THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO MATTHEW

Title] GOSPEL, from god and spel, “good message” or “news;” a translation of the Greek “euangelion,” which means the same. This name came to be applied to the writings themselves which contain this news, very early. Justin Martyr, in the second century speaks of “the memoirs drawn up by the Apostles, which are called gospels (euangelia).”

according to Matthew] as delivered by Matthew, implies authorship or editorship. It is not merely equivalent to of Matthew, which would have been said, had it been meant. Nor does it signify that the original teaching was Matthew’s and the present gospel drawn up after that teaching. Eusebius tells us, that Matthew “delivered to writing the gospel according to him.”

Matthew: Chapter 1

CHAP. I. 1–17.] GENEALOGY OF JESUS CHRIST.

1. book of the generation] Not always used of a pedigree only: see reff. Here however it appears that it refers exclusively to the genealogy, by “Jesus Christ” being used in the enunciation, and the close being “Jesus which is called Christ.” Then ver. 17 forms a conclusion to it, and ver. 18 passes on to other matter.

Jesus] See on ver. 21.

Christ] The word is equivalent to the Hebrew Messiah, anointed. It is used of kings, priests, prophets, and of the promised Deliverer. It is here used (see ver. 16) in that sense in which it became affixed to Jesus as the name of our Lord. It does not once thus occur in the progress of the Evangelic history; only in the prefatory parts of the Gospels, here and vv. 16, 17, 18: Mark i. 1: John i. 17, and once in the mouth of our Lord Himself, John xvii. 3; but continually in the Acts and Epistles. This may serve to shew that the evangelic memoirs themselves were of earlier date than their incorporation into our present Gospels.

son... son] both times refers to our Lord. Son of David was an especial title of the Messiah: see reff. That He should be son of Abraham, was too solemn a subject of prophecy to be omitted here, even though implied in the other. These words serve to shew the character of the Gospel, as written for Jews. Luke, ch. iii. 23 ff., carries his genealogy farther back.

2. and his brethren] These additions probably indicate that Matt. did not take his genealogy from any family or public documents, but constructed it himself.

3.] These children of Judah were not born in marriage: see Gen. xxxviii. 16–30. Both the sons are named, probably as recalling the incident connected with their birth. The reason for the women (Thamar, Rahab, Ruth, and Bathsheba) being mentioned, has been variously assigned: it might be, to meet the objection of the Jews to our Lord’s birth: or for the sake of minute accuracy. It most probably is, that the Evangelist omitted what was ordinary, but stated what was doubtful or singular. It has been suggested, that as these women are of Gentile origin or dubious character, they may be mentioned as introducing the calling of Gentiles and sinners by our Lord: also, that they may serve as types of the mother of our Lord, and are consequently named in the course of the genealogy, as she is at the end of it.

5. Rachab] It has been imagined, on chronological grounds, that this Rachab must be a different person from Rahab of Jericho. But those very grounds completely tally with their identity. For Naashon father of Salmon), prince of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 10), offered his offering at the setting up of the tabernacle (Num. vii. 12) 39 years before the taking of Jericho. So that Salmon would be of mature age at or soon after that event; at which time Rahab was probably young, as her father and mother were living (Josh. vi. 23). Nor is it any objection that Achan, the fourth in descent from Judah by Zara, is contemporary with Salmon, the sixth of the other branch: since the generations in the line of Zara average 69 years, and those in the line of Phares 49, both within the limits of probability. The difficulty of the interval of 366 years between Rahab and David does not to this passage only, but equally to Ruth iv. 21, 22; and is by no means insuperable, especially when the extreme old age of Jesse, implied in 1 Sam. xvii. 12, is considered.—I may add that, considering Rahab’s father and mother were alive, the house would hardly be called the house Of Rahab except on account of the character commonly assigned to her.

8. Joram... Ozias] Three kings, viz. Ahaziah, Joash, Amaziah (1 Chron. iii. 11, 12), are here omitted. Some think that they were erased on account of their connexion, by means of Athaliah, with the accursed house of Ahab. Simeon is omitted by Moses in blessing the tribes (Deut. xxxiv.): the descendants of Zebulun and Dan are over in 1 Chron., and none of the latter tribe are sealed in Rev. vii. But more probably such erasure, even if justifiable by that reason, was not made on account of it, but for convenience, in order to square the numbers of the different portions of the genealogies, as here. Compare, as illustrating such omissions, 1 Chron. viii. 1 with Gen. xlvi. 21.

11. Josias... Jechonias] Eliakim, son of Josiah and father of Jechonias, is omitted; which was objected to the Christians by Porphyry. The reading which inserts Joacim (i. e. Eliakim) rests on hardly any foundation, and would make fifteen generations in the second “fourteen.” The solution of the difficulty by supposing the name to apply to both Eliakim and his son, and to mean the former in ver. 11 and the latter in ver. 12, is unsupported by example, and contrary to the usage of the genealogy. When we notice that the brethren of Jechonias are his uncles, and find this way of speaking sanctioned by 2 Chron. xxxvi. 10, where Zedekiah, one of these, is called his brother, we are led to seek our solution in some manner of speaking of these kings, by which Eliakim and his son were not accounted two distinct generations. If we compare 1 Chron. iii. 16 with 2 Kings xxiv. 17, we can hardly fail to see that there is some confusion in the records of Josiah’s family. In the latter passage, where we have “his father’s brother,” the LXX render “his son.”

12. Jechonias.... Salathiel] So also the genealogy in 1 Chron. iii. 17. When, therefore, it is denounced (Jer. xxii. 30) that Jechoniah should be ‘childless,’ this word must be understood as explained by the rest of the verse, ‘for no man of his seed shall prosper, sitting upon the throne of David and ruling any more in Judah.’

Salathiel... Zorobabel] There is no difficulty here which does not also exist in the O.T. Zerubbabel is there usually called the son of Shealtiel (Salathiel). Ezra iii. 2, &c. Neh. xii. 1, &c. Hag. i. 1, &c. In 1 Chron. iii. 19, Zerubbabel is said to have been the son of Pedaiah, brother of Salathiel. Either this may have been a different Zerubbabel, or Salathiel may, according to the law, have raised up seed to his brother.

18. Zorobabel.... Abiud] Abiud is not mentioned as a son of the Zerubbabel in 1 Chron. iii.—Lord A. Hervey, On the Genealogies of our Lord, p. 122 ff., has made it probable that Abiud is identical with the Hodaiah of 1 Chron. iii. 24, and the Juda of Luke iii. 26—On the comparison of this genealogy with that given in Luke, see notes, Luke iii. 23–38.

17. fourteen generations] If we carefully observe Matthew’s arrangement, we shall have no difficulty in completing the three “fourteens.” For the first is from Abraham to David, of course inclusive. The second from David (again inclusive) to the migration; which gives no name, as before, to be included in both the second and third periods, but which is mentioned simultaneously with the begetting of Jechonias, leaving him for the third period. This last, then, takes in from Jechonias to JESUS CHRIST inclusive. So that the three stand thus, according to the words of this verse: (1) from Abraham to David. (2) From David to the migration to Babylon, i.e. about the time when Josiah begat Jechonias. (3) From the migration (i. e. from Jechonias) to Christ.

18–25.] CIRCUMSTANCES OF HIS BIRTH.

18. espoused] i.e. betrothed. The interval between betrothal and the consummation of marriage was sometimes considerable, during which the betrothed remained in her father’s house, till the bridegroom came and fetched her. See Deut. xx. 7 came together] Here to be understood of living together in one house as man and wife. Chrysostom well suggests, that the conception was not allowed to take place before the betrothal, both that the matter might take place more in privacy, and that the Blessed Virgin might escape slanderous suspicion.

was found] not merely for was, as some have said, but in its proper meaning:—she was discovered to be, no matter by whom. The words “of (by) the Holy Ghost,” are the addition of the Evangelist declaring the matter of fact, and do not belong to the discovery.

19. husband] so called, though they were as yet but betrothed: so in Gen. xxix. 21. Deut. xxii. 24.

just] “and not willing” is, not the explanation of just, but an additional particular. He was a strict observer of the law,—and (yet) not willing to expose her. The sense of ‘kind,’ ‘merciful,’ proposed by some instead of just, is inadmissible.

privily] Not ‘without any writing of divorce,’ which would have been unlawful; but according to the form prescribed in Deut. xxiv. 1. The husband might either do this, or adopt the stronger course of bringing his wife to justice openly. The punishment in this case would have been death by stoning. Deut. xxii. 23.

20. behold] answers to the Hebrew “hinneh,” and is frequently used by Matt. and Luke to introduce a new event or change of scene: not so often by Mark, and never with this view in John.

an angel] The announcement was made to Mary openly, but to Joseph in a dream; for in Mary’s case faith and concurrence of will were necessary—the communication was of a higher kind,—and referred to a thing future; but here it is simply an advertisement for caution's sake of an event which had already happened, and is altogether a communication of an inferior order: see Gen. xx. 3. But see on the other hand the remarks at the close of the notes on ver. 21.

son of David] These words would recall Joseph's mind to the promised seed, the expectation of the families of the lineage of David, and at once stamp the message as the announcement of the birth of the Messiah. May it not likewise be said, that this appellation would come with more force, if Mary also were a daughter of David? The addition, "thy wife," serves to remind Joseph of that relation which she already held by betrothal, and which he was now exhorted to recognize. See above on ver. 19.

21. Jesus] The same name as Joshua, the former deliverer of Israel. Philo says, "Jesus is, being interpreted, 'The salvation of the Lord.'"

He] emphatically: He alone: best rendered, perhaps, 'it is He that.' his people] In primary sense, the Jews, of whom alone Joseph could have understood the words: but in the larger sense, all who believe on Him: an explanation which the tenor of prophecy (cf. Gen. xxii. 18: Deut. xxxii. 21), and the subsequent admission of the Gentiles, warrant. Cf. a similar use of 'Israel' by St. Peter, Acts v. 31.

from their sins] It is remarkable that in this early part of the evangelic history, in the midst of pedigrees, and the disturbances of thrones by the supposed temporal King of the Jews, we have so clear an indication of the spiritual nature of the office of Christ. One circumstance of this kind outweighs a thousand cavils against the historical reality of the narration. If I mistake not, this announcement reaches further into the deliverance to be wrought, by Jesus, than any thing mentioned by the Evangelist subsequently. It thus bears the internal impress of a message from God, treasured up and related in its original formal terms.—"Sins" is not put for the punishment of sin, but is the sin itself—the practice of sin, in its most pregnant sense. 'How suggestive it is,' remarks Bishop Ellicott, 'that while to the loftier spirit of Mary the name of Jesus is revealed with all the prophetic associations of more than David's glories—to Joseph, perchance the aged Joseph, who might have long seen and realized his own spiritual needs, and the needs of those around him, it is specially said, thou shalt call his name Jesus: for He shall save his people from their sins.' Historical Lectures on the Life of our Lord, p. 56.

22. that it might be fulfilled] It is impossible to interpret that in any other sense than in order that. The words "all this was done," and the uniform usage of the N.T., forbid any other. Nor, if rightly viewed, does the passage require any other. Whatever may have been the partial fulfilment of the prophecy in the time of Ahaz, its reference to a different time, and a higher deliverance, is undeniable: and then, whatever causes contributed to bring about all this, might be all summed up in the fulfilment of the divine purpose, of which that prophecy was the declaration. The accomplishment of a promise formally made is often alleged as the cause of an action extending wider than the promise, and purposed long before its utterance. And of course these remarks apply to every passage where the phrase is used. Such a construction can have but one meaning. If such meaning involve us in difficulty regarding the prophecy itself, far better leave such difficulty, in so doubtful a matter as the interpretation of prophecy, unsolved, than create one in so simple a matter as the rendering of a phrase whose meaning no indifferent person could doubt. The immediate and literal fulfilment of the prophecy seems to be related in Isa. viii. 1–4. Yet there the child was not called Emmanuel: but in ver. 8 that name is used as applying to one of far greater dignity. Again, Isa. ix. 6 seems to be a reference to this prophecy, as also Micah v. 3.

23. the virgin] the words are from the Septuagint. Such is the rendering of the LXX. The Hebrew word is the more general term, "the young woman," and is so translated by Aquila.

they shall call] This indefinite plural is surely not without meaning here. Men shall call—i. e. it shall be a name by which He shall be called—one of his appellations. The change of person seems to shew, both that the prophecy had a literal fulfilment at the time, and that it is here quoted in a form suited to its greater and final fulfilment. The Hebrew has, 'thou shalt call' (fem.).

Emmanuel] i.e. God (is) with us. In Isaiah, prophetic primarily of deliverance from the then impending war; but also of final and glorious deliverance by the manifestation of God in the flesh.

25.] With regard to the much-controverted sense of this verse we may observe, (1) That the prima facie impression on the reader certainly is, that knew her not was confined to the period of time here mentioned. (2) That there is nothing in Scripture tending to remove this impression, either (a) by narration,—and the very use of the term, "brethren of the Lord" (on which see note at ch. xiii. 55), without qualification, shews that the idea was not repulsive: or (b) by implication,—for every where in the N.T. marriage is spoken of in high and honourable terms; and the words of the angel to Joseph rather imply, than discountenance, such a supposition. (3) On the other hand, the words of this verse do not require it: the idiom being justified on the contrary hypothesis. See my Greek Test. On the whole it seems to me, that no one would ever have thought of interpreting the verse any otherwise than in its prima facie meaning, except to force it into accordance with a preconceived notion of the perpetual virginity of Mary. It is characteristic, and historically instructive, that the great impugner of the view given above should be Jerome, the impugner of marriage itself: and that his opponents in its interpretation should have been branded as heretics by after ages. See a brief notice of the controversy in Milman, Hist. of Latin Christianity, i. 72 ff.

he called] i.e. Joseph; see ver. 21.

CHAP. II. 1-12.] VISIT AND ADORATION OF MAGI FROM THE EAST.

1. Bethlehem of Judæa] There was another Bethlehem in the tribe of Zebulun, near the sea of Galilee, Josh. xix. 15. The name Bethlehem-Judah is used, Judges xvii. 7, 8, 9; 1 Sam. xvii. 12. Another name for our Bethlehem was Ephrath; Gen. xxxv. 19; xlvi. 7; or Ephrata, Micah v. 2. It was six Roman miles to the south of Jerusalem, and was known as ‘the city of David,’ the origin of his family, Ruth i. 1, 19.

in the days of Herod] HEROD THE GREAT, son of Antipater, an Idumæan, by an Arabian mother, made king of Judæa on occasion of his having fled to Rome, being driven from his tetrarchy by the pretender Antigonus. This title was confirmed to him after the battle of Actium by Octavianus. He sought to strengthen his throne by a series of cruelties and slaughters, putting to death even his wife Mariamne, and his sons Alexander and Aristobulus. His cruelties, and his affection of Gentile customs, gained for him a hatred among the Jews, which neither his magnificent rebuilding of the temple, nor his liberality in other public works, nor his provident care of the people during a severe famine, could mitigate. He died miserably, five days after he had put to death his son Antipater, in the seventieth year of his age, the thirty-eighth of his reign, and the 750th year of Rome. The events here related took place a short time before his death, but necessarily more than forty days; for he spent the last forty days of his life at Jericho and the baths of Callirrhoe, and therefore would not be found by the magi at Jerusalem. The history of Herod’s reign is contained in Josephus, Antt. books xiv.—xvii.

It would be useless to detail all the conjectures to which this history has given rise. From what has been written on the subject it would appear, (1) That the East may mean either Arabia, Persia, Chaldæa, or Parthia, with the provinces adjacent. See Judges vi. 3: Isa. xli. 2; xlvi. 11: Num. xxiii. 7. Philo speaks of “the Eastern nations and their leaders the Parthians.” In all these countries there were magi, at least persons who in the wider sense of the word were now known by the name. The words in ver. 2 seem to point to some land not very near Judæa, as also the result of Herod’s enquiry as to the date, shewn in “two years old.” (2) If we place together (a) the prophecy in Num. xxiv. 17, which could hardly be unknown to the Eastern astrologers,—and (b) the assertion of Suetonius “that there prevailed an ancient and consistent opinion in all the East, that it was fated that at that time those should go forth from Judæa who should rule the empire:”—and of Tacitus, to the same effect and nearly in the same words,—and (c) the prophecy, also likely to be known in the East, of the seventy weeks in Daniel ix. 24;—we can, I think, be at no loss to understand how any remarkable celestial appearance at this time should have been interpreted as it was. (3) There is no ground for supposing the magi to have been three in number (as first, apparently, by Leo the Great, A.D. 450); or to have been kings. The first tradition appears to have arisen from the number of their gifts: the second, from the prophecy in Isa. Ix. 3. Tertullian seems to deduce it from the similar prophecy in Ps. lxxii. 10, for, he says, the Magi were most commonly kings in the East.

2. his star] There is a question, whether this expression of the magi, we have seen his star, points to any miraculous appearance, or to something observed in the course of their watching the heavens. We know the magi to have been devoted to astrology: and on comparing the language of our text with this undoubted fact, I confess that it appears to me the most ingenuous way, fairly to take account of that fact in our exegesis, and not to shelter ourselves from an apparent difficulty by the hypothesis of a miracle. Wherever supernatural agency is asserted, or may be reasonably inferred, I shall ever be found foremost to insist on its recognition, and impugn every device of rationalism or semi-rationalism; but it does not therefore follow that I should consent to attempts, however well meant, to introduce miraculous interference where it does not appear to be borne out by the narrative. The principle on which this commentary is conducted, is that of honestly endeavouring to ascertain the sense of the sacred text, without regard to any preconceived systems, and fearless of any possible consequences. And if the scientific or historical researches of others seem to contribute to this, my readers will find them, as far as they have fallen within my observation, made use of for that purpose. It seems to me that the preliminary question for us is, Have we here in the sacred text a miracle, or have we some natural appearance which God in His Providence used as a means of indicating to the magi the birth of His Son? Different minds may feel differently as to the answer to this question. And, seeing that much has been said and written on this note in no friendly spirit, I submit that it is not for any man to charge another, who is as firm a believer in the facts related in the sacred text as he himself can be, with weakening that belief, because he feels an honest conviction that it is here relating, not a miracle, but a natural appearance. It is, of course, the far safer way, as far as reputation is concerned, to introduce miraculous agency wherever possible: but the present Editor aims at truth, not popularity.

Now we learn from astronomical calculations, that a remarkable conjunction of the planets of our system took place a short time before the birth of our Lord. In the year of Rome 747, on the 29th of May, there was a conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn in the 20th degree of the constellation Pisces, close to the first point of Aries, which was the part of the heavens noted in astrological science as that in which the signs denoted the greatest and most noble events. On the 29th of September, in the same year, another conjunction of the same planets took place, in the 16th of Pisces: and on the 5th of December, a third, in the 15th degree of the same sign. Supposing the magi to have seen the first of these conjunctions, they saw it actually in the East; for on the 29th of May it would rise 3½ hours before sunrise. If they then took their journey, and arrived at Jerusalem in a little more than five months (the journey from Babylon took Ezra four months, see Ezra vii. 9), if they performed the route from Jerusalem to Bethlehem in the evening, as is implied, the December conjunction, in 15° of Pisces, would be before them in the direction of Bethlehem, 1½ hour east of the meridian at sunset. These circumstances would seem to form a remarkable coincidence with the history in our text. are in no way inconsistent with the word star, which cannot surely (see below) be pressed to its mere literal sense of one single star, but understood in its wider astrological meaning: nor is this explanation of the star directing them to Bethlehem at all repugnant to the plain words of vv. 9, 10, importing its motion from S.E. towards S.W., the direction of Bethlehem. We may further observe, that no part of the text respecting the star, asserts, or even implies, a miracle; and that the very slight apparent inconsistencies with the above explanation are no more than the report of the magi themselves, and the general belief of the age would render unavoidable. If this subservice of the superstitions of astrology to the Divine purposes be objected to, we may answer with Wetstein, “We must infer therefore that these men came to their conclusion from the rules of their art: which though beyond all doubt futile, vain, and delusive, might yet be sometimes permitted to hit on a right result. Hence appears the wonderful wisdom of God, who used the wickedness of men to bring Joseph into Egypt,—who sent the King of Babylon against the Jews by auguries and divinations (Ezek. xxi. 21, 22), and in this instance directed the magi to Christ by astrology.”

It may be remarked that Abarbanel the Jew, who knew nothing of this conjunction, relates it as a tradition, that no conjunction could be of mightier import than that of Jupiter and Saturn, which planets were in conjunction A.M. 2365, before the birth of Moses, in the sign of Pisces; and thence remarks that that sign was the most significant one for the Jews. From this consideration he concludes that the conjunction of these planets in that sign, in his own time (A. D. 1463), betokened the near approach of the birth of the Messiah. And as the Jews did not invent astrology, but learnt it from the Chaldeans, this idea, that a conjunction in Pisces betokened some great event in Judæa, must have prevailed among Chaldaean astrologers.

It is fair to notice the influence on the position maintained in this note of the fact which seems to have been substantiated, that the planets did not, during the year B.C. 7, approach each other so as to be mistaken by any eye for one star: indeed not “within double the apparent diameter of the moon.” I submit, that even if this were so, the inference in the note remains as it was. The conjunction of the two planets, complete or incomplete, would be that which would bear astrological significance, not their looking like one star. The two bright planets seen in the east,—the two bright planets standing over Bethlehem,—these would on each occasion have arrested the attention of the magi; and this appearance would have been denominated by them his star.

in the east] i.e. either in the Eastern country from which they came, or in the Eastern quarter of the heavens.

to worship him] i.e. to do homage to him, in the Eastern fashion of prostration.

3. was troubled] Josephus represents these troubles as raised by the Pharisees, who prophesied a revolution. Herod, as a foreigner and usurper, feared one was born King of the Jews: the people, worn away by seditions and slaughters, feared fresh tumults and wars. There may also be a trace of the popular notion that the times of the Messiah would be ushered in by great tribulations.

4. when he had gathered] i.e. says Lightfoot, he assembled the Sanhedrim. For the Sanhedrim consisting of seventy-one members, and comprising Priests, Levites, and Israelites, under the term “chief priests” are contained the two first of these, and under “scribes of the people” the third.

the chief priests are most likely the High Priest and those of his race,—any who had served the office,—and perhaps also the presidents of the twenty-four courses (1 Chron. xxiv. 6).

the scribes consisted of the teachers and interpreters of the Divine law, the lawyers of St. Luke. But the elders of the people are usually mentioned with these two classes as making up the Sanhedrim. See ch. xvi. 21; xxvi. 3, 59. Possibly on this occasion the chief priests and scribes only were summoned, the question being one of Scripture learning.

6. And thou] This is a free paraphrase of the prophecy in Micah v. 2. It must be remembered that though the words are the answer of the Sanhedrim to Herod, and not a citation of the prophet by the Evangelist, yet they are by the latter as correct.

princes] or thousands (LXX). The tribes were divided into thousands, and the names of the thousands inscribed in the public records of their respective cities. In Judges vi. 15 Gideon says “Behold my thousand is weak in Manasseh” (see English version, margin), on which Rabbi Kimchi annotates, “Some understand Alphi to mean ‘my father,’ as if it were Alluph, whose signification is ‘prince or lord.’” And thus, it appears, did the Sanhedrim understand the word (which is the same) in Micah v. 2. The word, without points, may mean either “among the thousands,” or “among the princes. ” out of thee shall come] It has been remarked that the singular expression, which occurs both in Tacitus and Suetonius (see above), “there should go forth from Judæa,” may have been derived from these words of the LXX.

9.] stood over may mean ‘over that part of Bethlehem where the young child was,’ which they might have ascertained by enquiry. Or it may even mean, ‘over the whole town of Bethlehem.’ If it is to be understood as standing over the house, and thus indicating to the magi the position of the object of their search, the whole incident must be regarded as miraculous. But this is not necessarily implied, even if the words of the text be literally understood; and in a matter like astronomy, where popular language is so universally broad, and the Scriptures so generally use popular language, it is surely not the letter, but the spirit of the narrative with which we are concerned.

11. with Mary] No stress must be laid on the omission of Joseph here. In the parallel account as regarded the shepherds, in Luke ii. 16, he is mentioned. I would rather regard the omission here as indicating a simple matter of fact, and contributing to shew the truthfulness of the narrative:—that Joseph happened not to be present at the time. If the meaning of the house is to be pressed (as in a matter of detail I think it should), it will confirm the idea that Joseph and Mary, probably under the idea that the child was to be brought up at Bethlehem, dwelt there some time after the Nativity. Epiphanius, supposes that Mary was at this time on a visit to her Kindred at Bethlehem (possibly at a Passover) as much as two years after our Lord’s birth. But if Mary had kindred at Bethlehem, how could she be so ill-provided with lodging, and have (as is implied in Luke ii. 7) sought accommodation at an inn? And the supposition of two years having elapsed, derived probably from the “two years old” of ver. 16, will involve us in considerable difficulty. There seems to be no reason why the magi may not have come within the forty days before the Purification, which itself may have taken place in the interval between their departure and Herod’s discovery that they had mocked him. No objection can be raised to this view from the “two years old” of ver. 16: see note there. The general idea is, that the Purification was previous to the visit of the magi. Being persuaded of the historic reality of these narratives of Matt. and Luke, we shall find no difficulty in also believing that, were we acquainted with all the events as they happened, their reconciliation would be an easy matter; whereas now the two independent accounts, from not being aware of, seem to exclude one another. This will often be the case in ordinary life; e.g. in the giving of evidence. And nothing can more satisfactorily shew the veracity and independence of the narrators, where their testimony to the main facts, as in the t case, is consentient.

treasures] chests or bales, in which the gifts were carried during their journey. The ancient Fathers were fond of tracing in the gifts symbolical meanings: “as to the king, the gold: as to one who was to die, the myrrh: as to a god, the frankincense.” Origen, against Celsus; and similarly Irenæus. We cannot conclude from these gifts that the magi came from Arabia,—as they were common to all the East. Strabo says that the best frankincense comes from the borders of Persia.

13.] The command was immediate; and Joseph made no delay. He must be understood, on account of “by night” below, as having arisen the same night and departed forthwith. Egypt, as near, as a Roman province and independent of Herod, and much inhabited by Jews, was an easy and convenient refuge.

15. Out of Egypt] This citation shews the almost universal application in the N.T. of the prophetic writings to the expected Messiah, as the general antitype of all the events of the typical dispensation. We shall have occasion to remark the same again and again in the course of the Gospels. It seems to have been a received axiom of interpretation (which has, by its adoption in the N.T., received the sanction of the Holy Spirit Himself, and now stands for our guidance), that the subject of all allusions, the represented in all parables and dark sayings, was He who was to come, or the circumstances attendant on His advent and reign.—The words are written in Hosea of the children of Israel, and are rendered from the Hebrew.—A similar expression with regard to Israel is found in Exod. iv. 22, 23.

that it might be fulfilled must not be explained away: it never denotes the event or mere result, but always the purpose.

16.] Josephus makes no mention of this slaughter; nor is it likely that he would have done. Probably no great number of children perished in so small a place as Bethlehem and its neighbourhood. The modern objections to this narrative may be answered best by remembering the monstrous character of this tyrant, of whom Josephus asserts, “a dark choleric seized on him, maddening him against all.” Herod had marked the way to his throne, and his reign itself, with blood; had murdered his wife and three sons (the last just about this time); and was likely enough, in blind fury, to have made no enquiries, but given the savage order at once.—Besides, there might have been a reason for not making enquiry, but rather taking the course he did, which was sure, as he thought, to answer the end, without divulging the purpose. The word “privily” in ver. 7 seems to favour this view.

the borders thereof] The word coasts is the common rendering of the Greek horia in the A.V. It does not imply any bordering on a sea shore, but is an old use for parts, or neighbourhood, as côte in French. See margin of A.V.

the borders thereof will betoken the insulated houses, and hamlets, which belonged to the territory of Bethlehem.

from two years old] This expression must not be taken as any very certain indication of the time when the star did actually appear. The addition and under implies that there was uncertainty in Herod's mind as to the age pointed out; and if so, why might not the jealous tyrant, although he had accurately ascertained the date of the star's appearing, have taken a range of time extending before as well as after it, the more surely to attain his point?

17. that which was spoken by Jeremy] Apparently, an accommodation of the prophecy in Jer. xxxi. 15, which was originally written of the Babylonish captivity. We must not draw any fanciful distinction between "then was fulfilled" and "that might be fulfilled," but rather seek our explanation in the acknowledged system of prophetic interpretation among the Jews, still extant in their rabbinical books, and now sanctioned to us by N.T. usage; at the same time remembering, for our caution, how little even now we understand of the full bearing of prophetic and typical words and acts. None of the expressions of this prophecy must be closely and literally pressed. The link of connexion seems to be Rachel's sepulchre, which (Gen. xxxv. 19: see also 1 Sam. x. 2) was 'in the way to Bethlehem,' and from that circumstance, perhaps, the inhabitants of that place are called her children. We must also take into account the close relation between the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, which had long subsisted. Ramah was six miles to the north of Jerusalem, in the tribe of Benjamin (Jer. xl. 1: "Er-Ram, marked by the village and green patch on its summit, the most conspicuous object from a distance in the approach to Jerusalem from the South, is certainly 'Ramah of Benjamin.'") Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, p. 213; so that neither must this part of the prophecy be strictly taken.

20. for they are dead] The plural here is not merely idiomatic, nor for lenity and forbearance, in speaking of the dead; but perhaps a citation from Exod. iv. 19, where the same words are spoken to Moses, or betokens, not the number, but the category. Herod the Great died of a dreadful disease at Jericho, in the seventieth year of his age, and the thirty-eighth of his reign, A.U. C. 750.

22.] ARCHELAUS was the son of Herod by Malthace, a Samaritan woman: he was brought up at Rome; succeeded his father, but never had the title of king, only that of Ethnarch, with the government of Idumæa, Judæa, and Samaria, the rest of his father's dominions being divided between his brothers Philip and Antipas. But, (1) very likely the word reign is here used in the wider meaning:—(2) Archelaus did, in the beginning of his reign, give out and regard himself as king: (3) in ch. xiv. 9, Herod the Tetrarch is called the King.—In the ninth year of his government Archelaus was dethroned, for having governed cruelly the Jews and Samaritans, who sent an embassy to Rome against him, and he was banished to Vienne, in Gaul. This account gives rise to some difficulty as compared with St. Luke's history. It would certainly, on a first view, appear that this Evangelist was not aware that Nazareth had been before this the abode of Joseph and Mary. And it is no real objection to this, that he elsewhere calls Nazareth "His country," ch. xiii. 54, 57. It is perhaps just possible that St. Matthew, writing for Jews, although well aware of the previous circumstances, may not have given them a place in his history, but made the birth at Bethlehem the prominent point, seeing that his account begins at the birth (ch. i. 18), and does not localize what took place before it, which is merely inserted as subservient to that great leading event. If this view be correct, all we could expect is, that his narrative would contain nothing inconsistent with the facts related in Luke; which we find to be the case.—I should prefer, however, believing, as more consistent with the fair and conscientious interpretation of our text, that St. Matthew himself was not aware of the events related in Luke i. ii., and wrote under the impression that Bethlehem was the original dwelling-place of Joseph and Mary. Certainly, had we only his Gospel, this inference from it would universally be made.

turned aside must not be pressed into the service of reconciling the two accounts by being rendered 'returned'; for the same is used (ver. 14) of the journey to Egypt.

23. that it might be fulfilled] These words refer to the divine purpose in the event, not to that of Joseph in bringing it about.

which was spoken by the prophets] These words are nowhere verbatim to be found, nor is this asserted by the Evangelist; but that the sense of the prophets is such. In searching for such sense, the following hypotheses have been made—none of them satisfactory:—(1) Euthymius says, "Do not enquire what prophets said this: for you will not find out: because many of the prophetic books have perished, some in the captivities, some by neglect of the Jews, some also by foul play." So also Chrysostom and others. Bar the expression "by the prophets" seems to have a wider bearing than is thus implied. (2) Others say, the general sense of the prophets is, that Christ should be a despised person, as the inhabitants of Nazareth were (John i. 47). But surely this part of the Messiah's prophetic character is not general or prominent enough, in the absence of any direct verbal connexion with the word in our text, to found such an interpretation on: nor, on the other hand, does it appear that an inhabitant of Nazareth, as such, was despised; only that the obscurity of the town was, both by Nathanael and the Jews, contrasted with our Lord's claims. (3) The Nazarites of old were men holy and consecrated to God; e.g. Samson (Judg. xiii. 5), Samuel (1 Sam. i. 11), and to this the words are referred by Tertullian, Jerome, and others. But (a) our Lord did not (like John the Baptist) lead a life in accordance with the Nazarite vow, but drank wine, &c., and set himself in marked contrast with John in this very particular (ch. xi. 18, 19); and (b) the word here is not Nazarite, but Nazarene, denoting an inhabitant of Nazareth. (4) There may be an allusion to the Hebrew “Netser,” a branch, by which name our Lord is called in Isa. xi. 1, and from which word it appears that the name Nazareth is probably derived. So “learned Hebrews” mentioned by Jerome on Isa. xi. 1, and others. But this word is only used in the place cited; and in by far the more precise prophecies of the Branch, Zech. iii. 8; vi. 12: Jer. xxiii. 5; xxxiii. 15, and Isa. iv. 2, the word “Tsemach” is used.—I leave it, therefore, as an unsolved difficulty.

CHAP. III. 1–12.] PREACHING AND BAPTISM OF JOHN. Mark i. 1–8: Luke iii. 1–17 (John i. 6–28). Here the synoptic narrative (i. e. the narrative common to the three Evangelists) begins, its extent being the same as that specified by Peter in Acts i. 22, ‘from the baptism of John unto that same day that He was taken up from us.’ For a comparison of the narratives in the various sections, see notes on St. Mark. In this Gospel, I have generally confined myself to the subject-matter.

1. In those days] The last matter mentioned was the dwelling at Nazareth; and though we must not take the connexion strictly as implying that Joseph dwelt there all the intermediate thirty years, “those days” must be understood to mean that we take up the persons of the narrative where we left them; i.e. dwelling at Nazareth.

came] literally, comes forward—‘makes his appearance.’ Euthymius asks the question, whence? and answers it, from the recesses of the wilderness. But this can hardly be, owing to the “in the wilderness” following. The verb is used absolutely. The title “John the Baptist” shews that St. Matthew was writing for those who well knew John the Baptist as an historical personage. Josephus, in mentioning him, calls him “John who is called the Baptist.” John was strictly speaking a prophet; belonging to the legal dispensation; a rebuker of sin, and preacher of repentance. The expression in St. Luke, “the word of God came to John,” is the usual formula for the divine commission of the Prophets (Jer. i. 1: Ezek. vi. 1; viii. 1, &c.). And the effect of the Holy Spirit on John was more in accordance with the O.T. than the N.T. inspiration; more of a sudden overpowering influence, as in the Prophets, than a gentle indwelling manifested through the individual character, as in the Apostles and Evangelists.—The baptism of John was of a deeper significance than that usual among the Jews in the case of proselytes, and formed an integral part of his divinely appointed office. It was emphatically the baptism of repentance (Luke iii. 3), but not that of regeneration (Titus iii. 5).

We find in Acts xviii. 24–26; xix. 1–7, accounts of persons who had received the baptism of John, who believed, and (in Apollos's case) taught accurately the things (i. e. facts concerning the Lord; but required instruction (in doctrine), and rebaptizing in the name of the Lord Jesus. Whether the baptism practised by the disciples before the Resurrection was of the same kind, and required this renewal, is uncertain. The fact of our Lord Himself having received baptism from John, is decisive against the identity of the two rites, as also against the idea derived from Acts xix. 4, that John used the formula “I baptize thee in the name of Him who is to come.” His whole mission was calculated, in accordance with the office of the law, which gives the knowledge of sin (Rom. iii. 20), to bring men's minds into that state in which the Redeemer invites them (ch. xi. 28), as weary and heavy laden, to come to Him.

in the wilderness] Where also he had been brought up, Luke i. 80. This tract was not strictly a desert, but thinly peopled, and abounding in pastures for flocks. This wilderness answers to “all the country round about Jordan” in Luke iii. 3. See note on ch. iv. 1.

2. Repent] Used by the Baptist in the O.T. sense of turning to God as His people, from the spiritual idolatry and typical adultery in which the faithless among the Jews were involved. This, of course, included personal amendment in individuals. See Luke iii. 10–14. Josephus describes John as “‘commanding the Jews to practise virtue, and justice to their neighbour, and piety towards God, and thus to receive his baptism.’” the kingdom of heaven] An expression peculiar in the N.T. to St. Matthew. The more usual one is “the Kingdom of God:” but “the Kingdom of heaven” is common in the Rabbinical writers, who do not however, except in one or two places, mean by it the reign of the Messiah, but the Jewish religion—the theocracy. Still, from the use of it by St. Matthew here, and in ch. iv. 17, x. 7, we may conclude that it was used by the Jews, and understood, to mean the advent the Christ, probably from the prophecy in Dan. ii. 44; vii. 13, 14, 27.

3. For this is he] Not the words of the Baptist, meaning “for I am he,” as in John i. 23, but of the Evangelist; and “is” is not for “was,” but is the prophetic present, representing to us the place which the Baptist fills in the divine purposes, Of for, Bengel says well, that it gives the cause why John then came forward, as described in ver. 1, 2, viz. because it had been thus predicted.—The primary and literal application of this prophecy to the return from captivity is very doubtful. If it ever had such an application, we may safely say that its predictions were so imperfectly and sparingly fulfilled in that return, or any thing which followed it, that we are necessarily directed onward to its greater fulfilment—the announcement of the kingdom of Christ. Euthymius remarks, that the ways and paths of the Lord are men's souls, which must be cleared of the thorns of passion and the stones of sin, and thus made straight and level for His approach.

4. And the same John] rather, now John himself, recalling the reader from the prophetic testimony, to the person of John. As John was the Elias of prophecy, so we find in his outward attire a striking similarity to Elias, who was “an hairy man, and girt with a girdle of leather about his loins.” 2 Kings i. 8. The garment of camel’s hair was not the camel’s skin with the hair on, which would be too heavy to wear, but raiment woven of camel’s hair. From Zech. xiii. 4, it seems that such a dress was known as the prophetic garb: ‘neither shall they (the prophets) wear a rough garment to deceive.’

locusts] There is no difficulty here. The locust, permitted to be eaten, Levit. xi. 22, was used as food by the lower orders in Judæa, and mentioned by Strabo and Pliny as eaten by the Æthiopians, and by many other authors, as articles of food. Jerome mentions it as the custom in the East and Libya: and Shaw found locusts eaten by the Moors in Barbary. (Travels, p. 164.)

wild honey] See 1 Sam. xiv. 25. Here again there is no need to suppose any thing else meant but honey made by wild bees. Schulz found such honey in wilderness in our own time. See Psalm lxxxi. 16: Judg. xiv. 8: Deut. xxxii. 13.

5.] all the region round about Jordan means all the neighbourhood of Jordan not included in “Jerusalem and Judæa” before mentioned. Parts of Peræa, Samaria, Galilee, and Gaulonitis come under this denomination.—There need be no surprise at such multitudes going out to John. The nature of his announcement, coupled with the prevalent expectation of the time, was enough to produce this effect. See, as strictly consistent with this account, chap. xi. 7–15.

6. were baptized] When men were admitted as proselytes, three rites were performed—circumcision, baptism, and oblation; when women, two—baptism and oblation. The baptism was administered in the day-time, by immersion of the whole person; and while standing in the water the proselyte was instructed in certain portions of the law. The whole families of proselytes, including infants, were baptized. It is most probable that John’s baptism in outward form resembled that of proselytes. See above, on ver. 1. Some deny that the proselyte baptism was in use before the time of John: but the contrary has been generally supposed, and maintained. Indeed the baptism or lustration of a proselyte on admission would follow, as a matter of course, by analogy from the constant legal practice of lustration after all uncleannesses: and it is difficult to imagine a time when it would not be in use. Besides, it is highly improbable that the Jews should have borrowed the rite from the Christians, or the Jewish hierarchy from John.

confessing their sins] From the form and expression, this does not seem to have been merely ‘shewing a contrite spirit,’ ‘confessing themselves sinners,’ but a particular and individual confession; not, however, made privately to John, but before the people: see his exhortation to the various classes in Luke iii. 10–15: nor in every case, but in those which required it.

7. Pharisees and Sadducees] These two sects, according to Josephus, Antt. xiii. 5. 9, originated at the same period, under Jonathan the High Priest (B. C. 159–144). The PHARISEES, deriving their name probably from “Parash,” ‘he separated,’ took for their distinctive practice the strict observance of the law and all its requirements, written and oral. They had great power over the people, and are numbered by Josephus, as being, about the time of the death of Herod the Great, above 6000. We find in the Gospels the Pharisees the most constant opponents of our Lord, and His discourses frequently directed against them. The character of the sect as a whole was hypocrisy; the outside acknowledgment and honouring of God and his law, but inward and practical denial of Him; which rendered them the enemies of the simplicity and genuineness which characterized our Lord’s teaching. Still, among them were undoubtedly pious and worthy men, honourably distinguished from the mass of the sect; John iii. 1: Actsv. 34. The various points of their religious and moral belief will be treated of as they occur in the text of the Gospels.

The SADDUCEES are said to have derived their name from one Sadok, about the time of Alexander the Great (B. C. 323): but they were named from the Hebrew Tsaddik, righteousness, more probably. They rejected all tradition, but did not, as some have supposed, confine their canon of Scripture to the Pentateuch. The denial of a future state does not appear to have been an original tenet of Sadduceism, but to have sprung from its abuse. The particular side of religionism represented by the Sadducees was bare literal moral conformity, without any higher views or hopes. They thus escaped the dangers of tradition, but fell into deadness and worldliness, and a denial of spiritual influence. While our Lord was on earth, this state of mind was very prevalent among the educated classes throughout the Roman empire; and most of the Jews of rank and station were Sadducees.—The two sects, mutually hostile, are found frequently in the Gospels united in opposition to our Lord (see ch. xvi. 1, 6, 11; xxii. 23, 34; also Acts iv. 1); the Pharisees representing hypocritical superstition; the Sadducees, carnal unbelief.

come] It would appear here as if these Pharisees and Sadducees came with others, and because others did, without any worthy motive, and they were probably deterred by his rebuke from undergoing baptism at his hands. We know, from Luke vii. 30, that the Pharisees in general ‘were not baptized of him.’ the wrath to come] The reference of John’s ministry to prophecy concerning Elias, Mal iii. 1; iv. 5 (Mark i. 2), would naturally suggest to men’s minds ‘the wrath to come’ there also foretold. It was the general expectation of the Jews that troublous times would accompany the appearance of the Messiah. John is now speaking in the true character of a prophet, foretelling the wrath soon to be poured on the Jewish nation.

8.] therefore expresses an inference from their apparent intention of fleeing from the wrath to come: q.d. ‘if you are really so minded,’ ...

9. think not to say] Not merely equivalent to “say not:” but, Do not fancy you may say, &c. The expression to say within yourselves, as similar expressions in Scripture (e. g. Ps. x. 6, 11; xiv. 1: Eccl. i. 16; ii. 15, al. fr.), is used to signify the act by which outward circumstances are turned into thoughts of the mind.

of these stones] The pebbles or shingle on the beach of the Jordan. He possibly referred to Isa. li. 1, 2. This also is prophetic, of the admission of the Gentile church. See Rom. iv. 16: Gal iii. 29. Or we may take the interpretation which Chrysostom prefers, also referring to Isa. li. 1, 2: Think not that your perishing will leave Abraham without children: for God is able to raise him up children even from stones, as He created man out of dust at the beginning. The present tenses, “is laid,” “is cut down,” imply the law, or habit, which now and henceforward, in the kingdom of heaven prevails: ‘from this time it is so.’

II. whose shoes,&c.) Lightfoot shews that it was the token of a slave having become his master’s property, to loose his shoe, to tie the same, or to carry the necessary articles for him to the bath. The expressions therefore in all the Gospels amount to the same.

with the Holy Ghost, and with fire] This was literally fulfilled at the day of Pentecost: but Origen and others refer the words to the baptism of the righteous by the Holy Spirit, and of the wicked by fire. I have no doubt that this is a mistake in the present case, though apparently (to the superficial reader) borne out by ver. 12. The double symbolic reference of fire, elsewhere found, e.g. Mark ix. 50, as purifying the good and consuming the evil, though illustrated by these verses, is hardly to be pressed into the interpretation of fire in this verse, the prophecy here being solely of that higher and more perfect baptism to which that of John was a mere introduction. To separate off “with the Holy Ghost” as belonging to one set of persons, and “with fire” as belonging to another, when both are united in “you,” is in the last degree harsh, besides introducing confusion into the whole. The members of comparison in this verse are strictly parallel to one another: the baptism by water, the end of which is “repentance,” a mere transition state, a note of preparation,—and the baptism by the Holy Ghost and fire, the end of which is (ver. 12) sanctification, the entire aim and purpose of man’s creation and renewal. Thus the official superiority of the Redeemer (which is all that our Evangelist here deals with) is fully brought out. The superiority of nature and pre-existence is reserved for the fuller and more dogmatic account in John i.

12. whose fan,&c.] In the Rabbinical work Midrash Tehillim, on Ps. ii., the same figure is found: “The winnowing is at hand: they throw the straw into the fire, the chaff to the wind, but preserve the wheat in the floor; so the nations of the world shall be the conflagration of a furnace: but Israel alone shall be preserved.”

his floor] i.e. the contents of the barn-floor. Thus in Job xxxix. 12, “he will bring home thy seed, and gather thy barn” (literally). Or perhaps owing to the verb (shall cleanse from one end to the other), the floor itself, which was an open hard-trodden space in the middle of the field. See “The Land and the Book,” p. 538 ff., where there is an illustration. “Very little use is now made of the fan, but I have seen it employed to purge the floor of the refuse dust, which the owner throws away as useless,” p. 540.

chaff] Not only the chaff, but also the straw: see reff.: ‘all that is not wheat.’

13–17.] JESUS HIMSELF BAPTIZED BY HIM. Mark i. 9–11: Luke iii. 21, 22. It does not appear exactly when the baptism of our Lord took place. If the comparative age of the Baptist is taken into account, we should suppose it to have been about six months after this latter began his ministry. But this is no sure guide. The place was Bethany (the older reading), beyond Jordan; John. i. 28.

13. to be baptized] Why should our Lord, who was without sin, have come to a baptism of repentance? Because He was made sin for us: for which reason also He suffered the curse of the law. It became Him, being in the likeness of sinful flesh, to go through those appointed rites and purifications which belonged to that flesh. There is no more strangeness in His having been baptized by John, than in His keeping the Passovers. The one rite, as the other, belonged to sinners—and among the transgressors He was numbered. The prophetic words in Ps. xl. 12, spoken in the person of our Lord, indicate, in the midst of sinlessness, the most profound apprehension of the sins of that nature which He took upon him. I cannot suppose the baptism to have been sought by our Lord merely to honour John, or as knowing that it would be the occasion of a divine recognition of his Messiahship, and thus pre-ordained by God: but bonâ fide, as bearing the infirmities and carrying the sorrows of mankind, and thus beginning here the triple baptism of water, fire, and blood, two parts of which were now accomplished, and of the third of which He himself speaks, Luke xii. 50, and the beloved Apostle, 1 John v. 8.—His baptism, as it was our Lord's closing act of obedience under the Law, in His hitherto concealed life of legal submission, His fulfilling all righteousness, so was His solemn inauguration and anointing for the higher official life of mediatorial satisfaction which was now opening upon Him. See Rom. i. 3, 4. We must not forget that the working out of perfect righteousness in our flesh by the entire and spotless keeping of God's law (Deut. vi. 25), was, in the main, accomplished during the thirty years previous to our Lord's official ministry.

14. forbad) Rather, tried to hinder: the word implies the active and earnest preventing, with the gesture, or hand, or voice. There is only an apparent inconsistency between the speech of John in this sense, and the assertion made by him in John i. 33, 'I knew him not.' Let us regard the matter in this light:—John begins his ministry by a commission from God, who also admonishes him, that He, whose Forerunner he was, would be in time revealed to him by a special sign. Jesus comes to be baptized by him. From the nature of his relationship to our Lord, he could not but know those events which had accompanied his birth, and his subsequent life of holy and unblamable purity and sanctity. My impression from the words of this verse certainly is, that he regarded Him as the Messiah. Still, his belief wanted that full and entire assurance which the occurrence of the predicted sign gave him, which the word knew implies, and which would justify him in announcing Him to his disciples as the Lamb of God.

15. now] The exact meaning is difficult. It cannot well be that which the A.V. at first sight gives, that something was to be done now, inconsistent with the actual and hereafter-to-be-manifested relation of the two persons, Rather—'though what has been said (ver.] 4) is true, yet the time is not come for that:—as yet, now, are we is another relation (viz. our Lord as the fulfiller of the law, John as a minister of it), therefore suffer it.' "This 'now' is spoken from the Lord's foreknowledge, that this relation of subjection to John was only temporary, that hereafter their relative situations would be inverted." Meyer. Stier remarks that now was fulfilled the prophetic announcement of Ps. xl. 7, 8.

us] not for me, but for me and thee. I cannot help thinking that this word glances at the relationship and previous acknowledged destinations of the speakers. It has however a wider sense, as spoken by Him who is now first coming forth officially as the Son of Man, extending over all those whose baptism plants them in his likeness, Rom. vi.

righteousness] requirements of the law. See ch. vi. 1, where the sense is general, as here.

16. baptised] On this account I would make the following remarks. (1) The appearance and voice seem to have been manifested to our Lord and the Baptist only. They may have been alone at the time: or, if not, we have an instance in Acts ix. 7, of such an appearance being confined to one person, while the others present were unconscious of it. We can hardly however, with some of the Fathers, say, that it was "a spiritual beholding,"—or that "the appearance was a vision, not reality." (2) The Holy Spirit descended not only in the manner of a dove, but in bodily shape (||Luke): which I cannot understand in any but the literal sense, as THE BODILY SHAPE OF A DOVE, seen by the Baptist. There can be no objection to this, the straightforward interpretation of the narrative, which does not equally apply to the Holy Spirit being visible at all, which John himself asserts Him to have been (John i. 32–34), even more expressly than is asserted here. Why the Creator Spirit may not have assumed an organized body bearing symbolical meaning, as well as any other material form, does not seem clear. This was the ancient, and is the only honest interpretation. All the modern explanations of the "like a dove," as importing the manner of coming down belong to the vain rationalistic attempt to reduce down that which is miraculous. The express assertion of St. Luke, and the fact that all four Evangelists have used the same expression, which they would not have done if it were a mere medium of comparison, are surely a sufficient refutation of this rationalizing (and, I may add, blundering) interpretation. (3) Two circumstances may be noticed respecting the manner of the descent of the Spirit: it was, as a dove:—the Spirit as manifested in our Lord was gentle and benign. This was not a sudden and temporary descent of the Spirit, but a permanent though special anointing of the Saviour for his holy office. It 'abode upon Him,' John i. 32. And from this moment His ministry and mediatorial work (in the active official sense) begins. Immediately, the Spirit carries Him away to the wilderness: the day of His return thence (possibly; but see notes on John i. 29) John points Him out as the Lamb of God: then follows the calling of Andrew, Peter, Philip, and Nathanael, and the third day after is the first miracle at the marriage in Cana. But we must not imagine any change in the nature or person of our Lord to have taken place at his baptism. The anointing and crowning are but signs of the official assumption of the power which the king has by a right independent of, and higher than these. (4) The whole narrative is in remarkable parallelism with that of the Transfiguration. There we have our Lord supernaturally glorified in the presence of two great prophetic personages, Moses and Elias, who speak of His decease,—on the journey to which He forthwith sets out (ch. xvii. 22, compared with xix. 1); and accompanied by the same testimony of the voice from heaven, uttering the same words, with an addition accordant with the truth then symbolized. (5) In connexion with apocryphal additions, the following are not without interest: When Jesus had gone down to the water, a flame was lit up in the Jordan: and when He had come up from the water, lo, the heavens, &c. See also, my Greek Test. on this passage.

CHAP. IV. 1–11.] TEMPTATION OF JESUS. Mark i. 12, 13: Luke iv. 1–13.

1. led up of (by) the spirit] The Spirit carried Him away, (see Acts viii. 39,) “driveth him,” Mark i. 12. Had St. Luke’s “was led in (thus literally) the Spirit” been our only account, we might have supposed what took place to have been done in a vision: but the expressions in the two other Evangelists entirely preclude this. The desert here spoken of may either be the traditional place of the Temptation near Jericho (thence called Quarantaria: it is described in “The Land and the Book,” p. 617, as a high and precipitous mountain, with its side facin the plain perpendicular, and apparently as high as the rock of Gibraltar, and with caverns midway below, hewn in the rock), or as scripture parallelism between Moses, Elias, and our Lord, leads one to think, the Arabian desert of Sinai. to be tempted] The express purpose of His being led up. Hence it is evident that our Lord this time was not ‘led up’ of his own will and design: but, as a part of the conflict with the Power of Darkness, He was brought to the Temptation. As He had been subject to his earthly parents at Nazareth, so now He is subject, in the outset of his official course, to His Heavenly Parent, and is by His will thus carried up to be tempted. In reverently considering the nature and end of this temptation, we may observe, (1) That the whole is undoubtedly an objective historical narrative, recording an actual conflict between our Redeemer and the Power of Evil. (2) That it is undetermined by the letter of the sacred text, whether the Tempter appeared in a bodily shape, or, as a spirit, was permitted to exert a certain power, as in ver. 5, and ver. 8, over the person of our Lord, even as the Holy Spirit did in ver. 1. If the latter were the case, the words spoken at the various of the temptation, were suggested by this Evil Power to the soul of our Redeemer. But (3) such an interpretation, while it cannot justly be accused of unreality by any who do not reject belief in the spiritual world, hardly meets the expressions of the text, “came (approached) to him,” ver. 9, and “leaveth him” ver. 11. Nor do the two members of ver. 11 correspond to one another in this case, for the angels must have been visible and corporeal, as in the parallel case at Gethsemane, Luke xxii. 43.

2. when he had fasted] Not in the wider ecclesiastical sense of the word, but its strict meaning, of abstaining from all food whatever; Luke, ver. 2. Similarly Moses, Exod. xxxiv. 28; and Elijah, 1 Kings xix. 8.

he was afterward an hungryd] Then probably not during the time itself. The period of the fast, as in the case of Moses, was Spent in a spiritual ecstasy, during which the wants of the natural body were suspended.

3. when the tempter came] From the words of both St. Mark and St. Luke, it appears that our Lord was tempted also during the forty days. Whether the words of St. Mark, “he was with the wild beasts,” allude to one kind of temptation, is uncertain: see note on Mark i. 13.—The words “came to him” need not be understood of the first approach, but the first recorded—‘at a certain time the tempter approaching, &c’

If thou be] “thinking to beguile Him with his flattery,” Chrys. Or, as Euthymius, “thinking that He would be irritated by this address, as being reproached with not being the Son of God.” At all events, there is no doubt expressed, as some think.

Son of God] Our Lord does not give way to the temptation, so as to meet him with an open declaration, ‘I am the Son of God:’ thus indeed He might have asserted his lordship over him, but not have been his Conqueror for us. The first word which He uses against him, reaches far deeper: ‘Man shall not live,’ &c. “This, like the other text, is taken from the history of Israel’s temptation in the wilderness: for Israel represents, in a foreshadowing type, the Son of Man, the servant of God Righteousness, the one that was to come, in whom alone that nature which in all men has degenerated into sin, ‘fulfils all righteousness’ Adam stood not,—Israel according to the flesh stood not,—when the Lord their God tempted them: but rather, after Satan’s likeness, tempted their God: but now the second Adam is come, the true Israel, by whose obedience the way of life is again made known and opened—“that man truly liveth on and in the eternal word of God.” Stier’s “Words of the Lord Jesus.” Observe also how our Lord resists Satan in His humanity; 3 at once here numbering Himself with men, by adducing “man” as including His own case; and not only so, but thus speaking out the mystery of his humiliation, in which He had foregone his divine Power, of his own will.—By ‘every word (or ‘thing,’ for the noun is not expressed in the original) that proceedeth out of the mouth of God,’ we must understand, every arrangement of the divine will; God, who ordinarily sustains by bread, can, if it please Him, sustain by any other means, as in the case alluded to. Compare John iv. 32, 34.

5. taketh him up] power being most probably given to the tempter over the person of our Lord. In St. Luke, this temptation stands third. The real order is evidently that in the text; for otherwise our Lord’s final answer, ver. 10, would not be in its place. It may be observed, that St. Luke makes no assertion as to succession, only introducing each temptation with and: whereas “then” and “again” here seem to mark succession. For “the holy city” see reff.

setteth him—by the same power by which he brought Him.

pinnacle] The general opinion, that our Lord was placed on Herod’s royal portico, is probably right. That portico overhung the ravine of Kedron from a dizzy height, so as to make one giddy with looking down, as described by Josephus, Antt. xv. 11.

5. The argument that it was probably on the other side, next the court, is grounded on the perfectly gratuitous assumption, that an exhibition to the people was intended. There is no authority for this in the text; the temptation being one not of ambition, but of presumption. The inference from Eusebius, who, quoting Hegesippus, (Hist. ii. 23) describes James the Just as set on and thrown from the pinnacle of the temple, among the people, is not decisive: for this term might embrace either side, as ‘the cornice,’ or ‘the parapet’ would.

6. It is written] cited (nearly verbatim from the LXX, as almost all the texts in this narrative) as applying to all servants of God in general, and à fortiori to the Son of God: not as a of the Messiah.

7. again] not ‘on the contrary,’ which the original word never simply means, not even in Gal. v. 3: 1 John ii. 8. The addition of a second Scripture qualifies and interprets the first; but does not refute it.

8.] The enquiry where and what this mountain was, is entirely nugatory, no data being furnished by the text.

sheweth him all the k. of the world] The additional words in Luke, “in a moment of time,” are valuable as pointing out to us clearly the supernatural character of the vision. If it be objected, that in that case there was no need for the ascent of the mountain,—I answer, that such natural accessories are made use of frequently in supernatural revelations: see especially Rev. xxi. 10. The attempts to restrict “the world” to Palestine, (which was, besides, God’s peculiar portion and vineyard, as distinguished from the Gentile world,) or the Roman empire, are mere subterfuges: as is also the giving to “sheweth” the sense of “points out the direction of.”

In this last temptation the enemy reveals himself openly, as the Prince of this world, and as the father of lies: for though power is given him over this world and its sons, his assertion here is most untrue.

10.] Our Lord at once repels him openly; not that He did not know him before,—but because he had thus openly tempted Him; but not even this of His own power or will; He adds, for it is written,—again, as Man, appealing to the word of God.—From this time, our Lord is known by the devils, and casts them out by a word. Mark i. 24, 34; iii. 11; v. 7.

11. leaveth him] but only for a season, see||Luke. The conflict, however often renewed in secret (of which we cannot speak), was certainly again waged in Gethsemane: see Luke xxii. 53, compare John xiv. 30. The expression in Luke x. 18, must be otherwise understood: see note there.

ministered] viz. with food, as in the case of Elias, 1 Kings xix. 6, 7.

12–22.] JESUS BEGINS HIS MINISTRY. CALLING OF PETER, ANDREW, JAMES, AND JOHN. Mark i. 14–20. Luke iv. 14, 15. Between the last verse and this is a considerable interval of time. After returning from the Temptation (see note on John i. 28, end) our Lord was pointed out by John the Baptist, (ib. vv. 29–34,) and again on the morrow to two of his disciples, Andrew and (probably) John, who followed Him, and were (on the next day? see note, John i. 44) joined by Simon Peter (35–43): then on the morrow Philip and Nathanael we recalled (44–52); three days after was marriage in Cana (ii. 1–11); then our Lord went down to Capernaum and remained not many days (12); then followed the Passover; the cleansing of the temple (13–22); the belief of many on Jesus (23–25); the discourse with Nicodemus (iii. 1–21); the baptizing by Jesus (i. e. his disciples) (22–24); the question about purifying, and testimony of the Baptist (25–36); the journey through Samaria into Galilee, and discourse with the woman of Samaria (iv. 1–42); the return to Cana, and healing of the ruler’s son in Capernaum (43–54); and the journey to Jerusalem related in John v. 1. After that chapter St. John breaks off the first part his narrative; and between his v. 47 and vi. 1, comes in the synoptic narrative, Matt. iv. 12—xiv. 15: Mark i. 14—vi. 30: Luke iv. 14—ix. 10. This omission is in remarkable consistency with St. Matthew’s account of his own calling in ch. ix. 9. Being employed in his business in the neighbourhood of Capernaum, he now first becomes personally acquainted with the words and actions of our Lord. From what circumstance the former miracle in Capernaum had not attracted his attention, we cannot, of course, definitely say; we can, however, easily conceive. Our Lord was not then in Capernaum; for the ruler sent to Him, and the cure was wrought by word at a distance. If Matthew’s attention had not been called to Jesus before, he might naturally omit such a narrative, which John gives probably from personal knowledge. The synoptic narrative generally omits this whole section of our Lord’s travels and ministry. Its sources of information, until the last visit to Jerusalem, seem to have been exclusively Galilean, and derived from persons who became attached to Him at a later period than any of the events recorded in that first portion of John’s Gospel. The objections to this view are, the narrative, in the three Gospels, of the baptism and temptation: but the former of these would be abundantly testified by John’s disciples, many of whom became disciples of Jesus; and the latter could only have been derived from the mouth of our Lord Himself.

12. delivered up] This seems to have been the usual and well-known term for the imprisonment of John. The same word in the original is also the usual one for the betrayal and apprehension of our Lord Himself.

departed] re-tired, withdrew; see ch. ii. 22, and note. No notice is given whence this withdrawal took place. The narrative is evidently taken up after an interval, and without any intention that it should follow closely on ver. 11. Wieseler sees in this a proof that St. Matthew recognized a ministry in Judæa during the interval. I cannot quite think this, but certainly he does not exclude it.

13. leaving Nazareth] Not on account of the behaviour of the Nazarenes to Him after the preaching in the Synagogue, Luke iv. 28, 29, as sometimes supposed; see notes, ib. ver. 31.

Capernaum] This town, on the borders of the lake of Gennesareth, was central in situation, and in the most populous and frequented part of Galilee. It besides was the residence of four at least of the Apostles, Andrew and Peter, and James and John—and probably of Matthew. “Kephar Nahum,” the village of consolation. So Josephus. It is from this time called ‘His own city,’ ch. ix. 1, see also ch. xvii. 24.

15.] This prophecy is spoken with direct reference to the days of the Messiah. It is here freely rendered from the Hebrew, without any regard to the LXX, which is wholly different. This, coming so immediately after a string of quotations literally from the LXX, seems to mark the beginning of a new portion of the Gospel, agreeably to what was said before.

the way of the sea] the country round the coast of the lake. All the members of this sentence are in apposition with one another: thus beyond Jordan is not a description of the land before spoken of, which was not thus situated, but of a different tract. The later meaning of the phrase, as signifying the tract to the west of the Jordan, and which naturally sprung during the captivity, is not to be thought of in Isaiah, who wrote before that event.

Galilee of the Gentiles] Galilee superior, near to Tyre and Sidon, which was inhabited by a variety of nations.

17. began to preach..] That is, began His ministry in Galilee. The account of Matthew, being that of an eyewitness, begins where his own experience began. It is not correct to suppose, as some of the German Commentators have done, (De Wette, Strauss,) that this preaching of repentance was of a different character from the after-teaching of our Lord: we recognize the same formula, though only partly cited, in ch. x. 7: Luke x. 10, and find our Lord still preaching repentance, Luke xiii. 3, after repeated declarations of His Messiahship.

18. by the sea of Galilee] The lake of Gennesareth or Tiberias (John vi. 1), called in the O.T. “the sea of Chinnereth,” Num. xxxiv. 11, or Chinneroth, Josh. xii. 3. It is of an oval shape, about 13 geographical miles long, and 6 broad: and is traversed by the Jordan from N. to S. “Its most remarkable feature is its deep depression, being no less than 700 feet below the level of the ocean.” See the interesting article by Mr. Porter in Smith’s Biblical Dictionary.

If we give any consideration to the circumstances here related, we cannot fail to see that the account in John is admirably calculated to complete the narrative. We have there furnished to us the reason why these two brethren were so ready to arise and follow One, whom, if we had this account only, we should infer they had never before seen. Add to this, that there is every probability that one of the other pair of brethren, John the son of Zebedee, is there described as having gone with Andrew to the dwelling of our Lord. It also tends to confirm the chronological view here taken, that Philip, the only one mentioned expressly by John as having been called by Jesus, is not mentioned here as called: and that Andrew, and the other disciple of John the Baptist, clearly were not called by Jesus in John i. 35–40, or the words “abode with him that day,” could not have been used: that these two continued disciples of the Baptist, is not probable; but that they were henceforth, but not invariably, attached to our Lord. I believe that the disciple whom Jesus loved was in His company during the whole of the events in John ii. iii. iv. and v., and on His return from Judæa with His disciples, John having for a time returned to his business, as our Lord was now resident in Capernaum, received, as here related, this more solemn and final call. We must remember, that the disciples would naturally have gone up to Jerusalem at the Passover, John ii. 23, without a call from the Lord, and by what they saw there would become more firmly attached to him. The circumstance related in John xxi, that even after they were assured of the Resurrection, the Apostles returned to their occupation as fishermen, gives additional probability to the usual nation of the call in our text.

20. left their nets, and followed him] i.e. from this time they were constant followers of the Lord. But when He happened to be in the neighbourhood of their homes, they resumed their fishing; cf. Luke v. 1–11, which occurrence was, in my belief, different from, and later than the one related in our text. See notes there.

23–25.] HE MAKES A CIRCUIT OF GALILEE. (Mark i. 89: Luke iv. 44, ordinarily: but qu.? There is no necessity for believing this circuit of Galilee to be identical with those, even if we read Galilee in the passage in Luke. Our Lord made many such circuits.)

23. synagogues] These were the places of religious assembly among the Jews after the return from the captivity. Tradition, and the Targums, ascribe a very early origin to synagogues: and Deut. xxxi. 11, and Ps. lxxiv. 8, are cited as testimonies of it. But the former passage does not necessarily imply it: and it is doubtful whether that Psalm was not itself written after the captivity. They are generally supposed to have originated in Babylon, and thence to have been brought, at the return, into the mother land. See Neh. viii. 1–8. At the Christian era there were synagogues in every town, and in some larger towns several. See Acts ix. 2, 20. In Jerusalem, according to the Rabbinical writings, there were upwards of 450. (See Acts vi. 9, and note.) The people assembled in them on sabbath and festival days, and in later times also on the second and fifth days of each week, for public prayer and the hearing of portions of Scripture. See Luke iv. 16: Acts xiii., 15. The officers of the synagogues were (1) the ruler of the synagogue, Luke viii. 49; xiii., 14: Acts xviii. 8, 17, who had the care of public order, and the arrangement of the service; (2) the Elders, Luke vii. 3: Mark v. 22: Acts xiii. 15, who seem to have formed a sort of council under the presidency of the Ruler; (3) the legate or angel of the assembly, who was the reader of prayers, and also secretary and messenger of the synagogues; (4) the minister (Luke iv. 20), or chapel clerk, whose office was to prepare the books for reading, to sweep, open, and shut the synagogue. Besides these, there appear to have been alms-gatherers. The synagogue was fitted up with seats, of which the first row were an object of ambition with the scribes (ch. xxiii. 6). A pulpit for the reader, lamps, and a chest, for keeping the sacred books, appear to complete the furniture of the ancient synagogue. Punishments, e.g. scourging, were inflicted in the synagogues. (See ch. x. 17; xxiii. 34: Luke ix. 49: Acts xxii. 19; xxvi. 11.) The catechizing also of children seems to have taken place there, as also disputations on religious questions.—Our Lord was allowed to read and teach in the synagogues, although of mean extraction according to the flesh, because of His miracles, and His supposed character as the professed leader and teacher of a religious sect.

preaching the gospel] For the exact meaning of these words, compare the declaration in the synagogue at Nazareth, Luke iv. 16–30.

24. Syria] Answering to “all the region round about Galilee,” Mark i. 28. On the possessed with devils, see note on ch. viii. 29. The lunatick were probably epileptics: see an instance in ch. xvii. 14 and parallels.

25. Decapolis] A district principally east of the Jordan, so called from ten cities, some of the names of which are uncertain.

beyond Jordan] Peræa. The country east of the Jordan, between the rivers Jabbok and Arnon. See Jos. B.J. iii. 3. 3.

CHAPP. V. VI. VII.] THE SERMON ON THE MOUNT. In this form peculiar to Matthew.

Without attempting a solution of the many difficulties which beset the question of time, place, and arrangement of our Lord’s Sermon on the Mount, I shall state the principal views of these subjects, and make some remarks upon them. One of the weightiest questions is, as to the identity or otherwise of the Sermon with that given in Luke vi. 20–49. There is (I) the view that they are identical. This is generally taken by ordinary readers of Scripture, from their similarity in many points. It is also taken by most of the modern German Commentators, who uniformly reject every attempt at harmonizing by supposing the same or similar words to have been twice uttered. This view is, however, beset by difficulties. For (a) the Sermon in Luke is expressly said to have been delivered after the selection of the Apostles: whereas that in the text is as expressly, by continual consecutive notes of time extending to the call of Matthew (before which the Apostles cannot have chosen,) placed before that event. And it is wholly unlikely that St. Matthew, assuming him to be the author of our Gospel, would have made a discourse, which he must have heard immediately after his call as an Apostle, take place that call.—Then (b) this discourse was spoken on a mountain,—that, after descending from a mountain, in the plain. Possibly this may be got over, by rendering St. Luke’s expression “on a level place.” See note on Luke: and the citation from Stanley below. And again (c), the two discourses are, though containing much common matter, widely different. Of 107 verses in Matt., Luke contains only thirty: his four beatitudes are balanced by as many woes: and in his text, parts of the sermon are introduced by sayings, which do not precede them in Matt. (e. g. Luke vi. 39 ff., 45 ff.), but which naturally connect with them. (II) St. Luke epitomized this discourse, leaving out whatever was unsuitable for his Gentile readers, e.g. ch. v. 17–38. But this is improbable: for Luke in several verses is fuller than Matthew, and the whole discourse, as related by him, is connected and consecutive. (III) The two discourses are wholly distinct. This view is maintained by Greswell, vol. ii, Diss. xi., and principally from the arguments above noticed. But it also is not without grave difficulties, especially if we suppose, as most do, that Luke had the Gospel of Matthew before him. That two discourses wholly distinct should contain so much in common, seems unlikely and unnatural. It is hardly credibly that two great public special occasions should be selected by the Lord near the commencement of His ministry, and two discourses delivered to the same audience, not identical, which might have been very probable, and impressive from that very circumstance,—nor consecutive, nor explanatory the one of the other, but, only coinciding in fragments, and not even as two different reports at the distance of some years might be expected to do. Add to this, that those parts of the discourses in which Luke and Matthew agree, occur in both in almost the same order, and that the beginning and conclusion of both are the same. (IV) St. Matthew gives a general compendium of the sayings of our Lord during this part of His ministry, of which St. Luke’s discourse formed a portion, or perhaps was another shorter compendium. But the last stated objection applies with still greater force to this hypothesis, and renders it indeed quite untenable. Besides, it labours under the chronological difficulty in all its bearings. And to one who has observed throughout the close contextual connexion of the parts in this discourse, it will be quite incredible that they should be a mere collection of sayings, set down at hazard. See notes throughout. (V) The apparent discrepancies are sometimes reconciled by remembering, that there is no fixed time mentioned in any Evangelist for the special ordination of the Apostles, and that it is very doubtful whether they were at any set moment so ordained all together. Thus Matthew may have been a usual hearer of our Lord, and present with the whole of the Apostles, as related in Luke, though not yet formally summoned as related in Matt. ix. 9 ff. The introduction of the discourse in Luke by the words “And it came to pass in those days” (which I maintain to be, on Luke vi. 12, not only possibly, but expressly indefinite, and to indicate that the event so introduced may have happened at any time during the current great period of our Lord’s ministry, before, during, or after, those last narrated,) allows us great latitude in assigning Luke’s discourse to any precise time. This, however, leaves the difficulties (above stated under I) in supposing the discourses identical, in force, except the chronological one.—With regard to the many sayings of this sermon which occur, dispersed up and down, in Luke, see notes in their respective places, which will explain my view as to their connexion and original times of utterance, in each several instance. See also notes on Luke vi. 20–49.

1. the mountain] Either some hill near Capernaum well known by this name, and called by it in the reff. to Mark and Luke, (tradition, not earlier probably than the Crusades, which points out a hill between Capernaum and Tiberias as the Mount of Beatitudes, near the present Saphet, is in such a matter worthless as an authority. But the situation seems to modern travellers [see Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, p. 368] “so strikingly to coincide with the intimations of the narrative, as almost to force the inference that in this instance the eye of those who selected the was for once rightly guided. It is the only height seen in this direction from the shores of the lake of Gennesareth. The plain on which it stands is easily accessible from the lake, and from that plain to the summit is but a few minutes’ walk. The platform at the top is evidently suitable for the collection of a multitude, and corresponds precisely to the ‘level place’ to which He would ‘come down’ as from one of its higher horns to address the people. Its situation is central both to the peasants of the Galilean hills, and the fishermen of the Galilean lake, between which it stands, and would therefore be a natural resort both to Jesus and His disciples when they retired for solitude from the shores of the sea, and also to the crowds who assembled ‘from Galilee, from Decapolis, from Jerusalem, from Judæa, and from beyond Jordan.’ None of the other mountains in the neighbourhood could answer equally well to this description, inasmuch as they are merged into the uniform barrier of hills round the lake: whereas this stands separate—‘the mountain,’ which alone could lay claim to a distinct name, with the exception of the one height of Tabor, which is too distant to answer the requirements,”) or the mountain district, certainly imported by the word in ch. xiv. 23.—See a full description of the locality in Tholuck, Bergpredigt, ed. 3, pp. 63 ff.

his disciples] in the wider sense: including those of the Apostles already called, and all who had, either for a long or a short time, attached themselves to him as hearers. See John vi. 66.

2. opened his mouth] as in reff., a solemn introduction to some discourse or advice of importance.

them] i.e. his disciples. The discourse (see vv. 13, 14, 20, 48; ch. vi. 9; vii. 6) was spoken directly to the disciples, but (see vii. 28, 29) also generally to the multitudes. It is a divine commentary on the words with which His own and the Baptist’s preaching opened: “Repent: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.” It divides itself into various great sections, which see below.

3-16.] THE DESCRIPTION OF the LORD’ S DISCIPLES, THEIR BLESSEDNESS< AND DIGNITY.

3. the poor in spirit] “He said not, the poor in possessions, but ‘in spirit:’ i.e. the lowly in purpose and in soul.” Euthymius. “What is ‘the poor in spirit?’ the humble and contrite in heart.” Chrys.—The meaning of voluntary poverty, as that of the religious orders, given by some of the Fathers, and many; Romish interpreters, is out of the question. As little can the bare literal sense of the words, which Julian scoffed at, be understood: viz. those who are ill-furnished in mind, and uneducated. See Rev. iii. 17. The idea (De Wette) is not improbable, that our Lord may have had a reference to the poor and subjugated Jewish people around him, once members of the theocracy, and now expectants of the Messiah’s temporal kingdom; and, from their condition and hopes, taken occasion to preach to them the deeper spiritual truth.

their’s is the kingdom of heaven] See Luke iv. 17–21: James ii. 5. The kingdom must here be understood in its widest sense: as the combination of all rights of Christian citizenship in this world, and eternal blessedness in the next, ch. vi. 33. But Tholuck well observes, that all the senses of “the kingdom of God,” or “of heaven,” or “of Christ,” are only different sides of the same great idea—the subjection of all things to God in Christ.

4.] The spiritual qualification in the former verse must be carried on to this, and the mourning understood to mean not only that on account of sin, but all such as happens to a man in the spiritual life. All such mourners are blessed: for the Father of mercies and God of all consolation being their covenant God, His comfort shall overbear all their mourning, and taste the sweeter for it. In Luke ii. 25, the Messiah’s coming is called “the consolation of Israel.”—This beatitude is by many editors placed after ver. 5. But the authority is by no means decisive, and I cannot see how the logical coherence of the sentence is improved by it.—In placing these two beatitudes first, the Lord follows the order in Isa. lxi. 1, which He proclaimed in the synagogue at Nazareth, Luke iv. 18.

5. the meek] A citation from Ps. xxxvii. 11. The usual dividers and allotters of the earth being mighty and proud conquerors, and the Messiah being expected as such a conqueror, this announcement that the meek should inherit the earth, struck at the root of the temporal expectations of power and wealth in the Messiah's kingdom. This meekness is not mere outward lowliness of demeanour, but that true meekness of Eph. iv. 2, whose active side is love, and its passive side long-suffering. On the promise, compare Isa. lvii. 13–15; lx. 21; 1 Cor. iii. 22. That kingdom of God which begins in the hearts of the disciples of Christ, and is not “of (sprung from) this world,” shall work onwards till it shall become actually a kingdom over this earth, and its subjects shall inherit the earth: first in its millennial, and finally in its renewed and blessed state for ever.

6.] See Ps. cvii. 9; lxv. 4; xxii. 26: Isa. xli. 17. This hunger and thirst is the true sign of that new life on which those born of the Spirit (John iii. 3, 5) have entered; and it is after righteousness, i.e. perfect conformity to the holy will of God. This was His meat, John iv. 34. They shall be satisfied—in the new heaven and new earth, in which dwelleth righteousness, 2 Pet. iii. 13. Compare the remarkable parallel Ps. xvii. 15. This hunger and thirst after righteousness, is admirably set forth in the three first petitions of the Lord's prayer,—‘Hallowed be Thy name—Thy kingdom come—Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven.’

7. merciful] “We may shew mercy, not by alms only, but by words: and if we have no other way, by tears. For manifold is the form of mercy, and wide is this command: They shall obtain mercy, here, from men; and there, from God,” Euthymius, expanding Chrysostom. This beatitude comprises every degree of sympathy and mutual love and help; from that fulness of it which is shed abroad in those who have been forgiven much, and therefore love much,—down to those first beginnings of the new birth, even among those who know not the Lord, which are brought out in ch. xxv. 37–40, where see notes.

8. pure in heart] See Ps. xxiv. 4, 6. It is no Levitical cleanliness, nor mere moral purity, that is here meant; but that inner purity, which (Acts xv. 9) is brought about by faith, has its fruit (1 Tim. i. 5) in love; which is opposed to all “double mindedness” (James i. 8), and all hypocrisy and outward colouring; so that pure in heart are those who have their “hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience.” There is an allusion to the nearer vision of God attained by progressive sanctification, of which St. Paul speaks, 2 Cor. iii. 18,—begun indeed in this life, but not perfected till the next, 1 Cor. xiii. 12.

9. peacemakers] More than ‘the peaceful’ (Vulg.) is doubtful whether the word ever has this meaning. Thus Euthymius, mostly after Chrysostom: They who not only are themselves not men of strife, but make peace between others when at strife. They shall be called sons of God, because they have imitated His only Son; whose office it is to bring together the separated and to reconcile those at variance. But even thus we do not seem to reach the full meaning, which probably is, “they that work peace,” not confining the reference to the reconciliation of persons at variance: see note on James iii. 18.

shall be called] implies the reality, as in ver. 19; shall (not only be, but also) be called, i.e. recognized, in the highest sense, both generally, and by the Highest Himself, as such. Let it ever be remembered, according to the order of these beatitudes, and the assertion of James iii. 17, that the wisdom from above is first pure, then peaceable, implying no compromise with evil. And it is in the working out of this purity that Luke xii. 51 is especially true. St. Augustine remarks, that martyrs are made not by the mere fact of suffering, but by the cause for which they suffer. And therefore it is added, ‘for righteousness' sake.’

10. persecuted] See 1 Pet. iii. 14; iv. 14, which probably refers to this verse. The repetition of the promise in ver. 8 is a close of the string of promises as it began.

11.] With the preceding verse the beatitudes end, in their general reference, and in this our Lord addresses His disciples particularly. The actions described in this verse are the expansion of persecuted in the last.

12. your reward] A reward, not of debt, but of grace, as parable in ch. xx. 1 ff. clearly represents it. ‘An expression,’ as De Wette observes, ‘taken from our earthly commerce, and applied to spiritual things;’ in which however we must remember, that the principal reference is to God as the giver, and not to us as the deservers: see the parable above cited, where the reward is not what was earned, but what was covenanted. These words, in heaven, must not be taken as having any bearing on the question as to the future habitation of the glorified saints. Their use in this end similar expressions is not local, but spiritual, indicating the blessed state when the kingdom of heaven shall have fully come. The local question is to be decided by wholly different testimonies of Scripture;—by the general tenor of prophecy, and the analogies of the divine dealings: and all of these seem to point rather to this earth, purified and renewed, than to the heavens in any ordinary sense of the term, as the eternal habitation of the blessed.

so persecuted they] For instance, Jeremiah was scourged, Jer. xx. 2; Zechariah son of Jehoiada was stoned, 2 Chron. xxiv. 21; Isaiah, according to Jewish tradition, was sawn asunder by Manasseh.—The reasoning implied in ‘for’ may be thus filled up: ‘and great will be their reward in heaven.’

13.] The transition from the preceding verses is easy and natural, from the “persecuted for righteousness’ sake,” of which vv. 11, 12 were a sort of application, and the allusion to the ancient Prophets, to “ye are the salt of the earth.”—Elisha healed the unwholesome water by means of salt (2 Kings ii. 20), and the ordinary use of salt for culinary purposes is to prevent putrefaction: so (see Gen. xviii. 23–33) are the righteous, the people of God, in this corrupt world.

It hardly seems necessary to find instances of the actual occurrence of salt losing its savour, for this is merely hypothetical. Yet it is worth noticing, that Maundrell, in his travels, found salt in the Valley of Salt, near Gehul, which had the appearance, but not the taste, having lost it by exposure to the elements (see the citation below);—and that Schöttgen maintains that a kind of bitumen from the Dead Sea was called ‘salt of Sodom,’ and was used to sprinkle the sacrifices in the temple; which salt was used, when its savour was gone, to strew the temple pavement, that the priests might not slip. This, however, is but poorly made out by him. Dr. Thomson, ‘The Land and the Book,’ p. 381, mentions a case which came under his own observation: where a merchant of Sidon had stored up a quantity of salt in cottages with earthen floors, in consequence of which the salt was spoiled, and Dr. T. saw “large quantities of it literally thrown into the street, to be trodden under foot of men and beasts.” He adds, “It is a well-known fact that the salt of this country, when in contact with the ground, or exposed to rain and sun, does become insipid and useless. From the manner in which it is gathered, much earth and other impurities are necessarily collected with it. Not a little of it is so impure that it cannot be used at all: and such salt soon effloresces and turns to dust—not to fruitful soil, however. It is not only good for nothing itself, but it actually destroys all fertility wherever it is thrown: and this is the reason why it is cast into the street.”

the earth means mankind, and all creation: but with a more inward reference, as to the working of the salt, than in “the world,” ver. 14, where the light is something outwardly shewn.

shall it be salted] it, i.e. the salt. The sense is: ‘If you become untrue to your high calling, and spiritually effete and corrupted, there are no ordinary means by which you can be re-converted and brought back to your former state, inasmuch as you have no teachers and guides over you, but ought yourselves to be teachers and guides to others.’ But we must not from this suppose that our Lord denies all repentance to those who have thus fallen: the scope of His saying must be taken into account, which is not to crush the fallen, but to quicken the sense of duty, and cause His disciples to walk worthily of their calling. (See Heb. vi. 4–6, and note on Mark ix. 49, 50.)

The salt in the sacrifice is the type of God’s covenant of sanctification, whereby this earth shall be again hallowed for Him: His people are the instruments, in His hand, of this wholesome salting: all His servants in general, but the teachers and ministers of His covenant in particular. There does not appear to be any allusion to ecclesiastical excommunication.

14. the light of the world] And yet only in a lower and derivative sense; Christ Himself being “the true light which lighteth every man,” John i. 9; “the light of the world,” viii. 12. His ministers are “candles,” John v. 35, and “lights,” Phil. ii. 15, receiving their light, and only burning for a time: lights lighted, whereas He is Light lighting, as Augustine. And here too, light in this verse = candle in ver. 15, where the comparison is resumed. so also Eph. v. 8:—light, as partaking of His Light: for every thing lighted (see note, ib. ver. 13) is light.

cannot be hid] Of course it is possible that our Lord may have had some town before Him thus situated, but not Bethulia, whose very existence is probably fabulous, being only mentioned in the apocryphal book of Judith. Recent travellers, as Dr. Stanley and Thomson (Sinai and Palestine, p. 429: The Land and the Book, p. 273), have thought that, notwithstanding the fact shewn by Robinson, that the actual city of Safed was not in existence at this time, some ancient portion of it, at all events its fortress, which is ‘as aged in appearance as the most celebrated ruins in the country’ (Thomson), may have been before the eye of our Lord as He spoke. It is ‘placed high on a bold spur of the Galilean Anti-Lebanon,’ and answers well to the description of a city ‘lying on the mountain top.’ The only other in view would be the village and fortress of Tabor, distinctly visible from the mount of Beatitudes, though not from the hills on the lake side. Either or both of these would suggest the illustration, which would be more striking from the fact, that this situation of cities on the tops of the hills is as rare in Galilee, as it is common in Judæa.’ Stanley, as above. But the CHURCH OF GOD, the city on a hill (Isa. ii. 2: Gal. iv. 26: see also Heb. xii. 22), in allusion to their present situation, on a mountain, is most probably leading thought.

15. do men light] literally, do they light: shewing, in the spiritual reference of the parable, that these lights of the world are ‘lighted’ by Him for whose use they are. See above.

16. so] i.e. like a candle on a candlestick—like a city on a hill; not merely, ‘so... that,’ as our English version seems rather to imply. By rendering in like manner, the ambiguity will be avoided. The sense of this verse is as if it were “that, seeing your good works they may&c.”... the latter verb, and not the former, carrying the purpose of the action. Thus the praise and glory of a well-lighted and brilliant feast would be given, not to the lights, but to the master of the house; and of a stately city on a hill, not to the buildings, but to those who built them.

The whole of this division of our Lord’s sermon is addressed to all His followers, not exclusively to the ministers of his word.

All servants of Christ are the salt of the earth, the light of the world (Phil. ii. 15). And all that is here said applies to us all. But à fortiori does it apply in its highest sense, to those who are, among Christians, selected to teach and be examples; who are as it were the towers and pinnacles of the city, not only not hid, but seen far and wide above the rest.

17-48.] The SECOND PART OF THE SERMON, in which our Lord sets forth His relation, as a lawgiver, to the law of Moses, especially as currently interpreted according to the letter only

17. I am come] more properly, I came. Observe how our Lord, through the whole sermon, sets forth Himself, in his proceeding forth from God, as truly “He that was to come.” the law, or the prophets] It is a question whether our Lord includes the prophecies, properly so called, in His meaning here. I think not: for no person professing himself to be the Messiah would be thought to contradict the prophecies, but to fulfil them. Neither, it appears, does He here allude to the sacrificial and typical parts of the law, but to the moral parts of both the law and the prophets; which indeed he proceeds to cite and particularize. If however we prefer to include both ceremonial and moral in this assertion, we may understand it in its more general sense, as applying, beyond the instances here given, to His typical fulfilment of the law, which could not as yet be unfolded.

to fulfil] This verb implies more than the mere fulfilling: it has the sense of filling out or expanding: i.e. here, giving a deeper and holier sense to—fulfilling in the spirit, which is nobler than the letter. Theophylact compares the ancient law to a sketch, which the painter does not wipe out, but fills in. The gnostic Marcion characteristically enough maintained that the Judaizing Christians had altered this verse, and that it originally stood,—think ye that I came to fulfil, &c.? I came to destroy, not to fulfil.

18. verily] literally, Amen: equivalent to “truly” in St. Luke, ix. 27; xii. 44; xxi. 3. jot (Iota) is the Hebrew Jod, the smallest letter in the alphabet: tittles, literally horns, horn-like projections, are the little turns of the strokes by which one Hebrew letter differs from another similar to it. The Rabbinical writings have many sayings similar in sentiment to this, but spoken of the literal written law.

It is important to observe in these days how the Lord here includes the O.T. and all its unfolding of the divine purposes regarding Himself, in His teaching of the citizens of the kingdom of heaven. I say this, because it is always in contempt and setting aside of the O.T. that rationalism has begun. First, its historical truth—then its theocratic dispensation and the types and prophecies connected with it, are swept away; so that Christ came to fulfil nothing, and becomes only a teacher or a martyr: and thus the way is paved for a similar rejection of the N.T.;—beginning with the narratives of the birth and infancy, as theocratic myths—advancing to the denial of His miracles—then attacking the truthfulness of His own sayings which are grounded on the O.T. as a revelation from God—and so finally leaving us nothing in the Scriptures but, as a German writer of this school has expressed it, ‘a mythology not so attractive as that of Greece.’ That this is the course which unbelief has run in Germany, should be a pregnant warning to the decriers of the O.T. among ourselves. It should be a maxim for every expositor and every student, that Scripture is a whole, and stands or falls together. That this is now beginning to be deeply felt in Germany, we have cheering testimonies in the later editions of their best Commentators, and in the valuable work of Stier on the discourses of our Lord. [Since however these words were first written, we have had lamentable proof in England, that their warnings were not unneeded. The course of unbelief which has issued in the publication of the volume entitled “Essays and Reviews,” has been in character and progress, exactly that above described: and owing to the injudicious treatment which has multiplied tenfold the circulation of that otherwise contemptible work, its fallacies are now in the hands and mouths of thousands, who, from the low standard of intelligent Scriptural knowledge among us, will never have the means of answering them. 1862. To this it may now be added, that even a Bishop of the Church of England has come before the world as a champion of that unbelief, in its first phase as described above. We may hope that his work, judging from the blunders already in the renderings of Hebrew words on which his arguments are founded, will soon be added to the catalogue of attacks by which the enemies of our holy faith have damaged nothing save their own reputation and influence. 1863.]

19.] There is little difficulty in this verse, if we consider it in connexion with the verse preceding, to which it is bound by the therefore and the these, and with the following, to which the for (ver. 20) unites it. Bearing this in mind, we see (1) that break, on account of what follows in ver. 20 and after, must be taken in the higher sense, as referring to the spirit and not the letter: whosoever shall break (have broken), in the sense presently to be laid down. (2) That these least commandments refers to one jot or tittle above, and means one of these minute commands which seem as insignificant, in comparison with the greater, as the jot and tittle in comparison with great portions of writing. (3) That shall be called least does not mean ‘shall be excluded from,’ inasmuch as the question is not of keeping or not keeping the commandments of in a legal sense, but of appreciating, and causing others to appreciate, the import and weight of even the most insignificant parts of God’s revelation of Himself to man; and rather therefore applies to teachers than to Christians in general, though to them also through the “break” and “do.” (4) That no deduction can be drawn from these words, binding the Jewish law, or any part of it, as such, upon Christians. That this is so, is plainly shewn by what follows, where our Lord proceeds to pour upon the letter of the law the fuller light of the spirit of the Gospel: thus lifting and expanding (not destroying) every jot and tittle of that precursory dispensation into its full meaning in the life and practice of the Christian; who, by the indwelling of the divine Teacher, God's Holy Spirit, is led into all truth and purity. (5) That these words of our Lord are decisive against such persons, whether ancient or modern, as would set aside the Old Testament as without significance, or inconsistent with the New. See the preceding note, and the Book of Common Prayer, Article vii.

On shall be called, see note on ver. 9.

20.) An expansion of the idea contained fulfil, ver. 17, and of the difference between break, which the Scribes and Pharisees did by enforcing the letter to the neglect of the spirit—and do and teach, in which particulars Christians were to exceed the Pharisees, the punctilious observers, and the Scribes, the traditional expounders of the law.

righteousness, purity of heart and life, as set forth by example in the doing, and by precept in the teaching. The whole of the rest of our Lord's sermon is a comment on, and illustration of, the assertion in this verse.

scribes] Persons devoted to the work of reading and expounding the law, whose office seems first to have become frequent after the return from Babylon. They generally appear in the N.T. in connexion with the Pharisees: but it appears from Acts xxiii. 9, that there were Scribes attached to the other sects also. In Matt. xxi. 15, they appear with the chief priests; but it is in the temple, where (see also Luke xx. 1) they acted as a sort of police. In the description of the assembling of the great Sanhedrim (Matt. xxvi. 3; Mark xiv. 53; xv. 1) we find it composed of chief priests, elders, and Scribes; and in Luke xxii. 66, of chief priests and Scribes. The Scribes uniformly opposed themselves to our Lord; watching Him to find matter of accusation, Luke vi. 7; xi. 53, 54; perverting His sayings, Matt. ix. 3, and His actions, Luke v. 30; xv. 2; seeking to entangle Him by questions, Matt. xxii. 35 (see note there); Luke x. 25; xx. 21; and to embarrass Him, Matt. xii. 38. Their authority as expounders of the law is recognized by our Lord Himself, Matt. xxiii. 1, 2; their adherence to the oral traditional exposition proved, Matt. xv. 1 ff.; the respect in which they were held by the people shewn, Luke xx. 46; their existence indicated not only in Jerusalem, but also in Galilee, Luke v. 17,—and in Rome, Josephus, Antt. xviii. 3. 5. They kept schools and auditories for teaching the youth, Luke ii. 46; Acts v. 34, compared with xxii. 3; are called by Josephus expounders of our patriarchal laws, Antt. xvii. 6. 2; sophists, B.J. i. 33. 2. The literal rendering is "shall abound more than the Scribes and Pharisees," i.e. more than that of the S. and P. Notice, that not only the hypocrites among the Scribes and Pharisees are here meant; but the declaration is, "Your righteousness must be of a higher order than any yet attained, or conceived, by Scribe or Pharisee."

ye shall in no case enter, &c.] A very usual formula (see ch. vii. 21; xviii. 3; xix. 17, 23, 24; John iii. 5 al.); implying exclusion from the blessings of the Christian state, and from the inheritance of eternal life.

21–48.] Six examples of the true FULFILMENT of the law by Jesus.—FIRST EXAMPLE. The law of murder.

21. Ye have heard] viz. by the reading of the law in the synagogues, and the expositions of the Scribes.

by them of old time] In this case, Moses and his traditional expounders are classed together; but the words may also be rendered, 'to the ancients',—which last interpretation seems to me to be certainly the right one. Meyer has well observed that "it was said to them of old time" corresponds to "but I say to you," and the "I" to the understood subject of "was said." He has not, however, apprehended the deeper truth which underlies the omission of the subject of was said, that it was the same person who said both. It will be noticed that our Lord does not here speak against the abuse of the law by tradition, but that every instance here given is either from the law itself, or such traditional teaching as was in accordance with it (e. g. the latter part of this verse is only a formal expansion of the former). The contrasts here are not between the law misunderstood and the law rightly understood, but between the law and its ancient exposition, which in their letter, and as given, were empty,—and the same as spiritualized, fulfilled, by Christ: not between two lawgivers, Moses and Christ, but between they of old time and you; between (the idea is Chrysostom's) the children by the same husband, of the bondwoman and of the freewoman. The above remarks comprise a brief answer to the important but somewhat misapprehended question, whether a impugned the Mosaic law itself, or only its inadequate interpretation by the Jewish teachers? There is no inconsistency in the above view with the assertion in ver. 19: the just and holy and true law was necessarily restricted in meaning and degraded in position, until He came, whose office it was to fulfil and glorify it.

the judgment] viz. the courts in every city, ordered Deut. xvi. 18, and explained by Josephus Antt. iv. 8. 14 to consist of seven men, and to have the power of life and death. But "the judgment" in the next verse (see note) is the court of judgment in the Messiah's kingdom.

23.] The sense is: 'There were among the Jews three well-known degrees of guilt, coming respectively under the cognizance of the local and the supreme courts; and after these is set the Gehenna of fire, the end of the malefactor, whose corpse, thrown out into the valley of Hinnom, was devoured by the worm or the flame. Similarly, in the spiritual kingdom of Christ, shall the sins even of thought and word be brought into judgment and punished, each according to its degree of guilt, but even the least of them before no less a tribunal than the judgment-seat of Christ.' The most important thing to keep in mind is, that there is no distinction of kind between these punishments, only of degree. In the thing compared, the “judgment” inflicted death by the sword, the “council” death by stoning, and the disgrace of the “Gehenna of fire” followed as an intensification of the horrors of death; but the punishment is one and the same—death. So also in the subject of the similitude, all the punishments are spiritual; all result in eternal death; but with various degrees (the nature of which is as yet hidden from us), as the degrees of guilt have been. So that the distinction drawn by the Romanists between venial and mortal sins, finds not only no countenance, but direct confutation from this passage. The words here mentioned must not be superstitiously supposed to have any damning power in themselves (see below), but to represent states of anger and hostility, for which an awful account hereafter must be given.

Raca] i.e. empty; a term denoting contempt, and answering to “O vain man,” James ii. 20.

Moreh] Two interpretations have been given of this interpretation have been given i word. Either it is (1), as usually understood, a Greek word, ‘Thou fool’ and used by our Lord Himself of Scribes and Pharisees, ch. xxiii. 17, 19,—and ‘fools’ (literally “senseless”) of the disciples, Luke xxiv. 25; or (2) a Hebrew word signifying ‘rebel,’ and the very word for uttering which Moses and Aaron were debarred from entering the land of promise:... ‘Hear now, ye rebels,’ Num. xx. 10. In presence of this doubt, it is best to leave the word untranslated, as was done with Raca before.

hell fire] more properly, the Gehenna of fire. To the S.E. of Jerusalem was a deep and fertile valley, called ‘the vale of Hinnom’ and rendered “Gehenna,” Josh xviii. 16 LXX. In this valley (also called Tophet, Isa. xxx. 33: Jer. vii. 31) did the idolatrous Jews burn their children to Moloch, and Josiah (2 Kings xxvii. 10) therefore polluted it; and thenceforward it was the place for the casting out and burning all offal, and the corpses of criminals; and therefore its name, “the Gehenna of fire,” was used to signify the place of everlasting punishment.

23 f. Therefore] An inference from the guilt and danger of all bitterness and hostility of mind towards another declared in the preceding verse.

thy gift, is any kind of gift—sacrificial or eucharistic.

hath ought against thee is remarkable, as being purposely substituted for the converse. It is not what complaints we have against others that we are to consider at such a time, but what they have against us; not what ground we have given for complaint, but what complaints they, as matter of fact, make against us.—See the other side dealt with, Mark xi. 25.

24.] be reconciled: i.e. become reconciled—thyself, without being influenced by the status of the other towards thee. Remove the offence, and make friendly overtures to thy brother. first belongs to “go thy way,” not to “be reconciled:” “first go thy way” is opposed to “then come,” the departure to the return, not “be reconciled” to “offer.” No conclusion whatever can be drawn from this verse as to the admissibility of the term altar as applied to the Lord’s table under the Christian system. The whole language is Jewish, and can only be understood of Jewish rites. The command, of course, applies in full force as to reconciliation re the Christian offering of praise and thanksgiving in the Holy Communion; but further nothing can be inferred.

25.] The whole of this verse is the earthly example of a spiritual duty which is understood, and runs parallel with it. The sense may be given: ‘As in worldly affairs, it is prudent to make up a matter with an adversary before judgment is passed, which may deliver a man to a hard and rigorous imprisonment, so reconciliation with an offended brother in this life is absolutely necessary before his wrong cry against us to the Great Judge, and we be cast into eternal condemnation.’—The adversary, in its abstract personification, is the offended law of God, which will cry against us in that day for all wrongs done to others; but in its concrete representation it is the offended brother, who is to us that law, as long as he has its claim upon us. The way, in the interpretation, is the way in which all men walk, the “way of all the earth” of 1 Kings ii. 2, the “way whence I shall not return” of Job. xvi. 22. In the civil process, it represents the attempt at arbitration or private arrangement before coming into court.

26.] These words, as in the earthly example they imply future liberation, because an earthly debt can be paid in most cases, so in the spiritual counterpart they amount to a negation of it, because the debt can never be discharged. We have “until he should pay what was due,” in ch. xviii. 30, where the payment was clearly impossible. The minister is the officer of the court who saw the sentences executed. If we are called on to assign a meaning to it in the interpretation, it must represent the chief of those who in ch. xviii. 34, are hinted at by “the tormentors,” viz, the great enemy, the minister of the divine wrath.

27–30.] SECOND EXAMPLE. The law of adultery.

28. whosoever looketh..] The precise meaning should in this verse be kept in mind, as the neglect of it may lead into error.

Our Lord is speaking of the sin of adultery, and therefore, however the saying may undoubtedly apply by implication to cases where this sin is out of the question—e. g. to the impure beholding of an un married woman with a view to fornication (it being borne in mind that spiritually, and before God, all fornication is adultery, inasmuch as the unmarried person is bound in loyalty and chastity to Him: see Stier below)—yet the direct assertion in this verse must be understood as applying to the cases where this sin is in question. And, again, the looketh on... to lust after, must not be interpreted of the casual evil thought which is checked by holy watchfulness, but the gazing with a view to feed that desire. And again, hath adulterously used her already in his heart, whatever it may undoubtedly imply respecting the guilt incurred in God's sight, does not directly state any thing; but plainly understood, affirms that the man who can do this—viz. ‘gaze with a view to feed unlawful desire’—has already in his heart passed the barrier of criminal intention; made up his mind, stifled his conscience; in thought, committed the deed. But perhaps there is justice in Stier’s remark, that our Lord speaks here after the O.T. usage, in which, both in the seventh commandment and elsewhere, adultery also includes fornication; for marriage is the becoming one flesh,—and therefore every such union, except that after the manner and in the state appointed by God, is a violation and contempt of that holy ordinance. The rendering of the A.V., “hath committed adultery with her,” is objectionable, as making her a party to the sin, which the original does not.

29.] Chrysostom observes, that these commands relate not to the limbs themselves, which are not in fault, but to the evil desire, which is. An admonition, arising out of the truth announced in the last verse, to withstand the first springs and occasions of evil desire, even by the sacrifice of what is most useful and dear to us. We may observe here, that our Lord grounds His precept of the most rigid and decisive self-denial on the considerations of the truest self-interest,—it is profitable for thee. See ch. xviii. 8, 9, and notes.

31 32.] THIRD EXAMPLE. The law of divorce. See note on ch. xix. 7–9. Lightfoot gives a form of the “writing of divorcement” which was a divorce a mensâ et thoro, and placed the woman absolutely in her own power, to marry whom she pleased. In Deut. xxiv. 1, the allowable reason of divorce is ‘some uncleanness.’ This the disciples of Shammai interpreted only of adultery; those of Hillel of any thing which amounted to uncleanness in the eyes of the husband.

32.] fornication must be taken to mean sin, not only before marriage, but after it also, in a wider sense, as including adultery likewise. In the similar places, Mark x. 11; Luke xvi. 18, this exception does not occur; see however our ch. xix. 9. The figurative senses of fornication cannot be admissible here, as the law is one having reference to a definite point in actual life; and this, its aim and end, restricts the meaning to that kind of fornication immediately applicable to the case. Otherwise this one strictly guarded exception would give indefinite and universal latitude.

and whosoever] How far the marriage of the innocent party after separation (on account of fornication) is forbidden by this or the similar passage ch. xix. 9, is a weighty and difficult question. By the Roman Church such marriage is strictly forbidden, and the authority of Augustine much cited, who strongly upholds this view, but not without misgivings later in life. On the other hand, the Protestant and Greek Churches allow such marriage. Certainly it would appear, from the literal meaning of our Lord’s words, that it should not be allowed: for if by such divorce the marriage be altogether dissolved, how can the woman be said to commit adultery by a second marriage? or how will St. Paul’s precept (1 Cor. vii. 11) find place? for stating this as St. Paul does, prefaced by the words “not I, but the Lord,” it must be understood, and has been taken, as referring to this very verse, or rather (see note there) to ch. xix. 6 ff., and consequently can only suppose fornication as the cause. Besides which, the tenor of our Lord’s teaching in other places (see above) seems to set before us the state of marriage as absolutely indissoluble as such, however he may sanction the expulsion a mensâ et thoro of an unfaithful wife. Those who defend the other view suppose divorced to mean, unlawfully divorced, not for fornication: and certainly this is not improbable. We may well leave a matter in doubt, of which Augustine could say, that it was so obscure, that error on either side is venial.

33–37.] FOURTH EXAMPLE. The law of oaths.

33, 34.] The exact meaning of these verses is to be ascertained by two considerations. (1) That the Jews held all those oaths not to be binding, in which the sacred name of God did not directly occur:—see Philo and Lightfoot cited in my Gr. Test. A stress is to be laid on this technical distinction in the quotation made by our Lord; and we must understand as belonging to the quotation, ‘but whatever thou shalt swear not to the Lord may be transgressed.’ (2) Then our Lord passes so far beyond this rule, that He lays down (including in it the understanding that all oaths must, be kept if made, for that they are all Ultimately referable to swearing by God) the rule of the Christian community, which is not to swear at all; for that every such means of strengthening a man’s simple affirmation arises out of the evil in human nature, is rendered requisite by the distrust that sin has induced, and is, therefore, out of the question among the just and true and pure of heart. See James v. 12, and note there, as explanatory why, in both cases, swearing by the name of God is not specified as forbidden. In the words, ‘Swear not at all,’ our Lord does not so much make a positive enactment by which all swearing is to individuals forbidden, e.g. on solemn occasions, and for the satisfaction of others, (for that would be a mere technical Pharisaism, wholly at variance with the spirit of the Gospel, and inconsistent with the example of God himself, Heb. vi. 13–17; vii. 21; of the Lord when on earth, whose "verily verily I say unto you" was a solemn asseveration, and who at once respected the solemn adjuration of Caiaphas, ch. xxvi. 63, 64; of His Apostles, writing under the guidance of His Spirit, see Gal. i. 20: 2 Cor. i. 23: Rom. i. 9: Phil. i. 8, and especially 1 Cor. xv. 31; of His holy angels, Rev. x. 6,) as declare to us, that the proper state of Christians is, to require no oaths; that when evil is expelled from among them, every yea and nay will be as decisive as an oath, every promise as binding as a vow. We observe (a) that these verses imply the unfitness of vows of every kind as rules of Christian action; (b) that the greatest regard ought to be had to the scruples of those, not only sects, but individuals, who object to taking an oath, and every facility given in a Christian state for their ultimate entire abolition.

34, 35.] Compare ch. xxiii. 16–22. Dean Trench observes (Serm. on Mount, p. 55), 'Men had learned to think that, if only God's name were avoided, there was no irreverence in the frequent oaths by heaven, by the earth, by Jerusalem, by their own heads, and these brought in on the slightest need, or on no need at all; just-as now-a-days the same lingering half-respect for the Holy Name will often cause men, who would not be wholly profane, to substitute for that name sounds that nearly resemble, but are not exactly it, or the name, it may be, of some heathen deity.'

36.] Thou hast no control over the appearance of grey hairs on thy head—thy head is not thine own;—thou swearest then by a creature of God, whose destinies and changes are in God's hand; so that every oath is an appeal to God. And, indeed, men generally regard it as such now, even unconsciously.

Yea, yea; Nay, nay] The similar place, James v. 12, admirably illustrates this—"let your yea be yea, and your nay nay:"—let these only be used, and they in simplicity and unreservedness.

cometh of evil] The gender of evil is ambiguous, as it may be also in the Lord's prayer, ch. vi, 13: but see note there. It is quite immaterial to the sense, in which gender we understand it; for the evil of man's corrupt nature is in Scripture spoken of as the work of "the evil One," and is itself "that which is evil." See John viii. 44: 1 John iii. 8.

38–41.] FIFTH EXAMPLE. The law of retaliation.

38.] That is, such was the public enactment of the Mosaic law, and, as such, it implied a private spirit of retaliation which should seek such redress; for the example evidently refers to private as well as public retribution. Here again our Lord appears to speak of the true state and perfection of a Christian community,—not to forbid, in those mixed and but half-Christian states, which have ever divided so-called Christendom among them, the infliction of judicial penalties for crime. In fact Scripture speaks, Rom. xiii. 4, of the minister of such infliction as the minister of God. But as before, our Lord shews us the condition to which a Christian community should tend, and to further which every private Christian's own endeavours should be directed. It is quite beside the purpose for the world to say, that these precepts of our Lord are too highly pitched for humanity, and so to find an excuse for violating them. If we were disciples of His in the true sense, these would, in their spirit, as indicative of frames of mind, be strictly observed; and, as far as we are His disciples, we shall attain to such their observance.

Here again, our Lord does not contradict the Mosaic law, but expands and fulfils it, declaring to us that the necessity for it would be altogether removed in the complete state of that kingdom which He came to establish.

Against the notion that an eye for an eye&c. sanctioned all kinds of private revenge, Augustine remarks that the ancient precept was rather intended to allay, than to stimulate anger; as a limit to vindictiveness, not a licence.

39.] Here again, we have our divine Lawgiver legislating, not in the bondage of the letter, so as to stultify His disciples, and in many circumstances to turn the salt of the earth into a means of corrupting it,—but in the freedom of the spirit, laying down those great principles which ought to regulate the inner purposes and consequent actions of His followers. Taken slavishly and literally, neither did our Lord Himself conform to this precept (John xviii. 22, 23), nor His Apostles (Acts xxiii. 3). But truly, and in the spirit, our blessed Redeemer obeyed it: 'He gave his back to the smiters, and his cheeks to them that plucked off the hair, and hid not his face from shame and spitting' (Isa. 1. 6): and his Apostles also, see 1 Cor. iv. 9–13.

evil] i.e. here the evil man; 'him who injures thee.' Or, perhaps, in the indefinite sense, as before, evil, generally, 'when thus directed against thee.' Only, the other possible meaning there, 'the evil One,' is precluded here. "Resist the devil," James iv. 7: but not this particular form of his working (viz. malice directed against thyself) so as to revenge it on another.

40, 41.]: See note on ver. 39. This is of legal contention only, and is thus distinguished from the violence in ver. 39.

coat, the inner and less costly garment; cloak, the outer and more valuable, used also by the poor as a coverlet by night (Exod. as above). In Luke vi. 29 the order is inverted, and appears to be that in which the two garments would be taken from the body, that verse referring to abstraction by violence. See the apostolic comment on this precept, 1 Cor. vi. 7.

compel] The original word is one derived from the Persian name of the post-couriers who carried the government despatches: and is thence used of any compulsory “pressing” to go on service. ‘The Jews particularly objected to the duty of furnishing posts for the Roman government; and Demetrius, wishing to conciliate the Jews, promised, among other things, that their beasts of burden should not be pressed for service. Hence our Saviour represents this as a burden.’ Josephus. The billeting of the Roman soldiers and their horses on the Jews was one kind of this compulsion.

42.] The proper understanding of the command in this verse may be arrived at from considering the way in which the Lord Himself, who declares, ‘If ye shall ask any thing in my name, I will do it’ (John xiv. 14), performs this promise to us. It would obviously be, not a promise of love, but a sentence of condemnation to us, understood in its bare literal sense; but our gracious Saviour, knowing what is good for us, so answers our prayers, that we never are sent empty away; not always, indeed, receiving what we ask,—but that which, in the very disappointment, we are constrained thankfully to confess is better than our wish. So, in his humble sphere, should the Christian giver act. To give every thing to every one—the sword to the madman, the alms to the impostor, the criminal request to the temptress—would be to act as the enemy of others and ourselves. Ours should be a higher and deeper charity, flowing from those inner springs of love, which are the sources of outward actions sometimes widely divergent; whence may arise both the timely concession, and the timely refusal.

borrow] without usury, which was forbidden by the law, Exod. xxii. 25: Levit. xxv. 37: Deut. xxiii. 19, 20.

43–48] SIXTH EXAMPLE. The law of love and hatred.

43.] The Jews called all Gentiles indiscriminately ‘enemies.’ In the Pharisaic interpretation therefore of the maxim (the latter part of which, although a gloss of the Rabbis, is a true representation of the spirit of the law, which was enacted for the Jews as a theocratic people), it would include the “hatred for mankind,” with which the Jews were so often charged. But our Lord’s ‘fulfilment’ of neighbourly love extends it to all mankind—not only foreign nations, but even those who are actively employed in cursing, reviling, and persecuting us; and the hating of enemies is, in His fulfilment of it, no longer an individual or national aversion, but a coming out and being separate from all that rebel.

45. sons] i.e. in being like Him. Of course there is allusion to our state of children by covenant and adoption; but the likeness is the point especially here brought out. So imitators of God, Eph. v. 1. The more we lift ourselves above the world’s view of the duty and expediency of revenge and exclusive dealing, into the mind with which the ‘righteous Judge, strong and patient, who is provoked every day,’ yet does good to the unthankful and evil,—the more firmly shall we assure, and the more nobly illustrate, our place as sons in His family, as having entered into the kingdom of heaven.

for] i.e. because, ‘in that:’ gives the particular in which the conformity implied by “sons” consists. There is a sentiment of Seneca remarkably parallel: “If thou wouldest imitate the gods, confer benefits even on the ungrateful: for the sun rises on the wicked as well as on others, and the seas are open for pirates’ use.”

46. publicans] This race of men, so frequently mentioned as the objects of hatred and contempt among the Jews, and coupled with sinners, were not properly the publicans, who were wealthy Romans, the rank of knights, farming the revenues of the provinces; but their underlings, heathens or renegade Jews, who usually exacted with recklessness and cruelty. “The Talmud classes them with thieves and assassins, and regards their repentance as impossible.” Wordsw. In interpreting these verses we must carefully give the persons spoken of their correlative value and meaning: ye, Christians, sons of God, the true theocracy, the Kingdom of heaven,—these, “publicans” or “Gentiles,” men of this world, actuated by worldly motives,—‘what thank have ye in being like them?’

47. salute] Here, most probably in its literal sense, Jews did not salute Gentiles: Mohammedans do not salute Christians even now in the East.

48. Be ye] The original is Ye shall be: not altogether imperative in meaning, but including the imperative sense: such shall be the state, the aim of Christians.

perfect] complete, in your love of others; not one-sided, or exclusive, as these just mentioned, but all-embracing, and God-like, = “merciful” Luke vi. 36.

ye is emphatic. No countenance is given by this verse to the ancient Pelagian or the modern heresy of perfectibility in this life. Such a sense of the words would be utterly at variance with the whole of the discourse. See especially vv. 22, 29, 32, in which the imperfections and conflicts of the Christian are fully recognized. Nor, if we consider this verse as a solemn conclusion of the second part of the Sermon, does it any the more admit of this view, asserting as it does that likeness to God in inward purity, love, and holiness, must be the continual aim and end of the Christian in all the departments of his moral life. But how far from having attained this likeness we are, St. Paul shews us (Phil. iii. 12); and every Christian feels, just in the proportion in which he has striven after it.

Matthew: Chapter 6

CHAP. VI. 1–18.] The THIRD DIVISION OF the SERMON, in which the disciples of Christ are warned against hypocritical display of their good deeds, by the examples of abuses of the duties of almsgiving (ver. 2), praying (ver. 5), and fasting (ver. 16).

1.] The discourse of our Lord now passes from actions to motives; not that He has not spoken to the heart before, but then it was only by inference, now directly.

righteousness] not ‘benevolence,’ or ‘alms,’ as in rabbinical usage,—for this meaning is never found in the N.T., and here we have doing alms treated of as a distinct head below. It is best then to understand righteousness as in ch. v. 20, as a general term, including the three duties afterwards treated of.

The words to be seen of (by) them clearly define the course of action objected to:—not the open benevolence of the Christian who lets his light shine that men may glorify God, but the ostentation of him whose object is the praise and glory coming from man. “For,” says Chrysostom, “a man may do his good deeds before men, but not in order to be seen by them; and a man may do them not before men, but in order to be seen by them.”

2. sound a trumpet] A proverbial expression, not implying any such custom of the hypocrites of that day, but the habit of self-laudation, and display of good works in general. Many Commentators, among whom are Calvin and Bengel, think that the words are to be taken literally: and Euthymins mentions this view. But Lightfoot says, that he finds no trace of such a practice among the customs in almsgiving.

before thee] According to the way in which the former verse is taken, these words are variously understood to apply to the trumpet being held up before the mouth in blowing, or to another person going before.

synagogues] If this bears the ordinary meaning of places of worship, the literal meaning of the previous words cannot well be maintained. The synagogues, as afterwards the Christian churches, were the regular places for the collection of alms.

3.] thy, emphatic: see ch. v. 48. This is another popular saying, not to be pressed so as to require a literal interpretation of it in the act of almsgiving, but implying simplicity, both of intention and act. Equally out of place are all attempts to explain the right and left hand symbolically, as was once the practice. The sound sense of Chrysostom preserves the right interpretation, where even Augustine strays into symbolism.

4. openly] before men and angels; at the resurrection of the just.

5–15] SECOND EXAMPLE. Prayer.

5. standing] No stress must be laid on this word as implying ostentation; for it was the ordinary posture of prayer. See 1 Sam. i. 26: 1 Kings viii. 22. The command in Mark (xi. 25) runs, “when ye stand praying...” See also Luke xviii. 11, 13. Indeed, of the two positions of prayer, considering the place, kneeling would have been the more singular and savouring of ostentation. The synagogues were places of prayer; so that, as Theophylact, it is not the place which matters, but the manner and intent.

6. enter, &c.] Both Chrysostom and Augustine caution us against taking this merely literally: and warn us, as above, that there may ostentation even in the secret chamber, as there may be the avoiding of it in the open church.

7.] On the original meaning of the word rendered “use vain repetitions,” see in my Gr. Test. Taking the word in its largest meaning, that of saying things irrelevant and senseless, it may well include all the various senses contended for. What is forbidden is not much praying, for our Lord Himself seed whole nights in prayer: not praying in the same words, for this He did in the very intensity of His agony at Gethsemane; but the making number and length a point of observance, and imagining that prayer will be heard, not because it is the genuine expression of the desire of faith, but because it is of such a length, has been such a number of times repeated. The repetitions of Paternosters and Ave Marias in the Romish Church, as practised by them, are in direct violation of this precept; the number of repetitions being prescribed, and the efficacy of the performance made to depend on it. But the repetition of the Lord’s Prayer in the Liturgy of the Church of England is not a violation of it, nor that of the Kyrie Eleison, because it is not the number of these which is the object, but each has its appropriate place and reason in that which is pre-eminently a reasonable service. Our Lord was also denouncing a Jewish error. Lightfoot quotes from the Rabbinical writings, “Every one who multiplies prayer, is heard.”

9–13.] THE LORD’ S PRAYER.

9.] There is very slender proof of what is often asserted, that our Lord took nearly the whole of this prayer from existing Jewish formalæ. Not that such a view of the matter would contain in it any thing irreverent or objectionable; for if pious Jews had framed such petitions, our Lord, who came to fulfil every thing that was good under the Old Covenant, might, in a higher sense and spiritual meaning, have recommended the same forms to His disciples. But such does not appear to have been the fact. Lightfoot produces only the most general common-place parallels for the petitions, from the Rabbinical books.

With regard to the prayer itself we may remark, 1. The whole passage, vv. 7–15, is digressive from the subject of the first part of this chapter, which is the discouragement of the performance of religious duties to be seen of men, and is resumed at ver. 16. Neander therefore supposes that this passage has found its way in here as a sort of accompaniment to the preceding verses, but is in reality the answer of our Lord to the request in Luke xi. 1, more fully detailed than by that Evangelist. But to this I cannot assent, believing our Lord’s discourses as given by this evangelist to be no collections of scattered sayings, but veritable reports of continuous utterances. That the request related in Luke should afterwards have been made, and similarly answered, is by no means improbable. (That he should have thus related it with this gospel before him, is more than improbable.) 2. It has been questioned whether the prayer was led in the very earliest times as a set form delivered for liturgical use by our Lord. The variations in Luke have been regarded as fatal to the supposition of its being used liturgically at the time when these Gospels were written. But see notes on Luke xi. 1. It must be confessed, that we find very few traces of such use in early times. Tholuck remarks, “It does not occur in the Acts, nor in any writers before the third century. In Justin Martyr we find, that the minister prays ‘according to his power’... Cyprian and Tertullian make the first mention of the prayer as a ‘lawful and ordinary prayer.’” An allusion to it has been supposed to exist in 2 Tim. iv. 18, where see note. 3. The view of some that our Lord gave this, selecting it out of forms known and in use, as a prayer ad interim, till the effusion of the Spirit of prayer, is inadmissible, as we have no traces of any such temporary purpose in our Saviour’s discourses, and to suppose any such would amount to nothing less than to set them entirely aside. On the contrary, one work of the Holy Spirit on the disciples was, to bring to their mind all things whatsoever He said unto them, the depth of such sayings only then first being revealed to them by Him who took of the things of Christ and shewed them to them, John xiv. 26.

After this manner] thus. Considering that other manners of praying have been spoken of above, the “vain repetition” and the “much speaking,” the word, especially in its present position of primary emphasis, cannot well be otherwise understood than ‘in these words,’ as a specimen of the Christian’s prayer (the ye holds the second place in emphasis), no less than its pattern. This, which would be the inference from the context here, is decided for us by Luke xi. 2, when ye pray, say—

Our Father] This was a form of address almost unknown to the Old Covenant: now and then hinted at, as reminding the children of their rebellion (Isa. i. 2: Mal. i. 6), or mentioned as a last resource of the orphan and desolate creature (Isa. lxiii. 16); but never brought out in its fulness, as indeed it could not be, till He was come by whom we have received the adoption of sons. “The prayer is a fraternal one; He saith not, My Father, as if prayed for himself only: bat Our Father, as embracing in one prayer all who are known as brethren in Christ.” Aug.

which art in heaven] These opening words of the Lord’s Prayer set clearly before us the state of the Christian, as believing in, depending upon, praying to, a real objective personal GOD, lifted above himself; to approach whom he must lift up his heart, as the eye is lifted up from earth to heaven. This strikes at the root of all pantheistic error, which regards the spirit of man as identical with the Spirit of God,—and at the root of all deism, testifying us it does our relation to and covenant dependence on our heavenly Father.

The local heavens are no farther to be thought of here, than as Scripture, by a parallelism of things natural and spiritual deeply implanted in our race, universally speaks of heaven and heavenly, as applying to the habitation and perfections of the High and Holy One who inhabiteth Eternity.

Hallowed be thy name] De Wette observes: ‘God’s ‘Name is not merely His appellation, which we speak—with the mouth, but also and principally the idea which we attach to it,—His Being, as far as it is confessed, revealed, or known.’ The ‘Name of God’ in Scripture is used to signify that revelation of Himself which He has made to men, which is all that we know of Him: into the depths of His Being, as it is, no human soul can penetrate. See John xvii. 6: Rom. ix. 17. Hallow here is in the sense of keep holy, sanctify in our hearts, as in ref. 1 Pet.

10. Thy kingdom come] Thy kingdom here is the fulness of the accomplishment of the kingdom of God, so often spoken of in prophetic Scripture; and by implication, all that process of events which lead to that accomplishment. Meyer, in objecting to all ecclesiastical and spiritual meanings of ‘Thy kingdom,’ forgets that the one for which he contends exclusively, the Messianic kingdom, does in fact include or imply them all.

Thy will be done] i.e. not, ‘may our will be absorbed into thy will;’ but may it be conformed to and subordinated to thine. The literal rendering is, Let thy will be done, as in heaven, (so) also on earth.

These last words, “as in heaven, so also on earth,” may be regarded as applying to the whole of the three preceding petitions, as punctuated in the text. A slight objection may perhaps be found in the circumstance, that the kingdom of God cannot be said to have come in heaven, seeing that it has always been fully established there, and thus the accuracy of correspondence in the particulars will be marred. It is true, this may be escaped by understanding, May thy kingdom come on earth, so as to be as fully established, as it is already in heaven. So that I conceive we are at liberty to take the prayer either way.

11. our daily bread] our—as ‘created for us,’ ‘provided for our use by Thee.’ The word rendered daily has been very variously explained. For a discussion of the probable derivations and meanings, I must refer to my Gr. Test. I have there seen reason to prefer the sense required for our subsistence—proper for our sustenance. So that the expression will be equivalent to St. James’s “things which are needful for the body” (ii. 16), and the expressions are rendered in the Syriac version by the same word. Thus only, this day has its proper meaning. The “day by day” in Luke xi. 3 is different; see there. It is a question, how far the expression may be understood spiritually—of the Bread of Life. The answer is easy: viz. that we may safely thus understand it, provided we keep in the foreground its primary, physical meaning, and view the other as involved by implication in that. To understand the expression of the Eucharist primarily, or even of spiritual feeding on Christ, is to miss the plain reference of the petition to our daily physical wants. But not to recognize those spiritual senses, is equally to miss the great truth, that the “we” whose bread is prayed for, are not mere animals, but com; of body, soul, and spirit, all of which want daily nourishment by Him from whom all blessings flow.

our debts] i.e. sins, short-comings, and therefore ‘debts:’ answers to “trespasses,” ver. 14. Augustine remarks, that those sins are not meant which are remitted in the regeneration of baptism, but those which are contracted day by day from the bitter fruits of worldly contact by our infirmity.

as we] Not ‘for we also,’ &c. (as in Luke), nor ‘in the same measure as we also,’ &c., but like as we also, &c.; implying similarity in the two actions, of kind, but no comparison of degree. ‘Augustine uses the testimony of this prayer against all proud Pelagian notions of an absolutely sinless state in this life’ (Trench); and answers the various excuses and evasions by which that sect escaped from the conclusion.

13.] The sentiment is not in any way inconsistent with the Christian’s joy when he “falls into divers temptations,” James i. 2, but is a humble self-distrust and shrinking from such trial in the prospect. The leading into temptation must be understood in its plain literal sense: so will make with the temptation also a way to escape, 1 Cor. x. 13. There is no discrepancy with James i. 13, which speaks not of the providential bringing about of, but the actual solicitation of, the temptation. Some have attempted to fix on leading into and entering into temptation, the meaning of bringing into the power of, and entering into, so as to be overcome by, temptation. But this surely the words will not bear.

But must not be taken as equivalent to ‘but if thou dost, deliver,’ &c.; but is rather the opposition to the former clause, and forms in this sense, but one petition with it,—‘b ring us not into conflict with evil, nay rather deliver (rid) us from it altogether’ In another view, however, as expressing the deep desire of all Christian hearts to be delivered from all evil (for the adjective is here certainly neuter; the introduction of the mention of the ‘evil one’ would seem here to be incongruous). Besides, compare the words of St. Paul, 2 Tim. iv. 18, which look very like a reminiscence of this prayer: see note there) these words form a seventh and most affecting petition, reaching far beyond the last. They are the expression of the yearning for redemption of the sons of God (Rom. viii. 28), and so are fitly placed at the end of the prayer, and as the sum and substance of the personal petitions.

The doxology must on every ground of sound criticism be omitted. Had it formed part of the original text, it is absolutely inconceivable that almost all the ancient authorities should with one consent have omitted it. They could have had no reason for doing so; whereas the habit of terminating liturgical prayers with ascriptions of praise would naturally suggest some such ending, and make its insertion almost certain in course of time. And just correspondent to this is the evidence. We find, absolutely no trace of it in early times, in any family of MSS. or in any expositors. The ancient Syriac version has it, but whether it always had, is another question. It is quite open for us to regard it with Euthymius as “a solemn ending, added by the holy lights and leaders of the Church,” and to retain it as such in our liturgies; but in dealing with the sacred text we must not allow any à priori considerations, of which we are such poor judges, to outweigh the almost unanimous testimony of antiquity. The inference to be drawn from the words of St. Paul, 2 Tim. iv. 18, is rather against, than for the genuineness of the doxology. The fact that he there adds a doxology, different from that commonly read here, seems to testify to the practice, begun thus early, of concluding the Lord's prayer with a solemn ascription of glory to God. This eventually fell into one conventional form, and thus got inserted in the sacred text.

14, 15] Our Lord returns (for) to explain the only part of the prayer which peculiarly belonged to the new law of Jove, and enforces it by a solemn assurance. On the sense, see Mark xi. 25, and the remarkable parallel, Ecclesiasticus xxviii. 2: "forgive thy neighbour the hurt that he hath done unto thee, so shall thy sins also be forgiven when thou prayest."

16–18.) THIRD EXAMPLE. Fasting. Another department of the spiritual life, in which reality in the sight of God, and not appearance in the sight of man, must be our object. While these verses determine nothing as to the manner and extent of Christian fasting, they clearly recognize it as a solemn duty, ranking it with almsgiving and prayer; but requiring it, like them, (see ch. ix. 14–17,) to spring out of reality, not mere formal prescription.

16. disfigure] The word literally means make to disappear. Hence some have explained it, hide, cover up, viz. in mourning costume. But in later Greek the meaning was to disfigure. One writer uses it of women who paint their faces. The allusion is therefore not to covering the face, which could only be regarded as a sign of mourning, but to the squalor of the uncleansed face, and hair of the head and beard, as the contrast of washing and anointing shews.

17.] i.e. 'appear as usual:' 'seem to men the same as if thou wert not fasting.' It has been observed that this precept applies only to voluntary and private fasts, (such as are mentioned Luke xviii. 12,) not to public and enjoined ones. But this distinction does not seem to be necessary; the one might afford just as much occasion for ostentation as the other.

19–34.] From cautions against the hypocrisy of formalists, the discourse naturally passes to the entire dedication of the heart to God, from which all duties of the Christian should be performed. In this section this is enjoined, 1. (vv. 19–24) with regard to earthly treasures, from the impossibility of serving God and Mammon: 2. (vv. 25–34) with regard to earthly cares, from the assurance that our Father careth for us.

19, 20. rust] The word is more general in meaning than mere rust: it includes the 'wear and tear' of time, which eats into and consumes the fairest possessions. The laying up treasures in heaven would accumulate the "bags that wax not old, a treasure that faileth not," of Luke xii. 33, corresponding to the "reward" of ch. v. 12, and the "shall reward thee" of vv. 4, 6, 18. See 1 Tim. vi. 19: Tobit iv. 9.

21.] The connexion with the foregoing is plain enough to any but the shallowest reader. 'The heart is, where the treasure is.' But it might be replied, 'I will have a treasure on earth and a treasure in heaven also: a divided affection.' This is dealt with, and its impracticability shewn by a parable from nature.

22, 23. The light] as lighting and guiding the body and its members: not as containing light in itself. Similarly the inner light, the conscience, lights the spirit and its faculties, but by light supernal to itself.

single, i.e. clear, untroubled in vision, as the eye which presents a well-defined and single image to the brain.

evil, i.e. perverse, as the eye which dims and distorts the visual images.

full of light, rather, in full light, as an object in the bright sunshine; full of darkness, rather, as an object in the deep shade.

If therefore&c.] Render, as in margin, If then the LIGHT w hich is in thee is darkness, how dark is the DARKNESS!i. e. 'if the conscience, the eye and light of the soul, be darkened, in how much grosser darkness will all the passions and faculties be, which are of themselves naturally dark?' This interpretation is that of nearly all the ancient fathers and versions. Stier expands it well: "As the body, of itself a dark mass, has its light from the eye, so we have here compared to it the sensuous, bestial life of men, their appetites, desires, and aversions, which belong to the lower creature. This dark region—human nature under the gross dominion of the flesh—shall become spiritualized, enlightened, sanctified, by the spiritual light: but if this light be darkness, how great must then the darkness of the sensuous life be!" The A.V., which agrees with the usual modern interpretation, makes the words a mere expression of the greatness of the darkness thereby occasioned, and thus loses the force of the sentence.

24.] And this division in man's being cannot take place—he is and must be one—light or dark—serving God or Mammon.

serve] Not merely 'serve,' as we now understand it, but in that closer sense, in which he who serves is the slave of, i.e. belongs to and obeys entirely. See Rom. vi. 16, 17.

for either.... or] is not a repetition; but the suppositions are the reverse of one another: as Meyer expresses it, "He will either hate A and love B, or cleave to A and despise B:" the one and the other keeping their individual reference in both members.

hate and love must be given their full meaning, or the depth the saying is not reached: the sense love less, disparage, for hate, would not bring out the opposition and division of the nature of man by the attempt.

mammon] the Chaldee word for riches. Mammon does not appear to have been the name of any Syrian deity, as some assert.

25. Therefore] A direct inference from the foregoing verse: the plainer, since the verb signifies 'to be distracted,' 'to have the mind drawn two ways.' The A.V., 'Take no thought,' does not express the sense, but gives rather an exaggeration of the command, and thus makes it unreal and nugatory. Take not anxious thought, is far better. In Luke xii. 29 we have "live not in careful suspense" (A. V. marg.).

Is not the life] The argument is, 'Shall not He who gave us the greater, also give us the less?'

26.] The two examples, of the birds and the lilies, are not parallel in their application. The first is an argument from the less to the greater; that our heavenly Father, who feeds the birds, will much more feed us: the second, besides this application, which (ver. 30) it also contains, is a reproof of the vanity of anxiety about clothing, which, in all its pomp of gorgeous colours, is vouchsafed to the inferior creatures, but not attainable by, as being unworthy of, us. Notice, it is not said "Sow not, reap not, gather not into barns;"—the birds are not our example to follow in their habits, for God hath made us to differ from them—the doing all these things is part of our "how much better are ye," and increases the force of the à fortiori; but it is said, "be not anxious,"—"be not in suspense" Luke xii, 24).

your Father, not their Father:—thus by every accessory word does our Lord wonderfully assert the truths and proprieties of creation, in which we, his sons, are His central work, and the rest for us.

of the air, and after-wards of the field, as Tholuck remarks, are not superfluous, but serve to set forth the wild and uncaring freedom of the birds and lants. I may add,—also to set forth their lower rank in the scale of creation, as belonging to the air and the field. Who could say of all mankind, "the men of the world?" Thus the à fortiori is more plainly brought out.

27.] These words do not relate to the stature, the adding a cubit to which (= a foot and a half) would be a very great addition, instead of a very small one, as is implied here, and expressed in Luke xii. 26, "if then ye be not able to do that thing which is least,"—but to the time of life of each hearer; as Theophylact on Luke xii. 26, "The measure of life is with God alone, and each man cannot set the measure of his own age." So the best Commentators: and the context seems imperatively to require it; for the object of food and clothing is not to enlarge the body, but to prolong life. The application of measures of space to time is not uncommon. See Ps. xxxix. 5: Job ix. 25: 2 Tim. iv. 7. Mimmnermus, a Greek poet, speaks of "a cubit's length of time." See other examples in my Gr. Test.

28.] Consider, implying more attention than "Behold." The birds fly by, and we can but look upon them: the flowers are ever with us, and we can watch their growth. These lilies have been supposed to be the crown imperial, (fritillaria imperialis), which grows wild in Palestine, or the amaryllis lutea, (Sir J. KE. Smith,) whose golden liliaceous flowers cover the autumnal fields of the Levant. Dr. Thomson, "The Land and the Book," p. 256, believes the Huleh lily to be meant: "it is very large, and the three inner petals meet above, and form a gorgeous canopy, such as art never approached, and king never sat under, even in his utmost glory. And when I met this incomparable flower, in all its love-Tiness, among the oak woods around the northern base of Tabor, and on the hills of Nazareth, where our Lord spent His youth, I felt assured that it was this to which He referred." Probably, however, the word here may be taken in a wider im-port, as signifying all wild flowers.

29.] We here have the declaration of the Creator Himself concerning the relative glory and beauty of all human pomp, com-ed with the meanest of His own works. 2 Chron. ix. 15–28. And the meaning hidden beneath the text should not escape the student. As the beauty of the flower is unfolded by the divine Creator Spirit from within, from the laws and capacities of its own individual life, so must all true adornment of man be un-folded from within by the same Almighty Spirit. See 1 Pet. iii. 3, 4. As nothing from without can defile a man, (ch. xv. 11,) so neither can any thing from without adorn him. Our Lord introduces with "I say unto you" His revelations of omniscience: see ch. xviii. 10, 19.

30. the grass] The wild flowers which form part of the meadow-growth are counted as belonging to the grass, and are cut down with it. Cat grass, which soon withers from the heat, is still used in the East for firing. See "The Land and the Book," p. 341.

the oven] "a covered earthen vessel, a pan, wider at the bottom than at the top, wherein bread was baked by putting hot embers round it, which produced a more equable heat than in the regular oven." Wilkinson and Webster's note.

32. for your heavenly Father knoweth] This second “for” brings in an additional reason.

33. seek ye first] Not with any reference to seeking these things after our religious duties, e.g. beginning with prayer days of avarice and worldly anxiety, but make your great Object, as we say, your first care.

his righteousness] Not here the forensic righteousness of justification, but the spiritual purity inculcated in this discourse. His righteousness answers to His perfection, spoken of in ch. v. 48, and is another reference to the being as our heavenly Father is. In the Christian life which has been since unfolded, the righteousness of justification is a necessary condition of likeness to God; but it is not the righteousness here meant.

shall be added unto you] There is a traditional saying of our Lord, “Ask ye for great things, and small things shall be added unto you: ask for heavenly things, and earthly things shall be added unto you.”

34] literally, for the morrow will care for it, viz. for itself, the morrow mentioned above: i.e. will bring care enough about its own matters: implying,—after all your endeavour to avoid worldly cares, you will find quite enough and more of them when to-morrow comes, about to-morrow itself: do not then increase those of to-day by introducing them before their time.’ A hint, as is the following evil thereof, that in this state of sin and infirmity the command of ver. 31 will never be com, ly observed.

CHAP. VII. 1–12.] Of our CONDUCT TOWARDS: OTHER MEN: parenthetically illustrated, vv. 7–11, by the benignity and wisdom of God in his dealings with us. The connexion with the last chapter is immediately, the word evil, in which a glance is given by the Saviour at the misery and sinfulness of human life at its best;—and now precepts follow, teaching us how we are to live in such a world, and among others sinful like ourselves:—mediately, and more generally it is, the continuing caution against hypocrisy, in our-selves and in others.

1] This does not prohibit all judgment (see ver. 20, and 1 Cor. v. 12); but, as Augustine, en-joins us to interpret others charitably in all cases where doubt may exist as to the motives of their actions.

judge has been taken for “condemn” here; and this seems necessary, at least in so far that it should be taken as implying an ill judgment. For if the command were merely “not to form authoritative judgments of others,” the second member, “that ye be not judged,” would not, in its right interpretation, as applying to God’s judgment of us, correspond. And the ‘condemn not,’ which follows in Luke vi. 87, is perhaps to be taken rather as an additional explanation of judge, than as a climax after it.

judged] i.e. ‘by God,’ for so doing;—a parallel expression to ch. v. 7; vi. 15; not ‘by others.’ The bare passive, without the agent expressed, is solemn and emphatic. See note on Luke vi. 88; xvi. 9; and xii. 20. The sense then is, ‘that you have not to answer before God for your rash judgment and its consequences.’ The same remarks apply to ver. 2.

3–5.] Lightfoot produces instances of this proverbial saying among the Jews. With them, however, it seems only to be used of a person retaliating rebuke; whereas our rd gives us a further application of it, viz. to the incapability of one involved in personal iniquity to form a right judgment on others, and the clearness given to the spiritual vision by conflict with and victory over evil. ere is also no doubt here a lesson given us of the true relative magnitude which our own faults, and those of our brother, ought to hold in our estimation. What is a mote to one looking on another, is to that other himself a beam: just the reverse of the ordinary estimate.

3.] beholdest, from with-out, a voluntary act: considerest not, apprehendest not, from within, that which is already there, and ought to have excited attention before. The same distinction is observed in Luke. 4.] how wilt thou say, is “how canst thou say” in Luke: Luther renders it “how darest thou say?”

5. Thou hypocrite] “He calls this man a hypocrite, as usurping the office of a physician, when he really fills the place of a sick man: or as in pretence busying him-self about another man’s fault, but in reality doing it with a view to condemning him.” Euthymius. shalt thou see clearly, with purified eye. The close is remarkable. Before, to behold the mote was all—to stare at thy brother’s faults, and as people do who stand and gaze at an object, attract others to gaze also:—but now, the object is a very different one—to cast out the mote—to help thy brother to be rid of his fault, by doing him the best and most difficult office of Christian friendship. The beholding was vain and idle; the seeing clearly is for a blessed end, viz. (ch. xviii. 15) to gain thy brother.

that which is holy] Some have thought this, in the Greek, to a mistranslation of a Chaldee word signifying an earring, or amulet; but the connexion is not at all improved by it. Pearls bear a resemblance to peas or acorns, the food of swine, but earrings none whatever to the food of dogs. The similitude is derived from “the holy things,” the meat offered in sacrifice, of which no unclean person was to eat (Lev. xxii. 6, 7, 10, 14, 15, 16). Similarly in the ancient Christian Liturgies and Fathers, “the holy things” are the consecrated elements in the Holy Communion. Thus interpreted, the saying would be one full of meaning to the Jews. As Dean Trench observes (Serm. Mount, p. 186), “It is not that the dogs would not eat it, for it would be welcome to them; but that it would be a profanation to give it to them, Exod. xxii. 31.” The other part of the similitude is of a different character, and belongs entirely to the swine, who having cast to them pearls, something like their natural food, whose value is inappreciable by them, in fury trample them with their and turning against the donor, rend him with their tusks. The connexion with the foregoing and following verses is this: “Judge not,” &c.; “attempt not the correction of others, when you need it far more yourselves.” still, “be not such mere children, as not to distinguish the characters of those with whom you have to do. Give not that which is holy to dogs,” &c. Then, as a humble hearer might be disposed to reply, ‘if this last be a measure of the divine dealings, what bounties can I expect at God’s hand?’ (ver. 7), ‘ask of God, and He will give to each of you: for this is His own will, that you shall obtain by asking’ (ver. 8)—good things, good for each in his place and degree (vv. 10, 11), not unwholesome or unfitting things. Therefore (ver. 12) do ye the same to others, as ye wish to be done, and as God does, to you: viz. give that which is good for each, to each, not Judging uncharitably on the one hand, nor casting pearls before swine on the other.’

7.] The three similitudes are all to be understood of prayer, and form a climax.

8.] The only limitation to this promise, which, under various forms, is several times repeated by our Lord, is furnished in vv. 9–11, and in James iv. 8, “Ye ask and receive not, because ye ask amiss.” 9.] There are two questions here, the first of which is broken off. See a similar construction in ch. xii. 11. The similitude of bread (a loaf) and a stone also appears in ch. iv. 8. Luke (xi. 12) adds the and the scorpion.

11. evil] i.e. in comparison with God. It is not necessary to suppose a rebuke conveyed here, but only a general declaration of the corruption and infirmity of man. Augustine remarks, in accordance with this view, that the persons now addressed are the same who had been taught to say ‘Our Father’ just now. Stier remarks, “This saying seems to me the strongest proof of original sin in the whole of the holy scriptures.” Reden Jesu, i. 236.

good things] principally, His Holy Spirit, Luke xi. 18. The same argument a fortiori is used by our Lord in the parable of the unjust judge, Luke xviii. 6, 7.

12.] Trench (Serm. on the Mount, p. 148) has noticed Augustine’s refutation of the sneer of infidels (such as Gibbon’s against this precept), that some of our Lord’s sayings have been before written by heathen authors. «Pythagoras said this, Plato said it... Well, if any of them is found to have said a thing which Christ also said, we congratulate him, we do not follow him. But, it is said, he came before Christ. So then, if a man speaks truth, he is to be esteemed prior to truth itself.”

Therefore is the inference indeed from the preceding eleven verses, but immediately from the give good things to them that ask him, just said,—and thus closing this section of the Sermon with a lesson similar to the last verse of ch. v., which is, indeed, the ground-tone of the whole Sermon—“Be ye like unto God.” even so, viz. after the pattern of all things whatsoever: not those things themselves, because what might suit us, might not suit others. We are to think what we should like done to us, and then apply that rule to our dealings with others: viz. by doing to them what we have reason to suppose they would like done to them. This is a most important distinction, and one often overlooked in the interpretation of this golden maxim.

13–27.] THE concLusIon oF THE DISCOURSE:—setting forth more strongly and personally the dangers of hypocrisy, both in being led aside by hypocritical teachers, and in our own inner life.—The gate stands at the end of the way, as in the remarkable parallel in the Table of Cebes; “Do you see a certain small door, and a certain path in front of the door, which is not much frequented, but only a few walk in it?... this is the way which leads to true discipline.”

14.] because gives a second reason, on which that in ver. 13 depends: strive, &c., for broad is, &c., because narrow is, &c. The reason why the way to destruction is so broad, is because so few find their way into the narrow path of life. This is not merely an arbitrary assignment of the because, but there is a deep meaning in it. The reason why so many perish is not that it is eo ordained by God, who will have all to come to the knowledge of the truth, but because so few will come to Christ, that they may have life; and the rest perish in their sins. See notes on ch. xxv. 41.

15.] The connexion is,—strive to enter&c.: but be not misled by persons who pretend to guide you into it, but will not do so in reality. These false prophets, directly, refer to those who were soon to arise, to deceive, if possible, even the very elect, ch. xxiv. 24; and indirectly, to all such false teachers in all ages in sheep's clothing] There may be allusion to the prophetic dress, ch. iii. 4; but most probably it only means that, in order to deceive, they put on the garb and manners of the sheep themselves.

16.] The fruits are both their corrupt doctrines and their vicious practices, as contrasted with the outward shews of almsgiving, prayer, and fasting, their sheep's clothing to deceive. See James iii. 12; ch. xii. 38, 34.

17. a corrupt tree] See also ch. xiii. 48. From these two verses, 17, 18, the Manichmans defended their heresy of the two natures, good and bad: but Augustine answers them, that such cannot possibly be their meaning, as it is entirely contrary to the whole scope of the passage (see for example ver. 13), and adds, “A bad tree then cannot bear good fruit: but it may, from bad, become good, in order to the bearing good fruit.” On the other hand, these verses were his weapon against the shallow Pelagian scheme, which would look at men’s deeds apart from the living root in man out of which they grew, and suppose that man’s unaided will is capable of good. Trench, Serm. on the Mount, p. 150.

20. ye shall know them] The original has more force; ‘ye shall thoroughly know them’ see 1 Cor. xiii. 12.

21.] The doom of the hypocritical false prophets introduces the doom of all hypocrites, and brings on the solemn close of the whole, in which the hypocrite and the true disciple are parabolically compared.—Observe that here the Lord sets Himself forth as the Judge in the great day, and at the same time speaks not of ‘my will,’ but “the will of my Father:” an important and invaluable doctrinal landmark in this ve ning of His ministry in the first Gospel. e context must rule the meaning of such wide words as saith*. Here it is evidently used of mere lip homage; but in “no man can say that Jesus is the Lord,” 1 Cor. xii. 3, the “saying” has the deeper mean-ing of a genuine heartfelt confession. To seek for discrepancies in passages of this kind implies a predisposition to find them: and is to treat Holy Scripture with less than that measure of candour which we ive to the writings of one another.

22. in that day] perhaps refers to ver. 19: or it may be the expression 20 common in the prophets of the great day of the Lord. Isa. ii. 20; xxv. 9 al. fr. Sothe Jews called the tt day of judgment “that day.”

in thy name] perhaps better by thy name, that name having filled out our belief, and been the object of our confession of faith.

prophesied] i.e., a so often in N.T., preached, not necessarily foretold future events. See 1 Cor. xii. 10, and note. On cast out devils, see note on ch. viii. 32.

23.] See Luke xiii. 25–27. will I profess (more properly, confess) is here remarkable, as a statement of the simple truth of facts, as opposed to the false colouring and self-dereit of the hypocrites— ‘I will tell them the plain truth.

I never knew you, i.e. in the sense in which it is said, John x. 14, “I know my sheep (lit. the things that are mine), and am known by them.” Neither the preaching Christ, nor doing miracles in His Name, is an infallible sign of being His genuine servants, but only the devotion of life to God’s will which this knowledge brings about.

24. these sayings of mine] more probably, these sayings from me: see Acts i. 4, ye have heard of (from) me. The expression, these sayings, seems to bind together the Sermon, and preclude, as indeed does the whole structure of the Sermon, the sup-position that these last chapters are merely a collection of sayings uttered at different times.

I will liken] Meyer and Tholuck take this Eword to signify, not ‘I will compare,’ but ‘I will make at that day like’ But it is, perhaps, more in analogy with the usage of the Lord’s discourses to under-stand it, I will compare: so ch. xi. 16: Luke xiii. 18.

25.] This similitude must not be pressed to an allegorical or symbolical meaning in its details, e.g. so that the rain, floods, and winds should mean three distinct kinds of temptation; but the ROCK, as signifying Him who spoke this, is of too frequent use in Scripture for us to overlook it here: cf. 2 Sam. xxii. 2 [Ps. xviii. 2], 82, 47; xxiii. 3: Ps. xxviii. 1; xxxi. 2, al. fr.; lxi. 2: Isa. xxvi. 4 (Heb.); xxxii. 2; xliv. 8 (Heb.): 1 Cor. x. 4, &c. He finds his house on a rock, who, hearing the words of Christ, brings his heart and life into accordance with His expressed will, and is thus by faith in union with Him, founded on Him. he who merely hears His words, but does them not, has never dug down to the rock, nor become united with it, nor has any stability in the hour of trial.

In the rock,—the sand,—the articles are categorical, importing that these two were usually found in the country where the discourse was delivered;—in the rain, the floods, the winds, the same, implying that such trials of the stability of a house were common. In the whole of the similitude, reference is probably made to the Prophetic passage xxviii. 15–18.

27. great] All the greater, because such an one as here supposed is a professed disciple—hearing these sayings—and therefore would have the er to fall in case of apostasy.

29.] Chrysostom's comment is, “For He did not say what He said on the authority of others, quoting Moses or the prophets, but every where alleging Himself to be the One who had the power. For when giving the law, he ever added, ‘But I say to you,’ shewing that He him-self was the Judge.”

CHAP. VIII. 1–4.] HEALING OF A LEPER. Mark i. 40–46. Luke v. 12–14. We have now (in this and the following chapter), as it were, a solemn procession of miracles, confirming the authority wi which our Lord had spoken.

2.] This same miracle is related by St. Luke with-out any mark of definiteness, either as to time or place,—“And it came to pass, when he was in a certain city...” In this instance there is, and can be, no doubt that the transactions are identical: and this may serve us as a key-note, by which the less obvious and more intricate harmonies of these two narrations may be ar-ranged. The plain assertion of the account in the text requires that the leper should have met our Lord on His descent from the mountain, while great multitudes were following Him. The accounts in St. Luke and St. Mark require no such fixed date. This narrative therefore fixes the occurrence. I conceive it highly probable that St. Matthew was himself a hearer of the Sermon, and one of those who followed our Lord at this time. From St. Luke's account, the miracle was performed in, or rather, perhaps, in the neighbourhood of, some city: what city, does not appear. As the leper is in all three accounts related to have come to Jesus (“And behold” implying it in Luke), he may have been outside the city, and have run into it to our Lord.

a leper] The limits of a note allow of only an abridgment of the most important particulars relating to this dis-ease. Read Leviticus xiii. xiv. for the Mosaic enactments respecting it, and its nature and symptoms. See also Exod. iv. 6: Num. xii. 10: 2 Kings v. 27; xv. 5: 2 Chron. xxvi. 19, 21. The whole ordinances relating to leprosy were symbolical and typical. The disease was not contagious: so that the view which makes them mere sanitary regulations is out of the question. The fact of its non-contagious nature has been abundantly proved by learned men, and is evident from the Scripture itself: for the priests had continually to be in close contact with lepers, even to handling and examining them. We find Naaman, a leper, commanding the armies of Syria (2 Kings v. 1); Gehazi, though a leper, is conversed with by the king of Terael (2 Kings viii. 4, 5); and in the examination of a leper by the priest, if a man was entirely covered with leprosy, he was to be pronounced clean (Levit. xiii. 12, 18). The leper was not shut out from the synagogue, nor from the Christian churches. Besides, the analogy of the other uncleannesses under the Mosaic law, e.g. having touched the dead, having an issue, which are joined with leprosy (Num. v. 2), shews that sanitary caution was not the motive of these ceremonial enactments, but a far deeper reason. This disease was specially selected, as being the most loath-some and incurable of all, to represent the effect of the defilement of sin upon the once pure and holy body of man. “Leprosy was, indeed, nothing short of a living death, a poisoning of the springs, a corrupting of the humours, of life; a dissolution, little by little, of the whole body, so that one limb after another actually decayed and fell away.” (Trench on the Miracles, p. 218.) See Num. xii. 12. The leper was the type of one dead in sin: the same emblems are used in his misery as those of mourning for the dead: the same means of cleansing as for uncleanness through connexion with death, and which were never used except on these two occasions. Compare Num. xix. 6, 13, 18, with Levit. xiv. 4–7. All this exclusion and mournful separation imported the Perpetual exclusion of the abominable and polluted from the true city of God, as declared Rev. xxi. 27. And David, when after his deadly sin he utters his prayer of penitence, ‘Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean,’ Ps. li. 7, doubtless saw in his own utter spiritual uncleanness, that of which the ceremonial uncleanness that was purged with hyssop was the type. Thus in the above-cited instances we find leprosy inflicted as the punishment a rebellion, lying, and presumption. ‘I put the plague of in an house’ (Levit. xiv. 34), ‘Remember what the Lord thy God did to Miriam’ (Deut. xxiv. 9), and other passages, point out this plague as a peculiar infliction from God. “The Jews termed it ‘the finger of God,’ and emphatically ‘The’ stroke.’ They said that it attacked first a man’s house; and if he did not turn, his clothing; and then, if he persisted in sin, himself. So too, they said, that a man’s true repentance was the one condition of his leprosy leaving him.” Trench, 216. The Jews, from the prophecy Isa. iii. 4, had a tradition that the Messiah should be a leper.

worshipped him] “falling on his face,” Luke v. 12; “kneeling to him,” Mark i. 40. These differences of expression are important. See beginning of note on this verse.

Lord] Not here merely a title of respect, but an expression of faith in Jesus as the Messiah. “This is the right utterance of ‘Lord,’ which will never be made in vain.” Stier. When Miriam was a leper, ‘Moses cried unto the Lord, saying, Heal her now, O God, I beseech thee,’ Num. xii. 18.

3. touched him] He who just now expansively fulfilled the law by word and commands, now does the same by act and deed: the law had forbidden the touching of the leper, Levit. v. 3. It was an act which stood on the same ground as the healing on the Sabbath, of which we have so many instances. So likewise the prophets Elijah and Elisha touched the dead in the working of a miracle on them (1 Kings xvii. 21: 2 Kings iv. 34). The same almighty power which suspends natural laws, supersedes ceremonial laws.

Here is a noble example illustrating His own precept so lately delivered, ‘Give to him that asketh thee.’ Again, we can hardly forbear to recognize, in His touching the leper, a deed symbolic of His taking on him, touching, laying hold of, our nature. The same remarkable word is used in the Greek in Luke xiv. 4, “and taking hold of him, he healed him,” and in Heb. ii. 16, “He taketh not hold of angels, but he taketh hold of the seed of Abraham.”

4. See thou tell no man] Either (1) these words were a moral admonition, having respect to the state of the man (teaching him not to boast and seek admiration,” as Chrysostom), for the injunction to silence was not our Lord’s uniform practice (See Mark v. 19,||L.), and in this case they were of lasting obligation, that the cleansed leper was not to make his healing a matter of boast hereafter; or (2) they were a cautionary admonition, only binding till he should have shewn himself to the priest, in order to avoid delay in this duty, or any hindrance which might, if the matter should first be blazed abroad, arise to his being pronounced clean, through the malice of the priests; or (3), which I believe to be the true view, our Lord almost uniformly repressed the fame of His miracles, for the reason given in ch. xii. 15–21, that, in accordance with prophetic truth, He might be known as the Messiah not by “wonder-working power, but by the great result of His work upon earth: see ‘ch. xii. 16–19. Thus Apostles always refer primarily to the Resurrection, and only incidentally, if at all, to the wonders and signs. ‘Acts ii, 22–24; iii. 18–16.) These latter were tokens of power common to our Lord and his followers; but in His great conflict, ending in His victory, He trod the winepress alone shew thyself to the priest] Read Levit. xiv. 182. This command has been used in support of the theory of satisfaction by priestly confession and penance. But even then (Trench on the Miracles, p. 221, where see instances cited) the advocates of it are constrained to acknowledge that Christ alone is the cleanser. It is satisfactory to observe this drawing of parallels between “the Levitical and (popularly so called) Christian priesthood, thus completely shewing the fallacy and untenability of the whole system; all those priests being types, not of future human priests, but of Him, who abideth a Priest for ever in an unchangeable priesthood and in Whom not a class of Christians, but all Christians, are in the true sense priests unto God.

a testimony unto them] A testimony both to, and against them. The man disobeyed the injunction, so that our Lord could no more enter the city openly + see Mark i. 45.

5–13.] HEALING OF THE CENTURION’ S SERVANT. Luke vii. 1–10, where we have a more detailed account of the former part of this miracle. On the chronological ar-rangement, see Introduction. The centurion did not himself come to our Lord, but sent elders of the Jews to Him, who recommended him to His notice as loving their nation, and having built them a synagogue. Such variations, the concise account making a man do by himself what the fuller one relates that he did by another, are common in all written and oral narrations. In such cases the fuller account is, of course, the stricter one. Augustine, answering Faustas the Manichean, who wished, on account of the words of our Lord in ver. 11, to set aside the whole, and used this variation for that makes the remark, so important in these days, “Does not our human custom fur-nish abundance of such instances? Shall we read, and forget how we speak? Could we that Scripture would speak with us otherwise than in our own manner?” On the non-identity of this miracle with that in John iv. 46 ff, see note there.

5. centurion] he was a Gentile, see ver. 10, but one who was deeply attached to the Jews and their religions possibly, though this is uncertain, a of the gate he such term as “devout,” “fearing God,” is used of him, as commonly of these proselytes; Acts, x. 2 al.).

6.] From Luke we learn that it was “a slave, who was precious to him.” The centurion, perhaps, had but one slave, see ver. 9.

8.] The centurion heard that the Lord was coming, Luke vii. 6, and sent friends to Him with this second and still humbler message. He knew and felt himself, as a heathen, to be out of the fold of God, a stranger to the commonwealth of Israel; and there-fore unworthy to receive under his roof the Redeemer of Israel.

9.] The meaning is, ‘I know how to obey, being myself under authority: and in turn know how others obey, having soldiers under me.’ inferring, ‘if then I, in my subordinate station of command, am obeyed, how much more Thou, who art over all, and whom diseases serve as their Master!’ That this is the right interpretation, is shewn by our Lord’s special commendation of his faith, ver. 10.

10. marvelled] to be accepted simply as a fact, as when Jesus rejoiced, wept, was sorrowful; not, as some have foolishly done, to be rationalized away into a mere lesson to teach us what to admire. The mysteries of our Lord’s humanity are too thus to be sacrificed to the timidity of theol outer darkness] the darkness outside, i.e. outside the lighted chamber of the feast, see ch. xxii. 18, and Eph. v. 7, 8. These verses are wanting in St. Luke, and occur when our Lord repeated them on a wholly different occasion, ch. xiii. 28, 29. Compare a remarkable contrast in the Rabbinical books illustrating Jewish pride: "God said to the Israelites, In the world to come I will spread for you a vast table, which the Gentiles shall see and be confounded."

13. was healed] Of what precise disease does not appear. In Luke he was "ready to die"—here he is "sick of the palsy, grievously tormented." But though these descriptions do not agree with 'the character of palsy among us, we read of a similar case in 1 Macc. ix. 55, 56: "At that time was Alcimus plagued and his enterprises hindered: for his mouth was stopped, and he was taken with a palsy, so that he could no more speak any thing, nor order any thing concerning his house. So Alcimus died at that time with great torment." The disease in the text may have been an attack of tetanus, which the ancient physicians included under lysis, and which is more common in hot countries than with us. It could hardly have been apoplexy, which usually bereaves of sensation.

14–17.] HEALING OF PETER'S WIFE'S MOTHER, AND MANY OTHERS. Mark i. 29–34. Luke iv. 38–41. From the other Evangelists it appears, that our Lord had just healed a demoniac in the synagogue at Capernaum: for they both state, 'when they were come out of the synagogue, they entered into the house of Simon and Andrew,' &c. Both Mark and Luke are fuller in their accounts than the text. The expression (of the fever) it left her, is common to the three, as is also the circumstance of her ministering immediately after: shewing that the fever left her, not, as it would have done if natural means had been used, weak and exhausted, but completely restored.

16.] at sunset, Mark ver. 82; Luke ver. 40. From St. Mark we learn that the whole city was collected at the door; from St. Luke, that the daemons cried out and said, 'Thou art Christ the Son of God.' And from both, that our Lord permitted them not to speak, for they knew Him. They brought sick in the evening, either because it was cool,—or because the day's work was over, and men could be found to carry them,—or perhaps because it was the sabbath (see Mark i. 21, 29, 82), which ended at sunset.

17.] The exact sense in which these words are quoted is matter of difficulty. Some understand took and bare as merely 'took away,' and 'healed.' But besides this being a very harsh interpretation of both words, it entirely destroys the force of Himself, and makes it expletive. Others suppose it to refer to the personal fatigue, (or even the spiritual exhaustion, [Olshausen,] which perhaps is hardly consistent with sound doctrine,) which our Lord felt by these cures being; long protracted into the evening. But believe the true relevancy of the prophecy is to be sought by regarding the miracles generally to have been, as we know so many of them were, lesser and typical outshewings of the great work of bearing the sin of the world, which He came to accomplish; just as diseases themselves, on which those miracles, are all so many testimonies to existence, and types of the effect, of sin. Moreover in these His deeds of mercy, He was 'touched with the feeling of our infirmities:' witness His tears at the grave of and His sighing over the deaf and dumb man, Mark vii. 84. The very act of compassion is (as the name imports) a suffering with its object; and if this be true between man and man, how much more strictly so in His case who had taken upon Him the whole burden of the sin of the world, with all its sad train of sorrow and suffering.

18—IX. 1.] JESUS CROSSES THE LAKE. INCIDENTS BEFORE EMBARKING. HE STILLS THE STORM. HEALING OF TWO DAEMONIACS IN THE LAND OF THE GADARENES. Mark iv. 35—v. 20: Luke ix. 67–60; viii. 22–39, on which passages compare the notes. 18.) It is obviously the intention of St. Matthew to bind on the following incidents to the occurrence which he had just related.

19.] Both, the following incidents are laced by St. Luke long after, during our Lord's last journey to Jerusalem. For it is quite impossible (with Greswell, Diss. iii. p. 155 sq.) in any common fairness of interpretation, to imagine that two such incidents should have twice happened, and both times have been related together. It is one of those cases where the attempts of the Harmonists do violence to every principle of sound historical criticism. Every such difficulty, instead of being a thing to be wiped out and buried up at all hazards (I am sorry to see, e.g., that Dr. Wordsw. takes no notice, either here or in St. Luke, of the recurrence of the two narratives), is a valuable index and guide to the humble searcher after truth, and is used by him as such (see Introduction).

20. the Son of man] "It is thought that this phrase was taken from Daniel vii. 13, to which passage our Saviour seems to allude in ch. xxvi. 64, and probably Stephen in Acts vii. 56. It appears from John xii. 34, that the Jews understood it to mean the Messiah: and from Luke xxii. 69, 70, that they considered the Son of Man to mean the same as the Son of God." Dr. Burton. It is the name by which the Lord ordinarily in one pregnant word designates Himself as the Messiah—the Son of God manifested in the flesh of man—the second Adam. And to it belong all those conditions, of humiliation, suffering, and exaltation, which it behoved the Son of Man to go through.

21.] In St. Luke we find, that our Lord previously commanded him to follow Him. Clement of Alexandria thus as having been said to Philip. But if so, He had long ago ordered Philip to follow Him, taking St. Luke's order of the occurrence. A tradition of this nature was hardly likely to be wrong; so that perhaps the words Follow me are to be taken (as in John xxi. 19, 22) as an admonition occasioned by some slackness or symptom of decadence on the part of the Apostle. The attempt to evade the strong words of our Lord's command by supposing that to bury my father means, 'to reside with my father is death' (Theophylact), is evidently futile, since "first to go and bury" is plainly said of an act waiting to be done; and the reason of our Lord's rebuke was the peremptory and all-superseding nature of the command "Follow me."

22. the dead] First time, as Rev. iii. 1, spiritually,—second, literally dead. The two meanings are similarly used in one saying by our Lord in John xi. 25, 26. See Heb. vi. 1; ix. 14: and the weighty addition in Luke, ver. 62.

23.] This journey across the lake, with its incidents, is placed by St. Mark and St. Luke after the series of parables commencing with that of the sower, and recorded in ch. xiii. By Mark with a precise Date of sequence: "the same day, when the even was come, he saith unto them," Mark iv. 35.

24. being covered] compare Mark iv. 87: Luke viii. 28. By keeping to the strict imperfect sense, we obviate all necessity for qualifying these words: the ship was becoming covered, &c. All lakes bordered by mountains, and indeed all hilly coasts, are liable to these sudden gusts of wind.

25.] Lord, save us: we perish = Master, carest thou not that we perish, Mark iv. 38 = Master, Master, we perish, Luke viii. 24. On these and such like variations, notice the following excellent and important remarks of Augustine: "The sense of the disciples waking the Lord and seeking to be saved, is one and the same: nor is it worth while to enquire which of these three was really said to Christ. For whether they said any one of these three, or other words which no one of the Evangelists has mentioned, but of similar import as to the truth of the sense, what matters it?" We may wish that he had always spoken thus. Much useless labour might have been and men's minds led to the diligent enquiry into the real difficulties of the Gospels, instead of so many spending time in knitting cobwebs. But Augustine himself in the very next sentence descends to the unsatisfactory ground of the Harmonists, when he adds. "Though it may be also, that when many were calling upon Him, all these may have been said, one by one, another by another." His mind however was not one to rest contented with such sophisms; and all his deeper and more earnest sayings are in the truer and freer spirit of the above extract. The above remarks are more than ever important, now that a reaction towards the low literal harmonistic view has set in, and the inspiration of the mere letter is set up against those who seek for life in searching the real spirit of the Scriptures.

28.] The time of this rebuke in the text precedes, but in Mark and Luke follows, the stilling of the storm. See the last note. They were of little faith, in that they were afraid of perishing while they had on board the slumbering Saviour: they were not faithless, for they had recourse to that Saviour to help them. Therefore He acknowledges the faith which they had; answers the prayer of faith, by working a perfect calm: but rebukes them for not having the stronger, firmer faith, to trust Him even when He seemed insensible to their danger.

The symbolic application of this occurrence is too striking to have escaped general notice. The Saviour with the company of His disciples in the ship tossed on the waves, seemed a typical reproduction of the Ark bearing mankind on the flood, and a foreshadowing of the Church tossed by the tempests of this world, but having Him with her always. And the personal application is one of comfort, and strengthening of faith, in danger and doubt.

27. the men] The men who were in the ship, besides our Lord and His disciples.

28.] Among the difficulties attendant on this narrative, the situation and name of the place where the event happened are not the least. Origen discusses the three, Gerasa, which he found in the text in his time, but pronounces to be a city of Arabia, having no sea or lake near it,—Gadara, which he found in a few MSS., but disapproves, as a city of Judæa, not near any lake or sea with cliffs;—and Gergesa, which he says is a city on the lake of Tiberias, with a cliff hanging over the lake, where the spot of the miracle was shewn. Notwithstanding this, it appears very doubtful whether there ever was a town named Gergesha (or-sa) near the lake. There were the Gergashites (Joseph. i. 6. 2) in former days, but their towns had been destroyed by the Israelites at their first irruption, and never, that we hear of, afterwards rebuilt (see Deut. vii. 1: Josh. xxiv. 11). Gerasa (now Dscherasch) lies much too far to the East. The town of Gadara, alluded to in the text, was a strong chief city in Peræa, opposite Scythopolis and Tiberias to the East, in the mountain, at whose foot were the well-known warm baths. It was on the river Hieromax, and sixty stadia from Tiberias, a Greek city (see raff. to Josephus and Eusebius in my Gr. Test.). It was destroyed in the civil wars of the Jews, and rebuilt by Pompeius, presented by Augustus to King Herod, and after his death united to the province of Syria. It was one of the ten cities of Decapolis. Burckhardt and others believe that they have found its ruins at Omkeis, near the ridge of the chain which divides the valley of Jordan from that of the sea of Tiberias. The territory of this city might well extend to the shore of the lake. It may be observed, that there is nothing in any of the three accounts to imply that the city was close to the scene of the miracle, or the scene of the miracle close to the herd of swine, or the herd of swine, at the time of their possession, close to the lake. Indeed the expression “a good way off from them,” ver. 30, implies the contrary with regard to the swine. It appears, from Burckhardt, that there are many tombs in the neighbourhood of the ruins of Gadara to this day, hewn in the rock, and thus capable of affording shelter. It may be well in fairness to observe, that “Gergesenes” can hardly have arisen, as sometimes represented, entirely from Origen’s conjecture, as it pervades so many MSS. and ancient (it is true, not the most ancient) versions. We cannot say that a part of the territory of Gadara may not have been known to those who, like Matthew, were locally intimate with the shores of the lake, by this ancient and generally disused name. Still however, we are, I conceive, bound in a matter of this kind to follow the most ancient extant testimony. See further on the parallel places in Mark and Luke.

two possessed with devils] In Mark v. 2, and Luke viii. 27, but one is mentioned. All three Evangelists have some particulars peculiar to themselves; but Mark the most, and the most striking, as having evidently proceeded from an eye-witness. The “we are many” of Mark is worth noticing, in reference to the discrepancy of number in the two accounts, as perhaps connected with the mention of more than one by our Evangelist, who omits the circumstance connected with that speech.

exceeding fierce] See the terribly graphic account of St. Mark (v. 3–6). The dæmoniac was without clothes, which though related only by St. Luke (viii. 27), yet, with remarkable consistency, appears from St. Mark’s narrative, where he is described as sitting, clothed, and in his right mind, at Jesus’s feet, after his cure.

so that no man] Peculiar to this Gospel.

29.] before the time, is peculiar to this Gospel: Son of God, common to all.

30. a good way off] The Vulgate rendering, “not far off,” does not seem accordant with the other accounts, both of which imply distance: Mark v. 11: Luke viii. 32. These, especially the first, would seem to imply that the swine were on the hills, and the scene of the miracle at some little distance, on the plain.

31.] St. Mark and St. Luke give, as the ground of this request, that they might not be sent out of the land = into the abyss, i.e. out of their permitted residence on earth to torment before the time in the abyss. See note on Luke.

32.] This remarkable narrative brings before us the whole question of DÆMONIACAL POSSESSIONS in the Gospels, which I shall treat here once for all, and refer to this note hereafter.

I would then remark in general, (I. 1) that the Gospel narratives are distinctly pledged to the historic truth of these occurrences. Either they are true, or the Gospels are false. For they do not stand in the same, or a similar position, with the discrepancies in detail, so frequent between the Evangelists: but they form part of that general groundwork in which all agree. (2) Nor can it be said that they represent the opinion of the time, and use words in accordance with it. This might have been difficult to answer, but that they not only give such expressions as possessed with devils, demonized (Mark v. 16: Luke viii. 36), and other like ones, but relate to us words spoken by the Lord Jesus, in which the personality and presence of the demons is distinctly implied. See especially Luke xi. 17–26. Now either our Lord spoke these words, or He did not. If He did not, then we must at once set aside the concurrent testimony of the Evangelists to a plain matter of fact; in other words establish a principle which will overthrow equally every fact related in the Gospels. If He did, it is wholly at variance with any Christian idea of the perfection of truthfulness in Him who was Truth itself, to suppose Him to have used such plain and solemn words repeatedly, before His disciples and the Jews, in encouragement of, and connivance at, a lying superstition. (8) After these remarks, it will be unnecessary to refute that view of dæmoniacal possession which makes it identical with mere bodily disease,—as it is included above; but we may observe, that it is every where in the Is distinguished from disease, and in such a way as to shew that, at all events, the two were not in that day confounded. (See ch. ix. 32, 33, and compare Mark vii. 32.) (4) The question then arises, Granted the plain historical truth of demoniacal pos-session, WHAT WAS IT? This question, in the suspension, or withdrawal, of the gift of ‘discerning of spirits’ in the modern Church, is not easy to answer. But we may gather from the Gospel narratives some important ingredients for our description. The dæmoniac was one whose being was strangely interpenetrated (‘possessed’ is the most exact word that could be found) by one or more of those fallen spirits, who are constantly asserted in Scripture (under the name of dæmons, evil spirits, unclean spirits, their chief being the devil or Satan) to be the enemies and tempters of the souls of men. (See Acts v. 3: John xiii. 2, and passim.) He stood in a totally different position from the abandoned wicked man, who morally is given over to the devil. This latter would be a subject for punishment; but the dæmoniac for deepest compassion. There appears to have been in him a double will and double consciousness—sometimes the cruel spirit thinking and speaking in him, sometimes his poor crushed self crying out to the Saviour of men for mercy: a terrible advantage taken, and a personal realization, by the malignant powers of evil, of the struggle between sense and conscience in the man of morally divided life. Hence it has been not improbably supposed, that some of these dæmoniacs may have arrived at their dreadful state through various progressive degrees of guilt and sensual abandonment. ‘Lavish sin, and especially indulgence in sensual lusts, superinducing, as it would often, a weakness in the nervous system, which is the especial band between body and soul, may have laid open these un-happy ones to the fearful incursions of the powers of darkness.’ (Trench on the Miracles, p. 160.) (5) The frequently urged objection, How comes it that this malady is not now among us? admits of an easy answer, even if the assumption be granted. The period of our Lord's being on earth was certainly more than any other in the history of the world under the dominion of evil. The foundations of man's moral being were broken up, and the 'hour and power of darkness' prevailing. Trench excellently remarks, 'It was exactly the crisis for such soul-maladies as these, in which the spiritual and bodily should be thus strangely interlinked, and it is nothing wonderful that they should have abounded at that time; for the predominance of certain spiritual maladies at certain epochs of the world's history which were specially fitted for their generation, with their gradual decline and disappearance in others less congenial to them, is a fact itself admitting no manner of question' (pp. 162, 163). Besides, as the same writer goes on to observe, there can be no doubt that the coming of the Son of God in the flesh, and the continual testimony of Jesus borne by the Church in her preaching and ordinances, have broken and kept down, in some measure, the grosser manifestations of the power of Satan. (See Luke x. 18.) But (6) the assumption contained in the objection above must not be thus unreservedly granted. We cannot tell in how many cases of insanity the malady may not even now be traced to direct daemonic possession. And, finally, (7) the above view, which I am persuaded is the only one honestly consistent with any kind of belief in the truth of the Gospel narratives, will offend none but those who deny the existence of the world of spirits altogether, and who are continually striving to narrow the limits of our belief in that which is invisible; a view which at every step involves difficulties far more serious than those from which it attempts to escape. But (II.) a fresh difficulty is here found in the latter part of the narrative, in which the devils enter into the swine, and their destruction follows. (1) Of the reason of this permission, we surely are not competent judges. Of this however we are sure, that 'if this granting of the request of the evil spirits helped in any way the cure of the man, caused them to resign their hold on him more easily, mitigated the paroxysm of their going forth (see Mark ix. 26), this would have been motive enough. Or still more probably, it may have been necessary, for the permanent healing of the man, that he should have an outward evidence and testimony that the hellish powers which held him in bondage had quitted him.' (Trench, p. 172.) (2) The destruction of the swine is not for a moment to be thought of in the matter, as if that were an act repugnant to the merciful character of our Lord's miracles. It finds its parallel in the cursing of the fig-tree (ch. xxi. 18–22); and we may well think that, if God has appointed so many animals daily to be slaughtered for the sustenance of men's bodies, He may also be pleased to destroy animal life when He sees fit for the liberation or instruction of their souls. Besides, if the confessedly far greater evil of the possession of men by evil spirits, and all the misery thereupon attendant, was permitted in God's inscrutable purposes, surely much more this lesser one. Whether there may have been special reasons in this case, such as the contempt of the Mosaic law by the keepers of the swine, we have no means of judging: but it is at least possible. (3) The fact itself related raises a question in our minds, which, though we cannot wholly answer, we may yet approximate to the solution of. How can we imagine the bestial nature capable of the reception of daemonic influence? If what has been cited above be true, and the unchecked indulgence of sensual appetite afforded an inlet for the powers of evil to possess the human demoniac, then we have their influence joined to that part of man's nature which he has in common with the brutes that perish, the animal and sensual soul. We may thus conceive that the same animal and sensual soul in the brute may be receptive of similar daemonic influence. But with this weighty difference: that whereas in man there is an individual, immortal spirit, to which alone belongs his personality and deliberative will and reason, and there was ever in him, as we have seen, a struggle and a protest against this tyrant power; the oppressed soul, the real 'I,' calling out against the usurper—this would not be the case with the brute, in whom this personality and reflective consciousness is wanting. And the result in the text confirms our view; for as soon as the demons enter into the swine, their ferocity, having no self-conserving balance as in the case of man, impels them headlong to their own destruction.

34.] This request, which is related by all three Evangelists, was probably not from humility, but for fear the miraculous powers of our Lord should work them still more worldly loss. For the additional particulars of this miracle, see Mark v. 15, 16, 18–20; Luke vii. 35, and notes.

IX. 1.] Certainly this verse should be the sequel of the history in the last chapter. It is not connected with the miracle following;—which is placed by St. Luke at a different time, but with the indefinite introduction of "it came to pass on a certain day."

his own city] Capernaum, where our Lord now dwelt: cf. ch. iv. 13.

2–8.] HEALING OF A PARALYTIC AT CAPERNAUM. Mark ii. 1–12; Luke v. 17–26, in both of which the account is more particular.

2. their faith] Namely, in letting him down through the roof, because the whole house and space round the door was full, Mark ii. 4 their must be supposed to include the sick man, who was at least a consenting party to the bold step which they took. These words are common to the three Evangelists, as also "thy sins be forgiven."

Neander has some excellent remarks on this man's disease. Either it was the natural consequence of sinful indulgence, or by its means the feeling of sinfulness and guilt was more strongly aroused in him, and he recognized the misery of his disease as the punishment of his sins. At all events spiritual and bodily pain seem to have been connected and interchanged within him, and the former to have received accession of strength from the presence of the latter. Schleiermacher supposes the haste of these bearers to have originated in the prospect of our Lord's speedy departure thence; but, as Neander observes, we do not know enough of the paralytic's own state to be able to say whether there may not have been some cause for it in the man himself.

4. knowing] lit., seeing: viz. by the spiritual power indwelling in Him: See John ii. 24, 25. No other interpretation of such passages is admissible. St. Mark's expression, "perceived in his spirit," is more precise and conclusive. From wherfore to thine house is common (nearly verbatim) to the three Evangelists.

5.] "In our Lord's argument it must be carefully noted, that He does not ask, which is easiest, to forgive sins, or to raise a sick man—for it could not be affirmed that that of forgiving was easier than this of healing—but, which is easiest, to claim this power or that, to say, Thy sins be forgiven thee, or to say, Arise and walk? That (i. e. the former) is easiest, and I will now prove my right to say it, by saying with effect and with an outward consequence setting its seal to my truth, the harder word, Arise and walk. By doing that, which is capable of being put to the proof, I will vindicate my right and power to do that which in its very nature is incapable of being proved. By these visible tides of God's grace I will give you to know in what direction the great under-currents of His love are setting, and that both are obedient to My word. From this, which I will now do openly and before you all, you may conclude that it is 'no robbery': (Phil. ii. 6, but see note there) upon my part to claim also the power of forgiving men their sins." Trench on the Miracles, p. 206.

6. the Son of man] The Messiah: an expression regarded by the Jews as equivalent to "the Christ, the Son of God," ch. xxvi. 63. See also John v. 27. "The Alexandrian Fathers, in their conflict with the Nestorians, made use of this passage in proof of the entire transference which there was of all the properties of Christ's divine nature to His human; so that whatever one had, was so far common, that it might also be predicated of the other. It is quite true that had not the two natures been indissolubly knit together in a single Person, no such language could have been used; yet I should rather suppose that 'Son of Man' being the standing title whereby the Lord was well pleased to designate Himself, bringing out by it that He was at once one with humanity, and the crown of humanity, He does not so use it that the title is every where to be pressed, but at times simply as equivalent to Messiah." Trench, p. 208.

on earth] Distinguished from "in heaven," as in ch. xvi. 19; xviii. 18. Bengel finely remarks, "This saying savours of heavenly origin." The Son of Man, as God manifest in man's flesh, has on man's earth that power, which in its fountain and essence belongs to God in heaven. And this not by delegation, but "because He (being God) is the Son of Man." John v. 27.

then saith he] See a similar interchange of the persons in construction, Gen. iii. 22, 23.

8. unto men] Not plur. for sing. 'to a man,' nor, 'for the benefit of men;' but to mankind. They regarded this wonder-working as something by God granted to men—to mankind; and without supposing that they had before them the full meaning of their words, those words were true in the very highest sense. See John xvii. 8. In Mark they say, "We never saw it in this fashion:" in Luke, "We have seen strange things to-day."

9-17.] THE CALLING OF MATTHEW: THE FEAST CONSEQUENT ON IT: ENQUIRY OF JOHN'S DISCIPLES RESPECTING FASTING:—AND OUR LORD'S ANSWER. Mark ii. 13–22; Luke v. 27–39. Our Lord was going out to the sea to teach, Mark, ver. 13. All three Evangelists connect this calling with the preceding miracle, and the subsequent entertainment. The real difficulty of the narrative is the question as to the identity of Matthew in the text, and Levi in Mark and Luke. I shall state the arguments on both sides. (1) There can be no question that the three narratives relate to the same event. They are identical almost verbatim: inserted between narratives indisputably relating the same occurrences. (2) The almost general consent of all ages has supposed the two persons the same.

On the other hand, (3) our Gospel makes not the slightest allusion to the name of Levi, either here, or in ch. x. 3, where we find "Matthew the publican" among the Apostles, clearly identified with the subject of this narrative: whereas the other two Evangelists, having in this narrative spoken of Levi in their enumerations of the Apostles (Mark iii. 18; Luke vi. 15), mention Matthew without any note of identification with the Levi called on this occasion. This is almost inexplicable, on the supposition of his having borne both names. (4) Early tradition separates the two persons. Clement of Alexandria, quoting from Heraclion the Gnostic, mentions Matthew, Philip, Thomas, Levi, and many others, as eminent men who had not suffered martyrdom from a public confession of the faith. (5) Again, Origen, when Celsus has called the Apostles publicans and sailors, after acknowledging Matthew the publican, adds, "And there may be also Levi a publican among Jesus's followers. But he was not of the number of His Apostles, except according to some copies of Mark's Gospel." It is not quite clear from this, whether the copies of Mark substituted Levi's (?) name for Matthew's, or for some other: but most probably the latter. (6) It certainly would hence appear, as if there were in ancient times an idea that the two names belonged to distinct persons. But in the very passages where it is mentioned, a confusion is evident, which prevents us from drawing any certain conclusion able to withstand the general testimony to the contrary, arising from the prima facie view of the Gospel narrative. (7) It is probable enough that St. Matthew, in his own Gospel, would mention only his apostolic name, seeing that St. Mark and St. Luke also give him this name, when they speak of him as an Apostle. (8) It is remarkable, as an indication that St. Matthew's frequently unprecise manner of narration did not proceed from want of information,—that in this case, when he of all men must have been best informed, his own account is the least precise of the three. (9) With regard to the narrative itself in the text, we may observe, that this solemn and peculiar call seems (see ch. iv. 19, 22) hardly to belong to any but an Apostle; and that, as in the case of Peter, it here also implies a previous acquaintance and discipleship. (10) We are told in Luke v. 29, that Levi made him a great feast in his house; and, similarly, Mark has "in his house." The narrative in our text is so closely identical with that in Mark, that it is impossible to suppose, with Greswell, that a different feast is intended. The arguments by which he supports his view are by no means weighty. From the words the house, he infers that the house was not that of Matthew, but that in which our Lord usually dwelt, which he supposes to be intended in several other places. But surely the article might be used without any such significance, or designating any particular house,—as would be very likely if Matthew himself is here the narrator. Again, Greswell presses to verbal accuracy the terms used in the accounts, and attempts to shew them to be inconsistent with one another. But surely the time is past for such dealing with the historic text of the Gospels; and, besides, he has overlooked a great inconsistency in his own explanation, viz. that of making in the second instance, according to him, Scribes and Pharisees present at the feast given by a Publican, and exclaiming against that which they themselves were doing. It was not at, but after the feast that the discourse in vv. 11–17 took place. And his whole inference, that the great feast must be the great meal in the day, and consequently in the evening, hangs on too slender a thread to need refutation. The real difficulty, insuperable to a Harmonist, is the connexion here of the raising of Jairus's daughter with this feast: on which see below, ver. 18.

11.] These Pharisees appear to have been the Pharisees of the place: Luke has "their Scribes and Pharisees." The very circumstances related shew that this remonstrance cannot have taken place at the feast. The Pharisees say the words to the disciples: our Lord hears it. This denotes an occasion when our Lord and the disciples were present, but not surely intermixed with the great company of publicans.

12. whole... sick] Both words, in the application of the saying, must be understood subjectively (an ironical concession, as Calvin, Meyer): as referring to their respective opinions of themselves; as also righteous and sinners, ver. 13:—not as though the Pharisees were objectively either "whole" or "righteous," however much objective truth "sick" and "sinners" may have had as applied to the publicans and sinners.

13.] The whole of this discourse, with the exception of the citation, is almost verbatim in Mark, and (with the addition of "to repentance") Luke also.

14.] According to the detailed narrative of St. Mark (ii. 18) it was the disciples of John and of the Pharisees who ed this question. St. Luke continues the discourse as that of the former Pharisees and Scribes. This is one of those instances where the three accounts imply and confirm one another, and the hints incidentally dropped by one Evangelist form the prominent assertions of the other.

The fasting often of the disciples of John must not be understood as done in mourning for their master's imprisonment, but as belonging to the asceticism which John, as a preacher of repentance, inculcated. On the fasts of the Pharisees, see Lightfoot in loc.

15. mourn] = "fast," Mark and Luke. The difference of these two words is curiously enough one of Greswell's arguments for the non-identity of the narratives. Even if there were any force in such an argument, we might fairly set against it that the Greek word rendered taken is common to all three Evangelists, and occurs no where else in the N.T.

the bridegroom] This appellation of Himself had from our Lord peculiar appropriateness as addressed to the disciples of John. Their master had himself used the figure, and the very word in John iii. 29. Our Lord, in calling Himself the Bridegroom, announces the fulfilment in Him of a whole cycle of O.T. prophecies and figures: very probably with immediate reference to Hosea ii., that prophet having been cited just before: but also to many other passages, in which the Bride is the Church of God, the Bridegroom the God of Israel. See especially Isa. liv. 5–10 Heb. and E.V. As Stier (i. 320, edn. 2) observes, the article the here must not be considered as merely introduced on account of the parable, as usual elsewhere, but the parable itself to have sprung out of the emphatic name, "the bridegroom." The sons of the bridechamber are more than the mere guests at the wedding: they are the bridegroom's friends who go and fetch the bride.

the days will come] How sublime and peaceful is this early announcement by our Lord of the bitter passage before Him! Compare the words of our Christian poet: 'measuring with calm presage the infinite descent.' It has been asked, "What man ever looked so calmly, so lovingly, from such an height down to such a depth!"

shall be] more properly, shall have been taken from them: when His departure shall have taken place.

and then shall (better, will) they fast] These words are not a declaration of a duty, or of an ordinance, as binding on the Church in the days of her Lord's absence: the whole spirit of what follows is against such a supposition: but they declare, in accordance with the parallel word "mourn," that in those days they shall have real occasion for fasting; sorrow enough; see John xvi. 20:—a fast of God's own appointing in the solemn purpose of His will respecting them, not one of their own arbitrary laying on. This view is strikingly brought out in Luke, where the question is, "Can ye make the sons, &c. fast," i.e. by your rites and ordinances? "but, &c." and then shall they fast: there is no constraint in this latter case: they shall (will) fast. And this furnishes us with an analogous rule for the fasting of the Christian life: that it should be the genuine offspring of inward and spiritual sorrow, of the sense of the absence of the Bridegroom in the soul,—not the forced and stated fasts of the old covenant, now passed away. It is an instructive circumstance that in the Reformed Churches, while those stated fasts which were retained at their first emergence from Popery are in practice universally disregarded even by their best and holiest sons, —nothing can be more affecting and genuine than the universal and solemn observance of any real occasion of fasting placed before them by God's Providence: It is also remarkable how uniformly a strict attention to artificial and prescribed fasts accompanies a hankering after the hybrid ceremonial system of Rome.

Meyer remarks well that then refers to a definite point of time, not to the whole subsequent period.

16.] Our Lord in these two parables contrasts the old and the new, the legal and evangelic dispensations, with regard to the point on which He was questioned. The idea of the wedding seems to run through them; the preparation of the robe, the pouring of the new wine, are connected by this as their leading idea to one another and to the preceding verses.

The old system of prescribed fasts for fasting's sake must not be patched with the new and sound piece; the complete and beautiful whole of Gospel light and liberty must not be engrafted as a mere addition on the worn-out system of ceremonies. For the filling it up, the completeness of it, the new patch, by its weight and its strength pulls away the neighbouring weak and loose threads by which it holds to the old garment, and a worse rent is made. Stier notices the prophetic import of this parable: in how sad a degree the Lord's saying has been fulfilled in the History of the Church, by the attempts to patch the new, the Evangelic state, upon the old worn-out ceremonial system. 'Would,' he adds, 'that we could say in the interpretation, as in the parable, No man doeth this!' The robe must be all new, all consistent: old things, old types, old ceremonies, old burdens, sacrifices, priests, sabbath, and holy days, all are passed away: behold all things are become new.

17.] This parable is not a repetition of the previous one, but a stronger and more exact setting forth of the truth in hand. As is frequently our Lord's practice in His parables, He advances from the immediate subject to something more spiritual and higher, and takes occasion from answering a cavil, to preach the sublimest truths. The garment was something outward; this wine is poured in, is something inward, the spirit of the system. The former parable respected the outward freedom and simple truthfulness of the New Covenant; this regards its inner spirit, its pervading principle. And admirably does the parable describe the vanity of the attempt to keep the new wine in the old skin, the old ceremonial man, unrenewed in the spirit of his mind: the skins are broken: the new wine is something too living and strong for so weak a moral frame; it shatters the fair outside of ceremonial seeming; and the wine runneth out, the spirit is lost; the man is neither a blameless Jew nor a faithful Christian; both are spoiled. And then the result: not merely the damaging, but the utter destruction of the vessel,—the skins perish. According to some expositors, the new patch and new wine denote the fasting; the old garment and old bottles, the disciples.

This view is stated and defended at some length by Neander; but I own seems to me, as to De Wette, far-fetched. For how can fasting be called a patch of new (unfulled) cloth, or how compared to new wine? And Neander himself, when he comes to explain the important addition in Luke (on which see Luke v. 39, and note), is obliged to change the meaning, and understand the new wine of the spirit of the Gospel. It was and is the custom in the East to carry their wine on a journey in leather bottles, generally of goats' skin, sometimes of asses' or camels' skin.

18—26.] RAISING OF JAEIRUS' S DAUGHTER, AND HEALING OF A WOMAN WITH AN ISSUE OF BLOOD. Mark v. 21—43; Luke viii. 41—56. In Luke and Mark this miracle follows immediately after the casting out of the devils at Gadara, and our Lord's recrossing the lake to Capernaum; but without any precise note of time as here. He may well have been by the sea (as seems implied by Mark and Luke), when the foregoing conversation with the disciples of John and the Pharisees took place. The account in the text is the most concise of the three; both Mark and Luke, but especially the latter, giving many additional particulars. The miracle forms a very instructive point of comparison between the three Gospels.

18. a certain ruler] A ruler of the synagogue, named Jaeirus. In all except the connecting words, "while he spake these things unto them," the account in the text is summary, and deficient in particularity. I have therefore reserved full annotation for the account, in Luke, which see throughout.

is even now dead] She was not dead, but dying; at the last extremity. St. Matthew, omitting the message from the ruler's house (Mark v. 35: Luke viii. 49), gives the matter summarily in these words.

20.] The "hem," see ref. Num., was the fringe or tassel which the Jews were commanded to wear on each corner of their outer garment, as a sign that they were to be holy unto God. The article, as in ch. xiv. 36, designates the particular tassel which was touched.

22.] The cure was effected on her touching our Lord's garment, Mark v. 27–29: Luke viii. 44. And our Lord enquired who touched Him (Mark, Luke), for He perceived that virtue had gone out of Him (Luke). She, knowing what had been done to her, came fearing and trembling, and told Him all.

24.] No inference can be drawn from these words as to the fact of the maiden's actual death; for our Lord uses equivalent words respecting Lazarus (John xi. 11). And if it be answered that there He explains the sleep to mean death, we answer, that this explanation is only in consequence of the disciples misunderstanding his words. In both cases the words are most probably used with reference to the speedy awaken-ing which was to follow; "Think not the damsel dead, but sleeping; for she shall soon return to life." Luke: appends, after "they laughed him to scorn,"— "knowing that she was dead," in which words there is at least no recognition by the Evangelist of a mere apparent death. 25.] took her by the hand is common to the three Evangelists. From Luke we learn that our Lord said "Maid, arise"; from Mark we have the words He actually uttered, Talitha Cum: from both we learn that our Lord only took with him Peter, James, and John, and the father and mother of the maiden,— that she was twelve years old,—and that our Lord commanded that something should be given her to eat. She was an only daughter, Luke viii. 42.

21–31.] HEALING OF TWO BLIND MEN. Peculiar to Matthew.

27.] departed thence is too vague to be taken as a fixed note of sequence; for "thence" may mean the house of Jaeirus, or the town itself, or even that part of the country,—as ver. 26 has generalized the locality, and implied some pause of time.

son of David] a title of honour, and of recognition as the Messiah. It is remarkable that, in all the three narratives of giving sight to the blind in this Gospel, the title Son of David appears.

28. the house] perhaps, as Euthymius, the house of some disciple. Or, the house which our Lord inhabited at Capernaum; or perhaps the expression need not mean any particular house, merely, as we sometimes use the expression, the house, as opposed to the open air.

to do this] i.e. the healing, implied in "have mercy on us."

29.] Touching, or anointing the eyes, was the ordinary method which our Lord took of impressing on the blind the action of the divine power which healed them. Ch. xx. 34: Mark viii. 25: John ix. 6. In this miracle however we have this peculiar feature, that no direct word of power passes from our Lord, but a relative concession, making that which was done a measure of the faith of the blind men: and from the result the degree of their faith appears. Stier remarks, "We may already notice, in the history of this first period of our Lord's ministry, that, from having at first yielded immediately to the request for healing, He begins, by degrees, to prove and exercise the faith of the applicants."

30. straitly charged] The word is said to mean "to command with threatening," "*to enjoin austere*ly." The purpose of our Lord's earnestness appears to have been twofold: (1) that He might not be so occupied and overpressed with applications as to have neither time nor strength for the preaching of the Gospel: (2) to prevent the already-excited people from taking some public measure of recognition, and thus arousing the malice of the Pharisees before His hour was come.

No doubt the two men were guilty of an act of disobedience in thus breaking the Lord's solemn injunction: for obedience is better than sacrifice; the humble observance of the word of the Lord, than the most laborious and wide-spread will-worship after man's own mind and invention. Trench (Miracles, p. 197) well remarks, that the fact of almost all the Romish interpreters having applauded this act, "is very characteristic, and rests on very deep differences."

32–34.] HEALING OF A DUMB DÆMONIAC. Peculiar to Matthew. The word as they went out places this miracle in direct connexion with the foregoing. This narration has a singular affinity with that in ch. xii. 22, or still more with its parallel in Luke xi. 14. In both, the same expression of wonder follows; the same calumny of the Pharisees; only that in ch. xii. the dæmoniac is said (not in Luke xi.) to have been likewise blind. These circumstances, coupled with the immediate connexion of this miracle with the cure of the blind men, and the mention of 'the Son of David' in both, have led some to suppose that the account in ch. xii. is a repetition, or slightly differing version of the account in our text, intermingled also with the preceding healing of the blind. But the supposition seems unnecessary,—as, the habit of the Pharisees once being to ascribe our Lord's expulsion of devils to Beelzebub, the repetition of the re-mark would be natural:—and the other coincidences, though considerable, are not exact enough to warrant it.

This was a dumbness caused by dæmoniacal possession: for the difference between this and the natural infirmity of a deaf and dumb man, see Mark vii. 31–37.

33. so seen] viz. the casting out of devils:—‘never was seen to be followed by such results as those now manifested.’ See above.

35–38.] OUR LORD’S COMPASSION FOR THE MULTITUDE. Peculiar to Matthew. In the same way as ch. iv, 23–25 introduces the Sermon on the Mount, so do these verses the calling and commissioning of the Twelve. These general descriptions of our Lord’s going about and teaching at once remove all exactness of date from the occurrence which follows—as taking place at some time during the circuit and teaching just described. Both the Sermon on the Mount and this discourse are introduced and closed with these marks of indefiniteness as to time. This being the case, we must have recourse to the other Evangelists, by whose account it appears (as indeed may be implied in ch. x. 1), that the Apostles had called to their distinct office some time before this. (See Mark iii. 16: Luke vi. 13.) After their calling, and selection, they probably remained with our Lord for some time before they were sent out upon their mission.

36. the multitudes] Wherever He went, in all the cities.

harassed] plagued,—viz. literally, with weariness in following Him; or spiritually, with the tyranny of the Scribes and Pharisees, their heavy burdens, ch. xxii. 4, scattered abroad] neglected, cast hither and thither, as sheep would be who had wandered from their pasture. The context shews that our Lord’s compassion was excited by their being without competent spiritual leaders and teachers.

37.] The harvest was primarily that of the Jewish people, the multitudes of whom before Him excited the Lord’s compassion. Chrysostom remarks that we see not only our Lord’s freedom from vainglory, in sending out his disciples rather than drawing all notice to Himself, but His wisdom, in giving them this preliminary practice for their future work: making, as he expresses it, Palestine a palaestra for the world.

The Lord, says Chrysostom, having given this command, does not join them in such a prayer, but Himself sends them out as labourers—shewing plainly that He Himself is the Lord of the harvest, and recalling to them the Baptist’s image of the threshing-floor, and One who shall purge it.

Matthew: Chapter 10

X. 1–XI. 1.] MISSION OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES. Mark vi. 7–13: Luke ix. 1–6,—for the sending out of the Apostles: Mark iii. 13–19: Luke vi. 13–16,—for their names. On the characteristic differences between this discourse and that delivered to the Seventy (Luke x. 1 ff.) see notes there.

Notice, that this is not the choosing, but merely the mission of the twelve. The choosing had taken place some time before, but is not any where distinctly detailed by the Evangelists.

2.] We have in the N.T. four catalogues of the Apostles: the present one,—and those at Mark iii. 16,—Luke vi. 14,—Acts i. 13. All seem to follow one common out-line, but fill it up very differently. The following table will shew the agreements and differences:—

	Matthew x. 2.	Mark iii. 16.	Luke vi. 14.	Acts i. 13.
1		Simon Peter
2	Andrew	James	Andrew	John
3	James	John	James	James
4	John	Andrew	John	Andrew
5	Philip
6	Bartholomew			Thomas
7	Thomas	Matthew		Bartholomew
8	Matthew	Thomas		Matthew

9	James (the son) of Alphæus.
10	Lebbæus	Thaddæus	Simon called the Zelotes	Simon Zelotes
11	Simon of Cananæan		Judas (the bro.) of James.
12	Judas Iscariotes	Judas Iscarioth		Vacant.

From this it appears (1), that in all four three classes are enumerated, and that each class contains (assuming at present the identity of Lebbæus with Thaddæus, and of Thaddæus with Judas (the brother of James), the same persons in all four, but in different order, with the following exceptions:—that (2) Peter, Philip, James (the son?) of Alphæus, and Judas Iscariot hold the same places in all four. (3) That in the first class the two arrangements are (a) that of Matt. and Luke (Gospel),—Peter and Andrew, brothers; James and John, brothers;—i. e. according to their order of calling and connexion, and with reference to their being sent out in couples, Mark vi. 7: (b) Mark and Luke (Acts),—Peter, James, John, (the three principal,) and Andrew;—i. e. according to their personal pre-eminence. In the second class (c), that of Matt., Mark, and Luke (Gospel),—Philip and Bartholomew, Mat-thew and Thomas,—i. e. in couples: (d) Luke (Acts),—Philip, Thomas, Barth. Matthew (reason uncertain). In the third class (e), Matt. and Mark,—James (the son?) of Alphæus and (Lebb.) Thaddeus, Simon the Cananæan and Judas Iscariot; i.e. in couples: (f) Luke (Gosp. and Acts) James (the son?) of Alphæus, Simon Zelotes, Judas (the brother?) of James and Judas Iscariot (uncertain). (g) Thus in all four, the leaders of the three classes are the same, viz. Peter, Philip, and James (the son?) of Alphæus; and the traitor is always last. (4) It would appear then that the only difficulties are these two: the identity of Lebbæus with Thaddæus, and with Judas (the brother?) of James, and of Simon the Cananæan with Simon Zelotes. These will be discussed under the names.

The first] Not only as regards arrangement, or mere priority of calling, but as first in rank among equals. This is clearly shewn from James and John and Andrew being set next, and Judas Iscariot the last, in all the catalogues. We find Simon Peter, not only in the lists of the Apostles, but also in their history, prominent on various occasions before the rest. Sometimes he speaks in their name (Matt. xix. 27: Luke xii. 41); sometimes answers when all are addressed (Matt. xvi. 16||); sometimes our Lord addresses him as principal, even among the three favoured ones (Matt. xxvi. 40: Luke xxii. 31); sometimes he is addressed by others as representing the whole (Matt. xvii. 24: Acts ii. 37). He appears as the organ of the Apostles after our Lord's ascension (Acts i. 15; ii. 14; iv. 8; v. 29): the first speech, and apparently that which decided the Council, is spoken by him, Acts xv. 7. All this accords well with the bold and energetic character of Peter, and originated in the unerring discernment and appointment of our Lord Himself, who saw in him a person adapted to take precedence of the rest in the founding of His Church, and shutting (Acts v. 3, 9) and opening (Acts ii. 14, 41; x. 5, 46) the doors of the kingdom of Heaven. That however no such idea was current among the Apostles as that he was destined to be the Primate of the future Church, is as clear as the facts above mentioned. For (1) no trace of such a pre-eminence is found in all the Epistles of the other Apostles; but when he is mentioned, it is either, as 1 Cor. ix. 5, as one of the Apostles, one example among many, but in no wise the chief;—or as in Gal. ii. 7, 8, with a distinct account of a peculiar province of duty and preaching being allotted to him, viz. the apostleship of the circumcision (see 1 Pet. i. 1,) as distinguished from Paul, to whom was given the apostleship of the uncircumcision;—or as in Gal. ii. 9, as one of the principal pillars, together with James and John;—or as in Gal. ii. 11, as subject to rebuke from Paul as from an equal. And (2) wherever by our Lord Himself the future constitution of His Church is alluded to, or by the Apostles its actual constitution, no hint of any such primacy is given (see note on Matt. xvi. 18), but the whole college of Apostles are spoken of as absolutely equal. Matt. xix. 27, 28; xx. 26, 28: Eph. ii. 20, and many other places. Again (3) in the two Epistles which we have from his own hand, there is nothing for, but every thing against, such a supposition. He exhorts the presbyters as being their co-presbyter (1 Pet. v. 1): describes himself as a partaker of the glory that shall be revealed: addresses his second Epistle to them that have obtained the like precious faith with ourselves (2 Pet. i. 1): and makes not the slightest allusion to any pre-eminence over the other Apostles.

So that first here must be understood as signifying the prominence of Peter among the Apostles, as well as his early calling. (See John i. 42.)

called Peter] Or Cephas, so named by our Lord Himself (John as above) at His first meeting with him, and again more solemnly, and with a direct reference to the meaning of the name, Matt. xvi. 18.

Andrew] He, in conjunction with John (see note on John i. 37–41), was a disciple of the Baptist, and both of them followed our Lord, on their Master pointing Him out as the Lamb of God. They did not however from that time constantly accompany Him, but received a more solemn calling (see Matt. iv. 17–22: Luke v. 1–11)—i the narrative of which Peter is prominent, and so first called as an Apostle, at least of those four.

James (the son) of Zebedee, and John his brother] Partners in the fishing trade with Peter and Andrew, Luke v. 10.

3. Philip, and Bartholomew] Philip was called by our Lord the second day after the visit of Andrew and John, and the day after the naming of Peter. He was also of Bethsaida, the city of Andrew and Peter, James and John.

Andrew and Philip are Greek names. See John xii. 20–22.

Bartholomew, i.e. in Heb., son of Talmai or Tolom æ us, has been generally supposed to be the same with Nathanael of Cana in Galilee; and with reason: for (1) the name Bartholomew is not his own name, but a patronymic:— (2) He follows next in order, as Nathanael, in John i. 46, to the Apostles just mentioned, with the same formula which had just been used of Philip's own call (ver. 44),— “Philip findeth Nathanael.”— (3) He is there, as here, and in Mark and Luke (Gospel), in connexion with Philip (that he was his brother, was conjectured by Dr. Donaldson; but rendered improbable by the fact that John, in the case of Andrew a few verses above, expressly says “he findeth his own brother Simon,” whereas in ver. 46 no such specification occurs):— (4) in John xxi. 2, at the appearance of our Lord on the shore of the sea of Tiberias, Nathanael is mentioned as present, where seven apostles (“disciples”) are recounted.

Thomas, and Matthew the Publican] Thomas, in Greek Didymus (the twin). John xi. 16; xx. 24; xxi. 2.

Matthew the publican is clearly by this appellation identified with the Matthew of ch. ix. 9. We hear nothing of him, except in these two passages. Dr. Donaldson believed Matthew and Thomas to have been twin brothers. Eusebins preserves a tradition that Thomas's real name was Judas.

James (the son of Alphæus)] From John xix. 25, some infer (but see note there), that Mary the (wife) of Clopas was sister of Mary the mother of our Lord. From Mark xv. 40, that Mary was the mother of James “the little,” which may be this James. Hence it would appear, if these two passages point to the same person, that Alphæus = Clopas. And indeed the two Greek names are but different ways of expressing the Hebrew name. If this be so, then this James the Less may possibly be “the brother of the Lord” mentioned Gal. i. 19 apparently as an apostle, and one of “His brethren” mentioned Matt. xiii. 55 (where see note) (?). But on the difficulties attending this view, see note on John vii. 5.

Lebbæus] Much difficulty rests on this name, both from the various readings, and the questions arising from the other lists. The received reading appears to be a conjunction of the two ancient ones, Lebbæus and Thaddæus: the latter of these having been introduced from Mark: where, however, one of the ancient MSS. has Lebbæus. Whichever of these is the true reading, the Apostle himself has generally been supposed to be identical with “Judas of James” in both Luke's catalogues, i.e. (see note there) Judas the brother (Dr. Donaldson supposed son: see note on Luke xxiv. 13) of James, and so son of Alpheus, and commonly supposed to be (?) one of the brethren of the Lord named Matt. xiii. 55. In John xiv. 22 we have a ‘Judas, not Iscariot,’ among the Apostles: and the catholic epistle is written by a ‘Judas brother of James.’ What in this case the names Lebbæus and Thaddæus are, is impossible to say. So that the whole rests on conjecture; which however does not contradict any known fact, and may be allowed as the only escape from the difficulty.

4. Simon the Cananæan] This is not a local name, but is derive from Canan, which is equivalent to Zelotes (Luke, Gospel and Acts). We may therefore suppose that before his conversion he belonged to the sect of the Zealots, who after the example of Phinehas (Num. xxv. 7, 8) took justice into their own hands, and punished offenders against the law. This sect eventually brought upon Jerusalem its destruction.

Judas Iscariot] Son of Simon (John vi. 71; [xii. 4 various reading;] xiii. 2, 26). Probably a native of Kerioth in Juda, Josh. xv. 25. Ish Kerioth, a man of Kerioth, as Istobus, a man of Tob, Joseph. Antt. vii. 6. 1. That the name Iscariot cannot be a surname, as Bp. Middleton supposes, the expression “Judas Iscariot the son of Simon,” used in all the above places of John, clearly proves. Dr. Donaldson assumed it as certain that the Simon last mentioned was the father of Judas Iscariot. But surely this is very uncertain, in the case of so common a name as Simon.

5. saying] If we compare this verse with ch. xi. 1, there can be little doubt that this discourse of our Lord was delivered at one time and that, the first sending of the Twelve. How often its solemn injunctions may have been repeated on similar occasions we cannot say: many of them reappear at the sending of the Seventy in Luke x. 2 ff.

Its primary reference is to the then mission of the Apostles to prepare His way; but it includes, in the germ instructions prophetically delivered for the ministers and missionaries of the Gospel to the end of time. It may be divided into THREE GREAT PORTIONS, in each of which different departments of the subject are treated, but which follow in natural sequence on one another. In the FIRST of these (vv. 5–15), our Lord, taking up the position of the messengers whom He sends from the declaration with which the Baptist and He Himself began their ministry, “The Kingdom of heaven is at hand,” gives them commands, mostly literal, and of present import, for their mission to the cities of Israel. This portion concludes with a denunciation of judgment against that unbelief which should reject their preaching. The SECOND (vv. 16–23) refers to the general mission of the Apostles as developing itself, after the Lord should be taken from them, in preaching to Jews and Gentiles (vv. 17, 18), and subjecting them to persecutions (vv. 21, 22). This portion ends with the end of the apostolic period properly so called, ver. 23 referring primarily to the destruction of Jerusalem. In this portion there is a foreshadowing of what shall be the lot and duty of the teachers of the Gospel to the end, inasmuch as the ‘coming of the Son of Man’ is ever typical of His final coming to judgment. Still the direct reference is to the Apostles and their mission, and the other only by inference.

The THIRD (vv. 24–42), the longest and weightiest portion, is spoken directly (with occasional reference only to the Apostles and their mission [ver. 40]) of all disciples of the Lord,—their position,—their encouragements,—their duties,—and finally concludes with the last great reward (ver. 42).

In these first verses, 5, 6,—we have the location; in 7, 8, the purpose; in 9, 10, the fitting out; and in 11–14, the manner of proceeding,—of their mission: ver. 15 concluding with a prophetic denunciation, tending to impress them with a deep sense of the importance of the office entrusted to them.

Samaritans] The Samaritans were the Gentile inhabitants of the country between Judaea and Galilee, consisting of heathens whom Shalmaneser king of Assyria brought from Babylon and other places. Their religion was a mixture of the worship of the true God with idolatry (2 Kings xvii. 24–41). The Jews had no dealings with them, John iv. 9. They appear to have been not so unready as the Jews to receive our Lord and His mission (John iv. 39–42; Luke ix. 51 ff., and notes);—but this prohibition rested on judicial reasons. See Acts xiii. 46. In Acts i. 8 the prohibition is expressly taken off: ‘Ye shall be witnesses in Jerusalem, and in all Judaea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost of the earth.’ And in Acts viii. 1, 5, 8, we find the result. See ch. xv. 21–28.

6. the lost sheep] See besides reff. ch. ix. 36: John x. 16.

7.] This announcement shews the preparatory nature of this first apostolic mission. Compare, as shewing the difference of their ultimate message to the world, Col. i. 26–28.

8. freely, &c.] See Acts viii. 18–20.

9. Provide neither...] All the words following depend on this verb, and it is explained by the parallel expressions in Mark and Luke. They were to make no preparations for the journey, but to take it in dependence on Him who sent them, just as they were. This forbidden provision would be of three kinds (1) Money: in Mark (vi. 8) (literally) “brass,” in Luke (ix. 3) “silver.” here all the three current in order of value, connected by the nor, introducing a climax—no gold, nor yet silver, nor yet brass—in their girdles (so, literally, Luke x. 4). In the Greek it is, ‘no gold, nor even silver, nor even brass.’ So again in ver. 10. (2) Food: here scrip, in Mark “no scrip, no bread.” similarly Luke. (3) Clothing—neither two coats: so Mark and Luke.—neither shoes; in Mark expressed by “be shod with san, dals:” explained in Luke x. 4 by “carry no shoes,” i.e. a second pair.—nor yet a staff = “save a staff only” Mark. They were not to procure expressly for this journey even a staff: they were to take with them their usual staff only. The missing of this explanation has probably led to the reading staves both here and in Luke. If it be genuine, it does not mean two staves; for who would ever think of taking a spare staff? but a staff each. The whole of this prohibition was temporary only; for their then journey, and no more. See Luke xxii. 35, 36.

10. for the workman...] This is a common truth of life—men give one who works for them his food and more; here uttered however by our Lord in its highest sense, as applied to the workmen in His vineyard. See 1 Cor. ix. 13, 14: 2 Cor. xi. 8: 3 John 8. It is (as Stier remarks, vol. i.p. 352, ed. 2) a gross perversion and foolish bondage to the letter, to imagine that ministers of congregations, or even missionaries among the heathen, at this day are bound by the literal sense of our Lord’s commands in this passage. But we must not therefore imagine that they are not bound by the spirit of them. This literal first mission was but a foreshadowing of the spiritual subsequent sending out of the ministry over the world, which ought therefore in spirit every where to be conformed to these rules.

11. worthy] Inclined to receive you and your message,—worthy that you should become his guest. Such persons in this case would be of the same ind as those spoken of Acts xiii. 48 as “disposed to eternal life” (see there). The precept in this verse is very much more fully set forth by Luke, x. 7 ff.

till ye go thence] i.e. Until ye depart out of the city.

13.] The peace mentioned is that in the customary Eastern salutation, Peace be with you. Luke has Peace be to this house (x. 5). Compare with the spirit of vv. 10–13,—ch. vii. 6. Stier remarks that the spirit of these commands binds Christian ministers to all accustomed courtesies of manner in the countries and ages in which their mission may lie. So we find the Greek salutation instead of the Jewish form of greeting, Acts xv. 23: James i. 1. And the same spirit forbids that repelling official pride by which so many ministers lose the affections of their people. And this is to be without any respect to the worthiness or otherwise of the inhabitants of the house. In the case of unworthiness, ‘let your peace return (See Isa. xlvi. 23) to you,’ i.e. ‘be as though you had never spoken it.’

14.] See Acts, in the references. A solemn act which might have two meanings: (1) as Luke x. 11 expresses at more length,—‘We take nothing of yours with us, we free ourselves from all contact and communion with you,’ or (2),—which sense probably lies beneath both this and ver. 13, ‘We free ourselves from all participation in your condemnation: will have nothing in common with those who have rejected God’s message.’ See 1 Kings ii. 5, where the shoes on the feet are mentioned as partakers in the guilt of blood. It was a custom of the Pharisees, when they entered Judæa from a Gentile land, to do this act, as renouncing all communion with Gentiles: those then who would not receive the apostolic message were to be treated as no longer Israelites, but Gentiles. Thus the verse forms a kind of introduction to the next portion of the discourse, where the future mission to the Gentiles is treated of.

The or city brings in the alternative; “house, if it be a house that rejects you, city, if a whole city.”

15.] The first verily I say unto you; with which expression our Lord closes each portion of this discourse.

day of judgment, i.e. of final judgment, = “that day” Luke x. 12. It must be noticed that this denunciatory part, as also the command to shake off the dust, applies only to the people of Israel, who had been long prepared for the message of the Gospel by the Law and the Prophets, and recently more particularly by John the Baptist; and in this sense it may still apply to the rejection of the Gospel by professing Christians; but as it was not then applicable to the Gentiles, so neither now can it be to the heathen who know not God.

16–23.] SECOND PART OF THE DISCOURSE. See above on ver. 5, for the subject of this portion.

16.] I is not without meaning. It takes up again the subject of their sending, and reminds them WHO sent them.

send forth, Gr. apostello, is in direct connexion with their name Apostles.

sheep in the midst of wolves] This comparison is used of the people of Israel in the midst of the Gentiles, in a Rabbinical work cited by Stier: see also Eccl. xiii. 17.

17. beware] The wisdom of the serpent is needed for this part of their course; the simplicity of the dove for the take not anxious thought in ver. 19.

The but turns from the internal character to behaviour in regard of outward circumstances.

councils] See Acts iv. 6, 7; v. 40. They are the courts of seven (on which see Deut. xvi. 18), appointed in every city, to take cognizance of causes both civil and criminal, ch. v. 21: here perhaps put for any courts of assembly in general. The scourging in the synagogues is supposed to have been inflicted by order of the Tribunal of Three, who judged in them.

18. and] literally, yea; and more-over; assuming what has just been said, and passing on to something more.

governors—Proconsuls, Proprætors, Procurators, as (Pontius Pilate,) Felix, Festus, Gallio, Sergius Paulus.

kings, as (Herod,) Agrippa. The former verse was of Jewish persecution; this, of Gentile: the concluding words shew that the scope of both, in the divine purposes, as regarded the Apostles, was the same, viz. for a testimony. The “testimony” is in both senses—a testimony to, and against them (see ch. viii. 4, note), and refers to both sets of persecutors: to them, i.e. the Jews (not the “rulers and kings,” for they are in most cases Gentiles themselves), and to the Gentiles. It was a testimony in the best sense to Sergius Paulus, Acts xiii. 7, but against Felix, Acts xxiv. 25; and this double power ever belongs to the word of God as preached—it is a “two-edged sword” Rev. i. 16; ii. 12).

19. take not anxious (or distracting) thought] A spiritual prohibition, answering to the literal one in vv. 9, 10. See Exodus iv. 12.

20. For it is not ye....] This shews the reference of the to a future mission of the Apostles, see John xv. 26, 27. (1) It is to be observed that our Lord never in speaking to His disciples says our Father, but either my Father (ch. xviii. 10), or your Father (as here), or both conjoined (John xx. 17); never leaving it to be inferred that God is in the same sense His Father and our Father. (2) It is also to be observed that in the great work of God in the world, human individuality sinks down and vanishes, and God alone, His Christ, His Spirit, is the worker.

21.] Spoken perhaps of official information given against Christians, as there are no female relations mentioned. But the general idea is also included.

22. all men] i.e. all else but yourselves; not, as sometimes interpreted, a strong expression, intended to signify many, or the majority of mankind.

but he that endureth] In order to understand these words it is necessary to enter into the character of our Lord’s prophecies respecting His coming, as having an immediate literal, and a distant foreshadowed fulfilment. Throughout this discourse and the great prophecy in ch. xxiv., we find the first apostolic period used as a type of the whole ages of the Church; and the vengeance on Jerusalem, which historically put an end to the old dispensation, and was in its place with reference to that order of things, the coming of the Son of Man, as a type of the final coming of the Lord. These two subjects accompany and interpenetrate one another in a manner wholly inexplicable to those who are unaccustomed to the wide import of Scripture prophecy, which speaks very generally not so much of events themselves, points of time,—as of processions of events, all ranging under one great description. Thus in the present case there is certainly direct reference to the destruction of Jerusalem; the end directly spoken of is that event, and the shall be saved the preservation provided by the warning afterwards given in ch. xxiv. 15–18. And the next verse directly refers to the journeys of the Apostles over the actual cities of Israel, territorial, or where Jews were located. But as certainly do all these expressions look onwards to the great final coming of the Lord, the end of all prophecy; as certainly the shall be saved here bears its full scripture meaning, of everlasting salvation; and the endurance to the end is the finished course of the Christian; and the precept in the next verse is to apply to the conduct of Christians of all ages with reference to persecution, and the announcement that hardly will the Gospel have been fully preached to all nations (or, to all the Jewish nation, i.e. effectually) when the Son of Man shall come. It is most important to keep in mind the great prophetic parallels which run through our Lord's discourses, and are sometimes separately, sometimes simultaneously, presented to us by Him.

24–42.] THIRD PART OF THE DISCOURSE. See note on ver 5. It treats of (I.) the conflicts (vv. 24–26), duties (vv. 26–28), and encouragements (vv. 28–32) of all Christ's disciples. (II.) The certain issue of this fight in victory; the confession by Christ of those who confess Him, set in strong light by the contrast of those who deny Him (vv. 32, 33); the necessity of conflict to victory, by the nature of Christ's mission (vv. 34–37), the kind of self-devotion which he requires (vv. 37–39); concluding with the solemn assurance that no reception of His messengers for His sake, nor even the smallest labour of love for Him, shall pass without its final reward. Thus we are carried on to the end of time and of the course of the Church.

24.] This proverb is used in different senses in Luke vi. 40 and John xiii. 16. The view here is, that disciples must not expect a better lot than their Master, but be well satisfied if they have no worse. The threefold relation of our Lord and His followers here brought out may thus be exemplified from Scripture: disciple and teacher, Matt. v. 1; xxiii. 8; Luke vi. 20; servant and lord, John xiii. 13; Luke xii. 35–48; Rom. i. 1; 2 Pet. i. 1; Jude 1; master of the house and household, Matt. xxvi. 26–29||; Luke xxiv. 30; Matt. xxiv. 45 ff.||.

25. Beelzebub] (or—bul) (Either 'lord of dung,'—or, as in 2 Kings i. 2, 'lord of flies,'—a god worshipped at Ekron by the Philistines; there is however another derivation more probable than either of these, from baal, lord, and zeboul, a house, by which it would exactly correspond to the term used.)—A name by which the prince of the devils was called by the Jews, ch. xii. 24,—to which accusation, probably an usual one (see ch. ix. 34), and that in John viii. 48, our Lord probably refers. In those places they had not literally called Him Beelzebub, but He speaks of their mind and intention in those charges. They may however have literally done so on other unrecorded occasions.

26.] The force of this is: 'Notwithstanding their treatment of Me your Master, Mine will be victory and triumph; therefore ye, My disciples, in your turn, need not fear.' Compare Rom. viii. 37.

for there is nothing] This solemn truth is again and again enounced by our Lord on different occasions, with different references. See Luke viii. 17; xii. 2. The former part of the verse drew comfort and encouragement from the past: this does so from the future. 'All that is hidden must be revealed—(1) it is God's purpose in His Kingdom that the everlasting Gospel shall be freely preached, and this purpose ye serve. (2) Beware then of hypocrisy (see Luke xii. 2) through fear of men, for all such will detected and exposed hereafter: and (3) fear them not, for, under whatever aspersions ye may labour from them, the day is coming which shall clear you and condemn them, if ye are fearlessly doing the work of Him that sent you' (ch. xiii. 43).

27.] An expansion of the duty of freeness and boldness of speech implied in the last verse. The words may bear two meanings: either (1) that which Chrysostom gives, taking the expressions relatively, of His speaking to them only, and in a little corner of Palestine, as compared with the subsequent publicity of the Word; or (2) as this part of the discourse relates to the future principally, the secret speaking may mean the communication which our Lord would hold with them hereafter by His Spirit, which they were to preach and proclaim. See Acts iv. 20. These senses do not exclude one another, and are possibly both implied.

There is no need, with Lightfoot and others, to suppose any allusion to a custom in the synagogue, in the words hear in the ear. They are a common expression, derived from common life: we have it in a wider sense Acts xi. 22, and Gen. 1. 4.

upon the housetops] On the flat roofs of the houses. Thus we have in Josephus, "Going up on the roof, and with his hand quieting their tumult... he said...."

28.] On the latter part of this verse much question has of late been raised, which never was, as far as I have been able to find, known to the older interpreters. Stier designates it as 'the only passage of Scripture whose words may equally apply to God and the enemy of souls.' He himself is strongly in favour of the latter interpretation, and defends it at much length; but I am quite unable to assent to his opinion. It seems to me at variance with the connexion of the discourse, and with the universal tone of Scripture regarding Satan. If such a phrase as "to fear the devil" could be instanced as equivalent to "to guard against the devil," or if it could be shewn that any where power is attributed to Satan analogous to that indicated by "able to destroy both soul and body in hell," I then should be open to the doubt whether he might not here be intended; but seeing that "fear not," indicating terror, is changed into "fear" so usually followed by "God" in a higher and holier sense (there is no such contrast in ver. 26, and therefore that verse cannot be cited as ruling the meaning of this), and that GOD ALONE is throughout the Scripture the Almighty dispenser of life and death both temporal and eternal, seeing also that Satan is ever represented as the condemned of God, not one able to destroy, I must hold by the general interpretation, and believe that both here and in Luke xii. 3-7 our Heavenly Father is intended, as the right object of our fear. As to this being inconsistent with the character in which He is brought before us in the next verse, the very change of meaning in "fear" would lead the mind on, out of the terror before spoken of, into that better kind of fear always indicated by that expression when applied to God, and so prepare the way for the next verse. Besides, this sense is excellently in keeping with ver. 29 in another way. 'Fear Him who is the only Dispenser of Death and Life: of death, as here; of life, as in the case of the sparrows for whom He cares.' 'Fear Him, above men: trust Him, in spite of men.'

In preparing the 2nd edn. of my Greek Test., I carefully reconsidered the whole matter, and went over Stier's arguments with the connexion of the discourse before me, but found myself more than ever persuaded that it is quite impossible, for the above and every reason, to apply the words to the enemy of souls. The similar passage, James iv. 12, even in the absence of other considerations, would be decisive. Full as his Epistle is of our Lord's words from this Gospel, it is hardly to be doubted that in "there is one lawgiver [and judge] who is able to save and to destroy," he has this very verse before him. The depth of this part of the discourse I take to be, the setting before Christ's messengers their Heavenly Father as the sole object of childlike trust and childlike fear—the former from His love,—the latter from His power,—His power to destroy, it is not said them, but absolute, body and soul, in hell. Here is the true depth of the discourse: but if in the midst of this great subject, our Lord is to be conceived as turning aside, upholding as an object of fear the chief enemy, whose ministers and subordinates He is at the very moment, commanding us not to fear, and speaking of him as he that is able to destroy both soul and body in hell, to my mind all true and deep connexion is broken.

29. sparrows] any small birds. a farthing] Gr. assarion. This word, derived from 'as,' was used in Greek and Hebrew to signify the meanest, most insignificant amount.

fall on the ground] which birds do when struck violently, or when frozen, wet or starved: it is therefore equivalent to die: "not one of them is forgotten before God," Luke xii. 6.

30.] See 1 Sam. xiv. 45: Luke xxi. 18: Acts xxvii. 34. The your is emphatic, corresponding to the ye at the end of ver. 31. But the emphatic ye spoken directly to the Apostles, is generalized immediately by the whosoever in ver. 32.

32. confess me] The context shews plainly that it is a practical consistent confession which is meant, and also a practical and enduring denial. The Lord will not confess the confessing Judas, nor deny the denying Peter; the traitor who denied Him in act is denied: the Apostle who confessed Him even to death will be confessed. Cf. 2 Tim. ii. 12. We may observe that both in the Sermon on the Mount (ch. vii. 21-23) and here, after mention of the Father, our Lord describes Himself as the Judge and Arbiter of eternal life and death.

34.] In Luke xii. 51-53 this announcement, as here, is closely connected with the mention of our Lord's own sufferings (ver. 38). As He won His way to victory thro the contradiction of sinners and strife, so must those who come after Him. The immediate reference is to the divisions in families owing to conversions to Christianity. Ver. 35 is quoted nearly literally from Micah vii. 6. When we read in Commentators that these divisions were not the purpose, but the inevitable results only, of the Lord's coming, we must remember that with God, results are all purposed.

37.] Compare Deut. xxxiii. 9, and Exod. xxxii. 26-29, to which passages this verse is a reference. Stier well remarks, that under the words worthy of me there lies an exceeding great reward which counterbalances all the seeming asperity of this saying.

38.] How strange must this prophetic announcement have seemed to the Apostles! It was no Jewish proverb (for crucifixion was not a Jewish punishment), no common saying, which our Lord here and so often utters. See ch. xvi. 24: Mark x. 21: Luke ix. 23. He does not here plainly mention His Cross; but leaves it to be understood, see ver. 25. This is one of those sayings of which John xii. 16 was eminently true.

39. his life... it] refer to the same thing, but in somewhat different senses. The first "life" is the life of this world, which we here all count so dear to us; the second, implied in "it," the real life of man in a blessed eternity.

hath found = “loveth.” John xii. 25 = “will save,” Mark viii. 35. The past participles are used in anticipation, with reference to that day when the loss and gain shall become apparent. But “hath found” and “hath lost” are again somewhat different in position: the first implying earnest desire to save, but not so second any will or voluntary act to destroy. This is brought out by the for my sake, which gives the ruling providential arrangement whereby the losing is brought about. But besides the primary meaning of this saying as regards the laying down of life literally for Christ’s sake, we cannot fail to recognize in it a far deeper sense, in which he who loses his life shall find it. In Luke ix. 23, the taking up of the cross is to be “daily;” in ch. xvi. 24|[Mk. “let him deny himself” is joined with it. Thus we have the crucifying of the life of this world,—the death to sin spoken of Rom. vi. 4–11, and life unto God. And this life unto God is the real, true life, which the self-denier shall find, and preserve unto life eternal. See John xii. 25 and note.

40.] Here in the conclusion of the discourse, the Lord recurs again to His Apostles whom He was sending out. From ver. 32 has been connected with whosoever, and therefore general.

receiveth, see ver. 14; but it has here the wider sense of not only receiving to house and board,—but receiving in heart and life the message of which the Apostles were the bearers. On the sense of the verse, see John xx. 21, and on him that sent me, “I send you,” ver. 16, and Heb. iii. 1. There is a difference between the representation of Christ by His messengers, which at most is only official, and even then broken by personal imperfection and infirmity (see Gal. ii. 11; iv. 13, 14),—and the perfect unbroken representation of the Eternal Father by His Blessed Son, John xiv. 9; Heb. i. 3.

41. a prophet’s reward] either, such a reward as a prophet or a righteous man would receive for the like service,—or, such a reward as a prophet or a righteous man shall receive as such. Chrysostom.

in the name of] i.e. because he is: i.e. ‘for the love of Christ, whose prophet he is.’ The sense is, ‘He who by receiving (see above) a prophet because he is a prophet, or a holy man because he is a holy man, recognizes, enters into, these states as appointed by Me, shall receive the blessedness of these states, shall derive all the spiritual benefits which these states bring with them, and share their everlasting reward,

42. these little ones] To whom this applies is not very clear. Hardly, as some think, to the despised and meanly-esteemed for Christ’s sake. I should rather imagine some children may have been present: for of such does our Lord elsewhere use this term, see ch. xviii. 2–6. Though perhaps the expression may be meant of lower and less advanced converts, thus keeping up the gradation from the prophet. This however hardly seems likely: for how could a disciple be in a downward gradation from a righteous man?

2–30.] MESSAGE OF ENQUIRY FROM THE BAPTIST: OUR LORD’ S ANSWER, AND DISCOURSE THEREON TO THE MULTITUDE. Luke vii. 18–35. There have been several different opinions as to the reason why this enquiry was made. I will state them, and append to them my own view. (1) It has been a very generally received idea that the question was ask: for the sake of the disciples themselves, with the sanction of their master, and for the purpose of confronting them, who were doubtful and jealous of our Lord, with the testimony of His own mouth. This view is ably maintained by Chrysostom, and has found strenuous defenders in our own day. The objections to it are,—that the text evidently treats the question as coming from John himself; the answer is directed to John; and the following discourse is on the character and position of John. These are answered by some with a supposition that John allowed the enquiry to be made in his name; but surely our Saviour would not in this case have made the answer as we have it, which clearly implies that the object of the miracles done was John’s satisfaction. (2) The other great section of opinions on the question is that which supposes doubt to have existed, for some reason or other, in the Baptist’s own mind. This is upheld by Tertullian and others, and advocated by De Wette, who thinks that the doubt was perhaps respecting not our Lord’s mission, but His way of manifesting Himself, which did not agree with the theocratic views of the Baptist. This he considers to be confirmed by ver. 6. Olshausen and Neander suppose the ground of the doubt to have lain partly in the Messianic idea of the Baptist, partly in the weakening and bedimming effect of imprisonment on John’s mind. Lightfoot carries this latter still further, and imagines that the doubt arose from dissatisfaction at not being liberated from prison by some miracle of our Lord. Others have supposed that John, perplexed by the various reports about the worker of these miracles, sent his disciples to ascertain whether it was really He who had been borne witness to by himself.

(3) It appears to me that there are objections against each of the above suppositions, too weighty to allow either of them to be entertained. There can be little doubt on the one hand, that our Saviour's answer is directed to John, and not to the disciples, who are bona fide messengers and nothing more:— “Go and shew John” can I think bear no other interpretation: and again the words “blessed is he, whosoever shall not be offended in me” must equally apply to John in the first place, so that, in some sense, he had been offended at Christ. On the other hand, it is exceedingly difficult to suppose that there can have been in John's own mind any real doubt that our Lord was He that should come, seeing that he himself had borne repeatedly such notable witness to Him, and that under divine direction and manifestation (see ch. iii, 16, 17: John i. 26–37).

The idea of his objective faith being shaken by his imprisonment is quite inconsistent not only with John's character, but with our Lord's discourse in this place, whose description of him seems almost framed to guard against such a supposition.

The last hypothesis above mentioned is hardly probable, in the form in which it is put. We can scarcely imagine that John can have doubted who this Person was, or have been confounded by the discordant rumours which reached him about His wonderful works. But that one form of this hypothesis is the right one, I am certainly disposed to believe, until some more convincing considerations shall induce me to alter my view. (4) The form to which I allude is this: John having heard all these reports, being himself fully convinced Who this Wonderworker was, was becoming impatient under the slow and unostentatious course of our Lord's self-manifestation, and desired to obtain from our Lord's own mouth a declaration which should set such rumours at rest, and (possibly) which might serve for a public profession of His Messiahship, from which hitherto He had seemed to shrink. He thus incurs a share of the same rebuke which the mother of our Lord received (John ii. 4); and the purport of the answer returned to him is, that the hour was not yet come for such an open declaration, but that there were sufficient proofs given by the works done, to render all inexcusable, who should be offended in Him. And the return message is so far from being a satisfaction designed for the disciples, that they are sent back like the messenger from Gabii to Sextus Tarquinius, with indeed a significant narrative to relate, but no direct answer; they were but the intermediate transmitters of the symbolic message, known to Him who sent it, and him who received it.

It is a fact not to be neglected in connexion with this solution of the difficulty, that John is said to have heard of the works, not of Jesus, but of (the) Christ: the only place where that name, standing alone, is given to our Lord in this Gospel. So that it would seem as if the Evangelist had purposely avoided saying of Jesus to shew that the works were reported to John not as those of the Person whom he had known as Jesus, but of the Deliverer—the Christ; and that he was thus led to desire a distinct avowal of the identity of the two. I have before said that the opening part of the ensuing discourse seems to have been designed to prevent, in the minds of the multitude, any such unworthy estimations of John as those above cited. The message and the answer might well beget such suspicions, and could not from the nature of the case be explained to them in that deeper meaning which they really bore; but the character of John here given would effectually prevent them, after hearing it, from entertaining any such idea.

2. had heard] From his own disciples, Luke vii. 18. The place of his imprisonment was Machaerus, a frontier town between the dominions of Aretas and Herod Antipas. Our Lord in that hour wrought many cures, Luke ver. 21. Verses 4–6 are nearly verbatim in the two Gospels.

5.] The words the dead are raised up have occasioned some difficulty; but surely without reason. In Luke, the raising of the widow's son at Nain immediately precedes this message; and in this Gospel we have had the ruler's daughter raised. These miracles might be referred to by our Lord under the words the dead are raised up; for it is to be observed that He bade them tell John not only what things they saw, but what things they had heard, as in Luke.

It must not be forgotten that the words here used by our Lord have an inner and spiritual sense, as betokening the blessings and miracles of divine grace on the souls of men, of which His outward and visible miracles were symbolical. The words are mostly cited from Isa. xxxv. 5, where the same spiritual meaning is conveyed by them. They are quoted here, as the words of Isa. liii. are the Evangelist in ch. viii. 17, as applicable to their partial external fulfilment, which however, like themselves, pointed onward to their greater spiritual completion.

the poor have the gospel preached to them (are evangelized)] Stier remarks the coupling of these miracles together, and observes that with the dead are raised, this is united, as being a thing hitherto unheard of and strange, and an especial fulfilment of Isa. lxi. 1.

6.] See note on ver. 2.

7–30.] The discourse divides itself into TWO PARTS: (1) vv. 7–19, the respective characters and mutual relations of John and Christ: (2) vv. 20–30, the condemnation of the unbelief of the time—ending with the gracious invitation to all the weary and heavy laden to come to Him, as truly He that should come.

7.] The following verses set forth to the people the real character and position of John; identifying him who cried in the wilderness with him who now spoke from his prison, and assuring them that there was the same dignity of office and mission throughout. They are not spoken till after the departure of the disciples of John, probably because they were not meant for them or John to hear, but for the people, who on account of the question which they had heard might go away with a mistaken depreciation of John. And our Lord, as usual, takes occasion, from reminding them of the impression made on them by John's preaching of repentance, to set forth to them deep truths regarding His own Kingdom and Office.

8. But] i.e. what was it, if it was not that?

what went ye out] The repetition of this question, and the order of the suggestive answers, are remarkable. The first sets before them the scene of their desert pilgrimage—the banks of Jordan with its reeds, but no such trifles were the object of the journey: this suggestion is rejected without an answer. The second reminds them that it was a man—but not one in soft clothing, for such are not found in deserts. The third brings before them the real object of their pilgrimage in his holy office, and even amplifies that office itself. So that the great Forerunner is made to rise gradually and sublimely into his personality, and thus his preaching of repentance is revived in their minds.

in soft raiment] Contrast this with the garb of John as described ch. iii. 4. Such an one, in soft raiment, might be the forerunner of a proud earthly prince, but not the preacher of repentance before a humble and suffering Saviour; might be found as the courtly flatterer in the palaces of kings, but not as the stern rebuker of tyrants, and languishing in their fortress dungeons.

9.] We read, ch. xxi. 26, that 'all accounted John as a prophet.'—John was more than a prophet, because he did not write of, but saw and pointed out, the object of his prophecy;—and because of his proximity to the kingdom of God. He was moreover more than a prophet, because he himself was the subject as well as the vehicle of prophecy. But with deep humility he applies to himself only that one, of two such prophetic passages, which describes him as a voice of one crying, and omits the one which gives him the title of my messenger, here cited by our Lord.

10. thy] Our Lord here changes the person of the original prophecy, which is my. And that He does so, making that which is said by Jehovah of Himself, to be addressed to the Messiah, is, if such were needed (compare also Luke i. 16, 17, and 76), no mean indication of His own eternal and co-equal God-head. It is worthy of remark that all three Evangelists quote this prophecy similarly changed, although St. Mark has it in an entirely different place. Also, that the high dignity and honor, which our Lord here predicates of the Baptist, has a further reference: He was thus great above all others, because he was the forerunner of Christ. How great then above all others and him, must HE be.

11. hath... risen] Not merely a word of course, but especially used of prophets and judges, see reff., and once of our Saviour Himself, Acts v. 30.

he that is least] This has been variously rendered and understood. Chrysostom and other ancient interpreters, put the pause after "least," and take the words "in the Kingdom of heaven" with what follows: understanding "he that is least" of our Lord. But such an interpretation is surely adverse to the spirit of the whole discourse. We may certainly say that our Lord in such a passage as this would not designate Himself as "he that is least" compared with John, in any sense: nor again is it our Lord's practice to speak of Himself as one in the Kingdom of heaven, or of His own attributes as belonging to or dependent on that new order of things which this expression implies, and which was in Him rather than He in it. Again, the analogy of such passages as Matt. v. 19; xviii. 1, would lead us to connect the preceding adjective least with in the Kingdom of heaven, and not the following. The other, the usual interpretation, I am convinced, is the right one: but he that is least in the of heaven, is greater than he.

There is very likely an allusion to Zech. xii. 8: "He that is feeble among them at that day shall be as David."

Thus the parallelism is complete: John, not inferior to any born of women—but these, even the least of them, are born of another birth (John i. 12, 13; iii. 5). John, the nearest to the King and the Kingdom—standing on the threshold—but never having himself entered; these, "in the Kingdom," subjects and citizens and indwellers of the realm, whose citizenship is in heaven. He, the friend of the Bridegroom: they, however weak and unworthy members, His Body, and His Spouse.

sense? Does it mean, ‘is taken by force,’ and the following, ‘and men violently press in for their share of it, as for plunder;’—or does it mean, ‘is violently resisted, and violent men tear it to pieces?’ (viz. its opponents, the Scribes and Pharisees?) This latter meaning bears no sense as connected with the discourse before us. The subject is not the resistance made to the kingdom of heaven, but the difference between a prophesied and a present kingdom of heaven. The fifteenth verse closes this subject, and the complaints of the arbitrary prejudices of ‘this generation’ begin with ver. 16. We conclude then that these words imply From the days of John the Baptist un!now (i. e. inclusively, from the beginning of his preaching), the kingdom of heaven is pressed into, and violent persons—eager, ardent multitudes—seize on it. Of the truth of this, notwithstanding our Lord’s subsequent reproaches for unbelief, we have abundant proof from the multitudes who follow and outwent Him, and thronged the doors where He was, and would (John vi. 15) take Him by force to make Him a king. But our Lord does not mention this so much to commend the violent persons, as to shew the undoubted fact that He that should come was come:—that the kingdom of heaven, which before had been the subject of distant prophecy, a closed fortress, a treasure hid, was now undoubtedly upon earth (Luke xvii. 21 and note), laid open to the entrance of men, spread out that all might take. Thus this verse connects with ver. 28, “Come unto Me all,” and with Luke xvi. 16, “every man presseth into it.” Compare also with this throwing open of the kingdom of heaven for all to press into, the stern prohibition in Exod. xix. 12, 13, and the comment on it in Heb. xii. 18–24.

13, 14.] The whole body of testimony as yet has prophetic,—the Law and Prophets, from the first till Zacharias the priest and Simeon and Anna prophesied; and according to the declaration of prophecy itself, John, in the spirit and power of Elias, was the forerunner of the great subject of all prophecy. Neither this—nor the testimony of our Lord, ch. xvii. 12—is inconsistent with John’s own denial that he was Elias, John i. 21. For (1) that question was evidently asked as implying a re-appearance of the actual Elias upon earth: and (2) our Lord cannot be understood in either of these passages as meaning that the prophecy of Malachi iv. 5 received its full completion in John. For as in other prophecies, so in this, we have a partial fulfilment both of the coming of the Lord and of His forerunner, while the great and complete fulfilment is yet future—at the great day of the Lord. Mal. iv. 1. The words here are not “which was for to come,” but are strictly future, who shall come. Compare ch. xvii. 11, where the future is used. The if ye will (are willing to) receive it must be taken as referring to the partial sense of the fulfilment implied: for it was (and is to this day) the belief of the Jews that Elias in person should come before the end.

15.] These words are generally used by our Lord when there is a further and deeper meaning in His words than is expressed: as here—‘if John the Baptist is Elias, and Elias is the forerunner of the coming of the Lord, then know surely that the Lord is come.’

16. But] Implying ‘the men of this generation have ears, and hear not; will not receive this saying: are arbitrary, childish, and prejudiced, not knowing their own mind.’

whereunto shall I liken] See similar questions in Mark iv. 30: Luke xiii. 18, 20; and note on ch. vii. 24.

like unto children: as children in their games imitate the business and realities of life, so these in the great realities now before them shew all the waywardness of children. The similitude is to two bodies of children, the one inviting the other to play, first at the imitation of a wedding, secondly at that of a funeral;—to neither of which will the others respond. Stier remarks that the great condescension of the preaching of the Gospel is shewn forth in this parable, where the man sent from God, and the eternal Word Himself, are represented as children among children, speaking the language of their sports. Compare Heb. ii. 14. It must not be supposed that the two bodies of children are two divisions of the Jews, as some (e. g. Olsh.) have done: the children who call are the Jews,—those called to, the two Preachers; both belonging, according to the flesh, to this generation,—but neither of them corresponding to the kind of mourning (in John’s case) with which the Jews would have them mourn, or the kind of joy (in the Lord’s case) with which the Jews would have them rejoice. The converse application, which is commonly made, is against the is like unto children, by which the first children must be the children of this generation; and nothing can be more perplexed than to understand is like unto as meaning ‘may be illustrated by,’ and invert the persons in the parable. Besides which, this interpretation would lay the waywardness to the charge of the Preachers, not to that of the Jews.

18. neither eating nor drinking] Luke vii. 33 fills up this expression by inserting bread and wine. See ch. iii. 4 The neglect of John’s preaching, and rejection of his message, is implied in several places of the Gospels (see ch. xxi. 23–27: John v. 35); but hence only do we learn that they brought against him the same charge which they afterwards tried against our Lord. See John vii. 20; x. 20.

19.] Alluding to our Lord’s practice of frequenting entertainments and feasts, e.g. the marriage at Cana, the feast in Levi’s house, &c. See also ch. ix. 14.

But] literally, and; i.e. and yet; see John xvi. 32.

was justified—the same tense as “came” both times—refers to the event, q.d., ‘they were events in which wisdom was justified, &c.’ The force of the past tense is not to be lost by giving a present meaning to either of the verbs. The meaning seems to be, that the waywardness above described was not universal, but that the children of wisdom (in allusion probably to the Book of Proverbs, which constantly uses similar expressions: see ch. ii. 1; iii. 1, 11, 21; iv. 1, &c.) were led to receive and justify (= clear of imputation) the Wisdom of God, who did these things. Cf. Luke vii. 29, where in this same narrative it is said, the publicans justified God. The children of wisdom are opposed to the wayward children above, the child like to the child ish; and thus this verse serves as an introduction to the saying in ver. 25.

20–30.] SECOND PART OF THE DISCOURSE. See on ver. 7.

20. Then began he] This expression betokens a change of subject, but not of locality or time. The whole chapter stands in such close connexion, one part arising out of another (e. g. this out of ver. 16–19), and all pervaded by the same great undertone, which sounds forth in vv. 28–30, that it is quite impossible that this should be a collection of our Lord’s sayings uttered at different times. I would rather regard the then began he as a token of the report of an ear-witness, and as pointing to a pause or change of manner on the part of our Lord. See note on Luke x. 13.

because they repented not] Connect this with the first subject of our Lord’s preaching, ch. iv. 17. The reference is to some unrecorded miracles, of which we know (Luke iv. 23; John xxi. 25) that there were many.

21. Chorazin] According to Jerome, a town of Galilee, two (according to Eusebius twelve, but most likely an error in the transcriber) miles from Capernaum. It is nowhere mentioned except here and in the similar place of Luke.

Bethsaida] Called a city, John i. 45,—a village (literally), Mark viii. 23,—in Galilee, John xii. 21:—on the western bank of the lake of Gennesaret, near the middle, not far from Capernaum; the birth-place of Simon Peter, Andrew, and Philip. Both this and Chorazin appear to be put as examples of the lesser towns in which our Lord had wrought his miracles (the towns, literally, village-towns, of Mark i. 38), as distinguished from Capernaum, the chief town (ver. 23) of the neighbourhood.

Tyre and Sidon] These wealthy cities, so often the subject of prophecy, had been chastised by God’s judgment under Nebuchadnezzar and Alexander, but still existed (Acts xii. 20; xxi. 3, 7; xxvii. 3). repented... in sackcloth and ashes is probably an allusion to Jonah iii. 6, or to general Eastern custom.

23.] The sense has been variously interpreted. Some suppose it to allude to the distinguished honour conferred on Capernaum by our Lord’s residence there. Others to the rich fisheries carried on at Capernaum, by means of which the town was proud and prosperous. Others refer the expression to the lofty situation of Capernaum, which however is very uncertain. The first interpretation appears to me the most probable, seeing that our Lord chose that place to be the principal scene of His ministry and residence, “his own city,” ch. ix. 1. The very sites of these three places are now matter of dispute among travellers. See Robinson, vol. iii, pp. 283–300. Dr. Thomson, “The Land and the Book,” p. 359, was sure he found Chorazin in the ruins bearing the name Khorazy, lying in a side valley of the Wady Nashif, which runs down to the lake on the East of Tell Hûm (Capernaum). And this, in spite of Dr. Robinson’s rejection of the identification.

in Sodom] The comparison between sinful Israel and Sodom is common in the O.T. See Deut. xxxii. 32: Isa. i. 10: Lam. iv. 6: Ezek. xvi. 46–57.

it would have remained] This declaration of the Lord of all events, opens to us an important truth, that the destruction of Sodom was brought about, not by a necessity in the divine purposes—still less by a connexion of natural causes—but by the iniquity of its inhabitants, who, had they turned and repented, might have averted their doom. The same is strikingly set before us in the history of Jonah’s preaching at Nineveh.

24, and 22.] These verses are connected with those respectively preceding them thus:—‘If these mighty works had been done in Tyre and Sidon—in Sodom—they would have, &c.; but, since no such opportunity was afforded them, and ye, Bethsaida, Chorazin, and Capernaum, have had and rejected such, it shall be more tolerable, &c.’ And as to the saying of our Lord, ‘If more warnings had been given they would have repented,’—it is not for the infidel to say, ‘Why then were not more given?’ because every act of God for the rescue of a sinner from his doom is purely and entirely of free and undeserved grace, and the proportion of such means of escape dealt out to men is ruled by the counsel of His will who is holy, just, and true, and willeth not the death of the sinner; but whose ways are past our finding out. We know enough when we know that all are inexcusable, having (see Rom. i. ii.) the witness of God in their consciences; and our only feeling should be overflowing thankfulness, when we find ourselves in possession of the light of the glorious Gospel, of which so many are deprived.

That the reference here is to the last great day of judgment is evident, by the whole being spoken of in the future. Had our Lord been speaking of the outward judgment on the rebellious cities, the future might have been used of them, but could not of Sodom, which was already destroyed.

This shall be more tolerable is one of those mysterious hints at the future dealings of God, into which we can penetrate no further than the actual words of our Lord reveal, nor say to what difference exactly they point in the relative states of those who are compared. See also Luke xii. 47, 48.

25.] This is certainly a continuation of the foregoing discourse; and the answered, which seems to have nothing to refer to, does in reality refer to the words which have immediately preceded. The at that time is not chronological, but gives additional solemnity to what follows. There may have been a slight break in the discourse; the older interpreters, and others, insert the return of the Apostles: but I do not see any necessity for it. The whole ascription of praise is an answer: an answer to the mysterious dispensations of God's Providence above recounted. With regard to the arrangement in Luke, see note on Luke x. 21.

I thank thee] Not merely, 'I praise Thee,' but in the force of the Greek word, I confess to Thee, 'I recognize the justice of Thy doings;' viz. in the words Even so, Father, &c. Stier remarks that this is the first public mention by our Lord of His Father; the words in ch. x. 32, 33 having been addressed to the twelve (but see John ii. 16). We have two more instances of such a public address to His Father, John xi. 41; xii. 28; and again Luke xxiii. 34. It is to be observed that He does not address the Father as His Lord, but as Lord of heaven and earth: as He who worketh all things after the counsel of His will, Eph. i. 11.

hast hid.... hast revealed] more properly, didst hide, and didst reveal, in the deeper and spiritual sense of the words; the time pointed at being that in the far past, when the divine decrees as to such hiding and revealing were purposed. See 1 Cor. ii. 9–12.

these things, these mysterious arrangements, by which the sinner is condemned in his pride and unbelief, the humble and childlike saved, and God justified when He saves and condemns. These are 'revealed' to those who can in a simple and teachable spirit, as babes, obey the invitation in vv. 28–30, but 'hidden' from the wise and clever of this world, who attempt their solution by the inadequate instrumentality of the mere human understanding. See 1 Cor. i, 26–31.

27.] In one other place only in the three first Gospel (besides the similar passage, Luke x. 22) does the expression the Son occur; viz. Mark xiii. 32. The spirit of this verse, and its form of expression, are quite those of the Gospel of John; and it serves to form a link of union between the three synoptic Gospels and the fourth, and to point to the vast and weighty mass of discourses of the Lord which are not related except by John. We may also observe another point of union:—this very truth (John iii. 35) had been part of the testimony borne to Jesus by the Baptist—and its repetition here, in a discourse of which the character and office of the Baptist is the suggestive groundwork, is a coincidence not surely without meaning. The verse itself is in the closest connexion with the preceding and following, and is best to be understood in that connexion: all things were delivered to me answers to "thou hast revealed" in ver. 25 (on the tenses, see note above, ver. 25), only "revealed" could not be used of the Eternal Son, for He is Himself the Revealer;—no man (no one) knoweth the Son...., none but the Almighty Father has full entire possession of the mystery of the Person and Office of the Son: it is a depth hidden from all being but His, Whose Purposes are evolved in and by it: neither... the Father... nor does any fully apprehend, in the depths of his being, the love and grace of the Father, except the Son, and he to whom the Son, by the Eternal Spirit, proceeding from the Father and the Son, will reveal Him. Then in close connexion with the to whomsoever the Son will, which by itself might seem to bring in an arbitrariness into the divine counsel, follows, by the Eternal Son Himself, the Come unto me, all..., the wonderful and merciful generalization of the call to wisdom unto salvation.

28.] This is the great and final answer to the question, Art thou He that should come, or do we look for another? As before, we may observe the closest connexion between this and the preceding. As the Son is the great Revealer, and as the to whomsoever He will is by His grace extended to all the weary—all who feel their need—so He here invites them to receive this revelation, learn of Me. But the way to this heavenly wisdom is by quietness and confidence, rest unto the soul, the reception of the divine grace for the pardon of sin, and the breaking of the yoke of the corruption of our nature.

No mere man could have spoken these words. They are parallel with the command in Isa. xlvi. 22, which is spoken by Jehovah Himself.

labour are heavy laden] the active and passive sides of human misery, the labouring and the burdened, are invited. Doubtless, outward and bodily misery is not shut out; but the promise, rest to your souls, is only a spiritual promise. Our Lord does not promise to those who come to Him freedom from toil or burden, but rest in the soul, which shall make all yokes easy, and all burdens light. The main invitation however is to those burdened with the yoke of sin, and of the law, which was added because of sin. All who feel that burden are invited.

29.] learn of Me, both 'from My example,' which however is the lower sense the words, and 'from My teaching,' from which alone the rest can flow; the revelation of vv. 25 and 27.

ye shall find rest unto your souls is quoted from Jer. vi. 16 Heb. Thus we have it revealed here, that the rest and joy of the Christian soul is, to become like Christ: to attain by His teaching this meekness and lowliness of His.

Olshausen makes an excellent distinction between lowly in heart, an attribute of divine Love in the Saviour, and lowly, or poor, in spirit, ch. v. 3: Prov. xxix. 23, which can only be said of sinful man, knowing his unworthiness and need of help.

heart is only here used of Christ.

30.] easy, 'not exacting,' answering to 'kind,' spoken of persons, Luke vi. 35. See 1 John v. 3. Owing to the conflict with evil ever incident to our corrupt nature even under grace, the rest which Christ gives is yet to be viewed as a yoke and a burden, seen on this its painful side, of conflict and sorrow: but it is a light yoke; the inner rest in the soul giving a peace which passeth understanding, and bearing it up against all. See 2 Cor. iv. 16.

XII. 1–8.] THE DISCIPLES PLUCK EARS OF CORN ON THE SABBATH. OUR LORD'S ANSWER TO THE PHARISEES THEREON. Mark ii. 23–28: Luke vi. 1–5. In Mark and Luke this incident occurs after the discourse on fasting related Matt. ix. 14 sq.; but in the former without any definite mark of time. The expression at that time is, I conceive, a more definite mark of connexion than we find in the other Gospels, but cannot here be fixed to the meaning which it clearly has in ch. xi. 25, where the context determines it. We can merely say that it seems to have occurred about the same time as the last thing mentioned—in the same journey or season.

The plucking the ears was allowed Deut. xxiii. 25, but in the Talmud expressly forbidden on the Sabbath. It was also (Levit. xxiii. 14, apparently, but this is by no means certain: see note on Luke) forbidden until the sheaf of first-fruits had been presented to God, which was done on the second day of the feast of unleavened bread at the Passover. This incident, on that supposition, must have occurred between that day and the harvest. It is generally supposed to have been on the first Sabbath after the Passover. For a fuller discussion of the time and place, see note on Luke as before.

3.] It appears from 1 Sam. xxi. 6, that hot bread had been put in on the day of David's arrival; which therefore, Levit. xxiv. 8, was a sabbath. The example was thus doubly appropriate. Bengel maintains, on the commonly received interpretation of Luke vi. 1, that 1 Sam. xxi. was the lesson for the day. But the Jewish calendar of lessons cannot be shewn to have existed in the form which we now have, in the time of the Gospel history.

5.] The priests were ordered to offer double offerings on the Sabbath (Num. xxviii. 9, 10), and to place fresh (hot, and therefore baked that day) shewbread. In performing these commands they must commit many of what the Pharisees would call profanations of the Sabbath. So that, as Stier (ii. 4), not only does the sacred history furnish examples of exception to the law of the Sabbath from necessity, but the Law itself ordains work to be done on the Sabbath as a duty.

6.] The Greek has merely greater, and the best MSS, have it in the neuter gender, which sustains the parallel better: a greater thing than the temple is here. See John ii. 19. The inference is, 'If the priests in the temple and for the temple's sake, for its service and ritual, profane the Sabbath, as ye account profanation, and are blameless, how much more these disciples who have grown hungry in their appointed following of Him who is greater than the temple, the true Temple of God on earth, the Son of Man!' I cannot agree with Stier that the neuter would represent only "something greater, more weighty than the temple,—namely, merciful consideration of the hungry, or the like:" it seems to me, as above, to bear a more general and sublime sense than the masculine; see ver. 41, &c.

7.] The law of this new Temple-service is the law of charity and love:—mercy and not sacrifice, see ch. ix. 13;—all for man's sake and man's good;—and if their hearts had been ready to receive our Lord, and to take on them this service, they would not have condemned the guiltless.

8.] On the important verse preceding this in Mark ii. 27, see note there. The sense of it must here be supplied to complete the inference. Since the Sabbath was an ordinance instituted for the use and benefit of man,—the Son of Man, who has taken upon Him full and complete Manhood, the great representative and Head of humanity, has this institution under his own power. See this teaching of the Lord illustrated and expanded in apostolic practice and injunctions, Rom. xiv. 4, 5, 17: Col. ii. 16, 17.

9–14.] HEALING OF THE WITHERED HAND. Mark iii. 1–6: Luke vi. 6–11.

9. when he was departed thence] This change of place is believed by Greswell to have been a journey back to Galilee after the Passover. (Diss. viii. vol. ii.) It is true that no such change is implied in Mark and Luke; but the words here point to a journey undertaken, as in ch. xi. 1; xv. 29, the only other places in this Gospel where the expression occurs. In John vii. 3, the cognate expression, “Depart hence,” is used of a journey from Galilee to Judæa. So that certainly it is not implied here (as Meyer, al., suppose) that the incident took place on the same day as the previous one. We know from Luke vi. that it was on another (the next?) sabbath.

their] not, of the Pharisees; but of the Jews generally, of the people of the place.

10.] This narrative is found in Mark and Luke with considerable variation in details from our text, those two Evangelists agreeing however with one another. In both these accounts, they (the Scribes and Pharisees, Luke) were watching our Lord to see whether He would heal on the Sabbath:—and He (knowing their thoughts, Luke) ordered the man to stand forth in the midst, and asked them the question here given. The question about the animal does not occur in either of them, but in Luke xiv. 5, on a similar occasion. The additional particulars given are very interesting. By Luke,—it was the right hand; by Mark, —our Lord looked round on them with anger, being grieved for the hardness of their hearts:—And the Herodians were joined with the Pharisees in their counsel against Him. See notes on Luke.

dry] “withered,” literally “dried up,” as in Mark: of which the use had been lost and the vital powers withered. The construction of this verse is involved: there is a double question, as in ch. vii. 9.

Our Lord evidently asks this as being a thing allowed and done at the time when He spoke: but subsequently (perhaps, suggests Stier, on account of these words of Christ), it was forbidden in the Talmud; and it was only permitted to lay planks for the beast to come out.

13.] Our Lord does no outward act: the healing is performed without even a word of command. The stretching forth the hand was to prove its soundness, which the divine power wrought in the act of stretching it forth. Thus his enemies were disappointed, having no legal ground against Him.

14.] This is the first mention of counsel being taken by the Pharisees (and Herodians, Mark, as above) to put our Lord to death.

15–21.] Peculiar in this form to Matthew. See Mark iii. 7–12: Luke vi. 17–19.

15.] them all: see similar expressions, ch. xix. 2: Luke vi. 19;—i. e. ‘all who wanted healing.’

16. charged them] see ch. viii. 4, and note.

17.] On that it might be fulfilled, see note on ch. i. 22. It must not be understood ‘and thus was fulfilled:’ it is used only of the purpose, not of the result, here or anywhere. It is strange that any should be found, at this period of the progress of exegesis, to go back to a view which is both superficial and ungrammatical. The prophecy is partly from the LXX, partly an original translation. The LXX have ‘Jacob my servant... Israel my chosen...,’ but the Rabbis generally understood it of the Messiah.

18.] he shall shew (announce) judgment to the Gentiles, viz. in his office as Messiah and Judge. In these words the majesty of his future glory is contrasted with the meekness about to be spoken of: q.d. ‘And yet He shall not,’ &c.

20.] A proverbial expression for, ‘He will not crush the contrite heart, nor extinguish the slightest spark of repentant feeling in the sinner.’

Until He shall have brought out the conflict, the cause, the judgment, unto victory,—caused it, i.e. to issue in victory: i.e. such shall be his behaviour and such his gracious tenderness, during the day of grace: while the conflict is yet going on,—the judgment not yet decided.

22–45.] ACCUSATION OF CASTING OUT DEVILS BY BEELZEBUB, AND OUR LORD’S DISCOURSE THEREON. DEMAND OF A SIGN FROM HIM: HIS FURTHER DISCOURSE. Mark iii. 20–30: Luke xi. 14–36, where also see notes. This account is given by Luke later in our Lord’s ministry, but without any fixed situation or time, and with less copiousness of detail. See also ch. ix. 32, and notes there. St. Mark (iii. 23–29) gives part of the dis-course which follows, but without any determinate sequence, and omitting the miracle which led to it.

23. Is not this] This, form of question is properly a doubtful denial, involving in fact a surmise in the affirmative. ‘Surely this the son of David] see ch. ix. 27, and note.

24.] St. Mark states (iii. 22) that this accusation was brought by the “scribes who came down Jerusalem;” Luke (xi. 15), by “some of them,” i.e. of the multitude. the charge itself, Trench remarks, ‘A rigid monotheistic religion like the Jewish, left but one way of escape from the authority of miracles, which once were acknowledged to be indeed such, and not mere collusions and sleights of hand. There remained nothing to say but that which we find in the N.T. the adversaries of our Lord continually did say, namely, that these works were works of hell.’

25.] The Pharisees said this covertly to some among the multitude; see Luke, vv. 15, 17. “There is at first sight a difficulty in the argument which our Saviour draws from the oneness of the kingdom of Satan: viz. that it seems the very idea of this kingdom, that it should be this anarchy; blind rage and hate not only against God, but each part of it warring against every other part. And this is most deeply true, that hell is as much in arms against itself as against Heaven: neither does our Lord deny that in respect of itself that kingdom is infinite contradiction and division: only He asserts that in relation to the kingdom of goodness it is at one: there is one life in it and one soul in relation to that. Just as a nation or kingdom may embrace within itself infinite parties, divisions, discords, jealousies, and heartburnings: yet, if it is to subsist as a nation at all, it must not, as regards other nations, have lost its sense of unity; when it does so, of necessity it falls to pieces and perishes.” Trench, Miracles, p. 58. We may observe (1) that our Lord here in the most solemn manner re-asserts and confirms the truths respecting the kingdom of evil which the Jews also held. The kingdoms are so set parallel with one another, that the denial of the reality of the one with its chief, or the supposing it founded merely in assent on the part of our Lord to Jewish notions, inevitably brings with it the same conclusions with regard to the other. They are both real, and so is the conflict between them. (2) That our Lord here appeals not to an insulated case of casting out of devils, in which answer might have been made, that the craft of Satan might sometimes put on the garb and arts of an adversary to himself for his own purposes,—but to the general and uniform tenor of all such acts on his part, in which He was found as the continual Adversary of the kingdom of Satan. (3) That our Lord proceeds to shew that the axiom is true of all human societies, even to a family, the smallest of such. (4) That He does not state the same of an individual man, ‘Every man divided against himself falleth,’ rests upon deeper grounds, which will be entered on in the notes on vv. 30, 31.

27.] The interpretation of this verse has been much disputed; viz. as to whether the casting out by the sons of the Pharisees (scholars,—disciples; see 2 Kings ii. 3 and passim) were real or pretended exorcisms. The occurrence mentioned Luke ix. 49 does not seem to apply; for there John says, Master, we saw one casting out devils in thy Name, which hardly could have been the case with those here referred to. Nor again can the vagabond Jews, exorcists, of Acts xix. 13 be the same as these, inasmuch as they also named over the possessed the name of the Lord Jesus: or at all events it can be no such invocation which is here referred to. In Josephus (Antt. viii. 2. 5) we read that Solomon “left forms of exorcism, by which they cast out demons so that they never return. And,” he adds, “this kind of cure is very common among us to this day.” It is highly necessary to institute this enquiry as to the reality of their exorcisms: for it would leave an unworthy impression on the reader, and one very open to the cavils of unbelief, were we to sanction the idea that our Lord would have solemnly compared with his own miracles, and drawn inferences from, a system of imposture, which on that supposition, these Pharisees must have known to be such. I infer then that the sons of the Pharisees did really cast out devils, and I think this view is confirmed by what the multitudes said in ch. ix. 33, where upon the dumb speaking after the devil was cast out they exclaimed, “It never was so seen in Israel:” meaning that this was a more complete healing than they had ever seen before. The difficulty has arisen mainly from forgetting that miracles, as such, are no test of truth, but have been permitted to, and prophesied of, false religions and teachers. See Exodus vii. 22; viii. 7: ch. xxiv. 24, &c.: Deut. xiii. 1–5. There is an important passage in Justin Martyr, in which he says that the Name of the Son of God Himself never failed to cast out daemons, whereas those of the Jewish kings, prophets, and patriarchs, failed. “But,” he adds, “if you used the Name of the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, perhaps it might prevail.” Irenæus says that by this invocation the Jews cast out daemons even in his time. Jerome, Chrysostom, and others understood “your sons” to mean the Apostles.

28. by the Spirit of God] equivalent to “by the finger of God,” Luke; see Exod. viii. 9.

is come, emphatic in position: but merely, has come unto (upon) you: not ‘is already upon you,’ i.e. ‘before you looked for it,’—as Stier and Wesley.

29.] Luke has the word “a stronger” applied to the spoiler in this verse; a title given to our Lord by the Baptist, ch. iii. 11 and parallels; see also Isa. xl. 10; xlix. 24, 25; liii. 12. Compare note on Luke xi. 21 f., which is the fuller report of this parabolic saying.

30.] These words have been variously understood. Chrysostom and Euthymius understand them to refer to the devil: Bengel, Schleiermacher, and Neander, to the Jewish exorcists named above. Grotius and others understand it as merely a general proverb, and the “me” to mean ‘any one,’ and here to apply to Satan, the sense being, ‘If I do not promote Satan’s kingdom, which I have proved that I do not, then I must be his adversary.’ But this is on all accounts improbable: see below on gathereth and scattereth. We must regard it as a saying setting forth to us generally the entire and complete disjunction of the two kingdoms, of Satan and God. There is and can be in the world no middle party: they who are not with Christ, who do not gather with Him,—are against Him and his work, and as far as in them lies are undoing it. See Rom. viii. 7. And thus the saying connects itself with the following verse:—this being the case, Wherfore I say unto you,—the sin of an open belying of the present power of the Holy Spirit of God working in and for His Kingdom, assumes a character surpassingly awful. This saying is no way inconsistent with that in Mark ix. 40: Luke ix. 50. That is not a conversion of this, for the terms of the respective propositions are not the same. See note on Mark ix. 40.

As usual, this saying of our Lord reached further than the mere occasion to which it referred, and spoke forcibly to those many half-persuaded hesitating persons who flattered themselves that they could strike out a line avoiding equally the persecution of men and the rejection of Christ. He informed them (and informs us also) of the impossibility of such an endeavour.

In the gathereth there is an allusion to the idea of gathering the harvest: see ch. xiii. 30: John xi. 52, and for scattereth, John x. 12, in all which places the words exactly bear out their sense here.

31, 32.] Wherfore, because this is the case: see last note. Notice again the I say unto you, used by our Lord when He makes some revelation of things hidden from the sons of men: see ch. vi. 29, and xviii. 10, 19: and ver. 36 below. The distinction in these much controverted verses seems to be, between 1) the sin and blasphemy which arises from culpable ignorance and sensual blindness, as that of the fool who said in his heart ‘There is no God,’—of those who, e.g. Saul of Tarsus, opposed Jesus as not being the Christ; which persons, to whatever degree their sin may unhappily advance, are capable of enlightenment, repentance, and pardon:—and (2) the blasphemy of those who, acknowledge God, and seeing his present power working by his Holy Spirit, openly oppose themselves to it, as did, or as were very near doing (for our Lord does not actually imply that they had incurred this dreadful charge), these Pharisees. They may as yet have been under the veil of ignorance; but this their last proceeding, in the sight of Him who knows the hearts, approximated very near to, or perhaps reached, this awful degree of guilt. The principal misunderstanding of this passage has arisen from the prejudice which possesses men’s minds owing to the use the words, ‘the sin against the Holy Ghost.’ It is not a particular species of sin which is here condemned, but a definite act shewing a state of sin, and that state a wilful determined opposition to the present power of the Holy Spirit; and this as shewn by its fruit, blasphemy. The declaration, in substance, often occurs in the N.T. See 1 John v. 16, and note on “sin” there: 2 Tim. iii. 8: Jude 4, 12, 13: Heb. x. 26–31; vi. 4–8.

No sure inference can be drawn from the words neither in the world to come—with regard to forgiveness of sins in a future state. Olshausen remarks that a parallel on the other side is found in ch. x. 41, 42, where the recognition of divine power in those sent from God is accompanied with promise of eternal reward. He himself however understands the passage (as many others have done) to imply forgiveness on repentance in the imperfect state of the dead before the judgment, and considers it to be cognate with 1 Pet. iii. 18 ff. Augustine speaks very strongly: “It could not be said with truth of any, that ‘it shall not be forgiven them neither in this world nor either in the world to come,’ unless there were some who are to be forgiven not in this world, but in the world to come.” See, on the whole subject, note on 1 Pet. iii. 18 ff. In the almost entire silence of Scripture on any such doctrine, every principle of sound interpretation requires that we should hesitate to support it by two difficult passages, in neither of which does the plain construction of the words absolutely require it.

The expressions this world (equivalent to “this present world,” Tit. ii, 12: 2 Tim. iv. 10; “this time,” Mark x. 30; “the course (age) of this world,” Eph. ii. 2; “this present evil world,” Gal. i. 4) and the world to come (see Mark x. 30; equivalent to “that world,” Luke xx. 35; “the ages to come,” Eph. ii. 7) were common among the Jews, and generally signified respectively the time before and after the coming of the Messiah. In the N.T. these significations are replaced by—the present life, and that to come: the present mixed state of wheat and tares, and the future completion of Messiah’s Kingdom after the great harvest. These terms seem to differ from “the kingdom of heaven,” or “of God,” in never being spoken of, or as in, individuals, but as an age of time belonging to the universal Church.

33, 34.] not, as generally understood, equivalent to ‘represent..... as.’ for then the clause ‘for out&c.’ loses its meaning:—but literally, make. The verse is a parable, not merely a similitude. ‘There are but two ways open: either make the tree and its fruit both good, or both bad: for by the fruit the tree is known.’ How make, the parable does not say: but let us remember, the Creator speaks, and sets forth a law of his own creation, with which our judgments must be in accord. This verse resumes again the leading argument, and sets forth the inconsistency of the Pharisees in representing Him as in league with evil, whose works were uniformly good. But the words have a double reference: to our Lord Himself, who could not be evil, seeing that His works were good; and (which leads on to the next verse) to the Pharisees, who could not speak good things, because their works were evil.

35–37.] The treasure spoken of is that inner storehouse of good and evil only seen by God and (partially) by ourselves. And on that account—because words, so lightly thought of by the world and the careless, spring from the inner fountains of good and ill, therefore they will form subjects of the judgment of the great day, when the whole life shall be unfolded and pronounced upon. See James iii. 2–12.

idle is perhaps best taken here in its milder and negative sense, as not yet determined on till the judgment: so that our Lord's declaration is a deduction “a minori,” and if of every idle saying, then how much more of every wicked saying!

37.] The speech, being the overflow of the heart, is a specimen of what is within: is the outward utterance of the man, and on this ground will form a subject of strict enquiry in the great day, being a considerable and weighty part of our works.

38.] St. Luke (xi. 15, 16) places the accusation of casting out devils by Beelzebub and this request together, and then the discourse follows. It seems that the first of the discourse gave rise, as here related, to the request for a sign (from Heaven); but, as we might naturally expect, and as we learn from St. Luke, on the part of different persons from those who made the accusation. In consequence of our Lord declaring that His miracles were wrought by the Holy Ghost, they wish to see some decisive proof of this by a sign, not from Himself, but from Heaven. The account in ch. xvi. 1–4 manifestly relates to a different occurrence: see notes there. Cf. John vi. 30, 31; xii. 28.

39.] adulterous (see reff.), because they been the peculiar people of the Lord, and so in departing from Him had broken the covenant of marriage, according to the similitude so common in the prophets.

The expression there shall no sign be given to it does not, as has been maintained, exclude our Lord's miracles from being signs: but is the direct answer to their request in the sense in which we know they used the word, ‘a sign, not wrought Him, and so able to be suspected of magic art, but one from Heaven.’ Besides, even if this were not so, how can the refusing to work a miracle to satisfy them, affect the nature or signification of those wrought on different occasions, and with a totally different view? The sign of Jonas is the most remarkable foreshadowing in the O.T. of the resurrection of our Lord. It was of course impossible that His resurrection should be represented by an actual resurrection, as his birth was by births (Isaac, Samson, Samuel, Maher-shalal-hash-baz), and His death by deaths (Abel; the substitute for Isaac; Zechariah the prophet; the daily and occasional sacrifices); so that we find the events symbolic of his resurrection (Joseph's history; Isaac's sacrifice; Daniel's and Jonah's deliverance), representing it in a figure (lit., “a parable,” Heb. xi. 19). In the case before us the figure was very remarkable, and easily to be recognized in the O.T. narrative. For Jonah himself calls the belly of the sea monster (Jonah ii. 2), ‘the belly of Hades,’ = the heart of the earth here. And observe, that the type is not of our Lord's body being deposited in the tomb of Joseph of Arimathea, for neither could that be called ‘the heart of the earth,’ nor could it be said that ‘the Son of Man’ was there during the time; but of our Lord's personal descent into the place of departed souls:—see Eph. iv. 9; 1 Pet. iii. 19, and note on Luke xxiii. 43.

40.] If it be necessary to make good the three days and nights during which our Lord was in the heart of the earth, it must be done by having recourse to the Jewish method of computing time. In the Jerusalem Talmud (cited by Lightfoot) it is said “that a day and night together make up a day (night-day), and that any part of such a period is counted as the whole.” See Gen. xl. 13, 20: 1 Sam. xxx. 12, 13: 2 Chron. x. 5, 12: Hos. vi. 2.

41.] In this verse there is no reference to the sign of Jonas spoken of above, but to a different matter, another way in which he should be a sign to this generation. See Luke xi. 29 f., and note. (But the preaching of Jonas to the Ninevites was a sign after his resurrection: so shall the preaching of the Son of Man by His Spirit in His Apostles be after His resurrection. Stier.)

On the adjective, here and ver. 42, being in the neuter, see above, ver. 6, note.

There is more than Jonas here] No matter so worthy of arousing repentance had ever been revealed or preached as the Gospel: no matter so worthy of exciting the earnest attention of all. And the Lord Himself, the Announcer of this Gospel, is greater than all the sons of men: his preaching, greater than that of Jonah: his wisdom, than that of Solomon.

42. The queen of the south] Josephus calls her the woman who then reigned over Egypt and Æthiopia, i.e. over Meroe (whose queens were usually called Candace. Plin. Hist. vi. 29). Abyssinian tradition agrees with this account, calls her Maqueda, and supposes her to have embraced the Jewish religion in Jerusalem. The Arabians on the other hand also claim her, calling her Balkis, which latter view is probably nearer the truth, Sheba being a tract in Arabia Felix, near the shores of the Red Sea, near the present Aden, abounding in spice and gold and precious stones.

43.] This important parable, in the similitude itself, sets forth to us an evil spirit driven out from a man, wandering in his misery and restlessness through desert places, the abodes and haunts of evil spirits (see Isa. xiii. 21, 22; xxxiv. 14), and at last determining on a return to his former victim, whom he finds so prepared for his purposes, that he associates with himself seven other fiends, by whom the wretched man being possessed, ends miserably. In its interpretation we may trace three distinct references, each full of weighty instruction. (1) The direct application of the parable is to the Jewish people, and the parallel runs thus:—The old daemon of idolatry brought down on the Jews the Babylonish captivity, and was cast out by it. They did not after their return fall into it again, but rather endured persecution, as under Antiochus Epiphanes. The emptying, sweeping, and garnishing may be traced in the growth of Pharisaic hypocrisy and the Rabbinical schools between the return and the coming of our Lord. The re-possession by the one, and accession of seven other spirits more malicious than the first, hardly needs explanation. The desperate infatuation of the Jews after our Lord's ascension, their bitter hostility to His Church, their miserable end as a people, are known to all. Chrysostom, who gives in the main this interpretation, notices their continued infatuation in his own day: and instances their joining in the impieties of Julian. (2) Strikingly parallel with this runs the history of the Christian Church. Not long after the apostolic times, the golden calves of idolatry were set up by the Church of Rome. What the effect of the captivity was to the Jews, that of the Reformation has been to Christendom. The first evil spirit has been cast out. But by the growth of hypocrisy, secularity, and rationalism, the house has become empty, swept, and garnished: swept and garnished by the decencies of civilization and discoveries of secular knowledge, but empty of living and earnest faith. And he must read prophecy but ill, who does not see under all these seeming improvements the preparation for the final development of the man of sin, the great re-possession, when idolatry and the seven worse spirits shall bring the outward frame of so-called Christendom to a fearful end. (3) Another important fulfilment of the prophetic parable may be found in the histories of individuals. By religious education or impressions, the devil has been cast out of a man; but how often do the religious lives of men spend themselves in the sweeping and garnishing (see Luke xi. 39, 40), in formality and hypocrisy, till utter emptiness of real faith and spirituality has prepared them for that second fearful invasion of the Evil One, which is indeed worse than the first! (See Heb. i. 4, 6: 2 Pet. ii. 20–22.)

46–50.] HIS MOTHER AND BRETHREN SEEK TO SPEAK WITH HIM. Mark iii. 31–35. Luke viii. 19–21. In Mark the incident is placed as here: in Luke, after the parable of the sower.

46.] In Mark iii. 21 we are told that his relations went out to lay hold on Him, for they said, He is beside Himself: and that the reason of this was his continuous labour in teaching, which had not left time so much as to eat. There is nothing in this care for his bodily health (from whatever source the act may have arisen on the part of his brethren, see John vii. 5) inconsistent with the known state of his mother's mind (see Luke ii. 19, 51).

They stood, i.e. outside the throng of hearers around our Lord; or, perhaps, outside the house. He meets their message with a reproof, which at the same time conveys assurance to His humble hearers. He came for all men: and though He was born of a woman, He who is the second Adam, taking our entire humanity on Him, is not on that account more nearly united to her, than to all those who are united to Him by the Spirit; nor bound to regard the call of earthly relations so much as the welfare of those whom He came to teach and to save.

It is to be noticed that our Lord, though He introduces the additional term sister into his answer, does not (and indeed could not) introduce father, inasmuch as He never speaks of any earthly Father. See Luke ii. 49. All these characteristics of the mother of our Lord are deeply interesting, both in themselves, and as building up, when put together, the most decisive testimony against the fearful superstition which has assigned to her the place of a goddess in the Romish mythology. Great and inconceivable as the honour of that meek and holy woman was, we find her repeatedly (see John ii. 4) the object of rebuke from her divine Son, and hear Him here declaring, that the honour is one which the humblest believer in Him has in common with her.

Stier remarks (Reden Jesu, ii. 57 note), that the juxtaposition of sister and mother in the mouth of our Lord makes it probable that the brethren also were his actual brothers according to the flesh: see note on ch. xiii. 55.

CHAP. XIII. 1–52.] THE SEVEN PARABLES. (The parallels, see under each.)

1, 2.] Mark iv. 1.

1. In that day] These words may mean literally, as rendered in the A.V., the same day. But it is not absolutely necessary. The words certainly do bear that meaning in Mark iv. 35, and important consequences follow (see note there); but in Acts viii. 1 they are as evidently indefinite. The instances of their occurrence in John (xiv. 20; xvi. 23, 26) are not to the point, their use there being prophetical.

3. in parables] The senses of this word in the N.T. are various. My present concern with it is to explain its meaning as applied to the “parables” of our Lord. (1) The Parable is not a Fable, inasmuch as the Fable is concerned only with the maxims of worldly prudence, whereas the parable conveys spiritual truth. The Fable in its form rejects probability, and teaches through the fancy, introducing speaking ant or even inanimate things; whereas the Parable adheres to probability, and teaches through the imagination, introducing only things which may possibly happen. “A parable is a story of that which purports to have happened,—has not actually happened, but might have happened.” (2) Nor is the Parable a Myth: inasmuch as in Mythology the course of the story is set before us as the truth, and simple minds receive it as the truth, only the reflective mind penetrating to the distinction between the vehicle and the thing conveyed; whereas in the Parable these two stand distinct from one another to all minds, so that none but the very simplest would ever believe in the Parable as fact. (3) Nor is the Parable a Proverb: though the Greek word (parabolé) is used for both in the N.T. (Luke iv. 23; v. 36: Matt. xv. 14, 15.) It is indeed more like a Proverb than either of the former; being an expanded Proverb, and a Proverb a concentrated parable, or fable, or result of human experience expressed without a figure. Hence it will be seen that the Proverb ranges far wider than the parable, which is an expansion of only one particular case of a proverb. Thus ‘Physician heal thyself’ would, if expanded, make a parable; “dog eat dog,” a fable; “honesty is the best policy,” neither of these. (4) Nor is the Parable an Allegory: inasmuch as in the Allegory the imaginary persons and actions are placed in the very places and footsteps of the real ones, and stand there instead of them, declaring all the time by their names or actions who and what they are. Thus the Allegory is self-interpreting, and the persons in it are invested with the attributes of those represented; whereas in the Parable the courses of action related and understood run indeed parallel, but the persons are strictly confined to their own natural places and actions, which are, in their relation and succession, typical of higher things. (5) It may well hence be surmised what a Parable is. It is a serious narration, within the limits of probability, of a course of action pointing to some moral or spiritual Truth; and derives its force from real analogies impressed by the Creator of all things on His creatures. The great Teacher by Parables therefore is He who needed not that any should testify of man; for He knew what was in man, John ii. 25: moreover, He made man, and orders the course and character of human events. And this is the reason why none can, or dare, teach by parables, except Christ. We do not, as He did, see the inner springs out of which flow those laws of eternal truth and justice, which the Parable is framed to elucidate. Our parables would be in danger of perverting, instead of guiding aright. The Parable is especially adapted to different classes of hearers at once: it is understood by each according to his measure of understanding. See note on ver. 12.

The seven Parables related in this chapter cannot be regarded as a collection made by the Evangelist as relating to one subject, the Kingdom of Heaven, and its development; they are clearly indicated by ver. 53 to have been all spoken on one and the same occasion, and form indeed a complete and glorious whole in their inner and deeper sense. The first four of these parables appear to have been spoken to the multitude from the ship (the interpretation of the parable of the sower being interposed); the last three, to the disciples in the house.

From the expression he began in the parallel place in St. Mark, compared with the question of the disciples in ver. 10,—and with ver. 34—it appears that this was the first beginning of our Lord's teaching by parables, expressly so delivered, and properly so called. And the natural sequence of things here agrees with, and confirms Matthew's arrangement against those who would place (as Ebrard) this chapter before the Sermon on the Mount. He there spoke without parables, or mainly so; and continued to do so till the rejection and misunderstanding of his teaching led to His judicially adopting the course here indicated, without a parable spake He not (nothing) unto them. The other order would be inconceivable; that after such parabolic teaching, and such a reason assigned for it, the Lord should, that reason remaining in full force, have deserted his parabolic teaching, and opened out his meaning as plainly as in Sermon on the Mount.

3–9.] THE SOWER. Mark iv. 2–9: Luke viii. 4–8. See note on the locality in vv. 51, 52.

3.] For the explanation of the parable see on vv. 19–23. 4. by the way side] by (by the side of, along the line of) the path through the field. Luke inserts “and it was trodden down,” and after fowls—“of the air.”

5.] the stony places (= “the rock” Luke), places where the native rock is but slightly covered with earth (which abound in Palestine), and where therefore the radiation from the face of the rock would cause the seed to spring up quickly, the shallow earth being heated by the sun of the day before.

6.] root = “moisture” Luke. If the one could have struck down, it would have found the other.

7. among the thorns] In places where were the roots of thorns, beds of thistles, or such like.

sprung up = “sprung up with it” Luke: Mark adds “and it yielded no fruit.”

8.] After fruit Mark inserts “that sprang up and increased.” Luke gives only “as hundredfold.”

9.] is common to all three Evangelists (Mark and Luke insert “to hear”).

10–17.] OUR LORD'S REASON FOR TEACHING IN PARABLES. Mark iv. 10–12. Luke viii. 9, 10, but much abridged.

10.] the disciples = “they that were about him with the twelve,” Mark. This question took place during a pause in our Lord's teaching, not when He had entered the house, ver. 36. The question shews the newness of this method of teaching to the disciples. It is not mentioned in Mark: only the enquiry into the meaning of the parable just spoken: nor in Luke: but the answer implies it.

11.] The Kingdom of Heaven, like other kingdoms, has its secrets (mysteries,—see a definition by St. Paul in Rom. xvi. 25 f., —viz. “Something kept secret since the world began, but now made manifest”) and inner counsels, which strangers must not know. These are only revealed to the humble diligent hearers, to you: to those who were immediately around the Lord with the twelve; not to them = “the rest” Luke, = “them that are without” Mark. (1 Cor. v. 12, 13.)

it is not given is represented by “in parables” Luke, and “all things are done in parables” Mark.

12.] In this saying of the Lord is summed up the double force—the revealing and concealing properties of the parable. By it, he who hath,—he who not only hears with the ear, but understands with the heart, has more given to him; and it is for this main purpose undoubtedly that the Lord spoke parables: to be to His Church revelations of the truth and mysteries of His Kingdom. But His present purpose in speaking them, as further explained below, was the quality possessed by them, and declared in the latter part of this verse, of hiding their meaning from the hard-hearted and sensual. By them, he who hath not, in whom there is no spark of spiritual desire nor meetness to receive the engrafted word, has taken from him even that which he hath (“seemeth to have,” Luke); even the poor confused notions of heavenly doctrine which a sensual and careless life allow him, are further bewildered and darkened by this simple teaching, into the depths of which he cannot penetrate so far as even to ascertain that they exist. No practical comment on the latter part of this saying can be more striking, than that which is furnished to our day by the study of the German rationalistic (and, I may add, some of our English harmonistic) Commentators; while at the same time we may rejoice to see the approximate fulfilment the former in such commentaries as those of Olshausen, Neander, Stier, and Trench. In ch. xxv. 29, the fuller meaning of this saying, as applied not only to hearing, but to the whole spiritual life, is brought out by our Lord.

13.] because they seeing see not, &c. = (in Mark, Luke; similarly below) “that seeing they may... not....” &c. In the deeper view of the purpose of the parable, both of these run into one. Taking the saying of ver. 12 for our guide, we have “whosoever hath not,”—“because seeing they see not,”—and “from him shall be taken away even that he hath,”—“that seeing they may not see.” The difficulties raised on these variations, and on the prophecy quoted in vv. 14, 15, have arisen entirely not keeping this in view.

14, 15.] This prophecy is quoted with a similar reference John xii. 40: Acts xxviii. 26, 27; see also Rom. xi. 8.

is fulfilled] is being fulfilled, ‘finds one of the stages of its fulfilment:’ a partial one having taken place in the contemporaries of the prophet. The prophecy is cited verbatim from the LXX, which changes the imperative of the Hebrew (‘Make the heart of this people fat,’ &c., E.V.) into the indicative, as bearing the same meaning.

in them properly signifies relation, ‘with regard to them.’

is waxed gross] literally, grew fat; from prosperity.

are dull of hearing] literally, heard heavily, ‘sluggishly and imperfectly.’

their eyes they have closed] (Heb. ‘smeared over.’) All this have they done: all this is increased in them by their continuing to do it, and all lest they should (and so that they cannot) hear, see, understand, and be saved.

I should heal them = “it should be forgiven them” Mark. This citation gives no countenance to the fatalist view of the passage, but rests the whole blame on the hard-heartedness and unreadiness of the hearers, which is of itself the cause why the very preaching of the word is a means of further darkening and condemning them (see 2 Cor. iv. 3, 4).

16, 17.] See ref. Prov. These verses occur again in a different connexion, and with the form of expression slightly varied, Luke x. 23, 24. It was a saying likely to be repeated. On the fact that prophets, &c. desired to see those things, see 2 Sam. xxix. 5: Job xix. 23–27: also Exod. iv. 13, and Luke ii. 29–32.

18–23.] INTERPRETATION OF THE PARABLE OF THE SOWER. Mark iv. 10–20. Luke viii. 9–18, who incorporate with the answer of our Lord to the request of the disciples, much of our last section.

18.] Hear, in the sense of the verse before—hear the true meaning of, ‘hear in your hearts.’ With regard to the Parable itself, we may remark that its great leading idea is that “mystery of the Kingdom,” according to which the grace of God, and the receptivity of it by man, work ever together in bringing forth fruit. The seed is one and the same every where and to all: but seed does not spring up without earth, nor does earth bring forth without seed; and the success or failure of the seed is the consequence of the adaptation to its reception, or otherwise, of the spot on which it falls. But of course, on the other hand, as the enquiry, “Why is this ground rich, and that barren?” leads us up into the creative arrangements of God,—so a similar enquiry in the spiritual interpretation would lead us into the inscrutable and sovereign arrangements of Him who ‘preventeth us that we may have a good will, and worketh with us when we have that will’ (Art. X. of the Church of England). See, on the whole, my Sermons before the University of Cambridge, February, 1858.

19.] In Luke we have an important preliminary declaration, implied indeed here also: “the seed is the word of God.” This word is in this parable especially meant of the word preached, though the word written is not excluded: nor the word unwritten—the providences and judgments, and even the creation, of God. (See Rom. x. 17, 18.) The similitude in this parable is alluded to in 1 Pet. i. 23: James i. 21. The sower is first the Son of Man (ver. 37), then His ministers and servants (1 Cor. iii. 6) to the end. He sows over all the field, unlikely as well as likely places; and commands His sowers to do the same, Mark xvi. 15. Some, Stier says, have objected to the parable a want of truthful correspondence to reality, because sowers do not thus waste their seed by scattering it where it is not likely to grow; but, as he rightly answers,—the simple idea of the parable must be borne in mind, and its limits not transgressed—‘a sower went out to sow’—his SOWING—sowing over all places, is the idea of the parable. We see him only as a sower, not as an economist. The parable is not about Him, but about the seed and what happens to it. He is the fit representative of God, who giveth liberally to all men, and upbraideth not, James i. 5.

and understandeth it not is peculiar to Matthew, and very important; as in Mark and Luke this first class of hearers are without any certain index to denote them. The reason of this not understanding is clearly set forth by the parable: the heart is hardened, trodden down; the seed cannot penetrate.

the wicked one = “Satan” (Mark, who also inserts “immediately”), = “the devil” (Luke). The parable itself is here most satisfactory as to the manner in which the Evil One proceeds. By fowls of the air—passing thoughts and desires, which seem insignificant and even innocent—does Satan do his work, and rob the heart of the precious seed. St. Luke adds the purpose of Satan in taking away the word: “lest they should believe and be saved.”

he that was sown by the way side (not, as A.V. “he that received seed by the way side”). This is not a confusion of similitudes,—no ‘primary and secondary interpretation’ of the seed,—but the deep truth, both of nature and of grace. The seed sown springing up in the earth, becomes the plant, and bears the fruit, or fails of bearing it; it is therefore the representative, when sown, of the individuals of whom the discourse is. And though in this first case it does not spring up, yet the same form of speech is kept up: throughout they are they that were sown, as, when the question of bearing fruit comes, they must be. We are said to be “born again by the word of God,” 1 Pet. i. 23. It takes us up into itself, as the seed the earth, and we become a new plant, a new creation: cf. also below, ver. 38, “the good seed, are the children of the Kingdom.”

20, 21.] In this second case, the surface of the mind and disposition is easily stirred, soon excited: but beneath lies a heart even harder than the trodden way. So the plant, springing up under the false heat of excitement, having no root struck down into the depths of the being, is, when the real heat from without arises, which is intended to strengthen and forward the healthy-rooted plant, withered and destroyed. The Greek word signifies not only ‘dureth for a while,’ but also ‘is the creature of circumstances,’ changing as they change. Both ideas are included. St. Luke has, “in time of temptation fall away,” thus accommodating themselves to that time.

22.] In this third sort, all as regards the soil is well; the seed goes deep, the plant springs up; all is as in the next case, with but one exception, and that, the bearing of fruit—becometh unfruitful = bring no fruit to perfection (Luke). And this because the seeds or roots of thorns are in, and are suffered to spring up in the heart, and to overwhelm the plant. There is a divided will, a half-service (see on ch. vi. 25) which ever ends in the prevalence of evil over good. This class is not confined to the rich: riches in Scripture is not riches absolutely, as possessed, but riches relatively, as estimated by the desire and value for them. St. Mark adds, and the lusts of (the) other things, viz. the other things which shall be added to us if we seek first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness. The identity of the seeds sown with the individuals of these classes, as maintained above, is strikingly shewn in Luke here: that which fell among thorns, (these) are they &c. (viii. 14.) We may notice: (I) That there is in these three classes a PROGRESS, and that a threefold one:—(1) in TIME:—the first receives a hindrance at the very outset: the seed never springs up:—the second after it has sprung up, but soon after:—the third when it has entered, sprung up, and come to maturity: or while it is so coming.—(2) in APPARENT DEGREE. The climax is apparently from bad to better;—the first understand not: the second understand and feel: the third understand, feel, and practise. But also (3) in REAL DEGREE, from bad to worse. Less awful is the state of those who understand not the word and lose it immediately, than that of those who feel it, receive it with joy, and in time of trial fall away: less awful again this last, than that of those who understand, feel, and practise, but are fruitless and impure. It has been noticed also that the first is more the fault of careless inattentive CHILDHOOD; the second of ardent shallow YOUTH; the third of worldly self-seeking AGE. (II) That these classes do not EXCLUDE one another. They are great general divisions, the outer circles of which fall into one another, as they very likely might in the field itself, in their different combinations.

23.] Here also the fourth class must not be understood as a decided well-marked company, excluding all the rest. For the soil is not good by nature: the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; but every predisposition to receive them is of God:—even the shallow soil covering the rock, even the thorny soil, received its power to take in and vivify the seed, from

God. So that divine grace is the enabling, vivifying, cleansing power throughout: and these sown on the good land are no naturally good, amiable, or pure class, but those prepared by divine grace—receptive, by granted receptive power. The sowing is not necessarily the first that has ever taken place: the field has been and is continually resown, so that the care of the husbandman is presupposed. Again, no irresistible grace or absolute decree of God must be dreamt of here. God working not barely upon, but with man, is, as we said above, the mystery of the Kingdom here declared,—see Jer. iv. 3: Hosea x. 12: Gal. vi. 7. See note on Luke viii. 15.

an hundred, sixty, thirty, the different degrees of faithfulness and devotedness of life with which fruit is brought forth by different classes of persons. There is no point of comparison with the different classes in the parable of the talents: for he who had five talents yielded the same increase as he who had two.

24–30.] SECOND PARABLE. THE TARES OF THE FIELD. Peculiar to Matthew. For the explanation of this parable see below, vv. 36–43.

24.] is likened unto a man, i.e. ‘is like the whole circumstances about to be detailed; like the case of a man,’ &c. A similar form of construction is found in ch. xviii. 23, and in other parables in Matthew.

25.] men; i.e. not, ‘the men’ belonging to the owner of the field, but men generally: and the expression is used only to designate ‘in the night time,’ not to charge the servants with any want of watchfulness.

sowed] more than this: the verb means, sowed over the first seed.

tares] The Greek word is zizania: apparently the darnel, or bastard wheat (loliu album), so often seen in our fields and by our hedgerows; if so, what follows will be explained, that the tares appeared when the wheat came into ear, having been previously not noticeable. It appears to be an Eastern word.

Our Lord was speaking of an act of malice practised in the East:—persons of revengeful disposition watch the ground of a neighbour being ploughed, and in the night following sow destructive weeds. (The practice is not unknown even in England at present. Since the publication of the first edition of my Greek Test., a field belonging to myself, at Gaddesby in Leicestershire, was maliciously sown with charlock [sinapis arvensis] over the wheat. An action at law was brought by the tenant, and heavy damages obtained against the offender.)

29.] Jerome in loc, says: “Between wheat and tares, which we call loliu, as long as both are in the blade, and the stalk is not yet in ear, there is a great similitude, and discrimination is difficult, if not impossible.” Jerome, it must be remembered, resided in Palestine.

31, 32.] THIRD PARABLE. THE GRAIN OF MUSTARD SEED. Mark iv. 30–34: Luke xiii. 18, 19. On the connexion of this parable with the two last, Chrysostom observes: “Having told them that of the seed three parts perish, and only one is preserved, and that in the preserved portion itself there is such deleterious mixture,—for fear they might say, ‘And who then and how many will be the faithful?’ He goes on to remove this fear by the parable of the mustard seed, helping their faith, and shewing them that, all this notwithstanding, the kingdom shall spread and flourish.”

The comparison of kingdoms to trees was familiar to the Jews; see Daniel iv. 10–12, 20–22: Ezek, xxxi. 3–9; xvii. 22–24: Ps. lxxx. 8–11.

32. least of all] literally, less than all. The words are not to be pressed to their literal sense, as the mustard seed was a well-known Jewish type for any thing exceedingly small. e mustard tree attains to a size in Judæa. See citations from Lightfoot in my Greek Test. This parable, like most others respecting the kingdom of God, has a double reference—general and individual. (1) In the general sense, the insignificant beginnings of the kingdom are set forth: the little babe cast in the manger at Bethlehem; the Man of sorrows with no place to lay His Head; the crucified One; or again the hundred and twenty names who were the seed of the Church after the Lord had ascended; then we have the Kingdom of God waxing onward and spreading its branches here and there, and different nations coming into it, “He must increase,” said the great Forerunner. We must beware however of imagining that the outward Church-form is this Kingdom. It has rather reversed the parable, and is the worldly power waxed to a great tree and the Churches taking under the shadow of it. It may be, where not corrupted by error and superstition, subservient to the growth of the heavenly plant: but is not itself that plant. It is at best no more than (to change the figure) the scaffolding to aid the building, not the building itself, (2) The individual application of the parable points to the small beginnings of divine grace; a word, a thought, a passing sentence, may prove to be the little seed which eventually fills and shadows the whole heart and being, and calls ‘all thoughts, all passions, all delights’ to come and shelter under it.

33.] FOURTH PARABLE. THE LEAVEN. Luke xiii. 20, 21. Difficulties have been raised as to the interpretation of this parable which do not seem to belong to it. It has been questioned whether leaven must not be taken in the sense in which it so often occurs in Scripture, as symbolic of pollution and corruption. See Exod. xii. 15, and other enactments of the kind, passim in the law; and ch. xvi. 6: 1 Cor. v. 6, 7. And some few have taken it thus, and explained the parable of the progress of corruption and deterioration in the outward visible Church. But then, how is it said that the Kingdom of Heaven is like this leaven? For the construction is not the same as in ver. 24, where the similitude is to the whole course of things related, but answers to “a grain of mustard seed which a man took,” &c.: so “leaven, which a woman took,” &c. Again, if the progress of the Kingdom of Heaven be towards corruption, till the whole is corrupted, surely there is an end of all the blessings and healing influence of the Gospel on the world. It will be seen that such an interpretation cannot for a moment stand, on its own ground; but much less when we connect it with the parable preceding. The two are intimately related. That was of the inherent self-developing power of the Kingdom of Heaven, as a seed, containing in itself the principle of expansion; this, of the power which it possesses of penetrating and assimilating a foreign mass, till all be taken up into it. And the comparison is not only to the power, but to the effect of leaven also, which has its good as well as its bad side, and for that good is used: viz. to make wholesome and fit for use that which would otherwise be heavy and insalubrious. Another striking point of comparison is in the fact that leaven, as used ordinarily, is a piece of the leavened loaf put amongst the new dough, just as the Kingdom of Heaven is the renewal of humanity by the righteous Man Christ Jesus.

The Parable, like the last, has its general and its individual application: (1) in the penetrating of the whole mass of humanity, by degrees, by the influence of the Spirit of God, so strikingly witnessed in the earlier by the dropping of heathen customs and worship;—in modern times more gradually and secretly advancing, but still to be plainly seen in the various abandonments of criminal and unholy practices (as e.g. in our own time of slavery and duelling, and the increasing abhorrence of war among Christian men), and without doubt in the end to be signally and universally manifested. But this effect again is not to be traced in the establishment or history of so-called Churches, but in the hidden advancement, without observation, of that deep leavening power which works irrespective of human forms and systems. (2) In the transforming power of the ‘new leaven’ on the whole being of individuals. “In fact the Parable does nothing less than set forth to us the mystery of regeneration, both in its first act, which can be but once, as the leaven is but once hidden; and also in the consequent (subsequent?) renewal by the Holy Spirit, which, as the ulterior working of the leaven, is continual and progressive.” (Trench, p. 97.) Some have contended for this as the sole application of the parable; but not, I think, rightly.

As to whether the woman has any especial meaning, (though I am more and more convinced that such considerations are not always to be passed by as nugatory,) it will hardly be of much consequence here to enquire, seeing that women bakers would be every where a matter of course. Three of these measures, which composed an ephah, appear to have been the usual quantity prepared for a baking: see Gen. xviii. 6: Judg. vi. 19: 1 Sam. i. 24. This being the case, we need not perhaps seek for any symbolical interpretation: though Olshausen’s hint that the body, soul, and spirit may perhaps be here intended can hardly but occur to us, and Stier’s, that “of the three sons of Noah was the whole earth overspread,” is worth recording.

34, 35.] CONCLUSION OF THE PARABLES SPOKEN TO THE MULTITUDES. Mark iv. 33, 34.

35. that it might be fulfilled] See note on ch. i. 22. The prophet, according to the superscription of Psalm lxxviii., is Asaph, so called 2 Chron. xxix. 30, LXX.

38.] This verse has been variously interpreted, notwithstanding that its statements are so plain. The consideration of it will lead us into that of the general nature and place of the parable itself. The field is the world; if understood of the Church, then the Church only as commensurate with the world, Go ye into all the world, and preach the gospel to every creature (Mark xvi. 15); THE CHURCH standing for THE WORLD, not, the world for the Church. And the parable has, like the former ones, its various references to various counter-workings of the Evil One against the grace of God. Its two principal references are, (1) to the whole history of the world from beginning to end; the coming of sin into the world by the malice of the devil,—the mixed state of mankind, notwithstanding the development of God’s purposes by the dispensations of grace—and the final separation of the good and evil at the end. The very declaration ‘the harvest is the end of the world’ suggests the original sowing as the beginning of it. Yet this sowing is not in the fact, as in the parable, one only, but repeated again and again.

In the parable the Lord gathers as it were the whole human race into one lifetime, as they will be gathered in one harvest, and sets that forth as simultaneous, which has been scattered over the ages of time. But (2) as applying principally to the Kingdom of heaven, which lay in the future and with the Lord’s incarnation, the parable sets forth to us the universal sowing of GOOD SEED by the Gospel: it sows no bad seed: all this is done by the enemy, and further we may not enquire. Soon, even as soon as Acts v. in the History of the Church, did the tares begin to appear; and in remarkable coincidence with the wheat bringing forth fruit (see Acts iv. 32–37). Again, see Acts xiii. 10, where Paul calls Elymas by the very name, “son of the devil.” And ever since, the same has been the case; throughout the whole world, where the Son of Man sows good seed, the Enemy sows tares. And it is not the office, however much it may be the desire, of the servants of the householder, the labourers in His field, to collect or root up these tares, to put them out of the world literally, or of the Church spiritually (save in some few exceptional cases, such as that in Acts v.); this is reserved for another time and for other hands,—for the harvest, the end; for the reapers, the angels. (3) It is also most important to notice that, as the Lord here gathers up ages into one season of seed time and harvest, so He also gathers up the various changes of human character and shiftings of human will into two distinct classes. We are not to suppose that the wheat can never become tares, or the tares wheat: this would be to contradict the purpose of Him who willeth not the death of a sinner, but rather that he should be converted and live; and this gracious purpose shines through the command “let both grow together”—let time be given (as above) for the leaven to work. As in the parable of the sower, the various classes were the concentrations of various dispositions, all of which are frequently found in one and the same individual, so here the line of demarcation between wheat and tares, so fixed and impassable at last, is during the probation time, the time of growing together, not yet determined by Him who will have to be saved, and to come to the knowledge of the truth. In the very first example, that of our first parents, the good seed degenerated, but their restoration and renewal was implied in the promises made to them, indeed in their very punishment itself; and we their progeny are by nature the children of wrath, till renewed by the same grace. The parable is delivered by the Lord as knowing all things, and describing by the final result; and gives no countenance whatever to predestinarian error. (4) The parable has an historical importance, having been much in the mouths and writings of the Donatists, who, maintaining that the Church is a perfectly holy congregation, denied the applicability of this Scripture to convict them of error, seeing that it is spoken not of the Church, but of the world: missing the deeper truth which would have led them to see that, after all, the world is the Church, only overrun by these very tares. the good seed, (these) are the sons strikingly sets forth again the identity of the seed, in its growth, with those who are the plants: see above on ver. 19.

the sons of the kingdom] not in the same sense as in ch. viii. 12,—SONS there, by covenant and external privilege: here,—by the effectual grace of adoption: the KINGDOM, there, in mere paradigm, on this imperfect earth: here, in its true accomplishment, in the new heavens and earth wherein dwelleth righteousness: but in their state among the tares, waiting for the manifestation of the sons of God.

41. things that offend] generally understood of those men who give cause of offence, tempters and hinderers of others: it is better to understand it rather of things, as well as men, who afterwards designated.

43.] shall shine, literally, shine out (their light here being enfeebled and obscured), as the sun from a cloud.

of their Father, answering to the sons, ver. 38. This sublime announcement is over and above the interpretation of the parable.

44.] FIFTH PARABLE. THE HIDDEN TREASURE. Peculiar to Matthew. This and the following parable are closely connected, and refer to two distinct classes of persons who become possessed of the treasure of the Gospel. Notice that these, as also the seventh and last, are spoken not to the multitude, but to the disciples.

In this parable, a man, labouring perchance for another, or by accident in passing, finds a treasure which has been hidden in a field; from joy at having found it he goes, and selling all he has, buys the field, thus (by the Jewish law) becoming the possessor also of the treasure. Such hiding of treasure is common even now, and was much more common in the East (see Jer. xli. 8: Job iii. 21: Prov. ii. 4).

This sets before us the case of a man who unexpectedly, without earnest seeking, finds, in some part of the outward Church, the treasure of true faith and hope and communion with God; and having found this, for joy of it he becomes possessor, not of the treasure without the field (for that the case supposes impossible), but of the field at all hazards, to secure the treasure which is in it: i.e. he possesses himself of the means of grace provided in that branch of the Church, where, to use a common expression, he has “gotten his good;” he makes that field his own.

45, 46.] SIXTH PARABLE. THE PEARL OF GREAT PRICE. In this parable our Lord sets before us, that although in ordinary cases of finding ‘the truth as it is in Jesus,’ the buying of the field is the necessary prelude to becoming duly and properly possessed of it; yet there are cases, and those of a nobler kind, where such condition is not necessary. We have here a merchantman,—one whose business it is,—on the search for goodly pearls; i.e. a man who intellectually and spiritually is a seeker of truth of the highest kind. “He whom this pursuit occupies is a merchantman; i.e. one trained, as well as devoted, to business. The search is therefore determinate, discriminative, unremitting. This case then corresponds to such Christians only as from youth have been trained up in the way which they should go. In these alone can be the settled habits, the effectual self-direction, the convergence to one point of all the powers and tendencies of the soul, which are indicated by the illustration.” (Knox’s Remains, i. 460.) But as the same writer goes on to observe, even here there is a discovery, at a particular time. The person has been seeking, and finding, goodly pearls; what is true, honest, just, pure, lovely, and of good report: but at last he finds one pearl of great price—the efficacious principle of inward and spiritual life. We hear of no emotion, no great joy of heart, as before; but the same decision of conduct: he sells all and buys it. He chooses vital Christianity, at whatever cost, for his portion. But here is no field. The pearl is bought pure—by itself. It is found, not unexpectedly in the course of outward ordinances, with which therefore it would become to the finder inseparably bound up,—but by diligent search, spiritual and immediate, in its highest and purest form. Trench instances Nathanael and the Samaritan woman as examples of the finders without seeking:—Augustine, as related in his Confessions (we might add St. Paul, see Phil. iii. 7), of the diligent seeker and finder. Compare with this parable Prov. ii. 3–9, and to see what kind of buying is not meant, Isa. lv. 1: ch. xxv. 9, 10. Also see Rev. iii. 18.

47–52.] SEVENTH PARABLE. THE DRAW-NET. Peculiar to Matthew.

47.] The net spoken of is a drag, or draw-net, drawn over the bottom of the water, and permitting nothing to escape it. The leading idea of this parable is the ultimate separation of the holy and unholy in the Church, with a view to the selection of the former for the master's use. We may notice that the fishermen are kept out of view and never mentioned: the comparison not extending to them. A net is cast into the sea and gathers of every kind (of fish: not of things, as mud, weeds, &c., as some suppose); when this is full, it is drawn to shore, and the good collected into vessels, while the bad (the legally unclean, those out of season, those putrid or maimed) are cast away. This net is the Church gathering from the sea (a common Scripture similitude for nations: see Rev. xvii. 15: Isa. viii. 7: Ps. lxv. 7) of the world, all kinds (see Rev. vii. 9); and when it is full, it is drawn to the bank (the limit of the ocean, as the end (literally, consummation) is the limit of the world, [literally, age]), and the angels (not the same as the fishers; for in the parable of the tares the servants and reapers are clearly distinguished) shall gather out the wicked from among the just, and cast them into everlasting punishment. It is plain that the comparison must not be strained beyond its limits, as our Lord shews us that the earthly here gives but a faint outline of the heavenly. Compare the mere “cast away” of the one, with the fearful antitype of vv. 49, 50.

51, 52.] SOLEMN CONCLUSION OF THE PARABLES. When our Lord asks, ‘Have ye understood all these things?’ and they answer, ‘Yea, [Lord,’] the reply must be taken as spoken from their then standing-point, from which but little could be seen of that inner and deeper meaning which the Holy Spirit has since unfolded. And this circumstance explains the following parabolic remark of our Lord: that every scribe (they, in their study of the Lord's sayings, answering to the then scribes in their study of the Law) who is instructed (discipled), enrolled as a disciple and taught as such, is like an householder (the Great Householder being the Lord Himself, compare ch. xxiv. 45) who puts forth from his store new things and old; i.e. ‘ye yourselves, scribes of the Kingdom of Heaven, instructed as ye shall fully be in the meaning of these sayings, are (shall be) like householders, from your own stores of knowledge respecting them hereafter bringing out not only your present understanding of them, but ever new and deeper meanings.’

And this is true of every scribe: Every real spiritually-learned scribe of the Kingdom of Heaven is able, from the increasing stores of his genuine experimental knowledge of the word (not merely from books or learning, or the Bible itself, but out of his treasure), to bring forth things new and old.

The therefore is an expression of consequence, but not a strong one: answering nearly to our Well, then.

This is perhaps the fittest place to make a few general remarks on this wonderful cycle of Parables. We observe, (1) How naturally they are evolved from the objects and associations surrounding our Lord at the time (see on this the very interesting section of Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, ch. xiii. §2, p. 420 ff, “On the Parables”). He sat in a boat in the sea, teaching the people who were on the land. His eye wandered over the rich plain of Gennesaret:—the field-paths, the stony places, the neglected spots choked with wild vegetation, the plots of rich and deep soil, were all before him. The same imagery prevails in the parable of the tares of the field, and in that of the mustard seed; and the result of the tilling of the land is associated with the leaven in the lump. Then He quits the sea-shore and enters the house with the disciples. There the link to the former parable is the exposition of the tares of the field. From the working of the land for seed to finding a treasure in a field the transition is easy—from the finding without seeking to seeking earnestly and finding, easy again: from the seed to the buried treasure, from the treasure to the pearl,—the treasure of the deep,—again simple and natural. The pearl recalls the sea; the sea the fishermen with their net; the mixed throng lining the beach, the great day of separation on the further bank of Time. (2) The seven Parables compose, in their inner depth of connexion, a great united whole, beginning with the first sowing of the Church, and ending with the consummation. We must not, as Stier well remarks, seek, with Bengel, &c., minutely to apportion the series prophetically, to various historical periods: those who have done so (see Trench, p. 142, edn. 4) have shewn caprice and inconsistency; and the parable, though in its manifold depths the light of prophecy sometimes glimmers, has for its main object to teach, not to foretell. More than a general outline, shewn by the prominence of those points to which the respective parables refer, in the successive periods of the Church, we can hardly expect to find. But as much we unquestionably do find. The apostolic age was (1) the greatest of all the seed times of the Church: then (2) sprang up the tares, heresies manifold, and the attempts to root them out, almost as pernicious as the heresies themselves: nay, the so-called Church Catholic was for ages employed in rooting up the wheat also. Notwithstanding this (3) the little seed waxed onward—the kingdoms of the earth came gradually in—(4) the leaven was secretly penetrating and assimilating. Then is it, (5) during the period of dissensions, and sects, and denominations, that here and there by this man and that man the treasure shall be found: then is it, (6) during the increase of secular knowledge and cultivation of the powers of the intellect, that merchantmen shall seek goodly pearls up and down the world, and many shall find, each for himself, the Pearl of Price. And thus we are carried on (7) through all the ages during which the great net has been gathering of every kind, to the solemn day of inspection and separation, which will conclude the present state.

53–58.] TEACHING, AND REJECTION, AT NAZARETH. Mark vi. 1–6. See Luke iv. 16–29 and notes.

53, 54.] his own country, viz. Nazareth. Perhaps the proceedings of ch. viii 18–ix. 34 are to be inserted between those two verses. In Mark iv. 35, the stilling of the storm and voyage to the Gadarenes are bound to the above parables by what appears a distinct note of sequence: 'the same day, when the even was come.' The teaching was on the Sabbath (Mark).

55. his brethren] It is an enquiry of much interest and some difficulty, who these were. After long examination of the evidence on the subjects I believe that the truth will best be attained by disencumbering the mind in the first place of all à priori considerations, and traditions (which last are very inconsistent and uncertain), and fixing the attention on the simple testimony of Scripture itself. I will trace "His brethren," or "the brethren of the Lord," through the various mentions of them in the N.T., and then state the result; placing at the end of the note the principal traditions on the subject, and the difficulties attending them. (I) The expression "His brethren," occurs nine times in the Gospels, and once in the Acts. Of these the three first are in the narratives of the coming of His mother and brethren to speak with Him, Matt. xii. 46: Mark iii, 31: Luke viii. 19: the two next are the present passage and its||in Mark vi. 3, where they are mentioned in connexion with His mother and sisters; the four others are in John ii. 12; vii. 3, 5, 10; in the first of which He and his mother and brethren and disciples are related to have gone down to Capernaum: and in the three last His brethren are introduced as urging Him to shew Himself to the world, and it is stated that they did not believe on Him. The last is in Acts i. 14, where we read that the Apostles 'continued in prayer and supplication with the women, and with Mary the mother of Jesus, and with his brethren.' In another place, 1 Cor. ix. 5, Paul mentions "the other Apostles, and the brethren of the Lord, and Cephas." Such are all the places where the meaning is undoubted, that persons called, and being in some usual sense, brethren of the Lord, are mentioned. (Besides these the Lord, Himself uses the words "my brethren," Matt. xxviii. 10; John xx. 17, but apparently with a wider meaning, including at least the eleven Apostles in the term, as He does in Matt. xii. 49, and parallels.) Now I would observe (a) that in all the mentions of them in the Gospels, except those in John vii., they are in connexion with His mother: the same being the case in Acts i. 14. (b) That it is nowhere asserted or implied that any of them were of the number of the Twelve; but from John vii. 5, following upon vi. 70 (by "after these things," vii. 1), they are excluded from that number. St. John would certainly not have used the words "for neither did his brethren believe on him," had any of them believed on Him at that time (see this substantiated in note there):—and again in Acts i. 14, by being mentioned after the Apostles have been enumerated by name, and after the mother of Jesus, they are indicated at that time also to have been separate from the twelve, although, then certainly believing on Him. (c) Their names, as stated here and in Mark vi. 3, were JACOB (JAMES), JOSEPH, (or JOSES), SIMON, and JUDAS, all of them among the commonest of Jewish names. Of JOSEPH (or JOSES)—certainly not the Joseph Barnabas Justus of Acts i. 23: see ib. ver. 21) and SIMON (not Simon Cananæus or Zelotes: see above) we know from Scripture nothing. Of the two others we have the following traces—(d) JACOB (JAMES) appears in the apostolic narrative as the Lord's brother, Gal. i. 19: he is there called an apostle. This however determines nothing as to his having been among the Twelve (which is a very different matter); for Paul and Bareabas are called apostles, Acts xiv. (4) 14, and Paul always calls himself such. See also Rom. xvi. 7; 1 Thess. ii. 7 compared with i. 1. That he is identical with the James of Gal. ii. 9, whom Paul mentions with Cephas and John as having given him and Barnabas the right hand of fellowship, fourteen years after the visit in ch. i. 19, does not appear for certain, but has been pretty generally assumed. (See this whole subject, discussed in the Introduction to the Epistle of James.) (e) The JUDE who has left an epistle, and was brother of James, not only does not call himself an apostle, ver. 1 (as neither does James, nor indeed John himself, so that this cannot be urged), but in ver. 17 (see note there) seems to draw 8 distinction between himself and the Apostles. Whether this indicates that the James and Jude, the authors of the Epistles, were two of these brethren of the Lord, is uncertain; but it may at least be mentioned in the course of our enquiry.

I shall now state the result of that enquiry, which has been based on Scripture testimony only. (1) That there were four persons known as "His brethren," or "the brethren of the Lord," NOT OF THE NUMBER OF THE TWELVE. (2) That these persons are found in all places (with the above exception) where their names occur in the Gospels, in immediate connexion with Mary, the mother of the Lord. [It is a strange phænomenon in argument, that it should have been maintained by an orthodox writer, that my inference from this proves too much, because Joseph is here introduced as His father: as if a mistake of the Jews with regard to a supernatural fact, which they could not know, invalidated their cognizance of a natural fact which they knew full well.] (3) That not a word is any where dropped to prevent us from inferring that these brethren were His relations in the same literal sense as we know His mother to have been; but that His own saying, where He distinguishes His relations according to the flesh from His disciples (ch. xii. 50 and parallels), seems to sanction that inference. (4) That nothing is said from which it can be inferred whether Joseph had been married before he appears in the Gospel history;—or again, whether these brethren were, according to the flesh, older or younger than our Lord. (5) That the silence of the Scripture narrative leaves it free for Christians to believe these to have been real (younger) brethren and sisters of our Lord, without incurring any imputation of unsoundness of belief as to His miraculous conception. That such an imputation has been cast, is no credit to the logical correctness of those who have made it, who set down that, because this view has been taken by impugners of the great Truth just mentioned, therefore it eventually leads, or may fairly be used towards the denial of it; for no attempt is made to shew its connexion with such a conclusion. The fact is, that the two matters, the miraculous conception of the Lord Jesus by the Holy Ghost, and the subsequent virginity of His mother, are ESSENTIALLY AND ENTIRELY DISTINCT; see note on Matt. i. 25: see also respecting a supposed difficulty attending this view, note on John xix. 27. (II) I will now state the principal traditional views respecting the brethren of the Lord. (1) That they were all sons of Alpheus (or Clopas) and Mary the sister of the mother of our Lord; and so cousins of Jesus, and called agreeably to Jewish usage His brothers. This is the view taken in a remarkable fragment of Papias, adopted by Jerome, and very generally received in ancient and modern times. But it seems to me that a comparison of the Scripture testimonies cited above will prove it untenable. One at least of the sons of this Alphæus was an apostle, of the number of the twelve, viz. James the son of Alphæus (see all the lists, on ch. x. 3); which (see above) would exclude him from the number of the brethren of the Lord. But even if one of the four could be thus detached (which, from John vii. 5, I cannot believe), it is generally assumed that "Judas of James" (so in the Greek) (see Luke's two lists as above) is Jude the brother of James; and if so, this would be another son of Alphæus, and another subtraction from the number who did not believe on Hin. Again Matthew (see note on Matt. ix. 9), if identical with Levi (Mark ii. 14), was another son of Alpheus; which would make a fifth brother, and leave therefore, out of five, three believing on Him at the time when it was said, "neither did his brethren believe on Him." This view besides labours under the difficulty arising from these brethren accompanying and being found in connexion with Mary the mother of our Lord, whereas throughout that time their own mother was living. The way in which the assertors of this view explain John vii. 5, is either by supposing that all the brethren are not there implied, or that all are not here mentioned; both suppositions, it seems to me, very unlikely (compare e.g. John's minute accuracy where an exception was to be made, ch. vi. 23, 24). (2) That they were children of Joseph by a former marriage (or even by a later one with Mary wife of Clopas, to raise up seed to his dead brother,—as Clopas is said to have been: but this needs no refutation). This view was taken by several early Fathers, and mentioned by Origen, who says respecting it, "those who maintain this, wish to uphold the perpetual virginity of Mary." This however, while by no means impossible, and in some respects agreeing with the apparent position of these brothers as older (according to the flesh) than the Lord (John vii. 3), has no countenance whatever in Scripture, either in their being called sons of any other woman, or in any distinct mention of Joseph as their father, which surely in this case would be required. (III) On the à priori considerations which have influenced opinions on this matter, see note on Matt. i. 25; and on the traditional literature, see the references given in my Greek Testament. Neander brings out the importance of the view which I have above, under (I), endeavoured to justify, asshewing that the account of the miraculous conception is not mythical, in which case all would have been arranged to suit the views of virginity from which it had arisen,—but strictly historical, found as it is with no such arrangements or limitations.

58.] did not; could not do, Mark vi. 5, where see note. On the identity, or not, of this preaching at Nazareth with that related much earlier by Luke iv. 16 sq., see note there,

CHAP. XIV. 1–12.] HEROD HEARS OF THE FAME OF JESUS. PARENTHETICAL ACCOUNT OF THE DEATH OF JOHN THE BAPTIST. Mark vi. 14–29. Luke ix. 7–9, who does not relate the death of John.

1.] This Herod was Herod ANTIPAS, son of Herod the Great, by Malthacé, a Samaritan woman,—and own brother of Archelaus. The portion of the kingdom allotted to him by the second will of his father (in the first he was left as king) was the tetrarchy of Galilee and Peræa (Jos. Antt. xvii. 8. 1). He married the daughter of the Arabian king Aretas; but having during a visit to his half-brother Herod Philip (not the tetrarch of that name, but another son of Herod the Great, disinherited by his father) become enamoured of his wife Herodias, he prevailed on her to leave her husband, and live with him. (See below, on ver. 4.) This step, accompanied as it was with a stipulation of putting away the daughter of Aretas, involved him in a war with his father-in-law, which however did not break out till a year before the death of Tiberius (A. D. 37, U.C. 790), and in which he was totally defeated and his army destroyed by Aretas; a divine vengeance, according to the Jews as reported by Josephus, for the death of John the Baptist. He and Herodias afterwards went to Rome at the beginning of Caligula's reign, to complain of the assumption of the title of king by Agrippa his nephew, son of Aristobulus; but Caligula having heard the claims of both, banished Antipas and Herodias to Lyons in Gaul, whence he was afterwards removed to Spain, and there died.

The following events apparently took place at Machærus, a frontier fortress between Peræa and Arabia: see below on ver. 10.

It was the fame of the preaching and miracles of the Twelve, on their mission, of which Herod heard,—probably in conjunction with the works of Christ: see parallel place in Mark.

2.] he himself is emphatic; equivalent in English to "it is he and no other, that"... In Luke ix. 7 it is said that Herod was perplexed because it was said of some that John was risen from the dead. There is no inconsistency in these accounts: the report originated with others: but if Herod was perplexed concerning it, he, in the terrors of a guilty conscience; doubtless gave utterance to these words himself. There is no evidence that Herod was a Sadducee, or a disbeliever in the resurrection as then held by the Pharisees. See also note on Mark viii. 14.

There is no allusion here to the transmigration of souls, but to the veritable bodily resurrection, and supposed greater power acquired by having passed through death. This is an incidental confirmation of John x. 41, where we read that John wrought no miracle while living.

4.] The marriage was unlawful for these three reasons: (1) The former husband of Herodias, Philip, was still living. This is expressly asserted by Josephus. (2) The former wife of Antipas was still living, and fled to her father Aretas on hearing of his intention to marry Herodias. (3) Antipas and Herodias were already related to one another within the forbidden degrees of consanguinity. For she was daughter of Aristobulus, the brother of Antipas and Philip.

5.] This verse is further expanded in Mark vi. 20, which see. Josephus, not being aware of any other grounds for his imprisonment, alleges purely political ones, that Herod was afraid lest John's power of persuading the people might be turned to seditious purposes.

6. birthday] Some hold that the word here means the feast of Herod's accession: but they give no proof that it ever had such a meaning. A great feast was given to the nobility of Galilee, Mark vi. 21. The damsel's name was Salome, daughter of Herodias by her former husband Philip. She afterwards married her uncle Philip, tetrarch of Ituræa and Trachonitis: and he dying childless, she became the wife of her cousin Aristobulus son of Herod, king of Chalcis, by whom she had three sons, Herod, Agrippa, and Aristobulus.

The dance was probably a pantomimic dance.

9.] the king was a title which Herod never properly possessed. Subsequently to this event, Herodias prevailed on him to go to Rome to get the title, which had been granted to his nephew Agrippa. He was opposed by the emissaries of Agrippa, and was exiled to Lugdunum. Herod was grieved, because he heard John gladly (Mark vi. 20), and from policy did not wish to put him to death on so slight a cause. This is not inconsistent with his wishing to put him to death: his estimate of John was wavering and undecided, and he was annoyed at the decision being taken out of his hands by a demand, compliance with which would be irrevocable.

10.] It appears from the damsel's expression give me here, and this verse, that the feast was held either at Machæerus or at no great distance from it. Antipas had a palace near; but he was not there on account of the war with Aretas,—see above.

13–21.] FEEDING OF THE FIVE THOUSAND. Mark vi. 30–44. Luke ix. 10–17. John vi. 1–13, where also see notes.

13.] There is some difficulty here in conceiving how the narration is to proceed continuously. The death of the Baptist is evidently retrospectively and parenthetically inserted; and yet the retirement of our Lord in this verse seems to be the immediate consequence of his hearing of that occurrence. But this may well have been so: for (1) the disciples of John would be some days in bringing the news from Machæerus to Capernaum, and the report mentioned in ver. 1 might reach Herod meantime; (2) the expression with which that report is introduced, "At that time," extends it over a considerable space of time; and (3) the message which the disciples of John brought to our Lord might have included both particulars, the death of their Master, and the saying of Herod respecting Himself.

He went across the lake (John vi. 1) into a desert place belonging to the city called Bethsaida (Luke ix. 10). His retirement (Luke, ibid., and Mark vi. 30) was connected also with the return of the Twelve from their mission: compare the full and affecting account of the whole transaction in Mark vi. 30–36.

14.] went forth, from His place of retirement.

15.] This evening was the first evening, the decline of the day, about 3 p.m.; the evening, in ver. 23, after the miracle, was late in the night.

16, 17.] give ye them to eat, which is common to the three first Evangelists, is considerably expanded in the more detailed account of John, ver. 3–7; it was Andrew who spoke in ver. 17, and the five loaves and two fishes were brought by a lad: John vi. 8, 9. They were barley loaves and (salt) fish; ibid. And we have (perhaps, but see note there) the vast concourse accounted for in John by the fact that the Passover was at hand, and so they were collected on their journey to Jerusalem.

See a very similar miracle in 2 Kings iv. 42–44; only then there were twenty barley loaves and an hundred men. See also Numbers xi. 21, 22.

19. blessed] St. Luke supplies "them," i.e. the loaves and fishes: St. John has for it gave thanks. Both are one. The thanks to heaven is the blessing on the meat. This miracle was one of symbolic meaning for the Twelve, who had just returned from their mission, as pointing to the “freely ye received, freely give” of ch. x. 8 in a higher sense than they then could have understood it:—but see the symbolic import of the miracle treated in the notes to John vi.

Meyer well remarks, that the process of the miracle is thus to be conceived:—the Lord blessed, and gave the loaves and fishes to the disciples, as they were; and then, during their distribution of them, the miraculous increase took place, so that they broke and distributed enough for all. The cophinus (which is the word here rendered basket) was the usual accompaniment of the Jew: see quotation from Juvenal in my Gr. Test. Reland supposes that the basket was to carry their own meats on a journey, for fear of pollution by eating those of the Gentiles.

21.] beside women and children is peculiar to Matt., although this might have been inferred from men being mentioned in the other three Evangelists. See note on John vi. 10.

22–23.] JESUS WALKS ON THE SEA. Mark vi. 45–52. (Luke omits this incident.) John vi. 16–21. The conviction of the people after the foregoing miracle was, that Jesus was the Messiah; and their disposition, to take Him by force, and make Him king. See John vi. 14, 15. For this reason he constrained His disciples to leave Him, because they were but too anxious to second this wish of the multitude; and their dismissal was therefore an important step towards the other.

22.] Mark adds “to Bethsaida,” John “to Capernaum:” for the Bethsaida, the city of Philip and Andrew and Peter, was distinct from Bethsaida Julias, in whose neighbourhood the miracle took place,—and in the direction of Capernaum.

25.] The fourth watch according to the Roman calculation, which was by this time common among the Jews (who themselves divided the night into three parts or watches). This would be,—near the vernal equinox, which this was,—between three and six in the morning. The words walking on the sea are common to the three Evangelists, and can have no other meaning here, than that the Lord walked bodily on the surface of the water. In Job. ix. 8 we read of the Almighty, “Which alone spreadeth out the heavens, and treadeth upon the waves of the sea.” Mark adds “and would have passed by them.” John, “and drawing nigh unto the ship.” See notes on John.

28.] This narrative respecting Peter is peculiar to Matthew. It is in very strict accordance with his warm and confident character, and has been called almost a ‘rehearsal’ of his denial afterwards. It contains one of the most pointed and striking revelations which we have of the nature and analogy of faith; and a notable example of the power of the higher spiritual state of man over the inferior laws of matter, so often brought forward by our Lord. See ch. xvii. 20; xxi. 21.

32.] John (vi. 21) adds “and immediately the ship was at the land whither they went.”—see note there.

33.] These persons were probably the crew of the ship, and distinct from the disciples. On Son of God, see ch. iv. 3. It is the first time that our Lord is called so by men in the three first Gospels. See ch. iii. 17; iv. 3; viii. 29; John i. 34, 50. This feeling of amazement and reverence pervaded the disciples also: see the strong expressions of Mark vi. 52.

34–36.] Mark vi. 53–56. Gennesar or Gennesaret, a district from which the lake was also occasionally so called, extended along its western shore. Josephus gives a glowing description of the beauty and fertility of this plain, Jewish Wars, iii. 10. 7. At its northern end was Capernaum, near which our Lord landed, as would appear from John vi. 24, 25.

36.] On hem, see note on ch. ix. 20.

CHAP. XV. 1–20.] DISCOURSE CONCERNING EATING WITH UNWASHED HANDS. Mark vii. 1–23. From Mark it appears that these Scribes and Pharisees had come expressly from Jerusalem to watch our Lord: most probably after that Passover which was nigh at the time of feeding the five thousand, John vi. 4.

2.] The Jews attached more importance to the traditional exposition than to the Scripture text itself. They compared the written word to water; the traditional exposition to the wine which must be mingled with it.

The duty of washing before meat is not inculcated in the law, but only in the traditions of the Scribes. So rigidly did the Jews observe it, that Rabbi Akiba, being imprisoned, and having water scarcely sufficient to sustain life given him, preferred dying of thirst to eating without washing his hands.

The “elders” here, as in Heb. xi. 2, must be taken to mean the ancients. See ref. Heb.

3. ye also] The also implies that there was a transgression also on their part—acknowledging that on the part of the disciples.

the commandment of God] A remarkable testimony from our Lord to the divine origin of the Mosaic law: not merely of the Decalogue, as such, for the second command quoted is not in the Decalogue, and it is to be observed that where the text has God commanded, Mark (vii. 10) has Moses said.

5.] Lightfoot on this verse shews that the expression cited by our Lord did not always bind the utterer to consecrate his property to religious uses, but was by its mere utterance sufficient to absolve him from the duty of caring for his parents: see further on the word Corban in Mark vii. 11. The construction of this and the following verse is: But ye say, Whosoever shall say to his father or mother, That from which thou mightest have been benefited by me, is an offering (consecrated to God; see above).... (understand, is free). [And] such an one will certainly not honour his [father or his mother].

Of course the latter member of the sentence is our Lord's saying, not that of the Pharisees.

8.] The portion of Isaiah from which this citation is made (ch. xxiv.—xxxv.) sets forth, in alternate threatenings and promises, the punishment of the mere nominal Israel, and the salvation of the true Israel of God. And, as so often in the prophetic word, its threats and promises are for all times of the Church;—the particular event then foretold being but one fulfilment of those deeper and more general declarations of God, which shall be ever having their successive illustrations in His dealings with men.

10.] “He leaves the Scribes and Pharisees, as incorrigible, and already silenced and put to shame, and turns His discourse to the multitude as more worthy of being addressed.” Euthymius.

12.] This took place after our Lord had entered the house and was apart from the multitude: see Mark ver. 17.

13.] The plant is the teaching of the Pharisees, altogether of human, and not of divine planting. That this is so, is clear by “let them alone” following, and by the analogy of our Lord’s parabolic symbolism, in which seed, plant, &c., are compared to doctrine, which however in its growth becomes identified with, and impersonated by, its recipients and disseminators. See this illustrated in notes on the parable of the sower, ch. xiii. On this verse see John xv. 1, 2.

15.] The saying in ver. 11, which is clearly the subject of the question, was not strictly a parable, but a plain declaration; so that either Peter took it for a parable,—or the word must be taken in its wider sense of ‘an hard saying.’ Stier thinks that their questioning as to the meaning of parables in ch. xiii. had habituated them to asking for explanations in this form.

16.] The saying in ver. 11 was spoken for the multitude, who were exhorted “Hear and understand:” much more then ought the disciples to have understood it.

17.] “The mouth, through which, as Plato said, mortal things go in, but immortal things go out. For there go in meats and drinks, the perishable food of the perishable body: but there go forth words, the immortal laws of the immortal soul, by which the life of the reason is directed.” Philo.

21–28.] THE CANAANITISH WOMAN. Mark vii. 24–30: omitted by Luke. It is not quite clear whether our Lord actually passed the frontier into the land of the heathen, or merely was on the frontier. The usage of “into the parts” in Matthew favours the former supposition: see ch. ii. 22; xvi. 13; also for coasts, ch. ii. 16; iv. 13; viii. 34. Exod. xvi. 35, ‘to the borders of Canaan,’ has been quoted as supporting the other view; but the usage of our Evangelist himself seems to carry greater weight. And the question is not one of importance; for our Lord did not go to teach or to heal, but, as it would appear, to avoid the present indignation of the Pharisees.

Mark’s account certainly implies that the woman was in the same place where our Lord was wishing to be hid, and could not.

22. a Canaanitish woman of those districts came out] i.e. from her house, or town, or village. They were going by the way, see ver. 23.

The inhabitants of these parts are called Canaanites, Num. xiii. 29; Judg. i. 30, 32, 33; Exod. vi. 15; Josh. v. 1. St. Mark calls her “a Greek,” i.e. a heathen by religion, and “a Syro-Phenician by nation:” and describes her only as having come to our Lord in the house. But by the account in our text, she had been crying after the Lord and the disciples by the way previously; and St. Mark’s account must be understood to begin at ver. 25. From Mark iii. 8, Luke vi. 17, we learn that, the fame of our Lord had been spread in these parts, and multitudes from thence had come to Him for healing. It was not this woman’s dwelling-place, but her descent, which placed the bar between her and our Lord’s ministrations. The expression “Son of David” shews her acquaintance with Jewish expressions and expectations; but the whole narrative is against the supposition, that she may have been a proselyte of the gate.

23.] The reason alleged by the disciples must be coupled with our Lord's unwillingness to be known, stated by St. Mark (vii. 24), and means, 'she will draw the attention of all upon us.' Send her away does not necessarily imply granting her request, nor the contrary; but simply dismiss her, leaving the method to our Lord Himself.

24.] See ch. x. 5. Such was the purpose of our Lord's personal ministry; yet even that was occasionally broken by such incidents as this. The 'fountain sealed' sometimes broke its banks, in token of the rich flood of grace which should follow. See Rom. xv. 8.

25.] came she, i.e. into the house where our Lord was. See Mark vii. 24.

26. dogs] literally, little dogs. No contempt is indicated by the diminutive, still less any allusion to the daughter of the woman: the word is commonly used of tame dogs, as diminutives frequently express familiarity.

27.] The sense of the original is not given by 'yet' in the E.V. The woman, in her humility, accepts the appellation which our Lord gives her, and grounds her plea upon an inference from it. Her words also have a reference to "let the children first be filled," expressed by Mark vii. 27. It is, Yea, Lord: for even the dogs eat: or, for the dogs too eat. Our Lord, in the use of the familiar diminutive, has expressed not the uncleanness of the dog 20 much, as his attachment to and dependence on the human family: she lays hold on this favourable point and makes it her own, 'If we are dogs, then may we fare as such;—be fed with the crumbs of Thy mercy.' She was, as it were, under the edge of the table—close on the confines of Israel's feast. Some say that the crumbs are the pieces of bread on which the hands were wiped; but the "which fall" looks more like accidental falling, and the Greek word better expresses minute crumbs.

28.] In Mark, "For this saying, go thy way." The greatness of the woman's faith consisted in this, that in spite of all discouragements she continued her plea; and not only so, but accepting and laying to her account all adverse circumstances, she out of them made reasons for urging her request.

St. Mark gives the additional circumstance, that on returning to her house she found the devil gone out, and her daughter lying on the bed.

29–39.] HEALING BY THE SEA OF GALILEE. Peculiar to Matthew (see Mark vii. 31–37). FEEDING OF THE FOUR THOUSAND. Mark viii. 1–10.

29.] the mountain is the high land on the coast of the lake, not any particular mountain. From this account it is uncertain to which side of the lake our Lord came; from Mark vii. 31 we learn that it was to the eastern side, through the midst of the coasts of Decapolis.

30.] The maimed are properly persons maimed in the hands. The word is also sometimes used of the feet. The meaning need not be, that a wanting member was supplied to these persons; but that a debility, such as that arising from paralysis or wound, was healed.

31.] St. Mark (vii. 32–37) gives an instance of dumb speaking.

the God of Israel] Perhaps this last word is added as an expression of the joy of the disciples themselves, who contrasted the fulness and abundance of the acts of mercy now before them, with the instance which they had just seen of the difficulty with which the faith of a Gentile had prevailed to obtain help.

32.] The modern German interpreters assume the identity of this miracle with that narrated in ch. xiv. 14 ff. If this be so, then our Evangelists must have invented the speech attributed to our Lord in ch. xvi. 9, 10. But as Ebrard justly remarks, every circumstance which could vary, does vary, i in the two accounts. The situation in the wilderness, the kind of food at hand, the blessing and breaking, and distributing by means of the disciples, these are common to the two accounts, and were likely to be so: but here the matter is introduced by our Lord Himself with an expression of pity for the multitudes who had continued with Him three days: here also the provision is greater, the numbers are less than on the former occasion. But there is one small token of authenticity which marks these two accounts as referring to two distinct events, even had we not such direct testimony as that of ch. xvi. 9, 10. It is, that whereas the baskets in which the fragments were collected on the other occasion are called by all four Evangelists cophini, those used for that purpose after this miracle are in both Matt. and Mark spyrides.

And when our Lord refers to the two miracles, the same distinction is observed; a particularity which could not have arisen except as pointing to a matter of fact, that, whatever the distinction be, which is uncertain, different kinds of baskets were used on the two occasions. Perhaps the strangest reason for supposing the two identical is an imagined difficulty in the questions of the disciples, “Whence should we have” &c., so soon after the former miracle; as if the same slowness to believe and trust in divine power were not repeatedly found among men, and instanced in Scripture itself;—compare Exod. xvi. 13 with Num. xi. 21, 22: and read in Exod. xvii. 1–7 the murmurings of the Israelites immediately after their deliverance at the Red Sea. And even could we recognize this as a difficulty, it is not necessarily implied in the text. Our Lord puts the matter to them as a question, without the slightest intimation of His intention to supply the want supernaturally. They make answer in the same spirit, without venturing (as indeed it would have been most unbecoming in them to do, see John ii. 3, 4) to suggest the working of a miracle.

37.] The basket here spoken of (spyris) was large enough to contain a man’s body, as Paul was let down in one from the wall of Damascus, Acts ix. 25. Greswell supposes that they may have been used to sleep in, during the stay in the desert.

39.] Of Magadan nothing is known. Lightfoot, shews Magdala to have been only a Sabbath-day’s journey from Channath Gadara on the Jordan, and on the east side of the lake: but probably he is mistaken, for most travellers place it about three miles from Tiberias, on the west side of the lake, where is now a village named Madschel. Dalmanutha, mentioned by St. Mark (viii. 10), seems to have been a village in the neighbourhood.

CHAP. XVI. 1–4.] REQUEST FOR A SIGN FROM HEAVEN. Mark viii. 11–13, but much abridged. See also Luke xii. 54 and notes.

1.] See notes at ch. xii. 38. There is no ground for supposing that this narrative refers to the same event as that. What can be more natural than that the adversaries of our Lord should have met His miracles again and again with this demand of a sign from heaven? For in the Jewish superstition it was held that dæmons and false gods could give signs on earth, but only the true God signs from heaven. In the apocryphal Epistle of Jeremiah, ver. 67, we read of the gods of the heathen, “Neither can they shew signs in the heavens among the heathen....” And for such a notion they alleged the bread from heaven given by Moses (see John vi. 31), the staying of the sun by Joshua (Josh. x. 12), the thunder and rain by Samuel (1 Sam. xii. 17, compare Jer. xiv. 22), and Elijah (James v. 17, 18). And thus we find that immediately after the first miraculous feeding the same demand was made, John vi. 30, and answered by the declaration of our Lord that He was the true bread from heaven. And what more natural likewise, than that our Lord should have uniformly met the demand by the same answer,—the sign of Jonas, one so calculated to baffle His enemies and hereafter to fix the attention of His disciples? Here however that answer is accompanied by other rebukes sufficiently distinctive.

It was now probably the evening (see Mark viii. 10, “straightway”), and our Lord was looking on the glow in the west which suggested the remark in ver. 2, On the practice of the Jews to demand a sign, see 1 Cor. i. 22.

2.] Mark viii. 12 adds “He sighed deeply in his spirit...,” omitting however the sentences following. The Jews were much given to prognosticating the rains, &c. of the coming season in each year.

3.] of the times, generally. The Jews had been, and were, most blind to the signs of the times, at all the great crises of their history;—and also particularly to the times in which they were then living. The scepter had departed from Judah, the lawgiver no longer came forth from between his feet, the prophetic weeks of Daniel were just at their end; yet they discerned none of these things.

4.] See note on ch. xii. 39.

5–12. WARNING AGAINST THE LEAVEN OF THE PHARISEES AND SADDUCEES. Mark viii. 13–21.

5.] This crossing of the lake was not the voyage to Magadan mentioned in ch. xv. 39, for after the dialogue with the Pharisees, Mark adds (viii. 13), “entering into the ship again he departed to the other side.” they forgot to take bread; viz. on their land journey further. This is also to be understood in Mark (viii. 14), who states their having only one loaf in the ship, not to shew that they had forgotten to take bread before starting, but as a reason why they should have provided some on landing.

6. the leaven] See beginning of note on ch. xiii. 33. It is from the penetrating and diffusive power of leaven that the comparison, whether for good or bad, is derived. In Luke xii. 1, where the warning is given on a wholly different occasion, the leaven is explained to mean, hypocrisy; which is of all evil things the most penetrating and diffusive, and is the charge which our Lord most frequently brings against the Jewish sects. In Mark we read, “and the leaven of Herod.” The Herodians were more a political than a religious sect, the dependants and supporters of the dynasty of Herod, for the most part Sadducees in religious sentiment. These, though directly opposed to the Pharisees, were yet united with them in their persecution of our Lord, see ch. xxii. 16: Mark iii. 6. And their leaven was the same,—hypocrisy,—however it might be disguised by external difference of sentiment. They were all unbelievers at heart.

8–12.] Not only had they forgotten these miracles, but the weighty lesson given them in ch. xv. 16–20. The reproof is much fuller in Mark, where see note.

On the two sorts of baskets (cophini on the former occasion, spyrides on the latter), see note, ch. xv. 36.

This voyage brought them to Bethsaida: i.e. Bethsaida Jatias, on the North-Eastern side of the lake, see Mark viii. 22, and the miracle there related.

13–20.] CONFESSION OF Peter. Mark viii. 27–30. Luke ix. 18–21. Here St. Luke rejoins the narrative common to the three Evangelists, having left it at ch. xiv. 22. We here begin the second great division of our Saviour’s ministry on earth, introductory to His sufferings and death. Up to this time we have had no distinct intimation, like that in ver. 21, of these events. This intimation is brought in by the solemn question and confession now before us. And as the former period of His ministry was begun by a declaration from the Father of His Sonship, so this also, on the Mount of Transfiguration.

13. Caesarea Philippi] A town in Gaulonitis at the foot of Mount Libanus, not far from the source of the Jordan, a day’s journey from Sidon, once called Laish (Judg. xviii. 7, 29) and afterwards Dan (ibid.), but in later times Paneas, or Panias, from the mountain Panium, under which it lay. The tetrarch Philip enlarged it and gave it the name of Caesarea. In after times King Agrippa further enlarged it and called it Neronias in honour of the Emperor Nero. This must not be confounded with the Caesarea of the Acts, which was Caesarea Stratonis, on the Mediterranean. See Acts x. 1, and note. The following enquiry took place by the way, Mark viii. 27. St. Luke gives it without note of place, but states it to have been asked on the disciples joining our Lord, who was praying alone, Luke ix. 18.

The reading of the last words of the verse is somewhat uncertain. Some of the oldest authorities have, Who do men say that the Son of Man is? Some would render as if our Lord had said, ‘Who say men that I am? the Son of Man?’ i.e. the Messiah? but this is inadmissible, for the answer would not then have been expressed as it is, but affirmatively or negatively. Equally inadmissible is Olshausen’s rendering, ‘Me, who am, as ye are aware, the Son of Man?’ an expression, Olshausen says, by which the disciples would be led to the idea of the Son of God. But then this would destroy the simplicity of the following question, But who say ye that I am? because it would put into their mouths the answer intended to be given. The A.V. has beyond doubt the right rendering of this reading: and the Son of Man is a pregnant expression, which we now know to imply the Messiahship in the root of our human nature, and which even then was taken by the Jews as = the Son of God, (see Luke xxii. 69, 70,) which would serve as a test of the faith of the disciples, according to their understanding of it.

14.] It is no contradiction to this verdict that some called him the Son of David (ch. ix. 27; xii. 23; xv. 22); for either these were or were about to become His disciples, or are quoted as examples of rare faith, or as in ch. xii. 23, it was the passing doubt on the minds of the multitude, not their settled opinion. The same may be said of John vii. 26, 31; iv. 42. On our Lord’s being taken for John the Baptist, see ch. xiv. 2, from which this would appear to be the opinion of the Herodians.

one of the prophets] “that one of the old prophets is risen again,” Luke ix. 19. It was not a metempsychosis, but a bodily resurrection which was believed. On Elias, see note at ch. xi. 14. Jeremiah is mentioned first as being accounted by the Jews first in the prophetic canon. The confession is not made in the terms of the other answer: it is not ‘we say’ or ‘I say,’ but Thou art. It is the expression of: an inward conviction wrought by God’s Spirit. The excellence of this confession is, that it brings out both the human and the divine nature of the Lord: the Christ is the Messiah, the Son of David, the anointed King: the Son of the living God is the Eternal Son, begotten of the Eternal Father, not ‘Son of God’ in any inferior figurative sense, not one of the sons of God, of angelic nature, but THE SON OF THE LIVING GOD, having in Him the Sonship and the divine nature in a sense in which they could be in none else. This was a view of the Person of Christ quite distinct from the Jewish Messianic idea, which appears to have been that he should be a man born from men, but selected by God for the office on account of his eminent virtues. This distinction accounts for the solemn blessing pronounced in the next verse.

16.] The word living must not for a moment be taken here as it sometimes is used, (e. g. Acts xiv. 15,) as merely distinguishing the true God from dead idols: it is here emphatic, and imparts force and precision to Son.

That Peter when he uttered the words, understood by them in detail all that we now understand, is not of course asserted: bot that they were his testimony to the true Humanity and true Divinity of the Lord, in that sense of deep truth and reliance, out of which springs the Christian life of the Church.

17.] Blessed art thou, as in ch. v. 4, &c., is a solemn expression of blessing, an inclusion of him to whom it is addressed in the kingdom of heaven, not a mere word of praise. And the reason of it is, the fact that the Father had revealed the Son to him (see ch. xi. 25–27); cf. Gal. i. 15, 16, in which passage the occurrence of the word “reveal” seems to indicate a reference to this very saying of the Lord. The whole declaration of St. Paul in that chapter forms a remarkable parallel to the character and promise given to St. Peter in our text,—as establishing Paul’s claim to be another such rock or pillar as Peter and the other great Apostles, because the Son had been revealed in him not of man nor by men, but by God Himself. The name Simon Bar-jona is doubtless used as indicating his fleshly state and extraction, and forming the greater contrast to his spiritual state, name, and blessing, which follow. The same ‘Simon son of Jonas’ is uttered when he is reminded, by the thrice repeated enquiry, ‘Lovest thou me?’ of his frailty, in his previous denial of his Lord.

18.] The name Peter (not now first given, but prophetically bestowed by our Lord on His first interview with Simon, John i. 43) or Cephas, signifying a rock, the termination being only altered from Petra to Petros to suit the masculine appellation, denotes the personal position of this Apostle in the building of the Church of Christ. He was the first of those foundation-stones (Rev. xxi. 14) on which the living temple of God was built: this building itself beginning on the day of Pentecost by the laying of three thousand living stones on this very foundation. That this is the simple and only interpretation of the words of our Lord, the whole usage of the New Testament shews: in which not doctrines nor confessions, but men, are uniformly the pillars and stones of the spiritual building. See 1 Pet. ii. 4–6; 1 Tim. iii. 15 (where the pillar is not Timotheus, but the congregation of the faithful) and note: Gal. ii. 9; Eph. ii. 20; Rev. iii. 12. And it is on Peter, as by divine revelation making this confession, as thus under the influence of the Holy Ghost, as standing out before the Apostles in the strength of this faith, as himself founded on the one foundation, Jesus Christ, 1 Cor. iii. 11—that the Jewish portion of the Church was built, Acts ii. —v., and the Gentile, Acts x., xi. After this last event, we hear little of him; but during this, the first building time, he is never lost sight of: see especially Acts i. 15; ii. 14, 37; iii. 12; iv. 8; v. 15, 29; ix. 34, 40; x. 25, 26. We may certainly exclaim with Bengel, “All this may be said with safety; for what has this to do with Rome?” Nothing can be further from any legitimate interpretation of this promise, than the idea of a perpetual primacy in the successors of Peter; the very notion of succession is precluded by the form of the comparison, which concerns the person, and him only, so far as it involves a direct promise. In its other and general sense, as applying to all those living stones (Peter’s own expression for members of Christ’s Church) of whom the Church should be built, it implies, as Origen excellently comments on it, saying, that all this must be understood as said not only to Peter, as in the letter of the Gospel, but to every one who is such as Peter here shewed himself, as the spirit of the Gospel teaches us. The application of the promise to St. Peter has been elaborately impugned by Dr. Wordsworth. His zeal to appropriate the rock to Christ has somewhat overshot itself. In arguing that the term can apply to none but God, he will find it difficult surely to deny all reference to a rock in the name Peter. To me, it is equally difficult, nay impossible, to deny all reference, in “upon this rock,” to the preceding word Peter. Let us keep to the plain straightforward sense of Scripture, however that sense may have been misused by Rome.

church] This word occurs but in one place besides in the Gospels, ch. xviii. 17, and there in the same sense as here, viz. the congregation of the faithful: only there it is one portion of that congregation, here the whole.

The gates of hell (Hades), by a well-known Oriental form of speech, is equivalent to the power of the kingdom of death. The form is still preserved when the Turkish empire is known as ‘the Ottoman Porte.’ is promise received a remarkable literal fulfilment in the person of Peter in Acts xii. 6–18, see especially ver. 10.

The meaning of the promise is, that over the Church so built upon him who was by the strength of that confession the Rock, no adverse power should ever prevail to extinguish it.

19.] Another personal promise to Peter, remarkably fulfilled in his being the first to admit both Jews and Gentiles into the Church; thus using the power of the keys to open the door of salvation. As an instance of his shutting it also, witness his speech to Simon Magus, Acts viii. 21.

whatsoever thou shalt bind, &c.] This same promise is repeated in ch. xviii. 18, to all the disciples generally, and to any two or three gathered together in Christ’s name. It was first however verified, and in a remarkable and prominent way, to Peter. Of the binding, the case of Ananias and Sapphira may serve as an eminent example: of the loosing, the “Such as I have, give I thee,” to the lame man at the Beautiful Gate of the Temple. But strictly considered, the binding and loosing belong to the power of legislation in the Church committed to the Apostles, in accordance with the Jewish way of using the words bind and loose for prohibit and allow. They cannot relate to the remission and retention of sins, for though to loose sins certainly appears to mean to forgive sins, to bind sins for retaining them would be altogether without example, and, I may add, would bear no meaning in the interpretation: it is not the sin, but the sinner, that is bound, “liable to eternal sin” (so in text) (Mark iii. 29). Nor can the ancient custom of fastening doors by means of cord be alluded to; for the expressions clearly indicate something bound and something loosed, and not merely the power of the keys just conferred. The meaning in John xx. 23, though an expansion of this in one particular direction (see note there), is not to be confounded with this.

21–28.] OUR LORD ANNOUNCES HIS APPROACHING DEATH AND RESURRECTION. REBUKE OF PETER. Mark viii. 31–ix. 1. Luke ix. 22–27. See note on ver. 13. Obscure intimations had before been given of our Lord's future sufferings, see ch. x. 38: John iii. 14, and of His resurrection, John ii. 19 (x. 17, 18?), but never yet plainly, as now. With St. Mark's usual precise note of circumstances, he adds, "He spake that saying openly."

21.] On must, which is common to the three Evangelists, see Luke xxiv. 26: John iii. 14, and ch. xxv. 54.

suffer many things] "be rejected" in Mark and Luke. These many things were afterwards explicitly mentioned, ch. xx. 18: Luke xviii. 31, 32.

elders and chief priests and scribes] The various classes of members of the Sanhedrin: see note on ch. ii. 4.

On the prophecy of the resurrection, some have objected that the disciples and friends of our Lord appear not to have expected it (see John xx. 2: Luke xxiv. 12). But we have it directly asserted (Mark ix. 10 and 32) that they did not understand the saying, and therefore were not likely to make it a ground of expectation. Certainly enough was known of such a prophecy to make the Jews set a watch over the grave (Matt. xxvii. 63), which of itself answers the objection. Some Commentators reason about the state of the disciples after the crucifixion, just as if they had not suffered any remarkable overthrow of their hopes and reliances, and maintain that they must have remembered this precise prophecy if it had been given by the Lord. But on the other hand we must remember how slow despondency is to take up hope, and how many of the Lord's sayings must have been completely veiled from their eyes, owing to their non-apprehension of His sufferings and triumph as a whole. He Himself reproaches them with this very slowness of belief after His resurrection. It is in the highest degree improbable that the precision should have been given to this prophecy after the event, as Meyer supposes: both from the character of the Gospel History in general (see Prolegomena), and because of the carefulness and precision in the words added by St. Mark; see above.

22.] The same Peter, who but just now had made so noble and spiritual a confession, and received so high a blessing, now shews the weak and carnal side of his character, becomes a stumbling-block in the way of his Lord, and earns the very rebuff with which the Tempter before him had been dismissed. Nor is there any thing improbable in this; the expression of spiritual faith may, and frequently does, precede the betraying of carnal weakness; and never is this more probable than when the mind has just been uplifted, as Peter's was, by commendation and lofty promise.

The "Be it far from thee" of the A.V. is literally (God be) gracious (or, propitious) to thee.

this shall not be unto thee] It is an authoritative declaration, as it were, on Peter's part. This shall not happen to thee, implying that he knew better, and could ensure his divine Master against such an event. It is this spirit of confident rejection of God's revealed purpose which the Lord so sharply rebukes.

23.] As it was Peter's spiritual discernment, given from above, which made him a foundation-stone of the Church, so is it his carnality, proceeding from want of unity with the divine will, which makes him an adversary now. Compare ch. iv. 10, also Eph. vi. 12.

thou art an offence unto me] literally, Thou art my stumbling-block (not merely a stumbling-block to me), "rock (petra) of offence," in Peter's own remarkable words, 1 Pet. ii. 7, 8,—joined too with the very expression, which the builders disallowed (rejected), which, as above noticed, occurs in this passage in Mark and Luke. Before this rebuke St. Mark inserts "when he had turned about and looked on his disciples," that the reproof might be before them all.

24.] When he had called the people unto him with his disciples also, Mark viii. 34; he said to them all, Luke ix. 23. This discourse is a solemn sequel to our Lord's announcement respecting Himself and the rebuke of Peter: teaching that not only He, but also His followers, must suffer and self-deny; that they all have a life to save, more precious than all else to them; and that great day of account of that life's welfare should be ever before them. On this and the following verse, see ch. x. 38, 39. After his cross Luke inserts "daily."

26.] There is apparently a reference to Psalm xl ix. in this verse. Compare especially the latter part with ver. 7, 8, of that Psalm.

lose his own life = "lose himself" Luke. Compare also 1 Pet. i. 18.

what shall a man give in exchange for his life?] We must not here render soul, but life, understanding it in the higher sense, life here and hereafter.

27.] A further revelation of this important chapter respecting the Son of Man. He is to be JUDGE OF ALL—and, as in ch. xiii. 41, is to appear with His angels, and in the glory of His Father—the “glory which thou hast given me,” John xvii. 22. Mark and Luke place here, not this declaration, but that of our ch. x. 33. Our Lord doubtless joined the two. Compare ch. xxiv. 30; xxv. 31.

For implies, “And it is not without reason that I thus speak: a time will come when the truth of what I say will be shewn.”

28.] This declaration refers, in its full meaning, certainly not to the transfiguration which follows, for that could in no sense (except that of being a foretaste: compare Peter's own allusion to it, 2 Pet. i. 17, where he evidently treats it as such) be named ‘the Son of Man coming in his Kingdom,’ and the expression, some... shall not taste of death, till..., indicates a distant event,—but to the destruction of Jerusalem, and the full manifestation of the Kingdom of Christ by the annihilation of the Jewish polity; which event, in this aspect as well as in all its terrible attendant details, was a type and earnest of the final coming of Christ. See John xxi. 22, and compare Deut. xxxii. 36 with Heb. x. 30. This dreadful destruction was indeed judgment beginning at the house of God. The interpretation of Meyer, &c., that our Lord referred to His ultimate glorious coming, the time of which was hidden from Himself (see Mark xiii. 32: Acts i. 7), is self-contradictory on his own view of the Person of Christ. That our Lord, in His humanity in the flesh, did not know the day and the hour, we have from His own lips: but that not knowing it, He should have uttered a determinate and solemn prophecy of it, is utterly impossible. His verily I say unto you always introduces His solemn and authoritative revelations of divine truth. The fact is, there is a reference back in this discourse to that in ch. x., and the coming here spoken of is the same as that in ver. 23 there. Stier well remarks that this cannot be the great and ultimate coming, on account of the terms of the announcement, which imply that they should taste of death after they had seen it, and would therefore be inapplicable to the final coming. This is denied by Wordsworth, who substitutes for the simple sense of “shall not taste of death,” the far-fetched one, “shall not feel its bitterness,” “shall not taste of the death of the soul,” and then, thus interpreting, gives the prophecy, as it seems to me, the very opposite of its plain sense: “they will not taste of death till I come: much less will they taste of it then.”

CHAP. XVII. 1–13.] THE TRANSFIGURATION. Mark ix. 2–13. Luke ix. 28–36. This weighty event forms the solemn installation of our Lord to His sufferings and their result. Those three Apostles were chosen to witness it, who had before witnessed His power over death (Mark v. 37), and who afterwards were chosen to accompany Him in His agony (ch. xxvi. 37), and were (John xx. 2: Mark xvi. 7) in an especial sense witnesses of His resurrection. The Two who appeared to them were the representatives of the law and the prophets: both had been removed from this world in a mysterious manner:—the one without death,—the other by death indeed, but so that his body followed not the lot of the bodies of all; both, like the Greater One with whom they spoke, had endured that supernatural fast of forty days and nights: both had been on the holy mount in the visions of God. And now they came, endowed with glorified bodies before the rest of the dead, to hold converse with the Lord on that sublime event, which had been the great central subject of all their teaching, and solemnly to consign into His hands, once and for all, in a symbolical and glorious representation, their delegated and expiring power. And then follows the Divine Voice, as at the Baptism, commanding however here in addition the sole hearing and obedience of Him whose power and glory were thus testified.

There can arise no question of the absolute historical reality of this narration. It is united by definite marks of date with what goes before; and by intimate connexion with what follows. It cannot by any unfairness be severed from its context. Nor again is there any thing mentioned which casts a doubt on the reality of the appearances (see below, on vision, ver. 9). The persons mentioned were seen all—spoke—and were recognized. The concurrence between the three Evangelists is exact in all the circumstances, and the fourth alludes, not obscurely, to the event, which it was not part of his purpose to relate; John i. 14. Another of the three spectators distinctly makes mention of the facts here related, 2 Pet. i. 16–18. I cannot but add, having recently returned from the sight of the wonderful original at Rome, that the great last picture of Raffaelle is one of the best and noblest comments on this portion of the Gospel history.—The events passing, at the same time, on, and under, the Mount of Transfiguration, are by the painter combined, to carry to the mind of the spectator the great central truth, There is none but Christ to console and to glorify our nature. It is a touching reflection, that this picture was left unfinished by the painter, and carried in his funeral procession.

1.] “About an eight days after these sayings,” Luke ix. 28. The one computation is inclusive, the other not; or perhaps, from the “about” being inserted, the one is precise, the other roughly stated. The time of the transfiguration was probably night, for the following reasons. (1) St. Luke informs us that the Lord had gone up to the mount to pray; which He usually did at night (Luke vi. 12; xxi. 87; xxii. 89: Matt. xiv. 28, 24 al.). (2) All the circumstances connected with the glorification and accompanying appearances would thus be more prominently seen. (3) The Apostles were asleep, and are described, Luke, ver.

32, as 'having kept awake through it.' (4) They did not descend till the next day (Luke, ver. 37), which would be almost inexplicable had the event happened by day, but a matter of course if by night.

an high mountain] The situation of this mountain is uncertain. It was probably not Tabor, according to the legend; for on the top of Tabor then most likely stood a fortified town (De Wette, from Robinson). Nor is there any likelihood that it was Panium, near Caesarea Philippi, for the six days would probably be spent in journeying; and they appear immediately after to have come to Capernaum. It was most likely one of the mountains bordering the lake. St. Luke speaks of it merely as "the mountain" (country). Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, p. 399, contends for Hermon: as does, though doubtfully, Dr. Thomson, The Land and the Book, p. 231. Stanley thinks that our Lord would still be in the neighbourhood of Caesarea Philippi: and that "it is impossible to look up from the plain to the towering of Hermon, almost the only mountain which deserves the name in Palestine, and one of whose ancient titles ('the lofty peak') was derived from this very circumstance, and not be struck with its appropriateness to the scene.... High up on its southern slopes there must be many a point where the disciples could be taken 'apart by themselves.' Even the transient comparison of the celestial splendour with the snow, where alone it could be seen in Palestine, should not perhaps be wholly overlooked."

2.] was transfigured = "the fashion of his countenance was altered," Luke. In what way, is not stated; but we may conclude from what follows, by being lighted with radiance both from without and from within.

white as the light = "white and glistening," Luke; = "exceeding white [as snow] so as no fuller on earth can whiten them," Mark.

3.] There need be no question concerning the manner of the recognition of Moses and Elias by the disciples: it may have been intuitive and immediate. We can certainly not answer with Olshausen, that it may have arisen from subsequent information derived from our Lord, for Peter's words in the next verse preclude this. St. Luke adds, "who appeared in glory, and spake of his decease, which he should accomplish in Jerusalem."

4.] St. Luke inserts, that the Apostles had been asleep, but wakened through this whole occurrence;—thereby distinguishing it from a mere vision of sleep; and that this speech was made "as they departed from him." Both Mark and Luke add, that Peter knew not what he said: and Mark— "for they were sore afraid." The speech was probably uttered with reference to the sad announcement recently made by our Lord, and to which his attention had been recalled by the converse of Moses and Elias.

It is one of those remarkable coincidences of words which lead men on, in writing, to remembrances connected with those words, that in 2 Peter i. 14, 15, tabernacle and decease (exodus, as here) have just been mentioned before the allusion to this event: see note there.

Lord] Rabbi, Mark,—Master, Luke.

5.] them, viz. our Lord, Moses and Elias. St. Luke adds, "they feared as they entered into the cloud." That the Apostles did not enter the cloud, is shewn by the voice being heard out of the cloud. The hear him, and disappearance of the two heavenly attendants, are symbolically connected,—as signifying that God, who had spoken in times past to the Fathers by the Prophets, henceforth would speak by His Son.

Vv. 6, 7 are peculiar to Matthew.

9.] No unreality is implied in the word vision, for it is expressed by "what they had seen" in Mark and in Luke: see Num. xxiv. 3, 4. St. Luke, without mentioning the condition of time imposed on them, remarkably confirms it by saying, "they told no man in those days...."

10.] The occasion of this enquiry was, that they had just seen Elias withdrawn from their eyes, and were enjoined not to tell the vision. How then should this be? If this was not the coming of Elias, was he yet to come? If it was, how was it so secret and so short?

On ver. 12, see note on ch. xi. 14.

Our Lord speaks here plainly in the future, and uses the very word of the prophecy Mal. iv. 6, The double allusion is only the assertion that the Elias (in spirit and power) who foreran our Lord's first coming, was a partial fulfilment of the great prophecy which announces the real Elias (the words of Malachi will hardly bear any other than a personal meaning), who is to forerun His greater and second coming.

14–21.] HEALING oF A POSSESSED Lunatio. Mark ix. 14–29. Luke ix. 87–42. By much the fullest account of this miracle is contained in Mark, where see notes. It was the next day: see Luke ix. 87, and note on our ver. 1. Our Lord found the Scribes and the disciples disputing (Mark).

15.] He was an only son, Luke ix. 88. The demon had deprived him of speech, Mark ix. 17.

17.] Bengel remarks, that in our Lord's severe reproof, the disciples are numbered with the multitude.

19.] It was in the house, Mark ix. 28.

22, 23.] OUR LORD'S SECOND ANNOUNCEMENT OF His DEATH AND RESURRECTION. Mark ix. 30—32. Luke ix. 43—45. This followed immediately after the miracle (Mark ix. 30). Our Lord went privately through Galilee; For he taught his disciples, &c.— the imparting of this knowledge more accurately to His disciples, which he had begun to do in the last chapter, was the reason for his privacy. For more particulars, see Luke ver. 45 Mark ver. 32.

24—27.] DEMAND OF THE SACRED TRIBUTE, AND OUR LORD's REPLY. Peculiar to Matthew. The narrative connects well with the whole chapter, the aim of the events narrated in which is, to set forth Jesus as the undoubted Son of God.

24. the two drachmas] This was a sum paid annually by the Jews of twenty years old and upwards, towards the temple in Jerusalem. Exod. xxx. 18: 2 Kings xii. 4: 2 Chron. xxiv. 6, 9. Josephus says of Vespasian, "He levied a tribute on the Jews all over the world, compelling each man to pay two drachmas yearly into the Capitol, as they formerly used to do to the temple at Jerusalem." It does not quite appear whether this payment was compulsory or not; the question here asked would look as if it were voluntary, and therefore by some declined.

Many Commentators both ancient and modern, and among them no less names than Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Jerome, and Augustine, seem to have missed the meaning of this miracle, by interpreting the payment as a civil one, which it certainly was not. Peter answered in the affirmative, probably because he had known it paid before.

25, 26.] The whole force of this argument depends on the fact of the payment being a divine one. It rests on this: 'If the sons are free, then on Me, being the Son of God, has this tax no claim.'

tribute is here the rendering of census, money' taken according to the reckoning of the census,—a capitation tax.

27.] In this, which has been pronounced the most difficult miracle in the Gospels, the deeper student of our Lord's life and actions will find no difficulty. Our Lord's words amount to this:—"that, notwithstanding this immunity, we (graciously including the Apostle in the earthly payment, and omitting the distinction between them, which was not now to be told to any), that we may not offend them, will pay what is required—and shall find it furnished by God's special providence for us." In the foreknowledge and power which this miracle implies, the Lord recalls Peter to that great confession (ch. xvi. 16), which his hasty answer to the collectors shews him to have again in part forgotten.

Of course the miracle is to be understood in its literal historic sense. The rationalistic interpretation, that the fish was to be sold for the money (and a wonderful price it would be for a fish caught with a hook), is refuted by the terms of the narrative,—and the mythical one, besides the utter inapplicability of all mythical interpretation to any part of the evangelic history,—by the absence of all possible occasion, and all possible signification, of such a myth.

The stater = four drachmas—the exact payment required for two persons.

for, literally, instead of, because the payment was a redemption paid for the person, Exod. xxx. 12. To this also refers the "free" above.

me and thee—not us;—as in John xx. 17:—because the footing on which it was given was different.

CHAP. XVIII. 1—35.] DISCOURSE RESPECTING THE GREATEST IN THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN. Mark ix. 38—50. Luke ix. 46—50.

1.] In Mark we learn that this discourse arose out of a dispute among the disciples who should be the greatest. It took place soon after the last incident. Peter had returned from his fishing: see ver. 21. The dispute had taken place before, on the way to Capernaum. It had probably been caused by the mention of the Kingdom of God as at hand in ch. xvi. 19, 28, and the preference given by the Lord to the Three. In Mark it is our Lord who asks them what they were disputing about, and they are silent.

At that same time need not necessarily refer to the incident last related. It may equally well be understood as indicating the presence in the mind of the querist of something that had Passed in the preceding dispute.

2.] From Mark ix. 36 it appears that our Lord first placed the child in the midst, and then took it in His arms: possibly drawing a lesson for His disciples from its ready submission and trustfulness.

3. turned] The word also conveys the idea of turning back from the course previously begun, viz. that of ambitious rivalry. Without this they should not only not be pre-eminent in, but not even admitted into, the Christian state—the Kingdom of Heaven.

4.) Not “as this little child humbleth itself:” the child was naturally humble: and such as the child was by nature, we are to be by choice.

5.] Having shewn the child as the pattern of humility, the Lord proceeds to shew the honour in which children are held in His heavenly kingdom; and not only actual, but spiritual children—for both are understood in the expression one such little child. The receiving in my name is the serving (Mark ix. 35) with Christian love, and as belonging to Christ (see also ch. xxv. 40).

6.] Here St. Mark and St. Luke insert the saying of John respecting one casting out demons in Jesus’ name, who followed not with the Apostles: which it appears gave rise to the remark in this verse. St. Luke however goes on no farther with the discourse: St. Mark inserts also our ch. x. 42. The punishment here mentioned, drowning, may have been practised in the sea of Galilee: see Jerome cited in my Gr. Test. De Wette however denies this, saying that it was not a Jewish punishment; but it certainly was a Roman, for Suetonius mentions it as practised by Augustus on the rapacious attendants of Caius Caesar: and on a certain Macedonian also: see as above.

7.] See 1 Cor. xi. 19. Stier suggests that Judas, who took offence at the anointing in Bethany, may have been on other occasions the man by whom the offence came, and so this may have been said with special reference to him. Still its general import is undeniable and plain. See also Acts ii. 23.

8.] The connexion is— ‘Wilt thou avoid being the man on whom this woe is pronounced?—then cut off all occasion of offence in thyself first.’ The cautions following are used in a wider sense than in ch. v. 29, 30. In Mark, the ‘foot’ is expanded into a separate iteration of the command.

everlasting fire (literally the fire which is eternal), which here first occurs, is more fully expressed in Mark, vv. 43, 44 ff.

10.] Hitherto our text has been lel with that of Mark ix.; from this, Matthew stands alone.

The warning against contempt of these little ones must not be taken as only implying that special care must be taken not to scandalize them, nor indeed as relating exclusively, or even principally, to children. We must remember with what the discourse began—a contention who should be greatest among them: and the little ones are those who are the furthest from these ‘greatest,’ the humble and new-born babes of the spiritual kingdom. And despise must be understood of that kind of contempt which ambition for superiority would induce for those who are by weakness or humility incapacitated for such a strife. There is no doubt that children are included in the word little ones, as they are always classed with the humble and simple-minded, and their character held up for our imitation. The little children in the outward state of the Church are in fact the only disciples who are sure to be that in reality, which their Baptism has put upon them, and so exactly answer to the wider meaning here conveyed by the term; and those who would in afterlife enter into the kingdom must turn back, and become as these little children—as they were when they had just received the new life in Baptism. The whole discourse is in deep and constant reference to the covenant with infants, which was to be made and ratified by an ordinance, in the Kingdom of Heaven, just as then.

On the reason assigned in the latter part of this verse, there have been many opinions; some of which (e. g. that given Webster and Wilkinson, ‘angels, their spirits after death.’) a meaning which the word never bore, and one respecting which our Lord would not have spoken in the present tense, with always) have been broached merely to evade the plain sense of the words, which is—that to individuals (whether invariably, or under what circumstances of minor detail, we are not informed) certain angels are allotted as their especial attendants and guardians. We know elsewhere from the Scriptures, both of the Old and

New Testament (Ps. xxxiv. 7; xci. 11: Heb. i. 14 al.), that the angels do minister about the children of God: and what should forbid that in this service, a prescribed order and appointed duty should regulate their ministrations? Nay, is it not certain by analogy that such would be the case? But this saying of our Lord assures us that such is the case, and that those angels whose honour is high before God are entrusted with the charge of the humble and meek,—the children in age and the children in grace.

The phrase I say unto you, as in Luke xv. 7, 10, is an introduction to a revelation of some previously unknown fact in the spiritual world.

Stier has some very beautiful remarks on the guardian angels, and on the present general neglect of the doctrine of angelic tutelage, which has been doubtless a reaction from the idolatrous angel-worship of the Church of Rome (see Acts xii, 15: Daniel xii. 1: in the former case we have an individual, in the latter a national guardianship).

behold the face, &c. i.e. are in high honour before God; not perhaps especially so, but the meaning may be, ‘for they have angelic guardians, who always,’ &c. See Tobit xii. 15.

11.] The angels are the servants and messengers of the Son of Man; and they therefore (for &c.) are appointed to wait on these little ones whom He came to save; and who, in their utter helplessness, are especially examples of that which was lost. ‘Here,’ remarks Stier, ‘is Jacob’s ladder planted before our eyes: beneath are the little ones;—then their angels;—then the Son of Man in heaven, in whom alone man is exalted above the angels, Who, as the Great Angel of the Covenant, cometh from the Presence and Bosom of the Father;—and above Him again (ver. 14) the Father Himself, and His good pleasure.’

12, 18.] See notes on Luke xv. 4–6, where the same parable is more expanded. Compare also Ezek. xxxiv. 6, 11, 12.

14.] This verse sets forth to us the work of the Son as accomplishing the will of the Father;—for it is unquestionably the Son who is the Good Shepherd, searching for the lost, ver. 11. For similar declarations see Ezek. xviii. 28; xxxiii. 11: 2 Pet. iii. 9. The inference from this verse is—‘then whoever despises or scandalizes one of these little ones, acts in opposition to the will of your Father in Heaven.’ Observe, when the dignity of the little ones was asserted, it was my Father; now that a motive directly acting on the conscience of the Christian is urged, it is your Father.

15–20.] OF THE METHOD OF PROCEEDING WITH AN OFFENDING BROTHER: AND OF THE POWER OF THE CHRISTIAN ASSEMBLY IN SUCH CASES.

15.] The connexion of this with the preceding is: Our Lord has been speaking of offences (stumbling-blocks), which subject is the ground-tone of the whole discourse. One kind is, when thou sinnest against another, vv. 7–14. A second kind, when thy brother sins against thee. The remedy for the former must be, in each individual being cautious in his own person,—that of the latter, in the exercise of brotherly love, and if that fail, the authority of the congregation, vv. 15–17. Then follows an exposition of what that authority is, vv. 18–20.

On this verse see Levit. Xix. 17, 18. This direction is only in case of personal offence against ourselves, and then the injured person is to seek private explanation, and that by going to his injurer, not waiting till he comes to apologize.

hast gained, in the higher sense, reclaimed, gained for God, see reff.: and for thyself too: “for before, thou hadst lost him, having been broken off from thy society by the offence,” Euthymius.

16.] The first attempt of brotherly love is to heal the wound, to remove the offence, in secrecy; to cover the sin: but if this cannot be done, the next step is, to take two or three, still, in case of an adjustment, preventing publicity; but in the other event, providing sufficient legal witness. See reff. and John viii. 17.

Compare St. Paul’s apparent reference to these words of our Lord, 2 Cor. xiii. 1.

17. neglect to hear] The original verb is a stronger word than this, implying something of obduracy: refuse to hear.

the church (literally assembly), by what follows, certainly not ‘the Jewish synagogue’ (for how could vv. 18–20 be said in any sense of it?), but the congregation of Christians; i.e. in early times, such as in Acts iv. 82, the one congregation,—in after times, that congregation of which thou and he are members. That it cannot mean the Church as represented by her rulers, appears by vv. 19, 20,—where any collection of believers is gifted with the power of deciding in such cases. Nothing could be further from the spirit of our Lord’s command than proceedings in what are oddly enough called ‘ecclesiastical’ courts.

let him be, &c.] ‘let him no longer be accounted as a brother, but as one of those without,’ as the Jews accounted Gentiles and Publicans. Yet even then, not with hatred, see 1 Cor. v. 11, and compare 2 Cor. ii. 6, 7, and 2 Thess. iii. 14, 15.

18.] This verse re-asserts in a wider and more general sense the grant made to Peter in ch. xvi. 19. It is here not only to him as the first stone, but to the whole building. See note there, and on John xx. 23, between which and our ch. xvi. 19 this is a middle point. This refers to that entire accordance of hearty faith, which could hardly have place except also in accordance with the divine will. It was apparently misunderstood by the Apostles James and John;—see St. Mark's account, ch. x, 36, in which they nearly repeat these words. Notice again the [verily] I say unto you: see on ch. xvi. 28.

30.] A generalization of the term church (assembly), and the powers conferred on it, which renders it independent of particular forms of government or ceremonies, and establishes at once a canon against pseudo-catholicism in all its forms: compare 1 Cor. i. 2.

there am I must be understood of the presence of the Spirit and Power of Christ, see chap. xxviii. 20.

21–35.] Referring to Peter's QUESTION RESPECTING THE LIMIT OF FORGIVENESS; AND BY OCCASION, THE PARABLE OF THE FORGIVEN BUT UNFORGIVING SERVANT. See Luke xvii. 3, 4. It is possible that Peter may have asked this question in virtue of the power of the keys before (ch. xvi. 19) entrusted to him, to direct him in the use of them: but it seems more likely, that it was asked as in the person of any individual: that Peter wished to follow the rules just laid down, but felt a difficulty as to the limit of his exercise of forgiveness.

The Rabbinical rule was, to forgive three times and no more; this they justified by Amos i. 3, &c., Job xxxiii, 29, 30 LXX, and marg. E.V. The expression 'seven times a day' is found Prov. xxiv. 16, in connexion with sinning and being restored: see also Levit. xxvi. 18–28. In our Lord's answer we have most likely a reference to Gen. iv. 24, 22.] On seventy times seven, Chrysostom remarks,* that our Lord does not here lay down a number, but prescribes that which is infinite and continuous and everlasting.

23. Therefore 'because this is so,' because unlimited forgiveness is the law of the Kingdom of Heaven. The servants here are not slaves, but ministers or stewards. By the commanding to be sold of ver. 25 they could not be slaves in the literal sense. But in Oriental language all the subjects of the king, even the great ministers of state, are called slaves. The individual example is one in high trust, or his debt could never have reached the enormous sum mentioned. See Isa. i. 18.

24.] Whether these are talents of silver or of gold, the debt represented is enormous, and far beyond any private man's power to discharge. 10, 000 talents of silver is the sum at which Haman reckons the revenue derivable from the destruction of the whole Jewish people, Esth. iii. 9, Trench remarks (Parables, p. 124) that we can best appreciate the sum by comparing it with other sums mentioned in Scripture. In the construction of the tabernacle, twenty-nine talents of gold were used (Exod. xxxviii. 24): David prepared for the temple 3000 talents of gold, and the princes 5000 (1 Chron. xxix. 4–7: the Queen of Sheba presented to Solomon 120 talents (1 Kings x. 10): the King of Assyria laid on Hezekiah thirty talents of gold (2 Kings xviii. 14): and in the extreme impoverishment to which the land was brought at last, one talent of gold was laid on it, after the death of Josiah, by the King of Egypt (2 Chron. xxxvi. 3).

25.] See Exod. xxii. 3: Levit. xxv. 39, 47: 2 Kings iv. 1. The similitude is however rather from Oriental despotism: for the selling was under the Mosaic law softened by the liberation at the year of jubilee. The imprisonment also, and the tormentors, vv. 30, 34, favour this view, forming no part of the Jewish law.

26.] Luther explains this as the voice of mistaken self-righteousness, which when bitten by sense of sin and terrified with the idea of punishment, runs hither and thither, seeking help, and imagines it can build up a righteousness before God without having yet any idea that God Himself will help the sinner. Trench remarks, "It seems simpler to see in the words nothing more than exclamations characteristic of the extreme fear and anguish of the moment, which made him ready to promise impossible things, even mountains of gold," p. 127.

28.] Perhaps we must not lay stress on went out, as indicating any wrong frame of mind already begun, as some do:—the sequel shews how completely he had 'gone out' from the presence of his Lord. At all events the word corresponds to the time when the trial of our principle takes place: when we 'go out' from the presence of God in prayer and spiritual exercises, into the world. We may observe, that forgiveness of sin does not imply a change of heart or principle in the sinner.

The fellow-servant is probably not in the same station as himself, but none the less a fellow-servant. The insignificance of the sum is to shew us how trifling any offence against one another is in comparison to the vastness of our sin against God. Chrysostom finely remarks: "He paid no regard even to the words by which he owed his own deliverance,—the petition which won for him the forgiveness of those ten thousand talents: he recognized not the harbour where he escaped his impending shipwreck: the posture of the suppliant did not remind him of his lord's kindness: but rejecting all such considerations in his avarice and his cruelty and his ungodliness, he was more cruel than wild beast seizing and throttling his fellow-servant.

What doest thou, O man? Seest thou not that thou art exacting from thyself? drawing the sword against thyself, retorting upon thyself the denial, and refusing for thyself the free forgiveness?"

that thou owest must be understood as a haughty expression of one ashamed to meet the mention of the paltry sum really owing, and by this very expression generalizing his unforgiving treatment to all who owed him aught.

31.] The fel-low-servants were grieved, the lord is angry. Anger is not man's proper mood towards sin, but sorrow (see Ps. cxix. 186), because all men are sinners. These fellow-servants are the praying people of God, who plead with Him against the oppression and tyranny in the world.

32.] "When he owed 10, 000 talents, he never called him wicked, nor reviled him, but had compassion on him." Chrysostom.

34. the tormentors] not merely the prison-keepers, but the torturers. Remember he was to have been sold into slavery before, and now his punishment is to be greater. The condition following would amount in the case of the sum in the parable to perpetual imprisonment. So Chrysostom, "that is, forever; for he will never repay." See note on ch. v. 26.

There is a difficulty made, from the punishment of this debtor for the very debt which had been forgiven, and the question has been asked, 'whether sins once remitted come back again.' But it is the spiritual meaning which has here ruled the form of the parable. He who falls from a state of grace falls into a state of condemnation, and is overwhelmed with 'all that debt,' not of this or that actual sin formerly remitted, but of a whole state of enmity to God.

Meyer well remarks, that the motive held up in this parable could only have full light cast on it by the great act of Atonement which the Lord was about to accomplish. We may see from that consideration, how properly it belongs to this last period of His ministry.

35.] my Father, not your Father, as in the similar declaration in ch. vi. 14, 15. This is more solemn and denunciatory, "for it is not seemly that God should be called the Father of such an one, so wicked and malicious." Chrysostom.

CHAP. XIX. 1–12.] REPLY TO THE PHARISEE'S QUESTION CONCERNING DIVORCE, Mark x. 1–12. This appears to be the journey of our Lord into the region beyond Jordan, mentioned John x. 40. If so, a considerable interval has elapsed since the discourse in ch. xviii.

1.] The borders of Judwa beyond Jordan forms one continuous description. Bethany, where He went, was beyond Jordan, but on the confines of Judaea. See notes on Mark x. 1, and Luke ix. 51.

2.] This agrees with what is said John x. 41, 42. For healed, St. Mark has taught.

3.] This was a question of dispute between the rival Rabbinical schools of Hillel and Shammai; the former asserting the right of arbitrary divorce, from Deut. xxiv. 1, the other denying it except in case of adultery. It was also, says De Wette, a delicate question in the place where our Lord now was,—in the dominions of Herod Antipas.

for every cause;—i. e. is any charge which a man may choose to bring against his wife to justify him in divorcing her?

4–6.] On these verses we may remark, (1) that our Lord refers to the Mosaic account of the Creation as the historical fact of the first creation of man; and grounds his argument on the literal expressions of that narrative.

(2) That He cites both from the first and second chapters of Genesis, and in immediate connexion; thus shewing them to be consecutive parts of a continuous narrative,—which, from their different diction, and apparent repetition, they have sometimes been supposed not to be.

(3) That he quotes as spoken by the Creator the words in Gen. ii. 24, which were actually said by Adam; they must therefore be understood as said in prophecy, by divine inspiration, which indeed the terms made use of in them would require, since the relations alluded to by those terms did not yet exist. As Augustine says, 'God said by man that which man foretold.'

(4) That the force of the argument consists in the previous unity of male and female, not indeed organically, but by implication, in Adam. Thus it is said in Gen. i, 27, He made them (man, as a race) male (not a male) and female (not, man and woman): but then the male and female were implicitly shut up in one; and therefore after the creation of woman from man, when one man and one woman were united in marriage they should be one flesh, because woman was taken out of man.

The answer then is, that abstractedly, from the nature of marriage, it is indissoluble. The words they twain are in the Septuagint and the Samaritan Pentateuch, but not in the Hebrew.

5. one flesh] Stier remarks, that the essential bond of marriage consists not in unity of spirit and soul, by which indeed the marriage state should ever be hallowed and sweetened, but without which it still exists in all its binding power:—the wedded pair are ONE FLESH, i.e. ONE MAN within the limits of their united life in the flesh, for this world: beyond this limit, the marriage is broken by the death of the flesh. And herein alone lies the justification of a second marriage, which in no way breaks off the unity of love in spirit with the former partner, now deceased.

7-9.] In this second question, the Pharisees imagine that they have overthrown our Lord's decision by a permission of the law, which they call a command (compare ver. 7 with ver. 8). But He answers them that this was done by Moses on account of their hardness and sinfulness, as a lesser of evils, and belonged to that dispensation which entered, Rom. v. 20; was added because of transgressions, Gal. iii. 19. This He expresses by the your and you, as opposed to the general terms used before. Only that fornication, which itself breaks marriage, can be a ground for dissolving it. The question, whether demonstrated approaches to fornication, short of the act itself, are to be regarded as having the same power, must be dealt with cautiously, but at the same time with full remembrance that our Lord does not confine the guilt of such sins to the outward act only: see ch. v. 28. St. Mark gives this last verse (9) as spoken to the disciples in the house; and his minute accuracy in such matters of detail is well known. This enactment by our Lord is a formal repetition of what He had said before in the Sermon on the Mount, ch. v. 32. Some expositors (principally modern) have fallen into the mistake of supposing that the dictum applies to the marrying a woman divorced on account of fornication. But the full English way of rendering the sentence, would be, a woman thus divorced, viz. not on account of fornication.

10.] the case, not the cause of divorce just mentioned; nor, the condition of the man with his wife: but the account to be given, 'the original ground and principle,' of the relationship of man and wife. The disciples apprehend that the trials and temptations of marriage would prove sources of sin and misery. This question and its answer are peculiar to Matthew.

11, 12.] this saying, viz. of yours. The for in ver. 12 shews that the sense is carried on.

Our Lord mentions the three exceptions, the to whom it is given not to marry. 1. Those who from natural incapacity, or if not that, inaptitude, have no tendencies towards marriage: 2. Those who by actual physical deprivation, or compulsion from men, are prevented from marrying: 3. Those who in order to do the work of God more effectually (as e.g. St. Paul), abstain from marriage, see 1 Gor. ii, 26. The eunuchs and made eunuchs in the two first cases are to be taken both literally and figuratively: in the latter, figuratively only. It is to be observed that our Lord does not here utter a word from which any superiority can be attributed to the state of celibacy: the imperative in the last clause being not a command but a permission, as in Rev. xxii. 17. His estimate for us of the expediency of celibacy, as a general question, is to be gathered from the parable of the talents, where He visits with severe blame the burying of the talent for its safer custody. The remark is Neander's, and the more valuable, as he himself lived and died unmarried.

13-15.] THE BRINGING OF CHILDREN TO JESUS. Mark x. 13-16. Luke xviii. 16-17. After the long divergence of ch. ix. 51—xviii. 14, Luke here again falls into the synoptic narrative. This incident is more fully related in Mark, where see notes.

Our Evangelist has that he should put his hands on them, and pray (see Gen. xlvi. 14: Acts vi. 6), where the other two have only 'that He should touch them.' The connexion in which it stands here and in Mark seems to be natural, immediately after the discourse on marriage. Some further remarks of our Lord, possibly on the fruit of marriage, may have given rise to the circumstance.

16-30.] ANSWER TO THE ENQUIRY OF A RICH YOUNG MAN, AND DISCOURSE THEREUPON. Mark x. 17-31. Luke xviii. 18-30.

16.] From Luke ver. 18 we learn that he was a ruler: from Mark ver. 17, that he ran to our Lord. The spirit in which he came,—which does not however appear here so plainly as in the other gospels, from the omission of "good," and the form of our Lord's answer,—seems to have been that of excessive admiration for Jesus as a man of eminent virtue, and of desire to know from Him by what work of exceeding merit he might win eternal life. This spirit He reprobates, by replying that there is but One Good, and that the walking by His grace in the way of holiness is the path to life. On the question and answer, as they stand in the received text,—and on their doctrinal bearing, see notes to Mark. This passage furnishes one of the most instructive and palpable cases of the smoothing down of apparent discrepancies by correcting the Gospels out of one another and thus reducing them to conformity.

18.] De Wette observes well, that our Lord gives this enumeration of the commandments to bring out the self-righteous spirit of the young man, which He before saw. He only mentions those of the second table, having in ver. 17, in His declaration respecting "good," included those of the first. Mark has the addition of "Defraud not," representing probably the tenth

19.] The addition of Thou shalt love&c. is peculiar to Matthew.

20.] We may remark that this young man, though self-righteous, was no Hypocrite, no Pharisee: he spoke earnestly, and really strove to keep, as he really believed he had kept, all God's commandments. Accordingly St. Mark adds, that Jesus looking upon him loved him: in spite of his error there was a nobleness and openness about him, contrasted with the hypocritical bearing of the Pharisees and Scribes.

21, 22.] Our Lord takes him on his own shewing. As St. Mark and St. Luke add, "One thing is wanting to thee." Supposing thy statement true, this topstone has yet to be laid on the fabric. But then it is to be noticed, that part of that one thing is Come and follow me (taking up thy cross, Mark). Stier remarks, that this was a test of his observance of the first commandment of the first table: of breaking which he is by the result convicted.

24.] Lightfoot brings instances from the Talmud of similar proverbial expressions regarding an elephant: we have a case in ch. xxiii. 24, of a camel being put for any thing very large: and we must remember that the object here was to set forth the greatest human impossibility, and to magnify divine grace, which could accomplish even that.

25.] Who, not What rich man, which would have been a far shallower and narrower enquiry, but a general question—what man?

Besides the usual reason given for this question, "since all are striving to be rich," we must remember that the disciples yet looked for a temporal Kingdom, and therefore would naturally be dismayed at hearing that it was so difficult for any rich man to enter it.

26. beheld them] Probably to give force to and impress what was about to be said, especially as it was a saying reaching into the spiritual doctrines of the Gospel, which they could not yet apprehend.

this, salvation in general, and even of those least likely to be saved.

with, in both cases, means, 'in the estimation of.'

27.] The disciples, or rather Peter speaking for them, recur to the "shalt have treasure in heaven" said to the young man, and enquire what their reward shall be, who have done all that was required of them. He does not ask respecting salvation, but some pre-eminent reward, as is manifest by the answer. The 'all' which the Apostles had left, was not in every case contemptible. The sons of Zebedee had hired servants (Mark i. 20), and Levi (Matthew?) could make a great feast in his house. But whatever it was, it was their all.

28–30.] We may admire the simple truthfulness of this answer of our Lord. He does not hide from them their reward: but tells them prophetically, that in the new world, the accomplishment of that regeneration which He came to bring in (see Acts iii. 21; Rev. xxi. 5; Matt. xxvi. 29), when He should sit on His throne of glory, then they also should sit (see in my Greek Test. on the peculiar force of the two different forms of the verb sit, as applied to our Lord, sitting on His throne as His own act, and to the Apostles, as being promoted to, and taking their seats on, their thrones, as the will of another) on twelve thrones judging (see ref. 1 Cor.) the twelve tribes of Israel (see Rev. xx. 4; xxi. 12, 14:—one throne, Judas's, another took, Acts i. 20). At the same time he informs them, ver. 29, that this reward should not in its most blessed particulars be theirs alone, but that of every one who should deny himself for Him (see 2 Tim. iv. 8): and (ver. 30) cautions them, referring perhaps especially to Judas, but with a view to all, as appears by the following parable, that many first should be last, and last first.

On ver. 29, Stier remarks that the family relations are mentioned by St. Matthew in the order in which they would be left. On the other points requiring notice, see note on Mark x. 29, 30.

CHAP. XX. 1–16.] PARABLE OF THE LABOURERS IN THE VINEYARD. Peculiar to Matthew. In interpreting this difficult Parable, we must first carefully observe its occasion and connexion. It is bound by the For to the conclusion of chap. xix., and arose out of the question of Peter in ver. 27, what shall we have therefore? (1) Its salient point is, that the Kingdom of God is of grace, not of debt; that they who were called first, and have laboured longest, have no more claim upon God than those who were called last: but that to all, His covenant promise shall be fulfilled in its integrity. (2) Its primary application is to the Apostles, who had asked the question. They were not to be of such a spirit, as to imagine, with the murmurers in ver. 11, that they should have something super-eminent (because they were called first, and had laboured longest) above those who in their own time were to be afterward called (see 1 Cor. xv. 8–11). (3) Its secondary applications are to all those to whom such comparison, of first and last called, will apply:—nationally, to the Jews, who were first called, and with a definite covenant, and the Heathens who came in afterwards, and on a covenant, though really made (see Jer. xxxi. 38; Zech. viii. 8; Heb. viii. 10), yet not so open and prominent:—individually, to those whose call has been in early life, and who have spent their days in God's active service, and those who have been summoned later; and to various other classes and persons between whom comparison, not only of time, but of advantages, talents, or any other distinguishing characteristic, can be made: that none of the first of these can boast themselves over the others, nor look for higher place and greater reward, inasmuch as there is but one “gift” of God according to the covenant of grace. And the “first” of these are to see that they do not by pride and self-righteousness become the “last,” or worse—be rejected, as nationally were the Jews; for among the many that are called, there are few chosen—many who will fail of the reward in the end. (4) In subordination to this leading idea and warning of the Parable must the circumstances brought before us be interpreted. The day and its hours are not any fixed time, such as the duration of the world, or our Lord's life on earth, or the life of man, exclusively: but the natural period of earthly work as applied to the various meanings of which the parable is capable. The various times of hiring are not to be pressed as each having an exclusive meaning in each interpretation: they serve to spread the calling over the various periods, and to shew that it is again and again made. They are the quarters of the natural day, when the aliquot parts of the day's wages could be earned, and therefore labourers would be waiting. The last of these is inserted for a special purpose, and belongs more expressly to the instruction of the parable. (5) The hire bears an important part in the interpretation. I cannot with Stier (whose comment on this le I think much inferior to his remarks) suppose it to mean “the promise of this life” attached to godliness. His anxiety to escape from the danger of eternal life being matter of wages, has here misled him. But there is no such danger in the interpretation of the parable which I believe to be the true one. The hire is the promise of the covenant, uniformly represented by our Lord and His Apostles as a ‘reward,’ Matt. v. 12; Luke vi. 85; xiv. 14; John iv. 86; 1 Cor. iii. 14; 2 John 8; Heb. x. 85; xi. 6 al., reckoned indeed of free grace: but still, forensically considered, answering to, and represented by, ‘wages,’ as claimed under God's covenant with man in Christ. (The freeness and sovereignty of God's gift of grace is pointedly set before us in ver. 14, It is my will to give&c.) This hire I believe then to be eternal life, or, in other words, GOD HIMSELF (John xvii. 3). And this, rightly understood, will keep us from the error of supposing, that the parable involves a declaration that all who are saved will be in an absolute equality. This gift is, and will be to each man, as he is prepared to receive it. To the envious and murmurers, it will be as the fruit that turned to ashes in the mouth: by their own unchristian spirit they will “lose the things that they have wrought” (2 John 8), and their reward will be null: in other words, they will, as the spiritual verity necessitates, not enter into that life to which they were called. God's covenant is fulfilled to them—they have received their denarius—but from the essential nature of the “hire” are disqualified from enjoying its use: for as Gregory the Great remarks, “the kingdom of heaven none who murmurs, inherits: none who inherits, can murmur.” To those who have known and loved God, it will be, to each, as he has advanced in the spiritual life, joy unspeakable and full of glory.

1, early in the morning] See Jer. xxxv. 14, and other places.

labourers] in the primary meanings of the parable, ‘apostles, prophets, ministers,’ distinct from the vines in the vineyard. But inasmuch as every workman is himself subject to the treatment of the husbandman (see John xv. 1, 2), and every man in the Kingdom of God is in some sense or other a worker on the rest, the distinction is not to be pressed—the parable ranges over both comparisons.

vineyard] not the Jewish church only, as Greswell, Parables, iv. 355 ff., maintains. The Jewish Church was God's vineyard especially and typically; His Church in all ages is His true vineyard, see John xv. 1.

2.] The denarius a day was the pay of a Roman soldier in Tiberius' time, a few years before this parable was uttered. Polybius (but in illustrating the exceeding fertility and cheapness of the country) mentions that the charge for a day's entertainment in the inns in Cisalpine Gaul was half an as, = 1/20th of the denarius. This we may therefore regard as liberal pay for the day's work.

3, 4] The third hour, at the equinox our 9 a.m., and in summer 8, was sometimes called “the height of the market,”—when the market was fullest.

“The market-place of the world is contrasted with the vineyard of the Kingdom of God: the greatest man of business in worldly things is a mere idle gazer, if he has not yet entered on the true work which alone is worth any thing or gains any reward.” Stier.

No positive stipulation is made with these second, but they are to depend on the justice of the house-holder. They might expect 3/4ths of a denarius. From the same dialogue being implied at the sixth and ninth hour (“he did likewise”) the “whatsoever is right” is probably in each case the corresponding part of the denarius, at least in their expectation; so that it cannot be said that no covenant was made.

8.] By the Mosaic law (Deut. xxiv. 15) the wages of an hired servant were to be paid him before night. This was at the twelfth hour, or sunset: see ver. 12. I do not think the steward must be pressed as having a spiritual meaning. If it has, it represents Christ (see Heb. iii. 6, and ch. xi. 27).

beginning is not merely expletive, but definite, as in Luke xxiii. 5.

13, 14.] Friend, at first sight a friendly word merely, assumes a more solemn aspect when we recollect that it is used in ch. xxii. 12 to the guest who had not the wedding garment; and in ch. xxvi. 50 by our Lord to Judas.

go thy way hardly denotes (as Stier in his 1st edn.) expulsion and separation from the householder and his employment: it is here only a word of course, commanding him to do what a paid labourer naturally should do.

15. evil] here envious: so also Prov. xxviii. 22.

16.] The last were first, as equal to the first; first, in order of payment; first, as superior to the first (no others being brought into comparison), in that their reward was more in proportion to their work, and not married by a murmuring spirit. The first were last in these same respects.

The last words of the verse belong not so much to the parable, as to the first clause, and are placed to account for its being as there described; for, while multitudes are called into the vineyard, many, by murmuring and otherwise disgracing their calling, will nullify it, and so, although first by profession and standing, will not be of the number of the elect: although called, will not be chosen. In ch. xxiii. 14 the reference is different.

17–19.] Mark x. 32–34. Luke xviii. 31–34. FULLER DECLARATION OF HIS SUFFERINGS AND DEATH—revealing His being delivered to the Gentiles—and (but in Matthew only) His crucifixion. See the note on the more detailed account in Mark.

20–28.] AMBITIOUS REQUEST OF THE MOTHER OF THE SONS OF ZEBEDEE; OUR LORD'S REPLY. Mark x. 35–45; not related by Luke. This request seems to have arisen from the promise made to the twelve in ch. xix. 28. In Mark's account, the two brethren themselves make the request. But the narration in the text is the more detailed and exact; and the two immediately coincide, by our Lord addressing His answer to the two Apostles (ver. 22). The difference is no greater than is perpetually to be found in narrations of the same fact, persons being often related to have done themselves what, accurately speaking, they did by another. The mother's name was Salome;—she had followed our Lord from Galilee,—and afterwards witnessed the crucifixion, see Mark xv. 40. Probably the two brethren had directed this request through their mother, because they remembered the rebuke which had followed their former contention about precedence.

21.] The places close to the throne were those of honour, as in Josephus, where speaking of Saul, he describes Jonathan his son as seated on his right hand, and Abner the captain of the host on his left. In a Rabbinical work, it is said, that God will seat the King Messiah at his right hand, and Abraham at his left.

One of these brethren, John, the beloved disciple, had his usual place close to the Lord, John xiii. 23: the other was among the chosen Three (this request hardly can imply in their minds any idea of the rejection of Peter from his peculiar post of honour by the rebuke in ch. xvi. 23, for since then had happened the occurrences in ch. xvii. 1–8, and especially ib. vv. 24–27). Both were called Boanerges, or the sons of thunder, Mark iii. 17.

They thought the Kingdom of God was immediately to appear, Luke xix. 11.

22.] One at least of these brethren saw the Lord on His Cross—on His right and hand the crucified thieves. Bitter indeed must the remembrance of this ambitious prayer have been at that moment! Luther remarks, ‘The flesh ever seeks to be glorified, before it is crucified: exalted, before it is abased.’

The ‘cup’ is a frequent Scripture image for joy or sorrow: see Ps. xxiii. 5; cxvi. 13: Isa. li. 22: Matt. xxvi. 42. It here seems to signify more the inner and spiritual bitterness, resembling the agony of the Lord Himself,—and the baptism, which is an important addition in Mark, more the outer accession of persecution and trial,—through which we must pass to the Kingdom of God. On the latter image see Ps. xlvi. 7; lxix. 2; oxxiv. 4

Stier rightly observes that this answer of our Lord contains in it the kernel of the doctrine of the Sacraments in the Christian Church: see Rom. vi. 1–7: 1 Cor. xii. 18, and note on Luke xii. 50.

Some explain in their answer as if they understood the Lord to speak of drinking out of the royal cup, and washing in the royal ever: but the words are ye able to drink, and we are able, indicating a difficulty, preclude this.

23.] The one of these brethren was the first of the Apostles to drink the cup Of suffering, and be baptized with the baptism of blood, Acts xii. 1, 2: the other had the longest experience among them of a life of trouble and persecution.

The last clause of the verse may be understood as in the text, ‘is not mine to give, but it shall be given to them for whom it is prepared of my Father;’ So Meyer, al.; or, ‘is not mine to give, except to those for whom,’ &. So Chrysostom and others. If however we understand after but ‘it shall be given by Me,’ the two interpretations come to the same.

26–28.] great.... first, i.e. in the next life, let him be minister and servant here. Thus also the came, ver. 28, applies to the coming of the Son of man in the flesh only.

a ransom for many, is a plain declaration of the sacrificial and vicarious nature of the death of our Lord. The principal usages (in the Greek Scriptures) of the word rendered ransom are the following:—(1) a payment as equivalent for a life destroyed; (2) the price of redemption of a slave; (3) ‘propitiation for.’

many here is equivalent to “all” 1 Tim. ii. 6. No stress is to be laid on this word “many” as not being “all” here; it is placed in opposition to the one life which is given—the one for many—and not with any distinction from “all.” (I may observe once for all, that in the usage of these two words, as applied to our redemption by Christ, “all” is the OBJECTIVE, “many” the SUBJECTIVE designation of those for whom Christ died. He died for all, as outward matter of fact; but as matter of individual participation, the great multitude ‘whom no man can number, “many,” will be the saved by Him in the end.) ‘As the Son of man came to give His life for many and to serve many, so ye, being many, should be to each one the object of service and self-denial.’

29–34] HEALING OF TWO BLIND MEN ON HIS DEPARTURE FROM JERICHO. Mark x. 46–52. Luke xviii. 35–43; xix. 1, with however some remarkable differences. In the much more detailed account of St. Mark, we have but one blind man, mentioned by name as Bartimaeus; St. Luke also relates it of only one, and besides says that it was “as he was come nigh to Jericho.” The only fair account of such differences is, that they existed in the sources from which each Evangelist took his narrative. This later one is easily explained, from the circumstance having happened close to Jericho—in two accounts, just on leaving it—in the third, on approaching to it: but he must be indeed a slave the the letter, who would stumble at such discrepancies, and not rather see in them the corroborating coincidence of testimonies to the fact itself. Yet some strangely suppose our Lord to have healed one blind man (as in Luke) on entering Jericho, and another (Bartimaeus, as in Mark) on leaving it,—and St. Matthew to have, ‘with his characteristic brevity in relating miracles,’ combined both these in one. But then, what becomes of St. Matthew’s assertion, “as they departed from Jericho?” Can we possibly imagine, that the Evangelist, having both facts before him, could combine them and preface them with what he must know to be inaccurate? It is just thus that the Harmonists utterly destroy the credibility of the Scripture narrative. Accumulate upon this the absurd improbabilities involved in two men, under the same circumstances, addressing our Lord in the same words at so short an interval,—and we may be thankful that biblical criticism is at length being emancipated from ‘forcing narratives into accordance.’ See notes on Mark.

JERICHO, 150 stadia (18 rom. miles) N.E. of Jerusalem (Jos. B.J. iv. 8 3), and 60 (7. 2 rom. miles) w. from the Jordan (Jos. ibid.), in the tribe of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 21), near the borders of Ephraim (Josh. xvi. 7). The environs were like an oasis surrounded by high and barren limestone mountains,—well watered and fertile, rich in palm-trees (Deut. xxxiv. 8: Judg. i. 16; iii. 18), roses (Eccl. xxiv. 14), and balsam (Jos. Antt. iv. 6. 1 al.). After its destruction by Joshua, its rebuilding was prohibited under a curse (Josh. vi. 26) which was incurred by Hiel the Bethelite in the days of Ahab (1 Kings xvi. 84): ie. he fortified it, for it was an inhabited city before (see Judg. iii. 18: 2 Sem. x. 5). We find it the seat of a school of the prophets, 2 Kings ii. 4 ff. After the captivity we read of it, Ezra ii. 34; Neh. vii. 36: and in 1 Macc. ix. 50 we read that Jonathan strengthened its fortifications. It was much embellished by Herod the Great, who had a palace there (Jos. Antt. xvi. 5. 2 al.), and at this time was one of the principal cities of Palestine, and the residence of a chief publication on account of the balsam trade (Luke xix. 1). At present there is on or near the site only a miserable village, Richa or Ericha.

30, 31.] The multitude appear to have silenced them, lest they should be wearisome and annoying to our Lord; not because they called Him the Son of David,—for the multitudes could have no reason for repressing this cry, seeing that they themselves (being probably for the most part the same persons who entered Jerusalem with Jesus) raised it very soon after: see ch. xxi. 9. I have before noticed (on ch. ix. 27) the singular occurrence of these words, ‘Son of David,’ in the three narratives of healing the blind in this Gospel.

32.] called them = (literally) “said, call ye him” Mark, “commanded him to be brought” Luke.

34.] touched their eyes, not mentioned in the other Gospels. In both we have the addition of the Lord’s saying, “thy faith hath saved thee.” The question preceding was to elicit their faith.

CHAP. XXI. 1–17.] TRIUMPHAL ENTRY INTO JERUSALEM: CLEANSING OF THE TEMPLE. Mark xi. 1–11, 16. Luke xix. 29–44. John. xii. 12–36. This occurrence is related by all four Evangelists, with however some differences, doubtless easily accounted for, if we knew accurately the real detail of the circumstances in chronological order. In John (xii. 1),—our Lord came six days before the Passover to Bethany, where the anointing (of Matt. xxvi. 6–13) took place: and on the morrow, the triumphal entry into Jerusalem was made. According to Mark xi. 11,—on the day of the triumphal entry He only entered the city, went to the temple, and looked about on all things,—and then, when now it was late in the evening, returned to Bethany, and on the morrow the cleaning of the temple took place. The account in Luke, which is the fullest and most graphic of the four, agrees chronologically with that in the text.

I would venture to suggest, that the supposition of the triumphal entry in Mark being related a day too soon, will bring all into unison. If this be so, our Lord's first entry into Jerusalem was private: probably the journey was interrupted by a short stay at Bethany, so that He did not enter the city with the multitudes. That this was the fact, seems implied in Mark xi. 11. Then it was that, "when He had looked round about upon all things," He noticed the abuse in the temple, which next day He corrected. Then in the evening He went back with the twelve to Bethany, and the supper there, and anointing, took place. Meantime the Jews (John xii. 9) knew that he was at Bethany; and many went there that evening to see Him and Lazarus. (Query, had not Lazarus followed Him to Ephraim?) Then on the morrow multitudes came out to meet Him, and the triumphal entry took place, the weeping over the city (Luke xix. 41), and the cleansing of the temple. The cursing of the fig-tree occurred early that morning, as He was leaving Bethany with the twelve, and before the multitude met Him or the aases were sent for. (On Matthew's narrative of this event see below on ver. 18.) According to this view, our narrative omits the supper at Bethany, and the anointing (in its right place), and passes to the events of the next day. On the day of the week when this entry happened, see note on John xii, 1,

1. Behphagé = Heb. the house of figs: a considerable suburb, nearer to Jerusalem than Bethany, and sometimes reckoned part of the city. No trace of it now remains: see "The Land and the Book," p. 697.

2, 3] The village over against you, i.e. Bethphagé. Mark and Luke mention the colt only, adding "wheroon never yet man sat" (see note on Mark): John "a young ass." Justin Martyr connects this verse with the prophecy in Gen. xl ix. 11.

The Lord, here, 'the LORD, Jehovah: most probably a general intimation to the owners, that they were wanted for the service of God. I cannot see how this interpretation errs against decorum, as Stier asserts. The meanest animals might be wanted for the service of the Lord Jehovah. And after all, what difference is there as to decorum, if we understand with him "the Lord" to signify "the King Messiah?" The two disciples were perhaps Peter and John: compare Mark xiv. 13 and Luke xxii. 8.

4.] A formula of our Evangelist's (see ch. i, 22), spoken with reference to the divine counsels, but not to the intention of the doors of the act; for this application of prophecy is in John xii. 16 distinctly said not to have occurred to the disciples at the time, but after Jesus was glorified.

6, 7.] In Mark, "they found the colt tied by the door without, in a place where two ways met." Our Lord sat on the foal (Mark, Luke), and the mother accompanied, apparently after the manner of a sumpter, as prophets so riding would be usually accompanied (but not of course doing the work of a sumpter). That this riding and entry were intentional on the part of our Lord, is clear: and also that He did not thereby mean to give any countenance to the temporal ideas of His Messiahship, but solemnly to fulfil the Scriptures respecting Him, and to prepare the way for His sufferings, by a public avowal of His mission. The typical meaning also is not to be overlooked. In all probability the evening visit to the temple was on the very day when the Paschal Lamb was to be taken up—i. e. set apart for the sacrifice.

8, 9.] Which was a royal honour: see 2 Kings ix. 13.

Hosanna] from Psalm cxviii. 25; = "save now," a formula originally of supplication, but conventionally of gratulation, so that it is followed by "to&c." and by "in the highest," meaning, "may it be in heaven!" see 1 Kings i. 36: Luke ii. 14, where however it is an assertion, not a wish. Luke has "the king that cometh," John "the king of Israel that cometh."

12.] Compare the notes on John ii. 13–18. The cleansing related in our text is totally distinct from that related there. It is impossible to suppose that St. Matthew or St. John, or any one but moderately acquainted with the events which he undertook to relate, should have made such a gross error in chronology, as must be laid to the charge of one or other of them, if these two occurrences were the same. I rather view the omission of the first in the synoptic accounts as in remarkable consistency with what we otherwise gather from the three Gospels—that their narrative is exclusively Galilean (with one exception, Luke iv. 44 in our text), until this last journey to Jerusalem, and consequently the first cleansing is passed over by them. On the difference from Mark, see note on ver. 1. Both coming of Jehovah to His temple were partial fulfilments of Mal. iii. 1–3,—which shall not receive its final accomplishment till His great and decisive visit at the latter day. The temple here spoken of was the court of the Gentiles.

We have no traces of this market in the O.T. It appears to have first arisen after the captivity, when many would come from foreign lands to Jerusalem. This would also account for the money-changers, as it was unlawful (from Exod. xxx. 18) to bring foreign money for the offering of atonement.

dovés] the poor were allowed to offer these instead of the lambs for a trespass-offering, Lev. v. 7; also for the purification of women, Lev. xii. 8: Luke ii. 24.

13.] Stier remarks that the verse quoted from Jeremiah is in connexion with the charge of murder, and the shedding of innocent blood (see Jer. vii. 6). On the intention of this act of our Lord, see notes on John ii. 15. It was a purely Messianic act; see Mal. iii. 1–3.

15, 16.] The circumstance that the children were crying ‘Hosanna to the Son of David’ in the temple, seems to me to fix this event, as above, on the of the triumphal entry.

Psalm viii. is frequently cited in the N.T. of Christ: see 1 Cor. xv. 27: Heb. ii. 6: Eph. i. 22. In understanding such citations as this, and that in ver. 4, we must bear in mind the important truth, that the external fulfilment of a prophecy is often itself only a type and representation of that inner and deeper sense of the prophecy which belongs to the spiritual dealings of God.

17.] If this is to be literally understood of the village (and not of a district round it, including part of the Mount of Olives; see Luke xxi. 37), this will be the second night spent at Bethany. I would rather of the two understand it literally, and that the spending the nights on the Mount of Olives did not begin till the next night (Tuesday).

18–22.] THE CURSE OF THE BARREN FIG-TREE. Mark xi. 12–14, 20–26, where see notes, St. Luke omits the incident.

The cursing of the fig-tree had in fact taken place on the day before, and the withering of it was now noticed. St. Mark separates the two accounts, which are here given together. We must remember that this miracle was wholly typical and parabolical. The fig-tree was THE JEWISH PEOPLE—full of the leaves of an useless profession, but without fruit:—and further, all hypocrites of every kind, in every age. It is true, as De Wette observes, that no trace of a parabolic meaning appears in the narrative (and yet strangely enough, he himself a few lines after, denying the truth of the miracle, accounts for the narrative by supposing it to have arisen out of a parable spoken by our Lord); but neither does there in that of the driving out the buyers and sellers from the temple, and in those of many other actions which we know to have been symbolic.

19.] one fig tree, i.e. a solitary fig-tree. It was the practice to plant fig-trees by the road-side, because it was thought that the dust, by absorbing the exuding sap, was conducive to the production of the fruit.

21, 22.] This assurance has occurred before in ch. xvii. 20. That truest and highest faith, which implies a mind and will perfectly in unison with that of God, can, even in its least degree, have been in Him only who spoke these words. And by it, and its elevating power over the functions and laws of inferior natures we may reverently believe that His most notable miracles were wrought. It is observable, that such a state of mind entirely precludes the idea of an arbitrary exercise of power—none such can therefore be intended in our Lord’s assertion—but we must understand,—“if expedient.” Though we cannot reach this faith in its fulness, yet every approach to it (ver. 21) shall be endowed with some of its wonderful power,—in obtaining requests from God. See the remarkable and important addition in Mark xi. 25, 26.

23–32.] Mark xi. 27–83. Luke xx. 1–8. OUR LORD’S AUTHORITY QUESTIONED. HIS REPLY. Now commences that series of parables, and discourses of our Lord with his enemies, in which He develops more completely than ever before his hostility to their hypocrisy and iniquity:—and so they are stirred up to compass His death.

23. the chief priests and the elders of the people St. Mark and St. Luke add the scribes, and so make up the members of the Sanhedrim. It was an official message, sent with a view to make our Saviour declare Himself to be a prophet sent from God—in which case the Sanhedrim had power to take cognizance of His proceedings, as of a professed Teacher."Thus the Sanhedrim sent a deputation to John on his appearing as a Teacher, John i. 19. The question was the result of a combination to destroy Jesus, Luke xix. 47, 48. They do not now ask, as in John ii. 18, What sign shewest Thou unto us, seeing thou doest these things? for they had had many signs, which are now included in their “these things.” The second question is an expansion of the first.

25.] The baptism, meaning thereby the whole office and teaching, of which the baptism was the central point and seal. If they had recognized the heavenly mission of John, they must have also acknowledged the authority by which Jesus did these things, for John expressly declared that he was sent to testify of Him, and bore witness to having seen the Holy Spirit descend and rest upon Him. John i. 33, 34.

believe him, ‘give credit to his words:’ ‘for those words were testimonies to Me.’

26, 27.] These ‘blind leaders of the blind’ had so far made an insincere concession to the people’s persuasion, as to allow John to pass for a prophet; but they shrunk from the reproof which was sure to follow their acknowledging it now. This consultation among themselves is related almost verbatim by the three Evangelists. The intelligence of it may have been originally derived from Nicodemus or Joseph of Arimathaea. The neither tell I you of our Lord is an answer, not to their outward words, “we cannot tell,” but to their inward thoughts, “we will not tell.”

28.] But what think ye? a formula of connexion—but doubtless here intended to help the questioners to the true answer of their difficulty about John’s baptism. The following parable (peculiar to Matthew) refers, under the image of the two sons, to two classes of persons, both summoned by the great Father to “work in His vineyard” (s00 ch. xx. 1); both Jews, and of His family. The first answer the summons by a direct and open refusal—these are the open sinners, the publicans and harlots, who disobey God to His face. But afterwards, when better thoughts are suggested, they repent, and go. The second class receive the summons with a respectful assent (not unaccompanied with a self-exaltation and contrast to the other, implied in the emphatic I, sir)—having however no intention of obeying (there is no mention of a change of mind in this case): but go not. These are the Scribes and Pharisees, with their shew of legal obedience, who “said, and did not” (ch. xxiii. 3). It will of course admit of wider applications—to Jews and Heathens, or any similar pair of classes who may thus be compared.

31.] The go.... before you may be taken either as declarative—go before you, in the matter of God’s arrangements,—or as assertive of the mere matter of fact, are going before you. I prefer this latter on account of the explanation following:—‘go before,’—not entirely without hope for you, that you may follow, but not necessarily implying your following. The door of mercy was not yet shut fo them: see John xii. 35: Luke xxiii. 34. The idea of ‘shewing the way’ by being their example, is also included. There were publicans among the disciples, and probably repentant harlots among the women who followed the Lord.

32.] in the way of righteousness, not only in the way of God’s commandments, so often spoken of, but in the very path of ascetic purity which you so much approve; yet perhaps it were better to let the simpler sense here be the predominant one, and take righteousness for ‘repentance,’ as Noah is called a preacher of righteousness (2 Pet. ii. 5) in similar circumstances.

repent afterward are words repeated from the parable (ver. 29), and serving to fasten the application on the hearers.

33–46.] PARABLE OF THE VINEYARD LET OUT TO HUSBANDMEN. Mark xii. 1–12. Luke xx. 9–19. This parable is in intimate connexion with Isa. v. 1 ff., and was certainly intended by our Lord as an express application of that passage to the Jews of His time. Both St. Mark and St. Luke open it with a “began to speak...,” as a fresh beginning, by our Lord, of a series of parables. St. Luke adds, that it was spoken to the people. Its subject is, of course, the continued rejection of God’s prophets by the people of Israel, till at last they rejected and killed His only Son. The householder planted a vineyard: i.e. ‘selected it out of all His world, and fenced it in, and dug a receptacle for the juice (in the rock or ground, to keep it cool, into which it flowed from the press above, through a grated opening), and built a tower (of recreation—or observation to watch the crops).’ This exactly coincides with the state of the Jewish nation, under covenant with God as His people. All these expressions are in Isaiah V. The letting out to husbandmen was probably that kind of letting where the tenant pays his rent in kind, although the fruits may be understood of money. God began about 430 years after the Exodus to send His prophets to the people of Israel, and continued even till John the Baptist; but all was in vain; they “persecuted the prophets,” casting them out and putting them to death. (See Neh. ix. 26. Matt. xxiii. 31, 37: Heb. xi. 36–38.)

The different sendings must not be pressed; they probably imply the fulness and sufficiency of warnings given, and set the longsuffering of the Householder; and the increasing rebellion of the husbandmen is shewn by their increasing ill-treatment of the messengers.

37.] See Luke ver. 18: Mark ver. 6. Our Lord sets forth His heavenly Father in haman wise deliberating, “What shall I do?” (Luke) and “it may be they will reverence him,” to signify His gracious adoption, for man’s sake, of every means which may turn sinners to repentance. The difference here is fully made between the Son and all the other messengers; see Mark,—“having yet therefore one Son, his wellbeloved...” and, as Stier remarks, this is the real and direct answer to the question in ver. 23. The Son appears here, not in his character of Redeemer, but in that of a preacher—a messenger demanding the fruits

38. This is] So Nicodemus, John iii. 2, “we know that thou art a teacher come from God,” even at the beginning of His ministry; how much more then after three years spent in His divine working. The latent consciousness that Jesus was the Messiah, expressed in the prophecy of Caiaphas (John xi. 49–62, compare the Thou hast said of our ch. xxvi. 64), added no doubt to the guilt of the Jewish rulers in rejecting and crucifying Him, however this consciousness may have been accompanied with ignorance of one kind or other in all of them,—see Acts iii. 17 and note.

the heir] This the Son is in virtue of His human nature: see Heb. i. 1, 2.

come, let us kill him] The very words of Gen. xxxvii. 20, where Joseph’s brethren express a similar resolution: and no doubt used by the Lord in reference to that history, so deeply typical of His rejection and exaltation. This resolution had actually been taken, see John xi. 53: and that immediately after the manifestation of His power as the Son of God in the raising of Lazarus, and also immediately after Caiaphas’s prophecy.

let us seize] See John xi. 48. As far as this, the parable is History: from this point, Prophecy.

39.] This is partly to be understood of our Lord being given up to the heathen to be judged; but also literally, as related by all three Evangelists. See also John xix. 17, and Heb. xiii. 11, 12. In Mark the order is different, “they killed him, and cast him out Of the vineyard.”

40, 41.] See Isa. v. 5. All means had been tried, and nothing; but judgment was now left. St. Mark and St. Luke omit the important words they say unto him, though St. Luke has given us the key to them, in telling us that the parable was spoken in the hearing of the people, who seem to have made the answer. Perhaps however the Pharisees may have made this answer, having missed, or pretended to miss, the sense of the parable; but from the strong language used, I incline to the former view. Whichever said it, it was a self-condemnation, similar to that in ch. xxvii. 25: the last form, as Nitzsch finely remarks (cited by Stier), of the divine warnings to men, ‘when they themselves speak of the deeds which they are about to do, and pronounce judgment upon them.’ So striking, even up to the last moment, is the mysterious union of human free-will with divine foresight (see Acts ii. 23: Gen. 1. 20), that after all other warnings frustrated, the conscience of the sinner himself interposes to save him from ruin. In the original the adverb rendered “miserably” is that belonging to the adjective rendered “wicked.” This could hardly be given in a version in English: it may be represented by some such expression as, “He will destroy them wretchedly, wretches as they are.”

The which, applied to persons, is not equivalent to who: it means, of a kind, who: “who” would identify, “which” classifies. They do not specify who, but only of what sort, the new tenants will be. The clause is peculiar to Matthew. We may observe that our Lord here makes when the lord... cometh coincide with the destruction of Jerusalem, which is uncontestedly the overthrow of the wicked husbandmen. This passage forms therefore an important key to our Lord’s prophecies, and a decisive justification for those who, like myself, firmly hold that the coming of the Lord is in many places to be identified, primarily, with that overthrow.

42.] A citation from the same Psalm of triumph from which the multitudes had taken their Hosannas. This verse is quoted with the same signification in Acts iv. 11: 1 Pet. ii. 6, 7, where also the cognate passage Isa. xxvii. 16 is quoted, as in Rom. ix. 33. The builders answer to the husbandmen, and the addition is made in this changed similitude to shew them that though they might reject and kill the Son, yet He would be victorious in the end.

the head of the corner] The corner-stone binds together both walls of the building; so Christ unites Jews and Gentiles in Himself. See the comparison beautifully followed into detail, Eph. ii. 20–22.

On maryellowes in our eyes, compare Acts iv. 13, 14.

43.] Our Lord here returns to the parable, and more plainly than ever before announces to them their rejection by God. The vineyard is now the kingdom of God. The nation here spoken of is not the Gentiles in general, but the Church of the truly Faithful,—the “holy nation, peculiar people” of 1 Pet. ii. 9: see Acts xv. 14, 44.] A reference to Isa. viii. 14, 15, and Dan. ii. 44, and a plain identification of the stone there mentioned with that in Ps. cxviii. The stone is the whole kingdom and power of the Messiah summed up in Himself.

he that hath fallen....] he that takes offence, that makes it a stone of stumbling, (or perhaps, he that is superimposed on it, as a stone in the building: but not so probably, as the breaking would want due interpretation,) shall be broken: see Luke ii. 34: but on whomsoever, as its enemy, it shall come in vengeance, as prophesied in Daniel, it shall dash him in pieces. Meyer maintains that the meaning of the word is not this, but literally ‘shall winnow him,’ throw him off as chaff. But the confusion thus occasioned in the parable is quite unnecessary. The result of winnowing is complete separation and dashing away of the worthless part: and it is surely far better to understand this result as the work of the falling of the stone, than to apply the words to a part of the operation for which the falling of a stone is so singularly unsuited.

45, 46.] All three Evangelists have this addition. St. Mark besides says "and they left him and went their way," answering to our ch. xxii. 22. Supposing St. Mark's insertion of these words to be in the precise place, we have the following parable spoken to the people and disciples: see below.

CHAP. XXII. 1–14.] PARABLE OF THE MARRIAGE OF THE KING' S SON. Peculiar to Matthew. A parable resembling this in several particulars occurs in Luke xiv. 15–24, yet we must not hastily set it down as the same. Many circumstances are entirely different: the locality and occasion of delivery different, and in both cases stated with precision. And the difference in the style of the parables is correspondent to the two periods of their utterance. That in Luke is delivered earlier in our Lord's ministry, when the enmity of the Pharisees had yet not fully manifested itself: the refusal of the guests is more courteous, their only penalty, exclusion;—here they maltreat the servants, and are utterly destroyed. This binds the parable in close connexion with that of the wicked husbandmen in the last chapter, and with this period of our Lord's course.

2.] The householder of the former parable is the KING here, who makes a marriage for his Son. The word thus rendered not always necessarily "a marriage," but any great celebration, as accession to the throne, or coming of age, &c. Here however the notion of a marriage is certainly included; and the interpretation is, the great marriage supper (Rev. xix. 9) of the Son of God: i.e. His full and complete union to His Bride the Church in glory: which would be to the guests the ultimate result of accepting the invitation. See Eph. v. 25–27. The difficulty, of the totality of the guests in this case constituting the Bride, may be lessened by regarding the ceremony as an enthronization, in which the people are regarded as being espoused to their prince. On the whole imagery, compare Ps. xlv.

3.] These servants are not the prophets, not the same as the servants in ch. xxi. 34, as generally interpreted:—the parable takes up its ground nearly from the conclusion of that former, and is altogether a New Testament parable. The office of these servants was to summon those who had been invited, as was customary (see Esth. v. 8 and vi. 14); these being the Jewish people, who had been before, by their prophets and covenant, invited. These first servants are then the first messengers of the Gospel,—John the Baptist, the Twelve, and the Seventy,—who preached, saying 'The Kingdom of heaven at hand.' And even our Lord Himself must in some sort be here included, inasmuch as He took the form of a servant, and preached this same truth, with however the weighty addition of Come unto Me.

4.] We now come to a different period of the Evangelic announcement. Now, all is ready: the sacrifice, or the meat for the feast, is slain. We can hardly help connecting this with the declarations of our Lord in John vi. 51–59, and supposing that this second invitation is the preaching of the Apostles and Evangelists after the great sacrifice was offered. That thus the slaying of the Lord is not the doing of the invited, but is mentioned as done for the Feast, is no real difficulty. Both sides of the truth may be included in the parable, as they are in Acts ii. 23, and indeed wherever it is set forth. The discourse of Peter in that chapter is the best commentary on "all things are ready, come to the marriage." The meal designated is not that which we understand by dinner, but the meal at noon, with which the course of marriage festivities began. This will give even greater precision to the meaning of the parable as applying to these preparatory foretastes of the great feast, which the Church of God now enjoys. As the former parable had an O.T. foundation, so this: viz. Prov. ix. 1 ff.

5, 6.] Two classes are here represented: the irreligious and careless people (notice his own farm, bringing out the selfish spirit), and the rulers, who persecuted and slew God's messengers. Stephen,—James the brother of John, James the Just, and doubtless other of the Apostles, of whose end we have no certain account, perished by the hands or instigation of the Jews: they persecuted Paul all through his life, and most probably brought him to his death at last: and the guilt of the death of the Lord abode upon them (ch. xxvii. 25). They repeatedly insulted and scourged the Apostles (see Acts iv. 3; v. 18, 40).

7.] The occurrence of this verse before the opening of the Feast to the Gentiles has perplexed some interpreters: but it is strictly exact: for although the Gospel was preached to the Gentiles forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem, yet the final rejection of the Jews and the substitution of the Gentiles did not take till that event.

his armies] The Roman armies; a similar expression for the unconscious instruments of God's anger is used Isa. x. 5; xiii. 5: Jer. xxv. 9: Joel ii. 25.

their city] no longer His, but their city. Compare your house, ch. xxiii. 38. This is a startling introduction of the interpretation into the parable; we knew not before that they had a city.

8–10.] On not worthy, see Acts xiii. 46.

were: the past tense passes them by as done with. The highways here spoken of are the places of resort at the meetings of streets, the squares, or confluences of ways. De Wette and Meyer are wrong in saying that they are not in the city, ‘for that was destroyed’; it is not the city of the murderers, but that in which the feast is supposed to be held, which is spoken of: not Jerusalem, but God’s world.

bad and good] Both the open sinners and the morally good together. See ch. xiii. 47, where the net collects of every kind. Stier remarks, that we might expect, from ch. xxi. 31, to find the guest who by and by is expelled, among the good. Here, so to speak, the first act of the parable closes; and here is the situation of the Church at this day;—collected out of all the earth, and containing both bad and good.

11, 12.] This second part of the parable is in direct reference to the word of prophecy, Zeph. i. 7, 8: “The Lord hath prepared a sacrifice, he hath bid his guests. And it shall come to pass in the day of the Lord’s sacrifice, that I will punish.... all such as are clothed with strange apparel.” The coming of the King to see his guests is the final and separating Judgment of the Church, see ch. xxv. 19,—when that distinction shall be made, which God’s ministers have no power nor right to make in admissions into the visible Church. Yet as Trench remarks (Parables, p. 207), this coming of the King is not exclusively the final one, but every trying and sifting judgment adumbrates it in some measure.

With regard to the wedding garment, we must not, I think, make too much of the usually cited Oriental custom of presenting the guests with such garments at feasts. For (1) it is not distinctly proved that such a custom existed; the passages usually quoted (Gen. xiv. 22: Judg. xiv. 12: 2 Kings v. 22) are nothing to the purpose; 2 Kings x. 22 shews that the worshippers of Baal were provided with vestments, and at a feast: and at the present day those who are admitted to the presence of Royalty in the East are clothed with a caftan: but all this does not make good the assumption: and (2) even granting it, it is not to be pressed, as being manifestly not the salient point of this part of the parable. The guest was bound to provide himself with this proper habit, out of respect to the feast and its Author: how this was to be provided, does not here appear, but does elsewhere. The garment is the imputed and inherent righteousness of the Lord Jesus, put on symbolically in Baptism (Gal. iii. 27), and really by a true and living faith (ib. ver. 26),—without which none can appear before God in His Kingdom of glory;—Heb. xii. 14: Phil. iii. 7, 8: Eph. iv. 24: Col. iii. 10: Rom. xiii. 14:—which truth could not be put forward here, but at its subsequent manifestation threw its great light over this and other such similitudes and expressions. This guest imagines his own garment will be as acceptable, and therefore neglects to provide himself. See 1 John v. 10: Isa. lxiv. 6; lxi. 10: Rev. xix. 8.

13, 14.] These servants (diaconoi, ministers) are not the same as the above, but the angels, see ch. xiii. 41, 49. The ‘binding of his feet and hands’ has been interpreted of his being now in the night, in which no man can work; but I doubt whether this be not too fanciful. Rather should we say, with Meyer, that it is to render his escape from the outer darkness impossible. In ver. 14 our Lord shews us that this guest, thus single in the parable, is, alas, to be the representative of a numerous class in the visible Church, who although sitting down as guests before His coming, have not on the wedding garment.

15–22.] REPLY CONCERNING THE LAWFULNESS OF TRIBUTE TO CÆSAR. Mark xii. 13–17. Luke xx. 20–26. On the Herodians, see above, ch. xvi. 6. By the union of these two hostile parties they perhaps thought that the “spies” or “suborned persons” (Luke), who were to feign themselves honest men, Luke xx. 20, would be more likely to deceive our Lord. For this also is their flattery here designed. ‘The devil never lies so foully, as when he speaks the truth.’ Meyer compares that other “we know that,” John iii. 2. The application may have been as if to settle a dispute which had sprung up between the Pharisees, the strong theocratic repudiators of Roman rule, and the Herodians, the hangers-on of a dynasty created by Caesar. In case the answer were negative, these last would be witnesses against Him to the governor (Luke xx. 20); as indeed they became, with false testimony, when they could not get true, Luke xxiii. 2; in case it were affirmative, He would be compromised with the Roman conquerors, and could not be the people’s Deliverer, their expected Messias; which would furnish them with a pretext for stirring up the multitudes against Him (see Deut. xvii. 15).

17.] The tribute here spoken of was a poll-tax, which had been levied since Judæa became a province of Rome.

18–22.] Our Lord not only detects their plot, but answers their question; and in answering it, teaches them each a deep lesson.

The tribute money was a denarius: see on ch. xx. 2. It was a saying of the Rabbis, quoted by Lightfoot and Wetstein, that ‘wherever any king’s money is current, there that king is lord.’ The Lord’s answer convicts them, by the matter of fact that this money was current among them, of subjection to (Tiberius) Cæsar, and recognition of that subjection: Pay therefore, He says, the things which are Cæsar’s to Cæsar, and (not perhaps without reference to the Herodians, but also with much deeper reference) the things that are God's, to God. These weighty words, so much misunderstood, bind together, instead of separating, the political and religious duties of the followers of Christ. See Jer. xxvii. 4–18: Rom. xiii. 1: 1 Pet. ii. 13, 14: John xix. 11. The second clause comprehends the first, and gives its true foundation: as if it had been, ‘this obedience to Cæsar is but an application of the general principle of obedience to God, of Whom is all power.’ The latter clause thus reaches infinitely deeper than the former: just as our Lord in Luke x. 41, 42 declares a truth reaching far beyond the occasion of the meal. Man is the coinage, and bears the image, of God (Gen. i. 27): and this image is not lost by the fall (Gen. ix. 6: Acts xvii. 29: James iii. 9. See also notes on Luke xv. 8, 9). We owe then ourselves to God: and this solemn duty is implied, of giving ourselves to Him, with all that we have and are. The answer also gives them the real reason why they were now under subjection to Cæsar: viz. because had fallen from their allegiance to God. ‘The question was as if an adulterer were to ask, whether it were lawful for him to pay the penalty of his adultery.’ (Claudius, cited by Stier.) They had again and again rejected their theocratic inheritance;—they refused it in the wilderness;—they would not have God to reign over them, but a king;—therefore were they subjected to foreigners (see 2 Chron. xii. 8).

23–33.] REPLY TO THE SADDUCEES RESPECTING THE RESURRECTION. Mark xii. 18–27. Luke xx. 27–40. From Acts xxiii. 8, the Sadducees denied resurrection, angel, and spirit; consequently the immortality of the soul, as well as the resurrection of the body. This should be borne in mind, as our Lord's answer is directed against both errors. It is a mistake into which many Commentators have fallen, to suppose that the Sadducees recognized only the Pentateuch: they acknowledged the prophets also, and rejected tradition only.

24. raise up seed] The firstborn son of such a marriage was reckoned and registered as the son of the deceased brother.

29, 30.] Ye do not understand the Scriptures, which imply the resurrection (ver. 31), nor the power of God, before which all these obstacles vanish (ver. 30). See Acts xxvi. 8: Rom. iv. 17; viii. 11: 1 Cor. vi. 14.

Our Lord also asserts here against them the existence of angels, and reveals to us the similarity of our future glorified state to their present one.

are as angels of God in heaven] because the risen will not be in heaven, but on earth. Tho Rabbinical decision of a similar question was, that a woman who had been the wife of two husbands on earth, is restored in the next life to the former of them.

31–33.] Our Lord does not cite the strong testimonies of the Prophets, as Isa. xxvi. 19: Ezek. xxxvii. 1–14: Dan. xii. 2, but says, as in Luke (xx. 37), ‘even Moses has shewn,’ &c., leaving those other witnesses to be supplied. The books of Moses were the great and ultimate appeal for all doctrine: and thus the assertion of the Resurrection comes from the very source whence their difficulty had been constructed. On the passage itself, and our Lord's interpretation of it, much has been written. Certain in it is, that our Lord brings out in this answer a depth of meaning in the words, which without it we could not discover. Meyer finely says, “Our Lord here testifies of the conscious intent of God in speaking the words. God uttered them, He tells us, to Moses, in the consciousness of the still enduring existence of His peculiar relation to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.” The groundwork of our Lord's argument seems to me to be this:—The words “I am thy God” imply a covenant; there is another side to them: “thou art Mine” follows upon “I am thine.” When God therefore declares that He is the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, He declares their continuance, as the other parties in this covenant. It is an assertion which could not be made of an annihilated being of the past. And notice also, that Abraham's (&c.) body having had upon it the seal of the covenant, is included in this. Stier remarks that this is a weighty testimony against the so-called ‘sleep of the soul’ in the intermediate state. Compare “for all live unto Him” Luke xx. 38. Thus the burden of the Law, ‘I AM THE LORD THY GOD,’ contains in it the seed of immortality, and the hope of the resurrection.

34–40.] REPLY CONCERNING THE GREAT COMMANDMENT. Mark xii. 28–34. In the more detailed account of Mark (Luke has a similar incident in another place, x. 25), this question does not appear as that of one maliciously tempting our Lord: and his seems to me the view to be taken,—as there could not be any evil consequences to our Lord, whichever way He had answered the question. See the notes there.

35. a lawyer] These were Mosaic jurists, whose special province was the interpretation of the Law. Scribe is a wider term, including them.

36. which is the great commandment] This should more exactly be rendered, which (what kind of a) commandment is great in the law? In Mark, otherwise.

40. the law and the prophets] in the sense of ch. v. 17; vii. 12: all the details of God's ancient revelation of His will, by whomsoever made. 41–46.] THE PHARISEES BAFFLED BY A QUESTION RESPECTING CHRIST AND DAVID. Mark xii. 35–37. Luke xx. 41–44. [See also Acts ii. 34.] Our Lord now questions his adversaries (according to Matt.:—in Mark and Luke He asks the question not to, but concerning the Scribes or interpreters of the law), and again convicts them of ignorance of the Scriptures. From the universally recognized title of the Messiah as the Son of David, which by his question He elicits from them, He takes occasion to shew them, who understood this title in a mere worldly political sense, the difficulty arising from David's own reverence for this his Son: the solution lying in the incarnate Godhead of the Christ, of which they were ignorant.

43. in spirit] i.e. by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit: “by (in) the Holy Ghost,” Mark. This is a weighty declaration by our Lord of the inspiration of the prophetic Scriptures. St. Mark (ver. 37) adds to this “the common people heard him gladly.” Here then end the endeavours of His adversaries to entrap Him by questions: they now betake themselves to other means. “A new scene, as it were, henceforth opens.” Bengel.

CHAP. XXIII. 1–39.] DENUNCIATION OF THE SCRIBES AND PHARISEES. Peculiar to Matthew.

1.] Much of the matter of this discourse is to be found in Luke xi. and xiii. On its appearance there, see the notes on those passages. There can, I think, be no doubt that it was delivered, as our Evangelist here relates it, all at one time, and in these the last days of our Lord’s ministry. On the notion entertained by some recent critics, of St. Matthew having arranged the scattered sayings of the Lord into longer discourses, see Introduction to Matthew. A trace of this discourse is found in Mark xii. 38–40; Luke xx. 45–47. In the latter place it is spoken to the disciples, in hearing of the crowd: which (see ver. 8 ff.) is the exact account of the matter. It bears many resemblances to the Sermon on the Mount, and may be regarded as the solemn close, as that was the opening, of the Lord’s public teaching. It divides itself naturally into three: (1) introductory description of the Scribes and Pharisees, and contrast to Christ’s disciples (vv. 1–12); (2) solemn denunciations of their hypocrisy (vv. 14–33); (3) conclusion, and mournful farewell to the temple and Jerusalem.

2.] Moses’ seat in the office of judge and lawgiver of the people: see Exod. ii. 13–25; Deut. xvii. 9–13. Our Lord says, ‘In so far as the Pharisees and Scribes enforce the law and precepts of Moses, obey them: but imitate not their conduct.’

The verb rendered sit must not be pressed too strongly, as conveying blame,—‘have seated themselves;’—it is merely stated here as a matter of fact. Vv. 8, 10 however apply to their leadership as well as their faults; and declare that among Christians there are to be none sitting on the seat of Christ.

3. all therefore] The therefore here is very significant:—because they sit on Moses’ seat: and this clears the meaning, and shews it to be, ‘all things which they, as successors of Moses, out of his law, command you, do;’ there being a distinction between their lawful teaching as expounders of the law, and their frivolous traditions superadded thereto, and blamed below.

4.] The warning was, imitate them not—for they do not themselves what they enjoin on others. And this verse must be strictly connected with ver. 3. The burdens then are not, as so often misinterpreted, human traditions and observances;—but the severity of the law, which they enforce on others, but do not observe (see Rom. ii. 21–23): answering to the weightier matters of the law of ver. 23. The irksomeness and unbearableness of these rites did not belong to the Law in itself, as rightly explained, but were created by the rigour and ritualism of these men, who followed the letter and lost the spirit; who spent all their labour in enforcing and amplifying ceremonies.

5–7.] But whatever they do perform, has but one motive.

phylacteries were strips of parchment with certain of Scripture, viz. Exod. xiii. 11–16 and 1–10; Deut. xi. 13–21; vi. 4–9, written on them, and worn on the forehead between the eyes, on the left side next the heart, and on the left arm. The name in the text was given because they were considered as charms. They appear not to have been worn till after the captivity; and are still in use among the rabbinical Jews. Their use appears to have arisen from a superstitious interpretation of Exod. xiii. 9: Deut. vi. 8, 9. See Joseph. Antt. iv. 8. 13. The hems or fringes, were commanded to be worn for a memorial, Num. xv. 38. See note on ch. ix. 20.

6, 7.] See Mark xii. 38, 39: Luke xx. 46, 47. On the uppermost place at feasts, see Luke xiv. 7.

8–10.] The prohibition is against loving, and in any religious matter, using such titles, signifying dominion over the faith of others. It must be understood in the spirit and not in the letter. Paul calls Timotheus his ‘son’ in the faith, 1 Tim. i. 2, and exhorts the Corinthians (1 Cor. xi. 1) to be followers of him as he of Christ. To understand and follow such commands in the slavery of the letter, is to fall into the very Pharisaism against which our Lord is uttering the caution. See (e. g.) Barnes’s note here.

Rabbi: i.e. ‘my master:’ an expression used, and reduplicated as here, by scholars to their masters, who were never called by their own name by their scholars. So the Lord says, John xiii. 13, “ye call me Master and Lord, and ye say well, for so I am.” The Teacher is probably not Christ, as supplied here in the received text, but the Holy Spirit (see John xiv. 26: Jer. xxxi. 33, 34: Ezek. xxxvi. 26, 27), only not here named, because this promise was only given in private to the disciples. If this be so, we have God, in His Trinity, here declared to us as the only Father, Master, and Teacher of Christians; the only One, in all these relations, on whom they can rest or depend. They are all brethren: all substantially equal—none by office or precedence nearer to God than another; none standing between his brother and God. ‘And the duty of all Christian teachers is to bring their hearers to the confession of the Samaritans in John iv. 42: “Now we believe, not because of thy saying, for we have heard Him ourselves, and know that this is the Saviour of the world.”

9.] Literally, name not any Father of you on earth; no ‘Abba’ or ‘Papa’ (see the account of the funeral of John Wesley, Coke and More’s Life, p. 441, and the opening, of the Author’s dedication of the book).

11.] It may serve to shew us how little the letter of a precept has to do with its true observance, if we reflect that he who of all the Heads of sects has most notably violated this whole command, and caused others to do so, calls himself ‘servus servorum Dei’ (“servant of the servants of God”).—It must be noted (see margin) that the word here rendered “servant” in the A.V., is not that usually so translated (doulos), which properly means slave or bondsman: but diaconos, which is in the same version rendered minister in chap. xx. 26.

12.] This often-repeated saying points here not only to the universal character of God’s dealings, but to the speedy humiliation of the lofty Pharisees; and as such finds a most striking parallel in Ezek. xxi. 26, 27.

13.] In Luke xi. 52 it is added “ye have taken away the key of knowledge”—the Key being, not the Key of, i.e. admitting to, Knowledge, but the Key which is the Knowledge itself, the true simple interpretation of Scripture, which would have admitted them, and caused them to admit others, into the Kingdom of Heaven, by the recognition of Him of whom the Scriptures testify; whereas now by their perverse interpretations they had shut out both themselves—and others from it. See a notable instance of this latter in John ix. 24. They shut the door as it were in men’s faces who were entering. [On the interpolated ver. 14, see notes on Mark (xii. 40). It is wanting in almost all the oldest authorities. It appears to have been inserted here by the copyists from Mark, as above, or from Luke xx. 47.]

15.] And with all this betrayal of your trust as the teachers of Israel (John iii. 10 literally), as if all your work at home were done. This was their work of supererogation—not commanded them, nor in the spirit of their law. The Lord speaks not here of those pious Godfearing men, who were found dwelling among the Jews, favouring and often attending their worship—but of the proselytes of righteousness, so called, who by persuasion of the Pharisees, took on them the whole Jewish law and its observances. These were rare—and it was to the credit of our nature that they were. For what could such a proselyte, made by such teachers, become? A disciple of hypocrisy merely—neither a sincere heathen nor a sincere Jew—doubly the child of hell: condemned by the religion which he had left—condemned again by that which he had taken.

16–22.] The Lord forbade all swearing to His own disciples, ch. v. 34; and by the very same reasoning—because every oath is really and eventually an oath by God—shews these Pharisees the validity and solemnity of every oath. This subterfuge became notorious at Rome. See citation in my Gr. Test.

The reading dwelt in ver. 21 is remarkable; God did not then dwell in the Temple, nor had He done so since the Captivity.

23, 24.] It was doubtful, whether Levit. xxvii. 30 applied to every smallest garden herb: but the Pharisees, in their over-rigidity in externals, stretched it to this, letting go the heavier, more difficult and more important (see ver. 4) matters of the Law. In the threefold enumeration, our Lord refers to Micah vi. 8 (see also Hosea xii. 6)—where to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with God, are described as being better than all offerings.

these—these last, are the great points on which your exertions should have been spent—and then, if for the sake of these they be observed, the others should not be neglected. The gold here is probably not the ornamental gold, but the Corban—the sacred treasure. They were fools and blind, not to know and see, that no inanimate thing can witness an oath, but they all these things are called in to do so because of sanctity belonging to them, of which God is the primary source:—the order likewise of the things hallowed being, in their foolish estimate of them, reversed: for the gold must be less than the temple which hallows it, and the gift than the altar—not as if this were of any real consequence, except to shew their folly—for vv. 20–22, every oath is really an oath by God. But these men were servants only of the temple (“your house, ver. 38) and the altar, and had forgotten God. “The straining the gnat is not a mere proverbial saying. The Jews (as do now the Buddhists in Ceylon and Hindustan) strained their wine, &c., carefully that they might not violate Levit. xi. 20, 23, 41, 42 (and, it might be added, Levit. xvii. 10–14). The “strain of a gnat” in our present auth. vers. for “strain out a gnat” of the earlier English vers. seems not to have been a mistake, as sometimes supposed but a deliberate alteration, meaning, “strain [out the wine] at [the occurrence of] a gnat.” The camel is not only opposed, as of immense size, but is also joined with the other as being equally clean.

25–28.] This woe is founded not on a literally, but a typically denoted practice of the Pharisees. Our Lord, in the ever-deepening denunciation of His discourse, has now arrived at the delineation of their whole character and practices by a parabolic similitude.

are fall of] the straining out of the gnat is a cleansing pertaining to the outside, as compared with the inner composition of the wine itself, of which the cup is fall: see Rev. xviii. 3. The exterior is not in reality pure when the interior is foul: it is not ‘a clean cup,’ unless both exterior and interior be clean. Observe, the emphasis is on be: “that its exterior also may not appear to be, but really become, pure.”

27.] The Jews used once a year (on the fifteenth of the month Adar) to whitewash the spots where graves were, that persons might not be liable to uncleanness by passing over them (see Num. xix. 16). This goes to the root of the mischief at once: “your heart is not a temple of the living God, but a grave of pestilent corruption: not a heaven, but a hell. And your religion is but the whitewash—hardly skin-deep.”

29–33.] The guilt resting on these present Pharisees from being the last in a progressive series of generations of such hypocrites and persecutors, forms the matter of the last ‘Woe. The burden of this hypocrisy is, that they, being one with their fathers, treading in their steps, but vainly disavowing their deeds, were, by the very act of building: the sepulchres of the prophets, joined with their prophet-persecuting acts, convicting themselves of continuity with their fathers’ wickedness. See, as clearly setting forth this view, Luke xi. ‘Instead of the penitent confession, “We have sinned, we and our fathers,” this last and worst generation in vain protests against their participation in their fathers’ guilt, which they are meanwhile developing to the utmost, and filling up its measure Cheta vii. 52). Stier. Again notice the emphasis, which is now markedly on sons; thus bringing out that relation in all its fulness and consequences.

32.] Fill ye up also (as well as they) the measure (of iniquity) of your fathers.

Ver. 33 repeats almost verbatim the first denunciation of the Baptist—in this, the last discourse of the Lord: thus denoting the unchanged state of these men, on whom the whole preaching of: repentance had now been expended. One weighty difference however there is: then it was, “who hath warned you to flee?” the wonder was, how they believed thought themselves of escaping—now, how shall ye escape? On serpents, see Rev. xii. 9.

34.] From the similar place in the former discourse (Luke xi. 49, see notes there) it would appear that the wherefore refers to the whole last denunciation:—“since ye are bent upon filling up the iniquities of your fathers, in God’s inscrutable purposes ye shall go on rejecting His messengers.” Notice the difference between “the wisdom of God” in Luke xi. 49, and I, with its emphasis, here.

These words are nowhere written in Scripture, nor is it necessary to suppose that to be our Lord’s meaning. He speaks this as Head of His Church, of those whom He was about to send: see Acts xiii. 1: 1 Cor. xii. 8: Eph. iii. 5. He cannot, as some think, include Himself among those whom He sends—the Jews may have crucified many Christian teachers before the destruction of Jerusalem. And Eusebius relates from Hegesippus the crucifixion of Symeon son of Clopas, in the reign of Trajan. The and takes out the “crucify,” the special, from the “kill,” the general; with, of course, somewhat of emphasis: “yea, and even crucify.” The prophets were the Apostles, who, in relation to the Jews, were such—the wise men, Stephen and such like, men full of the Holy Ghost—the scribes, Apollos, Paul (who indeed was all of these together), and such. On scourge in your synagogues, see Acts v. 40; xxii. 19; xxvi. 11.

35.] that, not ‘in such a way that,’ as some: but strictly in order that. righteous (or innocent) blood is a common expression in the O.T. See 2 Kings xxi. 16; xxiv. 4: Jer. xxvi. 15; and more especially Lam. iv. 13, which perhaps our Lord referred to in speaking this.

all the.... blood] Thus in Babylon, Rev. xviii. 24, is found the blood of all that were slain upon the earth. Every such signal judgment is the judgment for a series of long-crying crimes—and these judgments do not exhaust God’s anger, Isa. ix. 12, 17, 21. The murder of Abel was the first in the strife between unrighteousness and holiness, and as these Jews represent, in their conduct both in former times and now, the murderer of the son of Barachias does not occur in Luke xi. 51, and perhaps was not uttered by the Lord Himself, but may have been inserted by mistake, as Zachariah the prophet was son of Barachiah, see Zech. i. 1.

Who Zacharias son of Barachias is has been much disputed. We may conclude with certainty that it cannot be (as Augustine and Greswell suppose) a future Zacharias, mentioned by Josephus, as son of Baruch, and slain in the temple just before the destruction of Jerusalem—for our Lord evidently speaks of an event past, and never prophesies in this manner elsewhere. Origen has preserved a tradition, that Zacharias father of John the Baptist was slain by them in the temple; but in the absence of all other authority, this must be suspected as having arisen from the difficulty of the allusion here. Most likely (see Lightfoot in loc., and note on Luke xi. 49) it is Zacharias the son of Jehoiada, who was killed there, 2 Chron. xxiv. 21, and of whose blood the Jews had a saying, that it never was washed away till the temple was burnt at the captivity.

between the temple and the altar] He was killed in the priest's court, where the altar of burnt-offerings was. On ver. 36, see note on ch. xxiv. 34, It is no objection to the interpretation there maintained that the whole period of the Jewish course of crime is not filled up by it: the death of Abel can by no explanation be brought within its limits or responsibility and our Lord's saying reaches far deeper than a mere announcement of their responsibility for what they themselves had done. The Jews stood in the central point of God's dealings with men; and as they were the chosen for the election of grace, so, rejecting God and His messengers, they became, in an especial and awful manner, vessels of wrath.

Our Lord mentions this last murder, not as being the last even before His own day, but because it was connected specially with the cry of the dying man, 'The Lord look upon it and require it.' Compare Gen. iv. 10. This death of Zacharias was the last in the arrangement of the Hebrew Canon of the O.T., though chronologically that of Urijah, Jer. xxvi. 23, was later.

37.] These words were before spoken by our Lord, Luke xiii. 34: see notes there, and compare ch. xxiv. 28.

how often would I have gathered must be understood of all the messages of repentance and mercy sent by the prophets, for our Lord's words embrace the whole time comprised in the historic survey of ver. 35, as well as His own ministry. On the similitude, see Deut. xxxii. 11: Ps. xvii. 8; xxxvi. 7; lvii. 1; lxi. 4: Isa. xxxi. 5: Mal. iv. 2.

ye would not] See Isa. xxviii. 12; xxx. 15, The tears of our Lord over the perverseness of Jerusalem are witnesses of the freedom of man's will to resist the grace of God.

38, 39.] This is our Lord's last and solemn departure from the temple—the true "Let us depart hence."

your house—no more God's, but your house—said primarily of the temple,—then of Jerusalem,—and then of the whole land in which ye dwell.

Ye shall not see me—He did not shew Himself to all the people after His resurrection, but only to chosen witnesses, Acts x. 41.

till ye shall say] until that day, the subject of all prophecy, when your repentant people shall turn with true and loyal Hosannas and blessings to greet 'Him whom they have pierced: see Deut. iv. 30, 31: Hosea iii. 4, 5: Zech. xii. 10; xiv. 8–11. Stier well remarks, 'He who reads not this in the prophets, reads not yet the prophets aright.'

CHAP. XXIV. 1–51.] PROPHECY OF HIS COMING, AND OF THE TIMES OF THE END. Mark xiii. 1–37. Luke xxi. 5–36. Matt. omits the incident of the widow's mite, Mark xii. 41–44. Luke xxi. 1–4,

1, 2.] St. Mark expresses their remarks on the buildings; see note there:—they were probably occasioned by ver. 38 of the last chapter. Josephus writes, "Caesar gave orders to pull down the whole city and the temple.... and all the area of the city was so levelled by the workmen, that a traveller would never believe that it had been inhabited."

3.] From Mark we learn that it was Peter and James and John and Andrew who asked this question. With regard to the question itself, we must, I think, be careful not to press the clauses of it too much, so as to make them bear separate meanings corresponding to the arrangements of our Lord's discourse. As expressed in the other Evangelists, the question was concerning the time, and the sign, of these things happening, viz. the overthrow of the temple and desolation of Judæa, with which, in the then idea of the Apostles, our Lord's coming and the end of the world were connected. Against this mistake He warns them, vv. 6, 14,—Luke ver. 24,—and also in the two first parables in our ch. xxv. For the understanding of this necessarily difficult prophetic discourse, it must be borne in mind that the whole is spoken in the pregnant language of prophecy, in which various fulfillments are involved. (1) The view of the Jewish Church and its fortunes, as representing the Christian Church and its history, is one key to the interpretation of this chapter.

Two parallel interpretations run through the former part as far as ver. 28; the destruction of Jerusalem, and the final judgment being both enwrapped in the words, but the former, in this part of the chapter, predominating. Even in this part, however, we cannot tell how applicable the warnings given may be to the events of the last times, in which apparently Jerusalem is again to play so distinguished a part. From ver. 28, the lesser subject begins to be swallowed up by the greater, and our Lord's second coming to be the predominant theme, with however certain hints thrown back as it were at the event which was immediately in question: till, in the latter part of the chapter and the whole of the next, the second advent, and, at last, the final judgment ensuing on it, are the subjects.

(2) Another weighty matter for the understanding of this prophecy is, that (see Mark xiii. 32) any obscurity or concealment concerning the time of the Lord's second coming, must be attributed to the right cause, which we know from His own mouth to be, that the divine Speaker Himself, in His humiliation, did not know the day nor the hour. All that He had heard of the Father, He made known unto His disciples (John xv. 15): but that which the Father kept in His own power (Acts i. 7), He did not in His abased humanity know. He told them the attendant circumstances of His coming; He gave them enough to guard them from error in supposing the day to be close at hand, and from carelessness in not expecting it as near. Regarding Scripture prophecy as I do as a whole, and the same great process of events to be denoted by it all, it will be but waste labour to be continually at issue, in the notes of this and the succeeding chapter, with those who hold that the Gospel prophecies are inconsistent, in their description of the end, with those after the Ascension, and those again with the millennial ones of the Apocalypse. How untenable this view is, I hope the following notes will shew; but to be continually meeting it, is the office of polemic not of exegetic theology.

4, 5.] Our Lord does not answer the when, but by admonitions not to be deceived. See a question similarly answered, Luke xiii. 23, 24. For many...] This was the first danger awaiting them: not of being drawn away from Christ, but of imagining: that these persons were Himself. Of such before the destruction of Jerusalem we have no distinct record; doubtless there were such: but (see above) I believe the prophecy and warning to have a further reference to the latter times, in which its complete fulfilment must be looked for. The persons usually cited as fulfilling this (Theudas, Simon, Magus, Barchochab, &c.) are all too early or too late, and not correspondent to the condition, in My name, 'with My name as the ground of their pretences.' See Greswell on the Parables, v. 380 note. St. Luke gives an addition (ver. 8) to the speech of the false Christs, "and the time is at hand."

6–8.] wars and rumors of wars there certainly were during this period; but the prophecy must be interpreted rather of those of which the Hebrew Christians would be most likely to hear as a cause of terror. Such undoubtedly were the three threats of war against the Jews by Caligula, Claudius, and Nero; of the first of which Josephus says, "that it would have brought extermination to the Jewish nation, had it not been for Caligula's death." Luke couples with wars "commotions,"—and to this nation against nation seems also to point. There were serious disturbances,—(1) at Alexandria, which gave rise to the complaint against and deposition of Flaccus, and Philo's work against him (A. D. 38), in which the Jews as a nation were the especial objects of persecution; (2) at Seleucia about the same time, in which more than 50, 000 Jews were killed; (3) at Jamnia, a city on the coast of Judæa near Joppa. Many other such national tumults are recorded by Josephus. In one place he calls the sedition a preface be the siege. famine, and pestilence, which is coupled to it in Luke, are usual companions. With regard to the first, Greswell shews that the famine prophesied of in the Acts (xi. 28) happened in the ninth of Claudius, A.D. 49. It was great at Rome,—and therefore probably Egypt and Africa, on which the Romans depended so much for supplies, were themselves much affected by it. Suetonius of continual droughts; and Tacitus of dearth of crops, and thence famine, about the same time. There was a famine in Judæa in the reign of Claudius (the true date of which however Mr. Greswell believes to be the third of Nero), mentioned by Josephus. And as to pestilences, though their occurrence might, as above, be inferred from the other, we have distinct accounts of a pestilence at Rome (A. D. 65) in Suetonius and Tacitus, which in a single autumn carried off 30, 000 persons at Rome. But such matters as these are not often related by historians, unless of more than usual severity.

earthquakes] The principal earthquakes occurring between this prophecy and the destruction of Jerusalem were, (1) a great earthquake' in Crete, A.D. 46 or 47; (2) one at Rome on the day when Nero assumed the manly toga A.D. 51; (8) one at Apamea in Phrygia, mentioned by Tacitus, A.D. 53; (4) one at Laodicea in Phrygia, A.D. 60; (5) one in Campania. Seneca, in the year 'A. D. 58, writes:—'How often have cities of Asia and Achaea fallen with one fatal shock! how many cities have been swallowed up in Syria, how many in Macedonia! How often has Cyprus been wasted by this calamity! How often has Paphos become a ruin! News has often been brought us of the demolition of whole cities at once.'

The prophecy, mentioning in divers places (place for place),—i. e. here and there, each in its particular locality; as we say, "up and down"), does not seem to imply that the earthquakes should be in Judæa or Jerusalem. We have an account of one in Jerusalem, in Josephus, which Mr. Greswell (as above) places about Nov. A.D. 67. On the additions in Luke xxi. 11, see notes there and on this whole passage see the prophecies in 2 Chron. xv. 5–7, and Jer. li. 45, 46.

the beginning of sorrows (literally of birth pangs)] in reference to the regeneration (ch. xix, 28), which is to precede the consummation of this age. So Paul in Rom. viii. 22, the whole creation... travaileth together until now. The death-throes of the Jewish state the 'regeneration' of the universal Christian Church, as the death-throes of this world the new heavens and new earth.

9–13.] Then, at this time,—during this period, not 'after these things have happened.' These words serve only definitely to fix the time of the indefinite then, here and in ver. 10. The then in ver. 14 is, from the construction of the sentence, more definite. For kill you, Luke has some of you shall they cause to be put to death, viz. the Apostles. This sign was early given. James the brother of John was put to death, A.D. 44. Peter and Paul (traditionally) and James the Lord's brother, before the destruction of Jerusalem: and possibly others.

ye shall be hated] See Acts xxviii. 22. Tacitus says that Nero, for the conflagration of Rome, persecuted the Christians, 'a race of men detested for their crimes;' also see 1 Pet. ii, 12; iii, 16; iv. 14–16. In chap. x. 22, from which these verses are repeated, we have only 'of all' (men)—here nations is added, giving particularity to the prophecy.

10.] See 2 Tim. iv. 16, and the warnings against apostasy in the Epistle to the Hebrews. The persons spoken of in this verse are Christians. Tacitus says, that the first apprehended by Nero confessed, and then a great multitude were apprehended their information, xv. 44. On offended, see note, ch. xi, 6. On hate one another, compare the deadly hatred borne to St. Paul and his work by the Judaizers. In the Apocryphal works called the Clementines, which follow teaching similar to that of the factions adverse to Paul in the Corinthian Church, he is hinted at under the name "the enemy." (See Stanley, Essays on Apostolic Age, p. 877.) These Judaizing teachers, among others, are meant by the false prophets, as also that plentiful crop of heretical teachers which sprang up every where with the good seed of the Gospel when first sown. See especially Acts xx. 30: Gal. i. 7–9: Rom. xvi. 17, 18: Col. ii, 17—end: 1 Tim. i. 6, 7, 20; vi. 3–5, 20, 21: 2 Tim. ii. 18; iii, 6–8: 2 Pet. ii. (and Jude): 1 John ii. 18, 22, 23, 26; iv. 1, 3: 2 John 7: false apostles, 2 Cor. xi. 18.

12.] It is against this iniquity especially that James, in his Epistle, and Jude, in more than the outward sense the brother of James, were called on to protest,—the mixture of heathen licentiousness with the profession of Christianity. But perhaps we ought to have regard to the past tense of the verb in the original, and interpret, 'because the iniquity is filled up,' on account of the horrible state of morality (parallel to that described by Thucydides, as prevailing in Greece, which had destroyed all mutual confidence), the love and mutual trust of the generality of Christians shall grow cold.

of the many,—thus we have, ch. xxv. 5, "they all slumbered and slept." Even the Church itself is leavened by the distrust of the evil days. See 2 Thess. ii. 3.

13.] The primary meaning of this seems to be, that whosoever remained faithful till the destruction of Jerusalem, should be preserved from it. No Christian, that we know of, perished in the siege or after it: see below. But it has ulterior meanings, according to which the end will signify to an individual, the day of his death (see Rev. ii. 10),—his martyrdom, as in the case of some of those here addressed,—to the Church, endurance in the faith to the end of all things. See Luke xxi. 19, and note.

14.] We here again have the pregnant meaning of prophecy. The Gospel had been preach rough the whole Roman world, and every nation had received its testimony, before the destruction of Jerusalem: see Col. i. 6, 23: 2 Tim. iv. 17. This was necessary not only as regarded the Gentiles, but to give to God's people the Jews, who were scattered among all these nations, the opportunity of receiving or rejecting the preaching of Christ. But in the wider sense, the words imply that the Gospel shall be preached in all the world, literally taken, before the great and final end come. The apostasy of the latter days, and the universal dispersion of missions, are the two great signs of the end drawing near.

15. the abomination of desolation] The Greek words are the LXX rendering of the Hebrew of Dan. xii. 11. The similar expression in ch. xi. 31, is rendered in the same manner by the LXX. To what exactly the words in Daniel apply, is not clear. Like other prophecies it is probable that they are pregnant with several interpretations, and are not yet entirely fulfilled. They were interpreted of Antiochus Epiphanes by the Alexandrine Jews; thus 1 Macc. i. 54 we read "they set up the abomination of desolation upon the altar." Josephus refers the prophecy to the desolation by the Romans. The principal Commentators have supposed, that the eagles of the Roman legions are meant, which were as abomination inasmuch as they were idols worshipped by the soldiers. These, they say, stood in the holy place, or a holy place, when the Roman armies encamped round Jerusalem under Cestius Gallus first, A.D. 66, then under Vespasian, A.D. 68, then lastly under Titus, A.D. 70. Of these the first is generally taken as the sign meant. Josephus relates, B.J. ii. 20. 1, that after Cestius was defeated, "many of the principal Jews removed from the city, as from a sinking ship." But, without denying that this time was that of the sign being given, I believe that all such interpretation of its meaning are wholly inapplicable. The error has mainly arisen from supposing that the parallel warning of St. Luke (ver. 20), "When see Jerusalem encompassed with armies, then her desolation draweth nigh," is identical in meaning with our text and that of St. Mark. The two first evangelist, writing for Jews, or as Jews, give the inner or domestic sign of the approaching calamity: which was to be seen in the temple, and was to be the abomination (always used of something caused by the Jews themselves, see 2 Kings, xxi. 2–15: Ezek. v. 11; vii. 8, 9; viii. 6–16) which should cause the desolation,—the last drop in the cup of iniquity. Luke, writing for Gentiles, gives the outward state of things corresponding to this inward sign. That the Roman eagles cannot be meant, is apparent: for the sign would thus be no sign, the Roman eagles having been seen on holy ground for many years past, and at the very moment when these words were uttered. Also holy place must mean the temple: see reff.

Now in searching for some event which may have given such alarm to the Christians. Josephus's unconscious admission is important. The party of the Zelots, as we learn, had taken possession of the temple. In the next section he tells us that they chose one Phannius as their high priest, an ignorant and profane fellow, brought out of the field. I own that the above-cited passages strongly incline me to think that if not this very impiety, some similar one, about ora little before this time, was the sign spoken of by the Lord. In its place in Josephus, this very event seems to stand a little too late for our purpose (4. D. 67, a year after the investment by Cestius): but the narrative occurs in a description of the atrocities of the Zelote, and without any fixed date, and they had been in possession of the temple from the very first. So that this or some similar abomination may have about this time filled up the cup of iniquity and given the sign to the Christians to depart. Whatever it was, it was a definite, well-marked event, for the flight was to be immediate, on one day (see ver. 20), and universal from all parts of Judaea. Putting then St. Luke's expression and the text together, I think that some internal desecration of, the holy place by the Zelots coincided with the approach of Cestius, and thus, both from without and within, the Christians were warned to escape. See Luke xxi. 20.

whoso readeth, let him understand] This I believe to have been an ecclesiastical note, which, like the doxology in ch. vi. 13, has found its way into the text. If the two first Gospels were published before the destruction of Jerusalem, such an admonition would be very intelligible. The words 'may' be part of our Lord's discourse directing attention to the prophecy of Daniel (see 2 Tim. ii. 7; Dan. xii. 10); but this is not likely, especially as the reference to Daniel does not occur in Mark, where these words are also found. They cannot well be the words of the Evangelist, inserted to bespeak attention, as this in the three first Gospels is wholly without example.

16–18.] The Christian Jews are said to have fled to Pella, a town described by Josephus as the northernmost boundary of Perea. Eusebius says they were directed thither by a certain prophetic intimation, which however cannot be this; as Pella is not on the mountains, but beyond them (but in order to reach it would not they have to fly exactly over [so literally here] the mountains? See note on ch. xviii, 12):—Epiphanius, that they were warned an angel.

17.] A person might run on the flat-roofed houses in Jerusalem from one part of the city to another, and to the city gates. Perhaps however this is not meant, but that he should descend by the outer stairs instead of the inner, which would lose time.

19, 20.] It will be most important that so sudden a flight should not be encumbered, by personal hindrances, or by hindrances of accompaniment, see 1 Cor. vii. 26; and that those things which are out of our power to arrange, should be propitious,—weather, and freedom from legal prohibition. The words neither on the sabbath day, are peculiar to Matthew, and shew the strong Jewish tint which caused him alone to reserve such portions of our Lord's sayings. That they were not said as any sanction of observance of the Jewish Sabbath is most certain: but merely as referring to the positive impediments which might meet them on that day, the shutting of the gates of cities, &c., and their own scruples about travelling further than the ordinary Sabbath-day's journey (about a mile English); for the Jewish Christians adhered to the law and customary observances till the destruction of Jerusalem.

21, 22.] In ver. 19 there is probably also an allusion to the horrors of the siege, which is here taken up by the for. See Deut. xxviii. 49–57, which was literally fulfilled in the case of Mary of Perea related by Josephus.

Our Lord still has in view the prophecy of Daniel (ch. xii.. 1), and this citation clearly shews the intermediate fulfilment, by the destruction of Jerusalem, of that which is et future in its final fulfilment: for Daniel is speaking of the end of all things. Then only will these words be accomplished in their full sense: although Josephus (but he only in a figure of rhetoric) has expressed himself in nearly the same language “All calamities from the beginning of time seem to me to shrink to nothing in comparison with those of the Jews.

22.] If God had not in his mercy shortened (by His decree) those days (‘the days of vengeance,’ Luke xxi. 22), the whole nation (in the ultimate fulfilment, all flesh) would have perished; but for the sake of the chosen ones,—the believing,—or those who should believe,—or perhaps the preservation of the chosen race whom God hath not cast off, Rom. xi. 1,—they shall be shortened. It appears that besides the cutting short in the Divine counsels, which must be hidden from us, various causes combined to shorten the siege. (1) Herod Agrippa had begun strengthening the walls of Jerusalem in a way which if finished would have rendered them able to resist all human violence, but was stopped by orders from Claudius, A. D 42 or 43, Jos. Antt. xix. 7. 2. (2) The Jews, being divided into factions among themselves, had totally neglected any preparations o stand a siege (3) The magazines of corn and provision were burnt just before the arrival of Titus; the words of Josephus are remarkable on this: “Within a little all the corn was burnt, which would have lasted them many years of siege.” 4) Titus arrived suddenly, and the Jews voluntarily abandoned parts of the fortification (Jewish Wars, vi. 8. 4). (5) Titus himself confessed, “God has fought for us, and He it is who has deprived the Jews of these their fortifications: for what could human hands or engines do against these towers?” Some such providential shortening of the great days of tribulation, and hastening of God's glorious Kingdom, is here promised for the latter times.

23–28.] These verses have but a faint reference (though an unmistakeable one) to the time of the siege: their principal reference is to the latter days. In their first meaning, they would tend to correct the idea of the Christians that the Lord's coming was to be simultaneous with the destruction of Jerusalem: and to guard them against the impostors who led people out into the wilderness (see Acts xxi. 38), or invited them to consult them privately, with the promise of deliverance. In their main view, they will preserve the Church firm in her waiting for Christ, through even the awful troubles of the latter days, unmoved by enthusiasm or superstition, but seeing and looking for Him who is invisible. On the signs and wonders, see 2 Thess. ii. 9–12: Deut. xiii. 1–3, 27, 28.] The coming of the Lord in the end, even as that in the t was, shall be a plain unmistakeable fact, understood of all;—and like that also, sudden and all-pervading. But here in the full meaning of the words is only to be found in the final fulfilment of them. The lightning, lighting both ends of heaven at once, seen of all beneath it, can only find its full similitude in His Personal ing, Whom e every eye shall see, Rev. i. 7.

28.] The stress is on wheresoever and there, pointing out the universality. In the similar discourse, Luke xvii. 37, before this saying, the disciples ask, ‘Where, Lord?’ The answer is,—first, at Jerusalem: where the corrupting body lies, thither shall the vultures (see below) gather themselves together, coming as they do from far on the scent of prey. Secondly, in its final fulfilment,—over the whole world;—for that is the carcase now, and the eagles the angels of vengeance. See Deut. xxviii. 49, which is probably here referred to; also Hosea viii. 1: Heb. i. 8. ‘The interpretation which makes the carcase case our Lord, and the eagles the elect, is quite beside the purpose. Neither is any allusion to the Roman eagles to be for a moment thought of. The birds meant by the original word are the vultures (vultur percnopterus, Linn.), usually reckoned by the ancients as belonging to the eagle kind,

29. Immediately] All the difficulty which this word has been supposed to involve has arisen from confounding the partial fulfilment of the prophecy with its ultimate one. The important insertion in Luke (xxi. 23, 24) shews us that the tribulation includes wrath upon this people, which is yet being inflicted: and the treading down of Jerusalem by the Gentiles, still going on (see note there); and immediately after that tribulation which shall happen when the cup of Gentile iniquity is full, and when the Gospel shall have been preached in all the world for a witness, and rejected by the Gentiles, (in Luke, “the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled,”) shall the coming of the Lord Himself happen. On the indefiniteness of this assigned period in the prophecy, see note on ver. 3. (The expression in Mark is equally indicative of a considerable interval: “In those days, after that tribulation.”) The fact of His coming, and its attendant circumstances, being known to Him, but the-exact time unknown,—He speaks without regard to the interval, which would be employed in His waiting till all things are put under His feet: see Rev. i. 1; xxii. 6–20. In what follows, from this verse, the Lord speaks mainly and directly of His great second coming. Traces there are (as e.g. in the literal meaning of ver. 84) of slight and indirect allusions to the destruction of Jerusalem;—as there were in the former part to the great events of which that is a foreshadowing;—but no direct mention. The contents of the rest of the chapter may be set forth as follows: (ver. 29) signs which shall immediately precede (ver. 30) the coming of the Lord to judgment, and (ver. 31) to bring salvation to His elect. The certainty of the event, and its intimate connexion with its premonitory signs (vv. 32, 33); the enduracne (ver. 84) of the Jewish people till the end—even till Heaven and Earth (ver. 35) pass away. But (ver. 36) of the day and hour none knoweth. Its suddenness (vv. 37–39) and decisiveness (vv. 40, 41),—and exhortation (vv. 42–44) to be ready for it. A parable setting forth the blessedness of the watching, and misery of the neglectful servant (vv. 45—end), and forming a point of transition to the parables in the next chapter.

shall the sun be darkened] The darkening of the material lights of this world is in prophecy as a type of the occurrence of trouble and danger in the fabric of human societies, Isa. v. 30; xiii. 10; xxxiv. 4: Jer. iv. 28: Ezek. xxxii. 7, 8: Amos viii. 9, 10: Micah iii. 6. But the type is not only in the words of the proxy, but also in the events themselves. Such prophecies are to be understood literally, and indeed without such understanding would lose their truth and significance. The physical signs shall happen (see Joel ii. 31: Hagg. ii. 6, 21, compared with Heb. xii. 26, 27) as accompaniments and intensifications of the awful state of things which the description typifies. The Sun of this world and the church (Mal. iv. 2: Luke i. 78: John i. 9: Eph. v. 14: 2 Pet. i. 19) is the Lord Jesus—the Light, is the Knowledge of Him. The moon—human knowledge and science, of which it is said (Ps. xxxvi. 9), ‘In thy light shall we see light:’ reflected from, and drinking the beams of, the Light of Christ. The stars—see Dan. viii. 10—are the leaders and teachers of the Church. The Knowledge of God shall be obscured—the Truth nigh put out—worldly wisdom darkened—the Church system demolished, and her teachers cast down. And all this in the midst of the fearful signs here (and in Luke, vv. 25, 26, more at large) recounted: not setting aside, but accompanying, their literal fulfilment, the powers of the heavens] not the stars, just mentioned;—nor the angels, spoken of by and by, ver. 31: but most probably the greater heavenly bodies, which rule the day and night, Gen. i. 16, and are there also distinguished from the stars. See notes on 2 Pet. iii. 10–12, where the stars seem to be included in the elements. Typically, the influences which rule human society, which make the political weather fair or foul, bright or dark; and encourage the fruits of peace, or inflict the blight and desolation of war.

30.] This then, so emphatically placed and repeated, is a definite declaration of time,—not a mere sign of sequence or coincidence, as e.g. in ver. 23:—when these things shall have been somewhat filling men’s hearts with fear,—THEN shall&c. It is quite uncertain what the sign shall be:—plainly, not the Son of Man Himself, as some explain it (even Bengel, generally so valuable in his explanations, says, “He Himself shall be the sign of Himself,” and quotes Luke ii. 12 as confirming this view; but there the swaddling clothes and the manger were the ‘sign,’ not the Child), nor any outward marks on His body, as His wounds; for both these would confuse what the prophecy keeps distinct—the seeing of the sign of the Son of Man, and all tribes of the earth mourning, and afterwards seeing the Son of Man Himself. This is manifestly s ome sign in the Heavens, by which all shall know that the Son of Man is at hand. The Star of the Wise Men naturally occurs to our thoughts—but a star would not be a sign which all might read.

On the whole I think no sign completely answers the conditions, but that of the Cross:—and accordingly we find the Fathers mostly thus ‘ing the passage. But as our Lord Himself does not answer the question, “What is the sign of thine appearing?” we may safely leave the matter.

all the tribes of the earth] See Zech. xii. 10–14, where the mourning is confined to the families of Israel:—here, it is universal: see Rev. i. 7; also vi. 15–17. This coming of the Son of Man is not that spoken of ch. xxv. 31, but that in 1 Thess. iv. 16, 17, and Rev. xix. 11 ff.,—His coming at the commencement of the millennial reign to establish His Kingdom: see Dan. vii. 13, 14.

The power is the power of the Kingdom, not, the host heaven.

31.] This is not the great Trumpet of the general Resurrection (1 Cor. xv. 52), except in so far as that may be spoken of as including also the first resurrection: see on this verse the remarkable opening of Ps. l, which is itself a prophecy of these same times.

32, 33, 34.] The English version in ver. 32 is ambiguous, besides being unfaithful. By “of” is evidently meant from: but it seems as if it were only concerning. “Learn,” says our Lord, “‘from the fig-tree the parable:’” the natural phenomenon which may serve as a key to the meaning.

This coming of the Lord shall be as sure a sign that the Kingdom of Heaven is nigh, as the putting forth of the tender leaves of the fig tree is a sign that summer is nigh. Observe all these things,—every one of these things,—this coming of the Son of Man included, which will introduce the millennial Kingdom.

As regards the parable,—there is a reference to the withered fig-tree which the Lord cursed: and as that, in its judicial unfruitfulness, emblematised the Jewish people, so here the putting forth of the fig-tree from its state of winter dryness, symbolizes the future reviviscence of that race, which the Lord (ver. 34) declares shall not pass away till all fulfilled. That this is the true meaning of that verse, must appear, when we recollect that it forms the conclusion of this parable, and is itself joined, by this generation passing away, to the verse following. We cannot, in seeking for its ultimate fulfilment, go back to the taking of Jerusalem and make the words apply to it.

As this is one of the points on which the rationalizing interpreters lay most stress to shew that the prophecy has failed, I have taken pains to shew, in my Gr. Test., that the word here rendered generation has the meaning of a race or family of people. In all the there cited, the word necessarily that signification: having it is true a more pregnant meaning, implying that the character of one generation stamps itself upon the race, as here in this verse also. The continued use of pass away (the word is the same in verses 34, 35) should have saved the Commentators from the blunder of imagining that the then living generation was meant, seeing that the prophecy is by the next verse carried on to the end of all things: and that, as matter of fact, the Apostles and ancient Christians did continue to expect the Lord’s coming, after that generation had passed away. But, as Stier well remarks, “there are men foolish enough now to say, heaven and earth will never pass away, but the words of Christ pass away in course of time;—of this, however, we wait the proof.” ii. 505.

all these things—all the signs hitherto recounted—so that both these words, and ye (in ver. 33), have their partial, and their full meanings.

it is near—viz. the end. On ver. 35 see Ps. cxix. 89: Isa. xl. 8; li. 6: Ps. cii. 26, 36.] that day, viz. of heaven and earth away; or, perhaps referring to ver 30 ff. day and hour—and how the exact time—as we say, ‘the hour and minute.’ The very im nt addition to this verse in Mark, and in some ancient MSS. here, neither the Son, is indeed included in “but my Father only,” but could hardly have been inferred from it, had it not been expressly stated: ch. xx. 23. All attempts to soften or explain away this weighty truth must be resisted: it will not do to say with some Commentators, “He knows it not as regards us,” which, however well meant, is a mere evasion:—in the course of humiliation undertaken by the Son, in which He increased in wisdom (Luke ii. 52), learned obedience (Heb. v. 8), uttered desires in prayer (Luke vi. 12, &c.),—this matter was hidden from Him: and as I have already remarked, this is carefully to be borne in mind, in explaining the prophecy before us.

37–39.] This comparison also occurs in Luke xvii. 26, 27, with the addition of ‘the days of Lot’ to it: see also 2 Pet. ii. 4–10; iii. 5, 6. It is important to notice the confirmation, by His mouth who is Truth itself, of the historic reality of the flood of Noah.

The expression drinking may serve to shew that it is a mistake to imagine that we have in Gen. ix. 20 the account of the first wine and its effects. The security here spoken of is in no wise inconsistent with the anguish and fear prophesied, Luke xxi. 25, 26. They say, there is peace, and occupy themselves as if there were: but fear is at their hearts. On the addition in Luke xxi. 34–36, see notes there.

40, 41.] From this point (or perhaps even from ver. 37, as historic resemblance is itself parabolic) the discourse begins to assume a parabolic form, and gradually passes into a series of formal parables in the next chapter.

These verses set forth that, as in the times of Noah, men and women shall be employed in their ordinary work: see Exod. xi. 5: Isa, xlvi. 2. They also shew us that the elect of God will to the last be mingled in companionship and partnership with the children of this world (see Mark i. 19, 20). We may notice, that these verses do not refer to the same as vv. 16–18. Then it is a question of voluntary flight; now of being taken (by the angels, ver. 81: the ‘present tense graphically sets the incident before us; or perhaps describes the rule of proceeding. It is interesting to know that the word “taken” is the same verb in the original as “receive” in John xiv. 3) or left. Nor again do they refer to the great judgment of ch. xxv. 31, for then (ver. 32) all shall be summoned: but they refer to the millennial dispensation, and the gathering of the elect to the Lord then. The “women grinding at the mill” has been abundantly illustrated by travellers, as even now seen in the East. See especially The Land and the Book, pp. 526, 7.

42–44.] Our Lord here resumes the tone of direct exhortation with which He commenced. To the secure and careless He will come as a thief in the night: to His own, as their Lord. See Obad. 5: Rev. iii. 3; xvi. 15: 1 Thess. v. 1–10, where the idea is expanded at length. Compare ver. 7 there with our ver. 49, and on the distinction between those who are of the day, and those who are of the night, see notes there.

45–47.] Our Lord had given this parabolic exhortation before, Luke xii. 42–46. Many of these His last sayings in public are solemn repetitions of, and references to, things already said by Him. That this was the case in the present instance, is almost demonstrable, from the implicit allusion in Luke xii. 36, to the return from the wedding, which is here expanded into the parable of ch. xxv. 1 ff. How much more natural that our Lord should have preserved in his parabolic discourses the same leading ideas, and again and again gathered his precepts round them,—than that the Evangelists should have thrown into utter and inconsistent confusion, words which would have been treasured up so carefully by them that heard them;—to say nothing of the promised help of the Spirit to bring to mind all that He had said to them.

Who then is] A question asked that each one may put it to himself,—and to signify the high honour of such an one.

faithful and wise] Prudence in a servant can be only the consequence of faithfulness to his master. This verse is especially addressed to the Apostles and Ministers of Christ. The give them (their) meat (= portion of meat, Luke xii. 42) answers to the description of the workman that need not be ashamed in 2 Tim. ii. 16. On ver. 47, compare ch. xxv. 21: 1 Tim. iii. 13: Rev. iii. 21; which last two passages answer to the promise here, that each faithful servant shall be over all his master’s goods. That promotion shall not be like earthly promotion, wherein the eminence of one excludes that of another,—but rather like the diffusion of love, in which, the more each has, the more there is for all.

48–51.] The question is not here asked again, is&c., but the transition made from the good to the bad servant, or even the good to the bad mind of the same servant, by the epithet evil.

delayeth] then manifestly, a long delay is in the mind of the Lord: see above on ver. 29. Notice that this servant also is one set over the household—one who says my lord—and began well—but now begins to, &c.—falls away from his truth and faithfulness;—the sign of which is that he begins (lit. shall have begun) to lord it over the elect (1 Pet. v. 3), and to revel with the children of the world. In consequence, though he have not lost his belief (“my lord”), he shall be placed those who believed not, the hypocrites.

51.] The reference is to the punishment of cutting, or sawing asunder: see Dan. ii. 5; iii. 29: Sus. ver. 59: see also Heb. iv. 12; xi. 37. The expression here is perhaps not without a symbolical reference also to that dreadful sundering of the conscience and practice which shall be the reflective torment of the condemned:—and by the mingling and confounding of which only is the anomalous life of the wilful sinner made in this world tolerable.

CHAP. XXV. 1–13.] PARABLE OF THE VIRGINS. Peculiar to Matthew.

ten virgins] The subject of this parable is not, as of the last, the distinction between the faithful and unfaithful servants; no outward distinction here exists—all are virgins—all companions of the bride—all furnished with brightly-burning lamps—all, up to a certain time, fully ready to meet the Bridegroom—the difference consists in some having made a provision for feeding the lamps in case of delay, and the others none—and the moral of the parable is the blessedness of endurance unto the end. “The point of the parable consists,” as Calvin remarks, in this, “that it is not enough to have been once girt and prepared for duty, unless we endure even to the end.” There is no question here of apostasy, or unfaithfulness—but of the want of provision to keep the light bright against the coming of the bridegroom, however delayed.

Ten was a favourite number with the Jews—ten men formed a congregation in a synagogue. In a passage from Rabbi Salomo, cited by Wetsteine he mentions ten lamps or torches as the usual number in marriage processions: see also Luke xix. 13.

to meet the bridegroom] It would appear that these virgins had left their own homes, and were waiting somewhere for the bridegroom to come,—probably at the house of the bride; for the object of the marriage procession was to fetch the bride to the bridegroom's house. Meyer however supposes that in this case the wedding was to be held in the bride's house, on account of the thing signified—the coming of the Lord to His Church;—but it is better to take the ordinary custom, and interpret accordingly, where we can. In both the wedding parables (see ch. xxii.) the bride does not appear for she, being the Church, is in fact the aggregate of the guests in the one case, and of the companions in the other. We may perhaps say that she is here, in the strict interpretation, the Jewish Church, and these ten virgins Gentile congregations accompanying her. This went forth is not their final going out in ver. 6, for only half of them did so,—but their leaving their own homes: compare took, in vv. 3, 4. The interpretation is—these are souls come out from the world into the Church, and there waiting for the coming of the Lord—not hypocrites, but faithful souls, bearing their lamps (their own lamps; so, literally: compare 1 Thess. iv. 4)—the inner spiritual life fed with the oil of God's Spirit (see Zech. iv. 2–12: Acts x. 38; Heb. i. 9). All views of this parable which represent the foolish virgins as having only a dead faith, only the lamp without the light, the body without the spirit, &c., are quite beside the purpose;—the lamps (see ver. 8) were all burning at first, and for a certain time.

Whether the equal partition of wise and foolish have any deep meaning we cannot say; it may be so.

3, 4.] These were not torches, nor wicks fastened on staves, as some have supposed, but properly lamps: and the oil vessels (which is most important to the parable) were separate from the lamps. The lamps being the hearts lit with the flame of heavenly love and patience, supplied with the oil of the Spirit,—now comes in the difference between the wise and foolish:—the one made no provision for the supply of this—the others did. How so? The wise ones gave all diligence to make their calling and election sure (2 Pet. i. 10 and 5–8), making their bodies, souls, and spirits (their vessels, 2 Cor. iv. 7) a means of supplying spiritual food for the light within, by seeking, in the appointed means of grace, more and more of God's Holy Spirit. The others did not this—but trusting that the light, once burning, would ever burn, made no provision for the strengthening of the inner man by watchfulness and prayer.

5–7] delayed: compare ch. xxiv. 48, where the Greek verb rendered delayeth is the same. The same English rendering ought to have been kept here. But the thought of the foolish virgins is very different from that of the wicked servant: his—‘there will be plenty of time, my Lord tarrieth;’—theirs, ‘surely He will soon be here, there is no need of a store of oil.’ This may serve to shew how altogether diverse is the ground of the two parables.

they all slumbered and slept] I believe no more is meant here than that all, being weak by nature, gave way to drowsiness: as indeed the wakefulness of the holiest Christian, compared with what it should be, is a sort of slumber:—but, the while, how much difference was there between them! Some understand this verse of sleep in death. But, not to mention that this will not fit the machinery of the parable (see below on ver. 8), it would assume (they all) that none of the faithful would be living on earth when the Lord comes.

a cry made] See Isa. lxii. 5–7: and the porter's duty, Mark xiii. 34. This warning cry is before the coming: see ver. 10. The exact rendering is present, graphically setting the reality before us: there ariseth a cry.

all] All now seem alike—all wanted their lamps trimmed—but for the neglectful, there is not wherewith. It is not enough to have burnt, but to be burning, when He comes. Raise the wick as they will, what avails it if the oil is spent?

trimmed] “by pouring on fresh oil, and removing the fungi about the wick: for the latter purpose a sharp-pointed wire was attached to the lamp, which is still seen in the bronze lamps found in sepulchres." Webst. and Wilk.

8, 9.] are going out;—not as A.V.—‘are gone out:’ and there is deep truth in this: the lamps of the foolish virgins are not extinguished altogether.

lest there be not enough] See Ps. xlix. 7: Rom. xiv. 12. No man can have more of this provision than will supply his own wants.

go ye rather] This is not said in mockery, as some suppose: but in earnest.

them that sell] These are the ordinary dispensers of the means of grace—ultimately of course God Himself, who alone can give his Spirit. The counsel was good, and well followed—but the time was past. Observe that those who sell are a particular class of persons—no mean argument for a set and appointed ministry; and moreover for a paid ministry. If they sell, they receive for the thing sold: compare our Lord's saying, Luke x. 7. This selling bears no analogy with the crime of Simon Magus in Acts viii.: compare our Lord's other saying, Matt. x. 8.

10–12.] We are not told that they could not buy—that the shops were shut—but simply that it was too late—for that time. For it is not the final coming of the Lord to judgment, when the day of grace will be past, that is spoken of,—except in so far as it is hinted at in the background, and in the individual application of the parable (virtually, not actually) coincides, to each man, with the day of his death. This feast is the marriage supper of Rev. xix. 7–9 (see also ib. xxi. 2); after which these improvident ones gone to buy their oil shall be judged in common with the rest of the dead, ibid. xx. 12, 13.

Observe here, I know you not is very different, as the whole circumstances are different, from “I never knew you,” in ch. vii. 23, where the “Depart from me” binds it to our ver. 41, and to the time of the final judgment, spoken of in that parable.

14–30.] PARABLE OF THE TALENTS. Peculiar to Matthew. The similar parable contained in Luke xix. 11–27 is altogether distinct, and uttered on a different occasion: see notes there.

14.] The ellipsis is rightly supplied in the A.V., For [the kingdom of heaven is] as a man, &c. We have this parable and the preceding one alluded to in very few words by Mark xiii. 34–36. In it we have the active side of the Christian life, and its danger, set before us, as in the last the contemplative side. There, the foolish virgins failed, from thinking their part too easy—here the wicked servant fails, from thinking his too hard. The parable is still concerned with Christians (his own servants), and not the world at large. We must remember the relation of master and slave, in order to understand his delivering to them his property, and punishing them for not fructifying with it.

15.] In Luke each receives the same, but the profit made by each is different: see notes there. Here, in fact, they did each receive the same, for they received according to their ability—their character and powers. There is no Pelagianism in this, for each man's powers are themselves the gift of God.

16–18.] The increase gained by each of the two faithful servants was the full amount of their talents:—of each will be required as much as has been given. The third servant here is not to be confounded with the wicked servant in ch. xxiv. 48. This one is not actively an ill-doer, but a hider of the money entrusted to him—one who brings no profit: see on ver. 24.

19–23.] After a long time] Here again, as well as in the delay of ver. 5 and ch. xxiv. 48, we have an intimation that the interval would be no short one. This proceeding is not, strictly speaking, the last judgment, but still the same as that in the former parable; the beginning of judgment at the house of God—the judgment of the millennial advent. This to the servants of Christ (his own servants, ver. 14), is their final judgment—but not that of the rest of the world. We may observe that this great account differs from the coming of the bridegroom, inasmuch as this is altogether concerned with a course of action past—that with a present state of preparation. This holds, in the individual application, of the account after the resurrection; that, at the utmost (and not in the direct sense of the parable even so much), of being ready for his summons at death.

20.] The faithful servant does not take the praise to himself—thou deliveredst unto me is his confession—and beside them the enabling cause of his gain;—‘without Me, can do nothing,’ John xv. 5. This is plainer in Luke (xix. 16), “Thy pound hath gained ten pounds.” See 1 Cor. xv. 10:—and on the joy and alacrity of these faithful servants in the day of reckoning, 1 Thess. ii. 19: 2 Cor. i. 14: Phil. iv. 1.

21.] See the corresponding sentence in Luke xix. 17, and note. The joy here is not a feast, as sometimes interpreted, but that joy spoken of Heb. xii. 2, and Isa. liii. 11—that joy of the Lord arising from the completion of His work and labour of love, of which the first Sabbatical rest of the Creator was typical—Gen. i. 31; ii. 2,—and of which His faithful ones shall in the end partake: see Heb. iv. 3–11: Rev. iii. 21.

Notice the identity of the praise and portion him who a been faithful in less, with those of the first. The words are, as has been well observed, “not, ‘good and successful servant,’ but ‘good and faithful servant:’” and faithfulness does not depend on amount.

24, 25.] This sets forth the excuse which men are perpetually making of human infirmity and inability to keep God’s commands, when they never apply to that grace which might enable them to do so—an excuse, as here, self-convicting, and false at heart.

reaping where thou hast not sown] The connexion of thought in this our Lord’s last parable, with His first (ch. xiii. 3–9), is remarkable. He looks for fruit where He has sown—this is truth: but not beyond the power of the soil by Him enabled—this is man’s lie, to encourage himself in idleness.

I was afraid] See Gen. iii. 10. But that pretended fear, and this insolent speech, are inconsistent, and betray the falsehood of his answer.

thou hast that is thine] This is also false—it was not so—for there was his lord’s time,—and his own labour, which was his lord’s—to be accounted for.

26, 27.] St. Luke prefixes “out of thine own mouth will I judge thee,”—viz. ‘because, knowing the relation between us, that of absolute power on my part over thee,—if thou hadst really thought me such an hard master, thou oughtest&c., in order to avoid utter ruin. But this was not thy real thought—thou wert wicked and slothful.’

thou knewest, &c. is not concessive, but hypothetical;—God is not really such a Master.

the exchangers, in Luke (xix. 23) “the bank” (exchange).

There was a saying very current among the early Fathers, “Be ye worthy exchangers,” which some of them seem to attribute to the Lord, some to one of the Apostles. It is supposed by some to be taken from this place, and it is just possible it may have been: but it more likely was traditional, or from some apocryphal gospel. Suicer discusses the question, and inclines to think that it was a way of expressing the general moral of the two parables in Matt. and Luke.

But, in the interpretation, who are these exchangers? The explanation (Olsh., and adopted by Trench, Parables, p. 247) of their being those stronger characters who may lead the more timid to the useful employments of gifts which they have not energy to use, is objectionable (1) as not answering to the character addressed—he was not timid, but false and slothful:—and (2) nor to the facts of the case: for it is impossible to employ the grace given to one through another’s means, without working one’s self.

I rather take it to mean, ‘If thou hadst really been afraid, &c., slothful as thou art, thou mightest at least, without trouble to thyself, have provided that I should have not been defrauded of the interest of my money—but now thou art both slothful and wicked, in having done me this injustice.’ Observe there would have been no praise due to the servant—but “that which is mine” would not have lost its increase. The machinery of religious and charitable societies in our day is very much in the place of the exchangers. Let the subscribers to them take heed that they be not in the degraded case of this servant, even if his excuse had been genuine.

28–31.] This command is answered in Luke xix. 25, by a remonstrance from those addressed, which the Master overrules by stating the great law of His kingdom. On ch. xiii. 12, we have explained this as applied to the system of teaching by parables. Here it is predicated of the whole Christian life. It is the case even in nature: a limb used is strengthened; disused, becomes weak. The ference of the talent is not a matter of justice between man and man, but is done in illustration of this law, and in virtue of that sovereign power by which God does what He will with his own: see Rom. xi. 29, and note there. In the outer darkness there is again an allusion to the marriage supper of the Lamb, from which the useless servant being excluded, gnashes his teeth with remorse without: see ch. xxii. 13.

31–46.] THE FINAL JUDGMENT OF ALL THE Nations. Peculiar to Matthew. In the two former parables we have seen the difference between, and judgment of, Christians—in their inward readiness for their Lord, and their outward diligence in profiting by his gifts. And both these had reference to that first resurrection and millennial Kingdom, the reality of which is proved by the passages of Scripture cited in the notes above, and during which all Christians shall be judged. We now come to the great and universal judgment at the end of this period, also prophesied of distinctly in order in Rev. xx. 11–15—in which all the dead, small and great, shall stand before God. This last great judgment answers to the judgment on Jerusalem, after the Christians had escaped from it: to the gathering of the eagles (ministers of vengeance) to the carcase. Notice the precision of the words in ver. 31, when (ever)—this setting forth the indefiniteness of the time—the but the distinction from the two parables foregoing; and then, to mark a precise time when all this shall take place—a day of judgment.

Compare, for the better understanding of the distinction and connexion of these ‘two comings’ of the Lord, 1 Thess. iv. 16, 17, and 2 Thess. i. 7–10.

This description is not a parable, though there are in it parabolic passages, eg. as a shepherd&c.: and for that very reason, that which is illustrated by those likenesses is not itself parabolic. It will heighten our estimation of the wonderful sublimity of this description, when we recollect that it was spoken by the Lord only three days before his sufferings.

31. in his glory] This expression, repeated again at the end of the verse, is quite distinct from with power and great glory ch. xiv. 30: see Rev. xx. 11. This His glory is that also of all his saints, with whom He shall be accompanied: see Jude ver. 14. In this his coming they are with the angels, and as the angels: see Rev. xix. 14 (compare ver. 8): Zech. xiv. 5.

32.] The expression all the nations implies all the nations of the world, as distinguished from the elect already gathered to Him, just as the Gentiles were by that name distinguished from his chosen people the Jews. Among these are “the other sheep which He has, not of this fold,” John x. 16.

he shall separate] See Ezek. xxxiv. 17. The sheep are those referred to in Rom. ii. 7, 10; the goats in ib. vv. 8, 9, where this same judgment according to works is spoken of.

34.] THE KING—here for the first and only time does the Lord give Himself this name: see Rev. xix. 16: Rom. xiv. 9.

Come] Whatever of good these persons had done, was all from Him from whom cometh every good gift—and the fruit of his Spirit. And this Spirit is only purchased for man by the work of the Son, in whom the Father is well pleased: and to whom all judgment is committed. And thus they are the blessed of the Father, and those for whom this kingdom is prepared. It is not to the purpose to say that those blessed of... must be the elect of God in the stricter sense (the Father)—and that, because the Kingdom has been prepared for them from the foundation of the world. For evidently this would, in the divine omniscience, be true of every single man who shall come to salvation, whether belonging to those who shall be found worthy to share the first resurrection or not. The Scripture assures us of two resurrections: the first, of the dead in Christ, to meet Him and reign with Him, and hold (1 Cor. vi. 2) judgment over the world: the second, of all the dead, to be judged according to their works. And to what purpose would be a judgment, if all were to be condemned? And if any escape condemnation, to them might the words of this verse be used: so that this objection to the interpretation does not apply.

Election to life is the universal doctrine of Scripture; but not the reprobation of the wicked: see below, on ver. 41. On from the foundation of the world, see John xvii. 24: 1 Pet. i. 20.

37–40.] The answer of these righteous appears to me to shew plainly that they are not to be understood as being the covenanted servants of Christ. Such an answer it would be impossible for them to make, who had done all distinctly with reference to Christ, and for his sake, and with his declaration of ch. x. 40–42 before them. Such a supposition would remove all reality, as indeed it has generally done, from our Lord’s description. See the remarkable difference in the answer of the faithful servants, vv. 20, 22. The saints are already in His glory—judging the world with Him (1 Cor. vi. 2)—accounted as parts of, representatives of, Himself (ver. 40)—in this judgment they are not the judged (John v. 24: 1 Cor. xi. 31). But these who are the judged, know not that all their deeds of love have been done to and for Christ—they are overwhelmed with the sight of the grace which has been working in and for them, and the glory which is now their blessed portion. And notice, that it is not the works, as such, but the love which prompted them—that love which was their faith,—which felt its way, though in darkness, to Him who is Love—which is commended.

40. my brethren] Not necessarily the saints with Him in glory—though primarily those—but also any of the great family of man. Many of those here judged may never have had an opportunity of doing these things to the saints of Christ properly so called.

In this is fulfilled the covenant of God to Abraham, “in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth (so in LXX) be blessed.” Gen. xxii. 18.

41–43.] It is very important to observe the distinction between the blessing, ver. 34, and the curse here. ‘Blessed—of my Father:’—but not ‘cursed of my Father.’ because all man’s salvation is of God—all his condemnation from himself. ‘The Kingdom, prepared for you:’ but ‘the fire, which has been prepared for the devil and his angels’ [greater definiteness could not be given than by the words in the original: that particular fire, that eternal fire, created for a special purpose]—not, for you: because there is election to life—but there is no reprobation to death: a book of Life—but no book of Death; no hell for man—because the blood of Jesus hath purchased life for all: but they who will serve the devil, must share with him in the end.

The repetition of all these particulars shews how exact even for every individual the judgment will be. Stier excellently remarks, that the curse shews the termination of the High Priesthood of Christ, in which office He only intercedes and blesses. Henceforth He is King and Lord—his enemies being now for ever put under his feet.

44, 45.] See note on ver. 37. The sublimity of this description surpasses all imagination—Christ, as the Son of Man, the Shepherd, the King, the Judge—as the centre and end of all human love, bringing out and rewarding his latent grace in those who have lived in love—everlastingly punishing those who have quenched it in an unloving and selfish life—and in the accomplishment of his mediatorial office, causing, even from out of the iniquities of a rebellious world, his sovereign mercy to rejoice against judgment.

46.] See John v. 28, 29; and as taking up the prophetic history at this point, Rev. xxi. 1–8. Observe, the same epithet is used in the original for punishment and life—which are here contraries—for the life here spoken of is not bare existence, which would have annihilation for its opposite; but blessedness and reward, to which punishment and misery are antagonist terms. As regards the interpretation of this chapter, the coincidence of these portions of Scripture prophecy with the process of the great things in Rev. xx. and xxi. is never to be overlooked, and should be our guide to their explanation, however distrustful we may be of its certainty. Those who set this coincidence aside, and interpret each portion by itself, without connexion with the rest, are clearly wrong. The only alternative view seems to be that which regards this as the judgment at the time of Israel's deliverance, previous to the Millennium. This has been urged on me lately by a very able correspondent: but I cannot see how it agrees with the great features of the description as pointed out above.

CHAP. XXVI. 1, 2.] FINAL ANNOUNCEMENT OF HIS SUFFERINGS, NOW CLOSE AT HAND. Mark xiv. 1. Luke xxii. 1. The public office of our Lord as a Teacher having been now fulfilled, His priestly office begins to be entered upon. He had not completed all his discourses, for He delivered, after this, those contained in John xiv.—xvii.—but not in public; only to the inner circle of his disciples. From this point commences THE NARRATIVE OF HIS PASSION.

2. after two days] This gives no certainty as to the time when the words were said: we do not know whether the current day was included or otherwise. But thus much of importance we learn from them: that the delivery of our Lord to be crucified, and the taking place of the Passover, strictly coincided. The solemn mention of them in this connexion is equivalent to a declaration from Himself, if it were needed, of the identity, both of time and meaning, of the two sacrifices; and serves as the fixed point in the difficult chronological arrangement of the history of the Passion. The latter clause, and the Son of man..., depends on ye know as well as the former. Our Lord had doubtless before joined these two events together in His announcements to his disciples. To separate this clause from the former, seems to me to do violence to the construction. It would require and then the Son...

3–5.] CONSPIRACY OF THE JEWISH AUTHORITIES. Mark xiv. 1. Luke xxii. 2. This assembling has no connexion with what has just been related, but follows rather on the end of ch. xxiii.

who was called Caiaphas is in Josephus, “Joseph, who is also Caiaphas.” Valerius Gratus, Procurator of Judæa, had appointed him instead of Simon ben Kamith. He continued through the procuratorship of Pontius Pilate, and was displaced by the proconsul Vitellius, A.D. 37. See note on Luke iii. 2, and chronological table in introduction to Acts.

who was called does not mean who was ‘surnamed,’ but (see ver. 14) implies that some name is to follow, which is more than, or different from, the real one of the person.

Not during the feast] This expression must be taken as meaning the whole period of the feast—the seven days. On the feast-day (A. V.), i.e. the day on which the passover was sacrificed, they could not lay hold of and slay any one, as it was a day of sabbatical obligation (Exod. xii. 16). See note on ver. 17.

6–13.] THE ANOINTING AT BETHANY. Mark xiv. 3–9. John xii. 1–8. On Luke vii. 36–50, see note there. This history of the anointing of our Lord is here inserted out of its chronological place. It occurred six days before the Passover, John xii. 1. It perhaps can hardly be said that in its position here, it accounts in any degree for the subsequent application of Judas to the Sanhedrin: (vv. 14–16), since his name is not even mentioned in it: but I can hardly doubt that it originally was placed where it here stands by one who was aware of its connexion with that application. The paragraphs in the beginning of this chapter come in regular sequence, thus: Jesus announces his approaching Passion: the chief priests, &c. meet and plot His capture, but not during the feast: but when Jesus was in Bethany, &c. occasion was given for an offer to be made to them, which led to its being effected, after all, during the feast. On the rebuke given to Judas at this time having led to his putting into effect his intention of betraying our Lord, see note on John xii. 4, The trace of what I believe to have been the original reason of the anointing being inserted in this place, is still further lost in St. Mark, who instead of when Jesus was...has "and being"...just as if the narrative were continued; and at the end, instead of our them...Judas...went...has "and Judas...went"...as if there were no connexion between the two. It certainly cannot be said of St. Matthew, that he relates the anointing as taking place two days before the Passover: of St. Mark it might be said. It may be observed that St. Luke relates nothing of our Lord's visits to Bethany.

6. Simon the leper] Not at this time a leper, or he could not be at his house receiving guests. It is at least possible, that he may have been healed by our Lord. Who he was, is wholly uncertain. From Martha serving (John xii. 2), it would appear as if she were at home in the house (Luke x. 88 sqq.); and that Lazarus was one of them that sat at meat need not necessarily imply that he was a guest properly so called. He had been probably (see John xii. 9) absent with Jesus at Ephraim, and on this account, and naturally for other reasons, would be an object of interest, and one of the sitters at table.

7. an alabaster box] It was the usual cruse or pot for ointment, with a long narrow neck, and sealed at the top. It was thought that the ointment kept best in these cruses. On the nature of the ointment, see note on "spikenard," Mark xiv. 3.

his head] His feet, according to John xii. 3. See Luke vii. 88, and note there.

8. his disciples] Judas alone is mentioned, John xii. 4. It may have been that some were found ready to second his remark, but that John, from his peculiar position at the table,—if, as is probable, the same as in John xiii. 23,—may not have observed it. If so, the independent origin of the two accounts is even more strikingly shewn.

waste] Bengel remarks, that the word (literally, perdition) is the same as that by which Judas himself is called. John xvii. 12.

9. for much] 800 denarii (John),—even more than that (Mark). On the singular relation which these three accounts bear to one another, see notes on Mark.

10.] It was not only 'a good work,' but a noble act of love, which should be spoken of in all the churches to the end of time. On ver. 11, see notes on Mark, where it is more fully expressed.

12.] I can hardly think that our Lord would have said this, unless there had been in Mary's mind a distinct reference to His burial, in doing the act. All the company surely knew well that His death, and that by crucifixion, was near at hand: can we suppose one who so closely observed his words as Mary, not to have been possessed with the thought of that which was about to happen? The "she is come beforehand to anoint" of Mark (xiv. 8), and the "against the day of my burying hath she kept this" of John (xii. 7), point even more strongly to her intention.

13.] The only case in which our Lord has made such a promise. We cannot but be struck with the majesty of this prophetic announcement: introduced with the peculiar and weighty verily I say unto you,—conveying, by implication, the whole mystery of the gospel which should go forth from His Death as its source,—looking forward to the end of time, when it have been preached in the whole world,—and specifying the fact that this deed should be recorded wherever it is preached. We may notice (1) that this announcement is a distinct prophetic recognition by our Lord of the existence of written records, in which the deed should be related; for in no other conceivable way could the universality of mention be brought about: (2) that we have here (if indeed we needed it) a convincing argument against that view of our three first Gospels which supposes them to have been compiled from an original document; for if there had been such a document, it must have contained this narrative, and no one using such a Gospel could have failed to insert this narrative, accompanied by such a promise, in his own work,—which St. Luke has not done: (3) that the same consideration is equally decisive against St. Luke having used, or even seen, our present Gospels of Matthew and Mark. (4) As regards the practical use of the announcement, we see that though the honourable mention of a noble deed is thereby recognized by our Lord as a legitimate source of joy to us, yet by the very nature of the case all regard to such mention as a motive is excluded. The motive was love alone.

14–16.] COMPACT OF JUDAS WITH THE CHIEF PRIESTS TO BETRAY HIM. Mark xiv. 10, 11. Luke xxii. 3–6. (See also John xiii. 2.) When this took place, does not appear. In all probability, immediately after the conclusion of our Lord's discourses, and therefore coincidently with the meeting of the Sanhedrim in ver. 3. As these verses bring before us the first overt act of Judas's treachery, I will give here what appears to me the true estimate of his character and motives. In the main, my view agrees with that given by Neander. I believe that Judas at first became attached to our Lord with much the same view as the other Apostles. He appears to have been a man with a practical talent for this world's business, which gave occasion to his being appointed the Treasurer, or Bursar, of the company (John xii. 6; xiii. 29). But the self-seeking, sensuous element, which his character had in common with that of the other Apostles, was deeper rooted in him; and the spirit and love of Christ gained no such influence over him as over the others, who were more disposed to the reception of divine things. In proportion as he found our Lord's progress disappoint his greedy anticipations, did his attachment to Him give place to coldness and aversion. The exhibition of miracles alone could not keep him faithful, when once the deeper appreciation of the Lord's divine Person failed. We find by implication a remarkable example of this in John vi. 60–66, 70, 71, where the denunciation of the one unfaithful among the Twelve seems to point to the (then) state of his mind, as already beginning to be scandalized at Christ. Add to this, that latterly the increasing clearness of the Lord's announcements of His approaching passion and death, while they gradually opened the eyes of the other Apostles to some terrible event to come, without shaking their attachment to Him, was calculated to involve in more bitter disappointment and disgust one so disposed to Him as Judas was.

The actually exciting causes of the deed of treachery at this particular time may have been many. The reproof administered at Bethany (on the Saturday evening probably),—disappointment at seeing the triumphal entry followed, not by the adhesion, but by the more bitter enmity of the Jewish authorities,—the denunciations of our Lord in ch. xxii. xxiii. rendering the breach irreparable,—and perhaps His last announcement in ver. 2, making it certain that His death would soon take place, and sharpening the eagerness of the traitor to profit by it:—all these may have influenced him to apply to the chief priests as he did. With to his motive in general, I cannot think that he had any design but that of sordid gain, to be achieved by the darkest treachery. See further on this the note on ch. xxvii. 3.

15.] The verb rendered covenanted...for, may mean either weighed out, or appointed. That the money was paid to Judas (ch. xxvii. 8) is no decisive argument for the former meaning; for it may have been paid on the delivery of Jesus to the Sanhedrin. The “covenanted” of St. Luke and “promised” of St. Mark would lead us to prefer the other.

thirty pieces of silver] Thirty shekels, the price of the life of a servant, Exod. xxi. 32. Between three and four pounds of our money. St. Matthew is the only Evangelist who mentions the sum. De Wette and others have supposed that the accurate mention of the thirty pieces of silver has arisen from the prophecy of Zechariah (xi. 12), which St. Matthew clearly has in view. The others have simply “money.” It is just possible that the thirty pieces may have merely earnest-money: but a difficulty attends the supposition; if so, Judas would have been entitled to the whole on our Lord being delivered up to the Sanhedrim (for this was all he undertook to do); whereas we find (ch. xxvii. 8) that, after our Lord's condemnation, Judas brought only the thirty pieces back, and nothing more. See note there.

17–19.] PREPARATION FOR CELEBRATING THE PASSOVER. Mark xiv. 12–16. Luke xxii. 7–18. The whole narrative which follows is extremely difficult to arrange and account for chronologically. Our Evangelist is the least circumstantial, and, as will I think appear, the least exact in detail of the three. St. Mark partially fills up the outline;—but the account of St. Luke is the most detailed, and I believe the most exact. It is to be noticed that the narrative which St. Paul gives, 1 Cor. xi. 23–25, of the institution of the Lord's Supper, and which he states he ‘received from the Lord,’ coincides almost verbatim with that given by St. Luke. But while we say this, it must not be forgotten that over all three narratives extends the great difficulty of explaining the first day of unleavened bread (Matt., Mark), or “the day of unleavened bread” (Luke), and of reconciling the impression undeniably conveyed by them, that the Lord and his disciples ate the usual Passover, with the narrative of St. John, which not only does not sanction, but I believe absolutely excludes such a supposition. I shall give, in as short a compass as I can, the various solutions which have been attempted, and the objections to them; fairly confessing that none of them satisfy me, and that at present I have none of my own. I will (1) state the grounds of the difficulty itself. The day alluded to in all four histories as that of the supper, which is unquestionably one and identical, is Thursday, the 13th of Nisan. Now the day of the Passover being slain and eaten was the 14th of Nisan (Exod. xii. 6, 18: Lev. xxiii. 5: Numb. ix. 8; xxviii. 16: Ezek. xlvi. 21), between the evenings (so literally in Heb.), which was interpreted by the generality of the Jews to mean the interval between the first westering of the sun (3 p.m.) and his setting,—but by the Karaites and Samaritans that between sunset and darkness:—in either case, however, the day was the same. The feast of unleavened bread began at the very time of eating the Passover (Exod. xii. 18), so that the first day of the feast of unleavened bread was the 15th (Numb. xxviii. 17). All this with the narrative of St. John, where (xiii. 1) the last supper takes place before the feast of the Passover—where the disciples think (ib. ver. 29) that Judas had been directed to buy the things which they had need of against the feast—where the Jews (xviii. 28) would not enter into the judgment-hall, lest they should be defiled, but that they might eat the Passover (see note on John xviii. 28)—where at the exhibition of our Lord by Pilate (on the Friday at noon) it was (xix. 14) the preparation of the Passover—and where it could be said (xix. 31) for that Sabbath day was an high day,—being, as it was, a double Sabbath,—the coincidence of the first day of unleavened bread, which was sabbatically hallowed (Exod. xii. 16), with an actual sabbath. But as plainly, it does not agree with the view of the three other Evangelists, who not only relate the meal on the evening of the 13th of Nisan to have been a Passover, but manifestly regard it as the ordinary legal time of eating it: “on the first day of unleavened bread, when they killed the passover” (Mark xiv. 12), “when the Passover must be killed” (Luke xxii. 7), and in our Gospel by implication, in the use of the Passover, &c., without any qualifying remark.

The solutions which have been proposed are the following: (1) that the Passover which our Lord and his disciples ate, was not the ordinary, but an anticipatory one, seeing that He himself was about to be sacrificed as the true Passover at the legal time. To this it may be objected, that such an anticipation would have been wholly unprecedented and irregular, in a matter most strictly laid down by the law; and that in the three Gospels there is no allusion to it, but rather every thing (see above) to render it improbable. (2) That our Lord and his disciples ate the Passover, but at the time observed by a certain portion of the Jews, while He himself was sacrificed at the time generally observed. This solution is objectionable, as wanting any historical testimony whereon to ground it, being in fact a pure assumption. Besides, it is clearly inconsistent with Mark xiv. 12: Luke xxii. 7, cited above. A similar objection lies against (3) the notion that our Lord ate the Passover at the strictly legal, the Jews at an inaccurate and illegal time. (4) Our Lord ate only a commemorative Passover, such as the Jews now celebrate, and not a sacrificial Passover (Grotius). But this is refuted by the absence of any mention of a commemorative Passover before the destruction of Jerusalem; besides its inconsistency with the above-cited passages. (5) Our Lord did not eat the Passover at all. But this is plainly not a solution of the difficulty, but a setting aside of one of the differing accounts: for the three Gospels manifestly give the impression that He did eat it. (6) The solution offered by Chrysostom, on our ver. 58, is at least ingenious. The Council, he says, did not eat their Passover at the proper time, but “on another day, and broke the law, because of their eagerness about this execution...they chose even to neglect the Passover, that they might fulfil their murderous desire.” This had been suggested before in a scholium of Eusebius. But St. John’s habit of noticing and explaining all such exceptional circumstances, makes it very improbable. I may state, as some solutions have been sent me by correspondents, that I have seen nothing besides the above, which justifies any extended notice.

I will conclude this note by offering a few hints which, though not pointing to any particular solution, ought I think to enter into the consideration of the question. (a) That, on the evening of the 13th (i. e. the beginning of the 14th) of Nisan, the Lord ate a meal with his disciples, at which the announcement that one of them should betray Him was made: after which He went into the garden of Gethsemane, and was betrayed (Matt., Mark, Luke, John):—(b) That, in some sense or other, this meal was regarded as the eating of the Passover (Matt., Mark, Luke). (The same may be inferred even from John; for some of the disciples must have gone into the praetorium, and have heard the conversation between our Lord and Pilate [John xviii. 33–38]: and as they were equally bound with the other Jews to eat the Passover, would equally with them have been incapacitated from so doing by having incurred defilement, had they not eaten theirs previously. It would appear too, from Joseph of Arimathea going to Pilate during the preparation [Mark xv. 42, 43], that he also had eaten his passover.) (c) That it was not the ordinary passover of the Jews: for (Exod. xii. 22) when it was eaten, none might go out of the house until morning; whereas, not only did Judas go out during the meal (John xiii. 29), but our Lord and the disciples went out when the meal was finished. Also when Judas went out, it was understood that he was gone to buy, which could not have been the case, had it been the night of eating the Passover, which in all years was sabbatically hallowed. (d) St. John, who omits all mention of the Paschal nature of this meal, also omits all mention of the distribution of the symbolic bread and wine. The latter act was, strictly speaking, anticipatory: the Body was not yet broken, nor the Blood shed (but see note on ver. 26, end). Is it possible that the words in Luke xxii. 15, 16 may have been meant by our Lord as an express declaration of the anticipatory nature of that Passover meal likewise? May they mean, ‘I have been most anxious to eat this Paschal meal with you to-night (before I suffer), for I shall not eat it to-morrow,—I shall not eat of it any more with you?’ May a hint to the same effect be intended in ‘my time is at hand’ (ver. 18), as accounting for the time of making ready—may the present tense itself (I will keep is literally I keep) have the same reference?

I may remark that the whole of the narrative of St. John, as compared with the others, satisfies me that he can never have seen their accounts. It is inconceivable, that one writing for the purpose avowed in John xx. 31, could have found the three accounts as we have them, and have made no more allusion to the discrepancy than the faint (and to all appearance undesigned) ones in ib. ch. xii. 1; xiii. 1, 29; xviii. 28.

17. the first day of...unleavened bread] If this night had been the ordinary time of sacrificing the Passover, the day preceding would not indeed have been strictly the first day of unleavened bread; but there is reason to suppose that it was accounted so. The putting away leaven from the houses was of the work of the day, and the eating of the unleavened bread actually commenced in the evening. Thus Josephus mentions eight days as constituting the feast,—including this day in it.

Where wilt thou? The ‘making ready’ would include the following particulars; the ration of the guest-chamber itself (which however in this case was already done, see Mark xiv. 15 and note);—the lamb already kept up from the 10th (Exod. xii. 3) had to be slain in the fore-court of the temple (2 Chron. xxxv. 5);—the unleavened bread, bitter herbs, &c., prepared;—and the room arranged. This report does not represent the whole that passed: it was the Lord who sent the two disciples; and in reply this enquiry was made (Luke).

18.] The person spoken of was unknown even by name, as appears from Mark and Luke, where he is to be found by the turning in of a man with a pitcher of water. The Lord spoke not from any previous arrangement, as some have thought, but in virtue of His knowledge, and command of circumstances. Compare the command ch. xxi. 2f., and that in ch. xvii. 27. In the words to such a man here must be involved the additional circumstance mentioned by St. Mark and St. Luke, but perhaps unknown to our narrator: see note on Luke xxii. 10, where the fullest account is found.

The term the Master, common to the three accounts, does not imply that the man was a disciple of our Lord. It was the common practice during the feast for persons to receive strangers into their houses gratuitously, for the purpose of eating the Passover: and in this description of Himself in addressing a stranger, our Lord has a deep meaning, as (perhaps, but see note) in the Lord in ch. xxi. 3,—‘Our Master and thine says.’ It is His form of ‘pressing’ for the service of the King of this earth, the things that are therein.

My time is not ‘the time of the feast,’ but my own time, i.e. for suffering: see John vii. 8, and often. There is no reason for supposing from this expression that the man addressed was aware of its meaning. The bearers of the message were; and the words, to the receiver of it, bore with them a weighty reason of their own, which, with such a title as the Master prefixed, he was bound to respect. For these words we are indebted to St. Matthew’s narrative, 20–25.] JESUS, CELEBRATING THE PASSOVER, ANNOUNCES HIS BETRAYER. Mark xiv. 17–21. John xiii. 21 ff. Our Lord and the Twelve were a full Paschal company; ten persons was the ordinary and minimum number. Here come in (1) the expression of our Lord’s desire to eat this Passover before His suffering, Luke xxii. 15, 16; (2) the division of the first cup, ib. vv. 17, 18; (3) the washing of the disciples’ feet, John xiii. 1–20 (? see note, John xiii. 22). I mention these, not that I have any desire to reduce the four accounts to a harmonized narrative, for that I believe to be impossible, and the attempt wholly unprofitable; but because they are additional circumstances, placed by their narrators at this period of the feast. I shall similarly notice all such additional matter, but without any idea of harmonizing the apparent discrepancies of the four (as appears to me) entirely distinct and independent reports.

21.] This announcement is common to Matt., Mark, and John. In the part of the events of the supper which relates to Judas, St. Luke is deficient, giving no further report of them than vv. 21–23. The whole minute detail is given by St. John, who bore a considerable part in it.

22.] In the accounts of St. Luke and St. John, this enquiry is made “among themselves looking one on another.” The real enquiry from the Lord was made by John himself, owing to a sign from Peter. This part of John’s narrative stands in the highest position for accuracy of detail, and the facts related in it are evidently the ground of the other accounts.

23.] These first words represent the answer of our Lord to John’s question (John xiii. 26). The latter (ver. 24 were not said now, but (Luke, vv. 21, 22) formed part of the previous announcement in our ver. 21.

25.] I cannot understand these words (which are peculiar to our Gospel) otherwise than as an imperfect report of what really happened, viz. that the Lord dipped the sop, and gave it to Judas, thereby answering the general doubt, in which the traitor had impudently presumed to feign a share. If the question Is it I? before, represented looked on one another doubting, and was our narrator’s impression of what was in reality not a spoken but a signified question,—why now also should not this question and answer represent that Judas took part in that doubt, and was, not by word of mouth, but by a decisive sign, of which our author was not aware, declared to be the traitor? Both cannot have happened;—for John xiii. 28) no one knew (not even John, see note there) why Judas went out; whereas if he had been openly (and it is out of the question to suppose a private communication between our Lord and him) declared to be the traitor, reason enough would have been furnished for his immediately leaving the chamber. (Still, consult the note on Luke, vv. 24–30, where I have left room for modifying this view.) I am aware that this explanation will give offence to those who believe that every part of each account may be tessellated into one consistent and complete whole. Stier handles the above supposition very roughly, and speaks of its upholders in no measured terms. Valuable as are the researches of this Commentator into the inner sense of the Lord’s words, and ready as I am to acknowledge continual obligation to him, I cannot but think that in the whole interpretation of this part of the Gospel-history, he and his school have fallen into the error of a too minute and letter-serving exposition. In their anxiety to retain every portion of every account in its strict literal sense, they are obliged to commit many inconsistencies. A striking instance of this is also furnished in Mr. Birk’s Horse Evangelicae, p. 411: where in treating of this difficulty he says, “If we suppose St. Matthew to express the substantial meaning of our Lord’s reply, rather than its precise words, the two accounts are easily reconciled. The question of Judas might concur with St. John’s private enquiry, and the same sign which revealed the traitor to the beloved disciple, would be an affirmative reply to himself, equivalent to the words in the Gospel—‘Thou hast said.’” Very true, and nearly what I have maintained above: but the literal harmonizers seem to be quite blind to the fact, that this principle of interpretation, which they use when it suits them, is the very one against which they so vehemently protest when others use it, and for the use of which they call them such hard names. On Thou hast said, see below, ver 64, note.

26–29.] INSTITUTION OF THE LORD’S SUPPER. Mark xiv. 22–25. Luke xxii. 19, 20. 1 Cor. xi. 23–25. We may remark on this important point of our narrative, (1) That it was demonstrably our Lord’s intention to found an ordinance for those who should believe on Him; (2) that this ordinance had some analogy with that which He and the Apostles were then celebrating. The first of these assertions depends on the express word of the Apostle Paul; who in giving directions for the due celebration of the rite of the Lord’s Supper, states in relation to it that he had received from the Lord the account of its institution, which he then gives. He who can set this aside, must set aside with it all apostolic testimony whatever. The second is shewn by the fact, that what now took place was during the celebration of the Passover: that the same Paul states that Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us; thus identifying the Body broken, and Blood shed, of which the bread and wine here are symbolic, with the Paschal feast. (3) That the key to the right understanding of what took place must be found in our Lord’s discourse after the feeding of the five thousand in John vi., since He there, and there only besides at this place, speaks of His flesh and blood, in the connexion found here. (4) It is impossible to assign to this event its precise place in the meal. St. Luke inserts it before the announcement of the treason of Judas: St. Matt. and St. Mark after it. It is doubtful whether the accounts found in the Talmud and elsewhere of the ceremonies in the Paschal feast are to be depended on:—they are exceedingly complicated. Thus much seems clear,—that our Lord blessed and passed round two cups, one before, the other after the supper,—and that He distributed the unleavened cake during the meal. More than this is conjecture. The dipping of the hand in the dish, and dipping and giving the sop, may also possibly correspond to parts of the Jewish ceremonial.

The definite article is before bread in the original, but no especial stress must be laid on it; it would be the bread which lay before Him: see below. The bread would be unleavened, as the day was (see Exod. xii. 8).

blessed it, and gave thanks, amount to the same in practice. The looking up to heaven, and giving thanks was a virtual ‘blessing’ of the meal or the bread. It was customary in the Paschal meal for the Master, in breaking the bread, to give thanks for the fruit of the earth. But our Lord did more than this: He gave thanks, as Grotius observes, not only for the old creation, but for the new also, for the redemption of mankind, regarded as now accomplished. From this giving of thanks for, and blessing, the offering, the Holy Communion has been from the earliest times also called eucharist (eucharistia, giving of thanks).

brake it] It was a round cake of unleavened bread, which the Lord broke and divided: signifying thereby both the breaking of His body on the Cross, and the participation in the benefits of his death by all His. Hence the act of communion was known by the name the breaking of bread, Acts ii. 42. See 1 Cor. x. 16, also Isa. lviii. 7: Lam. iv. 4.

Take, eat] Our Gospel alone has both words. “Eat” is spurious in Mark: both words, in 1 Cor. xi. 24. Here, they are undoubtedly: and seem to shew us (see note on Luke, ver. 17) that the Lord did not Himself partake of the bread or wine. It is thought by some however that He did: e.g. Chrysostom, “He Himself drank His own Blood.” But the analogy of the whole, as well as these words, and “Drink ye all of it” below, leads us to a different conclusion. Our Lord’s non-participation is however no rule for the administrator of the rite in after times. Although in one sense he represents Christ, blessing, breaking, and distributing; in another, he is one of the disciples, examining himself, confessing, partaking. Throughout all Church ministrations this double capacity must be borne in mind. Olshausen maintains the opposite view, and holds that the minister cannot unite in himself the two characters. But setting the inner verity of the matter for a moment aside, how, if so, should an unassisted minister ever communicate?

this is my body] this, which I now offer to you, this bread. The form of expression is important, not being this bread, or this wine, but this, in both cases, or this cup, not the bread or wine itself, but the thing in each case;—precluding all idea of a substantial change.

is] On this much-controverted word itself no stress is to be laid. In the original tongue in which probably our Lord spoke, it would not be expressed: and as it now stands, it is merely the logical copula between the subject, this, and the predicate, my Body. The connexion of these two will require deeper consideration. First we may observe, as above of the subject, so here of the predicate, that it is not “My flesh” (although that very expression is didactically used in its general sense in John vi. 51, as applying to the bread), but My Body. The body is made up of flesh and blood; and although analogically the bread may represent one and the wine the other, the assertion here is not to be analogically taken merely: this which I give you, (is) my Body. Under this is the mystery of my Body: the assertion has a literal, and has also a spiritual or symbolic meaning. And it is the literal meaning which gives to the spiritual and symbolic meaning its fitness and fulness. In the literal meaning then, this (is) my Body, we have BREAD, ‘the staff of life,’ identified with THE BODY OF THE LORD: not that particular bread with that particular flesh which at that moment constituted the Body before them, nor any particular bread with the present Body of the Lord in heaven: but this, the food of man, with my body. This is strikingly set forth in John vi. 51. Now the mystery of the Lord’s Body is, that in and by it is all created being upheld: in Him all things consist, Col. i. 17; in Him was life, John i. 4. And thus generally, and in the widest sense, is the Body of the Lord the sustenance and upholding of all living. Our very bodies are dependent upon his, and unless by his Body standing pure and accepted before the Father could not exist nor be nourished. So that to all living things, in this largest sense, to live, is Christ. And all our nourishment and means of upholding are Christ. In this sense his Body is the Life of the world. Thus the fitness of the symbol for the thing now to be signified is shewn, not merely by analogy, but by the deep verities of Redemption. And this general and lower sense, underlying, as it does, all the spiritual and higher senses in John vi., brings us to the symbolic meaning, which the Lord now first and expressly attaches to this sacramental bread.

Rising into the higher region of spiritual things,—in and by the same Body of the Lord, standing before the Father in accepted righteousness, is all spiritual being upheld, but by the inward and spiritual process of feeding upon Him by faith: of making that Body our own, causing it to pass into and nourish our souls, even as the substance of the bread into and nourishes our bodies. Of this feeding upon Christ in the spirit by faith, is the sacramental bread the symbol to us. When the faithful in the Lord’s Supper press with their teeth that sustenance, which is, even to the animal life of their bodies, the Body of Christ, whereby alone all animated being is upheld,—they feed in their souls on that Body of righteousness and acceptance, by partaking of which alone the body and soul are nourished unto everlasting life. And as, in the more general and natural sense, all that nourishes the body is the Body of Christ given for all,—so to them, in the inner spiritual sense, is the sacramental bread symbolic of that Body given for them,—their standing in which, in the adoption of sons, is witnessed by the sending abroad of the Spirit in their hearts. This last leads us to the important addition in Luke and 1 Cor. (but omitted here and in Mark) which is (being given, Luke,—omitted in 1 Cor.) for you,—this do in remembrance of me. On these words we may remark (1) that the participle in the original is present; and, rendered with reference to the time when it was spoken, would be which is being given. The Passion had already begun; in fact the whole life on earth was this giving and breaking, consummated by his death: (2) that the commemorative part of the rite here enjoined strictly depends upon the symbolic meaning, and that, for its fitness, upon the literal meaning. The commemoration is of Him, in so far as He has come down into Time, and enacted the great acts of Redemption on this our world,—and shewn himself to us as living and speaking Man, an object of our personal love and affectionate remembrance:—but the other and higher parts of the Sacrament have regard to the results of those same acts of Redemption, as they are eternized in the counsels of the Father,—as the Lamb is slain from the foundation of the world (Rev. xiii. 8).

27. gave it] He gave, not to each, but once for all: in remarkable coincidence with Luke xxii. 17. take this and divide it amongst yourselves. This was after the meal was ended: likewise also the cup after supper. (Luke and 1 Cor.) As remarked above, it is quite uncertain whether our Lord followed minutely the Jewish practices, and we cannot therefore say whether the cup was one of wine and water mixed. It hardly follows from the expression of ver. 29, of this fruit of the vine, that it was of unmixed wine. The word likewise (in Luke and 1 Cor.) contains our details of taking and giving thanks in it. Drink ye all of it] Peculiar to Matthew, preserved however in substance by Mark's “and they all drank of it.” The all is remarkable, especially with reference to the practice of the Church of Rome, which forbids the cup to the laity. Calvin remarks: “Why did He simply command them to eat the bread, while of the cup He commanded them all to drink? It is as if He had intended to anticipate the craft of Satan.” It is on all accounts probable, and this command confirms the probability, that Judas was present, and partook of both parts of this first communion. The expressions are such throughout as to lead us to suppose that the same persons, the Twelve, were present. On the circumstance mentioned John xiii. 30, which has mainly contributed to the other opinion, see note there.

28. for this is my blood of the [new] testament] So St. Mark also, omitting for and new. In Luke and 1 Cor. there is an important verbal difference. This cup is the new testament in my blood. But if we consider the matter closely, the real difference is but trifling, if any. Let us recur to the paschal rite. The lamb (Christ our passover) being killed, the blood (the blood of the covenant [testament], Exod. xxiv. 8) is sprinkled on the doorposts, and is a sign to the destroying angel to spare the house. The blood of the covenant is the blood of the lamb. So also in the new covenant. The blood of the Lamb of God, slain for us, being not only as in the former case, sprinkled on, but actually partaken spiritually and assimilated by the faithful soul, is the blood of the new covenant; and the sacramental cup, is, signifies, sets forth (1 Cor. xi. 26), this covenant in His blood, i.e. consisting in a participation in His blood. With this explanation let us recur to the words in our text. First it will be observed that there is not here that absolute assertion which “this is My body” conveyed. It is not “this is my blood” absolutely. Wine, in general, does not represent by itself the effects (on the creation) of the blood of Christ; it, like every other nourishment of the body, is nourishment to us by and in Him, forasmuch as in Him all things consist: but there is no peculiar propriety whereby it is to us his Blood alone. But it is made so by a covenant office which it holds in his own declaration. Without shedding of blood, was no remission of sins under the old covenant: and blood was, throughout, the covenant sign of forgiveness and acceptance. Now all this blood of sacrifice finds its true reality and fulfilment in the blood of Christ, shed for the remission of sins. This is the very promise of the new covenant, see Heb. viii. 8–13, as distinguished from the old: the remission of sins, once for all,—whereas the old had continual offerings, which could not do this, Heb. x. 3, 4. And of this remission, the result of the outpouring of the blood of Christ,—first and most generally in bringing all creation into reconciliation with the Father (see Col. i. 20),—secondly and individually, in the application by faith of that blood to the believing soul,—do the faithful in the Lord's Supper partake.

which is [being] shed for many (for you, Luke)] On the present participle, see above. The situation of the words in Luke is remarkable; for the cup is the subject of the sentence, and the new testament the predicate. See note there.

for the remission of sins] Peculiar to Matthew: see above. The connexion is not “Drink it... for the remission of sins.” In the Sacrament, not the forgiveness of sins itself, but the refreshing and confirming assurance of that state of forgiveness is conveyed. The disciples (with one exception) were clean before the institution: John xiii. 10, 11. St. Paul, in 1 Cor. xi. 25, repeats the Do this as oft as ye drink it in remembrance of Me. On the words as oft as ye drink it, see note there.

In concluding this note, I will observe that it is not the office of a Commentator to enter the arena of controversy respecting transubstantiation, further than by his interpretation his opinions are made apparent. It will be seen how entirely opposed to such a dogma is the view above given of the Sacrament. Once introduce it, and it utterly destroys both the verity of Christ's Body, and the sacramental nature of the ordinance. That it has done so, is proved (if further need be) by the mutilation of the Sacrament, and disobedience to the divine command, in the Church of Rome. See further notices of this in notes on 1 Cor. x. 16, and on John vi.

29.] This declaration I believe to be distinct from that in Luke xxii. 18. That was spoken over the first cup—this over one of the following. In addition to what has been said on Luke, we may observe, (1) that our Lord still calls the sacramental cup the fruit of the vine, although by Himself pronounced to be His Blood: (2) that these words carry on the meaning and continuance of this eucharistic ordinance, even into the new heavens and new earth. As Thiersch excellently says, “The Lord’s Supper points not only to the past, but to the future also. It has not only a commemorative, but also a prophetic meaning. In it we have not only to shew forth the Lord’s death, until He come, but we have also to think of the time when He shall come to celebrate his holy Supper with his own, new, in his Kingdom of Glory. Every celebration of the Lord’s Supper is a foretaste and prophetic anticipation of the great Marriage Supper which is prepared for the Church at the second appearing of Christ. This import of the Sacrament is declared in the words of the Lord, ‘I will not drink henceforth, &c.’ These words ought never to be omitted in any liturgical form of administering the Communion.”

30–35.] DECLARATION THAT ALL SHOULD FORSAKE HIM. CONFIDENCE OF PETER. Mark xiv. 26–31. See Luke xxii. 31–38; John xiii. 36–38. Here, accurately speaking perhaps between singing the hymn and going out, come in the discourses and prayer of our Lord in John xiv. xv. xvi. xvii., spoken (see note on John xiv. 31) without change of place in the supper-chamber.

The hymn was in all probability the last of that which the Jews called the Hallel, or great Hallel, which consisted of Psalms cxv.—cxviii.; the former part (Psalms cxiii. cxiv.) having been sung during the meal. It is unlikely that this took place after the solemn prayer in John xvii.

30. went out] St. Luke (ver. 39) adds “as he was wont”—namely, every evening since his return to Jerusalem.

31.] All (emphatic) ye seems to be used as distinguishing those present from the one, who had me out.

offended] The word is ere used in a pregnant meaning, including what followed,—desertion, and, in one case, denial.

for it is written] This is a very important citation, and has been much misunderstood; how much, may appear from Grotius’s remark, that Zechariah’s words are not directly alluded to: nay, that in them rather is the saying used of some bad shepherd. But, on the contrary, if we examine Zech. xi. xii. xiii., we must I think come to the conclusion that the shepherd spoken of xi. 7–14, who is rejected and sold, who is said to have been pierced (xii. 10), is also spoken of in ch. xiii. 7. Stier has gone at length into the meaning of the whole prophecy, and especially that of the word ‘my fellow,’ and shewn that the reference can be to no other than the Messiah.

32.] In this announcement our Lord seems to have in mind the remainder of the verse in Zechariah: “and I will turn mine hand upon the little ones.” As this could not be cited in any intelligible connexion with present circumstances, our Lord gives the announcement of its fulfilment, in a promise to precede them (a pastoral office, see John x. 4) into Galilee, whither they should naturally return after the feast was over: see ch. xxviii. 7, 10, 16.

33.] Nothing can bear a greater impress of exactitude than this reply. Peter had been before warned (see note on Luke, vv. 31–34); and still remaining in the same spirit of self-confident attachment, now that he is included among the all, not specially addressed,—breaks out into this asseveration, which carries completely with it the testimony that it was not the first. Men do not bring themselves out so strongly, unless their fidelity has been previously attained.

34.] The very words in their order are, I doubt not, reported by St. Mark,—“This day, even in this night, before the cock crow twice, thou shalt deny me thrice.” The contrast to Peter’s boast, and the climax, is in these words the strongest; and the inference also comes out most clearly, that they likewise were not now said for the first time.

The first cock-crowing is at midnight: but inasmuch as few hear it,—when the word is used generally, we mean the second crowing, early in the morning, before dawn. If this view be taken, the cock-crowing and double cock-crowing amount to the same—only the latter is the more precise expression. It is most likely that Peter understood this expression as only a mark of time, and therefore received it, as when it was spoken before, as merely an expression of distrust on the Lord’s part; it was this solemn and circumstantial repetition of it which afterwards struck upon his mind, when the sign itself was literally fulfilled.

A question has been raised whether cocks were usually kept or even allowed in Jerusalem. No such bird is mentioned in the O.T., and the Mischna states that the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and the priests every where, kept no fowls, because they scratched up unclean worms. But the Talmud is here not consistent with itself: and Lightfoot brings forward a story which proves it. And there might be many kept by the resident Romans, over whom the Jews had no power.

We must not overlook the spiritual parabolic import of this warning. Peter stands here as a representative of all disciples who deny or forget Christ—and the watchful bird that cries in the night is that warning voice which ‘speaketh once, yea twice,’ to call them to repentance: see Rom. xiii. 11, 12.

35.] This though I must again appears to have the precision of a repeated asseveration. St. Mark has the stronger expression “he spake the more vehemently,” which even more clearly indicates that the die with thee not now first said. The rest said it, but not so earnestly perhaps;—at all events, Peter’s confidence cast theirs into the shade.

36–46.] OUR LORD’ S AGONY AT GETHSEMANE. Mark xiv. 32–42. Luke xxii. 39–46. John xviii. 1. The account of the temptation, and of the agony in Gethsemane is peculiar to the three first Evangelists. But it does not therefore follow that there is, in their narratives, any inconsistency with St. John’s setting forth of the Person of Christ. For it must be remembered, that, as we find in their accounts frequent manifestations of the divine nature, and indications of future glory, about, and during this conflict,—so in St. John’s account, which brings out more the divine side of our Lord’s working and speaking, we find frequent allusions to his human weakness and distress of spirit. For examples of the first, see vv. 13, 24, 29, 32, 53, and the parallels in Mark and Luke; and Luke xxii. 30, 32, 37, 43; of the latter, John xii. 27; xiii. 21; xiv. 30; xvi. 32.

The right understanding of the whole important narration must be acquired by bearing in mind the reality of the manhood of our Lord, in all its abasement and weakness:—by following out in Him the analogy which per the characteristics of human suffering—the strength of the resolved spirit, and calm of the resigned will, continually broken in upon by the inward giving way of human feebleness, and limited power of endurance. But as in us, so in the Lord, these seasons of dread and conflict stir not the ruling will, alter not the firm resolve. This is most manifest in His first prayer—if it be possible—‘if consistent with that work which I have covenanted to do.’ Here is the reserve of the will to suffer—it is never stirred (see below). The conflict however of the Lord differs from ours in this,—that in us, the ruling will itself is but a phase of our human will, and may be and is often carried away by the excess of depression and suffering; whereas in Him it was the divine Personality in which the higher Will of the covenant was eternally fixed,—struggling with the flesh now overwhelmed with an horrible dread, and striving to escape away (see the whole of Ps. lv.). Besides that, by that uplifting into a superhuman circle of Knowledge, with which the indwelling of the Godhead endowed His humanity, His flesh, with all its capacities and apprehensions, was brought at once into immediate and simultaneous contact with every circumstance of horror and pain that awaited Him (John xviii. 4), which is never the case with us. Not only are the objects of dread gradually unveiled to our minds, but hope is ever suggesting that things may not be so bad as our fears represent them.

Then we must not forget, that as the flesh gave way under dread of suffering, so the human soul was troubled with all the attendant circumstances of that suffering—betrayal, desertion, shame (see Ps. lv. again, vv. 12–14, 20, 21; xxxviii. 11, 12; lxxxviii. al.). Nor again must we pass over the last and deepest mystery of the Passion—the consideration, that upon the holy and innocent Lamb of God rested the burden of all human sin—that to Him, death, as the punishment of sin, bore a dark and dreadful meaning, inconceivable by any of us, whose inner will is tainted by the love of sin. See on this part of the Redeemer’s agony, Ps. xl. 12; xxxviii. 1–10. See also as a comment on the whole, Heb. v. 7–10, and notes there.

The three accounts do not differ in any important particulars. St. Luke merely gives a general summary of the Lord’s prayers and his sayings to the disciples, but inserts (see below) two details not found in the others. St. Mark’s account and St. Matthew’s are very nearly related, and have evidently sprung from the same source.

36.] St. Mark alone, besides our account, mentions the name of the place—St. Luke merely calls it “the place,” in allusion to “as wont” before. St. John informs us that it was a garden. The name signifies ‘an oil press.’ It was at the foot of the Mount of Olives, in the valley of the Kedron, the other side of the brook from the city (John xviii. 1).

while I go and pray] Such is the name which our Lord gives to that which was coming upon Him, in speaking to the Eight who were not to witness it. All conflict of the holy soul is prayer: all its struggles are continued communion with God. In Gen. xxii. 5, when Abraham’s faith was to be put to so sore a trial, he says, ‘I and the lad will go yonder and worship.’ Our Lord (almost on the same spot) unites in Himself, as the priest and victim, as Stier strikingly remarks, Abraham’s Faith and Isaac’s Patience.

yonder—probably some spot deeper in the garden’s shade. At this time the gorge of the Kedron would be partly in the moonlight, partly shaded by the rocks and buildings of the opposite side.

It may have been from the moonlight into the shade that our Lord retired to pray.

37.] These three—Peter, the foremost in attachment, and profession of it—the two sons of Zebedee, who were to drink of the cup that He drank of—He takes with Him, not only nor principally as witnesses of his trial—this indeed, in the full sense, they were not—but as a consolation to Him in that dreadful hour—to ‘watch with Him.’ In this too they failed—yet from his returning to them between his times of prayer, it is manifest that, in the abasement of his humanity, He regarded them as some comfort to him. "In great trials we love solitude, but to have friends near." Bengel.

he began—not merely idiomatic here—began, as He had never done before.

to be sorrowful] sore amazed, Mark.

very heavy] literally, as generally interpreted, utterly prostrate with grief.

38.] Our Lord's whole inmost life must have been one of continued trouble of spirit—He was a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief—but there was an extremity of anguish now, reaching even to the utmost limit of endurance, so that it seemed that more would be death itself. The expression is said to be proverbial (see Jonah iv. 9): but we must remember that though with us men, who see from below, proverbs are merely bold guesses at truth,—with Him, who sees from above, they are the truth itself, in its very purest form. So that although when used by a man, a proverbial expression is not to be to literal exactitude,—when by our Lord, it is, just because it is a proverb, to be searched into and dwelt on all the more.

The expression my soul, in this sense, spoken by our Lord, is only found besides in John xii. 27. It is the human soul, the seat of the affections and passions, which is troubled with the anguish of the body; and it is distinguished from the spirit, the higher spiritual being. Our Lord's soul was crushed down even to death by the weight of that anguish which lay upon Him—and that literally—so that He (as regards his humanity) would have died, had not strength (bodily strength, upholding his human frame) been ministered from on high by an angel (see note on Luke xxii. 43).

watch with me] not pray with me, for in that work the Mediator must be alone; but (see above) watch with Me—just (if we may compare our weakness with His) as we derive comfort in the midst of a terrible storm, from knowing that some are awake and with us, even though their presence is no real safeguard.

39.] went a little farther (Matt., Mark): was withdrawn from them about a stone's cast, Luke, who in this description is the more precise. The verb, in the original, implies something more than mere removal from them—something of the reluctance of parting.

The distance would be very small, not above forty or fifty yards. Hence the disciples might well catch the leading words of our Lord's prayers, before drowsiness overpowered them. Luke has however only kneeled down, which is not so full as our account.

prayed] Stier finely remarks: 'This was in truth a different prayer from that which went before, which John has recorded.' But still in the same spirit, uttered by the same Son of God and Redeemer of men. The glorifying (John xvii. 1) begins with suffering, as the previous words, the hour is come, might lead us to expect. The 'power over all flesh' shews itself first as power of the conflicting and victorious spirit over his own flesh, by virtue of which He is 'one of us.'

St. Mark expresses the substance of the prayer, and interprets cup by hour. St. Luke's report differs only in verbal expression from St. Matthew's. In the address, we have here and in Luke Father—in Mark Abba, Father. In all, and in the prayer itself, there is the deepest feeling and apprehension in the Redeemer's soul of his Sonship and the unity of the Father—the most entire and holy submission to His Will. We must not for a moment think of the Father's wrath abiding on Him as the cause of his suffering. Here is no fear of wrath,—but, in the depth of His human anguish, the very tenderness of filial love.

if it be possible,—all things are possible with thee,—if thou be willing. All these three find their union in one and the same inward feeling. That in the text expresses, 'If, within the limits of thy holy will, this may be;—that in Mark, 'All things are (absolutely) possible to Thee—Thou canst therefore—but not what I will, but what thou wilt:—that in Luke, 'If it be thy will to remove, &c. (Thou canst): but not my will, but thine be done.' The very words used by our Lord, the Holy Spirit has not seen fit to give us; shewing us, even in this solemn instance, the comparative indifference of the letter, when we have the inner spirit. That our Lord should have uttered all three forms of the prayer, is not for a moment to be thought of; and such a view could only spring out of the most petty and unworthy appreciation of the purpose of Scripture narrative.

pass from me] as we should say of a threatening cloud, 'It has gone over.' But what is the cup or hour, of which our Lord here prays that it may pass by? Certainly, not the mere present feebleness and prostration of the bodily frame: not any mere section of his sufferings—but the whole—the betrayal, the trial, the mocking, the scourging, the cross, the grave, and all besides which our thoughts cannot reach. Of this all, His soul, in humble subjection to the higher Will, which was absolutely united and harmonious with the will of the Father, prays that if possible it may pass over. And this prayer was heard—see Heb. v. 7—"in that he feared"—on account of His pious resignation to the Father's will, or on the ground of it, so that it prevailed—He was strengthened from Heaven. He did indeed drink the cup to the dregs—but He was enabled to do it, and this

nevertheless not as I will....] The Monothelite heresy, which held but one will in the Lord Jesus, is here plainly convicted of error. The distinction is clear, and marked by our Lord Himself. In his human soul, He willed to be freed from the dreadful things before Him—but this human will was overruled by the inner and divine purpose—the will at unity with the Father’s will.

40.] St. Mark agrees, except in relating the beginning of the address in the singular—no doubt accurately—for it was Peter (“Simon, who was no Peter on this occasion,” Stier), who had pledged himself to go with him to prison and death.

The question is literally could ye thus not watch...?—it implies their utter inability, as shewn by their present state of slumber, Are ye so entirely unable, &c.

one hour need not imply that our Lord had been absent a whole hour:—if it is to be taken in any close meaning, it would be that the whole trial would last about that time. But most likely it is in allusion to the time of our Lord’s trial, so often called by that name.

41.] St. Luke gives this command at the beginning and end of the whole; but his account is manifestly only a compendium, and not to be pressed chronologically. The command has respect to the immediate trial which was about to try them, and (for watch is a word of habit, not merely, as “arise” Eph. v. 15, or “awake to righteousness” 1 Cor. xv. 34, one of immediate import) also to the general duty of all disciples in all time.

enter into temptation is not to come into temptation merely, to be tempted: this lies not in our own power to avoid, and its happening is rather joy than sorrow to us—see James i. 2, where the word is “fall into”—but it implies an entering into temptation with the will, and entertaining of the temptation. Compare “fall into temptation” used in this sense, 1 Tim. vi. 9.

the spirit...] I cannot doubt that this is said by our in its most general meaning, and that He himself is included in it. At that moment He was giving as high and pre-eminent an example of its truth, as the disciples were affording a low and ignoble one. He, in the willingness of the spirit—yielding Himself to the Father’s will to suffer and die, but weighed down by the weakness of the flesh: they having professed, and really having, a willing spirit to suffer with Him, but, even in the one hour’s watching, overcome by the burden of drowsiness. Observe it is here spirit, not soul; and compare ver. 38 and note. To enter further into the depths of this assertion of our Lord would carry us beyond the limits of annotation: but see Stier’s remarks, vi. 237–242.

42.] St. Mark merely says of this second prayer, “he... spake the same words.” St. Luke gives it as “prayed more earnestly”—and relates in addition, that His sweat was like the fall of drops of blood on the ground: see notes on Luke xxii. 44. At what precise time the angel appeared to Him is uncertain: I should be inclined to think, after the first prayer, before He came to His disciples.

The words are not exactly the same: “the Lord knew that the Father always heard Him (John xi. 42); and therefore He understands the continuance of His trial as the answer to His last words, as Thou wilt.” Stier. Here therefore the prayer is If it be not possible.... Thy will be done. It is spoken in the fulness of self-resignation.

43.] St. Mark adds, and it is a note of accuracy, “neither wist they what to answer him.”

44.] the same, viz. as the last. This third prayer is merely indicated in Mark, by “he cometh the third time,” on our Lord’s return.

45, 46.] The clause Sleep on now, &c., has been variously understood. To take it interrogatively (“are ye sleeping” &c.?), does not improve the sense, and makes an unnatural break in the sentence, which proceeds indicatively afterwards. It seems to me that there can be but two ways of interpreting it—and both with an imperative construction. (1) Either it was said bona fide,—“Since ye are not able to watch with Me, now ye may sleep on—for my hour is come, and I am about to be taken from you”—which sense however is lulled by the “Rise, let us be going” below: or (2) it was said with an understanding of ‘if you can,’ as Bengel; if you hear not Me arousing you, there will speedily come others who will arouse you. “Meanwhile, sleep, if ye will.”

behold, the hour is at hand] “it is enough, the hour is come,” Mark. ‘It is enough’—enough of reproof to them for drowsiness—enough of exhortations to watch and pray—that was now coming which would cut all this short. This first behold is hardly to be taken literally of the appearance a Judas and his band; it merely announces the approach of the hour, of which the Lord had so often spoken: but at the utterance of the second, it seems that they were in sight, and that may be taken literally.

This expression, into the hands of sinners, should be noticed, as an echo of the Redeemer's anguish—it was the contact with sin,—and death, the wages of sin,—which all through His trial pressed heavily on His soul.

47–56.] BETRAYAL AND APPREHENSION OF JESUS. Mark xiv. 48–52. Luke xxii. 47–53. John xviii. 2–11. St. Mark's account has evidently been derived from the same source originally as St. Matthew's, but both had gained some important additions before they were finally committed to writing. St. Luke's is, as before, an abridged narrative, but abounding with new circumstances not related by the others. St. John's account is at first sight very dissimilar from either; see text above cited, and notes there. It may suffice now to say, that all which St. John, vv. 4–9, relates, must have happened on the first approach of the band—and is connected with our “Rise, let us be going.” Some particulars also must have happened, which are omitted by all: viz. the rejoining of the eight apostles (not alluded to in Luke, ver. 46, as Greswell supposes), and the preparing them for what was about to take place. On the other hand, John gives a hint that something had been passing in the garden, by his “went forth,” ver. 4. The two first Evangelists were evidently unaware of any such matter as that related by St. John, for they (Matt. ver. 49: Mark ver. 45) introduce the Kiss by a “forthwith.”

47.] Judas is specified as “one of the Twelve,” probably because the appellation, as connected with this part of his history, had become the usual one—thus we have in Luke “he that was called Judas, one of the Twelve”—fuller still. To the reader, this specification is not without meaning, though that meaning may not have been intended.

a great multitude] consisting of (1) a detachment of the Roman cohort which was quartered in the tower of Antonia during the feast in case of an uproar, called the band, John vv. 3, 12. (2) the servants of the council, the same as the captains of the temple, Luke ver. 52. (3) Servants and others deputed from the high priest to assist, see our ver. 51. (4) Possibly, if the words are to be taken exactly, (Luke ver. 52), some of the chief priests and elders themselves, forward in zeal and enmity. There is nothing improbable in this, seeing that we have these persons mixing among the multitude and stirring them up to demand the crucifixion of Jesus afterwards.

staves] any tumultuary weapons. The intention of the chief priests evidently was to produce an impression to the effect that a seditious plot was to be crushed, and resistance might be expected. John mentions also lanterns and torches—to search perhaps in the dark parts of the garden, most of which would by this time be in the shade.

48.] gave them a sign;—when is not stated. On St. Mark's addition, “and lead him away safely,” see notes there.

49.] forthwith—see above on ver. 47. The purpose of the kiss, supposing it to have taken place after John vv. 4–8, (and it is surely out of the question to suppose it to have taken place before, contrary to the plain meaning of John ver. 4,) has been doubted. Yet I think on a review of what had happened, it is very intelligible—not perhaps as some have supposed, to shew that Jesus could be approached with safety—but at all events as the sign agreed on with the Roman soldiers, who probably did not personally know Him, and who besides would have had their orders from the city, to take Him whom Judas should kiss. Thus the kiss would be necessary in the course of their military duty, as their authorization,—notwithstanding the previous declaration by Jesus of Himself. The word in the original implies, ‘kissed him eagerly,’ with ostentation, as a studied and prearranged sign.

50.] In Luke we have “Judas, betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss?”—which sense is involved in the text also: that variation shewing perhaps that one of the accounts is not an eye-witness.

Friend—see ch. xxii. 12 and note. It is more than doubtful whether the words that follow can properly be rendered as a question. More likely do they mean, “Friend, there needs not this shew of attachment: I know thine errand,—do thy purpose.” But the command itself is suppressed. On any understanding of the words, it is an appeal to the conscience and heart of Judas, in which sense (see above) it agrees with the words spoken in Luke:—see note there. The fact that at this period our Lord was laid hold of and secured (by hand—not yet bound) by the band, is important, as interpreting St. Luke's account farther on.

51.] The one of them... was Peter;—John ver. 10. Why he was not mentioned, is idle to enquire: one supposition only must be avoided—that there is any purpose in the omission. It is absurd to suppose that the mention of his name in a book current only among Christians, many years after the fact, could lead to his apprehension, which did not take place at the time, although he was recognized as the striker in the palace of the High Priest, John ver. 26. The real reason of the non-apprehension was that the servant was healed by the Lord.

This is the first opposition to ‘Thy will be done.’ St. Luke expresses it, that they saw what would happen—and asked, ‘Lord, shall we smite with the sword?’ Then, while the other (for there were but two swords in the company) was waiting for the reply, the rash Peter, in the very spirit of ch. xvi. 22, smote with the sword—the weapon of the flesh:—an outbreak of the natural man no less noticeable than that more-noticed one which followeded before morning.

All four Evangelists agree in this account. Luke and John are most exact—the latter giving the name of the slave,—Malchus.

The aim was a deadly one, and Peter narrowly escaped being one “w ho had committed murder in the insurrection.” From Luke, ver. 51, we learn that our Lord said “Suffer ye thus far” (on the meaning of which see note there), touched the ear, and healed it.

his place = “the sheath,” John. The sheath is the place for the Christian’s sword—“a sword out of its sheath is not in its place, unless as ministering to the divine anger,” Bengel; see note on Luke xxii. 36. Our Lord does not say ‘Cast away thy sword;’ only in His willing self-sacrifice, and in that kingdom which is to be evolved from his work of redemption, is the sword altogether out of place.

for all&c.] Peculiar to Matthew. There is no allusion, as Grotius and some of the ancients thought, to the Jews perishing by the Roman sword: for the very persons who were now taking Him were Romans. The saying is general—and the stress is on take—it was this that Peter was doing—‘taking up the sword’ of his own will; taking that vengeance which belongs to God, into his own hand.

shall perish with the sword is a command; not merely a future, but an imperative future; a repetition by the Lord in this solemn moment of Gen. ix. 6. This should be thought of by those well-meaning but shallow persons, who seek to abolish the punishment of death in Christian states.

John adds the words “the cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?” on which see notes there.

53, 54 are peculiar to Matthew.

53.] The Majesty of our Lord, and His Patience, are both shewn here.

twelve—not perhaps so much from the number of the apostles, who were now “the eleven,” but from that of the then company, viz. the Lord and the eleven.

legions—because they were Roman soldiers who were taking Him. The complement of the legion was about 6000 men. The power implied in thinkest thou that I cannot, shews the entire and continued free self-resignation of the Lord throughout—and carries on the same truth as He expressed John x. 18.

54.] how then—considering that this is so, that I voluntarily abstain from invoking such heavenly aid,—shall the scriptures be fulfilled, that thus it must be, if thou in thy rashness usest the help of fleshly weapons?

55.] St. Mark begins this with an answered—it was an answer to their actions, not to their words. St. Luke, here minutely accurate, informs us that it was to the chief priests and captains of the temple elders, that our Lord said this.

In his submission to be reckoned among the transgressors, our Lord yet protests against any suspicion that He could act as such.

sat (Matt. only) to indicate complete quiet and freedom from attack.

daily—during the week past, and perhaps at other similar times.

sat teaching is the greatest possible contrast to a thief and robber.

56.] It is doubted whether these words are a continuation of our Lord’s speech, or a remark inserted by St. Matthew. The use of “all this was (is) done” in this Gospel would lead us to the latter conclusion: but when we reflect that thus our Lord’s speech would lose all its completeness, and that St. Mark gives in different words the speech going on to this same purport, we must I think decide for the other view. Besides, if the remark were St. Matthew’s, we should expect some particular citation, as is elsewhere his practice: see ch. i. 22; xxi 4. Mark gives it elliptically, “but (so literally) that the scriptures might be fulfilled.” The Passion and Death of Christ were especially the fulfilment of the Scriptures. In this they all found their central point. Compare his dying words on the Cross,—It is finished,—with this his assertion. On the addition in Luke, see note there.

Then all] Some of them did not flee far. Peter and John went after Him to the palace of the High Priest; John, ver. 15. On the additional circumstance in Mark, ver. 51, see note there.

57–68.] HEARING BEFORE CAIAPHAS. Mark xiv. 53–65. [Luke xxii. 54, 63–65.] John xviii. 24. Previous to this took place a hearing before Annas the real High Priest (see note on Luke iii. 2), to whom the Jews took Jesus first;—who enquired of Him about his disciples and his teaching (John v. 19–23), and then (ver. 24) sent Him bound to Caiaphas. Only John, who followed, relates this first hearing. See notes on John v. 12–24, where this view is maintained. It may be sufficient here just to indicate the essential differences between that hearing and this. On that occasion no witnesses were required, for it was merely a private unofficial audience. Then the High Priest questioned and our Lord replied: whereas now, under false witness and reproach, He (as before Herod) is silent.

57. Caiaphas the high priest] He was High Priest of that year, Annas having been deposed, and since then the High Priests having been frequently changed by the Roman governors.

where the scribes...] Probably they had assembled by a preconcerted design, expecting their prisoner. This was a meeting of the Sanhedrim, but not the regular assembly, which condemned him and handed Him over to Pilate. That took place in the morning, Luke xxii. 66–71 (where see note).

We have not here the more complete detail of John xviii. 15–19. The palace is one and the same great building, in which both Annas and Caiaphas lived. This is evident from a comparison of the narratives of Peter's denial: see below. The circumstance of a fire being lighted and the servants sitting round it, mentioned by the other three Evangelists, is here omitted.

59. false witness] “As they thought, evidence, but in reality, false witness,” Euthymius. But is this quite implied? Is it not the intention of the Evangelist to represent that they sought false witness, not that they would not take true if they could get it, but that they knew it was not to be had?

This hearing is altogether omitted in Luke, and only the indignities following related, vv. 63–65.

60.] found they none, i.e. sufficient for the purpose, or perhaps, consistent with itself. See note on Mark ver. 56.

61.] See ch. xxvii. 40: the false witness consisted in giving that sense to His words, which it appears by ch. xxvii. 63 they knew they did not bear. There is perhaps a trace, in the different reports of Matt. and Mark, of the discrepancy between the witnesses. There is considerable difference between the words attributed to Him here, and there.

The instance likewise of his zeal for the honour of the temple, which had so lately occurred might tend to perplex the evidence produced to the contrary.

62.] Better rendered, Dost thou not answer what it is which these testify against thee? i.e. wilt thou give no explanation of the words alleged to have been used by thee? Our Lord was silent; for in answering He must have opened to them the meaning of these his words, which was not the work of this His hour, nor fitting for that audience.

63.] See Levit. v. 1.

I adjure thee, ‘I put thee under an oath,’ the form of Which follows. The junction of the Son of God with the Christ must not be pressed beyond the meaning which Caiaphas probably assigned to it—viz. the title given to the Messiah from the purport of the prophecies respecting Him. it is however a very different thing when our Lord by His answer affirms this, and invests the words with their fullest meaning and dignity.

64.] By Thou hast said, more may perhaps be implied than by St. Mark's “I am:” that is a simple assertion: this may refer to the convictions and admissions of Caiaphas (see John xi. 49). But this is somewhat doubtful. The expression is only used here and in ver. 25: and there does not appear to be any reference in it, as said to Judas, to any previous admission of his.

nevertheless—i. e. ‘there shall be a sign of the truth of what I say, over and above this confession of Mine.’

Henceforth—the glorification of Christ is by Himself said to begin with his betrayal, see John xiii. 31: from this time—from the accomplishment of this trial now proceeding. In what follows, the whole process of the triumph of the Lord Jesus even till its end is contained. The shall ye see is to the council, the representatives of the chosen people, so soon to be judged by Him to whom all judgment is committed—the power in contrast to his present weakness—sitting—even as they now sat to judge Him; and the coming in the clouds of heaven (see Dan. vii. 37) looke onward to the awful time of the end, when every eye shall see Him.

65.] In Levit. xxi. 10 (see also Levit. x. 6) the High Priest is ordered not to rend his clothes; but that appears to apply only to mourning or the dead. In 1 Macc. xi. 71, and in Josephus, B.J. ii. 15. 4, we have instances of High Priests rending their clothes. On rending the clothes at hearing blasphemy, see 2 Kings xviii. 37.

66.] This was not a formal condemnation, but only a previous vote or expression of opinion. That took place in the morning, see ch. xxvii. 1, and especially Luke xxii. 66–71.

67.] Luke gives these indignities, and in the same place as here, adding, what indeed might have been suspected that it was not the members of the Sanhedrim, but the men who held Jesus in custody, who inflicted them on Him.

The word rendered buffeted means to strike with the fist.

The following verb (smote him) is, generally, to strike a flat blow with the back of the hand—but also, and probably here, since another set of persons are described as doing it, to strike with a staff.

	MATTHEW.	MARK.	LUKE.	JOHN.
1st denial.	Sitting in the hall without the Galilean. ‘I know not what thou sayest.’	is charged by a maid servant with having been warming himself in the hall below	—&c. as Matt.— goes out into the vestibule —cock crows. ‘I know not	neither understand what thou sayest.’	Sitting by the fire is recognized by the maid and charged— replies	‘Woman	I know Him not.’
2nd denial.	He has gone out into the porch— another maid sees him. ‘This man also was with Jesus of Naz.’ He denies with an oath	The same maid (possibly: next page but see note)	line 26) col. 1	sees him again	and says	‘This man is of them.’ He denies again.	Another (but a male servant) says	‘Thou also art of them.’ Peter said
3rd denial.	After a little while	the standers-by say	‘Surely thou art of them; for thy dialect ‘Surely betrayeth thou art of thee.’ He them: for began to thou art curse and also a to swear: Galilæan.’ ‘I know not the man.’	After about an hour	another persisted saying	‘Truly this man was with Him	for he is a Galilæan.’ Peter said	‘Man I know not what thou sayest.’
	Immediately the cock crew	and Peter remembered	&c.— and going out he wept bitterly.	A second time the cock crew	&c.—and Immediately when he thought thereon he speaking the wept.	and the Lord turned and looked on Peter	&c.— and going out he wept bitterly.

On this table I would make the following remarks:—that generally,—(1) supposing the four accounts to be entirely independent of one another,—we are not bound to require accordance, nor would there in all probability be any such accordance, in the recognitions of Peter by different persons. These may have been many on each occasion of denial, and independent narrators may have fixed on different ones among them. (2) No reader, who is not slavishly bound to the inspiration of the letter, will require that the actual words spoken by Peter should in each case be identically reported. See the admirable remarks of Augustine, cited on ch. viii. 25: and remember, that the substantive fact of a denial remains the same, whether I know not what thou sayest, I know him not, or I am not, are reported to have been Peter's answer. (3) I do not see that we are obliged to limit the narrative to three sentences from Peter's mouth, each expressing a denial, and no more. On three occasions during the night he was recognized,—on three occasions he was a denier of his Lord: such a statement may well embrace reiterated expressions of recognition, and reiterated and importunate denials, on each occasion. And these remarks being taken into account, I premise that all difficulty is removed from the synopsis above given: the only resulting inferences being, (a) that the narratives are genuine truthful accounts of facts underlying them all: and (b) that they are, and must be, absolutely and entirely independent of one another.

For (1) the four accounts of the FIRST denial are remarkably coincident. In all four, Peter was in the outer hall, where the fire was made (see on ver. 69): a maid servant (Mt. Mk. L.),—the maid servant who kept the door (John) taxed him (in differing words in each, the comparison of which is very instructive) with being a disciple of Jesus: in all four he denies, again in differing words. I should be disposed to think this first recognition to have been but one, and the variations to be owing to the independence of the report. (2) In the narratives of the SECOND denial of our first preliminary remark is well exemplified. The same maid (Mk. possibly: but not necessarily—perhaps, the maiden in the vestibule or porch) other maid (Mt.), another (male) servant (Luke), the standers-by generally (John), charged him: again, in differing words. It seems he had retreated from the fire as if going to depart altogether (see note, ver. 69), and so attracted the attention both of the group at the fire and of the porteress. It would appear to me that for some reason, John was not so precisely informed of the details of this as of the other denials. The “going out” (Mt. Mk.) is a super-added detail, of which the “standing and warming himself” (John) does not seem to be possessed. (3) On the THIRD occasion, the standers-by recognize him as a Galilean (simply, Mk. [txt.], Luke: by his dialect, Mt., an interesting additional particular),—and a kinsman of Malchus crowns the charge by identifying him in a way which might have proved most perilous, had not Peter immediately withdrawn. This third time again, his denials are differently reported:—but here, which is most interesting, we have in Matt.'s and Mark's “he began to curse and to swear” a very plain intimation, that he spoke not one sentence only, but a succession of vehement denials.

It will be seen, that for fair comment on the fourfold testimony, we must not commit the mistake of requiring the recognitions, and the recognizers, in each case, to have been identical in the four. Had they been thus identical, in a case of this kind, the four accounts must have sprung from a common source, or have been corrected to one another: whereas their present varieties and coincidences are most valuable as indications of truthful independence. What I wish to impress on the minds of my readers is, that in narratives which have sprung from such truthful independent accounts, they must be prepared sometimes (as e.g. in the details of the day of the Resurrection) for discrepancies which, at our distance, we cannot satisfactorily arrange: now and then we may, as in this instance, be able to do so with something like verisimilitude:—in some cases, not at all. But whether we can thus arrange them or not, being thoroughly persuaded of the holy truthfulness of the Evangelists, and of the divine guidance under which they wrote, our faith is in no way shaken by such discrepancies. We value them rather, as testimonies to independence: and are sure, that if for one moment we could be put in complete possession of all the details as they happened, each account would find its justification, and the reasons of all the variations would appear. And this I firmly believe will one day be the case. (See the narrative of Peter's denials ably treated in an article in the “Christian Observer” for Feb. 1853.)

69.] “An oriental house is usually built round a quadrangular interior court; into which there is a passage (sometimes arched) through the front part of the house, closed next the street by a heavy folding gate, with a small wicket for single persons, kept by a porter. In the text, the interior court, often paved or flagged, and open to the sky, is the ‘hall,’ where the attendants made a fire; and the passage beneath the front of the house from the street to this court, is the pro-aulion (‘porch,’ Mark xiv. 68), or pylon (‘porch,’ ver. 71). The place where Jesus stood before the High Priest may have been an open room or place of audience on the ground floor, in the rear or on one side of the court; such rooms open in front, being customary.” Robinson.

70.] I know not what thou sayest is an indirect form of denial, conveying in it absolute ignorance of the circumstances alluded to.

73.] thy speech—Wetstein gives many examples of various provincial dialects of Hebrew. The Galilæans could not pronounce properly the gutturals, and they used “t” for “s”.

75.] out—viz. from the porch where the second and third denial had taken place: the motive being, as Chrysostom gives it, “that he might not be convicted by his tears.”

Matthew: Chapter 27

CHAP. XXVII. 1, 2.] JESUS IS LED AWAY TO PILATE. Mark xiv. 1. Luke xxii. 66 (who probably combines with this morning meeting of the Sanhedrim some things that took place at their early assembly), xxiii. 1. John xviii. 28. The object of this taking counsel, was so as (so literally) to put him to death,—i. e. to condemn Him formally to death, and devise the best means for the accomplishment of the sentence.

2.] Pontius Pilate the governor, see note on Luke iii. 1;—and on the reason of their taking Him to Pilate, on John xviii. 31. Pilate ordinarily resided at Cæsarea; but during the feast, in Jerusalem.

3–10.] REMORSE AND SUICIDE OF JUDAS. Peculiar to Matthew. This incident does not throw much light on the motives of Judas. One thing we learn for certain—that our Lord’s being condemned, which he inferred from His being handed over to the Roman governor, worked in him remorse, and that suicide was the consequence. Whether this condemnation was expected by him or not, does not here appear; nor have we any means of ascertaining, except from the former sayings of our Lord respecting him. I cannot (see note on ch. xxvi. 14) believe that his intent was other than sordid gain, to be achieved by the darkest treachery. To suppose that the condemnation took him by surprise, seems to me to be inconsistent with the spirit of his own confession, ver. 4. There I have betrayed the innocent blood expresses his act—his accomplished purpose. The bitter feeling in him now is expressed by I have sinned, of which he is vividly and dreadfully conscious, now that the result has been attained. Observe it was the thirty pieces of silver which he brought back—clearly the price of the Lord’s betrayal,—not earnest-money merely;—for by this time, nay when he delivered his Prisoner at the house of Annas, he would have in that case received the rest.

5.] in the temple—i. e. in the holy place, where the priests only might enter. We must conceive him as speaking to them without, and throwing the money into the temple.

hanged (or strangled) himself On the account given Acts i. 18, see note on that place. Another account of the end of Judas was current, which I have cited there.

6.] They said this probably by analogy from Deut. xxiii. 18.

the price (given for shedding) of blood; the wages of a murderer.

7. the potter’s field] the field of some well-known potter—purchased at so small a price probably from having been rendered useless for tillage by excavations for clay: see note on Acts i. 19.

strangers] not Gentiles, but stranger Jews who came up to the feasts.

8.] The field of blood—Aceldama. See Acts i. 19.

unto this day] This expression shews that a considerable time had elapsed since the event, before St. Matthew’s Gospel was published.

9.] The citation is not from Jeremiah (see ref.), and is probably quoted from memory and precisely; we have similar instances in two places in the apology of Stephen, Acts vii. 4, 16,—and in Mark ii. 26. Various means of evading this have been resorted to, which are not worth recounting. Jer. xviii. 1, 2, or perhaps Jer. xxxii. 6–12, may have given rise to it: or it may have arisen from a Jewish idea [see Wordsworth here], “that Zechariah had the spirit of Jeremiah.” The quotation here is very different from the Septuagint,—and not much more like the Hebrew. I put it to any faithful Christian to say, whether of the two presents the greater obstacle to his faith, the solution given above, or that given by a commentator of our own day, that the name of one prophet is here substituted for that of another, to teach us not to regard the prophets as the authors of their prophecies, but to trace them to divine Inspiration.

11–14.] HE IS EXAMINED BY PILATE, Mark xv. 2–5. Luke xxiii. 2–5. John xviii. 29–38. Our narrative of the hearing before Pilate is the least circumstantial of the four—having however two remarkable additional particulars, vv. 19 and 24. John is the fullest in giving the words of our Lord. Compare the notes there.

11.] Before this Pilate had come out and demanded the cause of his being delivered up; the Jews not entering the Pretorium.

The primary accusation against Him seems to have been that He said that He was Christ a King. This is presupposed in the enquiry of this verse.

Thou sayest is not to be rendered as a doubtful answer—much less with Theophylact, as meaning, ‘Thou sayest it, not I:’ but as a strong affirmative. See above on ch. xxvi. 64.

12–14.] This part of the narrative occurs only in Mark besides, but is explained by Luke ver 5. The charges were, of exciting the people from Galilee to Jerusalem. On the mention of Galilee, Pilate sent Him to Herod, Luke, vv. 6–12.

15–26.] BARABBAS PREFERRED TO HIM. HE IS DELIVERED TO BE CRUCIFIED. Mark xv. 6–15. Luke xxiii. 17–25. John xviii. 39, 40. In the substance of this account the Four are in remarkable agreement. St. John gives merely a compendium, uniting in one these three attempts of Pilate to liberate Jesus, and omitting any definite statement of the fact of Barabbas being liberated, and Jesus delivered to them.

15. at that feast] literally, feast by feast; i.e. at every feast. The name Bar-abbas, ‘son of his father,’ was not an uncommon one. It does not appear why this man was notable. The murderers in the insurrection in which he was involved were many (Mark ver. 7).

17.] In St. John’s narrative, the suggestion of liberating Barabbas seems to come from the Jews themselves; but not necessarily so: he may only be giving, as before, a general report of what passed. The when they were gathered together seems to imply that a great crowd had collected outside the Prætorium while the trial was going on.

It is possible that the addition, which is called Christ, which Pilate could hardly have heard from the Jews, may have been familiar to him by his wife’s mention of Jesus. See below.

18.] The whole narrative presupposes what this verse and the next distinctly assert, that Pilate was before acquainted with the acts and character of Jesus.

19.] The judgment seat was in a place called in Hebrew Gabbatha, the Pavement—John xix. 13, where however Pilate is not related to have gone thither, till after the scourging and mocking of the soldiers. But he may have sat there when he came out in some of his previous interviews with the Jews.

his wife] It had become the custom in Augustus’s time for the governors of Provinces to take their wives with them abroad; under Tiberius, Cæcina attempted to pass a law forbidding it, but was vehemently opposed (by Drusus among others) and put down. We know nothing more of this woman than is here related. Tradition gives her the name of Procla, or Claudia Procula. In the apocryphal gospel of Nicodemus, c. 2, we read that Pilate called the Jews and said to them, “Ye know how that my wife is a worshipper of God, and is rather of your religion than mine. They say unto him, Yea, we know it.” that just man is a term which shews that she knew the character for purity and sanctity which Jesus had. In the gospel of Nicodemus, the Jews are made to reply, “Did we not tell thee that he is a magician? behold, he hath sent a dream-token to thy wife.”

20.] So St. Mark also. St. Luke and St. John merely give, that they all cried out, &c. The exciting of the crowd seems to have taken place while Pilate was receiving the message from his wife.

21.] answered, not necessarily to the incitements of the Sanhedrists which he overheard, but rather to the state of confusion and indecision which prevailed.

22.] They chose crucifixion as the ordinary Roman punishment for sedition, and because of their hate to Jesus.

24.] The washing of the hands, to betoken innocence from bloodguiltiness, is prescribed Deut. xxi. 6–9, and Pilate uses it here as intelligible to the Jews.

25.] blood here has been supposed to mean the punishment of blood: but more probably there is a much wider reference—as the adherence of blood to the hands of a murderer is an idea not bearing any necessary reference to punishment, only to guilt.

26.) The custom of scourging before execution was general among the Romans. After the scourging, John xix. 1–16, Pilate made a last attempt to liberate Jesus—which answers to “I will chastise him and let him go,” Luke, ver. 16.

delivered him—to the Roman soldiers, whose office the execution would be.

27–30.] JESUS MOCKED BY THE SOLDIERS. Mark xv. 16–19 (omitted in Luke). John xix. 1–3. The assertion “delivered him to be crucified” in ver. 26 is not strictly in its place there. Before that, the contents of this passage come in, and the last attempt of Pilate to liberate Him. 27. the common hall] literally, the pretorium. The residence of the Roman governor was the former palace of Herod, in the upper city.

the whole band] The band is the cohort—the tenth part of a legion. The term the whole is of course not to be pressed.

unto him—to make sport with Him. This happened in the guard-room of the cohort: and the narrative of it we may well believe may have come from the centurion or others (see ver. 54), who were afterwards deeply impressed at the crucifixion.

28.] Possibly the mantle in which He had been sent back from Herod—see note on Luke, ver. 11: or perhaps one of the ordinary soldiers’ cloaks.

29.] It does not appear whether the purpose of the crown was to wound, or simply for mockery—and equally uncertain is it, of what kind of thorns it was composed. The acanthus, with its large succulent leaves, is singularly unfit for such a purpose: as is the plant with very long sharp thorns commonly known as spina Christi, being a brittle acacia (robinia),—and the very length of the thorns, which would meet in the middle if it were bent into a wreath, precluding it. Some flexile shrub or plant must be understood—possibly some variety of the cactus or prickly pear. ‘Hasselquist, a Swedish naturalist, supposes a very common Plant, naba or nubka of the Arabs, with many small and sharp spines; soft, round, and pliant branches; leaves much resembling ivy, of a very deep green, as if in designed mockery of a victor’s wreath.’ Travels, 288. 1766 (cited by F.M.).

30.] Here follows the exhibition of Jesus Pilate, and his last attempt to release ie John xix. 4–16.

31–34.] HE IS LED TO CRUCIFIXION. Mark xv. 20–23. Luke xxiii. 26–33. John xix. 16, 17. The four accounts are still essentially and remarkably distinct. St. Matthew’s and St. Mark’s are, from the same source, but varied in expression, and in detail; St. Luke’s and St. John’s stand each alone; St. Luke’s being the fullest, and giving us the deeply interesting address to the daughters of jerusalem led him away] or out, as in Mark. Executions usually took place without the camp, see Num. xv. 35, or city, 1 Kings xxi. 13, Acts vii. 58, Heb. xiii. 11–18. Grotius brings examples to shew that the same was the custom of the Romans.

32.] Previously, Jesus had bore his own cross: John, ver. 17. We have no data to ascertain any further particulars about this Simon of Cyrene. The only assumption which we are perhaps justified in making, is that he was afterwards known in the Church as a convert: see note on Mark, ver. 21. He was coming from the country, Mark, ibid.; Luke, ver. 26. Meyer suggests, to account for the selection of one out of the multitude present, that possibly he was a slave; the indignity of the service to be rendered preventing their taking any other person.

33.] Golgotha, a skull: the name is by Jerome, and generally, explained from its being the usual place of executions, and abounding with skulls—not however unburied, which was not allowed. This last consideration raises an objection to the explanation,—and as the name does not import a place of skulls, but a place of a skull or simply a skull (Luke), many understand it as applying to the shape of the hill or rock. But neither does this seem satisfactory, as we have no analogy to guide us, and no such hill or rock is known to have existed. As regards the situation, we await some evidence which may decide between the conflicting claims of the commonly-received site of Calvary and the Holy Sepulchre, and that upheld by Mr. Ferguson, who holds that the Dome of the Rock, usually known as the Mosque of Omar, is in reality the spot of our Lord’s entombment. See his Article “Jerusalem” in Dr. Smith’s Biblical Dictionary: and on the other side, Williams’s Holy City, and Stanley’s Sinai and Palestine, edn. 3, p. 459 ff.

34.] It was customary to give a stupefying drink to criminals on their way to execution: of which our Lord would not partake, having shewn by tasting it, that he was aware of its purpose.

In St. Mark’s account it is “wine mingled with myrrh”—and though wine and vinegar might mean the same thing, myrrh and gall cannot. We may observe here (and if the remark be applied with caution and reverence, it is a most useful one), how St. Matt. often adopts in his narrative the very words of prophecy, where one or more of the other Evangelists give the matter of fact detail; see above on ch. xxvi. 15, and compare with this verse, Ps. lxix. 21.

35–38.] HE IS CRUCIFIED, Mark xv, 24–28. Luke xxiii. 32–34, 38. John xix. 18–24. The four accounts are distinct from one another, and independent of any one source in common.

35. they crucified him] The cross was an upright pale or beam, intersected by a transverse one at right angles, generally in the shape of a T. In this case, from the ‘title’ being placed over the Head, the upright beam probably projected above the horizontal one, as usually represented†. To this cross, the criminal, being stripped of his clothes, was fixed by nails driven through the hands and (not always, nor perhaps generally, though certainly not seldom—see note at Luke xxiv. 39) through the feet, separate or united. The body was not supported by the nails, but by a piece of wood which passed between the legs. On the rest of the verse, see notes on John. The words omitted in the text as not found in any of the ancient manuscripts, are clearly interpolated from John, ver. 24, with just the phrase which was spoken by the prophet assimilated to St. Matthew’s usual form of citation.

36.] watched him—this was usual, to prevent the friends taking crucified persons down. There were four soldiers, John, ver. 23; a centurion and three others.

37.] St. Matthew finishes relating what the soldiers did, and then goes back to the course of the narrative. The ‘title’ appears to have been written by Pilate (see John, ver. 19) and sent to be affixed on the cross. It is not known whether the affixing of this title was customary. In Dio Cassius and others, we read of such a title being hung round the neck of a criminal on his way to execution. On the difference in the four Gospels as to the words of the inscription itself, it is hardly worth while to comment, except to remark, that the advocates for the verbal and literal exactness of each gospel may here find an undoubted example of the absurdity of their view, which may serve to guide them in less plain and obvious cases. (See this further noticed in the Introduction.) A title was written, containing certain words; not four titles, all different, but one, differing probably from all of these four, but certainly from three of them. Let us bear this in mind, when the narratives of words spoken, or events, differ in a similar manner. Respecting the title, see further on John, vv. 20–22.

38.] Then, i.e. after the crucifixion of Jesus was accomplished. These thieves were led out with Jesus, and crucified, perhaps by the same soldiers, or perhaps, from ver. 36, by another band.

39–44.] HE IS MOCKED ON THE CROSS. Mark xv. 29–32. Luke xxiii. 35–37, 39–43. Our narrative and that of St. Mark are from a common source. St. Luke’s is wholly distinct. The whole of these indignities are omitted by St. John. 39. they that passed by] These words say nothing as to its being a working-day, or as to the situation of the spot. A matter of so much public interest would be sure to attract a crowd, among whom we find, ver. 41, the chief priests, scribes, and elders. These passers-by were the multitude going in and out of the city, some coming to see, others returning.

wagging their heads] see Ps. xxii 7. The first reproach refers to ch. xxvi. 61; the second to the same, ver. 64

42.] St. Luke gives, more exactly, the second reproach in this verse as proceeding from the soldiers.

43.] This is omitted by St. Mark and St. Luke.

44.] Neither St. Matt. nor St. Mark is in possession of the more particular account given by St. Luke, vv. 39–48, where see notes. For the other incident which happened at this time, see John, vv. 25–27, and notes.

15–50.] SUPERNATURAL DARKNESS. LAST WORDS, AND DEATH OF JESUS. Mark xv. 33–37. Luke xxiii. 44–46. John xix. 28–30. The three accounts are here and there very closely allied; Matthew and Mark almost verbally. Luke only, however, contains the words which the Lord uttered before He expired,—omits the incident which takes up our vv. 46–49, and inserts here the rending of the veil. John is entirely distinct.

45.] According to Mark, ver. 25,

it was the third hour when they crucified Him. If so, He had been on the cross three hours, which in April would answer to about the same space of time in our day—i. e. from 9–12 A.M. On the difficulty presented by St. John’s declaration ch. xix. 14, see notes there and on Mark.

darkness—this was no eclipse of the sun, for it was full moon at the time—nor any partial obscuration of the sun such as sometimes takes place before an earthquake—for it is clear that no earthquake in the ordinary sense of the word is here intended. Those whose belief leads them to reflect WHO was then suffering, will have no difficulty in accounting for these signs of sympathy in Nature, nor in seeing their applicability. The consent, in the same words, of all three Evangelists, must silence all question as to the universal belief of this darkness as a fact; and the early Fathers appeal to the testimony of profane authors for its truth. The omission of it in St. John’s Gospel is of no more weight than the numerous other instances of such omission. See Amos viii. 9, 10.

over all the earth] The same word in the original is rendered earth in Luke, but land here and in Mark. This would seem to be pure caprice on the part of our translators; and might mislead. Whether these words are to be taken in all their strictness is doubtful. Of course, over the whole globe the darkness would not be supernatural—as it would be night naturally over half of it. The question is, are we to understand t hat part of it over which there was day? I believe we are; but see no strong objection to any limitation, provided the fact itself, as happening at Jerusalem, is distinctly recognized. This last is matter of testimony, and the three Evangelists are pledged to its truth: the present words hardly stand on the same ground, not being matter of testimony properly so called.

46.] See Ps. xxii. 1, The words are Chaldee, and not Hebrew. Our Lord spoke them in the ordinary dialect, not in that of the sacred text itself. The weightiest question is, In what sense did He use them? His inner consciousness of union with God must have been complete and indestructible—but, like His higher and holy will, liable to be obscured by human weakness and pain, which at this time was at its very highest. We must however take care not to ascribe all his suffering to bodily pain, however cruel: his soul was in immediate contact with ‘and prospect of death—the wages of sin, which He had taken on Him, but never committed—and the conflict at Gethsemane was renewed. ‘He himself,’ as the Berlenberg Bible remarks (Stier), ‘becomes the expositor of the darkness, and shews what it imports.’ In the words however, ‘My God’—there speaks the same union with the divine Will, and abiding in the everlasting covenant purpose, as in those, ‘Not my will, but thine.’

These are the only words on the Cross related by St. Matt. and St. Mark—and they are related by none besides.

47.] This was not said by the Roman soldiers, who could know nothing of Elias; nor was it a misunderstanding of the Jewish spectators, who must have well understood the import of Eli, nor again was it said in any apprehension, from the supernatural darkness, that Elias might really come; but it was replied in intended mockery, as the contemptuous This man,—‘this one among the three,’—clearly indicates.

This is one of the cases where those who advocate an original Hebrew Gospel of Matthew are obliged to suppose that the Greek translator has retained the original words, in order to make the reason of the reply clear.

48.] This was on account of the words ‘I thirst,’ uttered by our Lord: see John, ver. 28. St. Mark’s account is somewhat different: there the same person gives the vinegar and utters the scoff which follows. This is quite intelligible—contempt mingled with pity would doubtless find a type among the bystanders. There is no need for assuming that the soldiers offering vinegar in Luke, ver. 37, is the same incident as this. Since then, the bodily state of the Redeemer had greatly changed: and what was then offered in mockery, might well be now asked for in the agony of death, and received when presented. I would not however absolutely deny that St. Luke may be giving a less precise detail; and may represent this incident by his ver. 37. The vinegar is the posca, sour wine, or vinegar and water, the ordinary drink of the Roman soldiers. On the other particulars, see notes on John.

49.] we take our account as the strictly precise one, the rest—in mockery—call upon this person to desist, and wait for Elias to come and save Him: if that of St. Mark, the giver of the drink calls wpon the rest (also in veers) to let this suffice, or to let him (the giver) alone, and wait, &c. The former seems more probable.

50.] It has been doubted whether it is finished of John (ver. 50), and Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit of Luke (ver. 46), are to be identified with this crying out, or to be taken as distinct from it. But a nearer examination of the case will set the doubt at rest. The “delivered up” of John (ib.) implies the speech in Luke; which accordingly was that uttered in this loud voice. “It is finished” was said before; see notes on John.

51–56.] SIGNS FOLLOWING HIS DEATH. Mark xv. 38–41. Luke xxiii. 47–49. The three narratives are essentially distinct. That of St. Luke is more general—giving only the sense of the centurion’s words—twice using the indefinite “all”—and not specifying the women. The whole is omitted by St. John.

51.] The behold gives solemnity.

This was the inner veil, screening off the holy of holies from a holy place, Exod. xxvi. 33: Heb. ix. 2, 3. This circumstance has given rise to much incredulous comment, and that even from men like Schleiermacher. A right and deep view of the O.T. symbolism is required to furnish the key to it; and for this we look in vain among those who set aside that symbolism entirely.

That was now accomplished, which was the one and great antitype of all those sacrifices offered in the hole place, in order to gain, as on the great day of atonement (for that day may be taken as the representation their intent), entrance into the holiest place,—the typical presence of God. What those sacrifices (ceremonially) procured for the Jews (the type of God’s universal Church) through their High Priest, was now (really) procured for it men by the sacrifice of Him, who was at once the victim and the High Priest. When the objectors assert that no use is made of this event in the Epistle to the Hebrews, they surely cannot have remembered, or not have deeply considered, Heb. x. 19–21. Besides, suppose it had been referred to plainly and by name—what would then have been said? Clearly, that this mention was a later insertion to justify that reference. And almost this latter, Strauss, recognizing the allusion in Heb., actually does. Schleiermacher also asks, how could the event be known, seeing none but priests could have witnessed it, and they would not be likely to betray it? To say nothing of the almost certain spread of the rumour, has he forgotten that (Acts vi. 7) “a great company of the priests were obedient unto the faith?” Neander, who gives this last consideration its weight (but only as a possibility, that some priests may have become converts, and apparently without reference to the above fact), has an unworthy and shuffling note (L. J.p. 757), ending by quoting two testimonies, one apocryphal, the other rabbinical, from which he concludes that ‘some matter of fact lies at the foundation’ of this (according to him) mythical adjunct, the earth did quake—not an ordinary earthquake, but connected with the two next clauses, and finding in them its explanation and justification.

the rocks rent] It would not be right altogether to reject the testimonies of travellers to the fact of extraordinary rents and fissures in the rocks near the spot. Of course those who know no other proof of the historical truth of the event, will not be likely to take this as one; but to us, who are firmly convinced of it, every such trace, provided it be soberly and honest ascertained, is full of interest.

52, 53.] The whole transaction was supernatural and symbolic: no other interpretation of it will satisfy even ordinary common sense. Was the earthquake a mere coincidence? This not even those assert, who deny all symbolism in the matter. Was it a mere sign of divine wrath at what was done—a mere prodigy, like those at the death of Cæsar? Surely no Christian believer can think this. Then what was it? What but the opening of the tombs—the symbolic declaration, that the Death which bad happened had broken the bands of death for ever? These following clauses, which have no mythical nor apocryphal character, require this explanation to be fully understood. The graves were opened at the moment of the death of the Lord; but inasmuch as He is the firstfruits from the dead—the Resurrection and the Life—the bodies of the saints in them did not arise till He rose, and having appeared to many after his resurrection,—possibly during the forty days,—went up with Him into His glory. Moses and Elias, who were before in glory, were not from the dead, properly speaking: see note on ch. xvii. 1.

arose is the result—not the immediate accompaniment, of the opening of the tombs. It is to prevent this being supposed, that the qualification after his resurrection is added.

54.] the earthquake and those that were done is represented by “that he so gave up the ghost,” Mark. Does the latter of these look as if compiled from the former? The circumstances of our vv. 51–53, except the rending of the veil, are not in the possession St. Mark, of the minute accuracy of whose account I have no doubt. His report is that of one man—and that man, more than probably, a convert. St. Matthew’s is of many, and represents their general impression. St. Luke’s is also general.

those things that were done points to the crying out, as indeed does the “so” in Mark:—but see notes there.

was the Son of God—which the Centurion had heard that He gave Himself out for, John xix. 7, and our ver.

43. It cannot be doubtful, I think, that he used these words in the Jewish sense—and with some idea of that which they implied. When Meyer says that he must have used them in a heathen sense, meaning a hero or demigod, we must first be shewn that “Son of God” was ever so used. I believe St. Luke’s to be a different report: see notes there.

55, 56.] Magdalene from Magdala: see note on ch. xv. 39. She is not to be confounded with Mary who anointed our Lord, John xii. 1, nor with the woman who did the same, Luke vii. 36: see Luke viii. 2.

Mary the mother of James....] The wife of Alphæus or Clopas, John xix. 25: see note on ch. xiii. 55.

Mark adds “the less” to distinguish him from the brother of our Lord (probably not from the son of Zebedee).

The mother of the sons of Zebedee (i. e. of James and John: not “of Zebedee’s children,” as A.V. curiously renders it)] Salome, Mark. Both omit Mary the mother of Jesus:—but we must remember, that if we are to take the group as described at this moment, she was not present, having been, as I believe (see note on John, ver. 27), led away by the beloved Apostle immediately on the speaking of the words, ‘Behold thy mother.’ And if this view be objected to, yet she could not be named here, nor in Mark, except separately from these three—for she could not have been well included among those who ministered to Him. There must have been also another group, of His disciples, within sight;—e. g. Thomas, who said, ‘Except I see in his hands the print of the nails,’ &c., and generally those to whom He afterwards shewed his hands and feet as a proof of His identity.

57–61.) JOSEPH OF ARIMATHÆA BEGS, AND BURIES THE BODY OF JESUS. Mark xv. 42–47. Luke xxiii. 50–56.

John xix. 88–42. The four accounts, agreeing in substance, are remarkably distinct and independent, as will appear by a close comparison of them.

57.] Before sunset, at which time the sabbath, and that an high day, began: see Deut. xxi. 23. The Roman custom was for the bodies to remain on the crosses till devoured by birds of prey. On the other hand Josephus says that the Jews were so careful about burying that they took down even those who had been crucified, and buried them before sunset.

came] probably to the Prætorium. Meyer supposes, to the place of execution: which is possible, and seems supported by “came and took down,” John ver. 38, and “there came also....” ver. 39, which certainly was to Golgotha.

a rich man—he was also a counsellor, i.e. one of the Sanhedrim: see Mark, ver. 43; Luke, ver. 51.

Arimathæa] Opinions are divided as to whether this was Rama in Benjamin (see ch. ii. 18), or Rama (Ramathaim) in Ephraim, the birth-place of Samuel. The form of the name is more like the latter.

58.] The repetition of the body is remarkable, and indicates a common origin, in this verse, with Mark, who after gave expresses the body, on account of the expression of Pilate’s surprise, and the change of subject between.

59.] John (ver. 39) mentions the arrival of Nicodemus with an hundred pound weight of myrrh and aloes, in which also the Body was wrapped. The Three seem not to be in possession of this—nor St. Matthew and St. John of the subsequent design of the women to embalm It. What wonder if, at such a time, one party of disciples should not have been aware of the doings of another? It is possible that the women, who certainly knew what had been done with the Body (see ver. 61), may have intended to bestow on it more elaborate care, as whatever was done this night was hurried,—see John, vv. 41, 42.

60.] St. Matthew alone relates that it was Joseph’s own tomb. St. John, that it was in a garden, and in the place where He was crucified. All, except St. Mark, notice the newness of the tomb. St. John does not mention that it belonged to Joseph—but the expression “in which was never man yet laid” looks as if he knew more than he has thought it necessary to state. His reason for the Body being laid there is, that it was near, and the Preparation rendered haste necessary. But then we may well ask, How should the body of an executed person be laid in a new tomb, without the consent of the owner being first obtained? And who so likely to provide a tomb, as he whose pious care for the Body was so eminent?

All that we can determine respecting the sepulchre from the data here furnished is, (1) That it was not a natural cave, but an artificial excavation in the rock. (2) That it was not cut downwards, after the manner of a grave with us, but horizontally, or nearly so, into the face of the rock—this I conceive to be implied in “rolled a great stone to the door,” as also by the use of “stooping down,” John xx. 5, 11, and “went in,” ib. 5, 6.

(3) That it was in the spot where the crucifixion took place. Cyril of Jerusalem speaks of “the tomb close by, where He was laid, and the stone which was put on the door, which to this day (about 380 A.D.) lies by the tomb.”

61.] St. Luke mentions more generally the women who came with Him from Galilee; and specifies that they prepared spices and ointments, and rested the sabbath day according to the commandment.

62–66.] THE JEWISH AUTHORITIES OBTAIN FROM PILATE A GUARD FOR THE SEPULCHRE. Peculiar to Matthew.

62. the next day] not on that night, but on the next day. A difficulty has been found in its being called the day after the Preparation, considering that it was itself the sabbath, and the greatest sabbath in the year. But I believe the expression to be carefully and purposely used. The chief priests, &c. did not go to Pilate on the sabbath,—but in the evening, the termination of the sabbath. Had the Evangelist said “which is the sabbath,” the incongruity would at once appear of such an application being made on the sabbath—and he therefore designates the day as the first after that, which, as the day of the Lord’s death, the preparation, was uppermost in his mind.

The narrative following has been undeservedly impugned, and its historical accuracy given up by even the best of the German Commentators, and by others. The chief difficulties found in it seem to be: (1) How should the chief priests, &c. know of His having said, ‘in three days I will rise again,’ when the saying was hid even from His own disciples? The answer to this is easy. The meaning of the saying may have been, and was, hid from the disciples; but the fact of its having been said could be no secret. Not to lay any stress on John ii. 19, we have the direct prophecy of Matt. xii. 40—and besides this, there would be a rumour current, through the intercourse of the Apostles with others, that He had been in the habit of so saying. As to the understanding of the words, we must remember that hatred is keener sighted than love;—that the raising of Lazarus would shew, what sort of a thing rising the dead was to be;—and that the fulfilment of the Lord’s announcement of his crucifixion would naturally lead them to look further, to what more he had announced. (2) How should the women, who were solicitous about the removal of the stone, not have been still more so about its being sealed, and a guard set? The answer to this has been given above—they were not aware of the circumstance, because the was not set till the evening before. There would be no need of the application before the approach of the third day—it is only made for a watch until the third day, ver. 64—and it is not probable that the circumstance would transpire that night—certainly it seems not to have done so. (3) That Gamaliel was of the council, and if such a thing as this, and its sequel ch. xxviii. 11–15, had really happened, he need not have expressed himself doubtfully, Acts v. 39, but would have been certain that this was from God.

But, first, it does not necessarily follow that every member of the Sanhedrim was present and applied to Pilate, or even had they done so, that all bore a part in the act of ch. xxviii. 12. One who, like Joseph, had not consented to their deed before—and we may safely say that there were others such—would naturally withdraw himself from further proceedings against the person of Jesus. On Gamaliel and his Character, see note on Acts, as above. (4) Had this been so, the three other Evangelists would not have passed over so important a testimony to the Resurrection. But surely we cannot argue in this way—for thus every important fact narrated by one Evangelist alone must be rejected—e. g. (which stands in much the same relation) the satisfaction of Thomas,—and other such narrations. Till we know much more about the circumstances under which, and the scope with which, each Gospel was compiled, all à priori arguments of this kind are good for nothing.

65.] Ye have—the verb rendered may be either 1), indicative, Ye have:—but then the question arises, What guard had they? and if they had one, why go to Pilate? Perhaps we must understand some detachment placed at their disposal during the feast—but there does not seem to be any record of such a practice. That the guards were under the Sanhedrim is plain from ch. xxviii. 11, where they make their report, not to Pilate, but to the chief priests:—or 2), imperative; which doubtless it may be; see 2 Tim. i. 13 and note; and the sense here on that hypothesis would be, Take a body of men for a guard. And to this latter I rather incline: see the note in my Greek Test.

as ye can] literally as you know how:—in the best manner you can. There is no irony in the words, as has been supposed. The sealing was by means of a cord or string passing across the stone at the mouth of the sepulchre, and fastened at either end to the rock by sealing-clay.

CHAP. XXVIII. 1–10.] JESUS, HAVING RISEN FROM THE DEAD, APPEARS TO THE WOMEN. Mark xvi. 1–8. Luke xxiv. 1–12. John xx. 1–10. The independence and distinctness of the four narratives in this part have never been questioned, and indeed herein lie its principal difficulties. With regard to them, I refer to what I have said in the Introduction, that supposing us to be acquainted with every thing said and done in its order and exactness, we should doubtless be able to reconcile, or account for, the present forms of the narratives; but not having this key to the harmonizing of them, all attempts to do so in minute particulars must be full of arbitrary assumptions, and carry no certainty with them. And I may remark, that of all harmonies, those of the incidents of these chapters are to me the most unsatisfactory. Giving their compilers all credit for the best intentions, I confess they seem to me to weaken instead of strengthening the evidence, which now rests (speaking merely objectively) on the unexceptionable testimony of three independent narrators, and of one, who besides was an eye-witness of much that happened. If we are to compare the four, and ask which is to be taken as most nearly reporting the exact words and incidents, on this there can I think be no doubt. On internal as well as external ground, that of St. John takes the highest place: but not, of course, to the exclusion of those parts of the narrative which he does not touch. The improbability that the Evangelists had seen one another's accounts, becomes, in this part of their Gospels, an impossibility. Here and there we discern traces of a common narration as the ground of their reports, as e.g. Matt. v. 5–8: Mark v. 5–8, but even these are very few.

As I have abandoned all idea of harmonizing throughout, I will beg the student to compare carefully the notes on the other Gospels.

1. In the end of the sabbath] There is some little difficulty here, because the end of the sabbath (and of the week) was at sunset the night before. It is hardly to be supposed that St. Matthew means the evening of the sabbath, though “dawn” is used of the day beginning at sunset (Luke xxiii. 54, and note). It is best to interpret a doubtful expression in unison with the other testimonies, and to suppose that here both the day and the breaking of the day are taken in their natural, not their Jewish sense.

Mary Magdalene and the other Mary] In Mark, Salome also. St. John speaks of Mary Magdalene alone. See notes there.

to see the sepulchre] It was to anoint the Body, for which purposes they had bought, since the end of the Sabbath, ointments and spices, Mark.

In Mark it is after the rising of the sun; in John, while yet dark; in Luke, at dim dawn; the two last agree with our text.

2.] This must not be taken as pluperfect, "there had been, &c.," which would be altogether inconsistent with the text. The words here must mean that the women were witnesses of the earthquake, and that which happened.

It was not properly an earthquake, but was the sudden opening of the tomb by the descending Angel, as the for shews. The rolling away was not done naturally, but by a shock.

It must not be supposed that the Resurrection of our Lord took place at this time, as sometimes imagined, and represented in paintings. It had taken place before;— "He is risen, &c.," are the words of the Angel. It was not for Him, to whom (see John xx. 19–26) the stone was no hindrance, but for the women and His disciples, that it was rolled away.

3.] His appearance; not in shape (as some would explain it away), but in brightness.

5.] In Mark, a young man in a white robe was sitting in the tomb on the right hand: in Luke, two men in shining raiment (see Acts i. 10) appeared to them. St. John relates, that Mary Magdalene looked into the tomb and saw (but this must have been afterwards) two angels in white sitting one at the head, the other at the feet where the Body had lain. All attempts to deny the angelic appearances, or ascribe them to later tradition, are dishonest and absurd. That related in John is as definite as either of the others, and he certainly had it from Mary Magdalene herself.

6.] as he said is further expanded in Luke, vv. 6, 7. See ch. xvi. 21; xvii. 23.

the Lord (only found this once in Matt. as an appellation of Jesus) is emphatic;— ‘a glorious appellation,’ Bengel

7.] This appearance in Galilee had been foretold before his death, see ch. xxvi. 32. It is to be observed that St. Matthew records only this one appearance to the Apostles, and in Galilee. It appears strange that this should be the entire testimony of St. Matthew: for it seems hardly likely that he would omit those important appearances in Jerusalem when the Apostles were assembled, John xx. 19, 26, or that one which was closed by the Ascension. But perhaps it may be in accord with his evident design of giving the general form and summary of each series of events, rather than their characteristic details. See below on ver. 20.

The goeth before here is not to be understood as implying the journeying on the part of our Lord Himself. It is cited from His own words, ch. xxvi. 32, and there, as here, merely implies that He would be there when they arrived. It has a reference to the collecting of the flock which had been scattered by the smiting of the Shepherd; see John x. 4.

there shall ye see him is determined, by “there shall they see me,” below, to be part of the message to the disciples: not spoken to the women directly, but certainly indirectly including them. The idea of their being merely messengers; to the Apostles, without bearing any share in the promise, is against the spirit of the context: see further in note on ver. 17.

lo, I have told you is to give solemnity to the command. These words are peculiar to Matthew, and are a mark of accuracy.

8.] “With fear, because of the prodigies; with joy, for the promises,” Euthym.

9.] Neither St. Mark nor St. Luke recounts, or seems to have been aware of, this appearance. St. Mark even says “they said nothing to any man: for they were afraid.” But (see above) it does not therefore follow that the narratives are inconsistent. St. Mark’s account (see note there) is evidently broken off suddenly; and St. Luke’s (see also note there) appears to have been derived from one of those who went to Emmaus, who had evidently but an imperfect knowledge of what happened before they left the city. This being taken into account, we may fairly require that the judgment should be suspended in lack of further means of solving the difficulty.

held him by the feet, partly in fear and as suppliants, for the Lord says, “fear not,”—but shewing also the joy with which that fear was mixed (ver. 8)—joy at having recovered Him whom they loved.

10.] my brethren; so also to Mary Magdalene, John xx. 17.

The repetition of this injunction by the Lord has been thought to indicate that this is a portion of another narrative inwoven here, and may possibly belong to the same incident as that in ver. 7. But all probability is against this: the passages are distinctly consecutive, and moreover both are in the well-known style of St. Matthew (e. g., “behold” in both). There is perhaps more probability that this may be the same appearance as that in John xx. 11–18, on account of “touch me not,” there, and “my brethren,”—but in our present imperfect state of information, this must remain a mere probability.

11–15.] THE JEWISH AUTHORITIES BRIBE THE GUARDS TO GIVE A FALSE ACCOUNT OF THE RESURRECTION. Peculiar to Matthew. This was a meeting of the Sanhedrin, but surely hardly an official and open one; does not the form of the narrative rather imply that it was a secret compact between those (the majority) who were bitterly hostile to Jesus? The circumstance that Joseph had taken no part in their counsel before, leads us to think that others may have withdrawn themselves from the meeting, e.g., Gamaliel, who could hardly have consented to such a measure as this.

14.] not, as in A.V., ‘come to the ears of the governor,’ but be borne witness of before the governor, come before him officially: i.e. ‘if a stir be made, and you be in trouble about it.’

persuade, viz., by a bribe of money, which, “knowing the covetous character of the man, they were confidently able to promise.” Trench, on the A.V., p. 72.

15.] Justin Martyr says that the Jews sent men far and wide to disseminate this report.

16–20.] APPEARANCE OF THE LORD ON A MOUNTAIN IN GALILEE. This was after the termination of the feast, allowing two first days of the week, on which he appeared to the assembled Apostles (John xx. 19, 26), to elapse. It illustrates the fragmentary nature of the materials out of which our narrative is built, that the appointment of this mountain as a place of assembly for the eleven has not been mentioned, although the text seems to imply that it has. Stier well remarks (Reden Jesu, vii. 209) that in this verse St. Matthew gives a hint of some interviews having taken place previously to this in Galilee. And it is important to bear this in mind, as suggesting, if not the solution, at least the ground of solution, of the difficulties of this passage. Ver. 17 seems to present an instance of this fragmentary narrative. The impression given by it is that the majority of the eleven worshipped Him, but some doubted (not, whether they should worship Him; which is absurd, and not implied in the word). This however would hardly be possible, after the two appearances at Jerusalem in John xx. We are therefore obliged to conclude that others were present. Whether these others were the ‘500 brethren at once’ of whom St. Paul speaks 1 Cor. xv. 6, or some other disciples, not appear. Olshausen and Stier suppose, from the previous announcement of this meeting, and the repetition of that announcement by the angel, and by our Lord, that it probably included all the disciples of Jesus; at least, all who would from the nature of the case be brought together.

18. came] They appear to have first seen Him at a distance, probably on the top of the mountain. This whole introduction forbids us to suppose that the following words are a mere compendium of what was said on various occasions. Like the opening of ch. v., it carries with it a direct assertion that what follows, was spoken then, and there.

All power is given, &c.] The words are a reference to the prophecy in Daniel, which compare. Given,—by the Father, in the fulfilment of the Eternal Covenant, in the Unity of the Holy Spirit. Now first is this covenant, in its fulness, proclaimed upon earth. The Resurrection was its last seal: the Ascension was the taking possession of the Inheritance. But the Inheritance is already won; and the Heir is only remaining on earth for a temporary purpose—the assuring His joint-heirs of the verity of His possession.

All power in heaven and earth: see Eph. i. 20–23; Col. ii. 10; Heb. i. 6; Rom. xiv. 9; Phil. ii. 9–11; 1 Pet. iii. 22.

19.] therefore is not found, or found in varying forms, in many of the ancient authorities. It is probably a gloss, but an excellent one. It is the glorification of the Son by the Father through the Spirit, which is the foundation of the Church of Christ in all the world. And when we baptize into the Name (i. e. into the fulness of the consequence of the objective covenant, and the subjective confession) of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, it is this which forms the ground and cause of our power to do so—that this flesh of man, of which God hath made all the nations, is glorified in the Person of our Redeemer, through whom we all have access by one Spirit to the Father.

Go.... and make disciples] Demonstrably, this was not understood as spoken to the Apostles only, but to all the brethren. Thus we read (Acts viii. 2, 4), “they were all scattered abroad.... except the Apostles:—they that were scattered abroad went every where preaching the word.” There is peculiar meaning in make disciples of. All power is given me—go therefore and... subdue? Not so: the purpose of the Lord is to bring men to the knowledge of the truth—to work on and in their hearts, and lift them up to be partakers of the Divine Nature. And therefore it is not ‘subdue,’ but make disciples of (see below).

all the nations] including the Jews. It is absurd to imagine that in these words of the Lord there is implied a rejection of the Jews, in direct variance with his commands elsewhere, and also with the world-wide signification of “in earth,” above.

Besides, the (temporary) rejection of the Jews consists in this, that they are numbered among all the nations, and not a peculiar people any longer: and are become, in the providence of God, the subjects of that preaching, of which by original title they ought to have been the promulgators. We find the first preachers of the gospel, so far from excepting the Jews, uniformly bearing their testimony to them first. With regard to the difficulty which has been raised on these words,—that if they had been thus spoken by the Lord, the Apostles would never have had any doubt about the admission of the Gentiles into the Church,—I would answer that the Apostles never had any doubt whatever about admitting Gentiles,—only whether they should not be circumcised first. In this command, the prohibition of ch. x. 5 is for ever removed.

baptising them] Both these present participles are the conditions of the imperative preceding. The making disciples consists of two the initiatory, admissory rite, and the subsequent teaching. It is much to be that the inadequate rendering, ‘teach,’ has in our Bibles clouded the meaning of these important words. It will be observed that in our Lord’s words, as in the Church, the process of ordinary discipleship is from baptism to instruction—i. e. is, admission in infancy to the covenant, and growing up into observing all things commanded by Christ—the exception being, what circumstances rendered so frequent in the early church, instruction before baptism in the case of adults. On this we may also remark, that baptism, as known to the Jews, included, just as it does in the Acts (ch. xvi. 15, 88), whole households—wives and children.

As regards the command itself, no unprejudiced reader can doubt that it regards the outward rite of BAPTISM, so well known in this gospel as having been practised by John, and received by the Lord Himself. And thus it was immediately, and has been ever since, understood by the Church. As regards all attempts to explain away this sense, we may say—even setting aside the testimony furnished by the Acts of the Apostles,—that it is in the highest degree improbable that our Lord should have given, at a time when He was summing up the duties of His Church in such weighty words, a command couched in figurative or ambiguous language—one which He must have known would be interpreted by His disciples, now long accustomed to the rite and its name, otherwise than He intended it.

into the name...] Reference is apparently made to the Baptism of the Lord himself, where the whole Three Persons of the Godhead were in manifestation.

into] It is unfortunate again here that our English Bibles do not give us the force of this word. “In” should have been into, (as in Gal. iii. 27 al.,) both here and in 1 Cor. x. 2, and wherever the expression is used. It imports, not only a subjective recognition hereafter by the child of the truth implied in the Name, &c., but an objective admission into the covenant of Redemption—a putting on of Christ. Baptism is the contract of espousal (Eph. v. 26) between Christ and His Church. Our word ‘in’ being retained both here and in our formula of Baptism, it should always be remembered that the Sacramental declaration is contained in this word; that it answers (as Stier has well observed, vii. 268) to the “This is my Body,” in the other Sacrament. On the difference between the baptism of John and Christian baptism, see notes on ch. iii. 11: Acts xviii. 25; xix. 1–5.

20.] Even in the case of the adult, this teaching must, in greater part, follow his baptism; though as we have seen (on ver. 19), in his exceptional case, some of it must go before. For this teaching is nothing less than the building up of the whole man into the obedience of Christ. In these words, inasmuch as the then living disciples could not teach all nations, does the Lord found the office of Preachers in His Church, with all that belongs to it,—the duties of the minister, the school-teacher, the scripture reader. This ‘teaching’ is not merely the preaching of the gospel—not mere proclamation of the good news—but the whole catechetical office of the Church upon and in the baptized.

and, lo....] These words imply and set forth the Ascension, the manner of which is not related by our Evangelist.

I, in the fullest sense: not the Divine presence, as distinguished from the Humanity of Christ. His Humanity is with us likewise. The vine lives in the branches. Stier remarks the contrast between this ‘I am with you,’ and the view of Nicodemus (John iii. 2) ‘no man can do these miracles—except God be with him.’

with you] mainly, by the promise of the Father (Luke xxiv. 49) which He has poured out on his Church. But the presence of the Spirit is the effect of the presence of Christ—and the presence of Christ is part of the gift of all power above—the effect of the well-pleasing of the Father. So that the mystery of His name Emmanuel (with which, as Stier remarks, this Gospel begins and ends) is fulfilled—God is with us. And—all the (appointed) days—for they are numbered by the Father, though by none but Him.

unto the end of the world—that time of which they had heard in so many parables, and about which they had asked, ch. xxiv. 3—literally, the completion of the state of time. After that, He will be no more properly speaking with us, but we with Him (John xvii. 24) where He is.

To understand with you only of the Apostles and their (?) successors, is to destroy the whole force of these most weighty words.

The command is to the UNIVERSAL CHURCH—to be performed, in the nature of things, by her ministers and teachers, the manner of which is not here prescribed, but to be learnt in the unfoldings of Providence recorded in the Acts of the Apostles, who by his special ordinance were the founders and first builders of that Church—but whose office, on that very account, precluded the idea of succession or renewal.

That St. Matthew does not record the fact or manner of the Ascension, is not to be used as a ground for any presumptions regarding the authenticity of the records of it which we possess. The narrative here is suddenly brought to a termination: that in John ends with an express declaration of its incompleteness. What reasons there may have been for the omission, either subjective, in the mind of the author of the Gospel, or objective, in the fragmentary character of the apostolic reports which are here put together, it is wholly out of our power, in this age of the world, to determine. As before remarked, the fact itself is here and elsewhere in this Gospel (see ch. xxii. 44; xxiv. 30; xxv. 14, 31; xxvi. 64) clearly implied.

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO MARK

Throughout Mark, the parallel places in Matthew are to be consulted. Where the agreement is verbal, or nearly so, no notes are here appended.

Mark: Chapter 1

CHAP. I. 1–8.] THE PREACHING AND BAPTISM OF JOHN. Matt. iii. 1–12. Luke iii. 1–17. The object of St. Mark being to relate the official life and ministry of our Lord, he begins with His baptism; and as a necessary introduction to it, with the preaching of John the Baptist.

His account of John's baptism has many phrases in common with both Matthew and Luke; but from the additional prophecy quoted in ver. 2, is certainly independent and distinct (see Introduction to the Gospels).

1. beginning] This is probably a title to what follows as Matt. i. 1, and not connected with ver. 4, nor with ver. 2. It is simpler, and gives more majesty to the opening, to put a period at the end of ver. 1, and make the citation from the prophet a new and confirmatory title. of Jesus Christ] as its Author, or as its Subject, as the context may determine. Here probably it is the latter: and so will mean, the glad tidings concerning Jesus Christ.

2, 3.] The citation here is from two prophets, Isa. and Mal.; see reff. The fact will not fail to be observed by the careful and honest student of the Gospels. Had the citation from Isaiah stood first, it would have been of no note, as Meyer observes. Consult notes on Matt. xi. 10; iii. 3.

4.] See on Matt. iii. 1. the baptism of repentance, the baptism symbolic of repentance and forgiveness—of the death unto sin, and new birth unto righteousness. The former of these only comes properly into the notion of John's baptism, which did not confer the Holy Spirit, ver. 8.

7.] to stoop down and unloose... the sion is common to Mark, Luke, and John (i. 27). It amounts to the same as bearing the shoes—for he who did the last would necessarily be also employed in loosing and taking off the sandal. But the variety is itself indicative of the independence of Matthew and Mark of one another. St. John used the two expressions at different times, and our witnesses have reported both. Stoop down is added by St. Mark, who, as we shall find, is more minute in circumstantial detail than the other Evangelists.

8.] Matthew and Luke add “and fire.”

9–11.] JESUS IS BAPTIZED BY HIM. Matt. iii. 13–17. Luke iii. 21, 22.

9.] From Nasareth is contained here only. The words with which this account is introduced, express indefiniteness as to time. It was (Luke iii. 21) after all the people were baptized: see note there. The commencement of this Gospel has no marks of an eye-witness: it is the compendium of generally current accounts.

10.] straightway (immediately) is a favourite connecting word with Mark. St. Mark has here taken the oral account, verbatim, and applied it to Jesus, ‘He saw,’ &c.—and him must mean himself: otherwise es a understand John before saw, and take coming up as pendent, which is very improbable. The construction of the sentence is a remarkable testimony of the independence of Mark and Matthew even when parts of the narrative agree verbatim. See note on Matt. iii. 16.

12, 13.] TEMPTATION OF JESUS. Matt. iv. 1–11. Luke iv. 1–18.

12, 13.] drive = lead up Matthew, = lead Luke. It is a more forcible word than either of these to express the mighty and cogent impulse of the Spirit. Satan: the devil, Matthew, Luke: see note, Matt. iv. 1. It seems to have been permitted to the evil one to tempt our Lord during the whole of the 40 days, and of this we have here, as in Luke an implied assertion. The additional intensity of temptation at the end of that period, is expressed in Matthew by the tempter coming to Him—becoming visible and audible. Perhaps the being with the beasts may point to one form of temptation, viz. that of terror, which was practised on Him—but of the inward trials, who may speak? There is nothing here to contradict the fast spoken of in Matthew and Luke, as some have maintained. Our Evangelist, Perhaps implies it in the last words of ver. 13. remarkable that those Commentators who are fondest of maintaining that Mark constructed his narrative out of those of Matthew and Luke, are also most keen in pointing out what they call irreconcilable differences between him and them. No apportionment of these details to the various successive parts of the temptation is given by our Evangelist. They are simply stated to have happened, compendiously.

14, 15.] JESUS BEGINS HIS MINISTRY. Matt. iv. 12–17. Luke iv. 14 15.

14, 15] See notes on Matt. iv. 12. delivered up This seems to have been the usual and well-known term for the imprisonment of John.

The time is fulfilled] See Gal. iv. 4. “The end of the old covenant is at hand;.... the Son is born, grown up, anointed (in his baptism), tempted, gone forth, the testimony of his witness is given, and now He witnesses Himself; now begins that last speaking of God, by His Son, (Heb. i. 1), which henceforth shall be proclaimed in all the world till the end comes.” Stier.

and believe the gospel] These words are in Mark only. They furnish us an interesting characteristic of the difference between the preaching of John, which was that of repentance—and of our Lord, which was repentance and faith. It is not in Himself as the Saviour that this faith is yet preached: this He did not proclaim till much later in his ministry: but in the fulfilment of the time and approach of the kingdom of God.

16–20.] CALLING OF PETER, ANDREW, JAMES, AND JOHN. Matt. iv. 18–22.

Almost verbatim as Matthew. The variations are curious: after Simon, Mark omits which was called Peter:—although the name was prophetically given by our Lord before this, in John 1. 48, it perhaps was not actually given, till the twelve became a distinct body, see ch. iii. 16.

The “walked by” and the “casting a net into the sea” are noticed by Meyer as belonging to the graphic delineation which this Evangelist loves.

19.] who also, as well as the former pair of brothers. It belongs only to “in the ship,” not to the following clause.

20.] with the hired servants is inserted for particularity, and perhaps to soften the leaving their father alone. It gives us a view of the station of life of Zebedee and his sons; they were not poor fishermen, but had hired servants. May we not venture to say that both these accounts came from Peter originally? St. Matthew’s an earlier one, taught (or given in writing perhaps) without any definite idea of making it part of a larger work; but this carefully corrected and rendered accurate, even to the omitting the name Peter, which, though generally known, and therefore mentioned in the oral ac-count, was perhaps not yet formally given, and must be omitted in the historical.

21–28.] HEALING OF A DEMONIAC IN THE SYNAGOGUE AT CAPERNAUM. Luke iv. 31–37.

21.] Not immediately after the preceding. The calling of the Apostles, the Sermon on the Mount, the healing of the leper, and of the centurion’s servant, precede the following miracle.

23.] A formula occurring entire at the end of the Sermon on the Mount, Matt. vii. 28, and the first clause of it,—and, in substance, the second also,—in the corresponding place to this in Luke iv. 32.

23–28.] This account occurs in Luke iv. 33–37, nearly verbatim: for the variations, see there. It is very important for our Lord’s official life, as shewing that He rejected and forbade all testimony to his Person, except that which He came on earth to give. The demons knew Him, but were silenced. (See Matt. viii. 29; ch. v. 7.) It is of course utterly impossible to understand such a testimony as that of the sick person, still less of the fever or disease.

of Nasareth] We may ob-serve that this epithet often occurs under strong contrast to His Majesty and glory; as here, and ch. xvi. 6, and Acts ii, 22–24; xxii. 8; and, we may add, John xix. 19.

us, generic: the demons having a common cause. Bengel.

torn him] perhaps more properly, convulsed him. fake adds, that he did not injure him at all.

28.] This miracle, which St. Mark and St. Luke relate first of all, is not stated by them to have been the first. Compare John ii, 11.

28–34.] HEALING OF SIMON’ S MOTHER-IN-LAW. Matt. viii, 14–17. Luke iv. 38–41. The three accounts, perhaps from a common source (but see notes on Luke), are all identical in substance, but very diverse in detail and words.

31] left her, of the fever, is common to all, and-ministered unto them (or him), but no more. The same may be said of vv. 32–34:—the words of ver. 33 are added in our text, shewing the accurate detail of an eyewitness, as also does the minute specification of the house, and of the two accompanying our Lord, in ver. 29. Observe the distinction between the sick and the demoniacs: compare ch. iii. 15. Observe also many in both cases, in connection with the statement that the sun had set. There was not time for all. Meyer, who notices this, says also that in some the conditions of healing may have been wanting. But we do not find this obstacle existing on other occasions: compare Matt. iv. 24; xii, 15; xiv. 14: Acts v. 16. On the not permitting the demons to speak, see note above, ver. 25. I should be disposed to ascribe the account to Peter. Simon, Andrew, James, and John occur together again, ch. xiii. 3.

35–38.] JESUS, BEING SOUGHT OUT IN HIS RETIREMENT, PREACHES AND HEALS THROUGHOUT GALILEE. Luke iv. 42, 43, where see note. Our Lord's pre-sent purpose was, not to remain in any one place, but to make the circuit of Galilee; not to work miracles, but to preach.

35.] went out, from the house of Peter and Andrew, ver. 29.

36. they that were with him] Andrew, John, and James, ver. 29.

38.] came I forth = “was I sent,” Luke: not “undertook this journey.” He had not yet begun any journey, and it cannot apply to “went out” above, for that was not to any city, nor to preach. The word has its more solemn sense, as in John xvi. 28, though of course not understood then by the hearers. To deny this is certainly not safe.

39.] See on Matt. iv. 23: also on Luke iv. 44.

40–45.] CLEANSING OF A LEPER. Matt. viii. 2–4, Luke v. 12–14. The account here is the fullest, and evidently an original one, from an eye-witness. St. Luke mentions (ver. 15) the spreading of the fame of Jesus, without assigning the cause as in our ver. 45. See note on Matthew. It is characteristic of St. Mark, to assign our Lord's being moved with compassion as the reason of His stretching out his hand.

44.] thyself, in the original, has an emphasis: trouble not thyself with talking to others, but go complete thine own case by getting thyself formally declared pure.

45. came] literally, were coming, which tells us more. Our Lord did not wish to put a stop to the multitudes seeking Him, but only to avoid that kind of concourse which would have beset Him in the towns: the seeking to Him for teaching and healing still went on, and that from all parts.

Chap. II. 1–18.] HEALING OF A PARALYTIC

AT CAPERNAUM. Matt. ix. 2–8, where see notes. Luke v. 17–26.—The three are evidently independent accounts; St. Mark's, as usual, the most precise in de-tails; e.g. ‘bore of four’ St. Luke's also bearing marks of an eye-witness (see ver. 19, end); St. Matthew's apparently at second hand.

2.] In this verse we have again the peculiar minute depicting of Mark. A recent learned Commentator believes “these minute notices... to be recorded by the Evangelist with a studied design, lest it should be supposed that, because he incorporates so much which is in St. Matthew's gospel, he was only a copyist: and in order to shew that he did so because he knew from ocular testimony that St. Matthew's narrative was adequate and accurate.” I mention this, to shew to what shifts the advocates of the theory of the “inter-dependence” of the Evangelists are now reduced.

Literally, So that not even the parts towards the door (much less the house) would any longer hold them (they once sufficed to hold them).

preached] in the original it is in the strict imperfect sense: He speaking to them the word, when that which is about to be related happened.

3, 4.] It would appear that Jesus was speaking to the crowd from the upper story of the house, they being assembled in the court, or perhaps (but less probably) in the street. Those who bore the paralytic ascended the stairs which led direct from the street to the flat roof of the house, and let him down through the tiles (Luke). See the extract from Dr. Robinson, describing the Jewish house, in note on Matt. xxvi. 69.

7. this man thus] the first word depreciates; the second exaggerates.

8.] The knowledge was immediate and supernatural, as is most carefully and precisely here signified.

11. I say unto thee] The stress is on thee. The words are precisely those used, as so often in Mark,—and denote the turning to the paralytic and addressing him. There may have been something in his state, which required the emphatic address.

18–22.] THE CALLING OF LEVI. FEAST AT HIS HOUSE: QUESTION CONCERNING FASTING Matt. ix. 9–17. Luke v. 27–89. I have discussed the question of the identity of Matthew and Levi in the notes on Matthew. The three accounts are in matter nearly identical, and in diction so minutely and unaccountably varied, as to declare here, as elsewhere, their independence of one another, except in having had some common source from which they have more or less deflected. These re-marks do not apply to the diversity of the names Matthew and Levi, which must be accounted for on other grounds. See as throughout the passage, the notes on Mat-thew.

13.] again, see ch. i. 16. On the [son] of Alpheus see notes, Matt. xiii. 55; and x. 1 ff.

15.] The entertainment was certainly in Levi's house, not as some think, in that of our Lord, which last is a pure fiction, and is not any where designated in the Gospel accounts. Certainly the call, ver. 17, gives no counte-nance to the view. Our Lord, and those following Him as disciples, were ordinarily entertained where He was invited, which will account for their following Him. there were many, and they followed him, is peculiar to Mark.

16.] The question was after the feast, at which, being in the house of a Publican, they were not present.

18.] St. Mark here gives a notice for the information of his readers, as in ch. vii. 3, which places shew that his Gospel was not written for the use of Jews, It appears from this account, which is here the more circumstantial, that the Pharisees and disciples of John asked the question in the third person, as of others. In Matthew it is the disciples of John, and they join we and the Pharisees. In Luke, it is the Pharisees and Scribes, and they ask as here.

19.] The repetition in the last clause, contained neither in Matthew nor Luke, is inconsistent with the design of an abridger; and sufficiently shews the primary authority of this report, as also in that day, ver. 20. St. Mark especially loves these solemn repetitions: compare ch. ix. 42 ff. It is strange to see such a Commentator as De Wette calling the repetition, in that day, a proof of carelessness. It is a touching way, as Meyer well observes, of expressing ‘in that dark day.’

21.] Render, according to the correct reading, which cannot well be explained in the margin, the filling-up takes away from it, the new from the old, and a worse rent takes place. See note on Matthew. The addition here of the new confirms the view taken of the parable there. 23–28.] THE DISCIPLES PLUCK EARS OF CORN ON THE SABBATH. Matt. xii. 1–8. Luke vi. 1–6. The same may be said of the three accounts as in the last case, with continually fresh evidence of their entire independence of one another.

23. began, as they went, to pluck] literally, began to make their way, pluck-ing... is matter of detail and minute depiction. The interpretation of this narrative given by Meyer, I believe to be an entirely mistaken one. He the strict sense of ‘to make a way,’ and insists on the Lae sade by our narrative being, as distinguished from those in Matthew, Luke, that the disciples made a way for them-selves through the wheat field, by plucking the ears of corn, further maintaining, that there is no allusion here to their having eaten the grains of wheat, as in Matthew, Luke. But (1) the foundation on which all this is built is insecure. The same Greek expression in the LXX does undoubtedly mean ‘to make one's journey.’ And (2) as to no allusion being made to their having eaten the corn, how otherwise could the ‘had need’ have been common to the disciples and to David. Could it be said that any necessity compelled them to clear the path by pulling up the overhanging stalks of corn? How otherwise could the remarkable addition in our narrative, ver. 27, at all bear upon the case? Fritzache’s rendering, ‘to mark the way by plucking ears and strewing them in it,’ is still worse.

25. he] emphatic,—Himself, taking up the cause of his disciples, and not leaving their defence to themselves.

26.] In the days of Abiathar the high priest: i.e. necessarily in the original, during the high priesthood of Abiathar. But in 1 Sam. xxi., from which this ac-count is taken, Ahimelech, not Abiathar, is the High Priest. There is however considerable confusion in the names about this part of the history: Ahimelech himself is called Ahiah, 1 Sam. xiv. 3; and whereas (1 Sam. xxii. 20) Ahimelech has a son Abiathar, in 2 Sam. viii. 17, Ahimelech is the son of Abiathar, and in 1 Chron. xviii. 16, Abimelech. Amidst this varia-tion, we can hardly undertake to explain the difficulty in the text. In some MSS. the words are omitted; in others they are altered, to give the words strictly the sense ‘In the time of Abiathar the High Priest,’ so that the difficulty might be avoided by understanding the event to have happened in the time of (but not necessarily during the high priesthood of) Abiathar (who was afterwards) the High Priest. But supposing the reading to be so, what author would in an ordinary narrative think of designating an event thus? Who for instance would speak of the defeat of the Philistines at Ephesdammim, where Goliath fell, as happening in the time of David the king? Who would ever understand, ‘in the time of Elisaus the prophet, as importing, in matter of fact, any other period than that of the prophetic course of Elisha? Yet this is the way in which the difficulties of the Gospels have been attempted to be healed over. With the restoration of the true reading (see my Greek Test.), even this resource fails.

27.] peculiar to Mark, and highly important. The Sabbath was an ordinance for man; for man’s rest, both actually and typically, as setting forth the rest which remains for God’s people (Heb. iv. 9). But He who is now speaking has taken on himself Manhood, the whole nature of Man: and is rightful lord over creation as granted to man, and of all that is made for man, and therefore of the Sabbath. The whole dispensation of time is created for man, for Christ as He is man, and is in his absolute power. There is a remark-able parallel, in more than the mere mode of expression, in 2 Macc. v. 19: God did not choose the people for the place’s sake, but the place for the people’s sake.

28.] also, as well as of His other domains elements of lordship and power.

Mark: Chapter 3

CHAP. III. 1–6.] HEALING OF THE WITHERED HAND. Matt. xii. 9–14. Luke vi. 6–11. On Matthew’s narrative, see notes on Luke. The two other accounts are cognate, though each has some particulars of its own.

1.] again, see ch. i. 21; “on another Sabbath,” Luke. The synagogue was at Capernaum

2.] St. Luke only adds that it was the Scribes and Pharisees who watched Him.

4.] unto them. ‘St. Luke adds “I will ask you one thing:” as his account is the most de-tailed, I refer to the notes there.

5.] being grieved for the hardness of their hearts—peculiar to Mark: the word im-plies sympathy with their (spiritually) miserable state of hard-heartedness.

6. Herodians] See notes on Matt. xvi. 6, and xxii. 16. Why the Pharisees and Herodians should now combine, is not apparent. There must have been some reason of which we are not aware, which united these opposite sects in enmity against our Lord.

7–12.] A GENERAL SUMMARY OF OUR LORD’ S HEALING AND CASTING OUT DEVILS BY THE SEA OF GALILEE. Peculiar in this shape to Mark; but probably answering to Matt. xii. 15–21. Luke vi. 17–19. The description of the multitudes, and places whence they came, sets before us, more graphically than any where else in the Gospels, the composition of the audiences to which the Lord spoke, and whom He healed. The repetition of a great multitude (ver. 8) is the report of ‘one who saw the numbers from Tyre and Sidon coming and going.

11.] The unclean spirits are here spoken of in the person of those possessed by them, and the two fused together: for as it was impossible that any but the spirits could have known that He was the Son of God, so it was the material body of the possessed which fell down before Him, and their voice which uttered the cry: see note on Matt. viii. 82. The notion of the semirationalists that the sick identified them-selves with the demons, is at once refuted by the universal agreement of the testimony given on such occasions, that Jesus was the Son of God.

13–19.] THE APPOINTMENT OF THE TWELVE, AND ITS PURPOSES. Matt. x. 1–4. Luke vi. 12–16. See Luke, where we learn that He went up overnight to pray, and called his disciples to Him when it was day,—and notes on Matthew.

On the mountain see Matt. v. 1.

14.] The literal sense of the word rendered ordained is made: i.e. nominated,—set apart. We have here the most distinct intimation of any, of the reason of this appointment.

16.] On the list of the Apostles, see note as Matt. x. 2. The name Peter, According to St. Mark, seems to be now first given. This, at all events, does not look like the testimony of Peter: but perhaps the words are not to be so accurately pressed.

17.] Boanerges,—perhaps on account of their vehement and zealous disposition, of which we see marks Luke ix. 54: Mark ix. 38; x. 37: see also 2 John 10; but this is uncertain.

20–35.] CHARGES AGAINST JESUS,—OF MADNESS BY HIS RELATIONS,—OF DEMONIACAL POSSESSION

BY THE SCRIBES. HIS REPLIES. Matt. xii. 22–37, 46–60. Luke xi. 14–26; viii. 19–21. Our Lord had just cast out a deaf and dumb spirit (see notes on Matthew) in the open air (Matt., ver. 23), and now they retire into the house. The omission of this, wholly inexplicable if St. Mark had had either Matthew or Luke before him, belongs to the fragmentary character of his Gospel. The common accounts of the compilation of this Gospel are most capricious and absurd. In one place, St. Mark omits a discourse—‘because it was not his purpose to relate discourses;’ in another he gives a discourse, omitting the occasion which led to it, as here. The real fact being, that the sources of St. Mark’s Gospel are generally of the highest order, and most direct, but the amount of things contained very scanty and discontinuous.

20. again] resumed from ch. ii. 2.

his friends] those from his house: his relations, beyond a doubt—for the sense is resumed by then in ver. 31: see ref. went out (perhaps from Nazareth,—or, answering to John ii. 12, from Capernaum), set out: see ch. v. 14. They heard of his being so beset by crowds: see vv. 7–11.

Our version is right in giving the meaning He is mad: for the sense requires it. They had doubtless heard of the accusation of his having a demon: which we must suppose not to have first begun after this, but to have been going on throughout this course of miracles.

22.] the scribes which came down from Jerusalem... peculiar to Mark: see note on Matt. ver. 24. Here Matthew has “the Pharisees”—Luke “some of them,” i.e. “the people.”

He hath Beelzebub] This addition is most important. If He was possessed by Beelzebub, the prince of mons, He would thus have authority over the inferior evil spirits.

23.] he called them unto him is not inconsistent with His being in an house—He called them to Him, they having been far off. We must remember the large courts in the oriental houses. in parables, namely, a kingdom, &c., a house, &c., the strong man, &c. How can Satan cast out Satan?] The external unity of Satan and his kingdom is strikingly declared by this simple way of putting the question: see note on Matthew. The expression must not be taken as meaning, Can one devil cast out another? The Satan who casts out and the Satan who is cast out are the same person: compare ver. 26, 26.] but hath an end, peculiar to Mark.

29. guilty of eternal sin] Beza explains eternal by ‘never to be wiped out.’ It is to the critical treatment of the sacred text that we owe the restoration of such important and deep-reaching expressions as this. It finds its parallel in ye shall die in your sins, John viii. 24. Kuinoel’s idea, quoted and adopted by Wordsw., that sin means the punishment of sin, seems to be entirely unfounded. And as to its being “a Novatian error to assert that sin is eternal” (Wordsw.), it is at all events a legitimate inference from “hath never forgiveness” (literally, remission). If a sin remains unremitted for ever, what is it but eternal?

30.] explains the ground and meaning of this awful denunciation of the Lord.

31.] standing without, sent unto him, calling him is one of Mark’s precise details.

32.] And the multitude sat about him is another such.

34.] Matthew here has some remarkable and graphic details also: “He stretched forth his hand upon his disciples.”... Both accounts were from eye-witnesses, the one noticing the outstretched hand; the other, the look cast round. Deeply interesting are such particulars, the more so, as shewing the way in which the records arose, and their united strength derived from their independence and variety.

Mark: Chapter 4

CHAP. IV. 1–9] PARABLE OF THE SOWER. No fixed mark of date. Matt. xiii. 1–9. Luke viii. 4–8. There is the same intermixture of absolute verbal identity and considerable divergence, as we have so often noticed: which is wholly nee licable on the ordinary suppositions. In this case the vehicles of the parable in Matthew and Mark (see Matthew, vv. 1–3; Mark, vv. 1, 2) bear a strong, almost verbal, resemblance. Such a parable would be carefully treasured in all the Churches as a subject of catechetical instruction: and, in general, in proportion to the the popular nature of the discourse, is the resemblance stronger in the reports of it.

1. again] see ch. iii 7. The began is coincident with the gathering together of the crowd.

2.] Out from among the many things, the great mass of His teaching, one parable is selected, which he spoke during it—In his doctrine.

3.] Hearken—this solemn prefatory is peculiar to Mark.

4–8.] Matthew and Mark agree nearly verbally. In ver. 7 St. Mark adds and it yielded no fruit, and in ver. 8, that sprang up and increased.

10–12.] REASON FOR SPEAKING IN PARABLES. Matt. xiii. 10–17. Luke viii. 9, 10.

10.] they that were about him with the twelve; “his disciples” Luke.

11.] the mystery; “the mysteries” Matthew and Luke. them that are without added here (“the rest,” Luke) means the multitudes—those out of the circle of his followers. In the Epistles, all who are not Christians,—the corresponding meaning for those days,—are designated by it.

12.] We must keep the that strictly to its full meaning—in order that. When God transacts a matter, it is idle to say that the result is not the purpose. He doeth all things after the counsel of His own will. St Matthew, as usual, quotes a prophecy; St. Mark hardly ever—except at the beginning of his Gospel: St. Luke, very seldom.

13–20.] EXPLANATION OF THE PARABLES OF THE SOWER. In this parable the general question which had been asked ver. 10 with regard to parables is tacitly assumed to have had special reference to the one parable which has been given at length. Or we may understand, that the question of ver. 10 took the form which is given in Matthew: “Why speakest thou unto them in parables?” in which case the words must mean, asked Him concerning parables; or His parables. The three explanations (see Matt. xiii. 18–23: Luke viii. 9–15) are very nearly related to one another, with however differences enough to make the common hypotheses quite untenable. Matthew and Mark agree nearly verbatim; Matthew however writing throughout in the singular. Mark has some additions, e.g. the sower soweth the word, ver. 14,—after “the deceitfulness of riches,” ver. 19, and the lusts of other things:—and some varia-tions, e.g. Satan for St. Matthew’s “the wicked one,” and St. Luke’s “the devil.”

Such matters are not trifling, because they shew the gradual deflection of verbal expression in different versions of the same report,—nor is the general agreement of St. Luke’s, which seems to be from a different hearer.

16.] likewise, after the same analogy:—carrying on a like principle of interpretation.

20.] Notice the concluding words of the interpretation exactly reproducing those of the parable, ver. 8, as characteristic. It is remarkable that the same is found in Matthew but in another form and order: one taking the climax, the other the anticlimax. In Luke, the two are varied.

21–25.] Luke viii. 16–18; and for ver. 26, Matt. xiii. 12. The rest is mostly contained in other parts of Matthew v. 15; x. 26; vii. 2), where see notes. Here it is spoken with reference to teaching by parables:—that they might take cree in from them all the instruction which they were capable of giving:—not, hiding them under a blunted understanding, nor, when they did understand them, neglecting the teaching of them to others.

24.] more shall be given unto you (see var. readd.), more shall be added, i.e. more knowledge: so Euthymius: “with what measure ye measure your attention, with the same shall knowledge be measured to you: i.e. as much attention as you give, so much knowledge shall be served out to you, and not only so much, but even more... In the gospel according to Matthew this is said in another manner, and with another intent.”

26–29.] PARABLE OF THE SEED GROWING WE KNOW NOT HOW. Peculiar to Mark. By Commentators of the Straussian school. it is strangely supposed to be the same as the parable of the tares, with the tares left out. If so, a wonderful and most instructive parable has arisen out of the fragments of the other, in which the idea is a totally different one. It is, the growth of the once-deposited seed by the combination of its own development with the genial power of the earth, all of course under the creative hand of God, but independent of human care and anxiety during this time of growth.

26.] Observe said, without unto them—implying that He is now proceeding with his teaching to the people: compare ver. 33.

a man] Some difficulty has been felt about the interpretation of this man, as to whether it is Christ or his ministers. The former certainly seems to be excluded by should sleep, and he knoweth not how, ver. 27; and perhaps the latter by putteth in the sickle, ver. 29. But I believe the parable to be one taken simply from human things,—the sower being quite in the background, and the whole stress being on the SEED—its power and its development. The man then is just the farmer or husbandman, hardly admitting an interpretation, but necessary to the machinery of the parable.

Observe, that in this case it is not his seed as in Luke viii. 5,—and the agent is only hinted at in the most general way. If a meaning must be assigned, the best is “human agency” in general.

27.] sleep and rise—i. e. employs himself otherwise—goes about his ordinary occupations. The seed sown in the heart is in its growth dependent on other causes than mere human anxiety and watchfulness:—on a mysterious power implanted by God in the seed and the soil combined, the working of which is hidden from human eye.

No trouble of ours can accelerate the growth, or shorten the stages through pass.

It is the mistake of modern Methodism, for instance, to be always working at the seed, taking it up to see whether it is growing, instead of leaving it to God’s own good time, and meanwhile diligently doing God’s work elsewhere: see Stier, iii. p. 12. Wesley, to favour his system, strangely explains sleep and rise night and day, exactly contrary to the meaning of the parable—“that is, it continually in his thoughts.”

29.] he putteth in—i.e. the husbandman, see above. See Joel iii. 18, to which this verse is a reference:—also Rev. xiv. 14, 15, and 1 Pet. i. 23–25.

30–34.] PARABLE OF THE GRAIN OF MUSTARD SEED. Matt. xiii. 31–35. Luke xiii, 18, 19.

30.] This Rabbinical method of questioning before beginning a discourse is also found in Luke, ver. 18,—without however the condescending plural, which embraces the disciples, in their work of preaching and teaching,—and indeed gives all teachers an example, to what they may liken the Kingdom of God.

31.] The repetition of expressions verbatim in discourses is peculiar to Mark: so in the earth here, and cannot stand ch. i iii, 24, 25, 26: and see a very solemn instance, ch. ix. 44–48. 32.] and shooteth out great branches is also peculiar. See notes on Matthew and Luke. 33.] as they were able to hear it, according to their capacity of receiving:—see note on Matt. xiii. 12.

34.] when they were alone... We have three such instances—the sower, the tares, Matt. xiii. 36 ff., and the saying concerning defilement, Matt. xv. 16 ff. To these we may add the two parables in John—ch. x. 1–18, which however was publicly explained,—and ch. xv. 1–12;—and perhaps Luke xvi. 9; xviii. 6–8.

35–41.] THE STILLING OF THE STORM. Matt. viii. 18, 23–27. Luke viii. 22–25. Mark’s words bind this occurrence by a precise date to the preceding. It took place in the evening of the day on which the Parables were delivered: and our account is so rich in additional particulars, as to take the highest rank among the three as to precision 36.] even as he was, i.e. without any preparation or refreshment.

other ships] These were probably some of the multitudes following, who seem to have been a rated from them in the gale.

37.] a storm of wind is also in Luke, whose account is in the main so differently worded.

38.] the pillow, the cushion or seat at the stern, used by our Lord as a pillow.

39.] Peace, be still: these remarkable words are given only here. On the variations in the accounts, see on Matthew, ver. 25.

41.] The then expresses the inference from the event which they had witnessed: Who then is this, seeing He doeth such things?

Mark: Chapter 5

CHAP. V. 1–20.] HEALING OF A DEMONIAC AT GERGESA. Matt. viii. 28–34, Luke viii. 26–39. The accounts of St. Mark and St. Luke are strictly cognate, and bear traces of having been originally given by two eye-witnesses, or perhaps even by one and the same, and having passed through others who had learnt one or two minute additional particulars. St. Matthew’s account is evidently not from an eye-witness. Some of the most striking circumstances are there omitted. See throughout notes on Matthew, wherever the narrative is common.

4.] The because gives the reason, not why he could not be bound, but why the conclusion was come to that he could not. The fetters are shackles for the feet, the chains for general use, without specifying for what of the body.

6.] afar off and ran are peculiar to Mark.

7.] I adjure thee by God; “I beseech thee” Luke.

8.] St. Mark generally uses the direct address in the second person: see ver. 12.

For He said] literally, For He was saying to him, &c.

9.] for we are many has perhaps given rise to the report of two demoniacs in Matthew. I cannot see in the above supposition any thing which should invalidate the testimony of the Evangelists. Rather are all such tracings of discrepancies to their source, most interesting and valuable. Nor can I consent for a moment to accept here the very lame solution which supposes; one of the demoniacs not to be mentioned by St. Mark and St. Luke: in other words, that the least circumstantial account is in possession of an additional particular which gives a new aspect to the whole: for the plural, used here and in Luke of the many demons in one man, is there used of the two men, and their separate demons. On legion see note, Luke, ver. 30.

10.] send them away out of the country; “command them to go out into the deep” Luke: see on Matthew, ver. 30.

13.] about two thousand:—peculiar to Mark, who gives us usually accurate details of this kind: see ch. vi. 37,—where however John (vi. 7) also mentions the sum.

15, 16.] Omitted by St. Matthew, as also vv. 18–20. The whole of this is full of minute and interesting detail

18.] Euthymius and Theophylact suppose that he feared a fresh incursion of the evil spirits.

19.] There was perhaps some reason why this man should be sent to proclaim God’s mercy to his friends. His example may in former times have been prejudicial to them:—see note on Matthew, ver. 32 (I. 4).

20.] Gadara (see on Matt. viii. 28) was one of the cities of Decapolis (see also on Matt. iv. 25). “Our Lord, in His humility, ascribed the work to His Father: but the healed man, in his gratitude, attributed it to Christ.” Euthymius. He commands the man to tell this, for He was little known in Perea where it happened, and so would have no consequences to fear, as in Galilee, &c.

21–43.] RAISING OF JAIRUS’ S DAUGHTER, AND HEALING OF A WOMAN WITH AN ISSUE OF BLOOD. Matt. ix. 18–26. Luke viii. 41–56. The same remarks apply to these three accounts as to the last. Matthew is even more concise than there, but more like an eye-witness in his narration (see notes on Matthew and Luke):—Mark the fullest of the three. The name of the ruler of the synagogue is of three syllables, with the accent on the second,—Ja-i-rus.

21. gathered unto him...] received him, Luke.

23.] “Notice the affectionate diminutive little daughter, peculiar to Mark. lieth at the point of death answers to is even now dead Matthew.

24.] St. Matthew adds, “and his disciples.”

28.] For she said (was saying) perhaps need not be pressed to mean that she actually said it to some one—in herself may be understood. At the same time, the imperfect looks very like the minute accuracy of one reporting what had been an habitual saying of the poor woman in her distress.

29.] On these particulars see notes on Luke.

felt in her body, literally, knew in her body, elliptic—knew by feeling in her body.

32.] Peculiar to Mark, and indicative of an eye-witness.

34.] and be whole of thy plague: peculiar to Mark, and inexplicable, except because the Lord really spoke the words, as a solemn ratification of the healing which she had as it were surreptitiously obtained: see note on Luke, ver. 48.

36.] Jesus... overheard the message (word that was) being spoken: a mark of accuracy which is lost in the A.V.

40.] How capricious, according to modern criticism, must this Evangelist have been, who compiled his narrative out of Matthew and uke, adding minute particulars—in leaving out here knowing that she was dead (Luke), a detail so essential, if St. Mark had really been what he is represented. Can testimony be stronger to the untenableness of such a view, and the independence of his narration? And yet such abound in every chapter.

41.] I say unto thee is added in the translation. The accuracy of St. Mark's reports,—not, as has been strangely suggested, the wish to indicate that our Lord did not use mystic magical language on such occasions,—often gives occasion to the insertion of the actual Syriac and Aramaic words spoken by the Lord: see ch. vii. 11, 34; xiv. 36. Talitha, in the ordinary dialect of the people, is a word of endearment addressed to a young maiden. So that the words are equivalent to Rise, my child. Peculiar to Mark.

The whole account is probably derived from the testimony of Peter, who was present. For she was of the age of twelve years is added, as Bengel, to shew that she “returned to the state of body congruous to her age.”

43.] betokens an eyewitness, who relates what passed within. St. Matthew says nothing of this, but tells what took place without, viz. the spreading abroad of the report. Notice in the last words, that her further recovery of strength is left to natural causes.

CHAP. VI. 1–6.] REJECTION OF JESUS BY HIS COUNTRYMEN AT NAZARETH. Matt. xiii. 54–58, where see notes.

1.] went out from thence, not, from the house of Jairus, by the expression his own country in the corresponding clause. I may go out of my own house into a neighbour's, but I do not say, I go out of my own house into Lincolnshire: the two members of such a sentence must correspond:—I go out of Leicestershire into Lincolnshire—so, as corresponding to his own country, from thence must mean from that city, i.e. Capernaum. This against those who try on this misinterpretation to ground a difference between St. Matthew and St. Mark.

3. the carpenter] This expression does not, seem to be used at random,—but to signify that the Lord had actually worked at the trade of his reputed father. Justin Martyr says, “For He wrought, while among men, the ordinary works of a carpenter, to wit, ploughs and yokes.” But on the other hand, Origen (carelessly?) asserts that nowhere in the Gospels received in the churches is Jesus Himself called a carpenter. 6.] he could there do no... the want of ability spoken of is not absolute, but relative: “not because He was powerless, but because they were faithless.” Theophylact. The same voice, which could still the tempests, could any where and under any circumstances have commanded diseases to obey; but in most cases of human infirmity, it was our Lord's practice to require faith in the recipient of aid: and that being wanting, the help could not be given. However, from what follows, we find that in a few instances it did exist, and the help was given accordingly.

6.] marvelled—this need not surprise us, nor be construed otherwise than as a literal description of the Lord's mind: in the mystery of his humanity, as He was compassed by human infirmity,—grew in wisdom,—learned obedience,—knew not the day nor the hour (ch. xiii. 32),—so He might wonder at the unbelief of His countrymen.

And he went round... see Matt. ix. 35.

7–13.] THE SENDING FORTH OF THE TWELVE. Matt. x. 1–15. Luke ix. 1–5: see also Matt. ix. 36–38, as the introduction to this mission. The variations in the three accounts are trifling, as we might expect in so solemn a discourse delivered to all the twelve. See the notes to Matthew;—and respecting the subsequent difference between Matthew (ver. 16 ff.) and Luke—those on Luke x.

7. by two and two] These couples are pointed out in Matthew's list of the Apostles—not however in Mark's, which again shews the total absence of connecting design in this Gospel, such as is often assumed.

8.] Striking instances occur in these verses, of the independence of the three reports in their present form. save a staff only Mark, nor yet a staff Matthew, neither a staff Luke. See notes on Matthew, also in the next clause.

13.] anointed with oil—this oil was not medicinally, but as a vehicle of healing power committed to them;—a symbol of a deeper thing than the oil itself could accomplish. That such anointing has nothing in common with the extreme unction of Romanists, see proved in note on James v. 14, See for instances of such symbolic use of external applications, 2 Kings v. 14: Mark viii. 23: John ix. 6, &c.

14–29.] HEROD HEARS OF IT. BY OCCASION, THE DEATH OF JOHN THE BAPTIST IS RELATED. Matt. xiv. 1–12.

Luke ix. 7–9. (The account of John’s death is not in Luke.) Our account is, as usual, the fullest of details. See notes on Matthew.

14.] Herod was not king properly, but only tetrarch:—see as above. He heard most probably of the preaching of the twelve.

15.] (He is) a prophet as one of the prophets;—i. e. in their meaning, ‘He is not The Prophet for whom all are waiting, but only some prophet like those who have gone before.’ Where did our Evangelist get this remarkable expression, in his supposed compilation from Matthew and Luke?

16.] “I (which is emphatic in the original) has the emphasis given by his guilty conscience.” Meyer.

The principal additional particulars in the following account of John’s imprisonment and execution are,—ver. 19, that it was Herodias who persecuted John, whereas Herod knew his worth and holiness, and listened to him with pleasure, and even complied in many things with his injunctions:—that the maiden went and asked counsel of her mother before making the request; and that an executioner, one of the bodyguard was sent to behead John.

18.] said, more than once: it was the burden of to be an John’s exhortations to him.

20.] kept him safe, or preserved him; not, as in A.V. observed him, or ‘esteemed him highly’:—kept him in safety that he should not be killed by Herodias. Whether Herod heard him only at such times as he happened to be at Machaerus, or took him also to his residence at Tiberias, is uncertain.

21.] a convenient day, not, a festal day, as Hammond and others interpret it,—but, a day suitable for the of Herodias: which shews that the dance, &c. had been all previously contrived by her.

30–44.] FEEDING OF THE FIVE THOUSAND. Matt. xiv. 13–21. Luke ix. 10–17. John vi. 1–13. This is one of the very few points of comparison between the four Gospels during the ministry of our Lord. And here again I believe St. Mark’s report to be an original one, and of the very highest authority. Professor Bleek believed that Mark has used the Gospel of John—on account of the 200 denarii in our ver. 37 and John, ver. 7: and that he generally compiles his narrative from Matthew and Luke, which has been elsewhere shewed to be utterly untenable. I believe St. Mark’s to be an original full account; St. Matthew’s a compendium of this same account, but drawn up independently of St. Mark’s:—St. Luke’s a compendium of another ac-count:—St. John’s an independent narrative of his own as eye-witness.

30.] Mentioned by Luke, not by Matthew.

31–34.] One of the most affecting descriptions in the Gospels, and in this form peculiar to Mark. St. Matthew has a brief compendium of it. Every word and clause is full of the rich recollections of one who saw, and felt the whole. Are we mistaken in tracing the warm heart of him who said, ‘I will go with thee to prison and to death?’

31.] ye yourselves—not others; ‘you alone.’

33. afoot] perhaps better rendered by land.

34.] when he came out, i.e. had disembarked, most probably. Meyer would render it, ‘having come forth from his solitude’ in Matthew,—and ‘having disembarked’ here: but I very much doubt the former. There is nothing in Matthew to imply that He had reached his place of solitude before the multitudes came up. John indeed, vv. 3–7, seems to imply this; but He may very well have mounted the hill or cliff from the sea before He saw the multitudes, and this would be on his disembarkation.

35.] See notes on John vi. 3–7, and Matt. xiv. 15–17. The Passover was near, which would account for the multitude being on the move.

37.] This verse is to me rather a decisive proof that (see above) Mark had not seen John’s account; for how could he, having done so, and with his love for accurate detail, have so generalized the particular account of Philip’s question? That generalization was in the account which he used, and the circumstance was more exactly related by John, as also the following one concerning Andrew. The dividing of the fishes, and (ver. 43) the taking up fragments from the fishes, are both peculiar and characteristic of Mark: but it would have been most inconsistent with his precision to have omitted “besides women and children” in ver. 44, had he had it before him.

45–52.] JESUS WALKS ON THE SEA. Matt. xiv. 22–33. John vi. 16–21. Omitted in Luke. Matthew and Mark are very nearly related as far as ver. 47. John’s account is altogether original, and differing materially in details: see notes there, and on Matthew.

Bethsaida—this certainly seems (against Lightfoot, Wieseler, Thomson, “The Land and the Book,” al.: see Bishop Ellicott’s note, Lectures on Life of our Lord, p. 207) to have been the city of Peter and Andrew, James and John,—on the west side of the lake—and in the same direction as Capernaum, mentioned by John, ver. 17. The miracle just related took place near the other Bethsaida (Julias),—Luke ix. 10,

48. and would (was minded) have passed by them] Peculiar to Mark. “A silent note of Inspiration. He was about to pass by them. He intended so to do. But what man could say this? Who knoweth the mind of Christ but the Spirit of God? Compare 1 Cor. ii. 11.” Wordsw. But it may be perhaps doubted whether this is quite a safe or a sober comment. would has here but a faint subjective reference, and is well expressed by the English phrase in the text. See on Luke xxiv. 28, for the meaning. Lange well remarks, that this “would have passed by” and the “willingly received him” of John vi. 21, mutually explain one another.

50.] all saw him, and were troubled: peculiar to Mark. After this follows the history respecting Peter, which might naturally be omitted here if this Gospel were drawn up under his inspection—but this is at least doubtful in any general sense.

52.] Peculiar to Mark.

for they understood not] They did not, from the miracle which they had seen, infer the power of the Lord over nature.

53–56.] Matt. xiv. 34–36. The two accounts much alike, but Mark’s the richer in detail: e.g. and drew to the shore, ver. 53, and the particulars given in ver. 56.

55.] to carry about implies that they occasionally had wrong information of His being in a place, and had to carry the sick about, following the rumour of his presence

Mark: Chapter 7

CHAP. VII. 1–23.] DISCOURSE CONCERNING EATING WITH UNWASHED HANDS. Matt. xv. 1–20. The two reports differ rather more than usual in their additions to what is common, and are not so frequently in verbal agreement, where the matter is the same.

2.] See ch. ii. 16. A mark of particularity. that is to say, with unwashen is supposed by some to be a gloss, explaining defiled: but the explanation seems necessary to what follows, especially for Gentile readers.

3.] The word oft thus rendered has perplexed all the Commentators. Of the various renderings which have been given of it, two only seem to be admissible: (1) that given in the text, oft; and (2) diligently, which is adopted by the ancient Syriac version, and seems agreeable to Hebrew usage. Between these two it is not easy to decide.

4.] wash (baptise in original) is variously understood,—of themselves, or the meats bought. It certainly refers to themselves; as it would not be any unusual practice to wash things bought in the market:—but probably not to washing their whole bodies: see below.

brasen vessels] earthen ones, when unclean, were to be broken, Lev. xv. 12. These baptisms (for such is the word in the original), as applied to couches (meaning probably here those used at meals), were certainly not immersions, but sprinklings or affusions of water.

8.] Not contained in Matthew, but important, as setting forth their depreciating of God’s command in comparison with human tradition, before their absolute violation of that command in vv. 10, 11.

9.] Full well—ironical—see 2 Cor. xi. 4.

10.] For Moses said = “for God commanded” Matthew.

11.] Corban, an offering without a sacrifice.

12.] See note on Matthew, ver. 5.

13.] A repetition from ver. 8;—common in Mark.

14.] Both St. Matthew and St. Mark notice that our Lord called the multitude to Him, when He uttered this speech, It was especially this, said in the hearing of both the Pharisees and them, that gave offence to the former.

17.] his disciples asked him = “Peter answered and said” Matthew.

19. purging] The participle refers to the draught (sewer). There need not be any difficulty in this additional clause: what is stated is physically true. The sewer is that which, by the removal of the part carried off, purifies the meat; the portion available for nourishment being in its passage converted into chyle, and the remainder being cast out.

21, 22.] The heart is the laboratory and the fountain-head of all that is good and bad in the inner life of man.

St. Matthew’s catalogue follows the order of the second table of the decalogue.⁷ St. Mark’s more copious one varies the order. Compare Rom. i. 29: Eph. iv. 19: Wisd. xiv. 25, 26.

24–30.] THE SYROPHENICIAN WOMAN. Matt. xv. 21–28. Omitted by St. Luke. A striking instance of the independence of the two narrations. St. Mark, who is much more copious in particulars, omits a considerable and important part of the history: this would be most arbitrarily and indeed inexcusably done, if the common account of his having combined and epitomized Matthew and Luke is to be taken.

Our Lord’s retirement was to avoid the Pharisees: see notes on Matthew throughout.

24.] from thence is not, from the land of Gennesaret (Meyer),—for ch. vi. 55, 56, has completely removed definiteness from the locality;—but refers to the (un-specified) place of the last discourse.

the borders] The place must have been the neighbourhood of Tyre

25.] The woman had been following Him, and His disciples before, Matthew.

26.] Syro phenician, because there were also Liby phenicians, Carthaginians.

27. Let the children...] This important addition in Mark sets forth the whole ground on which the present refusal rested. The Jews were first to have the Gospel offered to them, for their acceptance or rejection it was not yet time for the Gentiles, laid upon the bed] which the torments occasioned by the evil spirit would not allow her to be before:—lying peacefully, as Euthymius says.

28.] yet... see on Matthew.

30.] These particulars are added here.

31–37.] HEALING OF A DEAF AND DUMB PERSON. Peculiar to Mark. A miracle which serves a most important purpose; that of clearly distinguishing ween the cases of the possessed and the merely diseased or deformed. This man was what we call ‘deaf and dumb;’ the union of which maladies is often brought about by the inability of him who never has heard sounds to utter them plainly:—or, as here apparently, by some accompanying physical infirmity of the organs of speech.

31.] He went first northward (perhaps for the same reason, of privacy, as before) through Sidon, then crossed the Jordan, and so approached the lake on its E. side. On Decapolis, see Matt. iv, 25. We have the same journey related Matt. xv. 29; and “the dumb speaking” mentioned among the miracles, for which the people glorified the God of Israel.

33. took him aside] No reason that we know can be assigned why our Lord should take aside this man, and the blind man, ch. viii. 23; but how many might there be which we do not know,—such as some peculiarity in the man himself, or the persons around, which influenced His determination.

It is remarkable that the same medium of conveying the miraculous cure is used also in ch. viii. 23. By the symbolic use of external means, our Lord signified the healing virtue for afflicted human kind, which resides in and proceeds from Him incarnate in our flesh. He uses either his own touch,—something from Himself,—or the cleansing element to which He so often compares his word.

34.] He looked to heaven in prayer: see John xi. 41, 42. He sighed, as grieving over the wreck of the nature which He had made, occasioned by the malice of the devil and the sin of man.

Ephphatha] the same word as that used in Isa. xxxv. 5, “Then shall the ears of the deaf be unstopped,... and the tongue of the dumb sing.”

35.] the fetter, or the bond:—the hindrance, whatever it was, which prevented him from speaking plainly before.

36.] See ch. i. 45.

37.] He hath done all things well... So “God saw every thing that He had made, and, behold, it was very good,” Gen. i. 31. This work was properly and worthily compared. with that first one of creation—it was the same Beneficence which prompted, and the same Power that wrought it.

Mark: Chapter 8

CHAP. VIII. 1-10.] FEEDING OF THE FOUR THOUSAND. Matt. xv. 32–39. The accounts agree almost verbatim. Mark adds for divers of them came from far, ver. 3, and again omits “besides women and children,” Matthew, ver. 38.

10.] Matthew mentions Magadan, ver. 39. Dalmanutha was probably a village in the neighbourhood,—see note on Matthew, and “The Land and the Book,” p. 393;—a striking instance of the independence of Mark: called by the Harmonists “an addition to St. Matthew’s narrative, to shew his independent knowledge of the fact.” What very anomalous writers the Evangelists must have been!

11-13.] REQUEST FOR A SIGN FROM HEAVEN. Matt. xvi. 1–4, who gives the account more at length: without however the graphic and affecting sighed deeply in His spirit, ver. 12.

14-21.] WARNING AGAINST THE LEAVEN OF THE PHARISEES AND OF HEROD. Matt. xvi. 5–12. Our account is fuller and more circumstantial,—relating that they had but one loaf in the ships ver. 14; inserting the additional reproofs ver. 18, and the reference to the two miracles of feeding more at length, vv. 19–21. St. Mark however omits the conclusion in Matthew, that they then understood that He spake to them of the doctrine, &c. Possibly this was a conclusion drawn in the mind of the narrator, not altogether identical with that to be drawn from our account here—for the leaven of Herod could not be doctrine (and of the leaven of Herod), ver. 15—Mark only), but must be understood of the irreligious lives and fawning worldly practices of the hangerson of the court of Herod.

14.] The subject to the verb forgot is the disciples unexpressed: see next verse. The leaven of Herod here seems to answer to the leaven of the Sadducees in Matthew. But we must not infer from this that Herod was a Sadducee. He certainly was a bad and irreligious man, which would be quite enough ground for such a caution. We have a specimen of the morals of his court in the history of John the Baptist’s martyrdom. In the last not yet, ver. 21, Meyer sees a new climax, and refers the not yet to the moment even after the reminiscence of vv. 18–20. It doubtless be so, and the idea would well accord with the graphic precision of St. Mark.

22-26.] HEALING OF A BLIND MAN AT BETHSAIDA. Peculiar to Mark. This appears to have been Bethsaida Julias, on the N.E. side of the lake. Compare ver. 13. See however against the idea that there were two Bethsaidas, “The Land and the Book,” pp. 373, f.

23.] The leading of this blind man out of the town appears as if it had been from some local reason. In ver. 26 we find him forbidden expressly to enter into or tell it in the town, and with a repetition of town, which looks as if the place had been somehow unworthy of such a work being done there. (This is a serious objection against Meyer’s reason, that the use of spittle on both occasions occasioned the same privacy here and in ch. vii 33.) Or we may perhaps find the reason in our Lord’s immediate departure to such a distance (ver. 27); and say, that He did not wish multitudes to gather about and follow Him.

when he had spit on his eyes, and put his hands upon him... see above on ch. vii. 33.

We cannot say what may have induced our Lord to form this miracle at twice—certainly not the reason assigned by Dr. Burton, “that a blind man would not, on suddenly recovering his sight, know one object from another, because he had never seen them before,” and so would require a double miracle;—a second to open the eyes of his mind also, to comprehend what he saw. This assumes the man to have been born blind, which he was not from ver. 24; for how should he know how trees appeared? and besides, the case of the man born blind in John ix. required no such double healing. These things were in the Lord’s power, and He them as He pl from present circumstances, or for our instruction.

24.] I see men, for I see them walking«5 trees; i.e. not distinct in individual peculiarity, but as trees in the hedge-row flit by the traveller. It is a minute mark of truth, that he describes the appearance of persons as he doubtless had often had occasion to do during the failing of sight which had ended in his blindness. By no possibility can the words convey three different stages of returning vision: “I see men. I see them standing still, and dimly, as trees. I see them walking.” For thus the for is altogether passed over, and walking taken out of its place, and most unnaturally made into a sentence by itself. 25.] If the marginal reading were adopted, the meaning would be, He saw plainly (the work of that instant), and was thoroughly restored, and (thenceforward) saw all things clearly. But the text is in much uncertainty.

26.] See above in this note,—and the various readings in my Greek Test. The neither and nor both carry a separate climax with them: he was not even to go into the village, no, nor so much as tell it to any who dwelt in the village.

27–30.] CONFESION OF PETER. Matt. xvi. 13–20. Luke ix. 18–21. With the exception of the introduction in Luke, which describes the Lord to have been alone praying, and joined by his disciples,—and the omission of the praise of and promise to Peter by both St. Mark and St. Luke, the three are in exact accordance. On this latter omission no stress must therefore be laid as to the character of Mark's Gospel, as has been done.

31–IX. 1.] ANNOUCEMENT OF HIS APPROACHING DEATH AND RESURRECTION. REBUKE OF PETER. Matt. xvi. 21–28. Luke ix. 22–27. St. Luke omits the rebuke of Peter. St. Mark adds, ver. 32, he spake that saying openly: and, in the rebuke of Peter, that the Lord said the words looking on his disciples. In vv. 34, 35, the agreement is close, except that St. Luke adds daily after his cross, and St. Mark and the Gospel's after my sake, ver. 35 [it is perhaps worthy of remark that St. Mark writes follow me in ver. 34: possibly from the information of him, to whom it was said, “What is that to thee? Follow thou me,” John xxi. 22]; and informs us in ver. 34, that our Lord said these words, having called the multitude with his disciples. This Meyer calls a contradiction to Matthew and Luke,—and thinks it arose from a misunderstanding of St. Luke's “he said to them all.” Far rather should I say that our account represents every detail to the life, and that the “to them all” contains traces of it. What wonder that a crowd should here, as every where else, have collected about Him and the disciples?

38.] St. Mark and St. Luke here agree: and St. Matthew, ver. 27, bears traces of this verse, having apparently abridged it in transcribing his report, not to repeat what he had before said, in ch. x. 33.

On adulterous, see Matt. xii. 39, and observe the addition, in this sinful and adulterous generation, as belonging to the precision and graphic character of our Evangelist's narrative.

Mark: Chapter 9

CH. IX. 1] See on Matthew.

there be some of them that stand here] Remember, our Lord was speaking to the multitude with his disciples.

2–13.] THE TRANSFIGURATION. Matt. xvii. 1–13. Luke ix. 28–36. Here again, while St. Matthew and St. Mark's accounts seem to have one and the same source, they have deflected from it, and additional particulars have found their way into our text. St. Luke's account is from a different source. If we might conjecture, Peter has furnished the accounts in Matthew and Mark:—this latter being retouched,—perhaps by himself: while that of Luke may have had another origin. The additional particulars in our text are,—the very graphic and noble description in ver. 3, and the detail in ver. 6.

St. Mark omits “in whom I am well pleased,” Matthew, ver. 5.

3.] became is of itself a graphic touch, bringing out the glistening of each separate portion of his clothing.

8. no man any more] i.e. none of those who appeared, but (‘nay on the contrary’) Jesus alone.

9–11.] Two remarkable additions occur in our text;—ver. 10, which indicates apostolic authority, and that of one of the Three;—and the last clause of ver. 12.

what the rising from the dead should mean does not refer to the Resurrection generally, for it was an article of Jewish belief, and connected with the times of the Messiah; but to His Resurrection as connected with his Death; the whole was enigmatical to them.

12.] Meyer and others render, and how is it written of the Son of Man? That he must, &c, making this last clause the answer to the question. But not to mention that such a sentence would be without example in our Lord's discourses, the sense given by it is meagre in the extreme. As it stands in the text, it forms a counter-question to that of the Apostles in ver. 11. They asked Why say the scribes that Elias must first come? Our Lord answers it by telling them that it is even so; and returns the question by another: And how is it (also) written of the Son of Man, that he, &c? Then comes the conclusion in ver. 13 with But I say unto you, stating that Elias has come, and leaving it therefore to be inferred that the sufferings of the Son of Man were close at hand. Notice how the it is written of, twice occurring, binds both together. Just as the first coming of the Son of Man is to suffer and to die, so has the first coming of Elias been as it was written of him; but there is a future coming of Elias to restore all things, and of the Son of Man in glory. See farther in notes on Matthew.

14-29.] HEALING OF A POSSESSED LUNATIC. Matt. xvii, 14-21. Luke ix. 37-42. The account of St. Mark is by far the most copious: and here, which is very rarely the case in the official life of our Lord, the three accounts appear to have been originally different and independent. The descent from the mountain was on the day following the transfiguration, Luke, ver. 37, 14.] The scribes were probably boasting over the disciples, and reasoning from their inability to that of their Master also.

As Stier remarks, there is hardly such another contrast to be found in the Gospel as this, between the open heaven and the sons of glory on the mount, and the valley of tears with its terrible forms of misery and pain and unbelief. I have already in the notes to Matthew spoken of the noble use made of this contrast in the last and grandest picture of the greatest of painters—the Transfiguration of Raffaele.

15.] The Lord's countenance probably retained traces of the glory on the mount; so strong words as were greatly amazed would hardly have been used merely of their surprise at His sudden approach: see Exod. xxxiv. 29, 30. That brightness, however, terrified the people: this attracts them: see 2 Cor. iii. 7-18.

16.] them (first time), i.e. 'the multitude,' regarding the Scribes as a part of the multitude. One of the multitude answers.

17.] unto thee—i. e. intended to do so, not being aware of His absence. From Luke, ver. 38, we learn that this was his only son.

dumb, i.e. causing deafness and dumbness, and fits of epilepsy; see Luke xi. 14.

18.] The words rendered pineth away may perhaps mean becomes dry or stiff.

19.] O faithless generation, not addressed to the man, as unbelieving,—nor to the disciples,—but generally, to the race and generation among whom the Lord's ministry was fulfilled. The additional words "and perverse" (Matthew, Luke) are probably from Deut. xxxii. 5; see further ib. ver. 20, where "faithless" is also expressed by "children in whom is no faith." The question is not asked in a spirit of longing to be gone from them, but of holy impatience of their hardness of heart and unbelief. In this the father, disciples, Scribes, and multitude are equally involved.

"The kingdom of Satan, in small and great, is ever stirred into a fiercer activity by the coming near of the kingdom of Christ. Satan has great wrath, when his time is short" (Trench, Mir. 365). Vv. 21-27 are peculiar to Mark.

21.] The Lord takes occasion to enquire thus of the father, to bring in the trial of his faith.

22.] See Matthew, ver. 15. if thou canst do any thing] This bespeaks, if any faith, at most but a very ignorant and weak one.

us—the wretched father counts his child's misery his own: thus the Syrophenician woman, Matt. xv. 25, help me.

23.] The most probable rendering of the original here is, Jesus said to him the saying, "If thou canst believe, all things are,"&c.: a saying which doubtless He often uttered on similar occasions, Some, omitting the believe, would set an interrogation after canst, and suppose our Lord to be citing the Father's words: "didst thou say, 'If thou canst?' —all things are,"&c. Others, as Dr. Burton, suppose it to mean:—'Believe what you have expressed by your if thou canst,&c. But both these renderings involve methods of construction and expression not usual in the Gospels. The if thou canst believe is a manifest reference to the if thou canst do any thing before, and meant to convey a reproof, as the father's answer testifies. The sentence, also, unless I am mistaken, is meant to convey an intimation that the healing was not to be an answer to that challenge, so that the Lord's power was to be challenged and proved,—but an answer to faith, which (of course by laying hold on Him who is Almighty) can do all things.

24.] Nothing can be more touching and living than this whole most masterly and wonderful narrative. The poor father is drawn out into a sense of the unworthiness of his distrust, and "the little spark of faith which is kindled in his soul reveals to him the abysmal depths of unbelief which are there." (Trench, p. 367.) "Thus," remarks Olshausen (B. Comm: i, 534), "does the Redeemer shew himself to the father as a Creator and bringer out of faith first, before He heals his son. In the struggle of his anxiety, the strength of Faith is born, by the aid of Christ, in the soul empty of it before."

There is strong analogy in the Lord's treatment of the father here, for the sponsorial engagement in infant baptism. The child is by its infirmity incapacitated; it is therefore the father's faith which is tested; and when that is proved, the child is healed. The fact is, that the analogy rests far deeper: viz. on the 'inclusion' of 'the old man' in Adam and the 'new man' in Christ: see Rom. v. 12–21.

25.] This took place at a distance from the crowd, among those who had run forward to meet our Lord, ver. 16.

I charge thee] The personal pronoun is emphatic, as opposed to the want of power on the part of the disciples. This is the only place where we have such a charge as enter no more into him,—shewing the excessive malignity and tenacity of this kind (see ver. 29) of spirit. This is also shewn by ver. 26.

27.] See ch. v. 41; also Matt. xvii. 6, 8: Rev. i. 17: Dan. x. 9, 10.

29.] The answer is given more at length in Matthew, ver. 20, and the Lord there distinctly includes the disciples in the faithless generation, by telling them "Because of your unbelief." The assurance also occurs there, which was repeated Matt. xxi. 21, where see notes.

This kind] That there are kinds, more and less malicious, of evil spirits, we find from Matt. xii. 45—and the pertinacity and cruelty of this one shewed him to belong to the worst kind. The Lord's saying here is rather for their after guidance, than their present; for they could not fast while He was with them, ch. ii.

30–32.] SECOND ANNOUNCEMENT OF HIS DEATH AND RESURRECTION. Matt. xvii. 22, 23. Luke ix. 43–45, where see notes, as this account is included in the two others.

33–50.] DISCOURSE RESPECTING THE GREATEST AMONG THEM. Matt. xviii. 1–9. Luke ix. 46–50. Here again the three accounts are independent, and differ in some particulars unimportant in them-selves, but very instructive for a right comparison of the three Gospels. First take St. Luke's account.—The disciples had been disputing;—our Lord knowing the strife of their hearts, took a child, &c.:—then compare St. Mark—our Lord asked them, on coming into a house, what had been the subject of their dispute;—they were silent from shame;—He sat down, delivered his sentence to the twelve,—and then took the child, &c.—Lastly turn to St. Matthew. There, the disciples themselves referred the question to our Lord, and He took the child, &c. Who can forbear seeing in these narratives the unfettered and independent testimony of three witnesses, consistent with one another in the highest form and spirit of truthfulness, but differing in the mere letter? St. Mark's account is again the richest and fullest, and we can hardly doubt that if the literal exact detail of fact is in question, we have it here.

33.] Between the coming to Capernaum, and this discourse, happened the demand of the tribute-money, Mt. xvii. 20–27.

34.] There is no real difference in the matter in question here (and in Luke), and in Matthew. The kingdom of heaven was looked on as about soon to appear: and their relative rank now would be assumed as their relative rank then. The difference in the expression of this is a mark of independence and authority.

35.] See Matt. xx. 26, and note.

36. taken him in his arms] This particular we learn from Mark.

38.] Only found besides in Luke, vv. 49, 50.

Notice the repetition of he followeth not us as characteristic of Mark. The connexion of this remark with what goes before, is: 'If the receiving any one, even a little child, in thy Name, be receiving Thee; were we doing right when we forbade one who used thy Name, but did not follow us?' "Let those observe this," says Bengel, "who bind on spiritual gifts to canonical succession." This man actually did what the very Apostles themselves were specially appointed to do: and our Lord, so far from prohibiting, encourages him; see Num. xi. 26–29.

39.] See 1 Cor. xii. 3. The very success of the miracle will awe him, and prevent him from soon or lightly speaking evil of me.

We must beware of supposing that the application of this saying is to be confined to the working of a miracle—ver. 40 shews that it is general—a weighty maxim of Christian toleration and charity, and caution to men how they presume to limit the work of the Spirit of God to any sect, or succession, or outward form of Church; compare Phil. i. 16–18.

40.] This saying is not inconsistent with that in Matt. xii. 30. They do not refer to the same thing. This is said of outward conformity—that, of inward unity of purpose—two widely differing things. On that saying, see note there. On this, we may say—all those who, notwithstanding outward differences of communion and government, believe in and preach Jesus Christ, without bitterly and uncharitably opposing each other, are hereby declared to be helpers forward of each other's work. O that all Christians would remember this! Stier (Red. J. iii. 24) strongly deprecates the reading us and our: “the us in the mouth of our Lord here confuses and destroys nearly the whole purport of his weighty saying. For this is the very fault of the disciples, that they laid down outward and visible communion with them as the decisive criterion of communion with the Lord: and this very fault the Lord rebukes with his repudiatory you.” Still, there is a propriety, a tempering the rebuke with a gracious reminiscence of their unity with Him, and something exceedingly suiting the belong to Christ below, in us and our. In the divided state of the critical evidence, the reading must be ever doubtful.

41.] This verse does not take up the discourse from ver. 37, as some think, but is immediately connected with ver. 40:—‘Even the smallest service done in my Name shall not be unrewarded—much more should not so great an one as casting out of devils be prohibited.’

The original has in the name that: i. e., by reason that, but not without an allusion to my name, which furnishes the reason.

ye belong to Christ] The only place in the Gospels where this expression is used. St. Paul it; see reff. and Rom. viii. 9: 1 Cor. iii. 4 42.] See Matt. xviii. 6.

43–48.] These solemn repetitions of former declarations (see Matt. v. 29; xviii. 8, 9) are by no means to be regarded as arbitrary insertions by this or that Evangelist, but as the truth of what was uttered by our Lord.

Vv. 44, 46, 48 are only in Mark; they are cited from Isaiah (see Isa. lxvi. 24), where the prophecy is of the carcasses of those who have transgressed against the Lord. This triple repetition gives sublimity, and leaves no doubt of the discourse having been verbatim thus uttered. See note on Matt. v. 22.

49.] In order to understand this difficult verse, it will be necessary first to examine its connexion and composition. (1) What is for? It connects it with the solemn assertions in vv. 43–48, it is better for thee..., and furnishes a reason why it is better for us to cut off and cast away, &c.

every one then is to be taken absolutely: referring back both to the thee, and the their above—every sacrifice is (not opposed to [Meyer], but) parallel with every one, and and equivalent to just as. (2) This being stated, let us now enquire into the symbolic terms used. FIRE, is the refiner's fire of Mal. iii. 2, to which indeed there seems to be a reference; the fire of Matt. iii. 11 and Acts ii. 3; of Ezek. xxviii. 14 (see my Hulsean Lectures for 1841, pp 9–12). Fire is the symbol of the divine purity and presence:—our God is a consuming fire, not only to his foes, but to his people: but in them, the fire shall burn up only what is impure and requires purifying out, 1 Cor. iii. 13: 1 Pet. i. 7; iv. 12, 17. This very fire shall be to them as a preserving salt, The SALT of the covenant of God (Lev. ii. 18) was to be mixed with every sacrifice; and it is with fire that all men are to be salted. This fire is the divine purity and judgment in the covenant, whose promise is, ‘I will dwell among them.’ And in and among this purifying fire shall the people of God ever walk and rejoice everlasting. Rev. xxi. 23. This is the right understanding of Isa. xxxiv. 14, 15, ‘Who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire?&c. He that walketh in righteousness,’ &c. And thus the connexion with the preceding verses is,—‘it is better for thee to cut off,’ &c.—‘for it is part of the salting of thee, the living sacrifice’ (Rom. xii. 1), that every offence and scandal must be burnt out of thee before thou canst enter into life.’ It is perhaps necessary to add that this is simply the explanation of our Lord’s words as they stand, in their symbolism and connexion. When Mr. Elliott objects to it as a ‘fearful comment,’ he has to do with those words, not with me. Surely, nothing but the most amazing power of misunderstanding can suppose the explanation inconsistent with such texts as Rom. viii. 1, 34: 1 John ii. 1, 2.

50.] The connexion of this (elsewhere said in other references, Matt. v. 13: Luke xiv. 34) is now plain. If this fire which is to purify and act as a preserving salt to you, have, from the nullity and vapidly of the grace of the covenant in you, no such power,—it can only consume—the salt has lost its savour—the covenant is void—you will be cast out, as it is elsewhere added, and the fire will be no longer the fire of purification, but of wrath eternal.

I will just add that the interpretation of the sacrifice as the condemned—and the fire and salt as eternal fire,—except in the case of the salt having lost its savour, is contrary to the whole symbolism of Scripture, and to the exhortation with which this verse ends: ‘Have this of God—this spirit of adoption—this pledge of the covenant, in yourselves;—and,’ with reference to the strife out of which the discourse sprung,—‘have peace with one another.’

CHAP. X. 1–12.] REPLY TO THE PHARISEES' QUESTION CONCERNING DIVORCE. Matt. xix. 1–12. See Luke xvii. 11.

1, and the farther side] Our Lord retired, after His discourses to the Jews in John x. and before the raising of Lazarus, to Bethany (John i. 28; x. 40) beyond Jordan, and thence made his last journey to Jerusalem; so that in the strictest sense of the words He did come into the borders of Judæa and beyond Jordan. St. Matthew has “beyond Jordan” without the copula. Here a large portion of the sayings and doings of Jesus is omitted: compare Matt. xviit. 10; xix. 3: Luke ix. 51–xviii. 15: John vii. 1 ff.

2–9.] See notes on Matthew, with whose account ours is nearly identical. Compare however our vv. 3, 4, 5 with Matthew vv. 7, 8, 9, and we have testimony to the independence of the two reports—for such an arbitrary alteration of arrangement is inconceivable.

4.] suffered is emphatic. Moses gave an express injunction.

7.] Our makes Adam's saying His own: in Matthew it is attributed to “him that made (them) from the beginning.” The parallel is most instructive.

10–12.] In Matthew this saying forms part of the discourse with the Jews. Here again Mark furnishes us with the exact circumstantial account of the matter. On the addition, Matthew vv. 10–12, see notes there.

We may notice, that St. Mark omits St. Matthew's “for every cause” in ver. 2,—and his “except for fornication” in ver. 11; as also does St. Luke (xvi. 18). The one omission seems to involve the other. The report here gives the enquiry without this particular exception. As a general rule, St. Mark, so accurate in circumstantial details, is less exact than St. Matthew in preserving the order and connexion of the discourses.

12.] This verse corresponds to “whoso marrieth her that is put away committeth adultery” in Matthew, ver 9—but it is expressed as if the woman were the active party, and put away her husband, which was allowed by Greek and Roman law (see 1 Cor. vii. 13), but not by Jewish (see Deut. xxiv. 1: Jos. Antt. xv. 7. 10). This alteration in the verbal expression may have originated in the source whence Mark's report was drawn.

13–16.] THE BRINGING OF CHILDREN TO JESUS. Matt. xix. 13–15. Luke xviii. 15–17. The three are nearly identical:—from Matthew, we have the additional reason “and pray,” and from Mark, “he took them up in his arms.”

13. young children] Not only so, but as in Luke, infants: and our Lord was not to teach them, but only to touch, and pray over them. This simple, seemingly superstitious application of those that brought them (perhaps not the mothers only) the disciples, interrupted in their converse on high and important subjects, despise and reprove.

14.] We can hardly read our Lord's solemn saying, without seeing that it reaches further than the mere then present occasion.

It might one day me a question whether the new Christian covenant of repentance and faith could take in the unconscious infant, as the old covenant did: whether, when Jesus was no longer on earth, little children might be brought to Him, dedicated to his service, and made partakers of his blessing. Nay, in the pride of the human intellect, this question was sure one day to be raised: and our Lord furnishes the Church, by anticipation, with an answer to it for all ages. Not only may the little infants be brought to Him,—but in order for us who are mature to come to Him, we must cast away all that wherein our maturity has caused us to differ from them, and become LIKE THEM. Not only is Infant Baptism justified, but it is (abstractedly considered;—not as to preparation for it, which from the nature of the case is precluded) the NORMAL PATTERN OF ALL BAPTISM; none can enter God's kingdom, except as an infant. In adult baptism, the exceptional case (see above), we strive to secure that state of simplicity and childlikeness, which in the infant we have ready and undoubted to our hands.

16.] The word may be rendered he fervently blessed them.

17–31.] ANSWER TO AN ENQUIRER RESPECTING ETERNAL LIFE, AND DISCOURSE THEREUPON. Matt. xix. 16–30. Luke xviii. 18–30. On the different form of our Lord's answer in Matthew, see notes there. As it here stands, so far from giving any countenance to Socinian error, it is a pointed rebuke of the very view of Christ which they who deny His Divinity entertain. He was no ‘good Master,’ to be singled out from men on account of His pre-eminence over his kind in virtue and wisdom: God sent us no such Christ as this, nor may any of the sons of men be thus called good. He was one with Him who only is good, the Son of the Father, come not to teach us merely, but to beget us anew by the divine power which dwells in Him. The low view then, which this applicant takes of Him and his office, He at once rebukes and annuls, as He had done before in the case of Nicodemus: see John iii. 1 ff. and notes.

The dilemma, as regards the Socinians, has been well put (see Stier ii. 283, note):—either, “There is none but God: Christ is good: therefore Christ is GOD;”—or, “There is none good but God: therefore Christ is not God; therefore Christ IS NOT GOOD.”

With regard to other points the variations in the narratives are trifling, but instructive—“if thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments. He saith unto Him, which?” (Matthew) = “thou knowest the commandments” (Mark and Luke) without any break in the discourse. Similarly, in Matthew, the young (Matthew) ruler (Luke) asks, ver. 20, “what lack I yet?” but in Mark and Luke, Jesus says to him (and here with the remarkable addition of “beholding him, loved him”) “one thing thou lackest.” Such notices as these shew the point at which, not short of which nor beyond which, we may expect the Evangelists to be in accord: viz. in that inner truthfulness of faithful report which reflects to us the teaching of the Lord, but does not depend on slavish, literal exactitude; which latter if we require, we overthrow their testimony, and most effectually do the work of our adversaries.

17.] into the way, out of the house, ver. 10, to continue His journey, ver. 32. The running and the kneeling are both found in the graphic St. Mark only.

19.] St. Mark here takes exactly the commandments of the second table,—defraud not standing for the tenth. St. Matthew adds their summary (“thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself”), omitting (with St. Luke) “defraud not” perhaps on account of “do not steal” having gone before.

21.] Notice the graphic details again, of looking on him and loving him.

22.] for he had great possessions—so also St. Matthew.

23–31.] Here our ver. 24 is a most important addition; the rest is much alike in the three. In that verse we have all misunderstanding of our Lord’s saying removed, and “the proverb,” as Wesley well observes, “shifted to this ground: ‘It is easier for a camel, &c. than for a rich man to cast off his trust in his riches’” Yet the power of divine grace can and does accomplish even this.

24.] Children is remarkable, and a trace of exactitude: see John xxi. 5:—go also looked round about, ver. 23.

26.] This reiterated expression of dismay, after the explanation in ver. 24, need not surprise us. The disciples were quite as well aware as we must be, if we deal truly with ourselves, that they that have riches and they that trust riches are too nearly commensurate, for the mind to be relieved of much of its dread at the solemn saying which preceded.

28.] Here is an instance of a saying of Peter’s reported, without any distinction indicating that he had a share in the report. See notes on Matthew, for the promise here made to the Apostles.

29, 30.] Here our report is most important. To it and St. Luke we owe now in this time, without which the promise might be understood of a future life only:—and to it alone we owe the particularizing of the returns made, and the words with persecutions, which light up the whole passage, and shew that it is the inheritance of the earth in the higher sense by the meek which is spoken of;—see 1 Cor. iii. 21, 22.

Observe mothers—nature gives us only one—but love, many (see Rom. xvi, 13). We do not read fathers, perhaps because of our high and absorbing relation to our Father in heaven; compare Matt. xxviii. 9. On and the gospel’s, Dr. Wordsworth observes, “see above, viii. 35, where this phrase (not found in the other Evangelists, see Matt. xvi. 25; Luke ix. 24) is inserted by St. Mark. Perhaps it made a greater impression upon his mind, because he had formerly shrunk from suffering for the Gospel’s sake. (See Acts xiii. 13; xv. 38.) St. Mark also alone here inserts our Lord’s words, with persecutions, perhaps from a recollection that he had been once affrighted by persecution from doing the work of the Gospel: and desiring to prepare others to encounter trials which for a time had mastered himself.”

This was (see Matt. xvi. 21; xvii. 22) the third declaration of His sufferings which the Lord had made to the disciples, and it was His going before them, accompanied most probably by something remarkable in his gait and manner—a boldness and determination perhaps, an eagerness, denoted in Luke xii. 50, which struck them with astonishment and fear.

“Though very little is said in the Gospels concerning our Lord’s external appearance and deportment, there are frequent indications of its effects on others. We do not see His glory in itself,—it could not be described,—but we read the reflection of it in them. See Matt. ix. 9, the call of St. Matthew: Matt. xxi. 12, the purging of the temple: Mark ix. 15, the feeling and behaviour of the crowd towards Him after the Transfiguration. The climax is at the betrayal, John xviii. 6, when, after His utterance of those words—‘I am he,’—the soldiers start back, and fall to the ground.” Dr. Wordsworth.

32.] began, anew: He again opened this subject.

33.] The circumstances of the passion are brought out in all three Evangelists with great particularity. The ‘delivery to the Gentiles’ is common to them all.

34.] spit upon him, Mark and Luke:—crucify him, Matthew only, which is remarkable, as being the first intimation, in plain terms, of the death He should die. The taking up the cross, so often alluded to, might have had now for them a deep meaning—but see Luke ver. 34. The they in ver. 34 means the Gentiles.

35–45.] AMBITIOUS REQUEST OF THE SONS OF ZEBEDEE: OUR LORD’S REPLY. Matt. xx. 20–28, where see notes throughout, and especially on the difference in our ver. 35. The two accounts of the discourse are almost verbatim the same, and that they came from one source is very apparent. Even here, however, slight deviations occur, which are unaccountable, if the one had actually before him the writing of the other. Besides, we have the whole additional particulars of the baptism, with which He was to be baptized: see note on Matthew.

38.] Observe the present tenses, drink of, and am baptised with. They may mean that the Lord had already the cup of His suffering at His lips; was already, so to speak, sprinkled with the first drops of spray of His baptism of blood: or they may be merely official: “that I am to drink of, and to be baptized with.”

42.] they which are accounted to rule,—who have the title of rulers: literally, they which seem to rule, or, think that they rule. It is not, ‘those who rule,’ which God alone does.

46–52.] HEALING OF BLIND BARTIMÆUS ON DEPARTURE FROM JERICHO. Matt. xx. 29–34. Luke xviii. 35–43. On the three accounts referring to one and the same miracle, see on Matthew. I will only add here, that a similar difference of number between Matthew and Mark is found in the miracle in the neighbourhood of Gergesa, ch. v. 2.

46.] Bar-timæus means, the son of Timæus,—so Bar tholomew, ch. iii. 18, Bar jesus, Acts xiii. 6.

48.] See on Matthew vv. 20, 31.

50.] Signs of an eye-witness, which make us again believe, that here we have the literally exact account of what took place.

51.] Rabboni, i.e. Master, or My Master, see John xx. 16. It was said to be a more respectful form than Rabbi merely.

52.] In Matthew only, Jesus touches him. The account here and in Luke seems to correspond more closely with the wonderful strength of his faith. Our Lord healed by a word in such cases, see Matt. viii. 10–13, ch. vii. 29, and other places. St. Luke adds, “glorifying God,”—and that all the people seeing him gave glory to God; see also Luke xix. 37.

Mark: Chapter 11

CHAP. XI. 1–11.] TRIUMPHAL ENTRY INTO JERUSALEM. Matt. xxi. 1–17. Luke xix. 29–44. John xii. 12–36. On the general sequence of events of this and the following day, see note on Matthew, ver. 1.

1, 2.] As far as ye shall find, the agreement in Matthew, Mark, and Luke is nearly verbal; after that, Mark and Luke only mention the foal, and add, on which never man sat. Compare with this, Luke xxiii. 53. Our Lord’s birth, triumph, and burial were to be, in this, alike. Meyer observes of this part of the history, ‘A later tradition, sprung from the sacred destination of the beast (for beasts never et worked were used for sacred purposes, Num. xix. 2: Deut. xxi. 3: 1 Sam. vi. 7).’ But does it never strike such annotators, that this very usage would lead not only to the narrative being so constructed, but to the command itself having been so given?

4.] The report of one of those sent: perhaps of Peter. The word rendered a place where two ways met, only means, a road leading round a place, and probably imports simply the street. Wordsw. interprets it, ‘the back way, w hich led round the house.’ But there does not appear to be any reason for supposing the word “round” to refer to the house, rather than to the whole block, or neighbourhood, of houses, round about which the street led. Dean Trench, on the A.V. p. 116, would render it “a way round,” “a crooked lane.”

branches] called branches of palm-trees, John, ver. 13: the word signifies not merely branches, but branches cut for the purpose of being littered to walk on: and thus implies the strawing in the way, which has been unskilfully supplied.

10.] blessed...David—is peculiar to Mark, clearly setting forth the idea of the people that the Messiah’s Kingdom, the restoration of the throne of David, was come.

See the additional particular of the weeping over the city, Luke, vv. 41–44, and notes.

11.] See Matthew, ver. 12, and notes on ver. 1: also on John ii. 13–18.

I am by no means certain that the solution proposed in the notes on Matthew is the right one, but I cannot suggest a better. When St. Mark, as here, relates an occurrence throughout, with such signs of an eye-witness as in ver. 4, it is very difficult to suppose that he has transposed any thing; whereas St. Matthew certainly does not speak here so exactly, having transposed the anointing in Bethany: see notes on Matt. xxvi. 2, 6.

12–26.] THE BARREN FIG-TREE. THE CLEANSING OP THE TEMPLE. Matt. xxi. 12–22. Our account here bears strong marks of being that of a beholder and hearer: e.g. when they had come forth from Bethany,—afar off,—having leaves,—and his disciples heard it.

The times and order of the events are here more exact than in St. Matthew, who seems to place the withering of ‘the tree immediately after the word spoken by our Lord.

13. the time of figs was not yet] The sentence, which in the original is elliptical (for the season was not of figs, or for it was not a season of figs), may be supplied,—for the season was not (one) of figs,—or, for the season was not (that) of figs, i.e. not yet the season for figs. The latter suits the context best. The tree was precocious, in being clothed with leaves: and if it had bad on it winter figs, which remain on from the autumn, and ripen early the next season, they would have been ripe at this time. But there were none—it was a barren tree. On the import of this miracle, see notes on Matthew.

15–19.] Matt. xxi. 12, 13, where see notes: also Luke xix. 45–48, any vessel]—e. g. a pail or basket,—used for common life.

16.] This was the court of the Gentiles, which was used as a thoroughfare; which desecration our Lord forbade.

17.] for all the nations, omitted in Matthew and Luke, but contained in the prophecy:—mentioned by St. Mark as writing for Gentile Christians: but this may be doubted.

18. all the people was astonished at his doctrine...] This remark, given by St. Mark and St. Luke, is omitted by St. Matthew: probably because he has given us so much of the doctrine itself.

19.] See note on Matthew, ver. 17. On the Monday and Tuesday evenings, our Lord appears to have gone to Bethany.

20–26.] The answers are very similar to those in Matthew, but with one important addition here, viz. vv. 25, 26: see Matt. vi. 14, and 1 Tim. ii. 8. The connexion here seems to be, ‘Though you should aim at strength of faith,—yet your faith should not work in all respects as you have seen me do, in judicial anger condemning the unfruitful and evil; but you must forgive.’

24. believe that ye have received them] The past tense is used, because the reception spoken of is the determination in the divine counsels coincident with the request—believe that when you asked, you received, and the fulfilment shall come.

25.] On the matter, compare Matt. vi. 14 f. See also Matt. v. 23 f., where the converse to this is treated of.

27–33.] THE AUTHORITY OF JESUS QUESTIONED. HIS REPLY. Matt. xxi. 23–32. Luke xx. 1–8. Our account and that of St. Matthew are very close in agreement. St. Luke's has (compare ver. 6, "all the people will stone us") few and important additions: see notes on Matthew.

28.] The expression these things need not necessarily refer to the cleansing of the temple, as Meyer: but seems, from Luke, to extend over our Lord's whole course of teaching and putting himself forward in public. 32.] The answer to the question, asked by themselves, is given by the Evangelist.

Mark: Chapter 12

CHAP XII. 1–12] PARABLE OF THE VINEYARD LET OUT TO HUSBANDMEN. This parable is, for the most part, identical with that in Matt. xxi. 33–46, and Luke xx. 9–19. The number and treatment of the servants sent, is enlarged on here; and in ver. 4 there occurs a singular word, which we render, wounded him in the head. Some have supposed it means, 'they made short work with him,' which is the more usual sense of the word, but not probable here; for they did not kill him, but disgracefully used him.

I must not allow any opportunity to pass of directing attention to the sort of difference, in similarity, between these three reports,—and observing that no origin of that difference is imaginable, except the gradual deflection of accounts from a common, or a parallel source. See notes on Matthew throughout.

9.] he will come, &c., is not the answer of the Pharisees, nor of the people, as the corresponding sentence in Matthew (see note there), but, here and in Luke, a continuation of our Lord's discourse.

After ver. 11 comes in Matt. vv. 43–45.

12.] Meyer makes the multitude ("the people" in Luke) the subject of they knew, but I think quite unnecessarily. The fear of the people is increased by the consciousness on the part of the that He had spoken the parable against them: they are as men convicted before the people.

13–17.] REPLY CONCERNING THE LAWFULNESS OF TRIBUTE TO CÆSAR. Matt. xxii. 15–22. Luke xx. 20–26. The parable of the wedding-garment, Matt. xxii. 1–14, is omitted. The only matters requiring additional remark in these verses are,

13.] by a word signifies the instrument wherewith they would catch him: the verb being one taken from the chase. They wished to lay hold on him by some saying of His.

14.] Must we give, or must we not give? the originality of the report is shewn by these words. They wish to drive our Lord to an absolute affirmation or negation.

15.] a denarius (see note on Matt. xx. 2), Mark and Luke, answers to "the tribute-money," Matthew.

17.] they marvelled is in the original in the imperfect tense, and is graphic. This was going on, when the next incident began.

18–27.] REPLY TO THE SADDUCEES CONCERNING THE RESURRECTION. Matt. xxii. 23–33. Luke xx. 27–40. The three reports are very much alike in matter, and now and then coincide almost verbally (Matthew ver. 27, Luke ver. 32. Mark ver. 23 end, Luke ver. 33). The chief additions are found in Luke, vv. 34–36, where see notes, and on Matthew throughout.

23.] when they shall rise does not here mean, 'when men (the dead) shall rise,' but when they (the wife and seven brothers) shall rise: see on ver. 25.

25.] the when they shall rise here is general, not as in ver. 23: see last note.

26. in the history the Bush (so also in Luke)] The words may in the original mean either, 'in the chapter containing the history of God appearing in the Bush,' or, 'when he was at the Bush.' The former is the more probable, on account of the construction of the verse in our text. In Luke, if we had his account alone, the other rendering might be admissible, 'Moses testified, at the Bush:' but this will not answer in our text.

28–34.] REPLY CONCERNING THE GREAT COMMANDMENT. Matt. xxii. 34–40, but with differing circumstances. There the question appears as that of one among the Pharisees' adherents, who puts this question, "tempting him"—and in consequence of the Pharisees coming up to the strife, after He had discomfited the Sadducees. I should be disposed to take St. Mark's as the strictly accurate account, seeing that there is nothing in the question which indicates enmity, and our Lord's answer, ver. 34, plainly precludes it. The man, from hearing them disputing, came up, and formed one of the band who gathered together for the purpose of tempting Him. St. Mark's report, which here is wholly unconnected in origin with St. Matthew's, is that of some one who had taken accurate note of the circumstances and character of the man: St. Matthew's is more general, not entering, as this, into individual motives, but classing the question broadly among the various "temptations" of our Lord at this time.

28.] The motive seems to have been, admiration of our Lord's wise answer, and a desire to be instructed further by Him.

the first commandment of all;—this was one of the "strivings about the law" (Titus iii. 9),—which was the greatest commandment. The Scribes had many frivolous enumerations and classifications of the commands of the law.

29f.] St. Mark cites the entire,—St. Matthew only the command itself.

31.] Our Lord adds this second as an application or bringing home of the first.

The first is the Sun, so to speak, of the spiritual life:—this the lesser light, which reflects the shining of that other. It is like to it, inasmuch as both are laws of love: both deduced from the great and highest love: both dependent on "I am the Lord thy God," Lev. xix. 18.

Stier sets forth beautifully the strong contrast between the requirements of these two commands, and the then state of the Jewish Church: see John vii. 19.

32, 33.] The Scribe shews that he had entered into the true spirit of our Lord's answer; and replies in admiration at its wisdom.

whole burnt offerings and sacrifices, the things to which the outward literal observers paid all their attention.

34. not far...] This man had hold of that principle in which Law and Gospel are one: he stood as it were at the door of the Kingdom of God. He only wanted (but the want was indeed a serious one) repentance and faith to be within it. The Lord shews us here that even outside His flock, those who can answer discreetly (or intelligently)—who have knowledge of the spirit of the great command of Law and Gospel, are nearer to being of his flock, than the formalists:—but then, as Bengel adds, "If thou art not far off, come in: otherwise thou hadst better be far off."

And no man...] This is apparently out of its place here, as it is after the question which now follows, that St. Matthew relates this discomfiture of his adversaries. We must not however conclude too hastily, especially where the minute accuracy of St. Mark is at stake. The question just asked was the last put to our Lord, and therefore the notice of its being the last comes in fitly here. The enquiry which follows did more than silence their questioning; it silenced their answering too; both which things St. Matthew combines as the result of this day, in his ver. 46.

35–37.] THE PHARISEES BAFFLED BY A QUESTION CONCERNING CHRIST AND DAVID. Matt. xxii. 41–46. Luke xx. 41–44, The reports are apparently independent of any common original, and hardly agree verbally in the citation from the LXX. See notes on Matthew.

35.] The whole controversy in the temple is regarded as one: hence the new point raised by our Lord is introduced as a rejoinder, with answered.

36.] Observe in the Holy Ghost, "in the Spirit," Matthew,—"in the book of Psalms," Luke: a coincidence not to be passed over.

37.] whence, i.e. from whence shall we seek an explanation for what follows?

And the common people (literally the great multitude) heard him gladly is peculiar to Mark.

38–40.] DENUNCIATION OF THE SCRIBES. Luke xx. 45–47. These verses, nearly verbatim the same in the two Evangelists, and derived from a common report, are an abridgment of the discourse which occupies the greater part of Matt. xxiii.—with the additions of love to go in long clothing, and ver. 40, see on Matthew, where these words are spurious. The words in his doctrine seem to imply that St. Mark understood it as a compendium.

They devoured widows' houses, by attaching them to themselves, and so persuading them to minister to them of their substance. A trace of this practice (but there out of gratitude and love) on the part of the Jewish women, is found in Luke viii. 2, 3. What words can better describe the corrupt practices of the so-called priesthood of Rome, than these of our Lord? The pretense was, to make their sanctity appear to these women, and so win their favour.

41–44.] THE WIDOW’ S MITES. Luke xxi. 1–4: probably from a common origin.

41. the treasury] This is usually understood of thirteen chests, which stood in the court of the women, into which were thrown contributions for the temple, or the tribute (of Matt. xvii. 24). But it is hardly likely that they would be called the treasury, and we hear of a building by this name in Josephus. Lucke believes some part the court of the women to be intended, perhaps a chamber in connexion with these chests.

Our Lord had at this time taken his leave of the temple, and was going out of it—between Matt. xxiii. end and xxiv.

42.) mites, the smallest Jewish coin: St. Mark adds which make a farthing, for his Roman readers:—the mite = 1 of an as = 1/40,—or, after the weight of the as was diminished, 1/2; of a denarius. Two, Bengel remarks, are noticed: she might have kept back one.

43.] more, in God’s reckoning; more, for her own stewardship of the goods entrusted to her care.

CHAP. XIII.] JESUS PROPHESIES OF HIS COMING, AND OF THE TIMES OF THE END. Matt. xxiv. Luke xxi. 5–36. The accounts are apparently distinct, and each contains some fragments which have escaped the others. On the matter of the prophecy, I have fully commented in Matthew, where see notes: also those on Luke.

1.] what great stones.—Josephus says, “the stones of the building were 40 cubits in size.” And again, “for 6 days together the strongest of all the battering engines played on the wall and produced no effect: the size and jointing of the stones was too strong for it, and for all the others.”

3.] Peter and James and John and Andrew are “his disciples” in Matthew, and “some” in Luke.

4.] these things implies that they viewed the destruction of the temple as part of a great series of events, which had now by frequent prophecy become familiar to them. ‘These things about which thou so often speakest.’

5.] began to say—with this begins our Lord’s full explanation on the matter. See reff.

8. there shall be... there shall be] By these repetitions majesty is given to the discourse.

the beginnings;—i. e. but the beginnings—the mere beginnings.

9.] ye has the emphasis—let your care be...

11.] St. Mark has vv. 10, 11 peculiar to himself. St. Luke (vv. 14, 15) has something very like them—St. Matthew nothing: but they occur Matt. x. 19, where see note.

12.] This is expressed by “then shall many be offended, and shall betray one another, and shall hate one another;” Matthew, ver. 10.

13.] hath endured, viz. in the confession implied by for my name’s sake preceding.

14.] where it ought not—see note on Matthew, ver. 15. This is a less definite description of the place than we find there.

18.] St. Matthew adds, “nor on the sabbath day.” St. Mark wrote mostly for Gentile readers, and thus perhaps was not likely to report this.

19, 20.] the creation which God created... and the elect’s sake, whom be hath chosen, peculiarities of St. Mark’s style in reporting our Lord’s discourses, for greater solemnity. John xvii. 26, John v. 16, cited strangely by Mr. Elliott to disprove this, are no cases in point. In both those, the expression is necessary to the sense: here, and usually in St. Mark, it is merely idiomatic.

24.] The opening word is more than the simple ‘but:’ and is best rendered by howbeit or nevertheless: as if it were, “though I

in those days, after that tribution—then those days come after that tribulation: see note on Matthew, ver. 29.

Our Evangelist omits the mourning of the tribes of the earth, and the seeing the sign of the Son of Man.

27.] from the uttermost part of the earth, from the extremity of the visible plane of the earth, shall the collecting begin: and shall proceed to the uttermost part of heaven, to the point where the sky touches that mate the other side.

28.] her, emphatic, when her branch... conveying an a fortiori in the application. If in so humble an example as the fig-tree you discern the nearness of a season, much rather should you in these sure and awful signs discern the approach of the end.

30.] this generation—see on Matthew, ver. 34.

32.] This is one of those things which the Father hath put in his own power, Acts i. 7, and with which the Son, in his mediatorial office, is not acquainted: see on Matthew. We must not deal unfaithfully with a plain and solemn assertion of our (and what can be more so than nor even the Son, in which by the nor even He is not below but above the angels?) by such evasions as "He does not know it so as to reveal it to us," or as Aug., "He did not so know it as then to indicate it to the disciples." Of such a sense there is not a hint in the context: nay, it is altogether alien from it. The account given by the orthodox Lutherans, as represented by Meyer, that our Lord knew this by possession, but not by use, is right enough, if at the same time it is carefully remembered, that it was this possession of which He emptied Himself when He became man for us, and which it belongs to the very essence of His mediatorial kingdom to hold in subjection to the Father.

33–37.] Peculiar to Mark, and containing the condensed matter of Matthew, vv. 43–47, and perhaps an allusion to the parable of the talents in Matt. xxv.

The porter is the door-porter, whose office it would be to look out for approaching travellers,—answering especially to the ministers of the word, who are (Ezek. xxxiii.) watchmen to God's church.

Mark: Chapter 14

CHAP. XIV. 1, 2.] CONSPIRACY OF THE JEWISH AUTHORITIES AGAINST JESUS. Matt. xxvi. 1–5. Luke xxii. 1, 2. The account of the events preceding the passion in our Gospel takes a middle rank between those of St. Matthew and St. Luke. It contains very few words which are not to be found in one or other of them; but at the same time the variations from both are so frequent and irregular, as in my opinion wholly to preclude the idea that St. Mark had ever seen either. The minute analysis of any passage in the three will, I think, convince an unprejudiced examiner of this.

On the chronological difficulties which beset this part of the Gospel history, see note on Matt. xxvi. 17.

1. the passover, and [feast of] unleavened bread classed together, because the time of eating the Passover was actually the commencement of the feast of unleavened bread. The announcement by our Lord of his approaching death (Matt. xxvi. 2) is omitted by St. Mark and St. Luke.

3–9.] THE ANOINTING AT BETHANY. Matt. xxvi. 6–13. John xii. 1–8. (On Luke vii. 36–50, see note there.) The whole narrative has remarkable points of similarity with that of St. John,—and has been used as one of the indications that St. Mark had knowledge of and used the Gospel of St. John. My own view leads me to a different conclusion.

I have already remarked (note on Matt. xxvi. 3), that while St. Matthew seems to have preserved trace of the parenthetical nature of this narrative, such trace altogether fails in our account. It proceeds as if continuous.

3. spikenard] The original, literally rendered, is as Bishop Jeremy Taylor has it in his Life of Christ, §15, "nard pistick." But it is quite uncertain what this epithet "pistick" means. The discussion may be seen in my Greek Testament. Here I can only state that the two possible explanations are (1) genuine, unadulterated; and (2) liquid, or drinkable. There clearly appears to have been a certain sort of ointment which they drank: see citations as above. The word is nowhere found in the classics, only here and in the parallel place in St. John, and some later writers.

brake the box can hardly mean only having broken the resin with which the cork was sealed. In ch v. 4, John xix, 36, Rev. ii. 27, the word is of breaking, properly so called: and I see no objection to supposing that the box (i. e. of course the narrow neck of it) was crushed in the hand, and the ointment thus poured over His head. The feet would then (John xii. 3) be anointed with what remained on the hands of Mary, or in the broken vase (see note on Luke vii. 38).

4, 5. some] See notes on Matthew. The three hundred denarii is common to our narrative and that of St. John.

6.] Let her alone, also common to John, but as addressed to Judas.

7.] The agreement verbatim here of Matthew and John, whereas our narrative inserts the additional clause and whosoever ye will ye may do them good, is decisive against the idea that St. Mark compiled his account from the other two. In these words there appears to be a reproach conveyed to Judas, and Perhaps an allusion to the office of giving to the poor being his

8.] We have here again a striking addition peculiar to Mark. She hath done what she could: as similar praise to that given to the widow, ch. xii. 44—“she cast in all that she had.” We have also the expression she hath by anticipation anointed, shewing, as I have observed on Matthew, that it is one of prospective love, grounded on the deepest apprehension of the reality of our Lord’s announcement of His approaching death.

9.] See notes on Matthew ver. 13.

10, 11.] COMPACT OF JUDAS WITH THE CHIEF PRIESTS TO BETRAY HIM. Matt. xxvi. 14–16. Luke xxii. 3–6. The only matters requiring notice are,—the words when they heard [it], i.e. ‘the proposal,’—and promised, implying, as does the word in Luke, that the money was not paid now, either as full wages, or as earnest-money,—but promised; and paid (most probably) when the Lord was brought before the Sanhedrim, which was what Judas undertook to do.

12–16.] PREPARATION FOR CELEBRATING THE PASSOVER. Matt. xxvi. 17–19. Luke xxii. 7–13. Our account contains little that is peculiar.

12.] when they killed the passover, like St. Luke’s expression “when the passover must be killed,” denotes the ordinary day, when they (i. e. the Jews) sacrificed the Passover;—for that the Lord ate His Passover on that day, and at the usual time, is the impression conveyed by the testimony the three Evangelists: see notes on ew ver. 17, and Luke ver. 7.

We may notice that if this Gospel, as traditionally reported, was drawn up under the superintendence of Peter, we could hardly have failed to have the names of the two disciples given;—nor again would our narrator have missed (and the omission is an important one) the fact that the Lord first gave the command, to go and prepare the Passover—which St. Luke only relates.

It becomes a duty to warn students of the sacred word against fanciful interpretations. A respected Commentator of our own day explains the pitcher of water, which led the way to the room where the last Supper was celebrated, to mean “the baptismal grace” which we have “in earthen vessels,” which “leads on to other graces, even to the communion of Christ’s Body and Blood.”

15.] In the midst of a verbal accordance with Luke we have here inserted prepared, indicating that the guest-chamber was already prepared for the celebration of the Passover, as would indeed be probable at this time in Jerusalem. The disciples had therefore only to get ready the Passover itself.

17–21.] JESUS, CELEBRATING THE PASSOVER, ANNOUNCES HIS BETRAYAL BY ONE OF THE TWELVE. Matt. xxvi. 20–25. Luke xxii. 14 (21–23). John xiii. 21 ff. The account of St. Luke (ver. 16) supplies the important saying of our Lord respecting the fulfilment of the two parts of the Passover feast—see notes there. After our ver. 17, comes in the washing of the disciples’ feet by the Lord as related in John xiii. 1–20.

18.] The words he that eateth with me are peculiar to Mark, and, as we have seen before, bear a relation to St. John’s account, where our Lord had just before cited “he that eateth bread with me,” &c. ver. 18. They do not point out any particular person, but give pathos to the contrast which follows.

20.] This description of the traitor here again does not seem to designate one especially, nor to describe an action at that moment proceeding, but, as before, pathetically to describe the near relation of the betrayer to the Betrayed. Now however the relation pointed out is still closer than before—it is that of one dipping in the same dish—one of nearest and most trusted.

22–25.] INSTITUTION OF THE LORD’s SUPPER. Matt. xxvi. 26–29. Luke xxii. 19, 20. 1 Cor. xi, 23–25. See notes on Matthew.

26–31.] DECLARATION THAT ALL SHOULD FORSAKE HIM. CONFIDENCE OF PETER. Matt. xxvi. 30–35 (see Luke xxii, 31–34, and notes there). Our account is almost verbatim the same as that in Matthew, where see notes. The few differences are there commented on.

30.] Notice the climax: this day, but not only this—in this night, the part of it now present: nor only so, but before the cock crow twice, i. e long before the night is over.

31.] spake the more vehemently—the original implies, went on repeating superabundant

32–42.] OUR LORD’ S AGONY AT GETHSEMANE. Matt. xxvi. 86–46. Luke xxiii. 39–46 (see John xviii. 1). The same remarks apply here also.

33.] Notice the graphic sore amazed, and see note on ch. ix. 15 where the same word is used in the original. St Matthew has to be sorrowful.

36.] Abba is the familiar and endearing appellation for Father. It is an Aramaic form, and after St. Mark’s manner inserted as ‘Ephphatha,’ ch. vii. 34,— ‘Talitha cumi,’ ch. v. 41.

Father is not given as the interpretation of Abba, but came to be attached to it in one phrase as a form of address: see the references.

39.] the same words, not verbatim, but in substance: see in Matthew.

41.] it is enough: viz, your watching with Me. The Lord had no need of it any more, now that the hour had come: not, as some, it is enough of sleep: this as Meyer observes, is refuted by the sleep on now.

43–52.] BETRAYAL AND APPREHENSION OF JESUS. Matt xxvi. 47–56. Luke xxii 47–53.

44.] lead him away safely] It does not quite appear whether safely is to be subjectively taken, ‘with confidence;’ or objectively, ‘in safety.’ Some suppose that it has an ironical meaning—q. d. ‘He will know how to rescue himself—take care that you keep Him safe.’ This of course depends on the view taken of the whole character and purpose of Judas on which see notes at Matt. xxvi. 14 and xxvii. 3.

45.] Rabbi appears to have been the usual form in which Judas addressed our Lord: see Matt. xxvi. 25. But we must not conclude from this with Bengel, that he never seems to have called Him Lord: see Matt. vii. 21, 22.

51.] It is impossible to determine, and therefore idle to enquire, who this was. Epiphanius, in recounting the traditional austerities of James the brother of the Lord, says, “that he never wore a second inner garment, but strictly used one wrapper of linen only, as it says in the Gospel, The young man fled and left the linen cloth with which he was girt.” Chrysostom and others supposed it to have been St. John: and there have been other conjectures. It seems to have been some attached disciple of the Lord (probably well known to the readers of Mark), who had gone to his nightly rest, and had been aroused by the intelligence. The disciples were not laid hold of:—this perhaps was throwing some obstacle in the way of the removal of Jesus: or he may have been laid hold of merely in wantonness, from his unusual garb.

53.] high priest—Caiaphas, de facto, and in the view of our narrator:—so Matthew and Luke: but Jesus was first taken before Annas, who was de jure the high priest: see John xviii. 12–23.

56.] their witness agreed not together—literally, their testimonies were not equal, i.e. consistent with one another. It was necessary that two witnesses should agree. Deut. xvii. 6.

57.] certain,—two: see Matthew.

58.] We and I are emphatic. The allusion is probably to Dan. ii. 34.

59.] Perhaps the inconsistency of these testimonies may be traced in the different reports here and in Matthew.

so,— ‘in asserting this’—i. e. they varied in the terms in which it was expressed.

60.] On the most probable punctuation and construction, see note on Matthew, ver. 62.

61.] the Blessed: in Hebrew, the ordinary Name for God. “This is the only lace in the N.T. where the well-known Name constantly used by the Rabbis is thus absolutely given.” Meyer.

62.] The “henceforth” of Matthew, and “from this time” of Luke are here omitted.

63.] his clothes, literally, his tunics—not his priestly robe, which was worn only in the temple, and when officiating: see on Matthew, ver. 65.

The plural perhaps is due to the wearing of two inner garments by persons of note.

65.] began—when the sentence was pronounced. The some appear to be members of the Sanhedrim: the servants follow.

Prophesy] St. Matthew and St. Luke explain this: ‘Prophesy, who smote thee?’

66–72.] OUR LORD IS THRICE DENIED BY PETER. Matt. xxvi. 69–75. Luke xxii. 56–62. John xviii. 17, 18, 25–27. See the comparative table, and notes, on Matthew.

66.] beneath, because the house was built round the court, and the rooms looked down into it. See note on Matt. xxvi. 69.

68.] Peter’s reply is an union of two separate answers, which form the 1st and 2nd in Matthew.

69.] the maid—in Matthew “another maid,” in Luke “another,” but masculine. Meyer does not appear to be justified in asserting that this is necessarily the same maid as before: it might be only the maid in waiting in the porch: see note on Matthew.

70.] a little after is expressed in Luke by “about the space of one hour after” for... also] for, in addition to all that has been hitherto said....

72.] when he thought thereon—no entirely satisfactory meaning has yet been given for the original word thus rendered. Referring to my Greek Testament for the discussion, I may sum it up by stating that the sense in the text, though not elsewhere found, seems to suit both the word and the context better than any other that has been suggested.

Mark: Chapter 15

CHAP. XV. 1–5.] JESUS IS LED AWAY TO PILATE, AND EXAMINED BY HIM. Matt. xxvii, 1, 2, 11–14, Luke xxiii. 1–5. John xviii. 28–38. Our account is very nearly related to that in Matthew: see notes there.

1.] the whole council is a touch of accuracy. From ch. xiv. 53 we know that all were assembled. Lightfoot quotes from Maimonides a precept which declares that of the Sanhedrim of 71 members it is not necessary for business that all be present: but when all were specially summoned, attendance was compulsory.

6–15.] BARABBAS PREFERRED TO HIM. HE IS DELIVERED TO BE CRUCIFIED. Matt. xxii. 15–26. Luke xxiii. 17–25. John xviii. 39, 40. Our account is nearly cognate to, but distinct from that of St. Matthew, where see notes. The principal points of distinction will be noticed.

7.] The circumstance that Barabbas was one of a set of murderers, shewn by the them that had made, and the plural who (see margin), is peculiar to our narrative, and shews that it is not compiled from Matthew and Luke.

8.] This is also peculiar to Mark—in Matthew it is Pilate who first offers them the choice—in Luke they cry out, but it is “away with this man, &c.” ver. 18.

coming up probably implies the rising of the crowd in excitement—or perhaps their coming up towards the palace, as “when they were gathered together” in Matthew.

9.] Here our account differs from Matthew and agrees with John, ver. 39.

10.] He knew is the imperfect tense: He was aware, He perceived, His apprehension of it was concurrent with the action going on.

12.] whom ye call the King of the Jews is “Jesus, which is called Christ” in Matthew. Neither of these expressions can well have been copied from the other.

13.] again only refers to “cried out;” see ver. 8, where this is implied in “began to desire.”—they had not cried out this before.

16–19.] JESUS MOCKED BY THE SOLDIERS. Matt. xxvii. 27–30 (omitted in Luke). John xix. 1–8. See notes on Matthew.
16.] hall, the court or guard room, but open, see note on Matt. xxvi. 69.

17.] purple, in Greek, is vaguely used, to signify different shades of red, and is especially convertible with “scarlet” as St. Matthew.

20–23.] HE IS LED TO CRUCIFIXION. Matt. xxvii. 31–34. Luke xxiii. 26–33. John xix. 16, 17. See notes on these.

21. Alexander and Rufus] It is quite uncertain whether Alexander be identical with either of the persons of that name mentioned Acts xix. 33, 1 Tim. i. 20, 2 Tim. iv. 14, or whether those, or any two of them, it one and the same person. There is a Rufus saluted Rom. xvi. 13. The words coming out of the country determine nothing as to its being a working day or otherwise, any more than “that passed by” Matthew, ver. 39: nothing is said as to the distance from whence he came.

22.] the place Golgotha—or perhaps the place of Golgotha, as the word Golgotha would then answer to a skull in the interpretation; St. Luke has “the place which is called a skull.”

23.] wine mingled with myrrh is “vinegar mingled with gall” in Matthew, which see. Literally, they were giving, i.e. they offered.

24–28.] HE IS CRUCIFIED. Matt. xxvii. 35–38. Luke xxiii. 33, 34, 88. John xix. 18–24.

25. the third hour] This date is in agreement with the subsequent account, ver. 33, and its parallel in Matthew and Luke, but, as now standing unexplained, inconsistent with John, xix. 14, where it is said to have been about the sixth hour at the time of the exhibition of our Lord by Pilate. I own I see no satisfactory way of reconciling these accounts, unless there has been (see note on John) some very early erratum in our copies, or unless it can be shewn from other grounds than the difficulty before us, that John’s reckoning of time differs from that employed in the other Evangelists. The difficulty is of a kind in no way affecting the authenticity of the narrative, nor the truthfulness of each Evangelist; but requires some solution to the furnishing of which we are not competent. It is preposterous to imagine that two such accounts as these of the proceedings of so eventful a day should differ by three whole hours in their apportionment of its occurrences. So that it may fairly be presumed, that some different method of calculation has given rise to the present discrepancy. Meanwhile the chronology of our text,—as being carried on through the day, and as allowing time both for the trial, and the events of the crucifixion,—is that which will I believe be generally concurred in. All the other solutions (so called) of the difficulty are not worth relating.

29–32.] HE IS MOCKED ON THE CROSS. Matt. xxvii. 39–44. Luke xxiii. 35–37, 39–43. (John xix. 25–27.) Our narrative, derived&common source with that of Matthew, omits the scriptural allusion, “He trusted in God,” &c. Matthew, ver. 43.

32. And they that were crucified with him] See notes on Luke.

33–37.] SUPERNATURAL DARKNESS. LAST WORDS, AND DEATH OF JESUS. Matt. xxvii. 45–60. Luke xxiii. 44–46. John xix. 28–30. Our account is nearly verbally the same with Matthew.

34.] Eloi, the Syro-chaldaic form, answering to “Eli” in Matthew. Meyer argues that the words in Matthew must have been those actually spoken by our Lord, owing to the taunt, that He called for Elias. The last word is pronounced Sabáchtháni, not Sabachtháni.

36.] On the difference in Matthew, see notes there.

38–41.] SIGNS FOLLOWING HIS DEATH. Matt. xxvii. 51–56. Luke xxiii. 45, 47–49. Omitted by John. See notes on Matthew.

39.] which stood over against him—a minute mark of accuracy, so com-mon in Mark.

so-so majestically, as Theophylact. There was something in the manner of this last cry so unusual and superhuman, that the Centurion (see on Matthew) was convinced that He must have been that Person, whom He was accused as having declared Himself to be.

40, 41.] the less—literally, the little—either in age, or in stature, so distinguished, hardly, at the time of this Gospel being written, from James the son of Zebedee, but more probably from James the brother of the Lord, the bishop of Jerusalem: see Introduction to Epistle of James. This Mary is the wife of Alpheus or Clopas; see John xix. 25.

Salome is called in Matthew, “the mother of the sons of Zebedee.” our Evangelist mentions that they had accompanied Him to Jerusalem;—and we may observe a curious variation of the wording, in “followed Him when He was in Galilee,” and “followed Jesus from Galilee”—the former rendering necessary the additional clause, “which came up with Him,” &c.

42–47.] JOSEPH OF ARIMATHEA BEGS, AND BURIES, THE BODY OF JESUS. Matt. xxvii. 57–61. Luke xxiii. 50–56. John xix. 38–42. For all notes on the substance of the common narrative, see Matthew.

42. the preparation, that is, the day before the sabbath] The Friday afternoon (the preparation—Parascevé, “the name by which Friday is now generally known in Asia and Greece.” Wordsw.) before sunset, at which time the Sabbath would begin, and the taking down, &c. would be unlawful. The three Evangelists do not imply that this “preparation” had any thing especial in it, as St. John does, ver. 31.

43.] honourable—probably in its later sense of noble, i.e. in station. But Meyer supposes it rather to refer to some-thing noble in the character or appearance of Joseph.

counsellor, 2 member of the Sanhedrim;—see Luke, ver. 51.

waited for the kingdom of God is common to Mark and Luke.

went in boldly] Characteristic of St. Mark’s narrative. On the change of mind produced in Joseph and in Nicodemus by the crucifixion, see note, John xix. 39.

44.] There is no inconsistency, or but a very trifling one, with the order in John, ver. 31, to break their legs and take them down. The circumstances related there had taken place, but no report of them had been made to Pilate. And the Body of the Lord had not been taken down, for some reason which does not appear, but which we can easily guess:—if Joseph had declared to the soldiers his intention of begging the Body, nay, had immediately gone (perhaps with them) to Pilate for that purpose,—and went in boldly looks like a sudden and unannounced application,—they would have left the Body for him to take down.

marvelled if he were already dead—he wondered at the fact thus announced to him of His death having already taken place.

45. gave] The passage cited from Cicero to shew that it was customary to give money on such occasions, is not to the point; “the parents were obliged to purchase with money a speedy death,” is not said of the body after death, but of a fee given to the officer for shortening the torments of the executed.

46. bought] Therefore it was not the first day of unleavened bread, which was one of sabbatical sanctity; as indeed the whole of this narrative shews, but such expressions as this more strikingly.

in a sepulchre] It is not said, but implied, both here and in Luke and John, that the tomb was his own—for how should he place the Body there otherwise? The newness of the tomb is not mentioned here, but by the other three Evangelists.

47.] Mary of Joses—understand mother; see ver. 40. That the same person is so called here, and Mary of James in the next verse, points to a difference of origin in the two accounts here, of the Crucifixion and Resurrection.

The mother of the Lord had in all probability previously departed: see notes on Matt. xxvii. 56 and John xix. 27.

St. Luke generalizes, and says, the women who came with Him from Galilee.

Some have understood by Mary of Joses or Jose or Joseph (for all are read here in the MSS.), the wife or daughter of Joseph of Arimathea—some, the mother of the Lord: but both unnecessarily, and without proof.

Mark: Chapter 16

CHAP. XVI. 1–8.] THE WOMEN, COMING TO THE SEPULCHRE, ARE APPRISED OF HIS RESURRECTION. Matt. xxviii. 1–10. Luke xxiv. 1–12. John xx. 1–10. On the general difficulties of this portion of the Gospels, and my view respecting them, see notes on Matthew.

1. when the sabbath was past] It was strictly when the Sabbath was ended, i.e. at sunset, that they bought the spices. St. Luke xxiii. 55, places it on the evening before the Sabbath; a slight but valuable discrepancy, as shewing the independence of the accounts. To suppose two parties of women (Greswell) or to take bought as pluperfect (as the A.V.) is equally arbitrary and unwarranted.

anoint him] This had not been done as yet. Nicodemus (John xix. 40) had only wrapped the Body hurriedly in the spices with the linen clothes.

2. when the sun was risen] This does not agree with Matthew, “as it began to dawn toward the first day of the week”—Luke, “at early (or deep) dawn;” or John, “w hen it was yet dark:”—nor indeed with “very early in the morning” of our narrative itself. If the sun was up, it would be between 6 and 7 o’ clock; which in the East especially, where even public business was transacted very early, could not be so called. Even Greswell virtually acknowledges a difficulty here.

3, 4.] It had been rolled away by an angel, Matthew.

for it was very great is stated as a reason why they could see that it was rolled away on looking up, possibly at some distance. This explanation is according to St. Mark’s manner of describing minute circumstantial incidents; but to refer this clause back as the reason why they questioned who should remove the stone, is not only harsh, but inconsistent with the usage of this Gospel.

5.] In Matthew—an angel, sitting on the stone which he had rolled away. Here he is described as he appeared, and we are left to infer what he was. In Luke,—two angels appeared to them in the tomb. The incident to which these accounts point, must be distinct from that related John xx. 11, which was after Mary Magdalene returned from the city. It is not worth while to detail the attempts which have been made to reconcile these various reports of the incident: they present curious examples of the ingenuity, and (probably unconscious) disingenuousness, of the Harmonists. I may mention that Greswell supposes the angels in Matthew and Mark to be distinct, and accounts for were affrighted in our text thus: ‘After seeing one angel without already, they were probably less prepared than before to see another so soon after within.’

6.] From the come of St. Matthew, I should be inclined to think that his is the strictly accurate account. This word implies that the angel accompanied the women into the tomb: and if so, an imperfect narrative like that in the text might easily describe his whole appearance as taking place within.

7.] But breaks off the discourse and turns to a new matter—But now rather do ye...

and Peter] It is hardly perhaps likely that the denial of Peter was the ground of this message, though it is difficult not to connect the two in the mind. The mention of him here is probably merely official—as the ‘first among equals’ We cannot say that others of the Apostles may not have denied their Master besides Peter.

It must not be concluded from this that we have a trace of Peter’s hand in the narrative.

8.] The idea of our narrative here is, that the women fled in terror from the sepulchre, and did not deliver the message at the time,—for they were afraid. All attempts to reconcile this with the other Gospels are futile. It is a manifest evidence that our narrative is here suddenly broken off, and (perhaps?) that no more information about the women was in the possession of its author. The subsequent verses are quite disconnected from this; and contain the substance of their writer’s information respecting the other appearances of the Lord.

9-20.] APPEARANCES OF JESUS AFTER HIS RESURRECTION: HIS ASCENSION. An addition to the narrative of a compendious and supplementary character, bear-ing traces of another hand from that which has shaped the diction and construction of the rest of the Gospel.

The reasons for and against this inference will be found in the various readings in my Greek Testament, and in the course of this note; and a general statement of them at the end of it. I may here state, for the English reader, that the passage is omitted,—or marked as suspicious, as variously given,—or asserted not to occur in the correct copies,—in many of our oldest authorities, It is quoted as early as Irenæus, in the 2nd century: but Jerome in the 3rd says that nearly “all the Greek MSS. by his time did not contain it.” The legitimate inference is, that it was placed as a completion of the Gospel soon after the apostolic period,—the Gospel itself having been, for some reason unknown to us, eh incomplete.

9.] the first day of the week is remarkable as occurring so soon after the mention of it, ver. 2 (see Luke xviii. 12).

out of whom he had cast...] This notice, coming so late, after the mention of Mary Magdalene in ver. 1, is remarkable. The instances quoted by De Wette to shew that the unexpected introduction of notices contained in the other Gospels is in St. Mark's manner, do not seem to me to apply here.

This verse agrees with John xx. 1 ff, but is unconnected with the former narrative in this chapter.

10. went and...] This idiom, never used by St. Mark, is three times contained in this passage (vv. 12, 15).

them that had been with him, though found in the Acts (xx. 18), never occurs in the Gospels: nor does the word "disciples" in this passage.

11.] See John xx. 18: Luke xxiv. 11.

had been seen of (by) her is a construction only found here in N.T., and the word here used for "seen" (which occurs again ver. 14) is not used by Mark.

believed not (disbelieved) is only used in ver. 16 and Luke xxiv. 11, 41, throughout the Gospels.

12.] After that is not found in Mark, though many opportunities occurred for using it. This verse epitomizes the events on the journey to Emmaus, Luke xxiv. 13–35.

was manifested... as they walked, though in general accord with St. Luke's narrative, is not accurate in detail. It was not as they walked, but as they sat at meat that he was manifested to them.

in another form—a slight difference from Luke xxiv. 15, 16, which relates the reason why they did not know Him to be, that their eyes were holden, his being is his usual form being declared by Jesus himself: but see notes there.

13.] they also—as Mary Magdalene had done before.

the residue—supply, of those that had been with Him.

neither believed they them—not consistent with Luke xxiv. 33, 34. Here again the Harmonists have used every kind of distortion of the plain meaning of words to reconcile the two accounts; assuming that some believed and some doubted, that they first doubted and then believed; or, according to Bengel, first believed and then doubted.

14.] The following narrative, evidently intended by its author to represent what took place at one and the same time, joins together in one at least four appearances of the Lord: (1) that related in this verse and Luke xxiv. 36–49; (2) that on the mountain in Galilee (Matt. xxviii. 16–20), when the words in ver. 15 were spoken; (3) some unrecorded appearance when the rest of these words (vv. 16–18) were spoken,—unless we consider the whole to have been said on the mountain in Galilee; and (4) the appearance which terminated with the Ascension.

The latter part of this ver. 14 appears to be an epitome of what our Lord said to them on several occasions—see Luke xxiv. 25, 38; John xx. 27; Matt. xxviii. 17.

15. all the world] "all the nations," Matt. xxviii. 19: see note there.

preach the Gospel, without the addition of "of the kingdom" (Matthew) or "of God" (Mark i. 14 only, Luke), is in St. Mark's manner (see ch xiii, 10; xiv. 9). It only once occurs in Matthew, viz. xxvi. 13.

the whole creation] Not to men only, although men only can hear the preaching of the Gospel; all creation is redeemed by Christ—see Col. i. 15, 23; Rom. viii. 19–23. "Men, primarily, ver. 16: the rest of the creatures secondarily. As wide as the curse extends, reaches the blessing. The creation by the Son, is the foundation of redemption and of the kingdom." Bengel.

This word creation, or creature, appears never in the N.T. to be used of mankind alone. Bengel's "the rest of the creatures in the second place" may be illustrated in the blessings which Christianity confers on the inferior creatures and the face of the earth by bringing civilization in its wake. By these words the missionary office is bound upon the Church through all ages, till every part of the earth shall have been evangelized.

16.] These past participles must be noticed, as carrying on the thought to a time beyond the work of the preacher: when saved and damned shall take place; and reserving the division of mankind into these two classes, till that day.

On baptized, see note on Matt. xxviii. 19.

There is no “and is not baptized” in the second clause here. Unbelief—by which is meant the rejection of the Gospel in heart and life, not weakness or doubt as in ver. 14—shall condemn a man, whether baptized or unbaptized. And, conversely, it follows that our Lord does not set forth here the absolute, but only the general necessity of Baptism to salvation; as the Church of England also teaches. But that general necessity extends to all to whom Baptism is accessible; and it was well said “not the privation, but the contempt of Baptism, condemns.”

These words cannot be taken, as those in Matt. xxviii. 19, 20, as setting forth the order in which faith and baptism must always come; belief and disbelief are in this verse the great leading subjects, and believeth must on that account stand first. On he that believeth... shall be saved, compare Acts xvi. 31. This is a solemn declaration of the doctrine of ‘salvation by faith,’ from the Lord Himself; but such a faith as is expanded, Matt. xxviii. 20, into teaching them to observe all that I have commanded you; which is its proper fruits.

shall be damned, i.e. in the most solemn sense: for the sin of unbelief:—for those are now spoken of who hear the Gospel preached, and reject it.

17.] This promise is generally made, without limitation to the first ages of the Church. Should occasion arise for its fulfilment, there can be no doubt that it will be made good in our own or any other time. But we must remember that signs are not needed where Christianity is professed: nor by missionaries who are backed by the influence of powerful Christian nations. There are credible testimonies of miraculous powers having been exercised in the Church considerably after the Apostles’ time shall cast out devils] The Lord Himself has declared how weighty a sign this was, Matt. xii. 28. For fulfilments of the promise, see Acts v. 16; viii. 7; xvi. 18.

shall speak with new tongues] See 1 Cor. xiv. 22: Acts ii. 4 al. On the gift of tongues, see notes at those places.

18.] shall take up serpents—see Acts xxviii. 3–5.

if they drink&c] We have no instance of this given in the Acts: but later, there are several stories which, if to be relied on, furnish examples of its fulfilment. Eusebius says that “a wonderful thing was related of Justus, who was surnamed Barsabas,—that he drank deadly poison and felt no evil, through the grace of the Lord.”

on the sick] “to lay hands on” is in Mark’s manner; see ch. viii. 25; x. 16. There is no mention of the anointing with oil here, as in James v. 14.

19.] The connecting particle, rendered so then,—the Lord,—and t he Lord Jesus, which some MSS. read here, are alike foreign to the diction of Mark, speaking of the Lord: we have the Lord in the message (common to all three Gospels) ch. xi. 3—but that manifestly is no example.

after the Lord had spoken can only in fairness mean, ‘when He had spoken these words.’ All endeavours of the Harmonists to include in them “not only these words, but all that He spake” (Euthymius) will have no weight with an honest reader, who looks to the evident sense of his author alone, and disregards other considerations. That other words were spoken, we know; but that this author intended us to infer that, surely is not deducible from the text, and is too often allowed in such cases to creep fallaciously in as an inference. We never shall read or comment on Scripture with full profit, till all such subterfuges are abandoned, and the Gospel evidence treated in the clear light of intelligent and honest faith. We have an example of this last in Theophylact’s exposition, “when He had thus spoken.” was received up] I should hardly say that the author of this fragment necessarily implies an ascension’ from the place where they were then assembled. The whole of these two verses is of a compendious character, and as sat on the right hand of God must be understood as setting forth a fact not comprehended in the cycle of the writer’s observation, but certain in the belief of all Christians, so this may very well speak of the fact as happening, not necessarily then and there, but (see remarks above) after these words were spoken; provided always that these words are recognized as the last in the view and information of our Evangelist. I say this not with any harmonistic view, but because the words themselves seem to require it. (See on the Ascension, notes on Luke xxiv. 51 ff)

20.] went forth—not, from the chamber where they were assembled—which would not answer to preached every where, but would require some immediate action of that very to correspond to it (see Matt. xii. 14);—but used in the more solemn sense of Rom. x. 18 (cited from Ps. xviii. 4 LXX). “their sound is gone forth into all lands:” see reff.

every where] No inference can be drawn from this word as to the date of the fragment. In Acts ix. 82 Peter is said to have “passed throughout all (quarters)...”—the expression being only a general one, indicating their performance, in their time and d», of our Lord’s words, into all the world the Lord, i.e. Jesus: see Matt. xxviii. 20: Heb. ii. 3, 4, which last passage some have absurdly supposed, to have been seen and used by our Evangelist. The two words rendered following (here and in ver. 17) are compound verbs, and both foreign to the diction of St. Mark, often as he uses the simple verb.

A few concluding remarks may be added respecting vv. 9–20. (1) For the external evidence, see as above. As to its genuineness as a work of the Evangelist Mark, (2) internal evidence is, I think, very weighty against St. Mark’s being the author. No less than twenty-one words and expressions occur in it (and some of them several times), which are never elsewhere used by St. Mark,—whose adherence, to his own peculiar phrases is remarkable. (3) The inference therefore seems to me to be, that i t is an authentic fragment, placed as a completion of the Gospel in very early times: by whom written, must course remain wholly uncertain; but coming to us with very weighty sanction, and having strong claims on our reception and reverence.

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO LUKE

Luke: Chapter 1

CHAP I. 1-4.] PREFACE ADDRESSED TO THEOPHILUS. The style of this preface is purer Greek than the contents of the Gospel, and also more labored and formal. This may be accounted for, partly because it is the composition of the Evangelist himself, and not translated from Hebrew sources like much of the rest, and partly because prefaces, especially when also dedicatory, are usually in a rounded and artificial style.

1. many] Much depends on the meaning of this word, as guiding, or modifying, our opinion on the relation and sources of our Gospel histories. (1) That the writers of our present Gospels exclusively cannot be meant, is evident; since, even supposing St. Luke to have seen all three Gospels, one (that of St. John) was wholly, and another (that of St. Matthew) was in greater the production of an eye-witness and minister of the word, which would leave only one for the many. (2) Apocryphal Gospels exclusively cannot be meant: for they would not be 'narrations concerning matters fully believed among us,' nor 'delivered by eye-witnesses and ministers of the word,' a great part of their contents being excluded by this very author from his own narration. (3) A combination of these two may be intended—e. g. of the later sort, the Gospel according to the Hebrews,—of the former, that according to St. Mark, but then also how shall we make out the many? Our present apocryphal Gospels arose far later than any likely date which can be assigned to St. Luke's Gospel see Introduction to Luke. (4) I believe the only probable interpretation of the words to be, that many persons, in charge of Churches, or otherwise induced, drew up, here and there, statements (narratives) of the testimony of eye-witnesses and ministers of the word (see below), so far as they themselves had been able to collect them. (I do not believe that either the Gospel of St. Matthew or that of St. Mark is to be reckoned among these; or if they are, that St. Luke had seen or used them.) That such narratives should not have come down to us, is no matter of surprise: for (1) they would be absorbed by the more complete and sanctioned accounts of our present Evangelists; and (2) Church tradition has preserved very few fragments of authentic information of the apostolic age. It is probable that in almost every Church where an eye-witness preached, his testimony would be taken down, and framed into some narrative, more or less complete, of the life and sayings of the Lord. This does not necessarily imply the insufficiency of such narrations, as some have imagined. The fact of that failure is indeed implied in St. Luke's description of his own work—but that, more because it possessed completeness (whereas they were fragmentary) than from any difference in kind.

to set forth in order] more Properly, to draw up, to arrange.

a declaration] a setting forth: and so if in relation to things past, a narration—history.

surely believed] According to some, this word means fulfilled. But the A.V. has the more likely rendering. Meyer would render it, 'which have found their completion among us,' i.e. 'us of the apostolic times;' meaning 'Theophilus and himself,' &c.

among us, i.e. us Christians, you and me, and all members of the Church of Christ so also the unto us in ver. 2.

2.] The Apostles, delivered these matters orally to the Churches in their teaching (see below on ver. 4), and others drew up accounts from that catechetical instruction. It appears from this, that St. Luke was not aware of any narration drawn up by an eye-witness or minister of the word. Their account of these matters was a tradition, from which the narrations were drawn up. He cannot therefore have seen (or, having seen, not recognized as such, which is highly improbable) the Gospel of St. Matthew. Compare 1 John i. 1-3.

from the beginning] Not, 'from the very beginning,' i.e. the birth of the Lord, &c., but from the official beginning: see Acts i. 21 f. It differs from from the very first below.

eyewitnesses most probably stands alone: but it may well be taken with of the word (see below).

ministers, i.e. ministering servants—but in connection with from the beginning.

of the word—not, 'the personal word' (i. e. Christ: so Orig., Athanasius, Cyril, Euthym.) which would be altogether alien from St. Luke's usage (see on Heb. iv. 12): but, the word, 'the word preached:'—we have the expression "the ministry (but there diaconia) of the word" in Acts vi. 4.

3. it seemed good to me also] St. Luke by this classes himself with these many, and shews that he intended no disparagement nor blame to them, and was going to construct his own history from similar sources. The words which follow imply however a conscious superiority of his own qualification for the work. There is here no expressed claim to inspiration, but at the same time no disclaimer of it.

having traced down] by research, and so become accurately acquainted with.

from the very first—i. e. as in ver. 5;—as distinguished from those who only wrote of the official life of the Lord, or only fragments perhaps of that. in order] i.e. consecutively. By this word we must not understand St. Luke to lay claim to any especial chronological accuracy in writing;—which indeed is not found in his Gospel. He traced the events in order as they happened: but he may have arranged them as other considerations led him.

most excellent Theophilus] It is wholly unknown who this person was. The name was a very common one. The conjectures about him are endless, and entirely without value. It appears by the title given him, that he was a person of dignity, and of course, from ver. 4, he was a convert to Christianity.

The idea of the name being not a proper, but a feigned one, designating ‘those who loved God’ (found as early as Epiphanius, and adopted again recently), is far-fetched and improbable.

4. instructed] Theophilus had then been orally instructed in the narratives which form the subject of this Gospel: and St. Luke’s intention in writing it is, that he might have a more accurate knowledge of these histories. The word means literally, catechized, ‘catechetically taught.’

those sayings] not as in A.V., to be rendered ‘things:’ neither the Greek nor the corresponding Hebrew word ever has this meaning, as is commonly but erroneously supposed. In all the commonly-cited examples of this, ‘things expressed in words’ are meant: here the histories,—accounts.

5–25.] ANNOUNCEMENT BY GABRIEL OF THE BIRTH OF JOHN. Peculiar to Luke. The style in the original now totally alters and becomes Hebraistic, signifying that the following is translated or compiled an Aramaic oral narration, or perhaps (from the very distinct character of these two first chapters) document.

5. of the course of Abia (Abijah)] This was the eighth of the four-and-twenty courses of the priests (see ref. 1 Chron.). These courses kept their names and order, though not their descent, after the captivity. The courses were of a week’s duration each.

Elisabeth] This is the Septuagint rendering, Exod. vi. 23, of Elisheba, the wife of Aaron: signifying, God (is my) oath: i.e. a swearer by,—worshipper of, God. John was thus of priestly descent by both parents.

9.] This was the most honorable office which was allotted among the priests each day, and the same person could not serve it more than once.

the temple] the holy place: see Heb. ix. 1–6, and Exod. xxx. 7.

An account of John Hyrcanus the high priest having a vision at the time of offering incense is given in Josephus: see the extract in my Greek Testament. There also we are told that the people were outside (in the courts of the men and women):—their prayers were offered while the incense was burnt, as the smoke was symbolical of the ascent of prayer, Rev. viii. 3, 4.

It appears, from the allotment having been just mentioned, to have been the morning incense burning. Theophylact and others understand the whole as describing the entry into the Holy of holies on the great day of Atonement, Levit. xvi. But this is manifestly an error: for it would necessitate Zacharias having been high priest, which he never was; and in this case there would have been no casting of lots.

11.] the altar of incense, Exod. xxx. 1, must not be confounded with the large altar of burnt-offering: that stood outside the holy place, in the court of the priests. It was during the sacrifice on the great altar that the daily burning of the incense took place: one of the two priests, whose lot it was to offer incense, brought fire from off the altar of burnt-offering to the altar of incense, and then left the other priest there alone, who, on a signal from the priest presiding at the sacrifice, kindled the incense: see Exod. xl. 5, 26.

This is no vision, but an actual angelic appearance. The right is the favorable side: see Matt. xxv. 83. “We must understand the right as regarded the officiating priest, who stood with his face to the altar. It would thus be on the N. side of the holy place, where the table of shew bread stood, whereas on the S. side was the golden candlestick,” Bleek.

13.] He had then prayed for a son—but as appears below, long since—for he now had ceased to look for an answer to his prayer. Many Commentators have thought his prayer was for the salvation of Israel by the appearance of the Messiah: but the former view appears more probable.

John—i. e. God is favorable: we have it under the form of Johanan, 2 Kings xxv. 23; 1 Chron. iii. 24; 2 Chron. xxviii. 12.

14.] The words of the original here may be rendered two ways, either there shall be to thee, i.e. thou shalt have, as A.V.: or, he shall be to thee... joy and gladness.

15. in the sight of the Lord] signifying the spiritual nature of his office and influence.

The priests were similarly prohibited to drink strong drink; and the Nazarites even more rigidly.

strong drink] the word is sikera—‘any liquor not made from grapes.’

Wyclif renders, ‘he schal not drynke wyne ne sidir.’

he shall be filled with the Holy Ghost is a contrast to, and a reason for, the not drinking wine nor strong drink: compare Eph. v. 18.

Olshausen and Meyer think that (comparing ver. 44) the meaning is, the Holy Spirit should in some wonderful manner act on the child even before his birth. But this is not necessary,—nay, would it not rather be in this case “in his mother’s womb....?” The from seems to fix the prior limit of the in-dwelling of the Spirit, at his birth.

16.] The work of John was one of preparation and turning men’s hearts towards God. For full notes on his office, see on Matt. xi. It may suffice here to repeat, that it was a concentration of the spirit of the law, whose office it was to convince of sin: and that he eminently represented the law and the prophets in their work of preparing the way for Christ.

17.] before him—i. e. “the Lord their God,” manifest in the flesh. De Wette denies this interpretation, as contrary to all analogy: and yet himself explains the expression by saying that what the Messiah does, is in Scripture ascribed to God as its doer (similarly Meyer). But why? because Messiah is GOD WITH US. This expression is besides used (see Zech. xiv. 5) in places where the undoubted and sole reference is to the Messiah.

in the spirit and power] As a type of partial fulfillment, of the personal coming of Elias in the latter days (see note on Matt. xi. 13, 14). Bleek remarks that it was not in the wonder working agency of Elias that John was like him, for ‘John did no miracle,’ but in the power of his uttered persuasion.

to turn....] The first member only of the sentence corresponds with Malachi. The angel gives the exposition of the second member,—which stands in the LXX, “and the heart of a man towards his neighbor” (in A.V. “and the heart of the children to their fathers”):—for of course that must be understood in the better sense, of the prevailing, and the bad becoming like them.

18.] The birth of John, involving human generation, but prophetically announced, and supernatural, answers to the birth of Isaac in the O.T. But Abraham’s faith was a strong contrast to the unbelief of Zacharias: see Rom. iv. 19.

an old man] The Levites (see Num. iv. 3; viii. 24, 25) became superannuated at the age of fifty: but it appears, by extracts from the Rabbinical writings given by Lightfoot, that this was not the case with the priests.

19. Gabriel] meaning, Man of God: see Dan. viii. 16; ix. 21, also Tobit xii. 15.

The names of the angels, say the Rabbis, came up with Israel from Babylon. We first read of both Michael and Gabriel in the book of Daniel. But we are not therefore to suppose that they were borrowed from any heathen system, as Strauss and the rationalists have done; the fact being, that the persons and order of the angels were known long before, and their names formed matter of subsequent revelation to Daniel. See Josh. v. 13–16.

that stand in the presence of God] one of the chief angels near the throne of God. They are seven in Tobit, as above.

20.] We must not consider this dumbness solely as a punishment; it was also a sign, as Zacharias had required. It is impossible for us to say what the degree of unbelief in Zacharias was, and therefore we can be no judges as to his being deserving of the punishment (against Strauss and the rationalists).

and not able to speak] This is not a repetition, but an explanation of the ground and reason of his silence.

until day that these shall be performed] ‘What day? that of the birth and the giving of the name,’ Euthymius.

21.] It was customary for the priest at the time of prayer not to remain long in the holy place, for fear the people who were without might imagine that any vengeance had been inflicted on him for some informality;—as he was considered the representative of the people.

22.] They knew, by some excitement, visible in his manner. It was not his office to pronounce the benediction, but that of the other incensing priest; so that his ‘not being able to speak,’ must mean, in answer to the enquiries which his unusual appearance prompted. This answer he gave by a sign: and the question was also by signs; for (see ver. 62) he was deaf, as well as dumb, which indeed is the strict meaning of the word used in the original.

23. as soon as....] The week during which his course was on duty. Mr. Greswell, by much elaborate calculation, has made it probable, but only as one out of several alternatives, that this week was Tisri 18–25, i.e. September 20—October 6, of the sixth year before the Christian era.

A deaf and dumb person, we thus see, was not precluded from some of the priest ministrations.

24, 25.] hid herself—either, to avoid defilement: see Judges xiii. 13, 14,—to hide her pregnancy from her neighbors till it was certain and apparent,—or, from the precaution which the first months of pregnancy require.

Kuinoel suggests, that the reason may have been, that she might devote herself more uninterruptedly to exercises of devotion and thankfulness, and that this is expressed by the words following.

my reproach] of barrenness: see reff.

26–38.] ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SAME

ANGEL OF THE BIRTH OF CHRIST.

26.] in the sixth month—referring to the “five months” in ver. 24.

Nazareth] In this particular the information of our Evangelist appears to be fuller than that of St. Matthew, who seems not to be aware of any residence at Nazareth previous to the birth of our Lord: but see note on Matt. ii. 22.

27.] of the house of David refers to Joseph in this place, who (see Matt. i.) was of the direct lineage of David. That Mary was so, is nowhere expressed in the Gospels, but seems to be implied in ver. 32, and has been the general belief of Christians. The Son of David was to be the fruit of his body (Ps. cxxxii. 11); which He would not be, unless His virgin mother was of the house of David. notes on the genealogy in ch. iii. Still, we must remember the absolute oneness in the marriage relation, which might occasion that Mary herself should be reckoned as being in very deed that which her husband was. Perhaps this has been hardly enough taken into account.

28.] highly favored, not “full of grace,” as the Vulgate:—the above is the meaning of the original word in the only other place where it occurs in the N.T., viz. Eph. Eph. i. 6 (“made us accepted” A.V.). It corresponds to “thou hast found favor with God,” ver. 30.

32. his father David] This announcement makes it almost certain (still see note above) that Mary also was house of David. No astonishment is expressed by her at this part of the statement and yet, from the nature of her question, it is clear that she did not explain it supposing Joseph to be the destined of her child. See 2 Sam. vii. 13: Ps. lxxxix, 3, 4: Isa. ix. 7: Jer. xxxiii. 15.

34, 35.] This question differs from that raised by Zacharias above. It is merely an enquiry after the manner in which so wonderful a thing should take place; not, how shall I know this?—it takes for granted that it shall be, and only asks, How?

The Holy Ghost—the creative Spirit of God, of whom it is said, Gen. i. 2, that He “moved upon the face of the waters.” But as the world was not created by the Holy Ghost, but by the Son, so also the Lord was not begotten by the Holy Ghost, but by the Father; and that, before the worlds. “No more is here to be attributed to the Spirit, than what is necessary to cause the Virgin to perform the actions of a mother..... As Christ was made of the substance of the Virgin, so He was not made of the substance of the Holy Ghost, Whose essence cannot at all be made. And because the Holy Ghost did not beget Him by any communication of His essence, therefore He is not the Father of Him, though He were conceived by Him.” (Pearson on the Creed, p. 165, 166.)

holy thing] Some render that which shall be born (of thee) shall be called holy, the Son of God. But it is more simple to take it as A.V., that holy thing,&c. 36. thy kinswoman] What What relation, nowhere appears in Scripture; and traditions are not worth recounting. But we must take the word in the narrower sense, not in the wider reference of Rom. ix. 3. Elisabeth was of the tribe of Levi: but this need not hinder connexion by marriage with other tribes. Aaron himself married into Judah, Exod. vi. 23. We find in Judges xvii. 7 a young man of the family of Judah who was a Levite. Philo says, "Moses ordered the high priest to marry not only a virgin, but one of priestly descent... but the other priests were permitted to marry other than the daughters of priests." 38.] Her own faithful and humble assent is here given to the divine announcement which been made to her. I believe that her conception of the Lord is to be dated from the utterance of these words. So Euthymius, and similarly Irenæus, Tertullian, Athanasius, Maldonatus, Grotius. Lightfoot, holding a different opinion, says, "I own, that it is the general opinion, that the Virgin conceived at Nazareth, in the instant when the Angel spoke with her." She was no unconscious vessel of the divine will, but (see ver. 45), in humility and faith, a fellow-worker with the purpose of the Father; and therefore her own unity with that purpose was required, and 1s here recorded.

39–56.] VISITATION OF ELISABETH BY MARY

39.] The situation of Elisabeth was not before this known to Mary; and on the intelligence of it from the angel, she arose and went to congratulate her kinswoman.

But before this the events related in Matt. i. 18–25 had happened.

Mary being betrothed to Joseph, had no communications with him, except through the bridesmaids; who, on the first indications of her pregnancy, represented it to him. This would not take longer time than the expression might include—possibly three or four weeks. Then happened Matt. i. 19, 20; and immediately Joseph took her home. As a betrothed virgin she could not travel: but now immediately, and perhaps for the very reason of the circumstances under which Joseph had taken her home, she visits Elisabeth—remaining with her about three months, ver. 56. So that we have, five months, during which Elisabeth hid herself, together with the sixth month, during which takes place the Annunciation, the discovery of Mary's pregnancy, her taking home by Joseph, together with three months visit of Mary, making up together nine months, nearly her full time: see ver. 57.

The words rendered a city of Juda may possibly mean "the city of Juttah," which (Josh. xxi. 16) was given, together with Hebron (in the hill country of Judæa: ib. ver. 11), and other neighbouring cities, to the children of Aaron the priest.

But it may also mean 'a city of Juda;' and this is perhaps more likely, as no place of residence is mentioned for Zacharias in ver. 23,—and one would hardly be introduced so abruptly here.

It is not Jerusalem; for that would hardly have been described as in the hill country; and from vv. 23, 65, the Evangelist clearly indicates some other place than Jerusalem as the residence of the parents of John.

41.] The salutation uttered by Elisabeth is certainly implied to have been an inspiration of the Holy Spirit. No intimation had been made to her of the situation of Mary. The movement of the babe in her womb (possibly for the first time) was part of the effect of the same spiritual influence. The known mysterious effects of sympathy in such cases, at least lead us to believe that there may be corresponding effects where the causes are of a kind beyond our common experience.

'The salutation of Mary' might be taken to mean the Annunciation: better therefore as in margin, Mary's salutation.

42.] The word rendered Blessed has a double meaning: that of blessed,—from above—blessed among women, i.e. beyond other women; and praised,—from below—i. e. called blessed by women. The former is the best rendering: and then among women will be the Hebrew superlative, as in Jer. xl ix. 15, and Song of Sol. i. 8.

43.] The word Lord, as applied to the unborn babe, can no otherwise be explained than as uttered in the spirit of prophecy, and expressing the divine nature of our Lord: see especially Ps. cx. 1, from which Bleek thinks the expression is adopted.

45.] The words may be rendered either as in A.V. (so also the Vulgate Erasmus, Beza, Meyer), blessed is she that believed, for&c.—or as in margin of A.V., blessed is she that believed that there shall be. The last is maintained by Bengel and De Wette, and supported by Acts xxvii. 25. I much prefer the former rendering, as agreeable likewise to the analogy of Scripture, where faith, in the recipient of the divine purposes, is so often represented as a co-ordinate cause of the fulfillment of those purposes. Lightfoot well suggests, that there may have been present to the mind of Elisabeth the unbelief of her husband, as contrasted with Mary's faith.

46–55.] Compare throughout the song of Hannah, 1 Sam. ii. 1–10.

As connected with the defense of the hymns contained in these two chapters, we may observe, taking the very lowest ground, that there is nothing improbable, as matter of fact, in holy persons, full of the thoughts which run through the O.T. prophecies, breaking out into such songs of praise as these, which are grounded on and almost expressed in the words of Scripture. The Christian believer however will take a higher view than this, and attribute to the mother of our Lord that same inspiration of the Holy Spirit which filled Elisabeth (ver. 41) and Zacharias (ver. 67).

46.] My soul... My spirit the whole inner being: see on 1 Thess. v. 23.

my Savior] not merely ‘Deliverer from degradation, as a daughter of David’—but, in a higher sense, author of that salvation which God’s people expected: among whom the Holy Virgin reckons herself. Only sinners need a Savior.

48.] regarded i.e. looked upon. Bleek remarks, that “look upon my son” in Luke ix. 38, is “have mercy on my son” in Matt. xvii. 15.

low estate, or condition, not humility; the noun is an objective one.

Ver. 55 is not rendered in the A.V. according to the construction; from Ps. xcvi. 3 it will be seen that in remembrance of his mercy to Abraham are to be joined together, and therefore as he spake to our fathers will be parenthetical. See Micah vii. 20.

57–79.] Birth and naming of John the Baptist.

59.] they were calling—wished to call: the imperfect tense is here in its strict meaning, as in Matt. viii. 24. The names of children were given at circumcision, because, at the institution of that rite, the names of Abram and Sarai were changed to Abraham and Sarah,—Gen. xvii. 5, 15.

60.] There is no reason for supposing, with some Commentators, that Elisabeth had had the name supernaturally intimated to her. She must necessarily have learnt it,—in the course of communication by writing, from her husband.

62.] The natural inference (see on ver. 22) from this verse is, that Zacharias was deaf as tell as dumb; nor do I think that the objectors have succeeded in invalidating this inference. There could have been no reason for beckoning, had Zacharias been able to hear articulate words.

63. a writing table] A tablet smeared with wax, on which they wrote with a style, or sharp iron point.

they marveled all] This also confirms the view that Zacharias was deaf. There would be nothing wonderful in his acceding to his wife’s suggestion, if he had known it: the coincidence, apparently without this knowledge, was the matter of wonder.

64.] For now first had the angel’s words, “thou shalt call his name John,” ver. 13, received their fulfillment.

66. For also...] A remark inserted by the Evangelist himself, not a further saying of the speakers in the verse before, as Kuinoel and others maintain. The for refers back to the question just asked, ‘And they might well enquire thus, for’ &c.

68–79.] This Hymn of thanksgiving appears to have been uttered at the time of the circumcision of the child (in which case the matters related in vv. 65, 66 are parenthetical and anticipatory)—and, as the Magnificat, under the immediate influence of inspiration of the Holy Ghost. It is entirely Hebrew in its cast and idioms, and might be rendered in that language almost word for word. It serves, besides its own immediate interest to every Christian, to show to us the exact religious view under which John was educated by his father.

69.] an horn—a metaphor from horned beasts, who are weak and defenseless without, but formidable with their horns. There does not seem to be any allusion to the horns of the altar—the mere notion of a refuge is never connected with the Messiah’s Kingdom.

74, 75.] The attempts to remove the Jewish worship by Antiochus Epiphanes and by the Romans, had been most calamitous to the people.

This in holiness and righteousness sufficiently refutes the idea of some, that the whole subject of this song is the temporal theocratic greatness of the Messiah.

76.] It is not necessary to interpret the Lord of the Messiah: it may be said of God, whose people (ver. 77) Israel was. But the believing Christian will find it far more natural thus to apply it, especially in connection with Matt. i. 21.

77.] in remission, the element in which the former blessing was to be conferred. The remission of sin is the first opening for the knowledge of salvation: sec ch. iii. 7.

78. dayspring] The springing up, or, the East, is in Jer. xxiii. 5, Zech. iii. 9, vi. 12, the LXX rendering for the Hebrew word for a branch or sprout—and thus, ‘that which springs up or rises,’ as Light:—which, from the clauses following, seems to be the meaning here.

from on high may be taken with dayspring, as in A.V.:—or perhaps with the verb to give light. But however taken, the expression is not quite easy to understand. The word had come apparently to be a name for the Messiah: thus in Zech. iii. 9 (LXX, see above), behold a man, his name is “the springing up,” or “the East” (the A.V. has the branch): and then figures arising from the meaning of the word itself, became mixed with that which was said of Him. The dayspring does not come from on high, but from beneath the horizon; but the Messiah does. Again, to give light, &c. of the next verse belongs to the dayspring, and only figuratively to the Messiah.

79.] Care must be taken on the one hand not to degrade the expressions of this song of praise into mere anticipations of temporal prosperity, nor, on the other, to find in it (except in so far as they are involved in the inner and deeper sense of the words, unknown save to the Spirit who prompted them) the minute doctrinal distinctions of the writings of St. Paul. It is the expression of the aspirations and hopes of a pious Jew, waiting for the salvation of the Lord, finding that salvation brought near, and uttering his thankfulness in Old Testament language, with which he was familiar, and at the same time under prophetic influence of the Holy Spirit.

That such a song should be inconsistent with dogmatic truth, is impossible: that it should unfold it minutely, is in the highest degree improbable.

80.] A very similar conclusion to those in ch. ii. 40, 52, and denoting probably the termination of that record or document of the birth of the Baptist, which the Evangelist has hitherto been translating, or perhaps transcribing already translated.

That this first chapter is such a separate document, appears from its very distinct style. Whether it had been preserved in the holy family, or how otherwise obtained by St. Luke, no trace now appears. It has a certain relation to, and at the same time is distinguished from, the narration of the next chapter. The Old Testament spirit is stronger here, and the very phraseology more in unison with Hebrew usage.

in the deserts] The hill country of Judaea was very near this wilderness, and from the character of John’s official life afterwards, it is probable that in youth he would be given to solitude and abstemiousness. It cannot be supposed that the Essenes, dwelling in those parts, had any, or only the most general kind of influence over him, as their views were wholly different from his.

his shewing] i.e. the opening of his official life: the same word is used of the appointment of the seventy in ch. x. 1.

Luke: Chapter 2

CHAP. II. 1-20.] BIRTH OF CHRIST. ITS ANNOUNCEMENT AND CELEBRATION BY THE HOSTS OF HEAVEN.

1, 2.] We go back again now to the birth of John, or shortly after it.

In annotating on these verses, I will first state the difficulty in which they appear to be involved,—then the remarkable way in which a solution has recently been found.

The assertion in these verses is this—that a decree went forth, &c., and that this enrolment first took place when Cyrenius (Quirinus) was governor of Syria. It would then appear, either that this very enrolment took place under Quirinus, —or that the first did so, and this was subsequent to it. Now both of these senses till recently seemed to be inadmissible. For Quirinus was not known to have been governor of Syria till the year of Rome 758, after the banishment of Archelaus, and the addition of his territory to the province of Syria. And the birth of our Lord occurred at least eight years before this, previous to Herod's death, and when Sentius Saturninus was governor of Syria. But it has been made highly probable, by A.W. Zumpt of Berlin, that Quirinus was TWICE governor of Syria. The substance of his researches is given at length in the note in my Greek Testament. The result of it is, that Zumpt fixes the time of his first governorship at from B.C. 4 to B.C. 1. It is true this does not quite remove our difficulty. But it brings it within such narrow limits, that any slight error in calculation, or even the latitude allowed by the words was first made might well cover it. I may mention it as remarkable, that Justin Martyr (Century 2) three times distinctly asserts that our Lord was born under Quirinus, and appeals to the register then made, as if from it the fact might, if necessary, be confirmed.

We conclude then, that an assessment or enrolment of names with a view to ascertain the population of the empire, was commanded and put in force at this time. It was unaccompanied (probably) by any payment of money. We know that Augustus drew up an account or summary of the whole empire, which took many years to arrange and complete, and of which the enrolment of the inhabitants of the provinces would naturally form a part. Of the data for this compilation, the enrolment in our text might be one.

That Judea was not a Roman province at this time, is no objection to our text; for the compilation of Augustus contained the "kingdoms" of the Roman empire, as well as the provinces.

3-5.] There is a mixture here of Roman and Jewish customs, which is not at all improbable, considering the circumstances. In the Roman census, men, women, and children were all obliged to go and be enrolled. But then this census was made at their dwelling-place, not at that of their extraction. The latter practice springs from the Jewish genealogical habits, and its adoption in this case speaks strongly for the accuracy of the chronology. If this enrolment, was by order of Augustus, and for the whole empire, it of course would be made so as to include all, after the Roman manner: but inasmuch as it was made under the Jewish king Herod, it was done after the Jewish manner, in taking this account of each at his own place of extraction.

Mary being apparently herself sprung from the lineage of David (see ch. i. 32), might on this account go to Bethlehem, being, as some suppose, an heiress; but this does not seem to be the Evangelist's meaning, but that, after the Roman manner, she accompanied her husband.

No stress must be laid on espoused, as if she were only the betrothed wife of Joseph at this time;—she had been taken to his house before this: the history in our text happening during the time indicated by Matt. i. 25.

7.] Now that "first-born" has disappeared: from the text of St. Matthew (i. 25), it must be here remarked, that although the term may undoubtedly be used of an only child, such use is necessarily always connected with the expectation of others to follow, and can no longer have place when the whole course of events is before the writer and no others have followed. The combination of this consideration with the fact, that brethren of our Lord are brought forward in this Gospel in close connexion with His mother, makes it as certain as an implied fact can be, that those brethren were the children of Mary herself.

Ancient tradition states the birthplace of our Lord to have been a cave: and this tradition is nowise inconsistent with our text—for caves are used in most rocky countries as stables.

the inn] i.e. a public place of reception for travelers; not 'a room in a private house.' Of what sort this inn was, does not appear. It probably differs from that mentioned in ch. x. 34, in not being kept by an host: see note there.

8.] Mr. Greswell has made it highly probable that our Lord was born on the evening of (i. e. which began) the 5th of April, the 10th of the Jewish Nisan: on which same day of April, and the 14th of Nisan, He suffered thirty-three years after. Before this time there would be abundance of grass in the pastures—the spring rains being over: but much after it, and till after the autumnal equinox again, the pastures would be comparatively bare: see note on John vi. 10.

9.] the glory of the Lord—the brightness of God's presence—the Shechinah (see reff.) which also accompanied His angels when they appeared to men. It is agreeable at least to the analogy of the divine dealings, to suppose that these shepherds, like Symeon, were waiting for the consolation of Israel.

10, 11] to all THE people,—i. e. the Jewish people. To them was the first message of joy, before the bursting in of the Gentiles—just as here the one angel gives the prefatory announcement, before the multitude of the heavenly host burst in with their proclamation of 'peace on earth.'

Christ the Lord] This is the only place where these words come together. In ch. xxiii. 2 we have "Christ a King," and in Acts ii. 36 "Lord and King." (In Col. iii. 24 we have, in a somewhat different meaning [said to servants], "ye serve the Lord Christ.") And I see no way of understanding this Lord, but as corresponding to the Hebrew JEHOVAH.

12.] Olshausen hazards a conjecture, that the stable or cave may possibly have belonged to these shepherds. But I think the words even unto, or as far as to Bethlehem, ver. 15, do not look as if Bethlehem were their home. It seems clear that the spot was somehow known to them by the angel's description.

Not "the babe," as A.V.;—the angel, in giving the sign, generalizes the term: they were to know the truth of his words, by finding a child wrapped in swaddling clothes, lying in a manger.

14.] It has been disputed whether Glory to means There is, or Let there be, glory to God. But there can be no doubt that the sense of both these is included. among men of good pleasure] This reading is found in the greater part of the ancient authorities and Fathers, including the Alexandrine, Vatican, and Sinaitic MSS. It does not mean, as the Roman Catholic interpreters generally explain it, "men of good will,"—"those that like it," which would be untenable in Greek as well as in theology. The only admissible rendering is, 'Among men of God's good pleasure,' i.e. among the elect people of God.

words, viz. those spoken by the shepherds.

21.] HIS CIRCUMCISION. The Lord was made like unto His brethren (Heb. ii. 17; iv. 15) in all weakness and bodily infirmity, from which legal uncleannesses arose. The body which He took on Him, though not a body of sin, was mortal, subject to the consequence of sin,—in the likeness of sinful flesh: but incorruptible by the indwelling of The Godhead (1 Pet. iii. 18). In the fulfillment therefore of His great work of redemption, He became subject to legal rites and purifications—not that they were absolutely necessary for Him, but were included in those things which were becoming for Him, in his humiliation and ‘making perfect:’ and in His lifting up of that human nature, for which all these things were absolutely necessary (Gen. xvii. 14), into the Godhead.

22–38.] THE PURIFICATION IN THE TEMPLE. SYMEON AND ANNA RECOGNIZE AND PROPHESY OF HIM.

22.] See Lev. xii. 1–8, where however the child is not, as here, expressly included in the purification. The reading his is remarkable, and hardly likely to have been a correction: “her,” adopted by the A.V., is almost without authority, and is a manifest correction.

Bengel denies that either the Lord or His mother wanted purification; and mentions that some render their ‘of the Jews,’ but does not approve of it (John ii. 6 is certainly no case in point). See the last note, on the necessity of purification for both.

23.] God had taken the tribe of Levi instead of the firstborn that openeth the womb, Num. iii. 12, and required only the excess in number of the firstborn over the Levites to be redeemed (ib. vv. 44–51). This arrangement appears afterwards to have been superseded by a general command to redeem all the firstborn at five shekels of the sanctuary (Num. xviii. 15, 16).

24.] The offering (ref. Lev.) was, a lamb for a burnt-offering, and a pigeon for a sin-offering: but if the parties were too poor to bring a lamb, then two pigeons. But we are not hereby justified in assuming extreme poverty to have been the condition of our Lord’s family. This nowhere appears Gospel history.

25.] It appears that this Symeon might have been Symeon the son of Hillel,—and father of Gamaliel, mentioned in Acts v. 34 ff. But we have no means of ascertaining this.

the consolation of Israel] See Acts xxviii. 20. Vol. I. It was a common form of adjuration among the Jews, “So may I see consolation, if&c.” referring to Isa. xl. 1. On the general expectation of deliverance at this time see on Matt. ii. 1 ff.

26.] Of the nature of this intimation, nothing is said. Symeon was the subject of an especial indwelling and leading of the Holy Ghost, analogous to that higher form of the spiritual life expressed in the earliest days by walking with God—and according to which God’s saints have often been directed and informed in an extraordinary manner by His Holy Spirit. In the power of this intimation, and in the spirit of prophecy consequent on it, he came into the Temple on this occasion.

29.] lettest thou depart, not from life, or out of the earth,—but as being thy servant, he thinks of his death as the termination of, and so dismissal from, his servitude.

32.] See Isa. xlix. 6. The general term of the last verse,—all the peoples (so literally), is here divided into two, the Gentiles, and Israel.

33. his father] his father) In ver. 48 we have Joseph again called by this name. Our Lord Himself would not speak of him thus, see ver. 49; but in the simplicity of the narrative we may read his parents, and such expressions, without any danger of forgetting the momentous history of the Conception and Nativity.

rising again,—or, rising up—in the sense of ch. i. 52—by faith and holiness; or, the fall and rising up may refer to the same persons; as it is said by our Lord, ‘He that humbleth himself shall be exalted.’ I prefer this last, interpretation, as cohering best with the next verse: see note on it.

35.] This prophecy I do not believe to have its chief reference to the deep sorrows of the mother of our Lord on beholding His sufferings, much less to her future death by martyrdom; least of all to the Crucifixion, which by shedding the blood of her Son, would also pierce her heart and drain it of its life-blood and make it childless. None of these interpretations satisfy us: for the words stand in a totally different connexion and one far worthier of the honor of that holy woman, and of the spiritual character of Symeon’s prophecy: that prophecy is, of the struggle of many in Israel through repentance to faith in this Saviour; among which number even His mother herself was to be included. The sharp pangs of sorrow for sin must pierce her heart also (cf. esp. Acts ii. 37); and the general end follows; that reasonings out of many hearts may be revealed; that they who receive the Lord Jesus may be manifest, and they who reject Him: see John ix. 39. We may find moreover, in the traces of her connexion with our Lord in the Evangelic history, the piercing and dividing of her soul, and in the last notice of her in Acts i., the triumph of her faith after the Ascension.

37. fastings and prayers] Not merely in the ordinary hours of prayer, at nine, and three, or the ordinary fasts on Monday and Thursday, but in an ascetic-devotional method of life.

night is said to be put first, because fasts were reckoned from one evening to another. Is it not rather because the greater solemnity and emphasis rests on the religious exercise by night?

38.] It was possibly at the hour of prayer; as she spoke of Him to numbers, who would at such a time be flocking to the temple.

39, 40.] RETURN TO NAZARETH.

39.] Certainly the obvious inference from this verse is, that Joseph and Mary returned from Jerusalem to Nazareth direct. But it is only an inference, and not the assertion of the text. This part of the Gospel History is one where the Harmonists, by their arbitrary reconcilements of the two Evangelistic accounts, have given great advantage to the enemies the faith. As the two accounts now stand, it is wholly impossible to suggest any satisfactory method of uniting them; every one who has attempted it has, in some part or other of his hypothesis, violated probability and common sense. But, on the other hand, it is equally impossible definitely to say, that they could not be reconciled by a thorough knowledge of the facts themselves; and such an assertion, whenever made, shews great ignorance of the origin and course of oral narration. How many things will a relator say, being unaware of certain important circumstances outside his narrative, which seem to preclude those circumstances? How often will points of time be apparently brought close together in such a narration,—between which, events most weighty to the history have occurred? The only inference these two accounts, which is inevitable, is, that they are wholly independent of one another. If St. Luke had seen the Gospel of St. Matthew, or vice versa, then the variations are utterly inexplicable; and the greatest absurdities of all are involved in the writings of those who assume this, and then proceed to harmonize. Of the dwelling at Nazareth before the Nativity, of the circumstances which brought Joseph and Mary to Bethlehem, of the Presentation in the temple, St. Matthew’s account knows nothing; of the visit of the Magi, the murder of the Innocents, the flight to Egypt, St. Luke’s is unaware. In all the main circumstances of the Conception and Nativity they agree, or are easily and naturally reconciled (see further in note on John vii. 42).

40.] grew—in body.—w axed strong, in spirit: the addition of these words to the text was a correct gloss. “The body advances in stature, and the soul in wisdom... the divine nature revealed its own wisdom in proportion to the measure of the bodily growth,” Cyril.

becoming filled: see ver. 52 and note there.

41–52.] VISIT TO THE TEMPLE AT THE PASSOVER The history of this incident serves for an example of the wisdom wherewith the Child was becoming filled. “The Evangelist next shows that what he has said is true,” Cyril.

41.] See Exod. xxiii. 14–17. Women, according to the maxims of the school of Hillel, were bound to go up once in the year—to the Passover.

42.] At the age of twelve, a boy was called by the Jews ‘son of the law,’ and first incurred legal obligation. At that time, then, commences the second step (see note on ver. 52) of the life of the Lord, the time when the things becoming for Him began; his course of blameless legal obedience (see note on ver. 21) in his own person and by his own will. Now first (ver. 49) appear those higher consciousnesses to have found expression, which unfolded within Him, till the fall time of his public ministry arrived. It cannot be inferred from this narrative, that it was the first time the holy Child had accompanied them to the Passover.

43.] the days, seven days, Exod. xii. 15, 17.

44.] the company forming the caravan, or band of travelers;—all who came from the same district traveling together for security and company.

The interpretation that ‘they went a day’s journey, seeking him,’ is simply absurd: for they would have turned back sooner: a few minutes might have sufficed for the search. It was not till they laid up for the night that they missed him, as at that time they would naturally expect his return to their own tent. Olshausen remarks, that being accustomed to His thoughtfulness and obedience, they were free from anxiety, till they discovered He really was not in the company.

45. seeking him everywhere] as they went back, all the way.

46.] Some interpret the three days, of their one day’s journey out, one back, and one in Jerusalem: but they were more likely three days spent in search in Jerusalem; or, at all events, reckoned from their discovery of His not being with them.

in the temple] In one of the rooms attached to the temple, where the Rabbis taught their schools.

No stress must be laid on in the midst; it is only among. Nor must it be supposed from asking them questions that our Lord was acting the part of a master. It was the custom in the Jewish schools for the scholars to ask questions of their teachers; and a great part of the Rabbinical books consists of the answers of the Rabbis to such questions.

48–50.] The salient point of this narrative appears to lie in thy father contrasted with my Father. This was the first time that those wonderful words of self-consciousness had been heard from the holy Child—when He began to be “a son of the law,” He first calls HIM His Father, Who gave Him the work to do on earth, of perfectly keeping that Law.

Every word of these verses is of the first importance to modern combatants for sound doctrine. Let the adversaries answer us,—why should his mother here have spoken, and not Joseph, unless there were some more than usual reason for her being put forward rather than his reputed father? Again, let the mythical school of Strauss give us a reason, why an incident altogether (in their view) so derogatory to the character of the subject of it, should have been inserted, if the myths arose out of an exaggerated estimate of the dignity of that character?

thy father] Then up to this time Joseph had been so called by the holy Child Himself: but from this time, never. Such words are not chance; had Mary said “we,” the strong contrast with what follows could not have been brought out.

How is it that ye sought me?] i.e.... what (reason) is there, that... This is no reproachful question. It is asked in all the simplicity and boldness of holy childhood... ‘did ye not know?’... it appeared as if that conviction, the expression of which now first breaks forth from HIM, must have been a matter known to them before.

I must] This is that must, so often used by our Lord of His appointed and undertaken course. Analogous to this first utterance of His conviction, is the dawn, amongst ourselves, of the principle of duty in the youthful and well-trained spirit about this same age,—this ‘earning time’ of human progress: see below on ver. 52.

among my Father’s matters] primarily, in the house of my Father; but we must not exclude the wider sense, which embraces all places and employments of my Father’s. The employment in which he was found, learning the word of God, would natural, be one of these.

they understood not] Both Joseph and His mother knew in some sense, Who He was: but were not prepared to hear so direct an appeal to God as His Father: understood not the deeper sense of these wonderful words. Still (ver. 51) they appear to have awakened in the mind of His mother a remembrance of “He shall be called the Son of God,” ch. i. 35. And probably, as Stier remarks, the unfolding of His childhood had been so gradual and natural, that even they had not been forcibly reminded by any strong individual notes, of that which He was, and which now shewed itself.

It is a remarkable instance of the blindness of the rationalistic Commentators to the richness and depth of Scripture narrative, that they hold this understood not to be altogether inconceivable, as coming after the angelic announcement to Mary. Can they suppose that she understood that announcement itself? The right interpretation is, they understood not the deeper sense: see ch. xviii. 34.

51.] The high consciousness which had manifested itself in ver. 49 did not interfere with His self-humiliation, nor render Him independent of His parents. This voluntary subjection probably showed itself in working at his reputed father's trade: see Mark vi. 2 and note.

From this time we have no more mention of Joseph: the next we hear is of His mother and brethren (John ii. 12): whence it is inferred that, between this time and the commencement of our Lord's public life, Joseph died.

and his mother kept...] These words tend to confirm the common belief that these opening chapters, or at least this narrative, may have been derived from the testimony of the mother of the Lord herself. She kept them, as in wonderful coincidence with the remarkable circumstances of His birth, and its announcement, and His presentation in the temple, and the offerings of the Magi; but in what way, or by what one great revelation, all these things were to be gathered in one, did not yet appear, but was doubtless manifested to her afterwards: see Acts i. 14; ii. 1.

52.] The Greek word rendered stature means not only that (as in ch. xix. 3), but age (see Matt. vi. 27, where the word is the same, and note), which comprehends the other.

During these eighteen mysterious years we may, by the light of what is here revealed, view the holy Child advancing onward to that fulness of wisdom and divine approval which was indicated at His Baptism, by "in thee I am well pleased." We are apt to forget, that it was during this time that much of the great work of the second Adam was done. The growing up through infancy, childhood, youth, manhood, from grace to grace, holiness to holiness, in subjection, self-denial, and love, without one polluting touch of sin,—this it was which, consummated by the three years of active ministry, by the Passion, and by the Cross, constituted "the obedience of one man," by which many were made righteous. We must fully appreciate the words of this verse, in order to think rightly of Christ. He had emptied Himself of His glory: His infancy and childhood were no mere pretense, but the Divine Personality was in Him carried through these states of weakness and inexperience, and gathered round itself the ordinary accessions and experiences of the sons of men. All the time, the consciousness of his mission on earth was ripening; 'the things heard of the Father' (John xv. 15) were continually imparted to Him; the Spirit, which was not given by measure to Him, was abiding more and more upon Him; till the day when He was fully ripe for his official manifestation,—that He might be offered to his own, to receive or reject Him,—and then the Spirit led Him up to commence his conflict with the enemy. As yet, He was in favor with man also: the world had not yet begun to hate Him; but we cannot tell how soon this feeling towards Him was changed, for He alleges John vii. 7), "Me the world hateth, because I testify of it that its deeds are evil;" and we can hardly conceive such testimony, in the years of gathering vigor and zeal, long withheld. The incident of ch. iv. 28, 29 can scarcely have arisen only from the anger of the moment.

CHAP. III. 1–22.] PREACHING AND BAPTISM OF JOHN. DIVINE TESTIMONY TO JESUS AT HIS BAPTISM. Matt. iii. 1–17. Mark i. 4–11.

1.] These dates are consistent with the accurate tracing down which St. Luke predicates of himself, ch. i. 3. In Matt. iii. 1 we have the same events indicated as to time by only "In those days." The fifteenth year of the sole principate of Tiberius began Aug. 19, in the year of Rome 781, and reckoning backwards thirty years from that time (see ver. 23), we should have the birth of our Lord in 751, or about then; for "about thirty" will admit of some latitude. But Herod the Great died in the beginning of the year 750, and our Lord's birth must be fixed some months at least before the death of Herod. If then it be placed in 749, He would have been at least thirty-two at the time of His baptism, seeing that it took some time after the beginning of John's ministry. This difficulty has led to the supposition that this fifteenth year is not to be dated from the sole, but from the associated principate of Tiberius, which commenced most probably at the end of 764. According to this, the fifteenth of Tiberius will begin at the end of 779—and our Lord's birth would be 749 or 750: which will agree with the death of Herod. This latter explanation has usually been adopted. Our present æra was fixed by Dionysius Exiguus, in the sixth century, and places the birth of our Lord in 754. It may be doubted, however, whether in all these reckonings more accuracy has not been sought than the Gospel narrative warrants any expectation of our finding. The "about thirty" is a wide expression, and might cover any age from thirty (see note on ver. 23) to thirty-two or thirty-three.

See on Matt. ii. 2, where it appears probable from astronomical considerations, that our Lord was born as early as U.C. 747.

Pontius Pilate....] Pilate was only Procurator of Judæa: the word governor being used promiscuously of the leading officers of the Roman government. PONTIUS PILATE was the sixth procurator from the deposition of Archelaus, and came to Judæa about the year of Rome 779. He held the province ten years, and was sent to Rome to answer for his conduct by Vitellius, prefect of Syria, in 789, the year of the death of Tiberius. See chronological table in the Introduction to the Acts.

Herod] See note on Matt. xiv. 1. HEROD ANTIPAS became tetrarch of Galilee after the death of his father Herod, in the year of Rome 750, and continued till he was deposed in 792. Philip] Son of Herod the Great by Cleopatra, a woman of Jerusalem. He was brought up at Rome, and after his father's death in 750, was made tetrarch of Batanza, Gaulonitis, Trachonitis, Panias, Auranitis (Batanaea and Auranitis make up Ituræa), and continued till his death in 786 or 787. He built Cæsarea Philippi. He was by far the best of Herod's sons, and ruled his portion mildly and well. He must not be confounded with his half-brother Philip, whose wife Herodias Herod Antipas seduced. This latter was disinherited by his father, and lived in privacy. See note on Matt. xiv. 1.

Lysanias the tetrarch of Abilene] ABILENE, the district round Abila, a town eighteen miles north of Damascus, now, according to Pococke, Nebi Abel. It must not be confounded with Abila in Decapolis. Josephus mentions it as among the districts which Claudius gave to king Agrippa I. under the name of Abila of Lysanias, and in another place as the Kingdom called that of Lysanias. See farther in note in my Greek Testament. It seems to have been a district patrimonially in possession of rulers bearing this name.

2.] ANNAS (Ananus, Josephus) the high priest, was deposed by Valerius Gratus (in the year of Rome 779), and after several changes, Joseph or Caiaphas, his son-in-law (John xviii. 13), was made high priest. It would appear from this verse (and the use of the singular—see margin)—renders the inference more stringent. Compare also St. Luke's own phrase, Acts iv. 6) that Annas, as ex-high priest, and possibly retaining in the view of the Jews the legitimate high priesthood, was counted still as having the office: he certainly (John xviii. 13) exercised the power,—and had influence enough to procure the actual high priesthood for five of his sons, after his own deposition, Jos. Antt. xx. 9. 1.

A substitute, or deputy to the high priest (called by the Talmudists Sagan), appears to have been usual,—see 2 Kings xxv. 18; and Annas would thus be able to evade the Roman appointment, and keep the authority.

the word of God came...] See John i. 33.

3–6.] Matt. iii. 1. Mark i. 4, where see note on the baptism of repentance.

5, 6.] are peculiar to Luke. They are nearly verbatim from the LXX in the Alexandrine copy.

7–9.] Matthew, vv. 7–10. John's speech is verbatim as Matthew, except that fruits is singular, and “think not” in Matthew is not in Luke. This indicates a common origin of this portion, which however is still thus slightly deflected; and let it be borne in mind that the slighter the deflection, the more striking the independence of the Evangelists.

8. begin not to say] He cuts off even the attempt to excuse themselves.

10–14.] Peculiar to Luke.

10.] Olshausen refers to the answer to a similar question under the N.T. dispensation, Acts ii. 87. See also Acts xvi. 30; xxii. 10. Deeds of justice and charity are the very first fruits of repentance; see Micah vi. 8.

12.] publicans, see on Matt. v. 46.

14.] soldiers—properly, men on march: not this need not be pressed, only that they were soldiers serving in an army. Who these were, we have no means of determining. Certainly not soldiers of the army which Herod Antipas sent against Aretas, his father-in-law:—see notes on Matt. xiv. 1 ff.

neither accuse any falsely] The way in which soldiers would be likely to act the part of informers, would be by laying vexatious charges of disaffection against persons.

15–17.] Ver. 15 is peculiar to Luke, but is equivalent to John i. 19–25.

in expectation,—i. e. that John would declare himself.

16, 17.] Matt. iii, 11, 12. Mark i. 7, 8. John i. 26, 27. The four accounts are cognate, but vary in expression and arrangement: ver. 17 is nearly verbatim as Matthew.

18–20.] Luke only: containing the corroboration of the account in Mark vi. 20 of John's boldness in rebuking Herod, with this slight variation, that whereas in Mark Herod heard him gladly, and did many things in consequence, here the rebuke for general profligacy seems to have contributed to his imprisonment. These accounts however, though perfectly distinct, are by no means inconsistent. The same rebukes which stung Herod's conscience and aided the desire to imprison John, might work on that conscience, and cause the wish to hear more from the man of God. Vv. 19, 20 are in anticipation of what follows; which is in St. Luke's manner; see ch. i. 80.

21, 22.] Matt. iii, 13–17. Mark i. 9–11. St. Luke's account is much more concise than usual, and wholly independent of the others; see note on Mark i. 10: we have here however three additional particulars—1. that all the people had been baptised before the Lord's baptism: 2. that He was praying at the time of the descent of the Spirit: 8. that the Spirit appeared in a bodily form. On (3), see note at Matt. iii. 16, §2.

23–38.] GENEALOGY OF OUR LORD. Peculiar to Luke.

23.] Jesus was about thirty years old when He began (His ministry): not, as A.V. 'began to be about,' &c., which is ungrammatical. This is the interpretation of Origen, Euthymius, and the best commentators. See Acts. i. 1.

This about thirty admits of considerable latitude, but only in one direction; viz. over thirty years. He could not well be under, seeing that this was the appointed age for the commencement of public service of God by the Levites; see reference to Numbers.

If no other proof were in existence of the total independence of the present Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Luke, their genealogies would furnish what I conceive to be an undeniable one. Is it possible that either of these Evangelists could have set down his genealogy with that of the other before him? Would no remark have been made on their many, and (on such a supposition) unaccountable variations? It is quite beside the purpose of the present Commentary to attempt to reconcile the two. It has never yet been accomplished; and every endeavour to do it has violated either ingenuousness or common sense. I shall, as in similar cases, only indicate the landmarks which may serve to guide us to all that is possible for us to discover concerning them. (1) The two genealogies are both the line of Joseph, and not of Mary. Whether Mary were an heiress or not, Luke's words here preclude the idea of the genealogy being hers; for the descent of the Lord is transferred putatively to Joseph by the as was supposed, before the genealogy begins; and it would be unnatural to that the reckoning, which began the real mother, would, after such Transference, pass back through her to her father again, as it must do, if the genealogy be hers.

The attempts of many to make it appear that the genealogy is that of Mary, reading 'the son (as supposed of Jos eph, but in reality) of Heli, &c.' are, as Meyer has shewn, quite unsuccessful;' see Dr. Mill's vindication of the Genealogies, p. 180 ff., for the history of this opinion. (2) St. Luke appears to have taken this genealogy entire from some authority before him, in which the expression Son of God, as applied to Christ, was made good by tracing it up, as here, through a regular ascent of Progenitors till we come to Adam, who was, but here again inexactly, the son of God. This seems much more probable than that St. Luke should, for his Gentile readers, have gone up to the origin of the human race instead of to Abraham. I cannot imagine any such purpose definitely present in the mind of the Evangelist. This view is confirmed by the entirely insulated situation of the genealogies here, between ver. 23 and ch. iv. 1. (3) The Points of divergence between the genealogies are,—in Matthew the father of Joseph is Jacob—in Luke, Heli; this gives rise to different lists (except two common names, Zorobabel and Salathiel) up to David, where the accounts coincide again, and remain identical up to Abraham, where Matthew ceases. (4) Here, as elsewhere, I believe that the accounts might be reconciled, or at all events good reason might be assigned for their differing, if we were in possession of data on which to proceed; but here, as elsewhere, we are not. For who shall reproduce the endless combinations of elements of confusion, which might creep into a genealogy of this kind? St. Matthew's, we know, is squared so as to form three groups of fourteens, by the omission of several generations; how can we tell that some similar step, unknown to us, may not have been taken with the one before us? It was common among the Jews for the same man to bear different names; how do we know how often this may occur among the immediate progenitors of Joseph? The marriage of a brother with a brother's wife to raise up seed (which then might be accounted to either husband) was common; how do we know how often this may have contributed to produce variations in the terms of a genealogy?

With all these elements of confusion, it is quite as presumptuous to pronounce the genealogies discrepant, as it is over-curious and uncritical to attempt to reconcile them. It may suffice us that they are inserted in the Gospels as authentic documents, and both of them merely to clear the Davidical descent of the putative father of the Lord. HIS OWN real Davidical descent does not depend on either of them, but must be solely derived through his mother. See much interesting investigation of the various solutions and traditions, in Dr. Mill's tract referred to above: and in Lord A. Hervey's work on the Genealogies of our Lord.

81.] Nathan: see 2 Sam. v. 14: 1 Chron. iii. 5: Zech. xii. 12.

36. Cainam] This name does not exist in our present Hebrew text, but in the LXX, Gen. x. 24; xi. 12, 13, and furnishes a curious instance of one of two things—either (1) the corruption of our present Hebrew text in these chronological passages; or (2) the incorrectness of the LXX, and notwithstanding that, the high reputation which it had obtained in so short a time. Lightfoot holds the latter alternative: but I own I think the former more probable. See on the whole question of the appearance of this second Cainam (n) among the ancestors of our Lord, Lord A. Hervey’s work above cited, ch. viii., in which, with much research and acuteness, he has endeavoured to shew that the name was probably interpolated here, and got from hence into the LXX. Certainly it appears not to have existed in the earliest copies of that version.

Luke: Chapter 4

CHAP. IV. 1–13.] TEMPTATION OF JESUS. Matt. iv. 1–11. Mark i. 12, 13. Ver. 1 is peculiar to Luke, and very important. Our Lord was now full of the Holy Ghost, and in that fulness He is led up to combat with the enemy. He has arrived at the fulness of the stature of perfect man, outwardly and spiritually. And as when His Church was inaugurated by the descent of the Spirit in His falness, so now, the first and fittest weapon for the combat is “the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God.” The discourse of Peter in Acts ii., like our Lord’s here, is grounded in the testimony of the Scripture.

The accounts of St. Matthew and St. Luke (St. Mark’s is principally a compendium) are distinct; see notes on Matthew and Mark.

2.] The literal rendering of the present text will be: Jesus.. was led by (in, in the power of) the Spirit in the wilderness, being tempted (i. e. because he was tempted) during forty days the devil. So that St. Luke, as also St. Mark, implies that the temptation continued the whole forty days. he did eat nothing testifies to the strictness in which the term ‘fasted’ must be taken.

3.] this stone, pointing to Some particular stone—command that it become a loaf (so literally)

4.] The citation is given in full by St. Matthew.

5.] There can be little doubt that the order in Matthew, in which this temptation is placed last, is to be adhered to in our expositions of the Temptation. No definite notes of succession are given in our text, but they are by Matthew: see notes there. Some suppose that the inversion has been made as suiting better the requirements of probability: it seeming; more natural that our Lord should be first taken to the mountain and then to Jerusalem, than the converse.

6.] Satan is set forth to us in Scripture as the prince, or god of this world,—by our Lord Himself, John xii. 31; xiv. 30; xvi. 11:—by St. Paul, 2 Cor. iv. 4 (Eph. vi. 12). On the signification of this temptation, see notes on Matthew.

8.] If the words “Get thee behind me, Satan” had been here, as in A.V., St. Luke could hardly have left the record as it stands: this being the first direct recognition by our Lord of His foe, after which, and in obedience to which command, he departs from Him.

10.] to keep thee is wanting in Matthew. The LXX, following the Hebrew, adds “in all thy ways.”

13.] for a season: see on Matthew, ver. 11, and note on ch. xxii. 53.

14–82.] CIRCUIT OF GALILEE. TEACHING, AND REJECTION, AT NAZARETH. Peculiar to Luke in this form: but see Matt. iv, 12–25; xiii. 53–58, and the parallel place in Mark, and note below.

14.] in the power of that full anointing of the Spirit for His holy office, which He had received at His baptism: and also implying that this power was used by Him in doing mighty works.

Here the chronological order of St. Luke’s history begins to be confused, and the first evident marks occur indefiniteness in arrangement, which I believe characterizes this Gospel. And in observing this, I would once for all premise, (1) that I have no bias for finding such chronological inaccuracy, and have only done so where no fair and honest means will solve the difficulty; (2) that where internal evidence appears to me to decide this to be the case, I have taken the only way open to a Commentator who would act uprightly by the Scriptures, and fairly acknowledged and met the difficulty; (8) that so far from considering the testimony of the Evangelists to be weakened by such inaccuracies, I am convinced that it becomes only so much the stronger (see Introduction to the Gospels).

These remarks have been occasioned by the relation of this account, vv. 14–30, to the Gospels of Matthew and John. Our verses 14 and 15 embrace the narrative of Matthew in ch. iv. 12–25. But after that comes an event which belongs to a later period of our Lord's ministry. A fair comparison of our vv. 16–24 with Matt. xiii. 53–58, Mark vi. 1–6, entered on without bias, and conducted solely from the narratives themselves, surely can hardly fail to convince us of their identity. (1) That two such visits should have happened, is of itself not impossible; though (with the sole exception of Jerusalem for obvious reasons) our Lord did not ordinarily revisit the places where He had been rejected as in our vv. 28, 29. (2) That He should have been thus treated at His first visit, and then marvelled at their unbelief on His second, is utterly impossible. (3) That the same question should have been asked on both occasions, and answered by our Lord with the same proverbial expression, is in the highest degree improbable. (4) Besides, this narrative itself bears internal marks of belonging to a later period. The whatsoever we have heard done in Capernaum must refer to more than one miracle done there: indeed the whole form of the sentence points to the plain fact, that our Lord had been residing long in Capernaum. Compare too its introduction here without any notification, with its description as a city of Galilee in ver. 31, and the separateness of the two pieces will be apparent: see further remarks in the notes below.

Here however is omitted an important cycle of our Lord's sayings and doings, both in Galilee and Jerusalem; viz. that contained in John i. 29—iv. 54 included. This will be shewn by comparing Matt. iv. 12, where it is stated that our Lord's return to Galilee was after the casting of John into prison, with John iii. 24, where, on occasion of the Lord and the disciples baptizing in Judæa, it is said, John was not yet cast into prison: see note on Matt. iv. 12.

a fame] The report, namely, of His miracles in Capernaum, wrought in the power of the Spirit, and possibly of what He had done and taught at Jerusalem at the feast.

15.] Olshausen well remarks that this verse, containing a general undefined notice of our Lord's synagogue teaching, quite takes from what follows any chrono-logical character. Indeed we find throughout the early part of this Gospel the same fragmentary stamp. Compare "on the sabbath days," ver. 31—"as the people pressed on him," ch. v. 1—"when he was in a certain city," ch. v. 12—"on a certain day," ch. v. 17; viii. 22—"on another sabbath," ch. vi. 6—"in these days," ch. vi. 12, &c. &c.

16.] where he had been brought up is expressed by "in thy country," ver. 23: see John iv. 44 and note.

as his custom was refers to the whole of what He did—it is not merely that he had been in the habit of attending the synagogues, but of teaching in them: see ver. 15. It was apparently the first time He had ever so taught in the synagogue at Nazareth.

stood up for to read] The rising up was probably to shew His wish to explain the Scripture; for so the word rendered "read" imports. Ezra is called a reader of the divine law, Joseph. Antt. xi. 5. 1. The ordinary way was, for the ruler of the synagogue to call upon persons of any learning or note to read and explain. That the demand of the Lord was so readily complied with, is sufficiently accounted for by vv. 14, 15. See reff.

17.] It is doubtful whether the Rabbinical cycle of Sabbath readings, or lessons from law and prophets, were as yet in use: but some regular plan was adopted; and according to that plan, after the reading of the law, which always preceded, the portion from the prophets came to be read (see Acts xiii. 15), which, for that sabbath, fell in the prophet Isaiah. The roll containing that book (probably, that alone) was given to the Lord. But it does not appear that He read any part of the lesson for the day; but when He had unrolled the scroll, found (the fortuitous, i.e. providential, finding is the most likely interpretation, not the searching, for and finding) the passage which follows.

No inference can be drawn as to the time of the year from this narrative: partly on account of the uncertainty above mentioned, and partly because it is not quite clear whether the roll contained only Isaiah, or other books also.

18–20.] The quotation agrees mainly with the LXX:—the words to set at liberty them that are bruised are inserted from the LXX of Isa. lviii. 6. The meaning of this prophetic citation may be better seen, when we remember that it stands in the middle of the third great division of the book of Isaiah (ch. xl ix.—lxvi.), that, viz., which comprises the prophecies of the Person, office, sufferings, triumph, and Church of the Messiah; and thus by implication wee the fulfilment of all that went before, in Him who then addressed them. 18. The Spirit of the Lord] See Isa. xi. 2; xl ii. 1. deliverance to the captives] See ch. xiii. 12, 16.

recovering of sight to the blind] See John ix. 39. The Hebrew words thus rendered by the LXX, signify, ‘to those who are bound, the opening of prison:’ so that we have here the LXX and literal rendering both included, and the latter expressed in the LXX words of Isa. lviii. 6.

19. the acceptable year of the Lord] See Levit. xxv. 8–17, where in ver. 10 we find that liberty was proclaimed to all in the land in the year of jubilee. No countenance is given by this expression to the extraordinary inference from it of some of the Fathers (Clement of Alexandria, Origen), that the Lord’s public ministry lasted only a year, and something over. Compare John ii. 13; vi. 4; xiii. 1.

20. sat down] It was the custom in the synagogues to stand while reading the law, sit down to explain it. Our Lord on other occasions taught sitting, e.g. Matt. v. 1; Mark iv. 1; xiii. 3. The minister was the officer whose duty it was to keep the sacred books.

21.] he began to say,— implying that the following words are merely the substance of a more expanded discourse, which our Lord uttered to that effect: see another occasion in Matt. xi. 4, 5, where the same truth was declared by a series of gracious acts of mercy.

fulfilled in your ears, viz. by My proclaiming it, and My course of ministry.

22.] bare him witness: i.e. bare witness to him (that It was so), The words of grace must be the discourse of which ver. 21 is a compendium. they said, viz. the “all” mentioned above, not merely some of them. While acknowledging the truth of what He said, and the power with which He said it, they wondered, and were jealous of Him, as being the son of Joseph—asking “Whence hath this man these things?” see Mark vi. 2–4. Between this verse and the next, the taking offence at Him is implied, for that is in a tone of reproof.

23.] heal thyself—not, ‘raise thyself from thy obscure station,’ but, exert thy powers of healing in thine own country, as presently interpreted; the Physician being represented as an inhabitant of Nazareth, and thyself including His own citizens in it. Stier remarks, that the reproach was repeated under the Cross. Then, with a strictly individual application. On the miracles previously wrought in Capernaum, see note on ver. 14. That in John iv, 47–53 was one such.

24.] See John iv. 44 and note. And (or, but) he said] A formula usual with St. Luke; and indicating, if I mistake not, the passing to a different source of information, or at least a break in the record, if from the same source.

25.] Our Lord brings forward instances where the two greatest prophets in Israel were not directed to act in accordance with the proverb, ‘Physician, heal thyself:’ but their miraculous powers exerted on those who were strangers to God’s inheritance.

three years and six months] So also in James v. 17—but in 1 Kings xviii. 1 we find that it was in the third year that the Lord commanded Elijah to shew himself to Ahab, for He would send rain on the earth. But it does not appear from what time this third year is reckoned,—or at what time of the year, with reference to the usual former and latter rains, the drought caused by Elijah’s prayer began [it apparently had begun some time before the prophet was sent to be miraculously sustained, as this very fact implies failure of the ordinary means of sustenance]; and thus, without forming any further hypothesis, we have latitude enough given for the three and a half years, which seems to have been the exact time. This period is one often recurring in Jewish record and in prophecy: see Daniel vii. 25; xii. 7: Rev. xi. 2, 3; xii. 6, 14; xiii. 5. Lightfoot produces more instances from the Rabbinical writers. “The period of three years and a half, = 42 months or 1260 days, had an ominous sound in the ears of an Israelite, being the time of this famine, and of the duration of the desolation of the temple under Antiochus.” Wordsw.

26.] Sarepta, now Sūrafend,—a large village, inland, halfway between Tyre and Sidon:—the ancient city seems to have been on the coast. 27.] Stier remarks, that these two examples have a close parallelism with those of the Syro-Phœnician woman (Mark vii. 26) and the ruler’s son at Capernaum (John iv. 46).

28–30.] The same sort of rage possessed the Jews, Acts xxii. 22, on a similar truth being announced to them. This whole occurrence, whenever it happened in our Lord’s ministry, was but a foreshadowing of His treatment afterwards from the nation of the Jews—a foretaste of “He came unto his own, and his own received him not” (John i. 11). The modern Nazareth is at a distance of about two English miles from what is called the Mount of Precipitation; nor is it built literally on the brow of that mount or hill. But (1) neither does the narrative preclude a considerable distance having been traversed, during which they had our Lord in their custody, and were hurrying with him to the edge of the ravine; nor (2) is it at all necessary to suppose the city built on the brow, but only on the mountain, or range of hills, of which the brow forms a part—which it is.

Our Lord's passing through the midst of them is evidently miraculous: the circumstances were different from those in John viii. 60, where the expression is "He hid himself and went out of the temple:" see note there. Here, the Nazarenes had Him actually in their custody.

31 f.] Mark i. 21, 22. The view maintained with regard to the foregoing occurrence in the preceding notes, of course precludes the notion that it was the reason of our Lord's change of habitation to Capernaum. In fact that change, as remarked on ver. 14, had been made some time before: and it is hardly possible that such an expression as "He came to Nazareth, where he had been brought up," should be used, if He still resided there. The words a city of Galilee come in unnaturally after the mention of Capernaum in ver. 23, and evidently shew that this was originally intended to be the first mention of the place.

What may have been the reason of the change of abode is quite uncertain. It seems to have included the whole family, except the sisters, who may have been married at Nazareth,—see note on John ii. 12, and Matt. iv. 18. came down,—see also John ii. 12,—because Nazareth lay high, and Capernaum on the sea of Galilee.

33–37.] HEALING OF A DÆMONIAC IN THE SYNAGOGUE AT CAPERNAUM. Mark i. 23–28, where see notes. The two accounts are very closely cognate—being the same narrative, only slightly deflected; not more, certainly, than might have arisen from oral repetition by two persons, at some interval of time, of what they had received in the same words.

35.] hurt him not is here only. St. Mark's expression, rendered "torn," may mean 'having convulsed him'—and our text, 'without doing him bodily injury.'

38–41.] HEALING OF SIMON' S WIFE' S MOTHER, AND MANY OTHERS. Matt. viii. 14–17. Mark i. 29–34. Our account has only a slight additional detail, which is interesting however as giving another side of an eye-witness's evidence—it is, he stood over her. Now this is implied in laying hold of her hand, as she was in bed; which particulars are both mentioned by St. Matthew and St. Mark:—this being one of those many cases where the alteration of the one expression into the other is utterly inconceivable.

38. a great fever] An epithet used by St. Luke, as a physician; for, as Galen observes, physicians divided fevers into great and small. Bleek doubts this, and understands it only of the intensity of the fever.

40.] he laid his hands on every one of them, is a detail peculiar to Luke, and I believe indicating the same as above: as also the crying out and saying, implied in the other Evangelists, but not expressed.

42–44.] JESUS, BEING SOUGHT OUT IN HIS RETIREMENT, PREACHES THROUGHOUT JUDÆA. Mark i, 35–39. The dissimilitude in wording of these two accounts is one of the most striking instances in the Gospels, of variety found in the same narration. While the matter related (with one remarkable exception, see below) is nearly identical, the only words common to the two are into a desert (or solitary, the word is the same) place.

42.] the multitudes are "Simon and they that were with him" in Mark. The great number of sick which were brought to the Lord on the evening before, and this morning, is accounted for by some from His departure having been fixed on and known beforehand; but it is perhaps more simple to view it us the natural result of the effect of the healing of the dæmoniac in the synagogue, on the popular mind.

This verse is a formal close to this section of the narrative, and chronologically separates it from what follows.

The reading Judæa wust, on any intelligible critical principles, be adopted. So far, however, being plain, I confess that all attempts to explain the fact seem to me futile. The three Evangelists relate no ministry in Judæa, with this single exception. And our narrative is thus brought into the most startling discrepancy with that of St. Mark, in which unquestionably the same portion of the sacred history is related. Still, these are considerations which must not weigh in the least degree with the critic. It is his province simply to track out what is the sacred text, not what, in his own feeble and partial judgment, it ought to have been.

CHAP. V. 1–11.] THE MIRACULOUS DRAUGHT OF FISHES. CALL OF PETER AND THE SONS OF ZEBEDEE. The question at once meets us, whether this account, in its form here peculiar to Luke, is identical in its subject-matter with Matt. iv. 18–22, and Mark i. 16–20. With regard to this, we may notice the following particulars. (1) Some suppose this to be the first meeting of our Lord with Simon Peter. But it must be, I think, the inference of most readers, that a previous and close relation had subsisted between them before. Peter calls Him Master and Lord: evidently (ver. 5, end) expects a miracle; and follows Him, his partners, without any present express command so to do.

Still all this might be, and yet the account might be identical with the others, For our Lord had known Peter before this, John i. 41 ff., and, in all probability, as one of His disciples. And although there is here no express command to follow, yet the words in ver. 10 may be, and are probably intended to be, equivalent to one. (2) That the Evangelist evidently intends this as the first apostolic calling of Peter and his companions. The expressions in ver. 11 could not otherwise have been used. (8) That there is yet the supposition, that the accounts in Matthew and Mark may be a shorter way of recounting this by persons who were not aware of these circumstances. But then such a supposition will not consist with that high of authority in those accounts, which I believe them to have: see note on Matk. (4) It seems to me that the truth of the matter is nearly this: —that this event is distinct from, and happened at a later than, the calling in Matthew and Mark; but that the four Apostles, when our Lord was at Capernaum, followed their occupation as fishermen. There is every thing to shew, in our account, that the calling had previously taken place; and the closing of it by the expression in ver. 11 merely indicates, what there can be no difficulty in seeing even without it, that our present account is an imperfect one, written by one who found thus much recorded, an knowing it to be part of the history of the calling of the Apostles, appended to it the fact of their leaving all and following the Lord. As to the repetition of the assurance in ver. 10, I see no more in it than this which appears also from other passages in the Gospels, that the Apostles, as such were not called or ordained at any special moment, or by any one word of power alone; but that in their case, as well as ours, there was line upon line, precept upon precept: and that what was said generally to all four on the former occasion, by words only, was repeated to Peter on this, not only in words, but by a miracle. Does his fear, as expressed in ver. 8, besides the reason assigned, indicate some previous slowness, or relaxation of his usually earnest attachment, of which he now becomes deeply ashamed? (5) It is also to be noticed that there is no chronological index to this narrative connecting it with what precedes or follows. It cannot well (see ver. 8) have taken place after the healing of Peter's wife's mother; and (ver. 1) must have been after the crowd had now become accustomed to hear the Lord teach. (6) Also, that there is no mention of Andrew here, as in ver. 10 there surely would have been, if he had been present. (7) It will be seen how wholly irreconcilable either of the suppositions is with the idea that St. Luke used the Gospel of St. Matthew, or that of St. Mark, in compiling his own.

2.] were washing their nets—indicating that their labour for that time was finished: see ver. 5.

4.] Launch out is, in the original, singular, as addressed to Peter alone, who was the steersman of his ship; let down is plural, as addressed to the fishermen in the ship collectively. So below also, I will let down, of the director,—when they had this done, of the doers,—of the act.

5.] all the night,—the ordinary time of fishing:—see John xxi. 3.

6.] were bursting, i.e. had begun to burst.

7.] They beckoned, on account of the distance; or perhaps for the r eason given by Euthymius, not being able to speak from their amazement and fear.

8.] Depart from me, i.e. from my ship. The speech is in exact keeping with the quick discernment, and expression of feeling, of Peter's character. Similar sayings are found Exod. xx. 18, 19; Judg. xiii. 22; 1 Kings xvii. 18; Isa. vi. 5; Dan. x. 17.

This sense of unworthiness and self-loathing is ever the effect, in the depths of a heart not utterly hardened, of the Divine Power and presence. “Below this, is the utterly profane state, in which there is no contrast, no contradiction felt, between the holy and the unholy, between God and man. Above it, is the state of grace, in which the contradiction is felt, between the deep gulf perceived, which divides between sinful man and an holy God,—yet it is felt that this gulf is bridged over,—that it is possible for the two to meet,—that in One, who is sharer with both, they have already been brought together.” Trench on the Miracles. The same writer remarks of the miracle itself, “Christ here appears as the ideal man, the second Adam of the eighth Psalm; ‘Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of Thy hands; thou hast put all things under His feet.... the fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever walketh through the paths of the seas’ (vv. 6, 8).”

10.] thou shalt be a catcher of men:—compare, and indeed throughout this miracle, the striking parallel, and yet contrast, in John xxi.—with its injunction, ‘Feed my lambs,’ ‘Shepherd My sheep,’ given to the same Peter; its net which did not burst: and the minute and beautiful appropriateness of each will be seen: this, at, or near, the commencement of the apostolic course; that, at how different, and how fitting a time!

12–16.] HEALING OF A LEPER. Matt. viii. 2–4. Mark i. 40–45. In Matthew placed immediately after the Sermon on the Mount: in Mark and here, without any note of time. See notes on Matthew.

12.] fall of leprosy (a touch of medical accuracy from the beloved physician) implies the soreness of the disease.

15.] The reason of this is stated in Mark, ver. 45, to be the disobedience of the leper to the Lord's command.

16.] and praying is peculiar to Luke, as often: see ch. iii. 21; vi. 12; ix. 18; xi. 1.

This verse breaks off the sequence of the narrative.

17–26.] HEALING OF A PARALYTIC. Matt. ix. 2–8. Mark ii. 1–12. This miracle is introduced by the indefinite words, and it came to pass on a certain day. In Matt. viii. 5—ix. 1, a series of incidents are interposed. Our Lord there appears to have returned from the country of the Gadarenes and the miracle on the dæmoniac there, to 'His own city,' i.e. Capernaum. The order in Mark is the same as here, and his narrative contains the only decisive note of sequence (ch. iv. 35), which determines his order and that in the text to have been the actual one, and the events in Matt. viii. to be related out of their order.

17.] out of every town: not to be pressed: as we say, from all parts.

the power of the Lord] Does this mean the power of God—or the power of the Lord, i.e. Jesus? Meyer remarks that St. Luke uses the Lord frequently for Jesus, but always with the Greek definite article: so in ch. vii. 13; x. 1; xi. 39; xii. 42, al. fr.:—but the same word without the article, for the Most High; so here; and in ch. i. 11, 38, 58, 66; ii. 9; iv. 19; whence we conclude that the meaning is, the power of God (working in the Lord Jesus) was in the direction of His healing: i.e. wrought so that He exercised the powers of healing: and then a case follows.

18.] Borne of four, Mark.

19.] This description is that of an eye-witness.

20.] On their faith see note on Matthew,

ver. 2; also on are forgiven.

26.] strange things—literally, things beyond our expectation. Compare the close of the accounts in Matthew and Mark.

27–39.] CALLING OF LEVI. QUESTION RESPECTING FASTING. Matt. ix. 9–17. Mark ii. 13–22. For all common matter,—the discussion of the identity of Matthew and Levi, &c.—see notes on Matthew and Mark. I here only notice what is peculiar to Luke.

27.] not merely 'He saw,' but He looked on,—He ob-served.

28.] left all: not merely, 'left his books and implements,' but the expression is generally used, and imports not so much a present objective relinquishment, as the mind with which he rose to follow.

29.] This fact is only expressly mentioned here—but may be directly inferred from Mark, and remotely from Matthew. See on Matthew, ver. 10.

33.] On the difference in the persons who ask this question, see on Matthew and Mark.

and make prayers: see ch. xi. 1. These prayers must be understood in connexion with an ascetic form of life, not as only the usual prayers of devout men.

34.] I have remarked on the striking contrast between make to fast and they shall (or, will) fast, on Matthew, ver. 15.

36.] The latter part of this verse is peculiar, and is to be understood as in the margin, 'if he does, he both will rend the new garment' (by taking out of it the piece), 'and the piece from the new garment will not agree with the old' In Matthew and

Mark the mischief done is differently expressed. Our text is very significant, and represents to us the spoiling of both systems by an attempt to engraft the new upon the old:-the new loses its completeness: the old, its consistency.

39.] This peculiar and important addition at once stamps our report with the very highest character for accuracy. Its apparent difficulty has perhaps caused its omission from some of our ancient authorities. It contains the conclusion of the discourse, and the final answer to the question in ver. 33, which is not given in Matthew and Mark. The persons who had drunk the old wine are the Jews, who had long been habituated to the old system;—the new is the new wine (see on Matthew) of the grace and freedom of the Gospel: and our Lord asserts that this new wine was not palatable to the Jews, who said the old is better (or, good). Observe that there is no objective comparison whatever here between the old and new wine; the whole stress is on desireth and for he saith, and the import of better is subjective:—in the view of him who utters it. And even if we were to assume such an objective comparison, it makes no difficulty. In time, the new wine will become older;—the man will become habituated to its taste, and the wine itself mellowed: and the comparison between the wines is not then which is the older, but which is intrinsically the better.

Stier observes, that the saying is a lesson for ardent and enthusiastic converts not to be disappointed, if they cannot at once instil their spirit into others about them.

Luke: Chapter 6

CHAP. VI. 1–5.] THE DISCIPLES PLUCK EARS OF CORN ON THE SABBATH. Matt. xii. 1–8. Mark ii. 23–28. Between the discourse just related here and in Mark, and this incident, Matthew interposes the raising of Jairus's daughter, the healing Of the two blind and one dumb, the mission of the twelve, and the message of John. I need not insist on these obvious proofs of independence in the construction of our Gospels.

On the question of the arrangements, see on Matthew.

1. second... after the first] The word thus rendered presents much difficulty. None of the interpretations have any certainty, as the word is found nowhere else, and can be only judged of by analogy. See the discussion in the notes in m Greek Testament.

rubbing them in their hands is a detail peculiar to Luke: rubbing them and blowing away the chaff.

2.] In Matthew and Mark, the Pharisees address our Lord, ‘Why do Thy disciples,’ &c.?

3.] Have ye not so much as this? i.e. ‘Are ye so utterly ignorant of the spirit of Scripture?’ See Mark xii. 10, where the same expression occurs. In one of our ancient authorities, the Cambridge MS., the following is the form of ver. 5: On the same day he beheld a certain man working on the sabbath, and said unto him, O man, if thou knowest what thou art doing, blessed art thou: but if thou knowest not, accursed, and a transgressor of the law. This remarkable substitution seems to be an interpolation, but hardly an invention of a later time. Its form and contents speak for its originality, and, I am disposed to believe, its authenticity.

6–11.] HEALING OF THE WITHERED HAND. Matt. xii. 9–14 Mark iii. 1–6. See on Matthew.

6.] The circumstances related in ch. xiv. 1–6 are very similar to these; and there St. Luke has inserted the question of Matthew, vv. 11, 12. I should be disposed to think that St. Mark and St. Luke have preserved the exact narrative here. St. Matthew, as we see, describes the watching of the Pharisees (their thoughts, or reasonings, ver. 8) as words actually spoken, and relates that they asked the question: which certainly arises from an imperfect report of what took place, the question itself being verbatim that which our Lord asked on that other occasion, Luke xiv. 3, and followed by a similar appeal about an animal. There can hardly be a doubt that in St. Matthew’s narrative the two occurrences are blended: and this may have taken place from the very circumstance of the question about an animal having been asked on both occasions; St. Luke omitting it here, because he reports it there—St. Matthew joining to it the question asked there, because he was not aware of another similar incident.

9.] After the question, St. Mark adds “But they held their peace”—as they did after the question just referred to in ch. xx. 3, because they were in a dilemma, and either answer would have convicted them.

10.) St. Mark adds “with anger, being grieved at the hardness of their hearts"—one of the most striking and graphic descriptions in the Gospels. It was thus that He bare (see Matt. viii. 17), even while, on earth, our sins and infirmities. Their hearts were hardened,—but He grieved for it.

11. foolishness] It does not appear that this word can ever mean, as in A.V. 'madness,' or as some explain it, rage of a senseless kind. The proper meaning, 'senselessness,' 'wicked folly,' must be kept to.

communed—viz. the Pharisees and Herodians: Mark, ver. 6, where see note.

12–19.] CALLING AND NAMES OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES. Peculiar (in this form) to Luke: see Matt. xii. 15–21; Mark iii. 13–19. We may observe, that St. Matthew does not relate the choosing of the Apostles, but only takes occasion to give a list of them on their being sent out, ch. x. 1 ff.; and that St. Mark and St. Luke agree in the time of their being chosen, placing it immediately after the healing on the sabbath,—but with no very definite note of time.

12.] in these days is vague in date, and may belong to any part of the period of our Lord's ministry now before us. I believe it to be a form of acknowledgment on the part of the Evangelist, that he did not determine exactly into what part of this period to bring the incident so introduced. Indeed the whole of this paragraph is of a supplementary and indefinite character, serving more as a preface to the discourse which follows, than as this and the cognate, though independent, account of Mark.

went out—viz. from Capernaum.

the mountain—see on Matt. v. 1.

to pray—see note on ch. v. 16.

and continued all night in his prayer to God] This is the right rendering. The fancy that by the words rendered "in his prayer to God" is meant in a house of prayer, is quite baseless.

13. he led unto him his disciples] expressed in Mark, "He calleth to him whom he would"—i. e. He summoned to Him a certain larger number, out of whom He selected Twelve. We are not to suppose that this selection was now first made out of a miscellaneous number—but now first formally announced; the Apostles, or most of them, had had each their special individual calling to be, in a peculiar manner, followers of the Lord, before this.

he named] not at a previous, or subsequent period; but at this time.

14.] On the catalogue, see notes on Matt. X. 1 ff.

16.] Judas of James—usually, and I believe rightly, rendered Jude the brother of James: see Introduction to Jude. On the question who this James was, see on Matt. x. 3, and xiii. 55.

17.] Having descended from the mountain, He stood on a level place—i. e. possibly, as has been suggested by some, on a flat ledge or shelf on the side of the mountain, but more naturally below the mountain: see on Matt. v. 1. Whether St. Luke could thus have written with the Gospel of St. Matthew before him, I leave the reader to judge: premising, that is, the identity of the two discourses.

19.] St. Luke uses the same expression, of power going forth from our Lord, in ch. viii. 46.

20–49.] SERMON ON THE MOUNT (?) Peculiar (in this form) to Luke, answering to Matt. v.—vii. On the whole question of the identity or diversity of the two discourses, see on Matt. v. 1. In Matthew I cannot doubt that we have the whole discourse much as it was spoken; the connexion is intimate throughout; the arrangement wonderfully consistent and admirable. Here, on the other hand, the discourse is only reported in fragments—there is a wide gap between vv. 26 and 27, and there are many omissions in other parts; besides which, sayings of our Lord, belonging apparently to other occasions, are inserted; see vv. 39, 40, 45. At the same time we must remember, that such central sayings would probably be frequently uttered by Him, and might very likely form part of this discourse originally. His teaching was not studious of novelty like that of men, but speaking with authority as He did, He would doubtless utter again and again the same weighty sentences when occasion occurred. Hence may have arisen much of the difference of arrangement observable in the report—because sayings known to have been uttered together at one time, might be thrown together with sayings spoken at another, with some one common link perhaps connecting the two groups. 20. on his disciples] The discourse was spoken to the disciples generally,—to the Twelve particularly,—to the people prospectively; and its subject, both here and in Matthew, is, the state and duties of a disciple of Christ.

ye poor] To suppose that St. Luke's report of this discourse refers only to this world's poverty, &c.—and the blessings to anticipated outward prosperity in the Messiah's Kingdom, is surely quite a misapprehension. Comparing these expressions with other passages in St. Luke himself, we must have concluded, even without St. Matthew's re-port, that they bore a spiritual sense; see ch. xvi. 11, where he speaks of 'the true riches,' and ch. xii. 21, where we have rich towards God. And who would apply such an interpretation to our ver. 21?

See on each of these beatitudes the corresponding notes in Matthew.

the kingdom of God] "the kingdom of heaven," Matthew, but it does not thence follow that "heaven" is the same as "God," but the two are different ways of designating the same kingdom—the one by its situation—in heaven, where its polity is (Jerusalem which is above, Gal. iv. 26), the other by Him, whose it is.

22.] Separate and cast out must not be understood of Jewish excommunication only, but of all kinds of expulsion from society.

your name:—either your collective name as Christians,—to which St. Peter seems to refer, 1 Pet. iv. 14–16;—or, your individual name.

24.] Of course I cannot assent to any such view as that taken by Meyer and others, that these 'woes' are inserted, from later tradition; in other words, were never spoken by our Lord at all:—either we must suppose that they ought to follow Matt. v. 12, which is from the context most improbable,—or that they and perhaps the four preceding beatitudes with them, were on some occasion spoken by our Lord in this exact form, and so have been here placed in that form.

26.] Not said to the rich, but to the disciples. The very warning conveyed false prophets shews this, and should have prevented the blunder from being made. The mention of "prophets" and "false prophets" has reference to the disciples' office as the salt of the earth. The address in ver. 27 is not (Meyer) a turning of the discourse to His own disciples, but I say unto you which hear is equivalent to "But I say unto you," which introduces the same command Matt. iv. 44,—and that hear serves the purpose of the I—to you who now hear me. The discourse being in an abridged form, the strong antithesis could not be brought out.

28.] See Matt. v. 39 ff.

31.) Matt. vii-12; but here it seems somewhat out of connexion, for the sense of vv. 29, 30, has been resist not evil, whereas this precept refers to the duty of man to man, injury being out of the question.

32.] This verse again belongs to ver. 28, not to ver. 31; see Matt. v. 46 ff. 33 ff.)thank corresponds to "reward," Matthew (see note on Matt. v. 12).

35. hoping for nothing] The original word is a difficult one. Three renderings of it have been given—(1) the ordinary one, as in the text, not expecting any payment from them: so Euthymius and others. This meaning of the word is unexampled, though agreeing with the context. (2) 'causing no one to despair,' i.e. refusing no one; so the ancient Syriac version renders it. (3) 'not despairing,' i.e. 'without anxiety about the result.' This last sense of the word is best supported by examples. But as it is a word only once occurring in the New Testament, perhaps the force of the context should prevail, and the ordinary interpretation be adopted, as there is nothing in analogy to forbid the meaning.

sons of the Highest] Meyer maintains that this must mean 'sons of God' in the sense of partakers of the glory of the Messiah's Kingdom, but without reference to the state of believers in this life, which last he says is according to the usage of St. Paul, not of the three first Evangelists. But surely this is sufficiently answered by your Father in the next verse, where the actual present sonship to our heavenly Father is a reason why we should imitate Him.

36.] merciful—equivalent to "perfect," Matt. v. 48, which last is the larger description, comprehending in it charity and mercy; see note there.

37.] Matt. vii. 1, 2. The saying is much enriched and expanded here; perhaps it was so uttered by our Lord on some other occasion; for the connexion is very strict in Matthew, and would hardly bear this expansion of what is not in that place the leading idea.

38.] The similitude is taken from a very full measure of some dry thing, such as corn. That no liquid is intended by running over, as Bengel supposes, is evident—for the three present participles all apply to the same good measure, and form a climax.

shall they give] The subject of this verb answers to the unexpressed agents of it shall be measured again; such agents being indefinite, and the meaning thereby rendered solemn and emphatic; see on ch. xii. 20. If we are to find a nom., it should be the Angels, who are in this matter the ministers of the divine purposes.

This saying is found with a totally different import Mark iv. 24; one of the many instances how the Lord turned about, so to speak, the Light of Truth contained in His declarations, so as to shine upon different departments of life and thought.

39.] From this verse to the end is in the closest connexion, and it is impossible that it should consist of sayings thrown together and uttered at different times.

The connexion with what went before is not so evident, indeed the spake a parable unto them seems to shew a break. The parabolic saying, implying the unfitness of an uncharitable and unjustly condemning leader (the Lord was speaking primarily to His Apostles) to perform his office, leads to the assertion [ver. 40] that no Christian ought to assume in this respect an office of judging which his Master never assumed; but rather will every well-instructed Christian strive to be humble as his Master was. Then follows the reproof of vv. 41–43; and vv. 44, 45 and 46–49 shew us, expanded in different images, what the beam in the eye is, to which our first efforts must be directed.

Can the blind lead the blind?

See this in quite another connexion, Matt. xv. 14, where Peter answers, “Declare unto us this parable”—meaning apparently the last uttered words, which the Lord however explains not specifically, but by entering into the whole matter. I believe this parable to have been one of the usual and familiar sayings of our Lord.

40.] See above. perfect, i.e. fully instructed—perfect, in the sense of ‘well-conditioned,’ knowing what is his duty, and consistently endeavouring to do it.

41.] Some have imagined a break in the sense here, and a return to Matt. vii. 3 f.;—but the whole is in the strictest connexion; see above.

43.] The corrupt fruit answers to the “beam in the eye.” if thy life is evil, it is in the vain to pretend to teach others.

45.] Again, the closest connexion of sense and argument; nor, as some say, is this verse put here because of the similarity of the preceding verses to Matt. xii. 33 reminding the compiler of ver. 35 there. Do these expositors suppose that our Lord only once spoke each of these central sayings and with only one reference??

46–48.] The connexion goes on here also—and our Lord descends into the closest personal searching of the life and heart, and gives His judicial declaration of the end of the hypocrite, whether teacher or private Christian;—see notes on Matthew.

48.] digged, and went deep—not merely as in A.V., “digged deep,” but, as Bengel observes, the description grows as it proceeds: he dug, and deepened as he dug: was not content with one digging, but kept going deeper.

Luke: Chapter 7

CHAP. VII. 1–10.] HEALING OF THE CENTURION’ S SERVANT. Matt. viii. 5–13. In Matthew also placed after the Sermon on the Mount, but with the healing of the leper in our ch. 5. 12 ff. interposed. Our narrative is fuller than that in Matthew in the beginning of the miracle, not so full at the end. See notes on Matthew.

3.] Elders—not elders of the synagogue (who in Luke are rulers of the synagogue, “archisynagogi,” Acts xiii. 15), but of the people.

5.] himself, i.e. at his own expense.

7.] wherefore, on account of his unworthiness; which unworthiness itself may be connected with the fact, that entering his house would entail ceremonial uncleanness till the evening. St. Matthew does not express this clause, having the narrative in a form which precludes it. See notes there.

The neither brings into emphasis, not “myself,” as distinguished from others, but the whole following clause; “neither did I adopt that course.”

9.] After this there is an important addition in Matthew on the adoption of the Gentiles, and rejection of Israel who shewed no such faith.

10.] Here Matthew simply states the fact of the healing, apparently not knowing of any having been sent.

11–16.] RAISING OF A DEAD MAN AT NAIN. Peculiar to Luke. NAIN occurs no where else in the Bible. It was a town of Galilee not far from Capernaum, a few miles to the south of Mount Tabor, ‘on the northern slope of the ragged and barren ridge of Little Hermon,’ Stanley. A poor village has been found in this situation with ruins of old buildings. See Robinson, iii. 226. See Stanley’s description, Sinai and Palestine, p. 357, edn. 3.

This is one of the three greatest recorded miracles of our Lord: of which it has been observed, that He raised one (Jairus’s daughter) when just dead,—one on the way to burial,—and one (Lazarus) who had been buried four days.

12. being carried out.] The Jews ordinarily buried outside the gates of their cities. The kings however of the house of David were buried in the city of David; and it was a denunciation on Jehoiakim that he should be buried with the burial of an ass, drawn forth and cast beyond the gates of Jerusalem. Jer. xxii. 19. “One entrance alone Nain could have had; that which opens on the rough hill-side in its downward slope to the plain. It must have been in this steep descent,” &c. Stanley, as above.

14.] The bier was an open coffin. There was something in the manner of our Lord which caused the bearers to stand still. We need not suppose any miraculous influence over them.

All three raisings from the dead are wrought with words of power,—‘Damsel, arise,’—‘Young man, arise,’—‘Lazarus, come forth.’ Trench quotes an eloquent passage from Massillon’s sermons (Miracles, p. 241),—‘Elie ressuscite des morts, c’ est vrai; mais il est obligé de se coucher plusieurs fois sur le corps de l’ enfant qu’ il ressuscite: il souffle, il se rétrécit, il s’ agite: on voit bien qu’ il invoque une puissance étrangère; qu’ il rappelle de l’ empire de la mort une Tae qui n’ est pas soumise à sa voix: et qu’ il n’est lui-même le maître de la mort et de la vie. Jésus-Christ ressuscite les morts comme il fait les actions les plus communes: il parle en mattre&ceux-qui dorment d’ un sommeil éternel: et l’ on sent bien qu’ il est le Dieu des morts comme des vivants,—jamais plus tranquille que lorsqu’ il opère les plus grandes choses.’

15. he delivered him to his mother] Doubtless there was a deeper reason than the mere consoling of the widow, (of whom there were many in Israel now as before-time,) that influenced our Lord to work this miracle. Olshausen remarks, “A reference in this miracle to the raised man himself is by no means excluded. Man, as a conscious being, can never be a mere means to an end, which would here be the case, if we suppose the consolation of the mother to have been the only object for which the young man was raised.” He goes on to say that the hidden intent was probably the spiritual awakening of the youth; which would impart a deeper meaning to delivered him to his mother, and make her joy to be a true and abiding one.

16.] fear, the natural result of witnessing a direct exhibition of divine power: compare ch. v. 8.

a great prophet] For they had only been the greatest of prophets who had before raised the dead,—Elijah and Elisha; and the Prophet who was to come was doubtless in their minds.

18–35.] MESSAGE OF ENQUIRY FROM THE BAPTIST: OUR LORD’ S ANSWER, AND DISCOURSE TO THE MULTITUDES THEREON. Matt. xi. 2–19. The incident there holds a different place, coming after the sending out of the Twelve in ch. x.;—but neither there nor here is it marked by any definite note of time.

18.] all these things here may extend very wide: so may “the works of Christ” in Matthew. On the common parts, see notes on Matthew, where I have discussed at length the probable reason of the enquiry.

21.] This fact follows by inference from Matthew, ver. 4: for they could not tell John “what they saw,” unless our Lord were employed in works of healing at the time. Observe that St. Luke, himself a physician, distinguishes between the diseased and the possessed.

22 f.] Nearly verbatim as Mat-thew. The expression the dead are raised does not necessarily imply that more than one such miracle had taken place: the plural is generic, signifying that some of the class fell under that which is predicated of them.

24–28.] See Matthew.

29, 30.] It has been imagined that these words are a continuation of our Lord’s discourse, but surely they would thus be most unnatural. They are evidently a parenthetical insertion of the Evangelist, expressive not of what had taken place during John's baptism, but of the present effect of our Lord's discourse on the then assembled multitude. Their whole diction and form is historical, not belonging to discourse. See likewise a grammatical objection to this rendering in my Greek Test.

31–35.] See on Matthew, vv. 16–19.

36–50.] ANOINTING OF JESUS' FEET BY A PENITENT WOMAN. Peculiar to Luke. It is hardly possible to imagine that this history can relate to the same incident as that detailed Matt. xxvi. 6; Mark xiv. 3; John xii. 3: although such an opinion has been entertained from the earliest times. Origen mentions and controverts it. It has been held in modern times by Grotius, Schleiermacher, Ewald, and Hug: and recently by Bleek. But the only particular common to the two (unless indeed we account the name of the host to be such, which is hardly worth recounting), is the anointing itself; and even that is not strictly the same. The character of the woman,—the description of the host,—the sayings uttered,—the time,—all are different. And if the probability of this occurring twice is to be questioned, we may fairly say, that an action of this kind, which had been once commended by our Lord, was very likely to have been repeated, and especially at such a time as ‘six days before the last Passover,’ and by one anointing Him for His burial.

I may add, that there is not the least reason for supposing the woman in this incident to have been Mary Magdalene. The introduction of her as a new person so soon after (ch. viii. 2), and what is there stated of her, make the notion exceedingly improbable.

36.] The exact time and place are indeterminate—the occasion of St. Luke's inserting the history here may have been the friend of publicans and sinners in ver. 34. Wieseler places it at Nain, which certainly is the last city that has been named: but it is more natural to suppose in the city to refer only to the house before—the city where the house was. Meyer thinks that the definite article points out Capernaum. The position of the words in the city in the amended text requires a different rendering from ‘a woman in the city which was a sinner.’ We must either render, ‘which was a sinner in the city,’ i.e. known as such in the place by public repute,—carrying on a sinful occupation in the place,—or (2) regard which was in the city as parenthetic, ‘a woman which was in the city, a sinner.’ The latter seems preferable.

was is not however to be rendered as if it were “had been.” She was, even up to this time (see ver. 39), a prostitute—and this was the first manifestation of her penitence. “What wonder that such should fly to Christ, seeing that they had also come to the baptism of John?” Matt. xxi. 32 (Grotius). It is possible, that the woman may have just heard the closing words of the discourses of John, Matt. xi. 28–30; but I would not press this, on account of the obvious want of sequence in this part of our Gospel. The behaviour of the woman certainly implies that she had heard our Lord, and been awakened by His teaching.

an alabaster box: for the word, &c., see Matt. xxvi. 7.

Our Lord would, after the ordinary custom of persons at table, be reclining on a couch, on the left side, turned towards the table, and His feet would be behind Him. She seems to have embraced His feet (see Matt. xxviii. 9), as it was also the Jews' custom to do by way of honour and affection to their Rabbis (see Wetstein on this passage), and kissed them, and in doing so to have shed abundant tears, which, falling on them, she wiped off with her hair. From the form of expression in the original (see in my Greek Test.), it does not appear that this latter was an intentional part of her honouring our Lord. It was the tears, implied in the word weeping,—the tears which she shed,—not ‘her tears,’ which would be otherwise expressed. The ointment here has a peculiar interest, as being the offering by a penitent of that which had been an accessory in her unhallowed work of sin.

39.] The Pharisee assumes that our Lord did not know who, or of what sort, this woman was, and thence doubts His being a prophet (see ver. 16);—the possibility of His is knowing this and permitting it, never so much as occurs to him. It was the touching by an unclean person, which constituted the defilement. This is all that the Pharisee fixes on: his offence is merely technical and ceremonial.

40.] answering—perhaps to the disgust manifested in the Pharisee's countenance; for that must have been the ground on which the narrative relates ver. 39. We must not however forget that in similar cases “Jesus knowing their thoughts” is inserted (Matt. ix. 4), and doubtless might also have been here.

There is an inner personal appeal in the words addressing the Pharisee. The calling by name—the especial I have somewhat to say unto thee refer to the inner thoughts of the heart, and at once bring the answer Master, say on, so different from “This man, if he were a prophet.”

41.] We must remember that our Lord is here setting forth the matter primarily with reference to Simon's subjective view of himself, and therefore not strictly as regards the actual comparative sinfulness of these two before God. Though however not to be pressed, the case may have been so: and, I am inclined to think, was so. The clear light of truth in which every word of His was spoken, will hardly allow us to suppose that such an admission would have been made to the Pharisee, if it had not really been so in fact. But see more below.

two debtors] The debtors are the prominent persons in the parable—the creditor is necessary indeed to it, but is in the background. And this remark is important—for on bearing it carefully in mind the right understanding of the parable depends. The Lord speaks from the position of the debtors, and applies to their case the considerations of ordinary gratitude and justice. And in doing so it is to be noticed, that He makes an assumption for the purpose of the parable:—that sin is proportionate to the sense of sin, just as a debt is felt to the amount of the debt. The disorganisation of our moral nature, the deadly sedative effect of sin in lulling the conscience, which renders the greatest sinner the least ready for penitence, does not here come into consideration; the examples being two persons, both aware of their debt. This assumption itself is absolutely necessary for the parable: for if forgiveness is to awaken love in proportion to the magnitude of that which is forgiven, sin in such a connexion must be the subjective debt which is felt to exist, not the objective one, the magnitude of which we never can know, but God only: see on ver. 47 below.

five hundred... fifty—a very different ratio from the ten thousand talents and the hundred pence (denarii) in Matt. xviii. 21–35, because there it is intended to shew us how insignificant our sins towards one another are in comparison with the offence of us all before which of them will love him most?] The difficulty usually found in this question and its answer is not wholly removed in the subjective nature of the parable. For the sense of sin, if wholesome and rational, must bear a proportion, as indeed in this case it did, to the actual sins committed: and then we seem to come to the false conclusion, ‘The more sin, the more love: let us then sin, that we may love the more.’ And I believe this difficulty is to be removed by more accurately considering what the love is which is here spoken of. It is an unquestionable fact, if the deepest penitents are, in one kind of love for Him who has forgiven them, the most devoted;—in that, namely, which consists in personal sacrifice, and proofs of earnest attachment to the blessed Saviour end His cause on earth. But it is no less an unquestionable fact, that this love is not the highest form of the spiritual life; that such persons are, by their very course of sin, incapacitated from entering into the length, breadth, and height, and being filled with all the fulness of Christ; that their views are generally narrow, their aims one-sided:—that though love be the greatest of the Christian graces, there are various kinds of it; and though the love of the reclaimed profligate may be and is intense of its kind, (and how touching and beautiful its manifestations are, as here!) yet that kind is not so high nor complete as the sacrifice of the whole life,—the bud, blossom, and fruit,—to His service to whom we were in baptism dedicated. For even on the ground of the parable itself, in that life there is a continually freshened sense of the need, and the assurance, of pardon, ever awaking devoted and earnest love.

42. when they could not pay, he frankly forgave them both] What depth of meaning there is in these words, if we reflect WHO said them, and by what means this forgiveness was to be wrought! Observe that the could not pay is pregnant with more than at first appears:—how is this incapacity discovered to the creditor in the parable? how, but by themselves? Here then is the sense and confession of sin; not a bare objective fact, followed by a decree of forgiveness: but the incapacity is an avowed one, the forgiveness is a personal one,—them both.

In the I suppose of Simon, we have, understood, “that is, if feel as they ought.”

44–46.] It would not appear that Simon had been deficient in the ordinary courtesies paid by a host to his guests—for these, though marks of honour sometimes paid, were not (even the of the feet, except when coming from a journey) invariably paid to guests:—but that he had taken no particular pains to shew affection or reverence for his Guest. Respecting water for the feet, see Gen. xviii. 4; Judg. xix. 21. Observe the contrasts here:—water, tears,—the blood of the heart, as Augustine calls them:—thou gavest me no kiss (on the face),—eagerly kissing my feet:—with oil my head,—my feet with ointment (which was more precious).

45. since the time I came in] These words will explain one difficulty in the circumstances of the anointing: how such a woman came into the guest-chamber of such a Pharisee.

She appears by them to have entered simultaneously with our Lord and His disciples. Nor do vv. 36, 37 at all preclude this idea:—the words of the original in ver. 37 may mean, ‘having knowledge that He was going to dine,’ &c. If she came in His train, the Pharisee would not exclude her, as He was accustomed to gather such to hear Him: it was the touching at which he wondered.

47.] This verse has been found very difficult to fit into the lesson conveyed by the Parable. But I think there need be little difficulty, if we regard it thus. Simon had been offended at the uncleanness of the woman who touched our Lord. He, having given the Pharisee the instruction contained in the parable, and having drawn the contrast the contrast between the woman’s conduct and his, now assures him, ‘Wherefore, seeing this is so, I say unto thee, she is no longer unclean—her many sins are forgiven: for (thou seest that) she loved much: her conduct towards Me shews that love, which is a token that her sins are forgiven.’ Thus the clauses are not connected by the causative particle, ‘because she loved much; but, as rightly rendered in A.V., for she loved much: for she has shewn that love, of which thou mayest conclude, from what thou hast heard, that it is the effect of a sense of forgiveness.’ Thus Bengel says, “The remission of sins, not imagined by Simon, is proved by its fruit, ver. 42, which latter is evident and meets the eye, whereas the other is hidden from us”—and Calovius, “Christ was using that kind of proof which is called à posteriori.” But there is a deeper consideration in this solution, which the words of the Lord in ver. 48 bring before us. The sense of forgiveness of sin is not altogether correspondent to the sense of forgiveness of a debt. The latter must be altogether past, and a back on, to awaken, gratitude: the former, by no means so. The expectation, the desire, and hope of forgiveness, the faith of ver. 50, awoke this love; just as in our Christian life, the love daily awakened by a sense of forgiveness, yet is gathered under and summed up in a general faith and expectation, that ‘in that day’ all will be found to have been forgiven. The remission (forgiveness) of sins, into which we have baptized, and in which we live, yet waits for that great “Thy sins are forgiven thee” which He will then pronounce.

she loved much—viz. in the acts related in vv. 44–46.

Remark that the assertion regarding Simon is not “few sins are forgiven,” but “little is forgiven;” stamping the subjective character of the part relating to him:—he felt, or cared about, but little forgiveness, and his little love shewed this to be so.

49.] This appears to have been said, not in a hostile, but a reverential spirit. Perhaps the also alludes to the miracles wrought in the presence of John’s messengers.

50.—See on ver. 47. The woman’s faith embraced as her own, and awoke her deepest love on account of, that forgiveness, which the Lord now first formally pronounced.

in (lit e rally into) peace: see 1 Sam. i. 17; not only ‘in peace,’ but implying state of mind to which she might now look forward.

Luke: Chapter 8

CHAP. VIII. 1–3.] JESUS MAKES A CIRCUIT, TEACHING AND HEALING, WITH HIS TWELVE DISCIPLES, AND MINISTERING WOMEN. Peculiar to Luke. A general notice of our Lord’s travelling and teaching in Galilee, and of the women, introduced again in ch. xxiii. 55; xxiv. 10, who ministered to Him.

2.] seven devils: see ver. 30.

3.] Prof. Blunt has observed in his Coincidences, that we find a reason here why Herod should say to his servants (Matt. xiv. 2), ‘This is John the Baptist,’ &c., viz.—because his steward’s wife was a disciple of Jesus, and so there would be frequent mention of Him among the servants in Herod’s court.

This is Herod Antipas.

Joanna is mentioned again ch. xxiv. 10, and again in company with Mary Magdalene and others. Susanna is not again mentioned.

ministered, providing food, and giving other necessary attentions.

unto them, viz. the Lord and His Apostles.

4–15.] PARABLE OF THE SOWER. Matt. xiii. 1–8, 18–23. Mark iv. 1–20. For the parable and its explanation, see notes on Matthew, where I have also noticed the varieties of expression here and in Mark. On the relation of the three accounts to one another, see notes on Mark. Our Lord had retired to Capernaum,—and thither this multitude were flocking together to Him.

4.] The present participle gathering, is overlooked by the A.V.: as is also coming to him; literally coming up one after another. It was the desire of those who had been impressed by His discourses and miracles to be further taught, that brought them together to Him now. He spoke this parable sitting in a boat, and the multitude on the shore.

15.] It has been said, on Matthew, ver. 23, that all receptivity of the seed is from God—and all men have receptivity enough to make it matter of condemnation to them that they receive it not in earnest, and bring not forth fruit. But there is in this very receptivity a wide difference between men; some being false-hearted, hating the truth, deceiving themselves,—others being earnest and simple-minded, willing to be taught, and humble enough to receive ‘with meekness the engrafted word. It is of these that our Lord here speaks; of this kind was Nathanael, the Israelite indeed in whom was no guile, John i. 48: see also John xviii. 37, “Every one that is of the truth, heareth My voice,” and Trench on the Parables, in loc.

in patience—consistently, through the course of a life spent in duties, and amidst discouragements—“he that endureth unto the end, the same shall be saved,” Matt. xxiv. 13

16–18] Mark iv. 21–25, where see notes. The sayings occur in several parts of Matthew (v. 15; x. 26; xiii. 12), but in other connexions. Euthym. remarks well, “It is likely that Christ spoke such sayings as these at different times.” On the meaning of the separate sayings, see notes on the passages in Matthew. Observe that ver. 18, how ye hear is “what ye hear” in Mark, and seemeth to have is “hath” in Mark.

19–21.] THE MOTHER AND BRETHREN OF JESUS SEEK TO SEE HIM. Matt. xii, 46–50. Mark iii. 31–35. The incident is introduced here without any precise note of sequence; not so in St. Matthew, who says, after the discourse in ch. xii., “while he was yet speaking to the multitudes”...and St. Mark “There came then”...having before stated, ver. 21, that His relations went out to lay hold of Him,—for they said, “He is beside Himself.” We must conclude therefore that they have it in the exact place, and that St. Luke only inserts it among the events of this series of discourses, as indeed it was, but without fixing its place. His account is abridged, and without marks of an eyewitness, which the others have.

23–25.] JESUS, CROSSING THE LAKE, STILL THE STORM. Matt. viii. 18, 23–27. Mark iv. 35–41. The chronology of this occurrence would be wholly uncertain, were it not for the precision of St. Mark, who has introduced it by “the same day, when the even was come,” i.e. on the same day in which the preceding parables were delivered. How it has come to be misplaced in Matthew, must ever be matter of obscurity. The fact that it is so, is no less unquestionable, than the proof that it furnishes of the independence of the two other Evangelists.

22. on one of the days] This serves to shew that St. Luke had no data by which he could fix the following events. If he had seen the Gospel of St. Mark, could this have been so?

23.] came down—from the sky,—or perhaps from the mountain valleys around: see Matt. vii. 27, and note on Acts xxvii. 14.

24.] See notes on Matthew.

25.] In Matthew this reproof comes before the stilling of the storm. But our account, and that in Mark, are here evidently exact.

26–39.] HEALING OF A DEMONIAC IN THE LAND OF THE GERAENES. Matt v111. 28–34. Mark v. 1–20, in both which places see notes.

26.] over against Galilee, a more precise description than “the other side,” Matthew, or “the other side of the sea,” Mark.

27.] out of the city belongs not to met him as in A.V., but to a certain man—a certain man of the city. The man did not come from the city, but from the tombs.

I put to any reader the question, whether it were possible for either St. Mark or St. Luke to have drawn up their account from Matthew, or with Matthew before them, seeing that he mentions two possessed throughout? Would no notice be taken of this? then indeed would the Evangelists be but poor witnesses to the truth, if they could consciously allow such a discrepancy to go forth. Of the discrepancy itself, no solution has been proposed which can satisfy any really critical mind. That one should have been prominent, and the spokesman, is of course possible, but such a hypothesis does not help us one whit. Where two healings take place, narrators do not commonly, being fully aware of this, relate in the singular: and this is the phenomenon to be accounted for. It is at least reasonable to assign occurrence in such a case to the more detailed and chronologically inserted accounts of St. Mark and St. Luke.

wore no clothes is to be taken literally. The propensity to go entirely naked is a well-known symptom in certain kinds of raving madness: see Trench, Miracles, p. 167, not.

29.] he was commanding, imperfect tense: in the midst of this ordering, and as a consequence of it, the possessed man cried out, as in the last verse.

brake the bands] The unnatural increase of muscular strength is also observed in cases of raving madness (as indeed also in those of any strong concentration of the will); see Trench as above.

30.] Lightfoot (on Mark v. 9) quotes instances of the use of legion (made into a Hebrew word) for a great number, in the Rabbinical writings. The fact of many demons having entered into this wretched man, sets before us terribly the utter break up of his personal and rational being. The words will not bear any figurative rendering, but must be taken literally (see ver. 2 of this chap., and ch. xi. 24 ff.); viz. that in the same sense in which other poor creatures were possessed by one evil spirit (see note on Matthew), this man, and Mary Magdalene, were possessed by many. 31. the abyss] This word is sometimes used for Hadés in general (Rom. x. 7), but more usually in Scripture for the abode of damned spirits: see reff. This last is certainly meant here—for the request is coordinate with the fear of torment expressed above (see note on ch. xvi. 23). But, as Dr. Wordsworth remarks, we must distinguish between the abyss, the inter-mediate place of torment, and the lake of fire, into which the devil will be cast by Christ at the end: see Rev. xx. 3, 10.

35.] they went out, viz. the people in the town and country; “the whole city” Mat-thew; here understood in ver. 34. at the feet of Jesus] This particularity denotes an eye-witness. The phrases common to Mark and Luke, e.g. clothed, and in his right mind, and that they that saw it, denote a common origin of the two narratives, which have however become considerably deflected, as comparison will shew.

38, 39.] See notes on Mark.

40–56.] RAISING OF JAIRUS’ S DAUGHTER, AND THE HEALING OF A WOMAN WITH AN ISSUE OF BLOOD. Matt. ix. 1, 18–26. Mark v. 21–43. Onur account is that one of the three which brings out the most important points, and I have therefore selected it for full comment.

40.] received him—i. e. welcomed Him; the “gladly” of the A.V. is a correct comment, but is more than is in the original text.

for they were all waiting for him: here we have an eye-witness again.

41.] a ruler of the synagogue: “one of the rulers of the synagogue,” Mark;—in Matthew only “a certain ruler.”

42.] one only daughter, peculiar to Luke, but perhaps implied in The affectionate diminutive of Mark.

lay a dying] In Matthew she is represented as already dead. He is not aware of the subsequent message to Jairus, and narrates concisely and generally.

The crowd seems to have followed to see what would happen at Jairus’s house: see ver. 54

43.] St. Mark adds, that she grew nothing better, but rather worse.

44.] Her inner thoughts are given in Mark, ver. 28.

There was doubtless a weakness and error in this woman’s view;—she imagined that healing power flowed as it were magically out of the Lord’s person; and she touched the fringe of his garment as the most sacred, as well as the most accessible part: see Matt. xxiii. 5: Num. xv. 37–40. But she obtained what she desired. She sought it, though in error, yet in faith. And she obtained it, because this faith was known and recognized by the Lord. It is most true objectively, that there did go forth healing power from Him, and from his Apostles (see Mark vi. 56: Luke vi. 19: Acts v. 15; xix. 12), but it is also true that, in ordinary cases, only those were receptive of this whose faith embraced the truth of its existence, and ability to heal them. The error of her view was overborne, and her weakness of apprehension of truth covered, by the strength of her faith. And this is a most encouraging miracle for us to recollect, when we are disposed to think despondingly of the ignorance or superstition of much of the Christian world: that He who accepted this woman for her faith even in error and weakness, may also accept them.

45.] We are not to imagine that our Lord was ignorant of the woman, or any of the circumstances. The question is asked to draw out what followed.

See, on the part of Jesus Himself, an undeniable instance of this, in ch. xxiv. 19—and note there. The healing took place by His will, and owing to is recognition of her faith: see similar questions, Gen. iii. 9, and 2 Kings v. 25.

Peter and they that were with him] A detail contained only here.

On the latter part of this verse many instructive remarks have been made in sermons—see Trench, Mir., p. 192, note (edn. 2)—to the effect that many press round Christ, but few touch Him, only the faithful. Thus Augustine, “Even thus is it now with His body, i.e. His Church. She is touched by the faith of few, thought crowded by the mob of the many.” And Chrysostom, “The believer on the Saviour toucheth Him, but the unbeliever strangleth and vexeth Him.” It is difficult to imagine how the miracle should be, as Dr. Wordsworth calls it, “a solemn warning to all who crowd on Christ;” or how such a forbidding to come to Him should be reconciled with “Come unto Me all...” Rather should we say, seeing it was one of those that thus crowded on Him who obtained grace from Him, that it is a blessed encouragement to us not only to crowd on Him, but even to touch Him: so to crowd on Him as never to be content till we have grasped if it be but His garment for ourselves: not to despise or discourage any of the least of those who “make familiar addresses to Him in (so called) religious hymns,” seeing that thus some of them may touch Him to the healing of their souls. I much fear that if my excellent friend had been keeping order among the multitude on the way to the house of Jairus, this poor woman would never have been allowed to get near to Jesus. But I hope and trust that he and I shall rejoice together one day in His presence amidst a greater crowd, whom no man can number, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues.

47.] It is not necessary (though perhaps probably), from the when all denied, ver. 45, that the woman should also have denied with them. She may have hidden herself among the crowd. Our Lord (Mark, ver. 32) looked around to see “her that had done this thing”—a wonderful precision of expression, by which His absolute knowledge of the whole matter is set before us.

trembling: and more, “knowing what was done to her,” Mark; which is implied here. All this is omitted in Matthew; and if we had only his account, we should certainly derive the wrong lesson from the miracle; for there we miss altogether the reproof, and the shame to which the woman is put; and the words of our Lord look like an encomium on her act itself. Her confession before all the people, is very striking Himself openly confessed, and not only secretly sought: that our Christian life is not, as it is sometimes called, merely ‘a thing between ourselves and God;’ but a good confession, to be witnessed before all.

48.] How lovingly does our Lord re-assure the trembling woman; her faith saved her—not merely in the act of touching, but as now completed by the act of confession;—it saved her mediately, as the connecting link between herself and Christ: but the “power which went out from Him,” working through that faith, saved her energetically, and as the working cause;—“by grace, through faith,” Eph. ii. 8.

in peace] See ch. vii. 50 and note.

St. Mark’s addition, “be whole of thy plague,” is important, as conveying to her an assurance that the effect which she felt in her body should be permanent; that the healing, about which she might otherwise almost have doubted, openly ratified by the Lord’s own word.

49.] Little marks of accuracy come out in each of the two fuller accounts. Here we have there cometh one, which was doubtless the exact fact:—in Mark “there came certain,”—generally expressed. In Mark again we learn not only that Jesus heard, but that the message was not reported to Him, but He overheard it being said, which is a minute detail not given here. Nothing could more satisfactorily mark the independent authority of the two narratives.

51.] Our Lord had entered the house, where He found “a tumult, and them that wept and wailed greatly,” Mark: “the minstrels and people making a noise,” Matthew, who were all following Him into the chamber of death. On this He declared who were to follow Him, and uttered the words “Give place” &c. Matthew.—Then He entered with His three Apostles and the parents. I say this, not for the sake of harmonizing, but to bring out the sequence in our narrative here, which unless we get the right meaning for suffered no man to go in, seems disturbed.

53.] The maiden was actually dead as plainly appears from the knowing that sho was dead. The words, she is not dead but sleepeth, are no ground for surmising the contrary: see note on Matthew, ver. 24.

55.] her spirit came again: see Judges xv. 19, 1 Kings xvii. 21, in the former of which places death had not taken place, but in the latter it had; so that no inference adverse to her actual death can be derived from the use of the word.

The command to give her to eat, shews that she was restored to actual life with its wants and weaknesses; and in that incipient state of convalescence, which would require nourishment. The testimony of Mark here precludes all idea of a recovery from a mere paroxysm—“and she walked.” One who “lay at the point of death” at the time of the father’s coming, and then died, so that it could be said of the minstrels and others who had time to assemble, “knowing that she was dead,”—could not, supposing that they were mistaken and she was only in a trance, have risen up and walked, and been in a situation to take meat, in so short a time after. Every part of the narrative combines to declare that the death was real, and the miracle a raising from the dead, in the strictest sense.

56.] The injunction, however, was not observed; for we read in Matthew, “the fame hereof went abroad into all that land.”

Luke: Chapter 9

CHAP. IX. 1–5.] MISSION OF THE TWELVE. Matt. x 5–12. Mark vi. 7–13. Mark’s account agrees nearly exactly with the text. The discourse is given at much greater length in Matthew, where see notes.

7–9.] HEROD ANTIPAS HEARS OF THE FAME OF JESUS THROUGH THE DOINGS OF THE TWELVE. Matt. xiv. 1–12. Mark vi. 14–29. How inexplicable would be the omission of the death of John the Baptist, by the Evangelist who has given so particular an account of his ministry, (ch. iii. 1–20), if St. Luke had had before him the narratives of St. Matthew and St. Mark.

7.] “by him,” though not genuine, and an explanatory gloss, points to the right account of the matter. Herod (see Mark) heard the account of the miracles wrought by the Twelve; but even then it was HIS name which was spread abroad. These works were done in their Master’s Name, and in popular rumour passed for His.

9.] The repetition of “I” (which is emphatic in the original) implies personal concern and alarm at the growing fame of Jesus: see notes on Matthew.

10–17.] RETURN OF THE APOSTLES. JESUS RETIRES TO BETHSAIDA. FEEDING OF THE FIVE THOUSAND. Matt. xiv. 13–21. Mark vi. 30–44, John vi. 1–13. Compare the notes on each of these.

10.] He went in a ship (Matthew, Mark, John), of which our Evangelist seems not to have been informed; for we should gather from our text that it was by land. A great difficulty also attends the mention of Bethsaida here. At first sight, it would appear to be the well-known Bethsaida, on the western bank of the lake, not far from Capernaum. But (1) our Lord was on this side before,—see ch. viii. 37; and (2) Mark (vi. 45) relates that after the miracle of the loaves He caused His disciples to cross over to Bethsaida. But there were two places of this name:—another Bethsaida (Julias) lay at the top of the lake, on the Jordan: see Stanley, p. 381, edn. 3. Now it is very likely that our Lord may have crossed the lake to this Bethsaida, and St. Luke, finding that the miracle happened near Bethsaida, and not being informed of the crossing Of the lake, may have left the name thus without explanation, as being that of the other Bethsaida. St. Mark gives us the exact account: that the Lord and the disciples, who went by sea, were perceived by the multitude who went by land, and arrived before Him. How any of these accounts could have been compiled with a knowledge of the others, I cannot imagine.

he received them] This word includes what St. Mark tells us of His going forth from His solitude, or perhaps landing from the ship, and seeing a great multitude, and having compassion on them; he received them, i.e. did not send them away.

12.] As the Three agree in their account, and St. John differs from them, see the difference discussed in notes there. In his account, the enquiry proceeds from our Lord Himself, and is addressed to Philip, and answered by Philip and Andrew.

14. by companies of about fifty] St. Mark. gives “by hundreds and by fifties” with his usual precision.

Besides these companies, there were the women and children unarranged; see on John vi. 10.

16.] On the symbolic import of the miracle, see notes on John vi.

Immediately after this miracle, St. Matthew, St. Mark, and St. John relate the walking on the sea, which, and the whole series of events following as far as Matt. xvi. 12,—the healings in the land of Gennesaret,—the discourse about un-washed hands,—the Syrophenician woman,—the healing of multitudes by the sea of Galilee,—the feeding of the 4000,—the asking of a sign from Heaven,—and the forgetting to take bread,—are wholly omitted by our Evangelist. Supposing him to have had St. Matthew’s gospel before him, how is this to be explained? It is also an important observation, that the omission by St. Luke of the second miracle of feeding is not to be adduced against its historical reality, as some have done, since it is only omitted as occurring in the midst of a large section, which the accounts gathered by St. Luke did not contain.

18–27.] CONFESSION OF PETER. FIRST ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE PASSION AND RESURRECTION. Matt. xvi. 13–28. Mark viii. 27–ix. 1. The Lord had gone into the neighbourhood of Cæsarea Philippi;—see notes on Matthew.

19. that one of the old prophets is risen again] See ver. 8. There is no improbability, nor contradiction to St. John's account that the multitudes sought to make him a king, in our Lord's asking this question. We must remember that such enquiries were not made by Him for information, but as means of drawing out the confession of others, as here.

20.] See the important addition, the promise to Peter, in Matthew, vv. 17–19.

22.] As far as slain is nearly verbatim with Mark: the last clause nearly so with Matthew. And yet, according to the Commentators, St. Mark has compiled his account from St. Matthew and St. Luke. The almost verbal agreement of the three in so solemn and sad an announcement, is what we might expect. Such words would not be easily forgotten.

23.] to them all—” having called the multitude with His disciples,” Mark. There is no allusion to what He had said to Peter in this all.

25.] himself is “his life” in Matthew, Mark:—his life, in the highest sense.

26.] After words St. Mark adds “in this adulterous and sinful generation.” ‘The Glory is threefold: (1) His own, which He has to and for Himself as the exalted Messiah: (2) the glory of God, which accompanies Him as coming down from God’s Throne: (3) the glory of the angels, who surround Him with their brightness.’ Meyer.

27.] See note on Matthew, ver. 28.

28–36.] THE TRANSFIGURATION. Matt. xvii. 1–8. Mark ix. 2–8. I have commented on the relation of the three accounts in the notes on Mark, and on the Transfiguration itself in those on Matthew, which treat also of the additional particulars found here.

28.] about an eight days is “after six days” in Matthew and Mark, the one reckoning being exclusive, the other inclusive.

to pray] See on ch. v. 16. This Gospel alone gives us the purpose of the Lord in going up, and His employment when the glorious change came over Him.

31.] This decease is expressed in the original by the word exodus, going forth, which could be no other than His death.

which he should accomplish, literally, fulfil,—by divine appointment.

32.] Not ‘when they were awake,’ as A.V., which is not the sense of the word,—but having kept awake through the whole. The word seems to be expressly used here to shew that it was not merely a vision, seen in sleep.

33.] as they departed, i.e. while they were departing:—the words were said with a desire to hinder their departure.

not knowing what he said—from fear and astonishment—”for they were sore afraid,” Mark.

34.] There is no difference in the accounts, as has been imagined: the as they departed..., ver. 33, is only an additional particular, and the rest is exactly in accordance. Notice however the remarkable word chosen of the correct text: and compare the references,—in which places only in the New Testament the term is applied to the Son of God. Compare also Ps. lxxxix. 3. 19: Isa. xlivi. 10 (cited in Matt. xii. 18).

36.] St. Luke gives the result of our Lord’s command to them: the command itself is related in Matthew ver. 9, and Mark ver. 9.

37–42.] HEALING OF A POSSESSED PERSON. Matt. xvii. 14–21. Mark ix. 14–29. The narrative in Mark is by far the most copious and I have there commented at length on it.

37. the next day] The transfiguration probably took place at night,—see on Matt. xvii. 1,—and this was in the morning. St. Luke omits the whole discourse concerning Elias (Matthew and Mark, vv. 9–13).

38.] he is mine only child is peculiar to Luke.

43–45.] OUR LORD’ S SECOND ANNOUNCEMENT OF HIS DEATH. Matt. xvii. 22, 23. Mark ix. 30–32.

these sayings, not, as some, ‘the foregoing discourses and wonders:’—that would give no sense,—for the disciples were thinking exclusively of those already: nor strictly ‘what I am about to tell you,’ so that these sayings should be identical in meaning with “this saying” below, ver. 45: but these sayings, of which this was now the second;—‘these intimations which I make to you from time to time respecting My sufferings and death.’ The Resurrection, expressly mentioned in the others, is omitted here.

45.] The sense here is not to be evaded by forcing it, as A.V., to mean ‘so that they did not....’, but to be literally rendered, that they might not, as in Matt. i. 22 al. It was the divine purpose, that they should not at present be aware of the full signification of these words.

46–50.] JESUS REBUKES THE DISCIPLES FOR THEIR EMULATION AND EXCLUSIVENESS. Matt. xviii. 1–5. Mark ix. 33–40. The most detailed account is in Mark, where I have discussed the differences in the three narratives.

46.] There is not the least occasion to confine the word reasoning to the sense of an inward doubt and questioning in the heart of each; indeed I will venture to say that no interpreter would have thought of doing so, had not the narratives of St. Matthew and St. Mark, by mentioning an outward expression of this thought, offered a temptation to discover a discrepancy. Had our narrative stood by itself, we should have understood it, as I do now, of a dispute which had taken place or was taking place, and which, though not actually spoken out before the Lord, was yet open to His discerning eye, so that not only the words, but the disputing of their thoughts, was known to Him.

48.] The discourse as here related has the closest connexion and harmony. The dispute had been, who (among the Twelve) should be greatest,—i. e. greatest in the kingdom of heaven: for other greatness is not to be thought of,—the minds of the disciples being always on this, as just about to appear; and our Lord reminds them, that no such precedence is to be thought of among those sent in His name; for that even a little child, if thus sent, is clothed with His dignity; and if there be any distinction among such, it is this, that he who is like that child, humblest and least, i.e. nearest to the spirit of his Lord, he is the greatest.

49, 50.] On the connexion of this answer with the preceding, see on Mark. It is even more strikingly brought out here. Our Lord had declared the absolute equality of all sent in His name—and that if there were any difference, it was to be made by a deeper self-renouncing. Then arises the thought in the mind of the ardent son of Zebedee, of the exclusive and peculiar dignity of those who were thus sent, the apostles: and he relates what they had done, as a proof of his fully appreciating this exclusive dignity. The link to what has preceded, is in the words in thy name... See the rest in Mark.

51.—CHAP. XIX. 28.] INCIDENTS DURING THE LORD’s LAST JOURNEY TO JERUSALEM. We now enter upon a long and most important portion of our Gospel, peculiar in this form, and most of it entirely peculiar to St. Luke. At ch. xviii. 15 he again joins the narrative of St. Matthew and St. Mark, within a few verses of where he parted from them.

Respecting this portion, I will observe, without entangling myself in the harmonistic maze into which most of the interpreters have ventured, (1) that the whole of it is to be understood here as belonging to our Lord’s last journey from Galilee to Jerusalem; see below on ver. 51. (2) that evidently that journey was not a direct one (see ch. x. 1; xiii, 22, 31; xvii. 11; xviii. 31, and notes), either in time, or in the road chosen. (3) that in each of the two other Gospels there is a journey placed at this very time, described Matt. xix. 1, “He departed from Galilee, and came into the borders of Judea beyond Jordan,” and Mark x. 1, “He arose from thence, and cometh into the borders of Judea by the farther side of Jordan,”—which, in their narrative also, is the last journey from Galilee to Jerusalem. (4) that in John x. 22, we find our Lord at Jerusalem, at the feast of Dedication, in the winter (about the end of December), without however any hint as to how or whence He came there. (5) that the whole time between that feast and His Passion is spent thus:—After the attempt to stone Him, John x. 31, He retired to Bethany beyond Jordan (see John i. 28, corrected text); was summoned thence by the message from Martha and Mary to Bethany near Jerusalem, where He raised Lazarus;—again retired to Ephraim, somewhere beyond Jericho, on the borders of the desert;—six days before the passover came to Bethany, and the anointing took place, &c.; this whole time being three months and a few days. (6) I believe then that we have obtained a fixed critical point in all the four Gospels for the last journey from Galilee, after which He never returned (in the flesh) thither again. And this last journey was to the feast of Dedication, or at all events brought Him in time for that feast (for it does not look like a journey specially to a feast) at Jerusalem. It was between the feast of tabernacles in John vii. 2, to which He went up privately (ib. ver. 10), and the occasion when we find Him in Solomon’s porch, John x. 22. (7) The three first Evangelists relate nothing of the being in Jerusalem at the feast of dedication, or indeed at all, except at the last passover. We therefore find in them nothing of the retirements to Bethany (beyond Jordan) and Ephraim; but the removal of our Lord from Galilee to the confines of Judæa through the parts beyond Jordan is described as uninterrupted. (8) We are now I believe in a situation to appreciate the view with which our Evangelist inserts this portion. He takes this journey, beginning its narrative at the very same place where the others do, as comprehending—as indeed in strict historical fact it did—the last solemn farewell to Galilee (ch. x. 13–15), the final resolve of our Lord to go up to Jerusalem (ix. 51), and,—which in its wider sense it did,—all the records which he possessed of miracles and discourses between this time and the triumphal entry. (9) As to arranging or harmonizing the separate incidents contained in this portion, as the Evangelist himself has completely by his connecting words in many places disclaimed it (see ch. ix. 57; x. 1, 25, 38; xi. 1, 14; xii. 1; xiii. 1, 10, 22; xiv. 1, 25; xv. 1; xvii. 1, 5, 11, 20; xviii. 1, 9),—I do not suppose that we, at this distance of time, shall succeed in doing so. The separate difficulties will be treated of as they occur.

51.] The verb is not past, as A.V.—not, when the time (days) was come (accomplished), but as the days were being accomplished: i.e. approaching their accomplishment.

his receiving up can have but one meaning; see Mark xvi. 19: Acts i. 2; ii. 22: 1 Tim. iii. 16: in all which places the verb belonging to this substantive is used in the original: his assumption, i.e. ascension into heaven.

He himself resumes the subject, not without some emphasis implying his own voluntary action.

set his face is a Hebrew way of speaking, implying determinate fixed purpose; see Isa. 1. 7, the sense of which, as prophetic of the Messiah going to his sufferings, seems to be referred to in this expression.

52.] messengers, who have been assumed without reason to have been James and John.

Samaritans] On the enmity of the Jews and Samaritans, see note, John iv. 9. The publicity now courted by our Lord is in remarkable contrast to His former avoidance of notice, and is a feature of the close of His ministry, giving rise to the accusation of ch. xxiii. 5.

to make ready for him must mean something more, surely, than to provide board and lodging; there is a solemnity about the sentence which forbids that supposition. It must have been to announce the coming of Jesus as the Messiah, which He did not conceal in Samaria as in Judæa and Galilee, see John iv. 26; and the refusal of the Samaritans must have been grounded on the jealousy excited by the preference shewn for the Jewish rites and metropolis. They expected that the Messiah would have confirmed their anti-Jewish rites and Gerizim temple, instead of going up solemnly to Jerusalem, and thereby condemning them.

54.] The disciples whom He named ‘sons of thunder,’ Mark iii. 17. They saw some insult of manner, or actual refusal to allow the Lord to enter their village. That a collision of this kind did take place, is plain from the last verse, and implied from the occasion alluded to by the two Apostles, where the fire was invoked in the presence of the offending persons. It happened also in Samaria.

fire, not lightning, but fire, as in the passage alluded to, and in 1 Kings xviii. 38.

It is exceedingly difficult (see margin) to determine the true reading in this passage, which seems to have been more than usually tampered with, or wrongly written. In this great uncertainty, I have thought the candid way is to let my edited text reflect such uncertainty, and I have therefore printed these latter debateable words in the same type as the text, and have annotated on them.

55.] Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of] Besides the mistaken ways of explaining these words of our Lord (e. g. ‘Do not see what a [bad] spirit you are shewing?’) there are two senses which they may bear. (1) Affirmative, as in A.V.—“Ye think ye are influenced by the same spirit as once influenced Elias... but ye are in error. Ye have indeed a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge; the offspring of human partiality, not of divine inspiration,” Grotius; or (2) interrogative—‘Know ye not what manner of spirit ye, belong to (are of)?’ the spirit meant being the Holy Spirit. ‘The Spirit in Elias was a fiery and judicial spirit, as befitted the times and the character of God’s dealings then; but the Spirit in Me and mine is of a different kind—a spirit of love and forgiveness,’

The latter of these is perhaps better suited to the context; but the former is more according to the usage of the expression Ye know (not) in the gospels: see note in my Greek Testament. I have therefore punctuated according to the former sense: which, indeed, seems more naturally followed by the for of the clause following.

it is very interesting to remember that this same John came down to Samaria (Acts viii. 14–17) with Peter, to confer the gift of the Holy Spirit on the Samaritan believers.

57–62.] St. Matthew (viii. 19–22) relates the contents of vv. 57–60, but at a totally different period of our Lord’s ministry, viz. His crossing the lake to go to Gerasa. It is quite impossible to decide which Evangelist has placed the incidents in their proper chronological place. When we once begin to speculate on such things, it is easy to find a fitness, on whichever side of the argument we range ourselves. Only (see notes on Matthew) we must not adopt the wretched subterfuge of the harmonists, and maintain that the two events took place twice, each time consecutively, and each time with the same reply from our Lord.

57, 58.] See notes on Matthew.

59. Follow me] This command is implied in Matthew, where the reply is, as here, “Lord, suffer me first”... which words could hardly be spoken without a reference in the “first” to it.

60.] go thou and preach (literally, disseminate, go about announcing) the kingdom of God is peculiar to Luke, and shews the independence of his source of information. Am I wrong in supposing also, that it connects this incident with the sending out of the Seventy, which follows immediately afterwards?

61, 62.] Peculiar to Luke. The answer of our Lord again seems to refer to the sending out into the harvest (ch. x. 2), for which the present Seventy were as it were the ploughmen, first breaking up the ground. The saying itself is to be explained simply from agricultural operations—for he who has his hand on the plough, guiding it, must look on the furrow which his share is making—if he look behind, his work will be marred.

serviceable, not ‘fit,’ but well adapted, ‘the right sort of workman.’ The sense is more immediately applicable to the ministry of the Gospel of Christ, which will least of all things bear a divided service and backward looks,—but of course affects also every private Christian, inasmuch as he too has a work to do—ground to break, and a harvest to reap.

CHAP. X. 1-16.] MISSION OF THE SEVENTY. It is well that St. Luke has given us also the sending of the Twelve:—or we should have had some of the Commentators asserting that this was the same mission. The discourse addressed to the Seventy is in substance the same as that to the Twelve, as the similarity of their errand would lead us to suppose it would be. But there is this weighty difference. The discourse in Matt. x. in its three great divisions (see notes there), speaks plainly of an office founded, and a ministry appointed, which was to involve a work, and embrace consequences, co-extensive, both in space and duration, with the world. Here we have no such prospective view unfolded. The whole discourse is confined to the first division there (vv. 1-15), and relates entirely to present duties.

Their sending out was not to prove and strengthen their own faith,—but to prepare the way for this solemn journey of the Lord, the object of which was the announcement of the near approach of the kingdom of God,—and the termination of it, the last events at Jerusalem. Their mission being thus temporary, and expiring with their return, it is not to be wondered at that we hear nothing of them in the Acts. This last is surely an absurd objection to bring against the historic truth of their mission, seeing that the Acts are written by this same Evangelist, and the omission is therefore an argument for, and not against, that truth.

The words should not be rendered, as in A.V., ‘other seventy also,’ but as in margin, others also, seventy in number, see ch. xxiii. 32. The others may refer, either to the Twelve, ch. ix. 1, or perhaps, from the similarity of their mission, to the messengers in ch. ix. 52. But perhaps the first is more probably, from the similarity of the discourses.

The number of seventy might perhaps have reference to the seventy elders of Israel, Exod. xxiv. 1; Numb. xi. 16:—all sorts of fanciful analogies have been found out and insisted on (and moreover forced into the text), which are not worth recounting.

2.] See Matt. ix. 37 and notes.

3, 4.] The time was now one of greater danger than at the mission of the Twelve; therefore ver. 3 is bound immediately up with their present sending, whereas in Matt. x. 16 it regards a time yet distant in the future; also one requiring greater haste,—which accounts for the addition, salute no man by the way. These reasons also account for merely the healing the sick being enjoined, ver. 9.

6.] the son of peace: i.e. persons receptive of your message of peace;—see reff.

7-12.] See on Matt. x. 11-15. The particular directions here are different.

7.] in the (that) house itself (see ver. 5, where it was last spoken of, the inhabitants having been since mentioned) remain. Beware of rendering it in the same house, as A.V., which the original will not admit.

9.] The kingdom of God is come nigh unto you is a later announcement than generally, “the kingdom of God is at hand,” Matt. x. 7.

13.] In these words, which our Lord had uttered before (Matt. xi. 21 ff.), He takes His solemn farewell of the cities where the greatest number of His miracles had been done, and discourses uttered: they being awful examples of that city just described.

16.] See Matt. x. 40 and notes.

17-24.] RETURN OF THE SEVENTY. As in ch. ix. 6-10, St. Luke attaches the return of the Seventy very closely to their mission. They probably were not many days absent. They say nothing of the reception of their message,—or it is not brought out in the Gospel, as not immediately belonging to the great central object of narration; they rejoice that more power seems to be granted to them than even His words promised, seeing that He commissioned them only to heal the sick, not to cast out devils, as He did the Apostles, ch. ix. 1. That this was a ground of joy not to be prominently brought forward, is the purport of our Lord's answer; the whole of which as far as ver. 24 inclusive is in the strictest connexion, and full of most weighty and deep truth.

17.] The fact that it was in thy name is perhaps too much lost sight of in the words unto us here—the disciples rejoice in their own endowment, and the source of it is put into the background.

18.] We may understand these words in two ways: (1) we may say, that in this brief speech our Lord sums up by anticipation, as so often in the discourses in John, the whole great conflict with and defeat of the power of evil, from the first, even till accomplished by His own victory. The words, I beheld Satan as lightning fall from heaven, refer to the original fall of Satan, when he lost his place as an angel of light, not keeping his first estate; which fall however had been proceeding ever since step by step, and shall do so, till all things be put under the feet of Jesus, who was made lower than the angels. And this I beheld belongs to the period before the foundation of the world when He abode in the bosom of the Father. He is to be (see ver. 22) the great Victor over the Adversary, and this victory when Satan fell from heaven. At the same time it may be doubted whether it is not (2) grammatically more correct, to refer the imperfect tense, I beheld, was beholding, to the time just past,—to the Lord's prophetic sight at the time of the ministering of the Seventy. If this view be correct, the words do not refer to any "triumph just gained," but to the Lord's glorious anticipations of final triumph, felt during the exercise of power by His servants.

as lightning] Not the suddenness only of the fall, but the brightness of the fallen Angel is thus set forth. The description is not figurative, but literal; i. e., as far as divine words can be said to be literal, being accommodated to our sensuous conceptions. See on this verse, Isa. xiv. 9-15, to which the words have a reference; and Rev. xii. 7-12.

19.] Our Lord here,—including all the evil and poison in nature in the power of the enemy,—from the power given Him over that enemy, asserts the gift to them, extended afterwards to all believers (Mark xvi. 18), of authority to ‘bruise the head of the serpent’ (Gen. iii. 15). There is an evident allusion to Ps. xci. 13.

20.] The connexion is—‘seeing that the power Which I grant to you is so large, arising from my victory over the enemy,—make not one particular department of it your cause of joy, nor indeed the mere subjection of evil to you at all—but this,—the positive and infinite side of God's mercy and goodness to you, that He hath placed you among His redeemed ones.’

the spirits is something different from the devils (daemons) in those words above, and denotes a wider range of influence—influence over spirit for good—whereby the “spiritual things of wickedness” (so literally in Eph. vi. 12) are subjected to the believers in Christ.

written in heaven is an expression in various forms frequent in Scripture, and is opposed to “written in earth,” Jer. xvii. 13, said of the rebellious. But no immutable predestination is asserted by it;—in the very first place where it occurs, Exod. xxxii. 32, 33, the contrary is implied:—see Ps. lxix. 28; Isa. iv. 3; Dan. xii. 1; Phil. iv. 3; Heb. xii. 23; Rev. iii. 5, xiii. 8, xx. 12, 15. The words your names seem to be a reference to in thy name above, which perhaps was with them a medium of self-praise, as so often with Christians, Our Lord says, ‘the true cause of joy for you is, not the power shewn forth by or in you in My Name, but that you, your names, are in the book of life’—as testified by the Spirit which “beareth witness with our spirit that we are children of God,” Rom. viii. 16. And this brings us to ver. 21, where our Lord rejoices in the revelation of these things even to the babes of the earth by the will and pleasure of the Father:—these things—not, the power over the enemy—but all that is implied in written in heaven.

This, which is the true cause of joy to the believer, causes even the Saviour Himself to triumph, anticipating Isa. liii. 11.

21.] The words the holy, before spirit, cannot well be excluded from the text; the expression as thus standing, is alone in the New Testament, but is agreeable to the analogy of Scripture: compare Rom. i. 4; Heb. ix. 14; 1 Pet. iii. 18: see also Rom. xiv. 17: 1 Thess. i. 6.

The ascription of praise, and the verses following, are here in the very closest connexion, and it is perfectly unimaginable that they should have been inserted in this place arbitrarily. The same has been said of their occurrence in Matt. xi. 25; and, from no love of harmonizing or escaping difficulties, but from a deep feeling of the inner spirit of both discourses, I am convinced that our Lord did utter, on the two separate occasions, these weighty words; and I find in them a most instructive instance of the way in which such central sayings were repeated by Him. It was not a rejoicing before (in Matthew), but only a confession: compare the whole discourse and notes. That the introductory words in that hour, or “at that time,” may have been introduced from one passage into the other, and perhaps by some one who imagined them the same, I would willingly grant, if needful; not that, in the presence of such truths, such a trifle is worth mention, but that the shallow school of modern critics do mention, and rest upon such. On vv. 21, 22, see notes on Matt. xi. 25–27, observing here the gradual narrowing of the circle to which our Lord addresses himself, ver. 22 (margin),—then ver. 23 the same, with privately added.

23.] This verse should not be marked off from ver. 22 by a new paragraph, as is done in the A.V.: much less, as in the Gospel for the 13th Sunday after Trinity, joined with what follows: except perhaps that the lesson taught us by its occurring there is an appropriate one, as shewing us how the grace of Christian love, which is the subject of the following parable, fulfils and abounds over, legal obedience. It is in connexion with the preceding, and comes as the conclusion after the thanksgiving in ver. 21. A similar saying of our Lord occurs Matt. xiii. 16, 17, but uttered altogether on a different occasion and in a different connexion.

24. prophets and kings] David united both these, also Solomon. There may be an especial reference to the affecting last words of David, 2 Sam. xxiii. 1–5, which certainly are a prophecy of the Redeemer, and in which he says, ver. 5, “This is all my salvation, and all my desire, though he make it not to grow:”—see also Gen. xl ix. 18.

25–37.] QUESTION OF A LAWYER: THE PARABLE OF THE GOOD SAMARITAN. Peculiar to Luke. As Stier remarks, it is well that St. Luke has related the other incident respecting an enquiry of the same kind, for the critics would be sure to have maintained that this incident was another report of Matt. xix. 16. Such clear cases as this should certainly teach us caution, in cases where no such proof is given of the independence of the different narratives: and should shew us that both questions addressed to our Lord, and answers from Him, were, as matter of fact, repeated.

See however a case to which this remark does not apply, ch. ix. 57 ff.

25.] No immediate sequence from ver. 24 is implied.

lawyer, a kind of scribe—“a doctor of the law,” ch. v. 17—whose especial office it was to teach the law, see Tit. iii. 13; “one of the scribes,” Mark xii. 28. There is no reason to suppose that the lawyer had any hostile intention towards Jesus,—rather perhaps a self-righteous spirit (see ver. 29), which wanted to see what this Teacher could inform him, who knew so much already. Thus it was a tempting or trying of Jesus, though not to entangle Him: for whatever had been the answer, this could hardly have followed.

what shall I do?] He doubtless expects to hear of some great deed; but our Lord refers him back to the Law of which he is a teacher.

26. how readest thou? A common rabbinical formula for eliciting a text of Scripture.

how? i.e. to what purport; so that the answer should contain a summary of his reading in the Law.

27.] The first part of this, together with Deut. xi. 13 ff., the Jews had written on their phylacteries, and recited night and morning: but not the second; so that the idea that Jesus pointed to the phylactery of the lawyer, will not hold.

Meyer thinks the man answered thus, because he had before heard our Lord cite these in connexion, and with an especial view to asking the question “who is my neighbour?” It may have been so;—but I should rather believe the same spirit with which he began, to have carried him on to this second question. The words willing to justify Himself seem to imply this; but see below.

29.] Meyer explains this: The questioner, having been by our Lord’s enquiry, “how readest thou?” himself thrown into the position of the answerer, yet, “willing to justify himself,” wishing to carry out the purpose with which he asked at first, and to cover what otherwise would be his shame at being answered by so simple a reply, and that his own,—asks, “who is my neighbour?”—I may observe that we need not take the whole of this explanation, but may well suppose that “to justify himself” may mean, ‘to get himself out of the difficulty:’ viz. by throwing on Jesus the definition of one’s neighbour, which was very narrowly and technically interpreted among the Jews, excluding Samaritans and Gentiles.

30.] answering, literally, taking him up,—implies that the question was made an occasion of saying more than the mere answer.

went down, both because Jerusalem was higher, and because ‘to go up’ is the usual phrase for journeying towards a metropolis.

from Jerusalem to Jericho, about 150 stadia (i. e. about 18 miles 6 furlongs) distant. The road through a wilderness (Josh. xvi. 1) which was notorious for the robberies committed there. “Arabs,... which race, given to habits of plunder, to this day infests the borders of Palestine, and lies in wait for travellers from Jerusalem to Jericho, as our Lord relates in the Gospel.” Jerome, Commentary on Jer. iii. 2. The same Father, who lived for many years in the neighbourhood, mentions that a part of the road was so infamous for murders, as to be called the red or bloody way, and that in his time there was a fort there garrisoned by Roman soldiers, to protect travellers.

stripped him, not merely of his clothing, but of all he had;—“despoiled him,” as the Vulgate renders it.

31.] Many priests journeyed this way, for Jericho was a priestly city; this man is perhaps represented as having been up to Jerusalem in the order of his course, and returning.

The Law and Prophets enjoined the act of mercy which this priest refused; see Exod. xxiii. 4, 5: Deut. xxii. 1–4; Isa. lviii. 7, not, it is true, literally,—and therefore he neglected it. He did not even go up to him to examine him, but passed by on the opposite side of the road.

32.] The Levite, the inferior minister of the law, did even worse; when he was at the place, he came and saw him;—came near, and then passed, as the other.

33–35.] The Samaritans were entirely, not half, Gentiles.

Why our Lord mentions the name here, see below.

had compassion] This was the great difference between the Samaritan and the others;—the actions which follow are but the expansion of this compassion.

oil and wine] These were usual remedies for wounds in the East; Galen, cited by Wetstein, prescribes thus for a wound in the head. “Rub down the tenderest leaves of the olive,—pour in oil and red wine, and make a plaster.”—see also Isa. i. 6.

on his own beast, thereby denying himself the use of it.

This is the only place where an inn, as we understand the word, a house for reception of travellers kept by a host, as distinguished from an empty caravan-serai, is mentioned. The Rabbinical writers frequently speak of such, but under a name adopted from this Greek word. Bleek remarks that this serves to shew, that there were such inns in, that neighbourhood, though certainly they were not frequent.

two denarii] Some see in this, two days' wages. See note on Matt. xx. 2.

36.] It will be observed that our Lord not only elicits the answer from the questioner himself, but that it comes in an inverted form. The lawyer had asked, to whom he was to understand himself obliged to fulfil the duties of neighbourhood? but the answer has for its subject one who fulfilled them to another. The reason of this is to be found,—partly in the relation of neighbourhood being mutual, so that if this man is my neighbour, I am his also;—but chiefly in the intention of our Lord to bring out a strong contrast, by putting the hated and despised Samaritan in the active place, and thus to reflect back the likewise more pointedly. “Observe, that the was neighbour; is literally became neighbour. The neighbour Jews became strangers, the stranger Samaritan became neighbour, to the wounded traveller. It is not place, but love, which makes neighbourhood.” Wordsworth.

37.] The lawyer does not answer—‘The Samaritan:’ he avoids this; but he cannot avoid it in conviction and matter of fact.

do thou likewise, i.e. ‘count all men thy neighbours, and love them as thyself.’

The student accustomed to look at all below the surface of Scripture, will not miss the meaning which lies behind this parable, and which—while disclaiming all fanciful allegorizing of the text—I do not hesitate to say that our Lord Himself had in view when He uttered it. All acts of charity and mercy done here below, are but fragments and derivatives of that one great act of mercy which the Saviour came on earth to perform. And as He took on Him the nature of us all, being ‘not ashamed to call us brethren,' counting us all His kindred,—so it is but natural that in holding up a mirror (for such is a parable) of the truth in this matter of duty, we should see in it not only the present and prominent group, but also Himself and His act of mercy behind. And thus we shall not (in spite of the scoffs which are sure to beset such an interpretation, from the superficial school of critics) give up the interpretation of the Fathers and other divines, who see in this poor traveller, going from the heavenly to the accursed city (Joab. vi. 26: 1 Kings xvi. 34),—the race of man, the Adam who fell;—in the robbers and murderers, him who was a murderer the beginning (John viii. 44);—in the treatment of the traveller, the deep wounds and despoilment which we have inherited from the fall;—in the priest and the Levite passing by, the in-efficacy of the law and sacrifice to heal and clothe us: Gal. iii. 21 (Trench remarks that the Church, by joining the passage Gal. iii. 16–23 as Epistle, with this Parable as Gospel for the 13th Sunday after Trinity, has stamped this interpretation with her approval):—in the good Samaritan, Him of whom it was lately said, “Say we not well that thou art a Samaritan, and hast a devil?” (John viii. 48)—who came to bind up the broken-hearted, to give them the oil of joy for mourning (Isa. lxi. 1 ff.);—who for our sakes became poor, that we through His poverty might become rich: who, though now gone from us, has left with us precious gifts, and charged His ministers to feed His lambs, promising them, when the chief Shepherd shall appear, a crown of glory that fadeth not away (1 Pet. v. 2, 4). Further perhaps it is well not to go;—or, if we do, only in our own private meditations, where, if we have the great clue to such interpretations, knowledge of Christ for ourselves, and a sound mind under the guidance of His Spirit,—we shall not go far wrong. But minutely to allegorize, is to bring the sound spiritual interpretation into disrepute, and throw stumbling-blocks in the way of many, who might otherwise arrive at it.

38–42.] ENTERTAINMENT OF OUR LORD AT THE HOUSE OF MARTHA AND MARY. It surely never could be doubted who this Martha and Mary were, nor where this took place,—but that the harmonizing spirit has so beclouded the sight of our critics. Bengel believes them not to be the sisters of Lazarus, but another Martha and Mary somewhere else;—and this in spite of the deep psychological identity of characters which meets us in John xi. xii.

Greswell, still more strangely, believes the persons to be the same, but that they had another residence in Galilee. I shall, as elsewhere, take the text in its most obvious and simple interpretation, and where nothing definite is inserted in it, throw light on it from what we know from other sources. And I believe most readers will agree with me in taking these for the sisters of Lazarus, and the village for Bethany.

38.] as they went need make no difficulty—the whole of the events related in this section of the Gospel are allotted, as in the widest sense they belonged to the last journey of our Lord from Galilee, which ended in the triumphal entry into Jerusalem;—see note on ch. ix. 51 ff. Jesus, as we know that He afterwards did, so now probably, when at Jerusalem (at the feast of Dedication), abode at Bethany. He ‘loved’—(only used in this sense by John with regard to this family and to himself)—Martha and Mary and Lazarus—and this word implies surely hospitality and intercourse.

a certain woman] It does not follow that Martha was a widow; the incident brings out the two sisters, and therefore no others are mentioned. She may have had a husband or a father living. At all events, it is a consistency belonging to real life, that we find the same person prominent in the family in John, as here.

39.] It does not appear that the meal had begun; far rather is it likely that Martha was busy about preparing it. Mary sat at the Lord’s feet, as His disciple, while He was discoursing.

41, 42.] The repetition of her name indicates reproof.

thou art careful (it is the same word as that in Matt. vi. 25, &c., and there rendered “to take anxious thought”) expresses the inner anxiety:—troubled, the outer bustle and confusion.

one thing] Perhaps we should not express the two words more definitely, for fear of narrowing the wide sense in which are spoken. I can hardly doubt that our Lord, in the first and most obvious meaning indicated that simpler preparation would have been all that was needful, but the many leads to the one, and that to the good part, the “one” being the middle term of comparison between the natural “many” and the spiritual “good part.” So that the whole will imply—only within the circle of Christ’s disciples, those who act from love (mistaken or otherwise) to Him—much as John vi. 27,—and will set before us the bread which perisheth on one hand, and that which endureth to everlasting life on the other. The good portion is the one thing which is needful—see John vi. 53,—the feeding on the bread of life by faith; which faith cometh by hearing, hearing by the word of Christ, which Mary was now receiving into her soul, and which (John vi. 54) shall never be taken away, but result in ever-lasting life.

The two types of character have ever been found in the Church; both, caring for Him, and for love to Him doing what they do: but the one busy and restless, anxious, and stirring; the other quiet and humble, content to sit at His feet and learn. We see here which of the two He praises. But on the other hand we must not derive any argument hence against an active Christian life of doing good: this is, in fact, to sit at His feet and learn—to take His yoke on us, and learn of Him. It is the bustling about the many things of which there is no need, which is blamed; not the working out the fruits of the Spirit, which are needful, being

Luke: Chapter 11

CHAP. XI. 1–13.] JESUS TEACHES THE DISCIPLES TO PRAY. The locality and time of the following incident are alike indefinite. The only limits are those of the great journey which is the subject of this section. There is no reason for supposing this to be the only occasion on which the Lord delivered this prayer to His disciples. In the Sermon on the Mount, it stands in close connexion with what goes before;—and here also. In so weighty a summary of His teaching as that was, He was not likely, when speaking of prayer, to omit it;—when asked by His disciples to teach them to pray, He was not likely to depart from the form once given them. Such are ordinary probabilities, antecedent to every question affecting the two Gospels: and those critics who throw aside all such, are far more prejudiced in reality, than those who allow them full weight. “The peculiar and abridged form in Luke,” says Meyer, “is a proof that the apostolic Church did not use the Lord’s prayer as a form” Rather, we may say, a proof of the fidelity with which our Evangelist reproduced his original not correcting them, as others after him did, to suit the forms most probably in use. If the apostolic Church did not use the Lord’s Prayer as a form, —when did its use begin, which we find in every known Liturgy?

1.] as John also.... of this fact we know nothing beyond the allusion here.

2.] When ye pray say.... more definite than “after this manner pray ye....” in Matthew. On the prayer itself, see notes on Matt. vi. 9–13. The clauses printed in brackets in the text could hardly by any possibility have been omitted by any, had they ever formed a part of it. The shorter form, found in the Vatican, the most ancient of all our MSS., and in the recently published Sinaiitic MS., was the original one: then the copyists inserted the clauses which were not found here, taking them from St. Matthew. That this, and not the converse process, must have been the one followed, is evident to any one who considers the matter. Stier’s argument, that our text has not been conformed to Matthew, because the doxology has never been inserted here, seems to me to tend in quite another direction: the doxology was inserted there, because that was form in general liturgical use, and not here, because this form was never used liturgically. 3.] literally.... for that day’s need, or, for that day.

4.] for we also.... expressed here more strongly than in Matthew, as the plea for the exercise of the divine forgiveness to us,—‘for it is our own practice also to forgive:’ but notice the difference—there is no sin in this second case, between man and man, only the ordinary business word of this world.

5.] Now follows a parable on continuing instant in prayer, of the same nature as that in ch. xviii. 2. ff. In both parables, the argument is that called à fortiori; ‘if selfish man can be won by prayer and importunity to give, and unjust man to do right, much more certainly shall the bountiful Lord bestow, and the righteous Lord do justice,’ Trench; who further remarks, that here intercessory prayer is the subject of the parable; there, personal. And, that we must remember that all reluctance on the part of God to answer our prayers is not real, but apparent only, and arises from deeper reasons working for our good: whereas the reluctance in these two parables is real, arising from selfishness and contempt of justice.

6. in his journey] In the East it was and is the custom to travel late at night, for coolness sake.

Why three loaves does not appear. I forbear to give the allegorical interpretations of the number, which abound: the significance of the thing asked for, see below on ver. 13.

7.] We have an interesting fragment of domestic life here given us. The door is ‘barred,’ not only ‘shut;’ there is the trouble of unbarring it: the father and children are in bed (observe how in all the parables which place the Father, or the Husband, before us, the Mother, or the Bride, does not appear); and he cannot (i. e. will not, cannot from being overcome by reluctance) rise and give to him.

8.] The word is too mildly rendered in the A.V. by ‘importunity.’ It should be, as in margin, shamelessness. It is presupposed here that the postulant goes on knocking and asking.

9.] What follows is in the closest connexion, and will not bear the idea that it is transferred here merely as being appropriate. The asking, seeking, knocking, all answer to the features of the parable.

10.] declares to us not merely a result observable here among men, (in which sense it is not universally true.) but a great law of our Father’s spiritual Kingdom: a clause out of the eternal Covenant, which cannot be changed.

11–13.] Our Lord sets forth the certainty of our obtaining the Holy Spirit, (the unspeakable gift, in which all other good gifts are included,) from our Father, by another ‘à fortiori’ argument, drawn from the love of earthly parents, so far less careful and tenderly wise than He is over His children.

For the rest, see notes on Matt. vii. 7 ff. The egg and scorpion are added here. The serpent and scorpion are the positively mischievous: the samples, ch. x. 19, of the “power of the enemy”—the stone, that which is simply unfit for food. So that God’s answers to our prayers consist of neither useless nor mischievous things, but of His best gift—His Holy Spirit—in all the various and fitting manifestations of His guidance, and consolation, and teaching, in our lives. This is (because this takes of and imparts to us by leading us continually to Him who is) the “bread” of the parable;—the “father of the family” is the Father from Heaven, with whom however the night is as the day, who never slumbers nor sleeps. It has been noticed how by the hungry traveller coming to the man, may be imported, in the depth of the parable, the awakening in a man’s own soul (which is so precious to him) of that hunger which he has nothing to satisfy, and which none but God can satisfy. The reader may, as in the foregoing parable, follow out this clue for himself (provided it be done soberly) with much interest and profit.

Notice that when we address God (Matt. vi. 9), He is “Our Father (which is) in heaven”—when He answers us, He is the Father from heaven. In the former case, we go up into Him and His abode; in the latter He comes down to us.

14–36.] ACCUSATION OF CASTING OUT DEVILS BY BEELZEBUB, AND DEMAND OF A SIGN FROM HEAVEN, OUR LORD’S DISCOURSE THEREUPON. Matt. xii, 22–45. Mark iii. 23–30. The reasonings of Mr. Greswell to shew that St. Luke relates an entirely different incident from St. Matthew and St. Mark, able and well conducted as they are, fail to carry conviction to my mind. The marks of identity are too many and striking to be mistaken; and on the plan of discrimination which he has adopted, I am persuaded that we might prove four distinct Crucifixions and Resurrections to have happened just as easily. Besides, it is quite impossible to carry the hypothesis throughout this section of St. Luke’s Gospel: and when it has been once given up, a considerable difference is made in the way of regarding the various narrations. On the side of which Evangelist the strict accuracy lies, it is next to impossible for us now to decide. I am inclined to think that the section from ch. xi. 14–xii. 53 (or rather perhaps 59) is a connected whole, or, at all events, is intended to form such. But then the whole is introduced (ver. 14) without any mark of connexion with the preceding, and terminated as abruptly. On the other hand, the narrative in Matthew is introduced by his usual “Then” following upon a very general description of a retirement of our Lord, and His being pursued by multitudes, all of whom He healed; but whether the multitudes are the same, and the “then” meant to specify that this incident occurred then and there, is by no means certain. Nor is the close of the section (xii. 50) bound very closely to xiii. 1, which commences “In that day” (not as the A.V., see margin), and can hardly be said with certainty to define the very same natural day. We may observe that the attendant circumstances, as introduced and closed in Mark iii. 20; iv. 1, are equally indeterminate. I therefore leave the difficulty where I found it, and where I believe it will ever remain, during our present state of imperfection: only observing, that the important incident and discourse grounded on it are no way thereby invalidated in authority. It seems to have been a portion of the evangelic history, the position of which was not exactly and satisfactorily fixed; of which there have been already some instances (see ch. ix. 57–62), and there are, as will be seen, yet more as we proceed

14.] dumb—and blind, Matthew, ver. 22, where see notes on all the common matter.

15. some of them] No inference can here be drawn that these persons were not Pharisees (as Greswell has done), and consequently that the charge proceeded from a different quarter.

16.] This is not mentioned here by St. Matthew, but further on in the discourse, ver. 38. No distinction can be drawn, as Greswell has done, for the purpose of maintaining that the two incidents were distinct, between “a sign” and “a sign heaven:” for (1) our Lord answers the demand in both places by the same reply, the sign of Jonas; see also Matt. xvi 1–4; and (2) the ordinary Jewish idea attached to a sign would imply from heaven: see notes on Matt. xvi. 1.

17.] knowing their thoughts: so Matthew also, ver. 25.

20.] with the finger of God] “by the Spirit of God,” Matthew. No distinction can be established, as Greswell attempts. The one expression explains the other. What was done (Hebraistically speaking) by the finger of God, was done by the Spirit of God. We have much greater variations than this in sayings demonstrably the same.

21.] This parabolic sentence is in close connexion with many prophetic sayings, Isa. xl. 10 marg., liii. 12, and most pointedly Isa. xlix. 24, 25. It will be remembered that the Baptist called the Lord by this name, a stronger, or one who is mightier—placing after it, it is true, “than I,” but still using it as indicative of the Almighty of the Son of God, rather than in comparison with himself.

The strong man is the adversary, Satan; his palace this present world,—John xii. 81; xiv. 80; xvi. 11. His goods or tools, or spoils—are the sons of men,—2 Tim. ii, 26; 1 John v. 19 (margin). With these he is clothed and armed, or rather with their evil capacities, which he furnishes and brightens for his use: with this whole armour of the devil, compare by way of contrast, the “whole armour of God,” Eph. vi. 11–20. Without these arms and tools he would be powerless: the evil one must have evil men —something receptive of evil—to work upon. But these the Stronger than he takes from him, and divides his spoils, Isa. lii. 12. He divides his spoils—turns to His own use and that of His followers all that good which the enemy had corrupted into evil.

The Stronger had already come into the strong man's house—the the Saviour, into the world—and was robbing him of his captives, and making them into His own disciples—e. g. Mary Magdalene and others: but the work was not fully completed yet, till the Lord, by and in His death, overcame him that had the power of death, i.e. the devil. And that His great victory is still proceeding;—He is still taking from him one and another,—rescuing the sons of men by the power of His Gospel, till the end, when He shall (Rev. xx. 1 ff) bind him in the abyss; and though he be loosed for the final conflict by His sufferance, shall cast him overthrown into the lake of fire forever. Rev. xx. 14.

27, 28.] This little but most instructive incident, here interposed, serves to shew the originality of St. Luke's account, and that, whatever its position may be, it is itself of the highest authority. The woman apparently was influenced by nothing but common-place and unintelligent wonder at the sayings and doings of Jesus:—and she broke out, with true womanly feeling, into a blessing of the mother who bare such a wonderful Teacher. Such seems to be the account of the incident itself.

Our Lord's reply is indeed wonderful:—

(1) In reproof. He corrects in her the unapprehensiveness of His word, which had caused her to go no further into the meaning of it than this ordinary eulogy imported,—and gives her an admonition how to profit better by it in the future.

(2) In humility. He disclaims all this kind of admiration, for his humanity: and says not ‘my word,’ but the word of God, which is in fact the same, but takes the view off from Him in His abasement, unto the Father who sent Him.

(3) In truth. He does not deny the honour hereby pronounced upon His mother, but beautifully turns it to its true side—viz. that which was given her long since—blessed is she that believed, ch. i. 45. Her blessedness consisted not so much in being His mother, as in her lowly and faithful observance of the word of the Lord spoken to her; see ch. ii. 19, 51. Nor again does He deny that to have borne Him was an honour—yes, rather:—‘yes, indeed, but.’

(4) In prophetic discernment. It will be seen that this answer cuts at the root of all worship of Mary, and shews us in what the true honour of that holy woman consisted,—in faith and obedience. As the mother of the Lord, she represents our human race, unto whom a child is born, a son is given; no individual exclusive honour is due to her, any more than to Cornelius, who was singled out from the Gentile world, and honoured by an angelic message relative to the divine purposes:—if she were, as there is every reason to conclude she was, a believer in her Son, the Son of man, she bore Christ in a far higher and more blessed sense than by being His mother in His humanity. And this honour may all believers in Him partake of with her; therefore the Lord says not “she that heareth...” but they that hear. The last and boldest perversion of these words of our Lord by Father Newman, viz., that He thus does but still further exalt her honour, in that, besides being His mother, she heard His word and kept it, need only be mentioned, to show the follies to which able men are abandoned, who once desert truth and simplicity.

29.] This is now in answer to those who sought of Him a sign from Heaven. When the multitude were gathering...perhaps in expectation, as He paused in His discourse, that the sign was now about to be shewn:—see notes on Matthew for the main subject.

Here we have one part of the sign of Jonas brought out, which is not touched on in Matthew, viz. his preaching after his resurrection to the Ninevites, announcing—for that would necessarily be involved in that preaching—the wonderful judgment of God in bringing him there,—and thus making his own deliverance, that he might preach to them, a sign to that people; which sign (ver. 32) they received, and repented;—but more than Jonas, a greater sign by far, this generation shall reject.

32.] Not ‘a greater than Jonas,’ or ‘than Solomon:’ but Jonah here is used as equivalent to the sign of Jonah,—so that more applies to Him who is the sign to this generation:—a sign, greater, both in its actuality, its significance, and its consequences. The order, here, seems to be for the sake of climax;—for the undervaluing and not appreciating His wisdom, will not lie so heavy on them in the judgment, as the rejection of His preaching of repentance.

33—36.] Our Lord goes on to speak of His teaching and miracles, which this generation despised, and demanded a sign from heaven in preference; He tells them that they will not see the significance of them, because they shut the eyes of their understanding, which should be the light of the soul;—this is set before them in a parable concerning the light of the body, which is the outward eye. The sentences are repeated from the Sermon on the Mount, see Matt. v. 15; vi. 22 f. (where see notes on all that is common), and ch. viii. 16; but, as has been shewn, the truth shines from a different side of them here.

33.] a secret place—more properly, a crypt, or covered passage.

36.] It has been said of this verse by a very able expositor (De Wette) that it is “tautological: the second member contains the same assertion as the first.”—Let us examine this. ‘When thine eye is single (ver. 34),—i. e. simple,—straight and single-seeing,—thy whole body will be light.’ Then (ver. 36),—‘if this be so,—if thy whole body be light, having no part dark,—then it shall all be light as when a lamp with its brightness illuminates thee.’ Of what is our Lord speaking? Of His teaching, as apprehended by the simple, single-seeing soul. If then the soul be so,—having no part darkened by prejudice or selfish lusts, and approach thus to His teaching, it shall be wholly illuminated by it, as by the candle of the Lord, searching its inward parts. So this saying, which, even as it stands, is not tautological,—for the second clause expresses the further result and waxing onward of the shining light, arising from the singleness of the eye,—becomes, in its spiritual significance, a weighty declaration of truth, answering to ch. viii. 16:—see also John viii. 12.

37–54.] DISCOURSE AGAINST THE PHARISEES. There can be no antecedent improbability in the supposition that our Lord spoke on various occasions, and with various incidental references, the component parts of that great anti-pharisaic discourse contained in Matt. xxiii. That was spoken in the temple, during the last week of His ministry; it formed the solemn close of His public teaching,—and at the end of it He departed out of the temple to return no more. I do not think it possible to suppose any part of that discourse in Matthew to be related otherwise than in its true place; all probability is against such an idea,—and so is the character of the reports of discourses in that Gospel, in general so strictly coherent and exact. There is then but one supposition left, unless we suppose St. Luke to have put together at random a number of fragments, and to have inserted them here, creating as occasion for them (for it amounts to this), which is equally inconceivable. And that is, that our Lord spoke at this meal, the occasion being the wonder of the Pharisee at His not washing before sitting down to meat, parts of that discourse, with which He afterwards solemnly closed His public ministry. See throughout, notes on Matt. xxiii.

37. to dine] This meal, as also that in John xxi. 12, 15, was not what we now understand by dinner, an afternoon meal, but the first meal of the day, the breakfast or dejeuner in the prime of the morning. We may retain dine (indeed we have no other fitting word) provided we remember this.

38.] The expression of this wonder is not stated, but it is probable that it found expression in some open way. Our Lord would hardly have so suddenly begun, ye Pharisees, unless something had been said, to which by assent they were parties. See His proceeding when nothing was said,—ch. vii. 39, 40.

washed] literally baptized. This use of the word shews that it did not imply necessarily immersion of the whole body;—for it was only the hands which the Pharisees washed before meat.

39.] There is not the least improbability or incongruity in our Lord’s having thus spoken as a guest at a meal (as some of the German Commentators maintain);—His solemn work of reproof and teaching was never suspended out of mere compliment,—nor were the intentions of the Pharisees towards Him so friendly as these invitations seem to imply. They were given mostly from deference to popular opinion, and from no love to Him;—sometimes even with a directly hostile object. See vv. 53, 54, and compare also ch. vii. 44–46. Observe also, that the severest parts of the discourse in Matthew (vv. 13–22, 33) were not uttered on this occasion.

Now, i.e. as instanced by your present conduct—Here is an instance of your, &c.

the cup and the platter—understand, ‘in the proverb’—or perhaps the application is left to be enthymematically filled up, for the next clause presupposes it.

the outside and the inward part of a man, are not the outside and inside of the body—but the outside apparent conduct, and the inner unseen. motives.

Some difficulty has been found in the parallelism of the outside of the cup and platter and your inward part. But the fact is, that the parable and its interpretation are intermixed throughout the whole, the mind of the hearer being left to find its own way in allotting each its part.

40.] seems clearly to me to be a question, and to mean, as A.V., Did not He, who made the outside, make the inside also?—i. e. if His works have become unclean and polluted through sin, what is the use of only partially purging them,—not accomplishing the purgation?—must not the cleansing, to be good for any thing, extend to the whole? See, on a proposal otherwise to understand it, the note in my Greek Test.

41.] Many Commentators, from whom I am compelled entirely to differ, understand this as ironical—‘but ye give alms of their contents, and, behold, all things are clean (in your estimation) to you. ' But this would be altogether irrelevant to the matter in hand, which was reproof to the Pharisees for their care about outward cleanliness, when the inside was left unclean. It would also be altogether contrary to our Lord's usual habit of speaking about giving alms, to make Him cast a slur on it, as this would do: see Mark x. 21; ch. xii. 33, where the expression is very similar to this.

The command is a rebuke for their covetousness (see ch. xvi. 14), which follows in close connexion with ravening (plunder) and wickedness, ver. 39.

such things as ye have (literally, the things inside) are the contents of the vessel, which vessel (ver. 39: see note above) is the men themselves: and is therefore equivalent in its meaning to that ye have of ch. xii. 33,—and the all things are clean answers to the treasure in heaven of that verse, the result of which is the "heart in heaven:" and such persons being pure in heart,—to them, as to the pure, all things are pure (Titus i. 15).

42.] But woe unto you, for ye do not this,—but make the most trifling payments, &c. The connexion, which is thus so close, is quite destroyed by the ironical interpretation of ver. 41. See note on Matt. xxiii. 23.

43.] Matt. xxiii. 6, 7. There doubtless was ample illustration of this at the time and place when it was spoken.

44.] See Matthew, ver. 27;—but here the point of comparison is different. There (see note) the sepulchres are whitened, that men may not pass over them unawares: and the comparison is to the outside fairness, and inside abomination. Here, the graves are not seen, and men thinking they are walking on clean ground are defiled by passing over them. Perhaps the difference of expression may have been occasioned by the greater wealth and splendour and display of the Pharisees in the metropolis, where Matt. xxiii. was spoken.

45.] This man appears to have been not a common Pharisee merely, but besides, a lawyer, whose duty it especially was to interpret the law. Perhaps he found himself involved in the censure of ver. 42; or generally among the other Pharisees.

46.] See on Matthew, ver. 4

47.] See on Matthew, vv. 29–32.

48.] See on Matthew, vv. 34–36.

We have here a remarkable variation of expression in ver. 49, the wisdom of God said is expressed by "I" in Matthew. Various explanations have been given of this. The difficulty is not the variation just noticed, so much as that no such passage exists in the O.T. But I have little doubt that the true explanation is this:—the whole saying is a reference to 2 Chron. xxiv. 18–22, and so marked a one, that I am surprised that no Commentators but Olahausen and Stier should have observed it, and they not thoroughly. That passage opens with remarks of the sacred historian on the delinquency of Judah and Jerusalem after the death of Jehoiada the priest: then ver. 19, 'He sent prophets to them, to bring them again to the Lord: and they testified against them: but they would not give ear. And the Spirit of God came upon Zechariah the son of Jehoiada the priest, which stood above the people, and said unto them...And they conspired against him, and stoned him with stones at the commandment of the king in the court of the house of the Lord...And when he died, he said, The Lord look upon it, and require it.' The words in our text are not indeed a citation, but an amplification of ver. 19 there—a paraphrase of them, giving the true sense of what the wisdom of God intended by them;—enlarging the mere historical notice which laid hold of God's purpose only by one thread let down to the earth, into the divine revelation of the whole purpose of God as the counsel of His will in heaven. In Matthew, the Lord: Jesus Himself, as became the solemnity of that final and awful close of His testimony to His own who received Him not, stands forth as the doer of this work, the sender of the Prophets and Apostles. (On 'son of Barachias, see on Matthew, ver. 35.)

52. ye took away the key of knowledge “Ye shut up the kingdom of heaven against men,” Matthew, ver. 13, which words are the best explanation of our text:—the key of knowledge (i. e. not of, as admitting to, knowledge—but the key is the knowledge), being that right understanding of the Law and Prophets, which should shew Him to the people, of whom they testified; this the expounders of Scripture had taken away, neither themselves entering, nor permitting those to enter who were otherwise doing so,—and thus shutting the kingdom of heaven in men's faces.

Luke: Chapter 12

CHAP. XII. 1–12.] WARNING AGAINST HYPOCRISY. A discourse spoken immediately or very soon after the former, and in connexion with it;—consisting for the most part of sayings repeated from other occasions, and found nearly verbatim in Matthew. It is impossible that there should be any reasonable doubt of this view, when we remember that some of them have appeared before, or appear again, in this very Gospel.

While our Lord was in the house of the Pharisee, the multitudes appear to have assembled together again. If so, in the mean time, or during which things, will mean while those related above were happening.

He comes forth to them (ch. xi. 53) in the spirit of the discourse which He has just completed, and cautions His disciples against that part of the character of the Pharisees which was most dangerous to them. The connexion of these twelve verses may be thus enunciated:—Beware of hypocrisy (ver. 1), for all shall be made evident in the end (ver. 2), and ye are witnesses and sharers in this unfolding of the truth (ver. 3). I n this your work, ye need not fear men; for your Father has you in His keeping (vv. 4–7)—and the confession of my name is a glorious thing (ver. 8), but the rejection of it (ver. 9), and especially the ascription of my works to the evil one (ver. 10), a fearful one. And in this confession ye shall be helped by the Holy Spirit in the hour of need (vv. 11, 12).

4.] my friends: see John xv. 13–15.

10.] See on Matt. xii. 31.

11, 12.] See on Matt. x. 19, 20.

13–21.] ANSWER TO ONE WHO SOUGHT A DIVISION OF HIS INHERITANCE. Peculiar to Luke.

13.] The man was evidently not a disciple, nor preparing to be one, but some hearer in the crowd, whose mind had been working in him during our Lord's last sayings about the care of Providence for His friends, and he thought this was just the care his circumstances wanted; being, as appears, oppressed by his brother in the matter of his patrimony. Possibly too he had an idea that the Messias, or the great Rabbi to whom he was listening, was come to set all things right;—and with that feeling which we all have of the surpassing injustice of our own wrongs, broke out with this inopportune request.

14.] Man... a word of solemn reproof; see Rom. ii. 1; ix. 20. The man also forms a definite subject for you to refer to,... ‘men,’ i.e. mankind in general. This question is expressed in almost the very words of the Egyptian rejecting the arbitration of Moses, Exod. ii. 14;—and may shew us the essential difference of the two offices of Moses and Christ.

15.] them. i.e. the multitude. He saw into the covetousness of the man's disposition, and made it an instructive warning for His hearers.

all covetousness] There is a meaning in all—every kind of covetousness. This kind, of which they had an example before them, was by no means one of the worst; but all kinds must be avoided.

not, because a man hath abundance, doth his life (therefore) consist in the things which he posseseth. That is, no man's life consists in what he posseseth; (“man shall not live by bread alone”)... nor by his not having abundance, can this be made to be the case. Man's life is of God, not of his goods, however abundant they may be. And this is the lesson conveyed by the following parable, and lying at the foundation of the still higher lesson conveyed in ver. 21.

The word life is used in the pregnant sense, emphatically his life; including time and eternity. This is self-evident the parable and its application.

16.] Our Lord in this parable sets before us one arrived at the very height of worldly prosperity, and that by no unfair means; but, as Augustine says, “not by removing landmarks, not by robbing the poor, not by overreaching the simple.” It was by God's blessing that he made thus rich, which might have been a real blessing, if he had known how to use it.

17.] “The character of a mind at ease without being at rest is admirably expressed,” Bengel.

I have no room where to bestow my fruits] “Thou hast barns—the bosoms of the poor, the houses of widows, the mouths of infants.... these are the barns which will last for ever.” Ambrose.

18.] “His folly is fourfold:—he forgets the Giver, (‘my fruits, my goods,’)—he greedily reserves all for himself,—he imagines such things to be food for his soul—he forgets death, which is every day possible.” Stier. A very striking similarity is found in Ecclesiasticus xi. 18, 19, “There is that waxeth rich by his wariness and pinching, and this is the portion of his reward: whereas be saith, I have found rest, and now will eat continually of my goods: and yet he knoweth not what time shall come upon him, and that he must leave these things to others, and die.” Stier thinks this a convincing proof that our Lord did occasionally refer to the Apocrypha.

20.] God said unto him,—perhaps it is meant, by some unmistakeable judgment; but more likely, as occurring in a parable, the words are to be literally taken. By supposing merely a divine decree to be meant, without personal communication, as Grotius, Kuinoel, and Trench do, we lose the impressive part of the parable, where the man's selfishness and folly is brought into immediate contact with the solemn truth of his approaching death, which certainly our Lord intends us to contemplate.

Thou fool, opposed to his worldly prudence;—this night, to the many years;—the soul in the one case, at its ease, eating, drinking, and making merry, to the soul in the other, demanded, rendered up, judged.

they require thy soul] Not strictly equivalent to “Thy soul shall be required,” as A.V.; there are those whose business it is, even the angels, the ministers of the divine purposes: see ch. vi. 38 and note. The merely impersonal sense may be defended: but this saying seems so solemn, as to require something more.

21.] So: so, in utter confusion, and sudden destitution of all help and provision for eternity. for himself... toward God...] The meaning of these expressions will be brought out thus: He who is rich for himself, laying up treasure for himself, is by so much robbing his real inward life, his life in and toward God, of its resources: he is laying up store for, providing for, the flesh; but the spirit, that which God looketh into and searcheth, is stripped of all its riches.

These words may also, as remarked on ch. vi. 20, shew that St. Luke does not, as supposed by some recent critics, use ‘riches’ as merely this world’s wealth, but with a deeper spiritual meaning.

22–31.] LESSONS OF TRUST IN GOD. In the closest connexion with the preceding;—Therefore... since worldly riches are of so little real use, &c.: see Matt. vi. 25–33, and notes.

24.] the ravens, who are elsewhere spoken of in Scripture as the objects of the divine care: see Job xxxviii. 41, Ps. cxlvii. 9.

26.] that thing which is least: this shews the truth of the interpretation age (not “stature”) given in the note on Matthew. A cubit would not be the least of things to add to the stature, but a very large increase: whereas, as Trench observes, “a cubit would be infinitesimally small when compared to his length of life, that life being contemplated as a course, or race, which he may attempt, but ineffectually, to prolong.”

32–34.] Our Lord gives to his own disciples an assurance of the Father’s favour as a ground for removing all fear from them, and shews them the true riches, and how to seek them.

32. little flock] Thus He sets himself forth as their Shepherd (John x. 1 ff.), and them (as in Isa. xli. 10–14) as a weak and despised people.

33.] Meyer endeavours to evade the force this, by supposing it addressed only to the Apostles and then existing disciples. But it is said to the little flock, who are all the elect people of God.

Sell that ye have,&c.] This is the true way of in-vesting worldly wealth:—‘He that giveth to the poor, lendeth to the Lord.’ See on Matt. vi. 19–21.

35–48.] EXHORTATIONS TO WATCHFULNESS. The attitude and employment of the little flock is carried on, even to their duty of continual readiness for their Lord’s coming. These verses are connected with ver. 32—‘since your Father hath seen fit to give you the kingdom, be that kingdom, and preparation for it, your chief care.’ There are continual points of similarity, in this part of the discourse, to Matt. xxiv. 42 ff., but no more: and the close connexion quite forbids us to imagine that the sayings have been collected merely by the Evangelist.

35.] There is a slight reference to, or rather another presentation of the truth set forth in, the parable of the virgins, Matt. xxv. 1 ff. But the image here is of servants waiting for their lord to return from the wedding;—left at home, and bound to be in readiness to receive him. There is only a hint at the cause of his absence—He is gone to a wedding: the word used may mean almost any feast or entertainment—and the main thought here only is that He is away at a feast, and will return. But in the background lies the wedding in all its truth—not brought out here, but elsewhere, Matt. xxii 1 ff.; xxv. 1 ff.

Let your loins be girded] See John xiii. 4.

your lights] See note on Matt. xxv. 1.

36.] ye yourselves, i.e. your whole conduct and demeanour.

37.] See Rev. iii. 20, 21, where the same similitude is presented, and the promise carried on yet further,—to the sharing of his Throne. The Lord Himself, in that great day of his glory,—the marriage-supper of the Lamb,—will invert the order of human requirements (see ch. xvii. 8), and in the fulness of his grace and love will serve his brethren:—the Redeemer, his redeemed, —the Shepherd, his flock.

come forth] more probably is the allusion to His coming in turn to each. Compare the washing of the disciples' feet in John iii. 1 ff., which was a foreshowing of this last great act of self-abasing love.

33.] Olshausen observes that the first watch is not named, because the marriage itself falls on it: but his view that because the fourth is not named, our Lord follows the ancient custom of the Jews and divides the night into three watches, is probably incorrect: it is more likely (Meyer) that the fourth is not named, because the return was not likely to be so long delayed;—for the decorum of the parable.

39.] I am surprised that it should have been imagined that this verse has been inserted so as to break the connexion, and by a later hand. Nothing can be more exact and rigid than the connexion as it now stands. Our Lord transfers, to shew the unexpected nature of his coming, and the necessity of watchfulness, the relation between Himself and the servants, to that between the thief and the master of the house. For the purposes of this verse, they represent the master of the house—collectively, as put in charge with the Lord's house and household (thus the verse is intimately connected with ver. 42):—and in the further application, individually—each as the householder of his own trust, he kept with watchfulness against that day: —He is represented by the thief—Rev. xvi. 15; iii. 3. Olshausen's view, that the master of the house is the “prince of this world,” is surely quite out of keeping with the main features of the parable. That he should be put in the place of the watching servants seems impossible:“besides that the faithful steward below is this very “master of the house,” being such in the absence of his Lord, but the steward when He appears.

41.] this parable; not, the two verses, but the whole:—‘Who are they that are thus to wait and watch, and to be thus honoured at the Lord's coming?’ This question coming in so suddenly and unconnectedly and remaining apparently unanswered, is among the many proofs of the originality and historic reality of this discourse.

42 ff.] Our Lord does not answer the question directly, but proceeds with His discourse, so as to furnish it with an answer;—viz. that in its highest sense it applies to his Apostles and ministers, inasmuch as to them most has been given as the stewards—but that its application is gradationally downwards through all those who know their Master's will, even to the lowest, whose measure both of responsibility and of reward is more limited. For the comment on vv. 42–46 see on Matt. xxiv. 45–51. Notice that unbelievers here is “hypocrites” in Matthew.

47, 48.] Primarily, in reference to the question in ver. 41. Those which knew represent us, the disciples: those that knew not represent all, the multitude:—but the application is not limited to this: the truth is one of universal extent.

prepared not—we must not supply, “himself,” as A.V., but matters, according to his will: “prepared,” almost in the absolute sense of ‘making ready:’—it refers back to the “be ye ready” of ver. 40; this readiness being not only preparing himself, but the matters over which he has charge, ver. 35. There is reference to Deut. xxv. 2.

But he that knew not] The case is of one (a disciple in the Sed reference, but then generally of all men) who bona fide is ignorant of his Lord's will. That such persons shall be punished, is both the sentence of the law, see Levit. v. 17–19, and an inference from the truth set forth ver. 57, and Rom. i. 19, 20, 32; ii. 14, 15,—that the natural conscience would have prevented the not doing. (Observe that the two classes, not included here, are “he that knew and did,” and “he that knew not and did,” as far as that can be said [see Rom. ii. 14];—the reference here being only to the did not in both cases, or rather to the “did not” in the first case and its equivalent “did things worthy of stripes” in the second.) But the difficulty seems to be to assign a spiritual meaning to the words, shall be beaten with few stripes. That such will ES the case, would à priori be consonant to the justice of the Judge of all the earth: and we have it here declared, that it shall be so: but how, is not revealed to us. It is in vain for the sinner to encourage himself in sin from such a declaration as this: for the very knowledge of the declaration excludes him from the exemption. “Our ears have heard the voice divine; We cannot be as they.” (Christian Year.)

much is given.... shall be much required] The second much is not the much that has been given, but a proportionable amount of result of diligence, a much which he is to render.

more] perhaps, more than from others: but more likely more than had been deposited with him, viz. that, and the interest of it; —see Matt. xxv. 15 ff.

49–53.] The connexion appears to be this:—the immense and awful difference between the faithful and unfaithful servants brings our Lord to the ground of that difference, and its necessary development in the progress of His kingdom on earth.

49. fire] It is extraordinary that the official announcement of the Baptist (ch. iii. 16)—“He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire”—connected with the mention of a baptism here,—with the promise Acts i. 5, and the appearance Acts ii. 3, so strikingly expressed as “cloven (divided, the very same word in the original) tongues as of fire”—have not kept the Commentators in general (Bleek is an exception) from falling into the blunder of imagining here that the fire is synonymous with, and means no more than, the discord and division which follow. The fire is, the gift of the Holy Spirit,—the great crowning result of the sufferings and triumph of the Lord Jesus. To follow this out in all its references belongs to another place:—see notes on Mark ix. 49, and Acts ii. 3. This fire, in its purifying and separating effects on the mass of mankind, causes the division afterwards spoken of.

The construction of the latter words in this verse has been ever a matter of dispute, while the meaning is on all hands nearly agreed. The three prevalent explanations of it are: (1) That adopted in margin, which is apparently Origen’s, And what will I? would that it were already kindled! This abrupt ejaculation might seem unlike the usual character of our Lord’s discourses: but we have a similar question in John xii. 27, and under corresponding circumstances, of His soul being troubled. (2) And how I wish that it were already kindled! To this, which is adopted by Theophylact, and some distinguished moderns, chief objection is, that the words of the original will not bear it: see in my Greek Test. (3) That of Euthymius, Beza, and the A.V., What will I, if it be already kindled? i.e. “What more do I await in the world, seeing that it is already kindled?” But this presents a great difficulty as regards the context; for, by ver. 50, it evidently was not kindled: and even if this were overcome, the expression, evidently a deep one of personal anxiety (and be it remembered who said it), would be vapid and unmeaning in the extreme. All things then being considered, I prefer the first explanation.

50.] The symbolic nature of Baptism is here to be borne in mind. Baptism is equivalent to Death. The figure in the Sacrament is the drowning,—the burial, in the water, of the old man and the resurrection of the new man: see 1 Pet. iii. 20–22, and notes. The Lord’s Baptism was His death, in which the Body inherited from the first Adam was buried, and the new Body raised again: see Rom. vi. 1–11, but especially ver. 10. And He was straitened (the best possible rendering) till this was accomplished:—i. e. in anxiety and trouble of spirit. The but here implies but first, i.e. before that fire can be shed abroad. Here we have then, as Stier expresses it, a “beginning of the passion” of our Lord; the first utterance of that deep anguish, which afterwards broke forth so plentifully,—but coupled at the same time with holy zeal for the great work to be accomplished

51–53.] The work of this fire, as as it burns onward in the world, will not be peace, but division; see Mal. iii 2, 3, 18; iv. 1, where we have the separating effect of this fire in its completion at the great day: see also Matt. iii. 12.

On the passage itself, see notes on Matt. x. 35, 36.

54–59.] REPROACHES FOR BLINDNESS TO THE SIGNS OF THE TIMES. The connexion of this with the foregoing is natural and close. From henceforth (ver. 52), the distinction shall begin to be made;—the discord and division between those who discern this time (ver. 56) and those who do not. Our Lord then turns to the crowd (also). He not only said to the disciples the foregoing, but to the crowd the following), and reproaches them (1) for their blindness, in not being able to discern it, as they did the signs in the natural heavens; and (2) for their want of prudence (vv. 57–59), in not repenting and becoming reconciled to the law of God while yet there was time.

54.] There is a somewhat similar saying of our Lord at Matt. xvi. 2 ff., but differing both in its occasion and its substance.

the cloud,—that usually rises there; see 1 Kings xviii. 44. The west, in Judæa, would the direction of the sea.

56.] the face of the earth—perhaps referring to other signs of rain or heat from the appearance of the hills, &c.

this time] The signs of this time were very plain;—the sceptre had departed from Judah;—the general expectation of the coming of the Messiah is testified even by profane authors;—the prophets had all spoken of Him, and the greatest of them, the Baptist, had announced His arrival.

57.] In what follows, our Lord takes occasion from the request about the inheritance, which had begun this discourse, to pass to infinitely more solemn matters. There is, I think, no denying that the “judging what is right” and the “thine adversary” have a reference to that request, in the ability and duty of every man to ‘judge what is right:’—but the sense of the words far outruns that reference, and treats of loftier things. ‘Why do ye not discern of yourselves your true state—that which is just—the justice of your case as before God? You are going (the course of your life is the journey) with your adversary (the just and holy law of God) before the magistrate (God Himself); therefore by the way take pains to be delivered from Him (by repentance, and faith in the Son of God, see Ps. ii. 12), lest he drag thee to the judge (who adjudges the case and inflicts the fine; that is, the Son to whom all judgment is committed), and the judge deliver thee to the exactor (see Matt. xiii. 41), and the exactor cast thee into prison' (ditto, ver. 42).

59.] See on Matt. v. 25, and, on the word mite, Mark xii. 42.

CHAP. XIII. 1-9.] ANSWER TO INTELLIGENCE OF THE MURDERED GALILÆANS, AND PARABLE THEREUPON. Peculiar to Luke.

1.] The words at that season may mean at that very time—viz. as He finished the foregoing discourse: but it is not necessary to interpret thus;—for, Matt. xii. 1; xiv. 1, the similar expression is certainly indefinite.

The opening words do not mean, as A.V., that these persons were in the crowd, and remarked to the Lord concerning these Galilæans, in consequence of what He had said ch. xii. 57:—such a finding of connexion is too fine-drawn. It is obvious that no connexion is intended between this incident and the foregoing discourse.

the Galilæans] The historical fact is otherwise unknown. The way of speaking here shews that it was well known to the writer. It must have occurred at some feast in Jerusalem, on which occasions riots often took place, and in the outer court of the temple. Such slaughters were frequent, and would not be particularly recorded by the historians. This mingling of their blood with their sacrifices seems to have been thought by the narrators evidence that they were very depraved sinners: for this was their argument, and is unconsciously that of many at this day,—‘the worse the affliction, the more deserved’: see Gen. xlvi. 21: Acts xxviii. 4.

2.] Our Lord perceives this to be their reasoning—they did not express it, as is plain by the suppose ye.... He does not deny that all the Galilæans were sinners, and deserved God’s judgments, but that these were pre-eminently so.

3. in like manner] The force of this is lost in the A.V., ‘likewise.’ It is strictly in like manner, as indeed the Jewish people did perish by the sword of the Romans.

4, 5.] Our Lord introduces this incident as shewing that whether the hand of man or (so-called) accidents, lead to inflictions of this kind, it is in fact but one Hand which doeth it all—Amos iii. 6. There is also a transference from the Galilæans—a despised people—to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, on whom the fulness of God’s wrath was to be poured out in case of impenitence. Of the incident itself, or of the tower in Siloam (the word here meaning probably the district in which the fountain, John ix. 7, was situated,—though on the whole matter, and the situation of the fountain itself, there is considerable uncertainty), we know nothing. See also Neh. iii. 15.

debtors, i.e. sinners,—see Matt. vi. 12;—perhaps the same thought may be traced as pervading the saying, as in vv. 58, 59, of the last chapter. No such idea as that the tower was a prison for debtors is for a moment to be thought of.

See on in like manner above;—here, the similarity will be—in the ruin of your whole city: This does not render it necessary that these words should have been spoken to actual dwellers in Jerusalem: for nearly the whole nation was assembled there at the time of the siege.

6-9.] This Parable has perhaps been interpreted with hardly enough reference to its own peculiar context, or to the symbolic language of Scripture in other places. Ordinarily the owner of the vineyard is explained to be the Eternal Father: the dresser and intercessor, the Son of God: the fig-tree, the whole Jewish people: the vineyard, the world. But it may be objected to this, that the owner comes to seek the fruit, which can be properly said only of Him who “came unto His own”—who is even in Matthew “the heir”—and by implication there, the possessor of the vineyard “whey he shall come” (for that destruction He universally represents as His coming). The other objections will come out in the direct exposition of the Parable, which I take to be this:—The link which binds it to the foregoing is Except ye repent...; and it is addressed rather to individuals than to the whole nation—though of course to the whole nation as made up of individuals. The vineyard is not the world, which would be wholly inconsistent with Scriptare symbolism (for Matt. xiii. 24 the comparison is to “the kingdom of heaven”—the Gospel dispensation, in which the field—not the vineyard—is the whole world); but, as in Isa. v. 7, the house of Israel and the men of Judah (see notes on Matt. xxi. 33 ff.). The fig-tree planted in the vineyard—among the vines—(a usual thing) denotes an individual application, fixing each man’s thought upon one tree—and that one, himself; just as the guest without the wedding-garment in Matt. xxii. He who had the tree planted in His vineyard (—‘All things that the Father hath, are Mine’—John xvi. 15), came seeking fruit, and found it not: see Matt. xxi. 19 and note. (The vine-dresser, see below.) He commands it to be cut down, as encumbering the soil (exhausting it, rendering it inactive); three years has He been coming and seeking fruit in this tree, and he findeth none. Then, at the intercession of the vine-dresser, He consents (for this is implied) to spare it this year also, until it been manured; if that fail, the Intercessor himself has no more plea to urge—it is to be cut down.

Now who is this Intercessor? First look at the matter of fact. Who were the vinedressers of God's vineyard? They were many. Moses, the Prophets, the Baptist, the Lord Himself, the Apostles and Teachers after Him. But what one Personality might be set forth as pervading all these, 'striving with man' in them all—as being the vine-dresser? Clearly it seems to me, the Holy Spirit of God. In the passage just alluded to, Gen. vi. 3, we can hardly but recognize the main features of our present parable; especially when the days Of Noah are compared by the Lord Himself to His own coming to vengeance. The intercessory office of the Spirit ("the Advocate," see on John xiv. 16), pleading with man and for man, and resigning that blessed conflict when met with inveterate obduracy, is often set before us in Scripture. See the whole history of Saul; Zech. vii. 12–14: Prov. i. 23–32: Isa. lxiii. 10: Neh. ix. 20: Rom. viii. 26, 27.

7. three years] I have little doubt that an allusion is intended to the three years of our Lord's ministry. The objection to this, that the cutting down ought then to have taken place at the end of this year, does not apply; for all is left indefinite in the request and the implied answer. In the individual application, many thousands did bear fruit this very year; and of those who did not, who shall say when the Spirit ceased pleading with them, and the final sentence went forth?

why moreover cumbereth it the ground?] i.e. Why, besides bearing no fruit, is it a impoverishing the soil—rendering the neighbouring ground useless?

8.] i.e. till I dig holes about the root, cast in manure, as is done to orange-trees in the south of Italy, and to hops in England.

9.] After fruit there is a breaking off, and well is to be supplied: but not without reason: to fill up the sentence did not belong to the purpose of this parable.

hereafter] This word belongs to bear fruit, not as in A.V., to the latter clause of the verse. We must remember, that as regards the Jews in the collective sense, the sentence lingered 40 years.

THOU shalt cut it down—not, "I will cut it down;" and I find in this an additional proof of the correctness of the foregoing interpretation. It is the "lord of the vineyard" who "when He cometh, shall wretchedly destroy those wretches." All judgment is committed to THE Son:—it is not the work of the Holy Spirit to cut down and destroy, for He is the Giver of life.

The above interpretation is ritually given by Stier, who has however in my view quite missed the vine-dresser, understanding by him the husbandmen in Matt. xxi., forgetting that they are destroyed in the sequel of that parable, and that their position, that of the tenants of the vineyard, does not appear at all in this, any more than does the vine-dresser in that.

10–21.] HEALING OF A WOMAN ON THE SABBATH: DISCOURSE THEREUPON. Peculiar to Luke, except the parables, which are in Matt. xiii. 31–33; Mark iv. 31–34.

10.] Time and place alike indefinite.

11. a spirit of infirmity] Her weakness was the effect of permitted power of the evil one (ver. 16); but whether we are to find here a direct instance of possession, seems very doubtful. There is nothing in our Lord's words addressed to her, to imply it: and in such cases He did not lay on His hands, or touch,—but only in cases of sickness or bodily infirmity.

The A.V. has here mistaken the position of the word which it renders "in no wise." It means altogether, and belongs to the verb lift herself.

12.] There is no reason to suppose any eminence of faith in her—though we may fairly conclude that she was there with some expectation of a cure: see ver. 14.

thou art loosed, expresses the setting free of her muscles from the power which bound them down,—and then, ver. 13, the laying on of the divine hands confers upon her strength to rise and stand upright. It would be, in such a case, one thing to be loosed from the stiffening of years,—and another to have strength at once conferred to stand upright.

14.] The ruler speaks not either to Jesus or to the woman; but covertly and cowardly, to the multitude. Stier notices the self-stultification of this speech, in making "to be healed,"—which is in fact a reception of divine grace and help, a species of "working."

15. Ye hypocrites] The Lord saw the real thoughts of his heart, that they were false, and inconsistent with his pretended zeal, and addressed the multitude as represented by him, their leader. A man hardly could give forth a doctrine so at variance with common sense and common practice, without some by-end, with which he covered his violation of truth. That by-end here was enmity to and jealousy of Jesus.

The instance chosen exactly fits the circumstances. A beast tied to the manger is confined down as this poor woman was.

16.] The contrast is strongly drawn—between a dumb animal, and (not merely a human creature, but) a daughter of Abraham—one of the chosen people (I cannot see any necessity for a spiritual daughtership [Gal. iii. 7] being here implied),—between a few hours, since the last watering, and ‘lo these eighteen years’ (compare ver. 7, “Behold these three years....”).

17.] So far am I from thinking a description of this kind to be a mere general close, put in by the Evangelist, that I would take it as an accurate and graphic account of the immediate effect of our Lord’s power and irresistible words, and the following parables as spoken immediately thereupon, shewing the people the ultimate conquest which the Kingdom of God should obtain over all opposition, however strong. On the parables themselves, see on Matt. xiii. 31–33.

18–21.] These two parables, found in Matthew as above, and the former of them in Mark iv. 30–32, seem to have been again spoken by our Lord at this time, in reference to the progress of His Gospel indicated in ver. 17. The rendering thereupon is important, as pointing out the connexion.

22–30.] ANSWER TO THE QUESTION AS TO THE NUMBER WHO SHALL BE SAVED. Our Lord repeats, occasion being given by a question peculiar to Luke, parts of His discourses spoken elsewhere, as referred to below.

22.] This notice includes what follows in the cycle of this last journey, but disclaims any definiteness of place or time for it. But certainly it seems to follow in natural order after our Lord’s solemn warnings to repentance at the beginning of this chapter. The enquirer can hardly have been a disciple of Jesus (see ver. 28), but most likely a Jew from the multitude, who had heard his discourses, and either from Jewish pride, or perhaps out of real desire to learn from Him, put this question.

23.] On the word rendered that be saved, see note, Acts ii. 47. Here, the implication of final salvation is obvious.

unto them, i.e. the multitude. Similar sayings have occurred in the Sermon on the Mount, but the connexion here is intimate and strict.

24.] See on Matt. vii. 18. The description of the broad and narrow ways is not here inserted, as probably by this time, the narrow door (or gate) was a familiar image. In what follows we must not understand, ‘shall seek to enter by it, and shall not be able:’—the emphasis of the command is, seek to enter at the narrow door: for many shall seek to enter (else-where), and shall not be able. After enter is to be supplied, in both places, into salvation, or into the Kingdom of God.

25.] A reason why this strive is so important:—because there will be a day when the gate will be shut. The figure is the usual one,—of a feast, at which the householder entertains (in this case) the members of his family. These being assembled, he rises and shuts the door, and none are afterwards admitted. ‘The from the time when extends to the end of ver. 25,—and the second member of the sentence begins with Then shall ye begin&c. to say The door is shut, ye begin to stand without and knock. On the spiritual import, see note on Matt. xxv. 11. I know you not whence ye are: i.e. ‘Ye are none of my family—have no relationship with me.’

26. We have eaten and drank in thy presence] As applied to the then assembled crowd, these words refer to the miracles of feeding,— perhaps also to His having so often sat at meat in the houses of various persons (the drinking must not be as meaning anything different from the eating:—the expression is a general one for taking a meal); as applied to Christians, to the eating and drinking whereof those miracles were anticipatory. Both these are merely in His presence;—very different from the drinking ‘with you’ of which He speaks Matt. xxvi. 29, and from “I will sup with him and he with me,” Rev. iii. 20.

thou hast taught in our streets] Applicable directly to those to whom the words were spoken; and further, in its fuller sense, to all among whom the Gospel is preached, even till the end.

27. workmen of iniquity] This unusual expression seems to mean, persons engaged in the hire and receiving the wages of unrighteousness:—see Matt. vii. 23, where “ye that work lawlessness” (20 literally) answers to it.

28, 29.] See Matt. viii. 11, 12, and notes. The verses occur here in a different connexion: ‘Ye Jews, who neglect the earnest endeavor to enter now, shall weep and gnash your teeth when ye see all the saints, Jews ‘and Gentiles, in the Kingdom of God, and yourselves excluded’ (see ch. xvi. 23). int these two verses is the real, answer to the question of ver. 23 given:—‘they shall be MANY—but what is that to you, if you be not among them?’

30.] As the words here stand—somewhat different from those in Matt. xx. 16—they seem to be a prophetic declaration of what shall be in the course of the ingathering of these guests;—viz. that some who were the it, or among the first to believe, shall fall from their high place, and vice versa. This former has, as Stier notices, been remarkably the case with the Oriental Churches, which were the first founded and flourishing:—and, we may add, with the mother church of Jerusalem, which has declined, while her Gentile offsets have flourished.

31–35.] WARING OF HEROD’ S ENMITY; OUR LORD’s REPLY. Peculiar to Luke:—the apostrophe in vv. 34, 35 was spoken by our Lord also on another occasion, Matt. xxiii. 37–39.

31.] In that hour is not necessarily definite.

These Pharisees appear to have been sent by Herod for the purpose of getting rid of Jesus out of his jurisdiction. Considering his character, it is hardly possible that he should really have wished to kill one who was so popular;—he refused to do so when Jesus was in his power afterwards in Jerusalem;—but, as great multitudes were now following Him about, and superstitious fears, as we know, agitated Herod, he wished to be quit of Him, and took this means of doing so. I think this view is necessary to justify the epithet applied to Herod, which certainly implies cunning on his part. Stier thinks the Pharisees invented the tale about Herod: but then how can the epithet applied to him be explained? I cannot for a moment believe, as he does, that our Lord saw through the lie of the Pharisees, and yet adopted it, meaning the fox to signify themselves. “That Jesus in a public discourse uses such an expression of the ruler of his country, is not to be judged of by the manners, and ways of speech, of our times. The free-spokenness of the ancient world, which we meet with especially in the Hebrew prophets, allowed such strong expressions, without any thing peculiarly offensive being found in them.” Bleak.

32, 33.] The interpretation of this answer is difficult, for two reasons—(1) that the signification of the to day, to tomorrow, and the third day is doubtful—(2) that the meaning of I am perfected is also doubtful.

The days mentioned are ordinarily supposed to be proverbially used; to day, for his present working—to tomorrow, for that between the present time and his arrival at Jerusalem—the third day, for that arrival, and the end of his work and course by his Death.

Against this, is (1) the positive use of the three days, in an affirmative sentence,—of which no instance can be brought where the proverbial meaning is implied:—(2) the verb journey, proceed on my mission, belonging to all three in ver. 33, whereas thus it only belongs to the two first.

The interpretation adopted by Meyer (and Bleek) is this:—In three days (literal days) the Lord’s working of miracles in Galilee would be ended, which had excited the apprehension of Herod: and then He would leave the territory, not for fear of Herod, but because He was going to Jerusalem to die. The objection to this is, that the sense—of ending these present works of healing, &c. does not seem a sufficient one for I am perfected, which, as applied to the Lord, surely must include His Death. I own that neither of the above interpretations satisfies me,—and still less the various modifications of them which have been proposed. Nor can I suggest any less open to objection:—but merely state my conviction, (1) that the days mentioned must have some definite reference to three actual days: (2) that perfected is used in the solemn sense elsewhere attached to the word: see John iv. 34, “finish:” v. 36, xvii. 4; Acts xx. 24; 2 Cor. xii. 9; Heb. ii. 10, v. 9, vii. 28, especially; x. 14, xi. 40, are 28; in all which places it is used in the original.

If this Gospel had been a chronological calendar of our Lord’s journey, the meaning would probably have been clear: but as we have none such, it is, and I believe must remain, obscure. Dr. Wordsworth’s note is much to the point: “It must be remembered that Herod was ruler of Peræa as well as of Galilee: and that John the Baptist had been put to death at Machærus, where Herod had a palace about ten miles E. of Jericho, and thirty E. of Jerusalem. St. Matt. xix. 1, and St. Mark, x. 1, 46, speak of our Lord being in Peræa, whence He passed over the river Jordan, and so came to Jericho, and thence to Bethany and Jerusalem for His Passion. Herod had put John to death not in Galilee but in Peræa; and if our Lord was now, as seems probable, in Peræa or near it, it was very likely that the Pharisees should endeavour to intimidate Him with a threat of Herod’s anger.”

the day following means the same as “the third day” above.

I must journey—in the original, it is the very word in which had addressed Him, “Depart (journey) hence,” ver. 31.

for it cannot be...., a monopoly not without exceptions, for John had been put to death by Herod out of Jerusalem.

But our Lord’s saying is not to be so literally pressed; He states the general rule, which His own case was to be fulfilled. There is no reference to the power of the Sanhedrim to judge and condemn false prophets (as some think), for the fact of perishing only is here in question;—and our Lord never would place himself in such a category.

34, 35.] These verses are in too close connexion with the preceding to allow of the supposition that they are inserted chronologically, as many suppose: and their variations from those in Matthew (xxiii. 37–39) are striking and characteristic. For “for,” which there accounts for the desolation of the temple, then for the last time left by our Lord, does not appear here, but and (or but) introducing a fresh saying, having I believe another meaning: and the words “from henceforth,” which follow “ye shall not see me” there, marking that moment as the commencement of the dereliction, are here omitted. Surely these differences indicate an uttering of the words prophetically, previous to their utterance in the act of departure. Our Lord overleaps in prophetic foresight the death Just set forth as certain, and speaks of the ages to come, during which holy city should be desolate and trodden down of the Gentiles.

That the very words, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord, were used by the multitude at the Lord’s entry into Jerusalem, I should much rather ascribe to a misunderstanding by them and the disciples of this very declaration, than for a moment suppose, as some have done, that these words found any sufficient fulfilment in that entry.

to eat bread] The Jews used to give entertainments on the Sabbath, see Neh. viii. 9–12; Tobit ii. 1. The practice latterly became an abuse,—see quotations from Augustine in my Greek Test.

2.] before him, not as a guest; see ver. 4, and compare ch. vii. 37, and note on ver. 45. “He was standing there,” says Euthymius, “not daring to ask to be healed, on account of the Sabbath, and the Pharisees; but only shewing himself, that our Lord might see him and be moved with pity, and so proceed to heal him.” It does not appear, though it is certainly possible, that he was set there by the pharisees on purpose. This was before the meal (ver. 7).

5.] There is a strict propriety in the comparison: the accident and disease are analogous.

son, or an ox] This reading, which, from the weight of ancient testimony in its favour, evidently was the original, seemed incompatible with the supposed argument from the less to the greater:—son was therefore altered to ass (as in ch. xiii. 15) or sheep, an one of our ancient MSS. has it. But our Lord’s argument is of another and a far deeper kind. The stress is on you: and the point of comparison is the ownership, consequent tender care, of the object in question. ‘Those who are in your possession and care, whether belonging to your families, or your herds, are cared for, and rescued from perishing: am I, (the possessor of heaven and earth,—this lies in the background) to let mine perish without care or rescue?’

There may be in the words the meaning “son, or even ox;” but I prefer rendering them simply.

7–24.] SAYINGS OF OUR LORD AT THIS SABBATH FEAST.

7–11.] It does not appear that the foregoing miracle gave occasion to this saying; so that it is with it. Our Lord, as was His practice, found His instructions on what He saw happening before Him.

As Trench remark, it is probable this was a splendid entertainment, and the guests distinguished persons (ver. 12).

7.] chief places, i.e., see Matt. xxiii. 6, the middle place in each couch, which was the most honourable. At a large feast there would be many of these.

8.] The whole of this has, besides its plain reference, a deeper one, linked into it by the important word wedding, carrying with it all that meaning which it always has when relating to the Kingdom of God. Both senses are obvious, and only one remark needed;—that all that false humility, by which men put themselves lowest and dispraise themselves of set purpose to be placed higher, is, by the very nature of our Lord’s parable, excluded: for that is not bond fide abasing one’s self. The exaltation at the hands of the Host is not to be a purposed end to the guests, but will follow true humility.

9. then shalt thou begin...] The form of expression sets fo the reluctance and lingering with which it is done.

11.] As an example of the first clause, see Isa. xiv. 13–15; of the second, Phil. ii. 6–11. 13–14.) The composition of the company before Him seems to have given occasion for this saying of our The Pharisee his host had doubtless, with the view (of watching Him) mentioned in ver. 1, invited the principal persons of the place, and with the intention of courting their favour, and getting a return. The Lord rebukes in him this spirit;—and it has been well remarked, that the intercourse and civilities of social life among friends and neighbours are here presupposed, (inasmuch as for them there takes place a recompense, and they are struck off the list by this means,) with this caution,—that our means are not to be sumptuously laid out upon them, but upon something far better,—the providing for the poor and maimed and lame and blind. When we will make s sacrifice, and provide at some cost, let us not throw our money away, as we should if a recompense is made to us in this world: but give it to the poor, i.e. lend it to the Lord; and then, as in ver. 14, there will be a recompense at the resurrection of the just, which shall not be a mere equivalent, but a rich reward.

14.] the resurrection of the just, the first resurrection, here distinctly asserted by our Lord; otherwise the words of the just would be vapid and unmeaning. See 1 Cor. xv. 22 f.; 1 Thess. iv. 16; ve xx. 4, 5.

15–24.] Parable of the Great Supper. One of the guests takes this literally, and imagines the great feast to which the Jews looked forward to be meant. He spoke as a Jew, and probably with an idea that, as such, his admission to this feast was sure and certain. Our Lord answers him by the parable following, which shewed him that, true as his assertion was, (and He does not deny it,) the blessedness would not be practically so generally acknowledged nor entered into.

The Parable, whatever analogy it may bear with that in Matt. xxii. 1 ff., is wholly Different from that in many essential points

16.] The great supper is the Kingdom of God, the feast of fat things in Isa. xxv. 6; completed in the marriage-supper of the Lamb; but fully prepared when the glad tidings af the Gospel were proclaimed.

bade many: these first bidden are the Pharisees and Scribes and the learned among the Jews.

17.] The servant represents one spirit, one message: but is not necessarily, in the three cases, one and the same person. The three messages were delivered (1) by John the Baptist and our Lord: (2) by our Lord and the Apostles; (3) by the Apostles and those who came after. The elder prophets cannot be meant, for [all] things are now ready was the message, representing the proclamation of John the Baptist and our Lord, “The kingdom of heaven is at hand.”

18–20.] with one consent; so (ch. vii. 30) they had rejected John’s baptism, and (John vii. 48) the Lord himself. The saying is not to be taken strictly without exception, e.g. that of Nicodemus: but genetically. So also ver. 24. The temper of these self-excusers is threefold; their spirit is one. The first alleges a necessity,—he must go and see his land: the second not so much as this, only his own plan and purpose—“I go to prove them:” the third not so much as either of these, but rudely asserts “I cannot (i. e. I will not) come.” Also the excuses themselves are threefold. The first has his worldly possession (‘one to his farm,’ Matt. xxii. 5) to go and see: the second his purchase (‘another to his merchandise,’ ibid.) of stock to prove: the third his home engagements and his lust to satisfy. All are detained by worldliness, in however varied forms.

21.] The gathering of guests is still in the city (Matt. xxii. 7); that is, still among the Jews.

the streets and lanes, the broad and narrow streets: perhaps the cities and villages through which the Lord and his Apostles journeyed preaching.

Here appear again the very persons of ver. 13; the representatives of the wretched and despised: “the common people (great multitude),” Mark xii. 37: not perhaps without a hint, that only those who knew themselves to be spiritually poor and maimed and halt and blind would come to the Gospel feast.

22.] The palace is large, and the guest-room: “neither nature nor grace endures a vacuum,” Bengel.

23.] The calling of the Gentiles, outside the city; in the country (Matt. xxii. 9, 10).

compel them to come in] Is there not here as allusion to Infant Baptism? for remember they who come in are good and bad. (Matt. l.c.)

24.) I think with Stier, that our Lord here speaks in his own Person: unto you will fit no circumstance in the parable; for the householder and his servant are alone: the guests are not present. He speaks, with His usual For I say unto you, to the company present: and half continuing the parable, half expounding it, substitutes Himself for the master of the feast, leaving it hardly doubtful who those men which were bidden are.

25–35.] DISCOURSE TO THE MULTITUDES. Our Lord is at some time further on in the journey, going forward, and speaking to the multitude on counting the cost before any man becomes his disciple.

26, 27.] See Matt. x. 37, 88, and note. The remark there made of the strangeness of this sound of the Cross, still applies: our Lord had not yet announced his death by crucifixion; hate not] It is well to enquire what sense this word here bears. That no such thing as active hatred can be meant, is plain: our Lord himself is an example to the contrary, John xix. 25–27; the hate is the general, not personal, feeling of alienation in the inmost heart,—so that this world's relationships, as belonging to the state things in this world, are not the home and rest of the heart. This is evident from the yea, and his own life also, which follows. Let the hate begin here, and little explanation will be further wanted. This addition also shews that the saying was not meant only for those times, in which more perhaps of the disruption of earthly ties was required, but for all time: for his own life is equally dear to every man in every age. It hardly need be observed that this hate is not only consistent with, but absolutely necessary to the very highest kind of love. It is that element in love which makes a man a wise and Christian friend,—not for time only, but for eternity.

28–30.] Peculiar to Luke. The same caution is followed out in this parable. This is to be borne in mind, or it will be misinterpreted. The ground of the parable is, that entire self: renunciation is requisite, to become a disciple of Christ. This man wishes to build a: tower: to raise that building (see 1 Cor. iii. 11–15), which we must rear on the one Foundation, and which shall be tried in the day of the Lord. He is advised to count the cost, to see whether he have enough thoroughly to finish it. If he begin, lay the foundation,—however seemingly well it may be done, it is not well done, because he has not enough to complete it; and the attempt can only lead to shame. So it is with one who would be Christ's disciple: but with this weighty difference, lying in the background of the parable—that in his case the counting the cost must always issue in a discovery of the utter inadequacy of his own resources, and the going out of himself for strength and means to build.

31–33.] This same lesson is even more pointedly set before us in the following parable, which, as well as the other, is frequently misunderstood. The two kings here are,—the man desirous to become a disciple, to work out his salvation,—and GOD, with whose just and holy law he is naturally at variance;—it is his adversary,” see ch. xii. 58, and note:—these two are to engage in war; and the question for each man to sit down and ask himself is, ‘Can I, with (the word may probably mean clad in,—surrounded by, all that I have, all my instrument of war) my ten thousand, stand the charge of Him who cometh against me with (the preposition is different, and may represent only as many as He pleases to bring with Him for the purpose, see Ps. xviii. 17, A.V.) twenty thousand?’—see Job xv. 24–26.

Here the inadequacy of man's resources is plainly set forth, not left, as in the former parable, to be inferred. Then, finding that he has no hope of prevailing,—while the other is yet a great way off, while there is yet time,—he sends an embassy, and sues for peace, abandoning the conflict: throwing himself upon the mere mercy and grace of God;—bidding fare-well to all that he hath in both cases. The ordinary misinterpretation of this parable is in taking the king with twenty thousand to be the ruler of this world, i.e. Satan—which destroys all the sense:—for with him the natural man is at peace, but the disciple of Christ at war.

34, 35.] For the third time, our Lord repeats the saying concerning salt: see Matt. v. 18: Mark ix. 50, and notes. The therefore and even, here restored to the text are both valuable; the former as importing the recurrence of a saying known before, the latter as giving force to the supposition.. The salt, in Scripture symbolism, is the whole life-retaining antiseptic influence of the Spirit of God:—this, working in the being My disciple, is good: but if even this be corrupted—if the mere appearance of this, and not the veritable salt (which is the savour), be in you—wherewith, &c.? Such a disciple is to be cast out. Salt was not used for land, Ps. vii. 34, nor for mingling with manure; it is of no use for either of those purposes, but must be utterly cast out.

CHAP. XV.] PARABLES, SETTING FORTH GOD'S MERCY TO SINNERS.

1–7.] THE LOST SHEEP. It does not appear where or when this gathering of publicans and sinners to hear Him happened,—but certainly in the progress of this same journey, and, we may well believe, consecutively on the discourses in the last chapter. first parable had been spoken by our Lord before Matt. xviii. 12–14: but, as Trench has remarked, with a different view: there, to bring out the preciousness of each individual little one in the eyes of the good Shepherd; here, to shew that no sheep can have strayed so widely, but He will seek it and rejoice over it when found. The second is peculiar to Luke.

1.] there were drawing near—were busied in drawing near—were continually about Him, struck perhaps with penitence,—found, by His seeking them:—having come from the husks of a life of sin, to the bread of life;—so the three parables seem to imply.

all the publicans, a general term, admitting of course of exceptions, see ch. xiii, 33 and note.

2.] receiveth into His circle of adherents—eateth with them, allows them to sit at meat with Him;—on the journey, or at entertainments, as in Matt. ix. 10. Stier remarks (iii. 214, edn. 2) that this receiveth sinners is an important and affecting testimony, from the mouth of the enemies of our Lord, to his willingness to receive them. The peculiar word rendered murmured implies either that they did so throughout the Journey;—or rather, one to another—responsively

3–7.] The man having the hundred sheep, the Son of God, the Good Shepherd. This had been his prophetic description, and that in this very connexion,—of seeking the lost, Ezek. xxxiv. 6, 11 ff. This it is which gives so peculiar an interest to David as a type of Christ—that he was a shepherd; ibid. ver. 23. Our Lord plainly declares then by this parable—and that I take to be the reason why it is placed first (see below)—that the matter in which they had found fault with Him was the very pursuit most in accordance with his divine Office of Shepherd.

4.] It is the Owner Himself who goes to seek, see Ezek. ver. 11—God in Christ. The hundred sheep are the house of Israel, see Matt. x. 6; but in present application, mankind: (not, ‘believers in Christ;’ see on ver. 7.)

The argument is to their self-interest: but the act on the part of the good Shepherd is, from the nature of the case, one of love; or, as Stier remarks, also human love for his own; for in Him, Love, and His glory, are one and the same thing.

the ninety and nine] These pass altogether into the background, and are lost sight of. The character of the good Shepherd is a sufficient warrant for their being well cared for. The wilderness is not a barren place, but one abounding in pastures (John vi. 10, compared with Matt. xiv. 15).

5.] Not mere self-interest, but love comes forward here; see Isa. xl. 11. No blows are given for the straying—no hard words: mercy to the lost one,—and joy within himself,—are the Shepherd’s feeling; the sheep is weary with long wanderings,—He gives it rest. Matt. ix. 36; xi. 28.

6.] In this return to His house, must be understood the whole course of seeking and finding which the good Shepherd, either by Himself or His agents, now pursues in each individual case, even until He brings the lost sheep home into heaven to Himself—not in reality, so that it should not take place till the death of the penitent—but by anticipation,—till the name is written in heaven;—till the sinner is penitent. This is clear from the interpretation in ver. 7. The friends and neighbours represent the angels (and spirits of just men made perfect?).

my sheep which was lost breathes a totally different thought from “the piece (drachma) which I lost.” There is pity and love in it, which, from the nature of the case, the other does not admit of.

7. I say unto you] In these words the Lord often introduces His revelations of the unseen world of glory: see Matt. xviii. 10.

On these just persons, see note at Matt. ix. 12, 13. They are the subjectively righteous, and this saying respects their own view of themselves. (Or if it be required that the words should be literally explained, seeing that these ninety-nine did not err,—then I see no other way but to suppose them, in the deeper meaning of the parable, to be the worlds that have not fallen;—and the one that has strayed, our human nature, in this our world.) But we have yet to enquire, what sort of sinner this parable represents; for each of the three sets before us a different type of the sinner sunk in his sin. Bengel, in distinguishing the three, says, “The sheep, the drachma, the prodigal son;—signify respectively, (1) the stupid sinner,—(2) the sinner wholly unconscious of the fact and of himself,—(3) the sinner conscious and of purpose.” This one is the stupid and bewildered sinner, erring and straying away in ignorance and self-will from his Shepherd, but sought the Shepherd, and fetched back with joy.

8–10.] THE LOST PIECE OF MONEY. In the following wonderful parable, we have the next class of sinners set before us, sought for and found by the power and work of the Spirit in the Church of Christ. It will be seen, as we proceed, how perfectly this interpretation comes out, not as a fancy, but as the very kernel and sense of the parable. The woman cannot be the Church absolutely, for the Church herself is a lost sheep at first, sought and found by the Shepherd. Rather is the house here the Church—as will come out by and by,—and the woman the indwelling Spirit, working in it. All men belong to this Creator-Spirit; all have been stamped with the image of God. But the sinner lies in the dust of sin and death and corruption—“wholly unconscious." Then the Spirit, lighting the candle of the Lord (Prov. xx. 27: Zeph. i. 12), searching every corner and sweeping every unseen place, finds out the sinner; restores him to his true value as made for God's glory. This lighting and sweeping are to be understood of the office of the Spirit in the Church, in its various ways of seeking the sinner—by the preaching of repentance, by the Word of God read, &c. Then comes the x again.

9.] her (female) friends her neighbours are invited—but there is no return home now—nor in the explanation, ver. 10, is there any "in heaven," because the Spirit abides in the Church because the angels are present in the Church, see 1 Cor. xi. 10:—nor is it "shall be" (as in ver. 7 at the return of the Redeemer then future), but is—the ministering spirits rejoice over every soul that is brought out of the dust of death into God's treasure-house by the searching of the blessed Spirit.

In this parable then we have set before us the sinner who is unconscious of himself and his own real worth; who is lying, though in reality a precious coin, in the mire of this world, and valueless, till he is searched out by the blessed and gracious Spirit. And that such a search will be made, we are here assured.

11–32.] THE PRODIGAL SON. Peculiar to Luke. 'If we might venture here to make comparisons, as we do among the sayings of men, this parable of the Lord would rightly be called, the crown and pearl of all His parables.' Stier.

We have here the and welcome reception of the returning sinner (sinner under the most aggravating circumstances) in the bosom of his heavenly Father: and agreeably to the circumstances under which the discourse was spoken, the just men who murmured at publicans and sinners are represented under the figure of the elder son:—see below. The parable certainly was spoken on the same occasion as the preceding, and relates to the same subject. Those who for the sake of upholding the patristic interpretation deny this, seem to me to have entirely missed the of the parable: see below.

11.] a certain man—Our heavenly Father, the Creator and Possessor of all: not Christ, who ever represents Himself as a son, although frequently as a possessor or lord.

two sons, not, in any direct or primary sense of the Parable, the Jews and the Gentiles: that there may be an ulterior application to this effect, is only owing to the parable grasping the great central truths, of which the Jew and Gentile were, in their relation, illustrations,—and of which such illustrations are furnished wherever such differences occur.

The two parties standing in the foreground of the parabolic mirror are, the Scribes and Pharisees as the elder son, the publicans and sinners as the younger;—all, Jews: all, belonging to God's family. The mystery of admission of Gentiles into God's Church was not yet made known in any such manner as that they should be represented as of one family with the Jews;—not to mention that this interpretation fails in the very root of the parable; for in strictness the Gentile should be the elder, the Jew not being constituted in his superiority till 2000 years after the Creation.

The upholders of this interpretation forget that when we speak of the Jew as elder, and the Gentile as younger, it is in respect not of birth, but of this very return to and reception into the Father's house, which is not to be considered yet. The objections of these interpreters do not touch the reasons here given. The relations of elder and younger have a peculiar fitness for the characters to be filled by them, and are I believe chosen on that account; as Euthymius says, "He names the sinner the younger, as being childish in mind and easily led astray."

12, 13.] The part of the parable relating to the prodigal himself divides itself into three parts—1. his sin: 2. his misery: 3. his penitence. In these verses his sin is described. It consists in a desire to depart from his Father's house and control, and to set up for himself,—to live a life of what the carnal man calls liberty.

12.] Such a request as this is shewn by Orientalists to have been known in the East, though not among the Jews.

The firstborn had two-thirds of the property, see Deut. xxi. 17. The father, as implied in the parable, reserves to himself the power during his life over the portion of the firstborn, see ver. 31. The parable sets before us very strikingly the permission of free will to man.

13.] The images of both the preceding parables are united here:—in his taking his journey, we have the straying sheep; in his state when he got into the far country, the lost piece of money. But in this case the search is to be carried on within him—we are now on higher ground than in those two parables, "The far-off country represents forgetfulness of God." Augustine.

profligate] The old English word retchless expresses perhaps best the meaning, which is not 'unsparing,' but incorrigible, past hope of reclaim.

14–18.] His misery set forth in these verses. He soon spends all:—there is a fine irony, as Stier remarks, in the word spent, as compared with wasted before—he spent his money for that which was no bread.

14. a mighty famine] This famine is the shepherd seeking his stray sheep—the woman sweeping to find the lost. The famine, in the interpretation, is to be subjectively taken; he begins to be in want,—to feel the emptiness of soul which precedes either utter abandonment or true penitence.

15.] He sinks lower and lower—becomes the despised servant of an alien (is there here any hint at the situation of the publicans, who were but the servants of wealthy Romans?) who employs him in an office most vile and odious to the mind of a Jew.

16. husks] ‘These are not the husks or pods of some other fruit, as of peas or beans, but themselves a fruit, that of the carob [or caruba, found not only in the East, but in South Europe, e.g. in abundance on the Riviera between Nice and Genoa. H.A.] like a bean-pod, though larger and more curved, thence called keration or little horn.... they have a hard dark outside and a dull sweet taste.... the shell or pod alone is eaten’ Trench. His appetite even drove him to these for food;—for (this is the real sense involved in and) no man gave (aught) to him.

We see him now in the depth of his misery,—the sinner reaping the consequences of his sin in utter shame and extremity of need.

17–20.] His penitence. And here we have a weighty difference between the permitted rational free will of man, and the stupid wandering on of the sheep, or the inanimate coin lying till it is picked up,—both these being however true in the case of man, did not God seek and save the sinner: ‘the grace of God by Christ preventing us, that we may have a good will and working with us when we have that will.’ Article X. of the Church of England.

17. when he came to himself] See 1 Kings viii. 47. Before this, he was beside himself. The most dreadful torment of the lost, in fact that which constitutes their state of torment, will be this coming to themselves, when too late for repentance.

He now recalls the peace and plenty of his Father's house.

hired servants] For he now was a hireling, but in how different a case!

18.] I will arise, see ver. 24, was dead, and is alive again; it was truly a resurrection from the dead. This resolution is a further step than his last reflection. In it be nowhere gives up his sonship: this, and the word Father, lie at the root of his penitence:—it is the thought of having sinned against (in the parable itself, Heaven and) Thee, which works now in him. And accordingly he does not resolve to ask to be made one of the hired servants, but as one of them:—still a son, but as an hireling. ‘And what is it that gives the sinner now a sure ground of confidence, that returning to God he shall not be repelled, nor cast out? The adoption of sonship which he received in Christ Jesus at his baptism, and his faith that the gifts and calling of God are without repentance or recall.’ Trench.

20.] What he has resolved, he does: a figure not of the usual, but of the proper course of such a state of mind.

when he was yet a great way off] Who can say whether this itself was not a seeking? whether his courage would have held out to the meeting?

On what follows, see especially Jer. iii. 12; James iv. 8; Gen. xlvi. 29; 2 Sam. xiv. 33.

21.] The intended close of his confession is not uttered:—there is no abatement of his penitence, for all his Father’s touching and reassuring kindness,—but his filial confidence sufficiently awakened to prevent the request that he might be as an hired servant.

22.] All these gifts belong to his reception, not as a servant, but as a son: the first robe, for him who came in rags,—Isa. lxi. 10; Rev. iii. 18:—but first must not be understood as meaning the robe which he used to wear—his robe—this would not be consistent with the former part of the parable, in which he was not turned out with any disgrace, but left as a son and of his own accord: but best, as in the A.V.:—a robe, (yea) the first and goodliest.

The ring,—a token of a distinguished and free person, see James ii. 2; Gen. xii, 42.

The shoes, also the mark of a free man (for slaves went barefoot), see Zech. x. 12; Eph. vi. 15. These are the gifts of grace and holiness with which the returned penitent is clothed by his gracious Father; see Zech. iii. 4, 5.

23. the fatted calf] So Judg. vi. 25. Gideon is commanded to kill thy father's young bullock of seven years old (rendered by the LXX thy father fatted calf): some calf fattened for a particular feast or anniversary, and standing in the stall. No allusion must be thought of to the sacrificing of Christ:—which would be wholly out of place here,—and is presupposed in whole parable.

be merry] So ver. 6., “joy in heaven;”—all rejoice.

Some of these are servants who have entered into the joy of their Lord: Matt. xxv. 21, 23.

24.] dead, and is alive again,—the lost money: lost, and is found,—the lost sheep: see 1 John iii. 14: Eph. ii. 5: 1 Pet, ii, 25.

began, a contrast to the “began” in ver. 14,

25–28.] As far as the penitent, the parable is finished:—but those who murmured at his reception, who were the proud and faultless elder son,—always in the house and serving, but not, as will appear, either over-affectionate or over-respectful,—they too must act their part, in order to complete the instruction. As regards the penitent, this part of the parable sets forth the reception he meets with from his fellow-men, in contrast to that from his father; see Matt. xviii. 27, 30.

25.] in the field—probably working, in the course of his “serving,” as he expresses it, ver. 29. He was apparently returning at meal-time.

musick and dancing] This is one of those by-glances into the lesser occupations and recreations of human life, by which the Lord so often stamps his tacit approval on the joys and unbendings of men. Would these festal employments have been here mentioned by Him on so solemn and blessed an occasion, if they really were among those works of the devil which He came into the world to destroy?

23–32.] Stier well remarks that this elder is now the lost son: he has lost all childlike filial feeling; he betrays the hypocrite within. The love and forbearance of the father are eminently shewn—the utter want of love and humility in the son strongly contrasted with them.

29.] Lo, these many years de I serve thee, the very manner of speech of a Pharisee: as the continuation. Let us ask with reference to the differences in the explanation, Could the Jewish nation be introduced saying, even in the falsest hypocrisy, that they had never transgressed God's commandments?

thou never gavest me answers to the younger son’s “give me” in ver. 12;—it is a separation of the individual son from his father, and, as there pointed out, the very root and ground of sin.

a kid, of less value than a calf.

my friends—who are these? this elder son also then has friends, who are not his father's friends: see Matt. xxii. 16, “they sent out unto him their disciples with the Herodians.”

30. this thy son] The last degree of scorn and contempt,—just such as was shewn by the Pharisees towards the publicans and sinners (see ch. xviii. 11). ‘I will not count such an impure person my brother.’

thy living] A covert reproach of his father for having given it to him.

with harlots] A charitable addition on the part of the elder brother, such as those represented by him always take care to make under similar circumstances. Even supposing it a necessary inference from the kind of life which he had been leading, it was one which nothing but the bitterest jealousy would have uttered at such a time.

thou hast killed for him the fatted calf] Parallel with “he receiveth sinners and eateth with them,” ver. 2. ‘Thou hast not only made him equal to me, but hast received him into superior favour.’

31.] thou art ever with me, as a reason why no extraordinary joy should be shewn over him; other reasons might be assigned, and lie indeed in the background, suggested by his tone and words: but this is the soft answer to turn away wrath.

all that I have is thine, because the portion of goods which remained was his.

32. It was meet] The Father still asserts the restored sonship of his returned prodigal—this thy brother. We may remark that the difficulties which have been found in the latter part of the parable, from the uncontradicted assertion in ver. 29, if the Pharisees are meant,—and the great pride and uncharitableness shewn, if really righteous persons are meant,—are considerably lightened by the consideration, that the contradiction of that assertion would have been beside the purpose of the parable; that it was the very thing on which the Pharisees prided themselves; that, besides, it is sufficiently contradicted in fact, by the spirit and words of the elder son. He was breaking his Father's commandment even when he made the assertion,—and the making it is part of his hypocrisy.

The result of the Father's entreaty is left purposely uncertain (see Trench, Parables): is it possible that this should have been the case, had the Jewish nation been meant by the elder brother? But now, as he typifies a set of individuals who might themselves be (and many of them were) won by repentance,—it is thus broken off, to be closed by each individual for himself. For we are all in turn examples of the cases of both these brothers, containing the seeds of both evil courses in our hearts: but, thanks be to God, under that grace, which is sufficient and willing to seek and save us from both.

CHAP. XVI. 1-8.] PARABLE OF THE UNJUST STEWARD. Peculiar to Luke. No parable in the Gospels has been the subject of so much controversy as this: while, at the same time, the general stream of interpretation is well defined, and, in the main, satisfactory. It would be quite beyond the limits of this note to give any thing like a catalogue of the views respecting it: the principal ones which differ from that which I have adopted, will be noticed in the course of my remarks.

1.] he said also—a continuation, I believe, of the foregoing:—certainly closely connected in subject with it, as is the second parable in this chapter also: see below.

unto his disciples, not to the Twelve only, but to the multitude of the disciples; and more immediately perhaps to the Publicans, whose reception by Him had been the occasion of this discourse. I say this because I believe them to hold a place, though not a principal or an exclusive one, in the application of the parable which follows.

There was a certain rich man....] The history of this parable is, in itself, purely worldly. The master is a son of this world, as well as his steward: bear this in mind:—the whole parabolic machinery is from the standing-point of the children of this world. In the interpretation, this rich man is the Almighty Possessor of all things. This is the only tenable view. Meyer, who supposes him to be Mammon (defending it by the consideration that dismissal from his service is equivalent to being received into everlasting habitations, which it is not—see below), is involved in inextricable difficulties further on. Olshausen's view, that he represents the Devil, the prince of this world, will be found equally untenable. Schleiermacher's, that the Romans are intended, whose stewards the Publicans were, and that the debtors are the Jews, hardly needs refuting;—certainly not more refuting, than any consistent exposition will of itself furnish.

a steward, a general overseer—very much what we understand by an agent, or ‘a man of business,’ or, in the larger sense, a steward. They were generally of old, slaves: but this man is a freeman, from vv. 3, 4. This steward represents especially the Publicans, but also all the disciples, i.e. every man in Christ's Church. We are all God's stewards, who commits to our trust His property:—each one's office is of larger or smaller trust and responsibility, according to the measure entrusted to him. I say, especially the Publicans, because the Twelve, and probably others, had relinquished all and followed Christ, and therefore the application of the parable to them would not be so direct: and also because I cannot but put together with this parable and consider as perhaps prompted by it or the report of it, the profession of Zacchæus, ch. xix. 8. Others have supposed the steward to represent the Pharisees—but then the parable should have been addressed to them, which it was not: and this view entirely fails in the application.

was accused unto him: it is the same word in the original which generally represents false or wrongful accusation. This it was not here, but it was malicious: and the reason why the word has come so generally to signify ‘wrongful accusation,’ is, that malicious charges are so frequently slanderous. The steward himself does not deny it.

The charge against him was not, that he had wasted (A. V.), but was wasting, his master's goods. In this charge (spiritually) we may see the real guilt of every man who is entrusted with the goods of our Heavenly Father. We are all ‘scattering his goods’ If some one is to be found to answer to the accusers, the analogy of ‘the Accuser of the brethren’ is too striking to escape us.

2.] It makes very little difference either in admissibility of construction or of sense, whether we render, ‘why do I hear this of thee?’ i.e. ‘what is the ground of this report?’—what occasion has thou given for this being brought to me?’ or, ‘What is this that I hear of thee?’ i.e. ‘give some account of it.’ I prefer rather the former, because no opportunity of explanation what it is, is given him, but he is commanded to produce his books, to shew how it has arisen.

give up the account of thy stewardship; for (taking for granted the correctness of the report, the steward not denying it) thou wilt not be able to retain thy stewardship any longer,—in ordinary English, thou canst not, &c. The impossibility lies in the nature of things—thou art precluded from. The interpretation of this announcement to the steward, is the certainty, spoken by God in every one of our consciences, that we must give up, and give an account of, our stewardship at death. The great truth lies in the background, that that dismissal, death itself, is the consequence of the scattering His goods—the wages of sin.

3.] The steward sets before himself the certainty of poverty and misery. He has not by his waste of his lord's property been laying up any store for himself;—that is not the point of the parable;—he has lived softly and effeminately, and cannot do an honest day's work:—dig is used for all manual labours. This speech, of digging and begging, must not be sought for in the interpretation; it belongs to the truth of the parable itself, as introducing the scheme which follows, but has no ulterior meaning.

4.] I am resolved: implying, I have just arrived at the knowledge,—an idea has just struck me,—I have a plan.

they may receive me—viz. those who are about to be spoken of, the debtors. He has them in his mind.

Observe, the aim of his scheme is that they may receive him into their houses,—give him shelter. This is made use of afterwards in the interpretation, for which see on ver. 9.

5.] It is more natural to suppose that these debtors had borrowed, i.e. not yet paid for these articles of food out of the stores of the rich man, than that they were contractors to the amounts specified.

of his own lord's,—shewing the unprincipled boldness of his plan for saving himself: as we express the same when we say, 'he robbed his own father.'

6.] measures—this first time the word is baths, for liquids, as the ephah for solids. See Ezek. xlvi. 10, 11, 14.

Take thy bill] The steward, not yet out of office, has all the vouchers by him, and returns each debtor his own bond for him to alter the figure (not, to make another, which would imply the destruction of the old bond, not its return).

quickly implies the hurry with which the furtive business is transacted. The debtors seem to be all together, that all may be implicated and none may tell of the other.

7.] measures—this second time the word is the corus, twelve Attic bushels, according to Josephus. There does not appear to be any designed meaning in the variation of the amount deducted. We may easily conceive a reason, if we will, in the different circumstances of the debtors.

8.] his lord—of course, the lord of the steward. The A.V. ought to have been thus expressed, and not "the lord," and there would have been no ambiguity. He praised him, because he had acted shrewdly, cleverly for his own interest. The point brought out is not merely the shrewdness of the steward, but his lord, whose injury was wrought by this very shrewdness, praising it: for, our Saviour adds, the sons of this world, to which category both belonged—he who conceived and he who praised the shrewdness—are more shrewd (towards the purposes of) their own generation—for the purposes of their self-interest,—than the sons of light. But this very expression "their own generation," indicates that there is a better and a higher generation, the family of light (John xii. 36: Rom. xiii. 12: Eph. v. 8: 1 Thess. v. 5), whose interests require a higher and better wisdom and foresight. It is hardly necessary to add that the discovery of the steward's trick by the master is essential to the parable, as exemplifying the wisely and wiser.

9.] We now pass to the application at once—from the mouth of our Lord Himself. All that is dishonest and furtive in the character of the steward belonged entirely to him as a son of this world: but even in this character there was a point to praise and imitate. And the dishonesty itself is not inserted without purpose—viz. to shew us how little the sons of this world scruple to use it, and how natural it is to them. Now, however, we stand on higher ground: to the pure, all things are pure:—in bringing up the example into the purer air which the children of light breathe, its grosser parts drop off, and the finer only remain.

Notice the emphasis, which ought always to be observed in reading, And I say unto you. It seems to recognize a necessary difference in the two situations:—‘although you are children of the light and the day, and can do no such furtive acts, yet I say to YOU'..... This view will explain how we may make friends of the mammon of unrighteousness, just as we can make an example for ourselves out of the steward of unrighteousness—that which is of itself of unrighteousness—which belongs to, is part of a system of, unrighteousness—which is the very root of all evils, the result, and the aptest concretion, of that system of mine and thine (see ch. xv. 12) which is itself the result of sin having entered into the world. And we are to use this mammon of unrighteousness to make ourselves,—not palaces, nor barns, nor estates, nor treasures,—but friends; i.e. to bestow it on the poor and needy—(see ch. xii. 33, which is the most striking parallel to our text—“when it fails,” with “a treasure which shall not fail”) that when it shall fail,—they, i.e. the friends—(compare the joy in heaven ch. xv. 7, 10, and Baxter’s remark cited there by Stier—‘Is there joy in heaven at thy conversion, and will there be none at thy glorification?’) may receive you into the (or their) everlasting tabernacles. See also ch. xiv. 13, 14.

God repays in their name. They receive us there with joy, if they are gone before us: they receive us there by making us partakers of their prayers, ‘which move the Hand that moves the world,’ even during this life.

Deeds then of charity and mercy are to be our spiritual shrewdness, by which we may turn to our account the unjust mammon,—providing ourselves with friends out of it;—and the debtors are here perhaps to be taken in their literal, not parabolic sense—we are to lighten their burdens by timely relief—the only way in which a son of light can change the hundred into fifty, or fourscore: see Isa. lviii. 6–8.

10–12.] Closely connected with the foregoing;—the ‘faithfulness in the least’ is the same as the prudence and shrewdness just spoken of;—in the case of the children of light they ran up into one—who is the faithful and wise steward, ch. xii. 42;—the least is the unrighteous mammon, which is the same as that which is another man’s—the wealth of this present world, which is not the Christian’s own, nor his proper inheritance. The much,—the true [riches],—that which is your own, is the true riches of God’s inheritance: of which the earth (see Matt. v. 5) forms a part, which God (implied in the who? for there will be none to give it you if you be untrue during this state of probation;—He will not God) shall give to you. The wealth of this world is another man’s—forfeited by sin—only put into our hands to try us, and to be rendered an account of.

13.] See note on Matt. vi. 24. The connexion here is,—that we must, while put in trust with the unrighteous mammon, be serving not it, but God. The saying here applies admirably to the Pharisees and Publicans: the former were, to outward appearance, the servants of God, but inwardly served Mammon;—the latter, by profession in the service of Mammon, were, by coming to Jesus, shewing that they inwardly served God.

14–31.] BY OCCASION OF THE COVETOUS PHARISEES DERIDING HIM, OUR LORD SPEAKS THE PARABLE OF THE RICH MAN AND LAZARUS. The Pharisees were not slow in perceiving that the scope of all these things was to place this world’s goods, and all that the covetous seek after, at a very low price. It will be observed that the sayings which follow are in reference to matters mentioned during the discourses, or arising out of the character of the Pharisees as commented on in them.

15.] See last. note, end. justify yourselves before men—a contrast to “I have sinned before thee,” ch. xv. 18: and abomination in the sight of God, to “joy in the presence of the angels of God,” ch. xv. 10.

16.] See Matt. xi. 12 and note. The connexion is,—‘Ye are they that justify yourselves before men; ye are no publicans and sinners,—no poor and needy,—but righteous, and increased with this world’s goods. But, since John, a kingdom has been preached, into which every one, publicans and sinners too (ch. xv. 1), are pressing in. The true relation however of that kingdom to the law is not as ye suppose, to destroy the law (Matt. v. 17), but to fulfil.’ Then, as an example, our Lord reiterates the decision which He had before given on a point much controverted among the Jews—the law of adultery. But this He does, not without occasion given, and close connexion with the circumstances, and with what had before been said. As early as Tertullian, in the third century, it was remarked, that an allusion was meant here to the adultery of Herod Antipas with his brother Philip’s wife, which the Pharisees had tacitly sanctioned, thus allowing an open breach of that law which Christ came to fulfil. To this mention of Herod’s crime the until John gave relevance. Still the idea must not be too lightly assumed. Bleek’s remark is worth notice, that, had such an allusion been intended, the last words of the verse would have been otherwise expressed. Antipas had not married a divorced woman, but abducted a married woman from her husband. See on Matt. v. 32.

19–31.] Our Lord, in this closing parable, grasps the whole covetous and self-seeking character of the Pharisees, shews them a case in which it is carried to the utmost, by one who ‘made no friends’—with the unrighteous Mammon;—places in contrast with it a case of extreme destitution and poverty,—the very thing which the covetous most abhorred;—and then passes over into the region beyond the grave, shewing them the contrast there also—and ending with a mysterious prophetic hint at the final rejection of the Kingdom of God and Himself by those for whom the law and prophets were insufficient to bring them to repentance. And while it does not appear that the covetousness of the Pharisees shewed itself in this particular way, our Lord here grasps the depravity by its root, which is, a godless and loveless self-seeking—saying in the heart, ‘There is no God’—and acting accordingly. The explanation of particular points see below.

19.] Now connects this directly with what goes before; being an answer, not immediately to any thing said by the Pharisees, but to their scoffs at Him;—as if He had said, ‘hear now a parable.’

a certain rich man.] Tertullian thought that Herod was meant, and by Lazarus John; and this view has been taken by others also: but surely with no probability. Our Lord might hint with stern rebuke at the present notorious crime of Herod, but can hardly be thought to have spoken thus of him. That the circumstances will in some measure apply to these two, is owing, as above in ch. xv., to the parable taking the general case, of which theirs was a particular instance. Others have thought that the rich man sets forth the Jews and the poor man the Gentiles. In my view, the very name of the poor man (see below) is a sufficient answer to this.

Observe, that this rich man is not accused of any fragrant crimes:—he lives, as the world would say, as became his means and station; he does not oppress nor spoil other men: he is simply a son of this generation, in the highest form.

purple and fine linen, the Tyrian costly purple—and the fine linen (for under clothing) from Egypt.

20.] The significant name Lazarus and Eleazarus, the same as Eleazar,—and meaning, God is my help, should have prevented the expositors from imagining this to be a true history.

Perhaps by this name our Lord may have intended to fill in the character of the poor man, which indeed must otherwise be understood to be that of one who feared God.

He was, or had been—cast down, i.e. was placed there on purpose to get what he could of alms.

his gate, see on Matt. xxvi. 69: it was the portal, which led out of the vestibule into the court.

21.] It would seem that he did obtain this wish, and that the word desiring, as would fain in ch. xv. 16, must mean that he looked for it, willingly took it.

The moreover seems also to imply, that he got the crumbs: this verse relating the two points of contrast to the rich man: his only food, the crumbs, with which he longed to fill his belly, but could not:—his only clothing, nakedness and sores, and instead of the boon companions of the rich man, none to pity him but the dogs, who licked—certainly in pity, not increasing his pain, as Bengel thinks,—his sores, as they do their own. Such was the state of the two in this world.

22.] The burial of Lazarus is not mentioned, “on account of the neglect attending the burial of beggars,” as Euthymius.

was carried by the angels] In the whole of this description, the following canon of interpretation may be safely laid down:—Though it is unnatural to suppose that our Lord would in such a parable formally reveal any new truth respecting the state of the dead,—yet, in conforming himself to the ordinary language current on these subjects, it is impossible to suppose that He, whose essence is Truth, could have assumed as existing any thing which does not exist. It would destroy the truth of our Lord’s sayings, if we could conceive Him to have used popular language which did not point at truth. And accordingly, where such language was current, we find Him not adopting, but protesting against it: see Matt. xv. 5.

The bearing of the spirits of the just into bliss by the holy angels is only analogous to their other employments: see Matt. xiii. 41: Heb. i. 14.

Abraham’s bosom] The above remark does not apply here—for this, a form of speech among the Jews, was not even by themselves understood in its strict literal sense; and though the purposes of the parable require this, ver. 23, no one would think of pressing it into a truth, bot all would see in it the graphic filling up of a state which in itself is strictly actual. The expression Abraham’s bosom signified the happy side of Hadès, where all the Fathers were conceived as resting in bliss.

No preeminence is signified as in John xiii. 23;—all the blessed are spoken of as in Abraham’s bosom. See also John i. 18.

The death of the rich man last should be remarked; Lazarus was taken soon from his sufferings; Dives was left longer, that he might have space to repent.

and was buried] There can be no doubt that the funeral is mentioned as being congruous to his station in life,—and, as Trench observes, ‘in a sublime irony,’—implying that he had all things properly cared for, the purple and fine linen which he wore in life, not spared at his obsequies.

23. in Hadès] Hadès, in Hebrew Sheöl, is the abode of all disembodied spirits till the resurrection; not, the place of torment,—much less hell, as understood commonly, in the A.V. Lazarus was also in Hadès, but separate from Dives; one on the blissful, the other on the baleful side. It is the gates of Hadès, the imprisonment of death, which shall not prevail against the Church (Matt. xvi. 18);—the Lord holds the key of Hadès (Rev. i. 18):—Himself went into the same Hadès, of which Paradise is a part.

in torments—not eternal condemnation;—for the judgment has not yet taken place; men can only be judged in the body, for the deeds done in the body:—but, the certainty and anticipation of it.

he lift up his eyes, not necessarily to a higher place, though that may be meant.

24.] “The proud man of earth is the beggar in hell,” Augustine.

On Father Abraham see Matt. iii. 9.

this flame, not subjective (i. e. confined to his own feeling) only, though perhaps mainly. But where lies the limit between inner and outer to the disembodied? Hardened sinners have died crying ‘Fire!’—Did the fire leave them, when they left their bodies?

25.] The answer is solemn, calm, and fatherly;—there is no mocking, as is found in the Koran under the same circumstances; no grief, as is sometimes represented affecting the blessed spirits for the lot of the lost.

remember] Analogy gives us every reason to suppose, that in the disembodied state the whole life on earth will lie before the soul in all its thoughts, words, and deeds, like a map of the past journey before a traveller. That which he was to remember is not sufficiently expressed by ‘receivedst,’ A.V.:—it is analogous to the word in Matt. vi. 2, 5, 16,—and expresses the receipt in full, the exhaustion of all claim on.

Those that were good things to thee, thy good things came to an end in thy lifetime: there are no more of them.

What a weighty, precious word is this thy: were it not for it, De Wette and the like, who maintain that the only meaning of the parable is, ‘Woe to the rich, but blessed are the poor,’ would have found in this verse at least a specious defence for their view.

evil things—not, his evil things,—for to him they were not so.

comforted: see ch. vi. 24.

26.] Even if it were not so,—however, and for whatsoever reason, God’s decree hath placed thee there,—thy wish is impossible.

a great gulf] In the interpretation,—the irresistible decree—then truly so, but no such on earth—by which the Almighty Hand hath separated us and you, in order that, not merely so that, none may pass it. In the graphic description, a yawning chasm impassable.

is fixed] for ever. This expression precludes all idea that the following verse indicates the beginning of a better mind in the rich man.

27.] This is the believing and trembling of James ii. 19. His eyes are now opened to the truth; and no wonder that his natural sympathies are awakened for his brethren.

That a lost spirit should feel and express such sympathy, is not to be wondered at; the misery of such will be very much heightened by the awakened and active state of those higher faculties and feelings which selfishness and the body kept down here.

29.] “Faith ts by hearing, and hearing by the word of Christ,” Rom. x. 17. “We are saved by faithful hearing, not by apparitions.” Bengel. This verse furnishes a weighty testimony from our Lord Himself of the sufficiency then of the O.T. Scriptures for the salvation of the Jews. It is not so now.

30, 31.] Nay—not, ‘they will not hear them:’ he could not tell that, and besides, it would have taken away much of the ground of the answer of Abraham:—the word deprecates leaving their salvation in such uncertainty, as the chance of their hearing Moses and the prophets seems to him to imply.—‘Leave it not so, when it might be at once and for ever done by sending them one from the dead.’

Abraham’s answer, besides opening to us a depth in the human heart, has a plain application to the Pharisees, to whom the parable was spoken. They would not hear Moses and the Prophets:—Christ rose from the dead, but He did not go to them;—this verse is not so worded, ‘they would have rejected Him, had He done so;’—the fact merely is here supposed, and that in the very phrase which so often belongs to His own resurrection. They were not persuaded—did not believe, though One rose from the dead. To deny altogether this allusion, is to rest contented with merely the surface of the parable.

Observe, Abraham does not say, ‘they will not repent’—but, ‘they will not believe, be persuaded.’ which is another and a deeper thing.

Luther does not seem to conclude rightly, that this disproves the possibility of appearances the dead. It only says, that such appearances will not bring about faith in the human soul: but that they may not serve other ends in God’s dealings with men, it does not assert. There is no gulf between the earth and Hadēs: and the very form of Abraham’s answer, setting forth no impossibility in this second case, as in the former, would seem to imply its possibility, if requisite.

We can hardly pass over the identity of the name LAZARUS with that of him who actually was recalled from the dead, but whose return, far from persuading the Pharisees, was the immediate exciting cause of their crowning act of unbelief.

Luke: Chapter 17

CHAP. XVII. 1–10.] FURTHER DISCOURSES. The discourse appears to proceed onward from the foregoing.

1.] The words were perhaps spoken owing to some offence which had happened;—the departure of the Pharisees in disgust, or some point in their conduct; such as the previous chapter alluded to.

2.] See Matt. xviii. 6, 7, and notes.

these little ones] Perhaps the publicans and sinners of ch. xv. 1; perhaps also, repeated with reference to what took place, Matt. 1. c.

3, 4.] See on Matt. xviii. 15, 21, 22. The take heed to yourselves here is to warn them not to be too readily dismayed at offences, nor to meet them in a brother with an unforgiving spirit.

rebuke him] “Love begins with speaking truth,” Stier:—who remarks, that in the Church, as in the world, the love of many waxing cold,—not being strong or warm enough for this rebuke,—is the cause why offences abound.

5.] ‘Increase our faith,’ of the A.V., is not exact: Add unto us, i.e. give us more faith, is more literal and simpler.

This is the only example in the Gospels in which the Apostles are marked out as requesting or saying any thing to Lord. They are amazed at the greatness of the faith which is to overcome offences and for-give sins as in vv. 8, 4:—and pray that more faith may be added to them.

6.] See on Matt. (xvii. 20) xxi. 21. On this occasion some particular tree of the sort was close at hand, and furnished the instance, just as the Mount of Transfiguration in the former of those passages, and the Mount of Olives in the latter.

The mulberry tree is not very common in Palestine, but still found there. It must not be confounded with the sycomore, ch. xix. 4, which is the Egyptian fig. See note there.

7–10.] The connexion is,— ‘Ye are servants of your Master; and therefore endurance is required of you,—faith and trust to endure out your day’s work before you enter into your rest. Your Master will enter into His, but your time will not yet come; and all the service which you can meanwhile do Him, is but that which is your bounden duty to do,—seeing that your body, soul, and spirit are His.’

7.] by and by (literally, immediately) in the A.V. is wrongly joined with will say unto him: it corresponds to “afterward” in ver. 8, and must be joined with go and sit down.

8.] till I have eaten and drunken: see ch. xii. 37, where a different assurance seems to be given. But our Lord is here speaking of what we in our state of service are to expect; there, of what, in our state of freedom, reward, and adoption, the wonders of His grace will confer on us. Here the question is of right: there, of favour.

9.] Our Lord is not laying down rules for the behaviour of an earthly master to his servants,—but (see above) is speaking of the rightful state of relation between us, and Him whose we are, and whom we serve.

10.] This shews the sense of the parable, as applying to our own thoughts of ourselves, and the impossibility of any claim for our services to God.

In Rom. vi. 23 (see also the foregoing verses) we have the true ground on which we look for eternal life set before us:—vix. as the gift of God whose servants we are,—not the wages, as in the case of sin, whose we are not. In the case of men this is different; a good servant is “profitable” (Philem. 11), not useless. See Acts xvii. 25.

The case supposed introduces an argument à fortiori, i.e. from the stronger to the weaker: ‘how much more, when ye have failed in so many respects.’ ‘Wretched is he, whom the Lord calls an unprofitable servant: happy, he who calls himself so.’ Bengel.

Thus closes the series of discourses which began with ch. xv. 1.

11–19.] HEALING OF TEN LEPERS. It does not appear to what part of the last journey this is to be referred. There is no reason for supposing it to have been subsequent to what has just been related:—this is not implied. It may have been at the very beginning of the journey. From the circumstance that these lepers were a mixed company of Jews and Samaritans, the words rendered through the midst of Samaria and Galilee, probably mean ‘between Samaria and Galilee,’ on the frontiers of both.

This seems to be parallel with Matt. xix. 1. The journey mentioned there would lead Him between Samaria and Galilee.

12.] afar off: see Levit. xiii. 46: Num. v. 2.

Their misery had broken down the national distinction, and united them in one company.

On the nature of leprosy and its significance, see on Matt. viii. 2.

14.] One of our Lord’s first miracles had been the healing of a leper; then He touched him and said, ‘Be thou clean:’ now He sinks as it were the healing, and keeps it in the background;—and why so? There may have been reasons unknown to us; but one we can plainly see, and that is, to bring out for the Church the lesson which the history yields. In their going away, in the absence of Jesus, they are healed: what need to go back and give him thanks? Here was a trial of their love: faith they had, enough to go, and enough to be cleansed: but love (with the one exception)—gratitude, they had not.

as they went] The meaning evidently is, that they had not gone far, and that the whole took place within a short time. They had not been to the priests, As some suppose.

15.] The words here set before us something immediate, and, I should be inclined to think, witnessed by the narrator.

18. this stranger] literally, this foreigner by birth. The Samaritans were Gentiles;—not a mixed race, as is sometimes erroneously supposed. They had a mixed religion, but were themselves originally from other countries: see 2 Kings xvii. 24–41. There may have been a reason for the nine Jews not returning,—that they held the ceremonial duty imposed on them to be paramount, which the Samaritan might not rate so highly. That he was going to Mount Gerizim does not appear: from his being found with Jews, he probably would act as a Jew.

19.] hath made thee whole—in a higher sense than the mere cleansing of his leprosy—theirs was merely the beholding of the brazen serpent with the outward eyes,—but his, with the eye of inward faith; and this faith saved him;—not only healed his body, but his soul.

20–37.] PROPHETIC ANSWER TO THE PHARISEES. In this discourse we have several sayings which our Lord afterwards repeated In His last prophetic discourse to the four apostles on Mount Olivet; but much also which is peculiar to Luke, and most precious.

20.] The question certainly is asked by the Pharisees, as all their questions were asked, with no good end in view: to entangle our Lord, or draw from Him some direct announcement which might be matter of accusation.

with (accompanied with) anticipation, or observation. The cognate verb is used ch. xiv. 1 of the Pharisees ‘watching’ Jesus.

21.] Its coming shall be so gradual and unobserved, that none during its waxing onward shall be able to point here or there for a proof of its coming,—for behold the kingdom of God is (already) among you. The misunderstanding which rendered these words ‘within you’ meaning this in a spiritual sense, ‘in your hearts,’ should have been prevented by reflecting that they are addressed. to the Pharisees, in whose hearts it certainly was not. Nor could the expression in this connexion well bear this spiritual meaning potentially—i. e. is in its nature, within your hearts. The words are too express and emphatic for this. The kingdom of God was begun among them, and continues thus making its way in the world, without observation of men; so that whenever men can say ‘lo here! or, lo there!’—whenever great ‘revivals’ or ‘triumphs of the faith’ can be pointed to, they stand self-condemned as not belonging to that kingdom. Thus we see that every such marked event in the history of the Church is by God’s own hand as it were blotted and marred, so as not to deceive us into thinking that the kingdom has come. So it was at the Pentecostal era:—so at that of Constantine;—so at the Reformation.

The meaning ‘among you,’ includes of course the deeper and personal one ‘within each of you,’ but the two cannot be interchanged the one for the other.

22.] This saying is taken up from the last verse.—‘He is among you, who is the Bridegroom,—the Son of Man;’—during whose presence ye cannot mourn, but when He shall be taken from you, you shall wish in vain for one of these days of His presence.

23. And they shall say to you] ‘Ye shall not see one of those days;—therefore do not run after false reports of My coming.’ A warning to all so-called expositors, and followers of expositors, of prophecy, who cry “see here” and “see there,” every time that war breaks out, or revolutions occur.

See on these verses, 23, 24, Matt. xxiv. 23–27 and notes.

25–30.] The events which must precede the coming: and (1) ver. 25, as regards the Lord Himself,—His sufferings and rejection, primarily by this generation,—but in implication, by the world;—and (2) vv. 26–30, which unfold this implication as regards the whole world, which shall be in its state of carelessness and sensuality at that time;—see notes on Matt. xxiv. 37–39. The example of the days of Lot is added here,—and thereby the sanction of the Lord of Truth given to another part of the sacred record, on which modern scepticism has laid its unhallowed hands.

31.] refers immediately to the example of Sodom just related. In Matt. xxiv. 16–18, it finds its place by a reference to the destruction of Jerusalem, see there.

32.] A solemn caution is here added, binding the warning to the example before,—let him not return back—remember her who did.

33.] See on Matt. x. 39, and ch. ix. 24. In connexion here, it leads the way to vv. 34, 35.

whosoever shall have sought, i.e. ‘during his preceding life,’—shall lose it then: whosoever shall have lost it, by self-sacrifice, during this life, shall quicken it then.

shall quicken it] “The verb in the original is an expressive word, derived from animal parturition, bringing forth to air and life what was before concealed in the womb. That day shall come as the pains of labour on a woman in travail (Matt. xxiv. 8): but to the saints of God it shall be the birth of the soul and body to life and glory everlasting.” Wordsw.

34–36.] See on Matt. xxiv. 40, 41. Here, there are two references (1) to the servants of the Lord in the midst of the world out of which they shall be separated: (2) to the separation of the faithful and unfaithful among themselves.

34.] indicates a closer relationship than that of mere fellow-workmen, and sets forth the division of even families in that day.

87.] Where, Lord? i.e. where shall this happen? The disciples know not the universality of this which our Lord is announcing to them, and which His dark and awful saying proclaims; see note on it, Matt. xxiv. 28.

Observe, there is not a word, except so far as the greater coming includes the lesser, in all this, of the destruction of Jerusalem. The future coming of the Lord is the only subject: and thus it is an entirely distinct discourse from that in Matt. xxiv., or in our ch. xxi.

CHAP. XVIII. 1–3.] THE UNJUST JUDGE. This parable, though not perhaps spoken in immediate unbroken sequence after the last discourse, evidently arose out of it:—perhaps was the fruit of a conversation with the disciples about the day of His coming and the mind with which they must expect it. For observe, that in its direct application it is ecclesiastical; and not individual, but by a legitimate accommodation. The widow is the Church; the judge, her God and Father in heaven. The argument, as in the parable of the steward of injustice (so literally), so in this of the judge of injustice (so literally), is “à fortiori, from the stronger to the weaker.” ‘If such be the power of earnest entreaty, that it can win right even from a man sunk in selfishness and fearing neither God nor men, how much more will the right be done by the just and holy God in answer to the continued prayers of his elect;’ even though, when this very right is asserted in the world by the coming of the Son of Man, He may hardly find among his people the power to believe it—though few of them will have shewn this unweariedness of entreaty which the poor widow shewed.

1. always] See 1 Thess. v. 17.

The mind of prayer, rather than, though of course including, the outward act, is here intended. The earnest desire of the heart, is prayer.

to faint;—to languish,—to give up through the weight of overpowering evil.

2.] See Deut. xvi. 18 and Matt. v. 21, 22.

3.] Avenge me of...or perhaps, deliver me from—the justice of her cause being presupposed—this adversary being her oppressor on account of her defenceless situation, and she wanting a sentence from the judge to stop his practices.

4.] The point of this part of the parable is, the extortions of right from such a man by importunity. His act was not an act of justice, but of injustice; his very avenging was injustice, because he did it from self-regard and not from a sense of duty. He, like the steward above, was a man of injustice,—belonging to, being of, the iniquity which prevails in the world.

5.] The word rendered weary is a remarkable one. It properly signifies to smite in the face;—and proverbially (see reff.), to mortify or incessantly annoy. It is the same verb as that in 1 Cor. ix. 27 rendered “keep under.” Meyer interprets it literally—“lest at last she should become desperate, and come and strike me in the face.” It has been observed that the Apostles acted from this very motive when they besought the Lord to send away the Syrophœnician woman,—‘for she cried after them.’ Matt. xv. 23.

6. the unjust judge] literally (see above) the judge of injustice—i. e. who was of, belonged to, the unrighteousness which is in the world.

7.] The poor widow in this case (the forsaken Church, contending with her adversary the devil, 1 Pet. v. 8) has this additional claim, in which the right of her cause consists,—that she is Elect of God,—His Beloved.

day and night] This answers to the always in ver. 1, but is an amplification of it.

and he is long-suffering over them] or,..... and He delays his vengeance in their case:—and He, in their case, is long-suffering, i.e. He is long-suffering to those who oppress them: which though it is merciful to the oppressors, yet may be taken in the light of a hardship to the oppressed.

8. Nevertheless....] This can hardly be, as Meyer interprets it, that the painful thought suddenly occurs to the Lord, how many there will be even at His coming who will not have received Him as the Messiah: for the faith, though it includes ‘faith’ generally, is yet here, strictly speaking, faith in reference to the object of the parable—faith which has endured in prayer without fainting. Or the meaning may be general: the faith in Him, who is the hearer and answerer of prayer.

9–14.] THE PHARISEE AND THE PUBLICAN. This parable is spoken not to the Pharisees, for our Lord would not in their presence have chosen a Pharisee as an example; nor concerning the Pharisees, for then it would have been no parable—but to the people, and with reference to some among them (then and always), certain, who trust in themselves that they are righteous, and despise other men.

The parable describes an every-day occurrence: the parabolic character is given by the concurrence and grouping of the two, and by the fact that each of these represents psychologically a class of persons.

10, 11.] The Pharisee stood (in the ordinary place) and prayed thus with himself:—such a prayer he would not dare to put up aloud. The Church has admirably fitted to this parable the declaration of thankfulness in 1 Cor. xv. 9, 10 (the two being the Epistle and Gospel for the Eleventh Sunday after Trinity), also made by a Pharisee, and also on the ground ‘that he was not as other men:’—but how different in its whole spirit and effect! There, in the deepest humility, he ascribes it to the grace of God that he laboured more abundantly than they all;—yet not I, but the grace of God that was with me.

12. I fast twice in the week] This was a voluntary fast, on the Mondays and Thursdays; the only prescribed fast in the year being the great day of atonement, see Levit. xvi. 29: Num. xxix. 7. So that he is boasting of his works of supererogation.

I give tithes of all] Here again, the law perhaps (but compare Abraham's practice, Gen. xiv. 20; and Jacob's, Gen. xxviii. 22) only required tithe of the fruit of the field and the produce of the cattle: see on Matt. xxiii. 23.

Not all that I possess, which is an incorrect rendering: but of all that I acquire;—of all my increase; see Deut. xiv. 22. His speech shews admirably what his trusting in himself was.

would not lift up so much as his eyes unto heaven—another contrast,—for we must here suppose that the Pharisee prayed with all significance of gesture, with eyes and hands uplifted (see Matt. vi. 5). There is a slight but true difference also in the original, in the word rendered stood of the Pharisee—‘being put in position’ (answering to ‘being seated’ of the other usual posture) and standing of the publican,—coming in merely and remaining, in no studied place or posture.

smote upon his breast] See ch. xxiii. 48, “for sorrow of mind. Where the pain is, there is the hand.” Bengel. The original is, to me the sinner. But probably the article is only generic, pointing him out as one of a class. It seems to me that any emphatic comparison here would somewhat detract from the solemnity and simplicity of the prayer. The definite article rather implies, not comparison with others, but intense self-abasement: “sinner that I am.” Nor are we to find any doctrinal meanings in the word be merciful (or, be propitiated). WE know of one only way, in which the prayer could be accomplished: but the words here have no reference to that, nor could they have.

14.] The sense is, One returned home in the sight of God with his prayer answered, and that prayer had grasped the true object of prayer,—the forgiveness of sins (so that justified is in the usual sense of the Epistles of St. Paul, justified before God—see reff.), the other prayed not for it, and obtained it not. Therefore he who would seek justification before God must seek it by humility and not by self-righteousness.

every one that exalteth himself has been illustrated in the demeanour of the Pharisee;—shall be abased, in his failure to obtain justification from God;—he that humbleth himself, in that of the Publican;—shall be exalted, in his obtaining the answer to his prayer, which was this justification. Thus the particular instance is bound up with the general truth.

15–17.] LITTLE CHILDREN BROUGHT TO CHRIST. Here the narrative of St. Luke again falls in with those of St. Matthew and St. Mark, after a divergence of nearly nine chapters, see note on ch. ix. 51.—Matt. xix. 13–15: Mark x. 13–16. The narrative part of our text is distinct from the two; the words of our Lord are verbatim as Mark; see notes on Matthew. The place and time indicated here are the same as before, from ch. xvii. 11.

15.] also their infants; not the people came only, but also brought their children. Or, the article may be merely generic, as in A.V.

The word used by St. Luke points out more distinctly the tender age of the children than that in Matthew and Mark.

13–30.] QUESTION OF A RICH RULER: OUR LORD' S ANSWER, AND DISCOURSE THEREUPON. Matt. xix. 16–30. Mark x. 17–31. The only addition in our narrative is that the young man was a ruler,—perhaps of the synagogue: see notes on Matthew and Mark.

31–34.] FULLER DECLARATION OF HIS SUFFERINGS AND DEATH. Matt. xx. 17–19. Mark x. 32–34. The narrative of the journey now passes to the last section of it,—the going up to Jerusalem, properly so called: that which in Matthew and Mark forms the whole journey: We know from John xi. 54 that this journey took place from Ephraim, a city near the desert.

32.] The betrayal is omitted

here, which is unaccountable if St. Luke saw St. Matthew's account, as also the omission of the crucifying, this being the first announcement of it; see a similar omission in ch. ix. 45.

34.] Peculiar to Luke. none of these things—i. e. neither the Sufferings nor the Resurrection. All was as yet hidden from them, and it seems not to have been till very shortly before the event itself that they had any real expectation of its happening.

35–43.] HEALING OF A BLIND MAN AT THE ENTRANCE INTO JERICHO. Matt. xx. 29–84, Mark x. 46–52, where see notes.

I have on Matthew spoken of the discrepancy of his narrative from the two others. The supposition that they were two miracles is perfectly monstrous: and would at once destroy the credit of St. Matthew as a truthful narrator. If farther proof of their identity were wanting to any one, we might find it in the fact that so many expressions are common to Mark and Luke: compare the wording of the two accounts. In Matthew of course they are in the plural, as he has two blind men.

39.] they which went before: in Matthew, “the multitude;” in Mark, “many.”

43.] Peculiar (except followed him, which three relate) to St. Luke;—his usual way of terminating such narrations, as it certainly was the result of such a miracle—see ch. xiii. 17; ix. 48; v. 26. He, of the three evangelists, takes most notice of the glory given to God on account of the miraculous acts of the Lord Jesus.

Luke: Chapter 19

CHAP. XIX. 1-10.] ZACCHÆUS THE PUBLICAN. Peculiar to St. Luke, and indicating that though in the main his narrative is coincident with, yet it is wholly independent of those of St. Matthew and St. Mark.

2.] Zacchæus signifies in Hebrew, ‘pure;’ the name occurs in Ezra ii. 9: Neh. vii. 14. He was not a Gentile, as Tertullian supposed, but a Jew, see ver. 9.

chief among the publicans] Probably an administrator of the revenue derived from balsam, which was produced in abundance in the neighbourhood.

4. a sycamore tree] not what we know that name, but the Egyptian fig, a tree like the mulberry in appearance, size, and foliage, but belonging generically to the fig-trees. It grows to a size and height. See on ch. xvii. 6.

5.] The Probability is, that our Lord’s supernatural knowledge of man (see John i. 48–50) is intended to be understood as the means of his knowing Zacchæus: but the narrative does not absolutely exclude the supposition of a personal knowledge of Zacchæus on the part of some around Him. But of what possible import can such a question be, when the narrative plainly shews us that Jesus saw into his heart? Cannot He who knows the thoughts, call by the name also?

abide, probably over the night. See John i. 40.

I must—perhaps it is my purpose, or even more, there is necessity that I should; for especially in these last days of our Lord’s ministry, every event is fixed and determined by a divine plan.

7.] The murmurers are Jews who were accompanying Him to Jerusalem, on the road to which Zacchæus’s house lay (see ver. 1).

with a man that is a sinner] His profession in life, and perhaps an unprincipled exercise of his power in it, had earned him this name with his fellow-countrymen. Compare his confession in the next verse.

8.] This need not have taken place in the morning; much more probably it was immediately on our Lord’s entrance into the house, while the multitude were yet murmuring in the court, and in their presence. Our Lord’s answer, This day is salvation come to this house, looks as if He were just entering the house, not just leaving it; and the day meant must be the same with that in ver. 5.

stood and said has something formal and pre-determined about it: he stood forward, with some effort resolve: see on ch. xviii. 11 ff., where the word used of the pharisee is the same.

the half of my goods I give to the poor] See note on ch. xvi. 9. Zacchæus may well have heard of that parable from one of his publican acquaintances, or perhaps repentance may have led him at once to this act of self-denial.

There is no uncertainty in if I have taken any thing: the expression is equivalent to, whatever I have unfairly exacted from any man. See note on ch. iii. 14.

9.] The announcement is made to him, though not in the second person.

Salvation] in the stronger sense, bringing with it all its blessings.

Is a son of Abraham: though despised by the multitude, has his rights as a Jew, and has availed himself of them by receiving his Lord in faith and humility.

10.] For, the greater sinner sinner he may have been, the more does he come under the description of those (sheep) whom the good Shepherd came to seek and save (Matt. xv. 24).

11–27.] PARABLE OF THE MINE, or POUNDS. Peculiar to Luke. By the introductory words, the parable must have been spoken in the house of Zacchaeus, i.e. perhaps in the open room looking into the court, where probably many of the multitude were assembled. A parable very similar in some points to this was spoken by our Lord in His last great prophetic discourse, Matt. xxv. 14–30.

Many modern Commentators maintain that the two parables represent one and the same: if so, we must at once give up, not only the pretensions to historical accuracy on the part of our Gospels (see ver. 11), but all idea that they furnish us with the words of our Lord any where: for the whole structure and incidents of the two are essentially different. If oral tradition thus varied before the Gospels were written, in the report of our Lord's spoken words, how can we know that He spoke any thing which they relate? If the Evangelists themselves altered, arranged, and accommodated those discourses, not only is the above the case, but their honesty is likewise impugned.

Besides, we shall here find the parable, in its very root and point of comparison, individual and dis-tinct. Compare throughout the notes on Matthew.

11.] The distance of Jericho from Jerusalem was 150 stadia = 16 English miles and 6 furlongs.

that the kingdom of God should immediately appear] They imagined that the present journey to Jerusalem, undertaken as it had been with such publicity, and accompanied with such wonderful miracles, was for the purpose of revealing and establishing the Messiah's kingdom.

12.] The groundwork of this part of the parable seems to have been derived from the history of Archelaus, son of Herod the Great. The kings of the Herodian family made journeys to Rome, to receive their "Kingdom." On Archelaus's doing so, the Jews sent after him a protest, which however was not listened to by Augustus. The situation was appropriate; for at Jericho was the royal palace which Archelaus had built with great magnificence.

13. ten] See on Matt. xxv. 1. The giving the mina to each, is a totally different thing from giving to one five, to another two, and to a third one talent. The sums given are here all the same, and all very small. The (Attic) mina is, of a talent, and equal to about £3 of our money, In Matthew the man gives his whole property to his servants; here he makes trial of them with these small sums ("a very little," see ver. 17).

14.] The nobleman, son of a king, literally, one high born, is the Lord Jesus; the kingdom is that over his own citizens, the Jews. They sent a message after Him; their cry went up to Heaven, in the persecutions of his servants, &c.; we will not have this man to reign over us. The parable has a double import: suited both to the disciples (his own servants), and the multitude (his citizens).

15.] what business they had carried on: not, 'what had gained'

16–28.] See on Matthew. It is observable here, however, how exactly and minutely in keeping is every circumstance. Thy pound hath gained ten pounds; the humility with which this is stated, where no account of each man's own ability is taken as in Matthew, and then the proportion of the reward,—ten cities,—so according with the nature of what the Prince went to receive, and the occasion of his return.

It has been shewn by rabbinical citations that the Jews used the napkin, or handkerchief, for wrapping and keeping their money in.

25.] is parenthetical, spoken by the standers-by in the parable, in surprise at such a decision: then in ver. 26, the king answers them.

27.] This command brings out both coming of the Lord,—at the destruction of Jerusalem, and at the end of the world: for we must not forget that even now 'He is gone to receive a Kingdom and return:' 'we see not yet all things put under His feet.'

28.] Not immediately after saying these things;—see on ver. 5: unless they were said in the morning on his departure.

29–38.] TRIUMPHAL ENTRY INTO

JERUSALEM. Matt. xxi. 1–9. Mark xi. 1–10. John xii. 12–19, where see notes.

37. the whole multitude of the disciples] In the widest sense; it is equivalent to “the multitudes,” Mat thew. The “mighty work,” In the which dwelt, mostly on their minds, was the raising of Lazarus, John xii. 17, 18:—but as this perhaps was not known to St. Luke, we must understand him to mean, all that they had seen during their journey with Him.

38.] in heaven is equivalent to in the highest, and was probably added by them to fill out the parallelism.

39, 40.] THE PHARISEES MURMUR: OUR LORD’ S REPLY. Peculiar to Luke.

39.] These Pharisees could hardly in any sense be disciples of Jesus. Their spirit was just that of modern Socinianism: the prophetic expressions used, and the lofty epithets applied to Him, who was merely in their view a teacher (so is the word rendered “master”), offended them.

40.] A proverbial expression—but probably not without reference to Habakuk ii. 11.

41–44.] OUR LORD WEEPS OVER JERUSALEM. Peculiar (in this form) to Luke.

41.] Our Lord stood on the lower part of the Mount of Olives, whence the view of the city even now is striking. What a history of divine Love and human ingratitude lay before him!

when He grieved, it was for the hardness of men’s hearts: when He wept, in Bethany and here, it was over the fruits of sin.

42.] “Those who lament,” says Euthymius in reference to the unfinished form of this sentence, “are in the habit of breaking off their sayings, by reason of the vehemence of their sayings, by reason of the vehemence of their affection.” Perhaps in the actual words ts spoken by the Lord there may have been an allusion to the name Jerusalem, which itself imports the seeing of peace.

even thou] or thou also, as well as these My disciples. For contains the awful reason which there was for the fervent wish just expressed: it was the Lord’s desire, because.... a trench] Literally, a mound with palisades. Josephus gives an account of its being built. When the Jews destroyed this, Titus built a wall round them,—see Isa. xxix. 2, 3, 4—to which our Lord here tacitly refers.

44.] The verb rendered shall lay thee even with the ground is used in two meanings:—shall level thy buildings to the foundation, and dash thy children against the ground.

thy children] Not infants merely; the meaning is general.

Shall not leave in thee one stone upon another] see Matt. xxiv. 2 and note there.

because of thy sins and rebellions; —t hose might be all blotted out, hadst thou known, recognized, the time of thy visit by Me.

visitation is a word of ambiguous meaning, either for good or for evil. It brings at once here before us the coming seeking fruit, ch. xiii. 7—and the returning of the Lord of the vineyard, ch. xx.

16. It is however the first or favourable meaning of visitation, that is here prominent.

45, 46.] CLEANSING OF THE TEMPLE. see on Matt. xxi. 12, 13: Mark xi. 15–17

47, 48.] A general description of His employment during these last days, the particulars of which follow. It is rightly however placed at the end of a chapter, for it forms a close to the long section wherein the last journey to Jerusalem has been described.

Luke: Chapter 20

CHAP. XX. 1–8.] HIS AUTHORITY QUESTIONED. HIS REPLY. Matt. xxi. 23–27 Mark xi. 27–33, where see notes. ()
(The history of the fig tree is not in our text.)

1.] the days, viz. of this His being in Jerusalem.

2.] or—that is “to speak more definitely”

9–19.] PARABLE OF THE VINEYARD LET OUT TO HUSBANDMEN. Matt. xxi. 33–46. Mark xii. 1–12. See notes on Matthew for the sense; and for comparison of the reports, on Mark.

9.] The parable was spoken to the people—but (ver. 19) at, with reference to, against the chief priests and scribes. Bengel suggests that he addressed it to the people, to guard against interruption on the part of the chief priests.

14. when the husbandmen saw him] This is taken up from when they saw him of the verse before, and is emphatic—On the contrary, when they saw him....

17.] The then infers the negation of Let it not be— ‘How then, supposing your wish to be fulfilled, could this which is written come to pass?’

19. and they feared the people] The copula, and, introduces the state of mind in which this their attempt was made: and they did so in fear of the people.

20–26.] REPLY CONCERNING THE LAWFULNESS OF TRIBUTE TO CÆSAR. Matt. xxii. 15–22. Mark xii. 13–17, where see notes as before.

20.] Spies: literally, men suborned, instructed and arranged for that purpose.

that they might....] they, not the spies, but the chief priests.

The A.V., in rendering his words, has mistaken the construction of the clause. It is, that they might lay hold of him by some saying; “catch him by a word,” as St. Mark. unto the ruling (Roman) power (genus), unto the authority of the governor (species). The form of the sentence in the original renders the separation of the two necessary.

27–40.] REPLY TO THE SADDUCEES RESPECTING THE RESURRECTION. Matt. xxii, 28–33; Mark xii. 18–27, and notes.

29.] therefore: i.e. well then— ‘as an example of this law,....’

34, 35.] Peculiar to Luke, and important. For this present state of men, marriage is an ordained and natural thing; but in “that world,” which is by the context the state of the first resurrection (nothing being said of the rest of the dead, though the bare fact might be predicated of them also), they who are found worthy to obtain that state of life and the resurrection from the dead, are no longer under the ordinance of marriage: for neither can they any more die; i.e. they will have no need of a succession and renewal, which is the main purpose of marriage.

36.] The fact, that they are equal unto the angels, is alleged, not as shewing them to be without passions or lusts, but as setting forth their immortality.

sons of God is here used, not in its ethical sense, as applied to believers in this world,—but its metaphysical sense, as denoting the essential state of the blessed after the resurrection:—‘they are, by their resurrection, essentially partakers of the divine nature, and so cannot die.’ When Meyer says that the Lord only speaks of the risen, and has not here in His view the ‘quick’ at the time of His coming, it must be remembered that the ‘change’ which shall pass on them (1 Cor. xv. 51–54) shall put them into precisely the same immortality as the risen (compare ibid. ver. 42).

37.] even Moses, i.e. that very Moses, whom you allege as showing by inference the contrary.

38.] On all live unto him see on Matt. vv. 31–33: but we have in this argument even a further generalization than in Matthew and Mark. There, it is a covenant relation on which the matter rests: here, a life of all, living and dead, in the sight of God,—so that none are annihilated,—but in the regard of Him who inhabiteth Eternity, the being of all is a living one, in all its changes.

39, 40.] Peculiar to Luke;—implied however in Matthew ver. 34, and Mark ver. 28. 41–44.] QUESTION RESPECTING CHRIST AND DAVID. Matt. xxii. 41–46; Mark xii. 85–87, where see notes. St. Luke omits the question of the lawyer, which occurred immediately on the gathering together of the Pharisees after the last incident. This question of our Lord seems to have followed close on that, which (and not that in vv. 27 ff. here) was their last to Him, Mark xii. 34.

41.] unto them, i.e. the Scribes. The same thing is signified by “How say the Scribes?” in Mark. In Matthew the question is addressed to the Pharisees. I mention these things as marks of the independence of the accounts. The underlying fact is, the Lord addressed the Pharisees and Scribes on a view which they (the Scribes, the Pharisees agreeing) entertained about the Messiah. Hence the three accounts diverge. 43.] On in the book of Psalms, Wordsw. gays, “added here as conveying information necessary to Gentile readers.” This might be well, did the words occur in the Evangelist’s narrative: but surely not, when they are in a discourse of our Lord. If His words were so loosely reported as this, where is any dependence on the accuracy of the Evangelists?

45–47.] DENUNCIATION OF THE SCRIBES. Matt. xxiii. 6, 7. Mark xii. 88–40, with which latter our text almost Yorbally, agrees: see notes there.

45.] This particular, in the audience of all the people, is only in Luke.

Luke: Chapter 21

CHAP. XXI. 1–4.] THE WIDOW’ S MITES. Mark xii. 41–44, where see notes.

1. looked up] Our Lord as yet has been surrounded with His disciples (see ch. xx. 45), and speaking to them and the multitude. He now lifts up His eyes, and sees at a distance, &c.

5–36.] PROPHECY OF HIS COMING, AND OF THE TIMES OF THE END. Matt. xxiv. 1–51 (xxv. 1–46). Mark xiii. 1–37. See notes on both, but especially on Matthew. Meyer says truly, that there is no trace in Luke of the discourse being delivered on the Mount of Olives—but he adds, that it belongs to the discourses in the temple, which begin ch. xx. 1, and that therefore St. Luke alone mentions the offerings. He seems to have overlooked the break at ver. 7, corresponding to the change of scene. three speak of the opening incident as happening while He was departing from the temple; and St. Matthew and St. Mark, of the enquiry being made afterwards, on the Mount of Olives,—i. e. in the evening, when he had retired thither (ver. 37).

5.] The offerings were many and precious. Tacitus calls it “a temple of immense opulence:” and Josephus gives an account of the gilding, and golden vines (presented by Herod the Great) with bunches of grapes as large as a man, &c. in the temple.

7.] That St. Luke’s account alone gives us no trace of a different scene or a different auditory, is a proof of its independence of the others: for how could any rational writer have omitted so interesting a matter of accurate detail, if he had been aware of it?

but when] Their question begins with “but,” on account of what our Lord had said, ver. 6.

8.] The time draweth near, i.e. the time of the Kingdom. They are the words, not of our Lord, but of the many just mentioned: see on Matthew, verses 4, 5.

10.] Then said he unto them perhaps implies a break in the discourse, which the other reports do not notice.

12.] Why the words before all these things should have made any difficulty, I am at a loss to imagine. The prophecies of vv. 7, 8 in Matthew,—ver. 8 Mark,—and vv. 10, 11 here, are a parenthetical warning of what shall happen before the end. And then having stated, that these things shall be the very beginning of the actual pangs themselves (see note on Matthew), the prophetic chronology is resumed from “the end is not yet,” in all three accounts; here, by distinct statement, But before all these things: in Mark by implication, “But take ye heed to yourselves,” by which “but” the following words are thrown back to the “Take heed” before:—in Matthew, by the gathering up of the parenthetical announcements “all these things,” and thus casting them off, as the “beginning of pangs” belonging to the “end,” before the discourse proceeds with the “then” taken up from ver. 6. The whole difficulty has arisen from not rightly apprehending the force of the word pangs as the death-throes of the end.

13.] for a testimony, viz. of your faithfulness, and (Mark) against them.

15.] Luke only. Gainsay corresponds to mouth, resist to wisdom.

16.] even by... ‘not only by strangers’ Bengel.

some of you—i. e. of the Apostles. One of the four who heard this discourse was put to death, Acts xii. 2.

18.] Not literally, but really true; not corporeally, but in that real and only life which the disciple of Christ possesses.

19.] In your Patience (i. e. by your endurance of all these things) ye shall acquire (not, possess, which is an ungrammatical rendering) your souls: this endurance being God’s appointed way, in and by which your salvation is to be put in your possession.

acquire, as “find,” Matt. xvi. 25—“save,” ch. ix. 24.

20.] being compassed graphically sets forth the scene now before them, as it should then appear. On the variation of expression from Matthew and Mark, see note on Matthew, ver. 15.

21.] of it belongs to the “of it” (thereof) of ver. 20, and signifies not “of Judæa,” but “of Jerusalem.” the fields—not “the countries,” or “the provinces.”

It is in the original the same word as our Lord uses in John iv. 35, where He commands His disciples to lift up their eyes on the fields.

22.] vengeance; from this being the same word in the Greek, it is a hint perhaps at ch. xviii. 8. The latter part of the verse alludes probably to the prophecy of Daniel, which St. Luke has omitted, but referred to in “the desolation thereof” ver. 20.

23.] on the earth, general—for this people, particular. The distress on all the earth is not so distinctly the result of the divine anger, as that which shall befall this nation.

24.] A most important addition, serving to fix the meaning of the other two Evangelists,—see notes there,—and carrying on the prophetic announcements past our own times, even close to the days of the end.

they, viz. this people. shall remain trodden down—see Rev. xi. 2.—The present state of Jerusalem. The construction of the verb in the original is unusual, and is made use of to signify a state of duration,—a condition which shall continue.

The times of the Gentiles are the end of the Gentile dispensation,—just as the time of Jerusalem was the end, fulfilment, of the Jewish Dispensation;—the great rejection of the Lord by the Gentile world, answering to its type, His rejection by the Jews, being finished, the time shall come, of which the destruction of Jerusalem was a type. Times has the same me time: no essential difference is to be insisted on. It is plural, because the Gentiles (nations) are plural: each Gentile people having in turn its time.

25, 26.] The greater part of these signs are peculiar to Luke.

28.] your redemption, i.e. the completion of it by My appearing.

34–36.] Peculiar to Luke.

34.] yourselves and your are emphatic, recalling the thoughts to themselves, after the recounting of these outward signs.

35.] There is meaning in sit; on them who are sitting securely.

36.] to be set, i.e., by the angels—see Matthew, ver. 31—before the glorified Son of Man.

37, 38.] Peculiar to Luke. These verses close the scene of our Lord’s disclosures in Jerusalem which began ch. xx. 1. It does not appear, that St. Luke believed our Lord to have taught after this in the temple. Nothing is said to imply it—a general closing formula like this applies to what has been related.

38.] St. Luke relates nothing of any visits to Bethany. He has the name, Incidentally only, in ch. xix. 29 and ch. xxiv. 50, where see note.

On the whole question regarding the history of the woman taken in adultery, which some of our MSS. insert here, compare notes, John viii. 1 ff. This certainly would seem a more appropriate place for it, than that which it now holds.

Luke: Chapter 22

CHAP. XXII. 1, 2.] CONSPIRACY OF THE JEWISH AUTHORITIES TO KILL JESUS. Matt. xxvi. 1–5. Mark xiv. 1, 2. The account of St. Matthew is the fullest;—see notes there. The words here give us a mere compendium of what took place.

3–6.] COMPACT OF JUDAS WITH THEM TO BETRAY HIM. Matt. xxvi. 14–16. Mark xiv. 10, 11. Our account is strikingly peculiar and independent of the others. The expression Satan entered into Judas is found in John xiii. 27,—and certainly in its proper place. Satan had not yet entered into Judas,—only (John xiii. 2) put it into his heart to betray our Lord.

4.] and captains is peculiar to Luke: the others have merely the chief priests.

On the office, see Acts iv. 1. The Levitical guard of the temple would be consulted, because, it had been of late especially in the temple that our Lord had become obnoxious to them (see ver. 53 and ch. xxi. 37, 38). The words covenanted and promised here seem clearly to imply that the money was not now paid, but afterwards, when the treachery was accomplished;—see note on Matt. xxvi. 15.

The concluding words of the verse may bear either the meaning in the text or that in the margin.

7–14.] PREPARATION FOR CELEBRATING THE PASSOVER. Matt. xxvi. 17–19. Mark xiv. 12–16. Our account is the fullest of the three, related however nearly to St. Mark's. By came we must of course understand that the day was come, not, as some would interpret it, was at hand.—On this whole subject see notes on Matt. xxvi. 17, and John xviii. 28. when the passover must be killed literally, sacrificed), i.e. the legal time of being sacrificed. So the narrators in the three Gospels evidently intend.

8.] It was a solemn message, and for it were chosen the two chief Apostles.

In the report of St. Matthew, the suggestion is represented as coming from the disciples themselves.

9.] The question, Where wilt thou? was asked, but only in reply to the command of our Lord.

10.] There can, I think, be no question that this direction was given in super-human foresight, just as that in ch. xix. 30:—see also 1 Sam. x. 2–8, and Matt. xvii. 27. This person carrying water would probably be a slave, and the time, towards evening, the usual hour of fetching in water.

11.] The “goodman of the house” was a man of some wealth, and could not be identical with the water-carrier (see notes on Matthew).

The Greek word rendered guestchamber is not here, as in ch. ii. 7, an inn, but a room set apart at this season of the feast, by residents in Jerusalem, in which parties coming from the country might eat the Passover. The question therefore would be well understood;—and the room being spread, and as Mark adds, “prepared,” would be no matter of surprise.

14.] The hour was evening; see above on ver. 10, and Matt. xxvi. 20.

15–18.] Peculiar to Luke. The desire of our Lord to eat this His last Passover may be explained from ch. xii. 50: not merely from his depth of love for His disciples, though this formed an element in it,—see John xiii. 1 sq. The for in ver. 16 gives us the leading reason. This is the only instance in the Gospels, the absolute use of suffer, as in the Creed, ‘He suffered.’ We have several times “suffer many things,” ch. ix. 22; xvii. 25; Matt. xvi. 21 al.; “suffer these things,” ch. xxiv. 26, and “thus to suffer,” ditto ver. 46.

16.] The full meaning of this declaration is to be sought in the words this passover. It was that particular Passover, not merely the Passover generally,—though of course that also,—that was to receive its fulfilment in the kingdom of God. And to this fulfilment our Lord alludes again in ver. 30. It is to this marriage supper of the Lamb, that the parable Matt. xxi. 1–14 in its ultimate application refers: nor can we help thinking on the faithless Apostle at this very supper, in verses 11–13 there:—see notes on that Lace.

17.] Some Suppose that it is here implied that our Lord did not drink of the cup Himself. But surely this cannot be so. The two members of the speech are strictly parallel: and if He desired to eat the Passover with them, He would also drink of the cup, which formed a usual part of the ceremonial. This seems to me to be implied in “He took the cup,” where the original has a different word from that used by all afterwards, when He did not partake of the bread and wine. This most important addition in our narrative, amounts, I believe, to a solemn declaration of the fulfilment of the Passover rite, in both its usual divisions,—the eating the flesh of the lamb, and drinking the cup of thanksgiving. Henceforward, He who fulfilled the Law for man will no more eat and drink of it. I remark this, in order further to observe that this division of the cup is not only not identical with, but has no reference to, the subsequent one in ver. 20. That was the institution of a new rite;—this the abrogation of an old one, now fulfilled, or about to be so, in the person of the true Lamb of God.

This is generally supposed to have been the first cup in the Passover-meal, with which the whole was introduced. On the possible connexion of this of our Lord with the celebration of the Passover at this particular time, see note on Matt. xxvi. 17 (p. 183, col. 2). After these verses, in order of time, follows the washing of the disciple's feet in John xiii. 1–20, referred to in our ver. 27.

19, 20.] INSTITUTION OF THE LORD'S SUPPER. Matt. xxvi. 26–29. Mark xiv. 22–24. 1 Cor. xi. 23–25. See notes on Matthew.

20.] Here follows, in Matthew ver. 29, Mark ver. 26, a second declaration, respecting not drinking any more of this fruit of the vine.

21–23.] ANNOUNCEMENT OF A BETRAYER. See notes on Matt. xxvi. 20–25. I would not venture absolutely to maintain that this announcement is identical with that one; but I own the arguments of Stier and others to prove them distinct, fail to convince me. The expression But, behold, bears marks of verbal accuracy, and inclines us to believe that this announcement was made after the institution of the cup, as here related. ‘Notwithstanding this My declaration of love, in giving My Body and Blood for you, there is one here present who shall betray Me.’

on the table] viz. in dipping into the dish with the Lord.

22. goeth] A somewhat similar expression to this occurs ch. xiii. 38, “I must walk (the Greek word is the same) to day and to tomorrow;” but that is used of our Lord's ministerial progress this of His progress through suffering to glory.

24–80.] DISPUTE FOR PRE-EMINENCE. OUR LORD'S REPLY. Without attempting to decide the question whether this incident is strictly narrated in order of time, or identical with one of those strifes on this point related Matt. xviii. 1, xx. 20, I will offer one or two remarks on it as it here stands. (1) Its having happened at this time is not altogether unaccountable. They had been just enquiring among themselves (ver. 23), who among them should do this thing. May it not reasonably be supposed, that some of them (Judas at least) would be anxiously employed in self-justification, and that this would lead, in some part of the table to a dispute of the kind here introduced? The natural effect of the Lord's rebuke would be to give rise to a different spirit among them, and the question, “Lord, is it I?” may have been the offspring of this better mind;—but see note on Matthew vv. 20–25. (2) It is surprising to find the very declaration of our Lord on the former strife related in this Gospel (ch. ix. 46–48), repeated as having been made at this Paschal meal,—by John, xiii. 20. May not this lead us to suppose that there has been a transposition of some of the circumstances regarding these various contentions among the Apostles, and that these words occurring in John may possibly point to a strife of this kind? (3) The “I am in the midst of you as he that ministereth” is too clear an allusion to the washing of at by the Lord, to have escaped even those Commentators who are slow to discern such hints. The appeal, if it had taken place, is natural and intelligible; but not otherwise. (4) The diction is repeatedly allusive to their then employment: “sitting at meat”—“eat and drink”—“in my my Kingdom”—all these have reference to things present, or words spoken, during that meal.—I therefore infer that the strife did happen at this time, in the order related here.

25.] See on Matt. xx. 25. The expression here they that exercise authority upon (over) them are called benefactors, also seems to be connected with what had just taken place. ‘Among them, the benefactors are those who exercise authority—but among you, I, your benefactor (see vv. 19, 20), do not so, but am in the midst of you as your servant.’ Ptolemy Euergetes (the benefactor) at once occurs to us;—numerous other examples are given by Wetstein.

27.] Compare John xii. 13–17.

28.] These words could hardly have been spoken except on this occasion, when “the matter concerning me hath an end,” ver.

29, 30.] See above, and note on Matt. xix. 28, see also Rev. ii. 27.

30.] at my table: see above, ver. 21, and note on ver. 16.

31–34.] APPEAL TO PETER: HIS CONFIDENCE, AND OUR LORD's REPLY. (See Matt. xxvi. 30–35: Mark xiv. 26–31:

John xiii. 36–38.) The speech appears to proceed continuously. There are marks, in these words of our Lord, of close connexion with what has gone before. His way, which the Father appointed to Him, is to His Kingdom—but it is through temptations. To these, who have been with Him in these trials, He appoints a king-dom,—but His way to it must be their way: and here is the temptation,—the sifting as wheat. The sudden address to Simon may perhaps have been occasioned by some remark of his,—or, which I think more probable, may have been made in consequence of some part taken by him in the preceding strife for precedence. Such sudden and earnest addresses spring forth from deep love and concern awakened for another.

31.] not only 'hath desired to have you,' A.V., but hath obtained you;—‘his desire is granted.’

you, all of you: not Simon alone, as sometimes understood, even by preachers, from the A.V. only. This must include Judas, though it does not follow that he was present; the sifting separated the chaff from the wheat, which chaff he was, see Amos ix. 9.

32. but I have prayed for thee] As Peter was the foremost (the rest are here addressed through him), so he was in the greatest danger. It must not be supposed that our Lord's prayer was not heard, because Peter's faith did fail, in his denial; this word fail here implies a total extinction, which Peter's faith did not suffer. Though the you all included Judas, he is not included in the prayer; see John xvii. 6–12. We may notice here, that our Lord speaks of the total failure of even an Apostle's faith, as possible.

when thou hast turned again] There can, I think, be little doubt that this word is here used in the general N.T. sense, of returning as a penitent after sin, turning to God,—and not in the almost expletive meaning which it has in such passages as Joel ii. 14; Acts vii. 42. strengthen (or confirm)] The use of this word, and the cognate substantive, thrice by St. Peter in his two epistles, 1 Pet. v. 10; 2 Pet. i. 12; iii. 17, and in the first passage in a connexion with the mention of Satan's temptations, is remarkable.

33, 34.] Whether these words are in close connexion with the preceding, may I think be doubted. They may represent the same reply of our Lord as we have recorded in John xiii. 38. One thing seems clear, without any attempt at minutely harmonizing: that two announcements were made by our Lord to Peter of his future denial, occasioned by two very different professions of his: One,—during last meal, i.e. before going out, and occasioned by Peter's professed readiness to go to prison and to death (‘to lay down his life’) for and with the Lord:—the other,—on the way to the Mount of Olives, after the declaration that all should be offended, and occasioned by Peter's profession that though all should be offended, yet would not he. Nothing is more natural or common than the repetition, by the warm-hearted and ardent, of professions like these, in spite of warning;—and when De Wette calls such an interpretation ‘a mere shift in difficulty,’ all that we can say is, to disclaim any wish to clear up difficulties, except by going into their depths, and examining honestly and diligently. If the above view be correct, I conceive that the account in John of this profession and our Lord's answer, being in strict coherence, and arising out of the subject of conversation, must be taken as the exact one: and St. Luke must be supposed to have inserted them here without being aware of the intermediate remarks which led to them.

This is the only place in the Gospels where our Lord addresses Peter by the name peter. And it is remarkable, as occurring in the very place where He forewarns him of his approaching denial of Himself.

35–38.] FOREWARNING OF PERILS AT HAND. Peculiar to Luke.

The meaning of our Lord in this much-controverted passage appears to be, to forewarn the Apostles of the outward dangers which will await them henceforward in their mission:—unlike the time when He sent them forth without earthly appliances, upheld by His special Providence, they must now make use of common resources for sustenance, yea, and even of the sword itself for defence. This they misunderstand, and point to the two swords which they have,—for which they are rebuked (see below).

35.] See ch. ix. 3; x. 4; also Matt. x. 9.

36.] take was the very word used in the prohibition before. There is a question how this sentence, which is elliptical in the original, should be filled up. Very many authorities make a sword understood after “hath not” (as in A.V.);—but the simpler construction and better sense is to place hath not in contrast with hath, He that hath a purse, &c., and he that hath none, let him, &c. Thus the sense will be complete,—for he who has a purse, can buy a sword, without selling his garment. The ‘sword of the Spirit’ (Olshausen and others) is wholly out of the question in interpreting this command. The saying is both a description to them of their altered situation with reference to the world without, and a declaration that self-defence and self-provision would henceforward be necessary. It forms a decisive testimony, from the mouth of the Lord Himself, against the views of the Quakers and some other sects on these points. But it does not warrant aggression by Christians, nor, as some R. Catholics, spreading the Gospel the sword.

37.] The connexion is this: ‘your situation among men will be one of neglect and even of danger;—for I myself (see Matt. x. 24, 25) am about to be reckoned among transgressors.’

By the very form of the expression it is evident, that the sword alluded to could have no reference to that night's danger, or the defending Him from it.

the matter concerning me hath an end] The prophecy cited closes the section of Isaiah, which eminently predicts the Lord’s sufferings (ch. lii. 13—liii. 12).

hath an end does not merely mean ‘must be fulfilled,’ which would be an assertion without any special reference here—but are coming to the completion of their accomplishment. So “it is finished,” John xix. 30.

38.] Two of them were armed,—either from excess of zeal to defend Him, excited by His announcement of His sufferings during this feast,—or, perhaps because they had brought their weapons from Galilee as protection by the way. The road from Jericho to Jerusalem (see ch. x. 30) was much infested with robbers;—and it was the custom for the priests, and even for the quiet and ascetic Essenes, to carry weapons when travelling. Chrysostom gives a curious explanation of the two swords,—that it was probable they had knives to cut up the Paschal lamb. This certainly agrees with the number of the disciples sent to get ready the Passover: but it has nothing else to recommend it. They exhibit their swords, misunderstanding His words, and supposing them to apply to that night. Our Lord breaks off the matter with It is enough,—not ‘they are sufficient;’—but, It is well,—we are sufficiently provided—‘it was not to this that My words referred.’ The rebuke is parallel with, though milder than, the one in Mark viii. 17,—as the misunderstanding was somewhat similar.

39–46.] CHRIST’ S AGONY AT THE MOUNT OF OLIVES. Matt. xxvi. 36–46. Mark xiv. 32–42. John xviii. 1. For all comment on the general narrative, see notes on Matthew. Our account is compendious combines the three prayers of our Lord into one, and makes no mention of the Three Apostles being taken apart from the rest. On the other hand it inserts the very important additional details of vv. 43, 44, besides the particularity of ver. 41, “about a stone's cast.”

42.] The sentence is broken off at me... If Thou be willing;—let it be so. The A.V. is not a correct reading in grammar.

43.] With the early and weighty evidence cited in my Gr. Test. in favour of verses 43, 44, it is impossible that they should have been an apocryphal insertion. The was perhaps expunged by the orthodox, who imagined they found in it an inconsistency with the divine nature of our Lord. We have reason to be thankful, that orthodoxy has been better understood since. The strengthening by means of the angel is physical—and the appearance likewise. It is strange how Olshausen can have so far deceived himself as to imagine that appeared unto him can imply a merely inward and spiritual accession of strength from above. It is strange likewise that the analogy of the ministration of angles in the Lord’s former temptation should not have occurred to those modern Commentators who have objected to this circumstance as improbable.

This strengthening probably took place between the first and the second prayer;—and the effect of it is, that He prayed more earnestly, ver. 44, and arrived at the entire resignation expressed in the second and third Payer of St. Matthew’s narrative.

44.] The intention of the Evangelist seems clearly to be, to convey the idea that the sweat was (not fell like, but was) like drops of blood;—i. e. coloured with blood,—for so I understand the as it were, as just distinguishing the drops highly coloured with blood, from pure blood. Aristotle, speaking of certain morbid states of the blood, says, “when the blood is watery, grievous disease ensues: for it becomes serous and milky, to such an extent that some have been known to perspire a bloody sweat.” To suppose that it only fell like drops of blood (why not drops of any thing else? and drops of blood from what, and where?) is to nullify the force of the sentence.

We must not forget, in asking on what testimony this rests, that the marks of such drops would be visible after the termination of the agony. An interesting example of a sweat of blood under circumstances of strong terror, accompanied loss of speech, is cited in the Medical Gazette for December, 1848. It occurred in the case of certain Norwegian sailors in a tremendous storm.

45.] for sorrow—the effect of anxiety and watching. The words may possibly express an inference of the Evangelist: but I would rather understand them as exactly describing the cause of their sleeping.

47–53.] BETRAYAL AND APPREHENSION OF JESUS. Matt. xxvi. 47–56. Mark xiv. 43–52. John xviii. 2–11. Our narrative is here distinguished even more than before by minute and striking details (see on the whole the notes to Matthew).

The first of these is the address to Judas, ver. 48, calling the traitor by name, and setting before him the whole magnitude of his crime in the very words in which the treason had lately (Matthew, ver. 45; Mark, ver. 41) and so often (Matt. xxvi. 2; xx. 18; xvii. 22) been announced.

Another is in ver. 49, where the disciples, seeing what would follow, ask, Lord, shall we smite with the sword? which question refers to, and is the filling up of their misunderstanding of our in ver. 38.

Again ver. 51 is peculiar to Luke.

51.] Suffer ye thus far I understand as addressed, not to the disciples, but to the multitude, or rather to those who were holding Him;—His hands were held,—and He says, Suffer, permit me, thus far: i.e. to touch the ear of the wounded person. If this interpretation be correct, it furnishes an additional token of the truthfulness of our narrative; for the previous laying hold of Jesus has not been mentioned here, but in Matthew (ver. 50) and Mark (ver. 46).

53.] There is an important addition here to the other reports of our Lord's speech;—but this is your hour, and the power of darkness. It stands here instead of the declaration that this was done that the Scriptures might be fulfilled (Matthew, ver. 66: Mark, ver. 49). The inner sense of those words is indeed implied here—but we cannot venture to say that our report is of the same saying,

Our Lord here distinguishes between the power exercised over Him by men, and that by the Evil One:—but so as to make the power which rules over them to be that of darkness—while His own assertion of this shews that all was by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God. In the word darkness there is also an allusion to the time—midnight. Compare with this declaration of the power of darkness over Him, the declaration, in ch. iv. 13, that the devil left Him “for a season.”

64.] Matt. xxvi. 57. Mark xiv. 53. John xviii. 13. Our narrative leaves it undecided who this high priest was, inasmuch as, ch. iii, 2, Annas and Caiaphas are mentioned as high priests. From St. John we find that it was Annas; who having questioned Jesus, sent Him bound to Caiaphas, before whom His trial took place. St. Luke omits this trial altogether—or perhaps gives the substance of it in the account (vv. 66–71) of the morning assembly of the Sanhedrim. See notes on Matthew.

55–62.] PETER'S THEREDENIALS OF JESUS. Matt. xxvi. 69–75. Mark xiv. 66–72. John xviii. 17, 18, 25–27. See throughout, table and notes in Matthew.

56.] The word light here seems to be used as accounting for the words beholding him: not so in Mark xiv. 54, where it is merely “he warmed himself at the light.”

58. another (masculine)] In Mat. thew it is feminine,—in Mark, the maid.

61.] See extract from Robinson's notes on Matthew, ver. 69. If, as there supposed, the trial was going on in an open chamber looking on the court, the look might well have been given from a considerable distance. We need not enquire, how our Lord could hear what was going on round the fire in the court, as some Commentators have done. But even were such an enquiry necessary, I see no difficulty in answering it. The anathemas of Peter, spoken to those who stood by with vehemence and the crowing of the cock,—were not these audible? But our Lord needed not these to attract His attention.

63–65.] HE IS MOCKED. St. Luke does not, as some Commentators say, place this mocking before the trial in Caiaphas's house, but in the same place as Matthew, vv. 67, 68, and Mark ver. 65, viz. after what happened there. The trial he omits altogether, having found no report of it. How those who this view of St. Luke's arrangement can yet suppose him to have had Matthew and Mark before him while writing, I am wholly at a loss to conceive.

66–71.] HEARING BEFORE THE COUNCIL. (Probably) Matt. xxvii, 1. Mark xiv. 1. It seems probable that St. Luke here gives us an account of a second and formal judgment held in the morning. The similarity of the things said at the two hearings may be accounted for by remembering that they were both more or less formal processes in legal courts, one the Precognition, the other the decision, at which the things said before would be likely to be nearly repeated.

66. as soon as it was day] Some trace of meeting of the Sanhedrim after daylight I believe our Evangelist to have found, see Matt. xxvii. 1—and to have therefore related as then happening, the following account of what really took place at the former meeting.

67.] First, before this enquiry, took place the “witness” referred to in ver. 71; and the person who said this was the high priest, and with an adjuration, Matthew, ver. 63. The rendering in the margin is the most natural and correct: If thou art (not if thou be) the Christ, tell us. The others, ‘Tell us whether thou be the Christ;’ and, ‘Art thou the Christ? tell us,’ are forced and unusual renderings of the original.

68.] I believe these words to have been said as a formal protest on the part of our Lord against the spirit and tendency of the question asked Him, before He gives an answer to it: and as such, they form an original and most valuable feature in the report.—‘It is with no view to examine and believe, that you ask this question: nor, were I to attempt to educe from your own mouths my innocence, would you answer Me [or release Me]. I am well aware of the intention of this question: BUT (Matthew, ver. 6) the time is come for the confession to be made:—Hence-forth&c.

69.] On henceforth, see notes on Matthew. The words “sit on the right hand of power” are common to all Three: only St. Luke adds “of God.”

70.] We find here, and it is worth observing, the Son of God used as synonymous with the Son of Man sitting on the right hand of the power of God, i.e. with the glorified Messiah. On Ye say that I am..... see note on Matthew, ver. 64.

71.] How would it have been possible that these words should have been said, if no “witness” had been brought forward at this examination, and if the very same question had been asked at the termination of the former one?

Luke: Chapter 23

CHAP. XXIII. 1–5.] HE IS ACCUSED BEFORE PILATE. Matt. xxvii. 2, 11–14. Mark xv. 1–5. John xviii. 23–38. Our account, not entering at length into the words said, gives a particular and original narrative of the things transacted at this interview.

2.] This charge was intended to represent the result of their previous judgment, we found;—whereas, in fact, no such matter had been before them: but they falsely allege it before Pilate, knowing that it was the point on which his judgment was likely to be most severe. The words themselves which they use are not so false, as the spirit, and impression which they convey. The forbidden to give tribute to cæsar was, however, false entirely (see ch. xx. 22 ff.); and is just one of those instances where those who are determined to effect their purpose by falsehood, do so, in spite of the fact having been precisely the contrary to that which they assert.

3.] This question is related in all four Gospels. But in John the answer is widely different from the distinct affirmation in the other three, amounting perhaps to it in substance—at all events affirming that He was ‘a King’—which was the form of their charge. I believe therefore that the Three give merely the general import of the Lord’s answer, which St. John relates in full. It is hardly possible, if Jesus had affirmed the fact so strongly and barely as the Three relate it, that Pilate should have made the avowal in ver. 4—which St. John completely explains.

4.] The preceding question had been asked within the pretorium—a fact which our Narrator does not adduce,—representing the whole as a continuous conversation in presence of the Jews; see John, ver. 38. We may remark (and on this see Matthew, ver. 18: Mark, ver. 10) that Pilate must have known well that a man who had really done that, whereof Jesus was accused, would be no such object of hatred to the Sanhedrim. This knowledge was doubtless accompanied (as the above-cited verses imply) with a previous acquaintance with some of the sayings and doings of Jesus, from which Pilate had probably formed his own opinion that He was no such King as His foes would represent Him. This is now confirmed by His own words (as related by St. John); and Pilate wishes to dismiss Him, finding no fault in Him.

5.] Possibly they thought of the matter mentioned ch. xiii. 1, in introducing Galilee into their charge. The opening words may mean, they strengthened, redoubled, the charge—or perhaps, they became urgent, they were the more fierce, as in text.

6–12.] HE IS SENT TO HEROD, AND BY HIM RETURNED TO PILATE. Peculiar to Luke; see remarks on ver. 12. Pilate, conscious that he must either do the duty of an upright judge and offend the Jews, or sacrifice his duty to his popularity, first attempts to get rid of the matter altogether by sending his prisoner to Herod, on occasion of this word Galilee. This was Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee and Peræa (see ch. iii, 1 and note on Matt. xiv. 1), who had come up to keep the feast.

7. he sent] or remitted him, to Herod. Grotius observes that this was the regular practice among the Romans, to remit a criminal to the ruler or judge of the district in which his crime was alleged to have been committed.

8, 9.] The reason of our Lord's silence is sufficiently shewn, in the account of Herod's feelings at seeing Him. He would not use His discourses or His miracles for liberating Himself from death, any more than He did for ostentation, or to gratify the curiosity of men.

10.] The accusations, of worldly kingship and of blasphemy, would probably be here united, as Herod was a Jew, and able to appreciate the latter.

11.] his men of war are the body-guard in attendance upon Herod.

a gorgeous robe] Variously interpreted:—either purple, as befitting a king,—and why should this not be the very “scarlet robe” afterwards used by Pilate’s soldiers (Matt. xxvii. 28; “purple robe,” John xix. 2)?—or white, as the word rendered “bright” is understood by, some (but see note), Acts x. 30.

12.] The cause of the quarrel is uncertain: apparently something concerning Herod’s power of jurisdiction, which was conceded by Pilate in this sending Jesus to him, and again waived by Herod in sending Him back again. From chap. xiii. 1, Pilate appears to have encroached on that jurisdiction. The remarks of some Commentators about their uniting in enmity against Christ, are quite beside the purpose. The present feeling of Pilate was any thing but hostile to the person of Christ: and Herod, by his treatment of Him, shews that he thought Him beneath his judicial notice.

This remission of Jesus to Herod seems not to have been in the possession of either of the other three Evangelists. It is worthy of notice that they all relate the mocking by the soldiers of Pilate, which St. Luke omits, whereas he gives it as taking place before Herod. This is one of the very few cases where the nature of the history shews that both happened.

Let the student ask himself, How could St. John, if he composed his Gospel with that of St. Luke before him, have here given us a narrative in which so important a fact as this is not only not related, but absolutely cannot find any place of insertion? Its real place is after John ver. 38;—but obviously nothing was further from the mind of that Evangelist, for he represents Pilate as speaking continuously.

13–25.] FURTHER HEARING BEFORE PILATE, WHO STRIVES TO RELEASE HIM, BUT ULTIMATELY YIELDS TO THE JEWS. Matt. xxvii. 15–26. Mark xv. 6–15. John xviii. 39, 40. Our account, while entirely distinct in form from the others, is in substance nearly allied to them. In a few points it approaches John very nearly, compare ver. 18 with John ver. 40, also ver. 17 with John ver. 39. The second declaration of our Lord’s innocence by Pilate is in St. John’s account united with the first, ver. 88. In the three first Gospels as asserted in our. ver. 14, the questioning takes place in the presence of the Jews: not so, however, in John (see xviii. 28).

15.] Not as A.V., is done unto him, but is done by him: meaning, such is the issue of Herod’s judgment: I assume that he has thus decided.

16.] Here, as Bengel observes, Pilate begins to shew culpable weakness in yielding to the Jews. If there be no fault in Him, why should He be corrected at all?—the Jews perceive their advantage, and from this moment follow it up. 25. him that for sedition and murder was cast into prison] The description is inserted for the sake of contrast;—see Acts iii. 14. St. Luke omits the scourging and mocking of Jesus. It is just possible that he might have omitted the mocking, because he had related a similar incident before Herod; but how shall we say this of the scourging, if he had seen any narratives which contained it? If St. Luke had had any materials wherewith to fill up the break between verses 25 and 26, I have no doubt he would have done so.

26–33.] HE IS LED FORTH TO CRUCIFIXION. Matt. xxvii. 31–34. Mark xv. 20–23. John xix. 16, 17. Our account is an original one—containing the count is an original one—containing the affecting narrative, vv. 27–32, peculiar to itself. 26. coming out of the country] See on Mark. after Jesus is peculiar to Luke, and a note of accuracy. 27.] These were not the women who had followed Him from Galilee, but the ordinary crowd collected in the streets on such occasions, and consisting, as is usually the case (and especially at an execution), principally of women. Their weeping appears to have been of that kind of well-meant sympathy which is excited by an affecting sight, such as that of any innocent person delivered to so cruel a death. This description need not of course exclude many who may have wept from deeper and more personal motives, as having heard Him teach, or received some benefit of healing from Him, or the like.

28.] turning unto them—after He was relieved from the burden of the cross. This word comes from an eyewitness.

for me—His future course was not one to be bewailed—see especially on this saying, Heb. xii. 2,— “who for the Joy set before Him endured the cross, despising the shame.” Nor again were His sacred sufferings a mere popular tragedy for street-bewailing; the sinners should weep for themselves, not for Him. for yourselves, and for your children...—see Matthew ver. 25, where the people called down the vengeance of His blood on themselves “and upon our children.” Many of those who now bewailed Him perished in the siege of Jerusalem. Those who now were young wives, would not be more than sixty when (A. D. 70) the city was taken. But to their children more especially belonged the miseries of which the Lord here speaks.

29. the days are coming] Between this and then, would be time for that effectual weeping, which might save both themselves and their children;—see Acts ii, 37, 38,—but of which few availed themselves. These few are remarkably hinted at in the change to the third person, which excludes them—they shall say, i.e. not ‘men in general,’ nor ‘My enemies,’ but ‘the impenitent among you,—those who weep merely tears of idle sympathy for Me, and none of repentance for themselves;—those who are in Jerusalem and its misery, which My disciples will not be.’

On the ‘saying itself, compare the whole of Hosea ix., especially vv. 12–16.

30.] This is cited from the next chapter of Hosea (x. 8). It was partially and primarily accomplished, when multitudes of the Jews towards the end of the siege sought to escape death by hiding themselves in the subterranean passages and sewers under the city, as related by Josephus: who adds that more than two thousand were found dead in these hiding-places, besides those who were detected there and killed.... But the words are too solemn, and too often used in a more awful connexion, for a further meaning to escape our notice: see Isa. ii. 10, 19, 21, and Rev. vi. 16, where is the striking expression “from the wrath of the Lamb”—of Him who now was the victim about to be offered. And the whole warning—as every other respecting the destruction of Jerusalem—looks through the type to the antitype, the great day of His wrath. Now, the days are coming—then “the great day of His wrath is come,” Rev. vi.

17. It is interesting to see how often David, who had passed as long in hiding among the rocks of the wilderness from Saul, calls the Lord his Rock (see Ps. xviii. 2, 46; xlvi. 9, &c.). They who have this defence, will not need to call on the rocks to hide them.

31.] This verse—the solemn close of our Lord’s teaching on earth—compares His own sufferings with that awful judgment which shall in the end overtake sinners, the unrepentant human kind—the dry tree. These things—were a judgment on sin;—He bore our sins;—He,—the vine, the green tree, the fruit-bearing tree,—of Whom His people are the branches,—if He, if they in Him and in themselves, are so treated, so tried with sufferings, what shall become of them who are cast forth as a branch and are withered? Read 1 Peter iv. 12–18;—ver. 18 is a paraphrase of our text. Theophylact’s comment is excellent: “If they do these things to Me, fruitful and ever-flourishing and immortal from my Godhead, what will happen to you, unfruitful, and void of all life-giving righteousness?”—The explanations which make the green tree mean the young, and the dry, the old,—or the green tree mean the women comparatively innocent, the dry, the guilty, at the destruction of Jerusalem,—seem to me unworthy of the place which the words hold, though the latter agrees with the symbolism Ezek. xx. 47, compared with xxi. 4. 32.] Since the publication of the first edition of this work, the additional evidence of the Sinaiitic MS. has made it appear that we ought to read the text simply, two other malefactors: not, as I maintained before, “two others, male-Factors.”

33–49.] THE CRUCIFIXION, MOCKING, LAST WORDS, AND DEATH OF JESUS. Matt. xxvii. 35–50. Mark xv. 24–37. John xix. 18–30; with however some particulars inserted which appear later in the other gospels.

34] Spoken

apparently during the act of the crucifixion, or immediately that the crosses were set up. Now, first, in the fullest sense, from the wounds in His Hands and Feet, is His Blood shed, for the forgiveness of sins (Matt. xxvi. 28), and He inaugurates His intercessional office by a prayer for His murderers—“forgive them.” This also is a fulfilment of Scripture, Isa. liii. 12,—where the contents of our verses 33, 34 are remarkably pointed out.

His teaching ended at ver. 31. His High Priesthood is now begun. His first three sayings on the Cross are for others: see ver. 43: John xix. 26, 27.

Father] He is the Son of God, and He speaks in the fulness of this covenant relation,—“I knew that Thou always hearest Me”—it is not merely a prayer—but the prayer of the Great Intercessor, which is always heard. Notice that even on the Cross, there is no alienation, no wrath of condemnation, between the Father and the Son.

forgive them] Who are here intended? Doubtless, first and directly, the four soldiers, whose work it had been to crucify Him. The words they know not what they are doing point directly at this: and it is surely a mistake to suppose that they wanted no forgiveness, because they were merely doing their duty. Stier remarks, "This is only a misleading fallacy, for they were sinners even as others, and their obedient and unsuspecting performance of their duty was not without a sinful pleasure in doing it, or at all events formed part of their entire standing as sinners, included in that sin of the world, to which the Lord here ascribes His Crucifixion." But not only to them, but to them as the representatives of that sin of the world, does this prayer apply. The persons pointed at by they are all mankind,—the Jewish nation, as the next moving agent in His death,—but all of us,—inasmuch as for our sins He was bruised.

for they know not what they do, primarily, as before, spoken of the soldiers,—then of the council, who delivered Him up, see John xi. 49, "ye know nothing,"—then of all, whose sin is from lack of knowledge of the truth, of what sin is, and what it has done,—even the crucifixion of the Lord. But certainly from this intercession is excluded that one sin—strikingly brought out by the passage thus cited as committed by him who said it, viz. Caiaphas,—and hinted at again by our Lord, John xix. 11—and perhaps also by the awful answer Matt. xxvi. 64,—'thou saidst it'—viz. in prophecy, John xi. 49; see also Matt. xxvi. 25,—and on the sin alluded to, Matt. xii. 31: 1 John v. 16. Observe that between the two members of this prayer lies the work of the Spirit leading to repentance—the prayer that they may have their eyes opened, and know what they have done: which is the necessary subjective condition of forgiveness of sins, see 2 Tim. ii. 25, 26.

35.] The insults of the people are by no means excluded, even if the words with them be omitted: nay they are implied, by the and.... also which follows in the next verse. To find a discrepancy with Matthew and Mark here, is surely unfair:—the people's standing looking on, does not describe their mind towards Jesus: St. Luke reports no more than he had before him: and the inference may be drawn that those whom he has related to have cried out an hour ago, 'Crucify him,'—would not have stood by in silence. On ver. 48, see note there.

the rulers are the chief priests and members of the Sanhedrim, Matthew, ver 41. The concluding words may be rendered either (see the reading in the margin) the Christ of God, His elect one,—or, elect Christ of God. I prefer the former: but either way, the Christ of God must be taken together.

36.] A different incident from that related in Matthew, ver. 48; Mark, ver. 36; John, vv. 28, 29. It was about the time of the mid-day meal of the soldiers,—and they in mockery offered Him their posca or sour wine, to drink with them.

38.] See on Matthew, ver. 37. over him, on the projecting upright beam of the cross.

39–43.] Peculiar to Luke. St. Matthew and St. Mark have merely a general and less precise report of the same incident. All were now mocking; the soldiers, the rulers, the mob:—and the evil-minded thief, perhaps out of bravado before the crowd, puts in his scoff also.

40.] Bengel supports the notion that this penitent, thief was a Gentile. But surely this is an unwarranted assumption. What should a Gentile know of Paradise, or of the kingdom of the Messiah as about to come?

The silence of the penitent is broken by the us of the other compromising him in the scoff.

also alludes to: the multitude—Dost thou too not fear God? (as thou oughtest to do) seeing that....

41. we] He classes himself with the other in condemnation, but not in his prayer afterwards.

amiss] literal unseemly. This is a remarkable testimony to the innocence of Jesus from one who was probably executed for his share in those very tumults which He was accused of having excited.

42.] The thief had heard of the announcements which Jesus had made,—or at all events of the popular rumour concerning his Kingdom. His faith lays hold on the truth that this is the King of the Jews in a higher and immortal sense. There is nothing so astounding in this man's faith dogmatically considered, as has been thought; he merely joins the common belief of the Jews of a Messianic Kingdom, in which the ancient Fathers were to rise, &c.,—with the conviction, that Jesus is the Messiah. What is really astounding, is the power and strength of that faith, which, amidst shame and pain and mockery, could thus lift itself to the apprehension of the Crucified as this King. This thief would fill a conspicuous place in a list of the triumphs of faith supplementary to Heb. xi.

in thy kingdom] The A.V., following the Latin Vulgate (so also Luther), renders this "into thy kingdom," which is a sad mistake, as it destroys the force of the expression. It is in thy kingdom—with thy kingdom, so "shall come in His glory," Matt. xxv. 31, which we (A. V.) have translated rightly. The above mistake entirely loses the solemn sense of comest—making it merely 'comest into,' just as we say to "come into" an estate: whereas it is the chief word in the clause, and "is Thy kingdom" its qualification, at thy coming in thy kingdom.

It will be seen that there is no necessity for supposing the man to have been a disciple, as some have done.

It is remarkable how, in three following sayings, the Lord appears as Prophet, Priest, and King: as Prophet, to the daughters of Jerusalem;—as Priest, interceding for forgiveness;—as King, acknowledged by the penitent thief, and answering his prayer.

43. Verily I say unto thee.....] The Lord surpasses his prayer in the answer; the verily I say unto thee, to day, is the reply to the uncertain "when (whencever)" of the thief.

Today] i.e.

this day: before the close Of this natural day. The attempt to join it with I say unto thee ("I say unto thee this day"), considering that it not only violates common sense, but destroys the force of our Lord's promise, is surely something worse than silly; see below.

shalt thou be with me can bear no other meaning than the ordinary sense of the words, 'I shall be in Paradise, and thou with Me.'

in paradise] On these words rests the whole explanation of the saying. What is this PARADISE? The word is used of the garden of Eden by the LXX, Gen. ii. 8, &c., and subsequently became, in the Jewish theology, the name for that part of Hadéa, the abode of the dead, where the souls of the righteous await the resurrection. It was also the name for a supernal or heavenly abode, see 2 Cor. xii. 4: Rev. ii. 7, which are the only other places in which it occurs in the New Testament. The former of these is, I believe, here primarily to be understood;—but only as introductory, and that immediately, to the latter. By the death of Christ only was Paradise first, opened, in the true sense of the word. He Himself, when speaking of Lazarus (ch. xvi. 22), does not place him in Paradise, but in Abraham's bosom—in that place which the Jews called Paradise, but by an anticipation which our Lord did not sanction. I believe the matter to have been thus. Our Lord spoke to the thief so as He knew the thief would understand Him; but He spoke with a fuller and more blessed meaning than he could understand then. For that day, on that very evening, was 'Paradise' truly 'regained':—opened by the death of Christ. We know (1 Pet. iii. 18, 19, where see note; iv. 6) that our Lord went down into the depths of death,—announced His triumph—(for His death was His triumph) to the imprisoned spirits,—and in that moment—for change of state, to the disembodied, is possibly all that change of place implies—they perhaps were in the Paradise of God,—in the blessed heavenly place, implied by the word, 2 Cor. xii. That this is not fulness of glory as yet, is evident;—for the glorified body is not yet joined to their spirits,—they are not yet perfect (Heb. xi. 40); but it is a degree of bliss compared to which their former was but as imprisonment.

This work of the Lord I believe to have been accomplished on the instant of His death, and the penitent to have followed Him at his death—which took place some little time after—into the Paradise of God. That our Lord returned to take His glorified Body, was in accordance with His design, and He became thereby the firstfruits of the holy dead, who shall like Him put on the body of the resurrection, and be translated from disembodied and imperfect bliss in the Paradise of God, to the perfection of glorified humanity in His glory, and with Him, not in Paradise, but at God's right hand.

44-46.] Our account is very short and epitomizing—containing, however, peculiar to itself, the last of our Lord on the cross. The impression conveyed by this account, if we had no other, would be that the veil was rent before the death of Jesus:—but the more detailed account of St. Matthew corrects this.

45.] The words the sun was darkened are probably added to give solemnity to the preceding, assigning its reason. It can hardly be, as Meyer, that the earth was darkened till the ninth hour, and then the sun became dark also.

46.] The use of with a loud voice shews that this was the cry to which St. Matthew and St. Mark allude. The words uttered are from the LXX, varying however from the common reading 'I will command,' and giving the verb in the present, which is also the rendering of the Hebrew.

These words have in them an important and deep meaning. They accompany that, which in our Lord's case was strictly speaking the act of death. It was His own act—not 'feeling the approach of death,' as some, not apprehending the matter, have commented; but a determinate delivering up of His spirit to the Father.— "He delivered up His spirit," John: see John x. 18 — "no man taketh it from Me, but I lay it down of Myself." None of the Evangelists say 'He died.' although that expression is ever after used of His death stated as one great fact:—but it is, "yielded up His spirit," Matthew; "breathed His last,"

Mark, Luke; "delivered up His spirit," John, The spirit here is the Personality—the human soul informed by the Spirit, in union:—not separated, so that His soul went to Hadés, and His spirit to the Father, as Olshausen thinks. Both are delivered into the hand of the Father; by Whom quickened, He worked His great victory over death and Hell. See again 1 Pet. iii, 18, 19 and notes, and Rom. viii. 10, 11.

The latter part of the verse in Ps. xxxi. ‘for Thou hast redeemed me, O Lord, thou God of truth,’ is not applicable here. The whole Psalm is not strictly prophetic, but is applied by the Lord Himself.

47–49.] Our account, as well as that of St. Mark, ascribes the impression made on the centurion to that which took place at the death of Jesus,—i. e. “that He thus breathed His last.” Something in the manner and words convinced him that this man was the Son of God; which expression he used doubtless with reference to what he had before heard, but especially to the words just uttered—“Father, into Thy hands I commend my spirit.” St. Luke has not expressed the words exactly the same:—but the A.V. has wrongly and ungrammatically rendered what he relates the Centurion to have said, and made ‘a righteous man’ (St. Luke), stand in the place of ‘the Son of God’ (St. Mark);—whereas the words only give the general sense of the persuasion of the centurion. Truly, this man was innocent:—and if innocent (nay, more, just, truthful), He was the Son of God, He had asserted it.

48.] Peculiar to Luke.

the things which came to pass are the darkness and other prodigies, after which we have no more raillery:—men’s tempers are changed, and we here see the result.

smote their breasts.... a sign of self-accusation, at least for “the time,—which is renewed on the preaching of Peter, Acts ii. 37.

49.] See on Matthew and Mark.

50–56.] BURIAL OF THE BODY OF JESUS BY JOSEPH OF ARIMATHÆA. Matt. xxvii. 57–61. Mark xv. 42–47. John xix, 38–42: see notes on Matthew.

51. the same had not consented....] Peculiar to Luke. The meaning is, he had absented himself, and taken no part in their (the council’s) determination against Jesus.

54.) preparation—‘the day before the sabbath,’—which now drew on (was dawning);—a natural word, used of the conventional (Jewish) day beginning at sunset. There is no reference to the lighting of candles in the evening or on the sabbath. Lightfoot has shewn that such use of the word was common among the Jews, who called the evening (the beginning) of a day, ‘light.’

55.] Only Mary Magdalene and Mary, the. mother of Jesus (‘the other Mary,’ Matthew),—Mark.

56.] They bought their spices&c. in the short time before sunset.

Luke: Chapter 24

CHAP XXIV. 1–12.] THE WOMEN COMING TO THE SEPULCHRE LEARN THAT HE IS RISEN, AND ANNOUNCE IT TO THE APOSTLES, BUT ARE DISBELIEVED. Matt. xxviii. 1–10. Mark xvi. 1–8. John. xx. 1–10: see notes on Matthew.

1.] at deep dawn, i.e. just beginning to dawn: “while it was yet dark” John, “as it began to dawn toward the first day of the week” Matthew, and “very early” Mark; but not “when the sun had risen” Mark also: see notes there.

they came—the same women as those afterwards mentioned (ver. 10) who told the Apostles the intelligence. The reference is to ch. xxiii. 55. spices, which (ch. xxiii. 56) they had made ready before the sabbath; in Mark xvi. 1, had bought the evening before, “when the sabbath was past.”

2.] This agrees with the more detailed account in Mark:—and, as regards the majority of the women, may also with that in Matthew:—but not as regards the two Maries.

4.] The narrative does not, as the A.V. (“stood by them”), determine the position of the angels. It says merely that they came upon them, or that they appeared to them; the same Greek word is used in ch. ii. 9. On the two angels here, see note on Mark ver. 5; to which I will just add, that the Harmonistic view, as represented by Greswell, strangely enough puts together the angel in Matthew, and the angel in Mark, and makes the two angels in Luke: see Acts i. 10.

men—to all appearance; the Evangelist does not mean that they were such, as clearly appears from what follows.

5.] They call the Lord simply the living,—Him who liveth, as addressed to the women; but Olshausen's view of a deeper meaning in the words should be borne in mind; for, as Origen truly observes, “Life, in its highest sense, is His alone.”

6, 7.] See ch. ix. 22; xviii. 32. The mention of Galilee is remarkable, as occurring in the angelic speeches in Matthew and Mark in quite another connexion. Here it is said to the women, as being from Galilee, see ch. xxiii. 55—and meaning, ‘when he was yet with you.’

9.] See note on Mark ver. 8.

10.] It seems as if the testimony of one of the disciples who went to Emmaus had been the ground of the whole former part—perhaps of the whole—of this chapter. We find consequently this account exactly agreeing with his report afterwards, vv. 23, 24.

Joanna was the wife of Chuza, Herod's steward, ch. viii. 2.

12.] This verse cannot well have been interpolated from John xx., for the only reason for the insertion would be, to tally with ver. 24, and in that case it certainly would not men-tion Peter alone. That Cleopas ver. 24, certain of them that were with us went, &c. must not be pressed too much, although it does certainly look as if he knew of more than one (see note there). The similarity in diction to John xx. 5, 10—(“stooping down he beheld the linen clothes laid by themselves,” and “went away home,” being common to the two passages) indicates a common origin, and, if I mistake not, one distinct from the rest of the narrative in this chapter.

13–35.] Jesus APPEARS TO TWO OF THE DISCIPLES AT EMMAUS. Peculiar to Luke:—the incident (but from another source) is alluded to in the fragmentary addition to Mark xvi. (ver. 12.)

13.] of them, not of the Apostles—the last mentioned were “the eleven, and all the rest,” ver. 9: see also ver. 22, “of us” (“of our company”). One of them ver. 18, was walled kleopas (equivalent to Kleopatros, probably a different name from Clopas, John xix. 25: see note on Matt. x. 3). Who the other was, is idle to conjecture. Origen, in several places, calls him Simon; apparently from having understood “saying” in ver. 34 to refer to the two from Emmaus, and referring “hath appeared unto Simon” to the present appearance. Epiphanius says it was Nathanael; Theophylact, St. Luke himself. This may shew what such reports are worth. Wieseler believes the two to have been, James the son of Alphaeus or Clopas or Cleopas (but see above) journeying with his father, and the appearance on the road to Emmaus to be the same as “was seen of James,” 1 Cor. xv. 7. Our narrative seems to have been from the report of Cleopas.

Emmaus] Josephus also mentions this Emmaus as sixty furlongs from Jerusalem. There were two other places of the same name: (1) a town afterwards called Nicopolis, twenty-two Roman miles from Jerusalem, where Judas Maccabeus defeated the Syrian general Gorgias: see 1 Macc. iii. 40–57. (2) Another Emmaus is mentioned by Josephus as being in front of the sea of Tiberias: and he adds, that Emmaus means, that there were warm springs there. This was the case also with the other places of the name. Our Emmaus is now called Cubelbi (?).

15.] Jesus himself, of whom they had been speaking, drew near to them. But this expression forbids the supposition that He was here, strictly speaking, in another form, as we find it less precisely expressed in Mark xvi. 12. The reason why they did not know Him was (ver. 16), that their eyes were supernaturally influenced, so that they could not;—see also ver. 31. No change took place in Him—nor apparently in them, beyond a power upon them, which prevented the recognition just so much as to delay it till aroused by the well-known action and manner of His breaking the bread. The cause of this was the will of the Lord himself, who would not be seen by them till the time when He saw fit.

drew near—from behind: see ver. 18, where they take Him for an inhabitant of Jerusalem.

17.] He had apparently been walking with them some little time before this was said. The term used by our Lord implies that they had been disputing with some earnestness: but there is no blame implied in the word. Possibly, though both were sad, they may have taken different views:—and in the answer of Cleopas we have that of the one who was most disposed to abandon all hope.

18.] They took Him (but we must not think of a peculiar dialect as giving that impression) for one who had been at Jerusalem at the feast:—and asked, Dost thou lodge (sojourn) alone at Jerusalem?

19–24.] Stier well remarks, that the Lord here gives us an instructive example how far, in the wisdom of love, we may carry dissimulation, with-out speaking untruth. (See the citation from Jer. Taylor below, on ver. 29.) He does not assert, that He was one of the strangers at this feast at Jerusalem, nor does He deny that He knew what had been done there in those days, but He puts the question by, with things?

19. they said unto him] Either, one spoke and the other assented; or perhaps each spoke, sometimes one and sometimes the other;—only we must not break up these verses, and allot an imagined portion to each. They contain the substance of what was said, as the reporter of the incident afterwards put it together. which was a prophet...: see a similar general description of Him to the Jewish people, Acts ii. 22. They had repeatedly acknowledged Him as a Prophet: see especially Matt. xxi. 11, 46. The phrase “mighty in words and in deeds” occurs of Moses, Acts vii. 22.

20.] The how follows on the hast not known, ver. 18. our rulers] Therefore the two disciples were Jews, not Grecian converts, as some have supposed.

delivered him, to Pilate.

21.] hoped is a word of weakened trust, and shrinking from the avowal that they ‘believed’ this.

redeemed—in the theocratic sense—including both the spiritual and political Kingdom; see ch. i. 68, 69, 74, 75, and compare Acts i. 6.

to day is the third day] literally, he is now in the third day: the words are spoken not without a reference, in the mind of the speaker, to His promise of rising on the third day.

22.] Yea, and... or, but, moreover—equivalent to, ‘certainly, thus much has happened, that’.... of our company—literally, of us:—‘disciples, as we are.’ The Apostles are distinguished presently as certain of them which were with us, ver. 24.

23.] This agrees exactly with St. Luke’s own narrative, but not with St. Matthew’s, in which they had seen the Lord Himself. There seems however to be some hint that the women had said something of having seen the Lord, in the “him they saw not,” said below of the “certain of them which were with us.”

24. certain] See ver. 12 and note. It is natural, even in accordance with ver. 12, that the antithesis to “certain women” before, and the loose way of speaking to a stranger, who (they believed) was not acquainted with any among them, might cause them here to use this word without any reference to Peter being accompanied. But what wonder, if the reports of such a day of anxiety and confusion were themselves disjointed and confused?

25.] The word rendered fools is more properly without understanding:—slow of heart, i.e. sluggish—in disposition—to believe: these were both shewn in their not having apprehended, from the fulfilment of the sufferings and death of Christ, the sequel of that death, the resurrection.

26. to have suffered... and to have entered] The sufferings were the appointed way by which Christ should enter into His glory. It was not the entering into His glory, but the suffering, about which they wanted persuading.

27.] beginning belongs to both the following clauses. A similar expression is found Acts iii. 24. He began with Moses first;—He began with each as He came to them.

the things concerning himself. De Wette remarks, “It were much to be wished that we knew what prophecies of the death and triumph of Christ are here meant. There are but few that point to the subject.” But I take the things concerning himself to mean something very different from mere prophetic passages. The whole Scriptures are a testimony to Him: the whole history of the chosen people, with its types, its law, and its prophecies, is a shewing forth Him: and it was here the whole—all the scriptures,—that He laid out before them. This general leading into the meaning of the whole, as a whole, fulfilled in Him, would be much more opportune to the place, and time occupied, than a direct exposition of selected passages.

the things concerning himself is right: not, ‘the parts concerning Him.’

Observe the testimony which this verse gives to the divine authority, and the Christian interpretation of the Old Testament Scriptures: so that the denial of the references to Christ’s death and glory in the O.T. is henceforth nothing less than a denial of His own teaching.

29. they constrained him] It is not implied that He said any thing to indicate that He would go further—but simply, that He was passing on. "Our blessed Saviour pretended that He would pass forth beyond Emmaus; but if He intended not to do it, yet He did no injury to the two disciples, for whose good it was that He intended to make this offer: and neither did He prevaricate the strictness of simplicity and sincerity, because they were persons with whom He had made no contracts; to whom He had passed no obligation; and in the nature of the thing, it is proper and natural, by an offer, to give an occasion to another to do a good action: and in case it succeeds not, then to do what we intended not; and so the offer was conditional." Jer. Taylor, Sermon on Christian Simplicity. Works (Heber), vi. 156.

with us does not imply 'that they lived at Emmaus; merely in the same quarters with us.

30.] I believe that there was something in the manner of His breaking the bread, and helping and giving it to them, which was his own appointed means of opening their eyes to the recognition of Him. But we must not suppose any reference to, much less any celebration of, the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, Neither of these disciples was present at its institution (but see Wieseler's conjecture, which is at all events worth consideration, in note on ver. 13); and certainly it had never been celebrated since. With this simple consideration will fall to the ground all that Romanists have built on this incident, even to making it a defence of administration in one kind only. The analogy of such a breaking and giving with His institution of that holy ordinance becomes lost, when we force the incident into an example of the ordinance itself. The Lord at their meal takes on Him the office of the master of the house (which alone would shew that it was not their house, but an inn), perhaps on account of the superior place which His discourse had won for Him in their estimation:—and as the Jewish rule was, that "three eating together were bound to give thanks," He fulfils this duty. In doing so, perhaps the well-known manner of His taking bread, &c., perhaps the marks of the nails in His hands, then first noticed, or these together, as secondary means,—but certainly His own will and permission to be seen by them, opened their eyes to know Him.

31.] he vanished out of their sight does not imply His Body to have remained, though invisible to them: but plainly indicates in the original, besides the supernatural disappearance, a real objective removal from them.

32.] 'Was there not something heart-kindling in His discourse by the way, which would have led us to suppose that it was none but the Lord Himself?' not that they did suppose it,—but the words are a sort of selfreproach for not having done so. Compare Matt. vii. 29.

he spoke to us, not merely, 'with us,' as A.V.: it was not so much a talking with them, as a discourse delivered to them.

33.] "They have now no fear of the journey at night, from which they before dissuaded their unknown companion." Bengel. The whole eleven were not there—Thomas was not present. Some have derived an argument from this incompleteness in their number, for the second of the travellers being also an Apostle; see above on ver. 13.

Who them that were with them are, we learn from Acts i, 14, 34.] This appearance to Simon (i. e. Peter—the other Simon would not be thus named without explanation; see ch. v. 8 ff.) is only hinted at here—but is asserted again, 1 Cor. xv. 5, in immediate connexion with that which here follows. It is not clear whether it took place before or after that on the way to Emmaus.

35.] And they—the travellers, distinguished from the others—not 'they also,' for thus we should leave the clause without a copula.

known of them in his breaking of bread] That this should have been so, does not exclude the supernatural opening of their eyes: see above, on ver. 31.

36–49.] APPEARANCE OF JESUS TO THE DISCIPLES. Mark xvi. 14. John xx. 19–23. The identity of these appearances need hardly be insisted on. On St. Mark's narrative, see notes there. That of St. John presents no difficulties, on one supposition, that he had not seen this of St. Luke. The particulars related by him are mostly additional, but not altogether so.

36.] stood in the midst of them—while they were speaking of these things,—possibly not entirely crediting the account, as seems hinted at in Mark xvi. 13,—the Lord appeared, the doors being shut, in the midst (John xx. 19 and notes).

Peace be unto you, the ordinary Jewish salutation, see ch. x. 5, but of more than ordinary meaning in the mouth of the Lord: sec John xiv. 27.

37.] On account of His sudden appearance, and the likeness to one whom they knew to have been dead.

a spirit is a ghost or spectre—an appearance of the dead to the living; not exactly as “a phantasm,” Matt. xiv. 26, which might have been any appearance of a supernatural kind.

38.] Not merely ‘thoughts,’ as A.V., but reasonings, questionings.

39.] There seems to be some doubt whether the reference to His hands and feet were on account of the marks of the nails, to prove His identity,—or as being the uncovered parts of His body, and to prove his corporeity. Both views seem supported by the text, and I think both were united. The sight of the Hands and Feet, which they recognized as His, might at once convince them of the reality the appearance, and the identity of the Person. The account of St. John confirms the idea that He showed them the marks of the nails, both by His side being added, and by the expressions of Thomas which followed. The same seems also implied in our ver. 40.

The assertion of the Lord must not be taken as representing merely ‘the popular notion concerning spirits’ (Dr. Burton); He who is the Truth, does not speak thus of that which He knows, and has created. He declares to us the truth, that those appearances to which He was now likened by the disciples, and spirits in general, have not flesh and bones. Observe flesh and bones—but not blood. This the resurrection Body probably had not,—as being the animal life:—see notes on John vi. 51, and John xx. 27.

42.] This was done farther to convince them of his real corporeity. The omission of the words and of an honeycomb in the best MSS. is remarkable: see var. readd. It may possibly have arisen from an idea in some transcriber that this meal is the same as that in John xxi. 9. The words could hardly have been an interpolation.

44.] Certainly, from the form of the beginning of this verse, which implies immediate sequence, St. Luke, at the time of writing his Gospel, was not in possession of records of any Galilæan appearances of the Lord, nor indeed of any later than this one. That he corrects this in Acts i., shews him meantime to have become acquainted with some other sources of information, not however perhaps including the Galilæan appearances.

The following discourse apparently contains a summary of many things said during the last forty days before the ascension;—they cannot have been said on this evening;—for after the command in ver. 49, the disciples would not have gone away into Galilee. Whether the Evangelist regarded it as a summary, is to me extremely doubtful. Knowing apparently of no Galilæan appearances, he seems to relate the command of ver. 49, both here and in the Acts, as intended to apply to the whole time between the Resurrection and the Ascension.

These are my words... i.e. ‘behold the realization of My words,’ &c.

which I spoke: see ch. xviii. 31–33; xxii. 37; Matt. xxvi. 56 al.; but doubtless He had often said things to them on these matters, which have not been recorded for us. So in John x. 25, we have perhaps a reference to a saying not recorded.

This threefold division of the O.T. is the ordinary Jewish one, into the Law, Prophets, and Hagiographa,—the first containing the Pentateuch;—the second Joshua, Judges, the four books of Kings, and the Prophets, except Daniel;—the third the Psalms, and all the rest of the canonical books:—Daniel, Esther, Ezra, and Nehemiah being reckoned as one book, and the Chronicles closing the canon.

47.] The substance of the preaching of the Gospel literally corresponded to this description—see Acts ii. 38: “Repent and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of sins,”—were the words of the first sermon preached at Jerusalem.

48. ye] From what follows, Acts i. 22, if these words are to be taken in their strict sense, they must have been spoken only to the Apostles;—they may however have been more general, and said to all present.

49.] This promise is explained (Acts i. 5) to be the baptism with the Holy Ghost,—and the time is limited to ‘not many days hence.’

I send (the I is emphatic)] The procession of the Holy Spirit from the Son is clearly here declared, as well as that from the Father. And consequently we find St. Peter, in Acts ii. 33, referring back to these very words, in ascribing the outpouring of the Spirit to the now exalted Saviour. In that verse, the “I” of this is filled up by “being by the right hand of God exalted”—the proper supplement of it here also.

The promise itself is not found in the three Gospels, but expressly and frequently in John xiv.—xvi.: see xiv. 16—26; xv. 26; xvi. 7—1], 13, 14,

The present, I send, is not equivalent to a future, but implies that the actual work is done, and the state brought in, by which that sending is accomplished;—viz. the giving of the ‘all power in heaven and earth,’ Matt. xxviii. 18. The words “of Jerusalem” have probably been interpolated by some who, believing these words to represent the Galilæan discourse, placed it here for an explanation: or perhaps Acts i. 4 gave occasion to it. This command must have been (historically) uttered after the return from Galilee: see above.

be clothed with] verb here has its full meaning, of abiding upon and characterizing, as a garment does the person. This, as Stier remarks, was the true and complete clothing of the nakedness of the Fall.

50.] The Ascension appears to be related as taking place after the above words were spoken—but there is an uncertainty and want of specification about the narrative, which forbids us to conclude that it is intended as following immediately upon them. This, however, can only be said as taking the other Gospels and Acts i. into account: if we had none but the Gospel of St. Luke, we should certainly say that the Lord ascended after the appearance to the Apostles and others, on the evening of the day of His resurrection.

he led them out, i.e. probably, from the words “in the city” just having occurred, outside Jerusalem: but the “out” might only apply to the house in which they were: see Matt. xxvi. 75.

as far as to Bethany—not quite to the village itself, but over the brow of the Mount of Olives, where it descends on Bethany: see Acts i. 12. (The synonymousness of these two expressions may shew that the same is meant, when, Mark xi. 11, our Lord is said to have gone out at night to Bethany, and Luke xxi. 37, to the Mount of Olives.)

51.] he was parted from them—not, ‘He went a little distance from them previous to His ascension,’—as Meyer would interpret it; but the two verbs belong to one and the same incident,—he was parted from them and borne up into heaven. We need not understand, ‘by an angel,’ or ‘by a cloud;’ the absolute passive is best.

The tense is imperfect, signifying the continuance of the going up during the “worshipping” of the next verse.

The more particular account of the Ascension is given Acts i. 9—12, where see notes. That account is in perfect accordance with this, but supplementary to it.

52. they worshipped him] This had been done before by the women, Matt. xxviii. 9, and by the disciples on the mountain in Galilee. This however was a more solemn act of worship, now paid to Him as exalted to God’s right hand.

53.] continually,—not ‘all their time;’—daily, at the hours of prayer: see Acts i. 13, 14; iii. 1.

A few words must be appended here in vindication of THE CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE ASCENSION. To those who doubt the fact of an Ascension at all, I have nothing to say, standing as I do altogether on different ground from them.

The Lord Himself foretold His Ascension, John vi. 62; xx. 17:—it was immediately after His disappearance from the earth expressly announced by the Apostles, Acts ii. 33, 34; v. 31:—continued to be an article of their preaching and teaching, 1 Pet. iii. 22; Eph. ii. 6; iv. 10; 1 Tim. iii. 16. So far should we have been assured of it, even had we not possessed the testimonies of St. Luke here and in the Acts:—for the fragment superadded to the Gospel of St. Mark merely states the fact, not the manner of it. But, to take first the à priori view,—is it probable that our Lord would have left so weighty a fact in His history on earth, without witnesses? And might we not have concluded from the wording of John vi. 62, that our Lord must have intended an ascension in the sight of some of those to whom He spoke, and that the Evangelist himself gives that hint, by recording those words without comment, that he had seen it?

Then again, is there any thing in the bodily state of our Lord after His Resurrection, which raises any even the least, difficulty here? He appeared suddenly, and vanished suddenly, when He pleased:—when it pleased Him, He ate, He spoke, He walked; but his Body was the Body of the Resurrection;—only not yet his Body of Glory (Phil. iii. 21), because He had not yet assumed that glory: but that He could assume it, and did assume it at his Ascension, will be granted by all who believe in Him as the Son of God. So that it seems, on à priori grounds, probable that, granted the fact of the Ascension, it did take place in some such manner as our accounts relate:—in the sight of the disciples, and by the uplifting of the risen Body of the Lord towards that which is to those on this earth the visible heaven.

This being so, let us now, secondly, regard the matter à posteriori. We possess two accounts of the circumstances of this Ascension, written by the same person, and that person a contemporary of the Apostles themselves. Of the genuineness of these accounts there never was a doubt. How improbable that, St. Luke should have related what any Apostles, or apostolic persons might have contradicted? How improbable that the universal Church, founded by those who are said to have been eye-witnesses of this event, should have received these too ac-counts as authentic, if they were not so? That these accounts themselves are never referred to in the Epistles, is surely no argument against them. If an occasion had arisen, such as necessitated the writing of 1 Cor. xv., there can be little doubt that St. Paul would have been as particular in the circumstances of the Ascension, as he has been in those of the Resurrection. The fact is, that by far the greatest difficulty remains to be solved by those who can imagine a myth or fiction on this subject to have arisen in the first age of the Church. Such a supposition is not more repugnant to our Christian faith and reverence, than it is to common sense and historical consistency.

THE GOSPEL ACCORDING TO JOHN

John: Chapter 1

CHAP. I. 1–18.] Prologue: in which is contained the substance and subject of the whole Gospel. THE ETERNAL WORD OF GOD, THE SOURCE OF ALL EXISTENCE, LIFE, AND LIGHT, BECAME FLESH, DWELT AMONG US, WAS WITNESSED TO BY JOHN, REJECTED BY HIS OWN PEOPLE, BUT RECEIVED BY SOME, WHO HAD POWER GIVEN THEM TO BECOME THE SONS OF GOD. HE WAS THE PERFECTION AND END OF GOD's REVELATION OF HIMSELF; WHICH WAS PARTIALLY MADE IN THE LAW, BUT FULLY DECLARED IN JESUS CHRIST.

1–5.] THE ETERNAL PRE-EXISTENCE OF THE WORD: HIS PERSONAL DISTINCTNESS; BUT ESSENTIAL UNITY WITH GOD. His WORKING IN CREATION, AND IN THE ENLIGHTENING OF MEN, BEFORE HIS MANIFESTATION IN THE FLESH; HIS NON-APPREHENSION BY THEM.

1.] Before commenting on the truths here declared, it is absolutely necessary to discuss the one term on which the whole turns: viz. THE WORD. This term is used by St. John without explanation, as bearing a meaning well known to his readers. The enquiry concerning that meaning must therefore be conducted on historical, not on mere grammatical grounds. And the most important elements of the enquiry are, (I.) the usage of speech as regards the term, by St. John himself and other biblical writers: and (II.) the purely historical information which we possess on the ideas attached to the term.

(a) From the first consideration we find, that in other biblical authors, as well as in John, the term LOGOS, which is the original word here, is never used to signify the divine Reason or Mind; nor indeed those of any human creature. These ideas are otherwise expressed. The usual Scripture meaning of Logos is speech, or word. The logos of God is the creative, declarative, injunctive Word of God.

(b) That this is also the import in our prologue, is manifest, from the evident relation which it bears to the opening of the history of creation in Genesis. “The Word” is not an attribute of God, but an acting reality, by which the Eternal and Infinite is the great first cause of the created and finite.

(c) Again, this “Word” is undoubtedly in our prologue, personal:—not an abstraction merely, nor a personification,—not the speaking word of God, once manifested in the prophets and afterwards fully declared in Christ, as Luthardt, comparing our prologue with Heb. i. 1,—but a PERSON: for “the Word was with God,” and “the Word became flesh.:” also the Word was God, not was God's:—which certainly would be said of none but a PERSON.

(d) Moreover, the WORD is identical with JESUS CHRIST, as the pre-existing Son of God. A comparison of verses 14 and 15 will place this beyond doubt.

(e) And Jesus Christ is the Word of God, not because He speaks the word;—nor because He is the One promised or spoken of,—nor because He is the Author and source of the Word as spoken in the Scriptures, &c.,—any more than his being called life and light implies only that He is the Giver of life and light: but because the Word dwells in and speaks from him, just as the Light dwells in and shines from, and the Life lives in and works from, Him.

(f) This WORD, which became flesh, is not from, nor of, Time or Space (ch. iii. 31; viii. 58); but eternally pre-existent.—and manifested in Time and Space, for the gracious ends of divine Love in Redemption (ch. iii. 16, 17).

(g) This Word spoke in the law and prophets, yet partially and imperfectly (ver. 17; ch. v. 39, 46); but in the personal WORD, spoke forth in fulness of grace and truth. It was He who made the worlds (ver. 3); He, who appeared to Isaiah (Isa. vi. compare ch. xii. 41); He, whose glory is manifested in His power over nature (ch. ii. 11); He, by reception of whom the new birth is wrought (ch. i. 12, 13); who has power over all flesh (ch. xvii. 2),—and can bestow eternal life (ibid.); whose very sufferings were His glory, and the glorifying of God (ch. xvii. 1 al.); and who, after those sufferings, resumed, and now has, the glory which He had with the Father before the world began (ch. xviii. 5, 24).

(h) Luthardt, in his Commentary on this Gospel, has propounded the following view of the term “Word” and its usage: “Jesus Christ is the fulness of that word of God which was fragmentarily manifested in the prophets (Heb. i. 1). But in this prologue, ‘the Word’ is not to be taken as identical with Jesus not yet incarnate, nor is He the subject of vv. 1 ff.” And he urges ch. x. 35, 36 (see note there, where I have discussed this) as a key text to the meaning of “the Word.”

It seems to me, that while much of his view is true and sound, that part of it will not hold which denies the identity of the pre-existent “Word” with Jesus, in the Apostle’s mind. Had he intended by the “Word” of vv. 1–4 any other than the personal Son of God, who in ver. 14 became flesh, I do not see how “was with God,” and “was God,” could be used of “the Word.”

Nor again can I consent with him to disconnect the use of “Logos” by St. John from its previous history. The reasons given in this note for believing such use, as matter of fact, to have been prepared by the Alexandrine philosophy, are no way affected by the objections which he alleges, the difference between the “Logos” of St. John and that of Philo, and the corrupt character of the philosophy itself.

II. (a) We are now secondly to enquire, how it came that St. John found this term “Logos” so ready made to his hands, as to require no explanation. The answer to this will be found by tracing the gradual personification of the Word, or Wisdom of God, in the O.T. and Jewish writings.

(b) We find faint traces of this personification in the book of Psalms: see Ps. xxxiii. 4, 6; cxix. 89, 105; cvii. 20; cxlvii. 15, 18. But it was not the mere offspring of poetic diction. For the whole form and expression of the O.T. revelation was that of the Word of God. The Mosaic History opens with ‘God said, Let there be light.’ Spoken commands, either openly, or in visions, were the communications from God to man. It is the Word, in all the Prophets; the Word, in the Law; in short, the Word, in all God’s dealings with his people: see further, Isa. xl. 8; lv. 10, 11; Jer. xxiii. 29 al.

(c) And as the Word of God was the constant idea for His revelations relatively to man, so was the Wisdom of God, for those which related to His own essence and attributes. That this was a later form of expression than the simple recognition of the divine Word in the Mosaic and early historical books, would naturally be the case, in the unfolding of spiritual knowledge and divine contemplation. His Almighty was first felt, before His Wisdom and moral Purity were appreciated. In the books of Job (ch. xxvii. 12 ff.) and the Proverbs (ch. viii. ix.) we find this Wisdom of God personified; in the latter in very plain and striking terms; and this not poetically only, but practically; ascribing to the Wisdom of God all his revelation of Himself in His works of Creation and Providence. So that this Wisdom embraced in fact in itself the Power of God; and there wanted but the highest divine attribute, Love, to complete the idea. But this was reserved for the N.T. manifestation.

(d) The next evidences of the gradual personification of the Wisdom of God are found in the two Apocryphal Books, the Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach, and the Wisdom of Solomon. The first of these, originally written in Hebrew, belongs probably to the latter half of the second century before Christ. In ch. i. 1, Wisdom is said to be “from the Lord; and with Him for ever:?” and in ver. 4, “Wisdom hath been created before all things.” Then in ch. xxiv. 9–21, the same strain is continued; “He created me from the beginning before the world,” &c., and the passage concludes with these remarkable words, “They that eat me shall yet be hungry, and they that drink me shall yet be thirsty.”

In the book of the Wisdom of Solomon, dating probably about 100 before Christ, we find (in ch. vi. 22—ch. ix.) a similar personification and eulogy of Wisdom. In this remarkable passage we have “Wisdom, that sitteth by Thy throne” (ch. ix. 4)—said to have been “present when Thou madest the world” (ch. ix. 9)—parallelized with “Thy word” (ch. ix. 1, 2: see also ch. xvi. 12). In ch. xviii. 15, 16, the “Almighty Word” is set forth as an Angel coming down from heaven, and destroying the Egyptians.

It seems highly probable that the author’s monotheistic views were confused by the admixture of Platonism, and that he regarded Wisdom as a kind of soul of the world. He occasionally puts her for God, occasionally for an attribute of God. But he had not attained that near approach to a personal view which we shall find in the next step of our enquiry. (e) The large body of Jews resident in Alexandria were celebrated for their gnosis, or religious philosophy. The origin of this philosophy must be referred to the mixture of the Jewish religious element with the speculative philosophies of the Greeks, more especially with that of Plato, and with ideas acquired during the captivity from Oriental sources. One of these Alexandrine writers in the second century A.C. was Aristobulus, some fragments of whose works have been preserved to us. He tells us that by the “voice of God” we are not to understand a “spoken word,” but the whole working of God in the creation of the world.

But the most complete representation of the Judeo-alexandrine gnosis, or philosophic theology, has come down to us in the works of Philo, who flourished cir. A.D. 40–50. It would be out of the province of a note to give a review of the system of Philo: the result only of such review will be enough. He identifies the “word” with the “wisdom” of God; it is the “image of God”; the “archetype and pattern of light, but itself like none of created things:” “the eldest of begotten things:” “the eldest son of the Father of all that are:” “His first-begotten, the eldest angel, being as an archangel with many names” (i. 427): “the shadow of God, using whom as an instrument He made the world:” “through whom the world was constituted:” “The Father which begat all gave to the Arch-angel and the eldest born, the Word, the eminent prerogative, that, standing between, he might divide the made from the Maker;... and He (the Word) rejoices in the prerogative.... not being unbegotten, as God, nor begotten, as we, but intermediate between the extremes, acting as a hostage to both:” “there are, as it seems, two temples of God; one, this world, in which also His first-begotten divine Word is High Priest:” “the viceroy of God:” “he contains and hath fulfilled all things:” “the second God, which is His Word.” These instances, the number of which might be much enlarged, will serve to shew how remarkably near to the diction and import of some passages in our Gospel Philo approached in speaking of the Word.

At the same time there is a wide and unmistakable difference between his “Word” and that of the Apostle. He does not distinguish it from the Spirit of God, nor does he connect it with any Messianic ideas, though these latter were familiar to him. Besides, his views are strangely compounded of Platonism and Judaism. The “Word” seems with him to be one comprehending, or ruling, the “powers” or “ideas” of God, which, although borrowed from Plato, he Judaically calls “angels,” and the “Word” their “archangel.” We see by this however how fixed and prepared the term, and many of its attributes, were in the religious philosophy of the Alexandrine Jews.

(f) Meanwhile the Chaldee paraphrasts of the O.T. had habitually used such expressions as ‘the glory,’ or ‘the presence,’ or ‘the word,’ of God,—in places where nothing but His own agency could be understood. ‘The latter of these—the Memra, or word of God,—is used in so strictly personal a sense, that there can be little doubt that the Paraphrasts understood by it a divine Person or Emanation.

(g) From these elements, the Alexandrine and Jewish views of the “Word” or “Wisdom” of God, there appear to have arisen very early among Christians, both orthodox and heretic, formal expressions, in which these or equivalent terms were used. Of this the Apostle Paul furnishes the most eminent example. His teacher Gamaliel united in his instruction both these elements, and they are very perceptible in the writings of his pupil. But we do not find in them any direct use of the term “WORD,” as personally applied to the Son of God. This shews him to have spoken mainly according to the Jewish school,—among whom, as Origen states, he could find none who held “that the WORD was the Son of God.”

(h) We find a much nearer approximation to the Alexandrine method of speech in the Epistle to the Hebrews, written evidently by some disciple intimately acquainted with the Alexandrine gnosis (see the opening verses, and especially “upholding all things by the word of His power”). But even there we have not the “Logos” identified personally with the Lord Jesus Christ, or indeed personally spoken so at all,—however near some passages may seem to approach to this usage (ch. iv. 12, 13; xi. 3).

(i) The Alexandrine gnosis was immediately connected with Ephesus, where the Gospel of John was probably written. Apollos (Acts xviii. 24) came thither from Alexandria; and Cerinthus is related by Theodoret to have studied and formed his philosophic system in Egypt, before coming to Ephesus.

(j) These notices will serve to account for the term “Logos” being already found by St. John framed to his use; and the anti-Gnostic tendency of his writings will furnish an additional reason why he should rescue such important truths as the pre-existence and attributes of the divine “Word” from the perversions which false philosophy had begun to make of them.

(k) In all that has been said in this note, no insinuation has been conveyed that either the Apostle Paul, or the Writer to the Hebrews, or John, adopted in any degree their TEACHING from the existing philosophies. Their teaching (which is totally distinct from any of those philosophies, as will be shewn in this commentary) is that of the Holy Spirit;—and the existing philosophies, with all their follies and inadequacies, must be regarded, in so far as they by their terms or ideas subserved the work which the Spirit had to do by the Apostles and teachers of Christianity, as so many providential preparations of the minds of men to receive the fuller effulgence of the Truth as it is in Jesus, which shines forth in these Scriptures.

In the beginning] Equivalent to “before the world was,” ch. xvii. 5. The expression is indefinite, and must be interpreted relatively to the matter spoken of. ‘Thus in Acts xi. 15, it is “the beginning of the Gospel;” and by the same principle of interpretation, here it is the beginning of all things, on account of “all things were made by him” ver. 3.

These words, if they do not assert, at least imply, the eternal pre-existence of the divine Word. For “was in the beginning is not said of an act done in the beginning (as in Gen. i. 1), but of a state existing in the beginning, and therefore without beginning itself.

was, not equivalent to “is” (see “I am,” ch. viii. 58 al.), as Euthymius and others have supposed; but Origen has given the true reason for the indefinite past being used,—“It would have been more strict, in speaking of God the Word, to say is; but seeing that he is speaking with reference to the distinction of the Incarnation, which took place at a certain time, the Evangelist uses was instead of is.” The existence of an enduring and unlimited state of being, implied in “was,” is contrasted with “was made,” or “became” (the word is the same) in verses 3 and 14.

and the Word was with God] ‘With’ is here used in the sense of “chez,” abiding with. Basil remarks that St. John says “with God, not in God, that he may set before us the distinctness of Person:... that he may give no opening for the confusion of person.” Both the inner substantial union, and the distinct personality of the “Word” are here asserted. The former is distinctly repeated in the next words.

and the Word was God] This is the true form of the sentence; not ‘God was the Word.’ This is absolutely required by the usage of the Greek language: see in my Gr. Test. But the sense to be conveyed here is as weighty a consideration as the form of the sentence. Had St. John intended to say, ‘God was the Word,’—what meaning could his assertion possibly have conveyed? None other than a contradiction to his last assertion, by which he had distinguished God from the Word. And not only would this be the case, but the assertion would be inconsistent with the whole historical idea of the Word, making this term to signify merely an attribute of God, just as when it is said, “God is love.” Not to mention the unprecedented inversion of subject and predicate which this would occasion; “the Word” having been the subject before, and again resumed as the subject afterwards.

The rendering of the words being then as above, their meaning is the next question. God (see the grammatical reasons in my Gr. Test.) must be taken as implying God in substance and essence,—not ‘the Father,’ in Person. It does not mean “divine,” nor is it to be rendered “a God”—but, as in “became flesh,” “flesh” expresses that state into which the Divine Word entered by a definite act, so in “was God,” “God” expresses that essence which was His in the beginning:—that He was very God. So that this first verse might be connected thus: the Word was from eternity,—was with God (the Father),—and was Himself God.

2.] In order to direct the mind to the difference (in unity) between this “Word” and “God,” St. John recalls the reader’s attention to the two first clauses of ver. 1, which he now combines, in order to pass on to the creative work, which distinctly belongs to the “Word.” Thus also this verse fixes the reference of him in ver. 3, which might otherwise, after the mention of “God,” have seemed ambiguous. 3.] All things (1 Cor. viii. 6. Col. i. 16), equivalent to “the world,” ver. 10. This parallelism of itself refutes the Socinian interpretation of “all things,” “all Christian graces and virtues, ‘the whole moral world.’” But the history of the term “Logos” forbids such an explanation entirely. For Philo says, “Thou shalt find that the cause of the world is God, by whom it was made; the matter, the four elements, out of which it was composed: the instrument, the Word of God, through whom it was constituted:” see also Col. i. 16, and Heb. i. 2. Olshausen observes, that we never read in Scripture that ‘Christ made the world;’ but ‘the Father made the world through the Son,’ or ‘the world was made by the Father, and through the Son,’ because the Son never works of Himself, but always as the revelation of the Father; His work is the Father’s will, and the Father has no Will, except the Son, who is all His will (in whom He is well pleased). The Christian Fathers rightly therefore rejected the semi-Arian formula, ‘The Son was begotten by an act of the Father’s will;’ for He is that Will Himself.

and without him] This addition is not merely a Hebraistic parallelism, but a distinct denial of the eternity and uncreatedness of matter as held by the Gnostics. They set matter, as a separate existence, over against God, and made it the origin of evil:—but St. John excludes any such notion. Nothing was made without Him (the Word); all matter, and implicitly evil itself, in the deep and inscrutable purposes of creation (for it was not in the beginning, but was made), was made through Him.

The punctuation at the end of the verse is uncertain, if we regard solely manuscript authority. Some of our MSS. set a full stop at “was not any thing made:” so that the sense of the words following would be, “That which hath been made by (or in) him was life.” The question must however be determined by the sense of the passage, which is rendered weak, and inconsistent with analogy, by adopting this punctuation:—weak, because in that case we must render ‘That which hath been made by Him was life (i. e. having life), and that life was the light of men;’ but how was that life, i.e. that living creation which was made by Him, the light of men?—inconsistent with analogy, for St. John’s usage of beginning a sentence with “in” or “by” and a demonstrative pron. should have its weight: compare ch. xiii. 35; xv. 8; xvi. 26: 1 John ii. 3, 4, 5; iii. (8,) 10, 16, 19, 24; iv. 2 al. fr. Compare also 1 John ii. 4,—ib. iii. 5. I have determined therefore for the ordinary punctuation. It is said to have been first adopted owing to an abuse of the passage by the Macedonian heretics, who maintained that if the exclusion (“without him was not any thing made that was made”) was complete, the Holy Spirit can also not have been without His creating power, i.e. was created by Him. But this would be refuted otherwise, for the Holy Spirit “was,” and “was not made.”

4.] In him was life—compare 1 John v. 11, i. 1, 2, and ch. vi. 33.

life is not merely ‘spiritual life,’ nor ‘the recovery of blessedness,’—as some explain it:—the Word is the source of all life to the creature, not indeed ultimately, but mediately (see ch. v. 26: 1 John v. 11).

and the life was the light of men] This is not to be understood of the teaching of the Incarnate Word, but of the enlightening and life-sustaining influence of the eternal Son of God, in Whom was life. In the material world, light, the offspring of the Word of God, is the condition of life, and without it life degenerates and expires:—so also in the spiritual world that life which is in Him, is to the creature the very condition of all development and furtherance of the life of the spirit. All knowledge, all purity, all love, all happiness, spring up and grow from this life, which is the light to them all.

It is not “light,” but the light:—because this is the only true light: see ver. 9, also 1 John i. 5.

5.] As light and life are closely connected ideas, so are death and darkness. The whole world, lying in death and in darkness, is the darkness here spoken of:—not merely the “darkened” (Eph. iv. 18; see Eph. v. 7, 8), but the whole mass, with the sole exception (see below, ver. 12) of “as many as received Him” (compare ch. iii. 19; 1 John v. 19).

This shineth not merely the historical present, but describes the whole process of the light of life in the Eternal Word shining in this evil and dark world; both by the O.T. revelations, and (see ch. x. 16; xi. 52) by all the scattered fragments of light glittering among the thick darkness of heathendom.

and the darkness comprehended (understood, apprehended) it not] That this is the meaning, will be clear from the context. St. John states here as a general fact, what he afterwards states of the appearance of the Incarnate Word to the chosen people, ver. 11. The sentences are strictly parallel. “The light shineth in the darkness” is parallel to “He came to his own,” and “the darkness comprehended it not” is parallel to “His own received him not.” In the first, he is speaking of the whole shining of this light over the world; in the second, of its historical manifestation to the Jews. In both cases, the Divine Word was rejected.

received is used in the second case as expressing the personal assumption to oneself. as a friend or companion.

Lücke observes, that the almost tragic tone of this verse is prevalent through the Gospel of St. John and his first epistle, see ch. iii. 19; xii. 37 ff. al.: and is occasionally found in St. Paul also; see Rom. i. 18 ff.

The connexion of the two members of our verse by and is not, “The Light shineth in the darkness, and therefore (i. e. because darkness is the opposition to light, and they exclude one another) the darkness comprehended it not;” but, “The Light shineth in the darkness, and yet (notwithstanding that the effect of light in darkness is so great and immediate in the physical world) the darkness comprehended it not;” see “and” below, ver. 11.

6–18.] THE MANIFESTATION AND WORKING OF THE DIVINE WORD, JESUS CHRIST, THE SON OF GOD, INCARNATE IN OUR FLESH.

6.] The Evangelist now passes to the historic manifestation of the Word. “In passing to the manifestation of the Son, what other beginning should he have fixed on, but the matters concerning John?” Theodore of Mopsuestia. He enunciates briefly in these verses 6, 7, what he afterwards, vv. 19–86, narrates with historical detail.

There was does not belong to sent, but to a man: “There was a man, sent from God.” In sent from God we have possibly a reference to Mal. iii. 1.

7.] The purpose of John’s coming was to bear witness to a fact, which fact (ver. 33) was made known to him by divine revelation. We must not render, as A.V., ‘for a witness, but for witness or for testimony, for the purpose of bearing witness.

to bear witness&c. is an expansion of for witness:—the subject of his testimony was to be,—the Light,—and the aim of it,—that all might believe (see ch. xii. 36) through him (i. e. John: not. through it, the light, which confuses the whole, for then we must understand on God after believe, which is here out of place)

8.] John was himself “the candle, lighted and shining” (ch. v. 35), see note on Matt. v. 14, but not the light.

9.] The word true in this connexion imports original, ‘archetypal,’ and is used of the true genuine sources and patterns of those things which we find here below only in fragmentary imitations and derivations. Such an original was the light here spoken of;—but John was only a derived light,—not a light lighting, but a light lighted.

The construction of this verse has been much disputed. Is coming into the world to be taken with every man (as many ancient versions, and most of the ancient Commentators, and A.V.), or does it belong to the true light?

The former construction can only be defended by a Rabbinical usage, by which “all that cometh into the world” means ‘all men.’ But it is very questionable whether St. John ever speaks thus. Certainly he does not, in any of the passages commonly cited to defend this rendering, ch. xviii. 87 (which is spoken by Christ of Himself and His Mission); xvi. 21, 28; xii. 46. And even if he had thus spoken, how harsh and how unmeaning is the sentence, however we take it; whether with Euthymius we lay an emphasis on “was,” or with A.V. &c. supply “that” before it. If this latter had been intended, surely it would have been more distinctly expressed; and even when it is supplied, we have in this verse only a less forcible repetition of ver. 4.

It seems then that we must join coming into the world with the true light.

But even then, three ways of rendering are apparently open to us.

The first of these, which is that of Socinus, takes “coming into the world” as meaning, ‘at its coming into the world?’ This however—besides the sense being inconsistent with ver. 4—leaves the opening clause without a demonstrative pronoun, as before. Then, secondly, coming might seem to be used in the sense in which we frequently have it, as a sort of future, ‘who was, or is, to come;’ see Matt. xi. 3; Mark x. 30 al. fr.; ch. vi. 14; xi. 27, in which last two places it is joined, as here, with “into the world.” But if this be adopted, the only sense will be that the true light, &c. was to come; i.e. had not yet come; which manifestly is not correct;—for it had come, when John gave his witness; and the whole of these verses 6–13 relate to the time when He had appeared, and come to His own.

We are driven then to the only legitimate rendering, which is to take was coming as equivalent to an imperfect, came:—this usage being frequent in the N.T.:—i. e. at the time when John bore this witness, the true light which lighteth every man, came—was in process of manifesting Himself,—into the world.

which lighteth every man is a further expansion of the true.

10.] The world is the created world, into which He came (ver. 9), which was made by Him (ver. 3), which nevertheless (i.e. as here represented by man, the only creature who “knows”) knew, recognized Him not.

and is as in ver. 5. The three members of the sentence form a climax;—He was in the world (and therefore the world should have known Him), and the world was made by Him (much more then should it have known Him), and the world knew Him not.

11.] It is impossible to express this verse in terse and short English. In the original, the first his own is neuter—his own things, or possessions: the second, masculine, his own people. If we enquire for the sense, his own things here cannot well mean the world, or his own people mankind in general: it would be difficult to point out any Scripture usage to justify such a meaning. But abundance of passages bear out the meaning which makes the former His own inheritance or possession, i.e. Judæa; and the latter, the Jews; compare especially the parable Matt. xxi. 33 ff.; and Eccl. xxiv. 7 ff. And thus came forms a nearer step in the approach to the declaration in ver. 14. He came to His own.

On received him not see above on ver. 5. 12.] The words, as many as.... primarily refer to the “election” among the Jews, who have just been spoken of: but also, by implication, being opposed to both the world and his own, the election in all the world.

as many as received him, i. e., as many as recognized Him as that which He was—the Word of God and Light of men.

them gave he power] The word means, not merely capability,—still less privilege or prerogative,—but power; involving all the actions and states needful to their so becoming, and removing all the obstacles in their way (e. g. the wrath of God, and the guilt of sin).

to become children of God] The spiritual life owes its beginning to a birth from above, ch. iii. 3–7. “And this birth is owing to the Holy Spirit of God; so that this is equivalent to saying, ‘As many as received Him, to them gave He His Holy Spirit.’ And we find that it was so: see Acts x. 44, children of God is a more comprehensive expression than “sons of God” (which rendering in the A.V. is entirely without authority), which brings out rather our adoption, and hope of inheritance (Rom. viii. 14 ff.), whereas the other involves the whole generation and process of our life in the Spirit, as being from and of God, and consequently our likeness to God, walking in light as He is in light (1 John i. 5–7)—free from sin (ib. iii. 9; v. 18) and death (ch. viii. 51).

to them that believe on his name His name is His manifestation as that which He has given Himself out to be: i.e. as a Saviour from sin; see Matt. i. 21, “Thou shalt call his name Jesus; for He himself shall save His people from their sins.”

13.] The Jews grounded their claim to be children of God on their descent from Abraham. St. John here negatives any such claim, and asserts the exclusive divine birth of all who become children of God by faith. It is to be noticed that the conjunctions here are not merely disjunctive ones, which would necessitate the ranging the clauses as co-ordinate and parallel, but exclusive ones, which rise in climax from one clause to another,—‘not of blood, nor yet of the will of the flesh, nor yet of the will of man, but of God.’—Many Interpreters have seen in “the will of man” (the word in the original is that expressing the man as distinguished from the woman) the male, and in “the will of the flesh” the female side of human concupiscence (so Augustine, Theophylact, &c.); or in the former the higher and more conscious, in the latter the lower and animal side (Bleek, Luthardt). But both these interpretations seem to be objectionable.

14.] And must not be understood as giving a reason for the verse before; it is only the same copula as in vv. 1, 3, 4, 5; sing on to a further assertion regarding the Word.

became flesh] the most general expression of the great truth that He became man. He became that, of which man is in the body compounded. ‘There is no reference here to the doctrine of the Lord Jesus being the second Adam, as Olshausen thinks; but although there may be no reference to it, it lies at the ground of this wideness of expression. The doctrine in this form may have been, as Lücke observes, alien to St. John’s habits of thought, but not that which is implied in the doctrine, the taking of the nature of man by the Eternal Word.

The simplicity of this expression is no doubt directed against’ the Docete of the Apostle’s time, who maintained that the Word only apparently took human nature. Therefore he says, absolutely and literally became flesh:—see 1 John iv. 2. The word rendered “dwelt,” properly is ‘sojourned,’ or ‘tabernacled,’ in us. There is no reference to the flesh being the tabernacle of the Spirit;—but the word is one technically used in Scripture to import the dwelling of God among men. us] “men, who are flesh,” Bengel.

we beheld] See 1 John i. 1; 2 Pet. i. 16. This is the Apostle’s testimony as such, see Acts i. 21.

The mention of glory seems to be suggested by the word tabernacled, so frequently used of the divine Presence or Shechinah, and cognate in its very form with it.

This glory was seen by the disciples, ch. ii, 11; xi. 4: also by Peter, James, and John, specially, on the mount of transfiguration: to which occasion the words “as of the only-begotten from the Father” seem to refer: but mainly, in the whole converse and teaching and suffering of the Lord, who was full of grace and truth, see below. On the term as, Chrysostom remarks that ‘it is not a word of mere likeness, or comparison, but of confirmation, and unquestionable endowment: as if he had said, We saw glory such as became, and such as was likely would be possessed by, the only begotten and genuine Son of God the King of all.’

only-begotten] This word applied to Christ is peculiar to John, and occurs in ver. 18; ch. 16, 18; 1 John iv. 9 only. In the N.T. usage it signifies the only son:—in the LXX, Ps. xxii. (xxi. 21 of the LXX) 20 (Heb., my only one from the hand of the dog), the beloved. It has been attempted to render the word in John, according to the usage in Ps. xxi. 20. But obviously in the midst of ideas reaching so far deeper than that of regard, or love, of the Father for the Son, the word cannot be interpreted except in accordance with them. It refers to, and contrasts with, the children of God in vv. 12, 13. They receive their divine birth by faith in Him, and through Him; but HE is the Only-begotten of the Father in the higher sense, in which He is begotten the Son of God.

The words full of grace and truth (see the note in my Gr. Test.) belong probably to the last words, the only-begotten of the Father, and there is no need of a parenthesis, as in A.V.

grace and truth] not equivalent to “true grace,” which destroys the precision of the expression, and itself conveys no sense whatever; but setting out the two sides of the divine manifestation in Christ,—grace, as the result of Love to mankind,—truth (see ch. xiv. 6), as the unity, purity, and light of His own Character.

15.] The testimony of John, so important as being the fulfilment of the very object for which he was sent from God, is in this prologue ranged, so to speak, parallel with the assertions and testimony of the Evangelist himself. So that this verse does not interrupt the train of thought, but confirms by this important testimony the assertion “the Word became flesh,” shewing that John bore witness to His pre-existence. Then (ver. 16) the “full of grace and truth” is again taken up. Euthymius paraphrases: “Even if I,” says the Evangelist, “may perhaps seem to some not worthy of credit, yet before me John witnesseth to His Godhead, that John, whose name is great and celebrated among all the Jews.”

beareth witness, present, for solemnity—as part of the testimony to Him, not only once given, but still subsisting.

crieth (in the original, perfect, being, in sense, present, ‘hath cried,’ so that the voice is still sounding), see ch. vii. 37: “John crieth out with confidence and joy, as becometh a great herald.” Bengel.

This was he of whom I spake...] This reference to a former saying seems to shew, as indeed would appear from the announcement of his own office by the Baptist, that he had uttered these words in the power of the Spirit concerning Him whose forerunner he was before he saw and recognized Him in the flesh. Then, on doing so, he exclaimed, This was He of whom I spake, &c. This view seems to be borne out. by his own statement, ver. 33, and by the order of the narrative in Matt. iii. 11, 12, 13.

cometh after me] In point of time; not of birth, merely or principally, nor of commencement of official life: but, inasmuch as John was His Forerunner, on account of official position.

taketh place before me] This expression, taketh place, represents one, in the original, very difficult to render in English. It is the same word as that rendered “hath been made” in ver. 8: hath come to be, is constituted. The A.V., “is preferred,” would be very suitable, setting forth the advancement to official dignity before which John’s office waned and decreased (ch. iii. 30), which took place even while John’s course was being fulfilled: but the objection to ‘preferred’ is, its possible ambiguity: the word to prefer meaning to esteem more highly, as well as to advance or promote, which is the sense required here. Even Dr. Johnson has fallen into the mistake of quoting this very passage, in his Dictionary, as an instance of the sense “to love more than another.”

because (or, for, but better because) He was (not “became” or “was made,” but as in ver. 1) before me; i.e. ‘He existed, was in being, before me.’ The question raised by some, whether it is probable that the Baptist had, or expressed such views of the pre-existence of Christ, is not one for us to deal with, in the face of so direct a testimony as is given to the fact, here and in ch. iii. 27 ff. In all probability, the Evangelist was himself a disciple of the Baptist: and if he has given us, as compared with the other Evangelists, a fuller and somewhat differing account of his testimony to Christ, it is because his means of information were ampler than those of the other Evangelists. The questioners seem to forget that the Baptist was divinely raised up and commissioned, and full of the Holy Ghost, and spoke in that power; his declarations were not therefore merely conclusions which he had arrived at by natural means,—the study of the prophecies, &c.: but inspirations and revelations of the Spirit.

16.] Origen blames Heracleon for terminating the testimony of John at the end of ver. 17, and makes it continue to the end of ver. 18. But it can hardly be that his testimony extends beyond ver. 15, for all we (in ver. 16) would bear no very definite meaning in his mouth, and the assertions in ver. 17 are alien from the character of the Baptist, belonging as they do to the more mature development of Christian doctrines. I cannot doubt that this and the following verses belong to the Evangelist, and are a carrying onwards of his declarations concerning the divine Word.

Ver. 15 is not parenthetical, but confirmatory of ver. 14, and this verse grounds itself on the fact of ver. 14, corroborated by the testimony of ver. 15,—that He dwelt among us, and that we saw His glory, full of grace and truth.

his fulness is that of which He was full, ver. 14, received, and...] ‘Our relation to Him has been that of recipients out of His fulness, and the thing received has been’....

grace for grace] The ancient interpretation, the New Covenant instead of the Old (Euthymius), is certainly wrong, for the received is spoken entirely of the times of the Incarnate Word: and besides, the law and grace are distinctly opposed to one another in the next verse.

The preposition rendered for (instead of) is properly used of any thing which supersedes another, or occupies its place. This is in fact its ordinary usage when exchange is spoken of: the possession of the thing gotten succeeds to, supersedes, the possession of the thing given in exchange, and I possess one thing instead of (or, for) another. ‘Thus also we have received grace for grace, continual accessions of grace; new grace coming upon and superseding the former.

17.] The connexion of this verse with the foregoing lies in the words his fulness (ver. 16), and in grace and truth (ver. 14). ‘We received from His fulness continual additions of grace, because that fulness is not, like the law, a positive enactment, finite and circumscribed, of which it could be said that it was given, but the bringing in of grace and truth, which came (came in, came to pass) by Jesus Christ.’ The fulness of Christ is set against the narrowness of positive enactment in the law. The distinction must not be lost sight of, nor denied, as Lücke attempts to do: for Bengel truly observes: “No philosopher places his words so accurately, and observes their minute differences, as John, especially in this chapter.”

18.] The connexion is: ‘Moses could not give out of the fulness of grace and truth, for he had no immediate sight of God, and no man can have: there is but One who can declare God, the only-begotten Son, who is no mere man, but abides in the bosom of the Father.’ The sight of God here meant, is not only bodily sight (though of that it is true, see Exod. xxxiii. 20: 1 Tim. vi. 16), but intuitive and infallible knowledge, which enables him who has it to declare the nature and will of God; see ch. iii. 11; vi. 46; xiv. 7.

The Evangelist speaks in this verse in accordance with the sayings of the Alexandrine philosophy, whose phraseology he has adopted: Who hath seen Him, that he might tell us? Eccl. xlivi. 31.

the only-begotten Son] A remarkable various reading, the only-begotten God, occurs here in many of our oldest MSS., versions, and Fathers. The evidence for and against it is given in full in my Gr. Test. (edn. 6.) It seems to have arisen from a confusion of the contracted forms of writing the words “Son” and “God” in the Greek: the former being in our ancient MSS. written YC, the latter ΘC. The question, which reading to adopt, is one which, in the balance of authorities, must be provisionally decided by the consideration that, as far as we can see, we should be introducing much harshness into the sentence, and a new and strange term into Scripture, by adopting only-begotten God: a consequence which ought to have no weight whatever where authority is overpowering, but may fairly be weighed where this is not so. I therefore retain the commonly received reading, only-begotten Son.

which is in the bosom] ‘The expression must not be understood as referring to the custom of reclining on the bosom, as in ch. xiii. 23: for by this explanation confusion is introduced into the imagery, and the real depth of the truth hidden. The expression signifies, as Chrysostom observes, Kindred and oneness of essence:—and is derived from the fond and intimate union of children and parents. The present, which is, as in ch. iti. 18, is used to signify essential truth, without any particular regard to time.

he] In the original this pronoun is very marked: He, and none else: an emphatic exclusive expression.

declared] Better than ‘hath declared, as A.V. On the sense, see Matt. xi. 27.

I. 19-II. 11.] INTRODUCTION OF CHRIST TO THE WORLD: BY THE WITNESS OF JOHN (vv. 19–40): BY HIMSELF (ver. 41—ii. 11).

19–28.] The first witness borne by John to Jesus: before the deputation from the Sanhedrim.

19. the Jews] St. John alone of the Evangelists uses this expression;—principally as designating the chiefs of the Jewish people, the members of the Sanhedrim. It is an interesting enquiry, what this usage denotes as to the author or date of our Gospel. Prof. Bleek has satisfactorily shewn that no inference can be deduced from it against the Jewish origin of the author, as some have endeavoured to do; but it is rather confirmatory of the belief that the Gospel was written after the Jews had ceased to be politically a nation,—and among Gentiles;—the author himself contemplating these last as his readers.

priests and Levites] This was a formal deputation;—priests and Levites, constituting the two classes of persons employed about the service of the temple (see Josh. iii. 3), are sent (Matt. xxi. 23) officially to enquire into the pretensions of the new Teacher (ver. 25), who had collected about him such multitudes (Matt. iii. 5), and had awakened popular expectation that he was the Messiah (Luke iii. 15).

Who art thou?] The emphasis should be on the thou. “The question is asked with reference to the popular doubts respecting him; in an unbelieving and inquisitorial spirit,—compare Matt. iii. 7 ff., which had already taken place. Even among the learned, as well as among the people, there were considerable differences as to the prophecies respecting the Messiah: see ch. vii. 40–52.

20.] He openly and formally confessed. This emphatic notice of his declaration seems to be introduced not with any view of removing too high an estimate of John’s work and office, as sometimes supposed, but rather to shew the importance of his testimony, which was so publicly and officially delivered,—that the Messiah was come (see ch. v. 33–35); and the way in which he depreciated himself in comparison with Him who came after him.

21.] Our earliest MS. (the Vatican) reads here, “What then art thou?” equivalent to What sayest thou of thyself? ver. 22.

Art thou Elias?] The whole appearance of John reminds them of Elias:—see Matt. iii. 4, and compare 2 Kings i. 8. Besides, his announcement that the Kingdom of God was at hand, naturally led them to the prophecy Mal. iv. 5. Lightfoot cites from the Rabbinical books testimonies, that the Jews expected a general purification or baptism before the coming of the Messiah (from Ezek. xxxvi. 25, 26, and Zech. xiii. 1), and that it would be administered by Elias.

And he saith, I am not] The right explanation of this answer seems to be the usual one,—that the deputation asked the question in a mistaken and superstitious sense, meaning Elias bodily come down from heaven, who was expected to forerun and anoint the Messias. (Our Lord seems to refer to the same extravagant notion in Matt. xi. 14, If ye will receive it, this is Elias, which shall come.) In this sense, John was not Elias; nor indeed in any other sense, was he Elias;—but only (Luke i. 17) in the spirit and power of Elias. Art thou the prophet?] From the prophecy of Moses, Deut. xviii. 15, 18, the Jews expected some particular prophet to arise,—distinct from the Messiah (this distinction however was not held by all, see ch. vi. 14),—whose coming was, like that of Elias, intimately connected with that of the Messiah Himself: see ch. vii. 40, 41. In Matt. xvi. 14 we have ‘Jeremiah, or one of the prophets,’ apparently spoken as representing this expected prophet. There seem to have been various opinions about him;—all however agreeing in this, that he was to be one of the old prophets raised from the dead (see also 2 Macc. ii. 1–8). This John was not: and he therefore answers this also in the negative.

22.] Notice—they ever ask about his person: he ever refers them to his office. He is no one—a voice merely: it is the work of God, the testimony to Christ, which is every thing. So the formalist ever in the church asks concerning any one who appears, Who is he? while the witness for Christ only exalts, only cares for Christ's work.

23.] These words, which by the other Evangelists are spoken of John as the fulfilment of the prophecy, appear from this place to have been first so used by himself. They introduce the great closing section of the prophecy of Isaiah (ch. xl.—lxvi.) so full of the rich promises” and revelations of the Messiah and His kingdom.

Make straight (straighten) is used as compendiously expressing the commands in the prophecy.

By implication, the Baptist, quoting this opening prophecy of himself, announces the approaching fulfilment of the whole section.

24. Now they had been sent by the Pharisees] The reason of this explanation being added is not very clear. Lücke refers it to the apparent hostility of the next enquiry: but I confess I cannot see that it is more hostile than the preceding. Luthardt thinks that it imports, there were some of the deputation present, who belonged to the sect of the Pharisees, which the words will hardly bear. Might it not be to throw light on their question about baptizing, as the Pharisees were the most precise about all ceremonies, lustrations, &c.? Thus the explanation will refer to the nature of the following question.

25.] This question shews probably that they did not interpret Isa. xl. 3 of any herald of the Messiah. They regarded baptism as a significant token of the approach of the Messianic Kingdom, and they asked, ‘Why baptizest thou, if thou art no forerunner of the Messiah?’

26, 27.] The latter part of ver. 26 and beginning of ver. 27, as read in our oldest and best authorities, runs, as in the corrected text, There standeth one among you whom ye know not, He that cometh after me.

The insertions, “it is,” and “is preferred before me,” have been made by some one not aware of the meaning, and wishing to square the verse with vv. 15, 30. The answer of the Baptist seems not to correspond to the question in ver. 25. This was noticed as early as Heracleon (Century II), who said, John answers the deputation from the Pharisees not with reference to what they asked, but what he himself chose. This however is impugned at some length by Origen, but not on very convincing grounds. The truth seems to have been apprehended by Olshausen,—that the declaration of John that the Messiah was standing among them at that moment unknown to them, was an answer to their question demanding a legitimation of his prophetic claims;—a sign that he was sent from God:—see ch. ii. 18. Olshausen also suggests that this may clear up the saying of the Jews in ch. x, 41 (see note there). In repeating this saying at other times (see Matt. iii. 11 and parallel places), the Baptist plainly states of the Messiah, that he should baptize them with the Holy Ghost (and fire), as here in ver. 33. Here, in speaking to those learned in the offices of the Messiah, he leaves that to be supplied.

whose shoe's latchet....] See note on Matt. iii. 11. ‘The latchet is the thong of the shoe or sandal, with which it was bound to the foot.

28.] The common reading, Bethabara, is owing to a conjecture of Origen, the grounds of which he thus states:— “We are not ignorant, that in almost all our copies it is stated, 'these things were done in Bethany;” and this seems to have been so read even before our time: for I have read it so in Heracleon. But I am persuaded that we ought not to read Bethany, but Bethabara; for I have been on the spot, in my desire to track the footsteps of Jesus and of His Apostles and of the prophets. Bethany, as the Evangelist himself says, is only fifteen furlongs from Jerusalem, far away from the river Jordan, about 180 furlongs, roughly stated. Nor is there any place near the Jordan of the same name as Bethany: but they say that a place is shewn on the banks of the Jordan called Bethabara, where they relate that John baptized.” He goes on to shew from the etymology of the names that it must have been Bethabara; an argument which modern criticism will not much esteem. It will be seen that his testimony is decisive for the universality and authority of the reading Bethany, while for the other he only produces a tradition, and that only at second-hand: ‘they say that such a place is shewn.’ That no Bethany beyond Jordan was known in his time proves but little;—for 300 eventful years had changed the face of Palestine since these events, and the names and sites of many obscure places may have been forgotten. I abstain from enumerating modern conjectures on the identity of the two, or the etymology of the names, as being indecisive and unprofitable. The objection of Paulus, that beyond Jordan the Sanhedrim had no authority, appears not to be founded in fact.

The question whether this testimony of the Baptist is identical with that given by the other three Evangelists, especially by St. Luke (iii. 16), is, after all that has been said on it, not of great importance. The whole series of transactions here recorded, from ver. 15 onwards, certainly happened after the baptism of our Lord;—for before that event John did not know Him as He that was to come: and “standeth among you,” ver. 26, shews that he had so recognized Him (see below on “the next day”): whereas the testimony in Luke iii. 16 and parallel places, is as certainly given before the baptism. But since the great end of John's mission was to proclaim Him who was coming after him, it is not only probable, but absolutely necessary to suppose, that he should have delivered this testimony often, and under varying circumstances: before the baptism, in the form given by St. Luke, "One mightier than I cometh," &c., and after it in this form, "This is He of whom I said," &c. (ver. 15), where his former testimony is distinctly referred to. And among John's disciples and the multitudes who frequented his baptism, many reports of such his sayings would naturally be current. So that there is neither a real nor even an apparent contradiction between John and the other Evangelists.

It is a far more important question, in what part of this narration the forty days' Temptation is to be inserted. From ver. 19 to ch. ii. 1 there is an unbroken sequence of days distinctly marked. Since then ver. 19 must be understood as happening after the baptism, it must have happened after the Temptation also. And in this supposition there is not the slightest difficulty. But when we have made it, it still remains to say whether at that time our Lord had returned from the Temptation or not. The general opinion of Harmonists has been, that the approach of Jesus to John in ver. 29 was His return after the Temptation. But this I think questionable, on account of the "standeth among you," ver. 26; which I can only understand literally. I therefore believe—that the return from the Temptation to Bethany beyond Jordan had taken place before the deputation arrived.

29–34.] Second witness borne by John to Jesus: apparently before His disciples.

29.] The next day (the morrow). Those who wish to introduce the Temptation between vv. 28 and 29, interpret it, 'on some day after.' Thus Euthym., "the next day; that is, the next after his return from the wilderness." But this sense, although certainly found in the Old Testament,—see Gen. xxx. 33 ('in time to come', Heb. "to-morrow"),—is not according to the usage of St. John (see ch. vi. 22; xii. 12), and would be quite alien from the precision of this whole portion of the narrative, which, ver. 40, specifies even the hours of the day. I understand it therefore literally, both here and. in vv. 35 and 44.

coming unto him] It is not said whence, or why, or whether for the purpose of an interview, or not; the fact merely is related, for the sake of the testimony which follows. I mention this, because on these points difficulties have been raised.

Behold the Lamb of God] This is one of the most important and difficult sayings in the New Testament. The question to be answered is, In calling Jesus by so definite a name as the Lamb of God, to what did John refer? And this question is intimately connected with that of the meaning of the following words, which taketh away the sin of the world.

(a) The title must refer to some "known and particular lamb, and cannot be a mere figure for a just and holy man, as some suppose. It is inconceivable, that the Lamb of God should, in a testimony so precise and formal as this of the Baptist, be nothing but an hyperbole, and that one wholly unprecedented, and to his hearers unintelligible. Had no doctrinal considerations been at stake, we may safely say that this interpretation would never have been proposed. In its bearing on the latter clause of the verse, it is equally untenable. These interpreters make which taketh away the sin of the world to mean, "who shall, though innocent, have, throughout his life, grievous experience of the wickedness of men, but shall, like a lamb, bear the evils inflicted upon him with a patient and gentle mind" (Gabler); or, "He shall remove the sins of men, i.e. wickedness, out of the earth." The first of these meanings of the verb rendered "takeaway" is altogether without example. The second, though common enough in other connexions, is never found in connexion with "sin." The common sense account of this part of the matter is:—John wished to point out Jesus as the Messiah: he designates Him as the lamb of God; he therefore referred to some definite lamb,—revealed by God, sent by God, pleasing to God, or in some meaning especially, of God. Whence did this idea come?

(b) Can John have referred to the paschal lamb? Further than the very use of the name brings in with it the general typical use of the animal, and thus this particular use may lie in the background, I think not,—and for this reason:—The ruling idea in the paschal sacrifice has no connexion, in any sense of the words, with taking away sin. However, by the light now thrown back on it since the Spirit has opened the things of Christ, we discern this typical meaning in the sprinkling of the blood (see 1 Cor. v. 7),—in the Jewish mind, no mention being made of sin or the removing of sin in any connexion with the paschal lamb, the two could not be brought forward, in such an announcement as this, in close connexion with one another.

(c) Can the reference be to the lamb of the daily morning and evening sacrifice? or to the sacrificial lamb generally? With the same reservation as above, I think not: for (1) this expression is too definite to have so general and miscellaneous a reference; (2) of many animals which were used for sacrifice, the lamb was only one, and that one not by any means so prominent as to serve as a type for the whole; and (3) the lamb (with only two exceptions, Levit. iv. 32: Num. vi. 14, in both which cases it was to be a female, as if for express distinction from the ordinary use of the lamb) was never used for a sin-offering, properly so called and known. The question is not, whether Christ be not typified by all these offerings, which we now know to be the case (1 Pet. i. 19 al.), but whether the Baptist is likely to have referred to them in such words as these. (d) There remains but one reference, and that is, to the prophetic announcement in Isa. liii. 7. The whole of that latter — section of Isaiah, as before remarked on ver. 23, is Messianic, and was so understood by the Jews (see my Hulsean Lectures for 1841, pp. 62–66). We have there the servant of God (the Messiah) compared to a lamb brought to the slaughter (lili. 7), and it is said of Him (ib. ver. 4), “He hath borne our griefs (in the LXX, “beareth our sins”) and carried our sorrows”—ver. 5, “He was wounded for our transgressions”—ver. 6, “The Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all” (in the LXX, “delivered Him to our sins”—ver. 8, “He was cut off out of the land of the living, for the transgression of my people was He stricken”—ver. 12, “He bare the sins of many, and made intercession for the transgressors” (in the LXX., “and was delivered because of their iniquities”). So that here, and here only, we have the connexion of which we are in search,—between the lamb, and the bearing or taking away of sin,—expressly stated, so that it could be formally referred to in a testimony like the present. And I have therefore no doubt that this was the reference.

(e) We have now to enquire into the specific meaning of which taketh away the sin of the world (see above under [a]). The verb rendered taketh away answers to a Hebrew verb, which is used frequently in the O.T., in connection with sin, in the sense of bearing its punishment:—see Levit. xxiv. 15: Num. v. 31; xiv. 3: Ezek. iv. 5; xxiii, 35a]. A form of this very Greek verb is used by the LXX in the sense of taking away sin and its guilt by expiation: see in our English Bible, Levit. x. 17. The word in our verse will bear either of these meanings, or both conjoined; for if the Lamb is to suffer the burden of the sins of the world, and to take away sin and its guilt by expiation, this result must be accomplished by the offering of Himself.

(f) But it is objected, that this view of a suffering Messiah, and of expiation by the sufferings of one, was alien from the Jewish expectations;—and that the Baptist (see Matt. xi. 2 ff. and note) cannot himself have had any such view. But the answer to this may be found in the fact that the view, though not generally prevalent, among the Jews, was by no means unknown to many. The application by the early Jewish expositors of Isa. lili. to the Messiah, could hardly have been made, without the idea of the suffering and death of their Messiah being presented to their minds. The same would be the case in the whole sacrificial economy:—the removal of guilt (which was universally ascribed to the Messiah) by suffering and death would be familiarized to their minds. Traces of this are found in their own writings. In 2 Macc. vii. 37, 38, the last of the seven brethren thus speaks before his martyrdom:—“But I, as my brethren, offer up my body and life for the laws of our fathers, beseeching God that He would speedily be merciful unto our nation; and that thou by torments and plagues mayest confess, that He alone is God: and that in me and my brethren the wrath of the Almighty, which is justly brought upon all our nation, may cease.” And Josephus says of these same martyrs, that they were “as it were a ransom for the nation’s sin: and by means of the blood of those pious ones and the propitiation of their death, divine Providence saved afflicted Israel.” The whole history of the sacrifices and devotions of the heathen world abounds with examples of the same idea variously brought forward; and to these the better-informed among the Jews could be no strangers. And as to the Baptist himself, we must not forget that the power of the Holy Spirit which enabled him to recognize by a special sign the Redeemer, also spoke in him, and therefore his words would not be the result of education merely, or his own reasoning, but of that kind of intuitive perception of divine truth, which those have had who have been for any special purpose the organs of the Holy Ghost.

As regards Matt. xi. 3, the doubt on the mind of John there expressed does not appear to have touched at all on the matter now in question,—but to have rather been a form of expressing his impatience at the slow and quiet progress of Him of whom he expected greater things and a more rapid public manifestation.

30.] See on ver. 15.

31.] On the apparent discrepancy between this statement, I knew him not, and St. Matthew’s narrative, I have stated my view on Matt. iii, 14. Both accounts are entirely consistent with the supposition that John had been from youth upwards acquainted with our Lord, and — indeed may have in his own mind believed Him to be the Christ:—but having (ver. 33) a special sign appointed him, by which to recognize Him as such,—until that sign was given, he, like the rest of the people (the words may be rendered, I also, as well as you, see ver. 26), had no certain knowledge of Him. De Wette gives the sense well: “This testimony (ver. 30) does not rest upon my long personal acquaintance with Him, but on that which happened during my work of baptizing.”

but that he should be made manifest] Justin Martyr represents Trypho the Jew saying, “Even if Christ has been born and exists somewhere, he is unknown, and is not even conscious of his own identity, until Elias shall come and anoint him, and make him manifest to all.” But our narrative is not built upon any such Jewish belief, for it is evidently only as a spiritual preparation, through repentance, for the knowledge of Him, that John regarded his baptism, not as any thing making Him manifest to all.

32, 33.] “What follows, is testimony, properly so called: what is said from ver. 29 f. was demonstration following on testimony. In the continued discourse of the Baptist the Evangelist as it were interposes a parenthesis, ‘And John bare witness, saying,’” Bengel.

The occurrence related by John happened at the baptism of Jesus, which is therefore here pre-supposed as known, Although this has been questioned, I cannot see how it can be reasonably doubted. We cannot surely suppose that such a sign was twice shewn. On the appearance itself, see note Matt. iii. 16. The account here given confirms the view which I have there maintained, that the appearance was confined to our Lord and the Baptist: he was to receive the sign, and then to testify to the others, who were not themselves yet the bearers, but the recipients of testimony:—“It was seen, in a kind of spiritual vision, by John alone.” Theodore of Mopsuestia.

I have beheld, in reference to the sign divinely intimated to him, in the abiding fulfilment of which he now stood. So again, below, ver. 34.

it remained upon him] By some appearance which is not described, the Holy Spirit was manifested to John as not removing from Jesus again, but remaining on Him. But we are not to understand that he had seen the Spirit descending on others, and not remaining; for (see ch. vii. 39; Acts i. 5; xix. 2 ff. (the gift of the Holy Spirit did not ordinarily accompany John’s baptism, but only in this one case; and its occurrence was to point out to him the Messiah.

the same is he which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost] Here again we seem to have a reference to the cycle of narratives of the three other Gospels, for our Evangelist has not before mentioned this office of the Messiah.

34.] A solemn reiteration of his testimony, after the mention of the giving of this token by Him who sent him;—And I have seen (accordingly)&c.

The token must have been given to the Baptist by a special revelation, which also revealed to him his own errand and office; so Luke iii. 2, “The word of God came unto John the son of Zacharias in the wilderness.”

The perfect tense in this verse is stronger than the present,—I have seen (on the perf. see above ver. 32) and have borne witness—it is a reference to his testimony at the time, as a thing on record in their memories, and as still continuing.

the Son of God] See ver. 18—the Word made flesh, the Messiah. On the import of the descent of the Spirit on Jesus at his baptism, I may remark, that the Personal Word, Who became flesh in our Lord, and was subjected to all the laws of human development in infancy, childhood, youth,—evermore in an especial degree under the leading of the Holy Spirit, by whose agency the Incarnation had taken place,—was the Recipient of this fulness of the indwelling of the Holy Ghost: and that herein consisted the real depth and propriety of this sign;—the abiding of the Spirit without measure (ch. iii. 34) on Him indicated beyond doubt that He was the Word become flesh—for no mere human intelligence could be thus receptive of the Holy Spirit of God;—we receive Him only as we can, only as far as our receptivity extends,—by measure; but HE, into the very fulness and infinite capacities of His divine Being.

35–43.] On account of the testimony of John, first Andrew, and another of his disciples, and through Andrew, Simon Peter, became acquainted with Jesus.

35. the next day after] See on ver. 29. I can hardly suppose, with De Wette, that these two had been absent on the preceding day. Rather, what they then heard seems to have made a powerful impression on their minds, so that the repetition of the notice is now the signal for them to follow Jesus. (On the second disciple, see below on ver. 40.)

37.] We must not understand followed in the narrower sense which it bears when they left all and followed Him; but here only of mechanical going after Him, “wishing to know somewhat of Him,” as Euthymius says.

38.] On What seek ye? Euthymius remarks, “This was not asked in ignorance, seeing that He witnesses the inner thoughts of men’s minds, but that He might attach them to Himself by the enquiry, and give them confidence. It is likely that they were bashful as yet and in perplexity, as being unacquainted with Him.”

They ask where dwellest thou? wishing to find Him alone and in quiet. Euthymius. They enquire after His place of lodging for the night, intending to visit Him there; or perhaps He was then apparently going thither, as it was late in the day. But He furthers their wish by inviting them to follow, and they will see.

39. about the tenth hour] i.e. 4 P.M., according to the Jewish reckoning; not, as some have thought, 10 A.M., according to that of the Romans. Our Evangelist appears always to reckon according to the Jewish method, see ch. iv. 6, 52; xix. 14, and notes, but especially ch. xi. 9. And as Lücke remarks, even among the Romans, the division of the day into twelve equal hours was, though not the civil, the popular way of computing time.

They remained with Him the rest of that day, which would be four or five hours, and need not strictly be limited by sunset.?,

40.] Who the other disciple was, is not certain: but considering (1) that the Evangelist never names himself in his Gospel, and (2) that this account is so minutely accurate as to specify even the hours of the day, and in all respects bears marks of an eye- witness, and again (3) that this other disciple, from this last circumstance, certainly would have been named, had not the name been suppressed for some especial reason, we are justified in inferring that it was the Evangelist himself. And such has been the general opinion. Euthymius, mentioning this, gives an alternative which is hardly probable: that this disciple may have been one of those who were but little known or distinguished.

41. Messias] Heb., the Anointed: the well-known name of the expected Deliverer. In the interpretation, it should be Christ, not the Christ: it is the two words which are here identified, not the two titles.

42.] This is evidently the first bestowal of the new name on Simon: and it is done from our Lord's prophetic knowledge of his future character; see note on Matt. xvi. 18. Kaphā in Aramaic, Kaph in Hebrew, a stone. But the rendering of Petros in this verse should be as in margin, Peter, not as in A.V., a stone. The Greek name Peter became the prevalent one in the apostolic Church very soon: St. Paul uses both names indiscriminately.

I own I cannot but think that the knowledge of Simon shewn by the Lord is intended to be miraculous, So also Stier, "I know who and what thou art from thy birth till thy present coming to me.... I name thee, I give thee a new name, I know what I will make of thee in thy following of Me and for my Kingdom." The emphatic use of looked on him here (it is not so emphatic in ver. 36, but still even there may imply fixed contemplation, in the power of the Spirit, who suggested the testimony) is hardly accountable except on this explanation of supernatural knowledge. Similarly Abram, Sara, Jacob, received new names in reference to the covenant and promises of God to them.

43–52.] The calling of Philip and Nathanael.

43. The day following] Apparently, the day after the naming of Peter; and if so, the next but one after the visit of Andrew and the other disciple, and the fourth day after ver. 19. Our Lord is on the point of setting out from the valley of the Jordan to Galilee, and finds Philip, with whom there is every reason to believe He was previously acquainted (see ver. 45). Here we find Jesus himself calling a disciple, for the first time. But Follow me does not here bear its strict apostolic sense; the expression, "We have found" afterwards, and the going to search for others to be disciples, unites Philip to the company of those who have been before mentioned, who we know were not immediately or inseparably attached as followers to Jesus.

44.] This is Bethsaida on the Western bank of the lake of Gennesaret; another Bethsaida (Julias) lay at the top of the lake, on the Jordan. See note on Luke ix. 10.

45.] It does not appear where Nathanael was found: but he is described, ch. xxi. 2, as of Cana of Galilee: and as we find Jesus there in ch. ii. 1, it is probable the call may have taken place in its neighbourhood. Nathanael (meaning, "the gift of God," corresponding to Theodore or Theodosius in Greek) is mentioned only in these two places. From them we should gather that he was an apostle; and as his name is nowhere found in the catalogues of the twelve, but Philip is associated in three of them, Matt. x. 3: Mark iii. 18: Luke vi. 14, with Bartholomew, it has been supposed that Nathanael and Bartholomew were the same person (see note on Matt. x. 3). This is however mere conjecture.

Moses in the law] Probably in Deut. xviii. 15; but also in the promises to Abraham, Gen. xvii. 7 al.: and in the prophecy of Jacob, Gen. xlvi. 10, and the prophets, passim; see the references.

the son of Joseph, which is from Nazareth] This expression seems to shew previous acquaintance on the part of Philip with Jesus. No stress can be laid, as has been most unfairly done, on Jesus being called by Philip, the son of Joseph, as indicating that the history of His birth and childhood, as related by St. Matthew and St. Luke, was unknown to St. John. Philip expresses what was the prevailing belief, in the ordinary words, as Olshausen remarks. In an admirable note, Neander remarks, that by combining the two declarations of John, that in Jesus the Eternal Word of God became flesh (ver. 14), and that 'that which is born of the flesh is flesh' (ch. iii. 6), we cannot escape the inference, that a supernatural working of God in the conception of the Ban Christ Jesus is implied.

46.] As Lücke observes, the meaning of this question is simpler than at first sight appears. It is impossible that Nathanael, himself a Galilean, could speak from any feeling of contempt for Galilee generally: and we have no evidence that Nazareth was held in contempt among the Galileans. He alluded therefore to the smallness and insignificance of the town in proportion to the great things which were now predicated of it. Nazareth is never named in the O.T. nor in Josephus.

47.] The Evangelist certainly intends a supernatural insight by the Lord into Nathanael's character to be here understood; and there is probably no reference at all to the question which Nathanael had just asked. To suppose that Jesus overheard that question, is just one of those perfectly gratuitous assumptions which the very Commentators who here make this supposition are usually the first to blame. Compare ch. ii. 25.

an Israelite indeed] 'An Israelite who truly answers to the inner and honourable meaning of the name' When we reflect what was contained in that name, and Who it is that speaks, we can hardly agree with De Wette that the words are spoken merely in the spirit in which every nation attaches some peculiar virtue, and especially those of openness and straightforwardness, to itself.

Our Lord probably referred to Ps. xv.

48.] The remark was overheard by Nathanael, and recognized as indicating perfect knowledge of his character. The question, Whence knowest thou me? is one of astonishment, but not perhaps yet of suspicion of any thing supernatural. Our Lord's answer first opens this to him.

Before that&c.] The whole form of our Lord's answer seems to indicate that the place where Philip called Nathanael was not now in sight, nor had been. The declaration that Jesus had seen him there, at once brings the conviction which he expresses in the next verse. This would not have been the case, unless the sight had been evidently and unquestionably supernatural: and unless the words "when thou wast under the fig tree" involved this. Had Jesus merely seen Nathanael without being seen by him, or had "I saw thee" only expressed, 'I knew thy character,' at first sight, 'although at a distance, no such immediate conviction would have followed.' when thou wast under the fig tree, ses Wordsw., "is something more than merely 'under the fig tree' would be; it indicates retirement thither as well as concealment there,—perhaps for purposes of prayer and meditation." In fact it contains in it, 'when thou wentest under the fig tree, and while thou wert there.'

49.] The answer expresses, 'Thou art the Messiah;' see Ps. ii. 7: ch. xi. 27: Matt. xvi. 16: Luke xxii. 70. Olshausen maintains that the Son of God was not a Jewish appellation for the Messiah,—on account of the Jews taking up stones to cast at Jesus when He so called Himself, ch. x. 33. But as Lücke observes, it was not for the mere use of this Name,—but for using it in a close and literal sense which was unintelligible and appeared blasphemous to them, 'I and My Father are one',—that they wished to stone Him; see note on ch. x. 36. It was certainly not so common a name as 'the Son of David, for the Messiah. Nathanael can hardly have meant the name in other than its popular meaning; and the synonymous and better known appellation which he adds, confirms this.

50.] Our Lord says this not in blame, rather in praise of the simple and honest expression of Nathanael's conviction; but principally to shew him, that if he believed by reason of this comparatively small proof of His divine power, his faith would increase from strength to strength at the greater proofs which should from that time forward be given.

There is no need to understand our Lord's reply as a question; it may be, thou believest. The question is perhaps most natural here: but see notes on the similar sentences, ch. xvi. 31, and ch. xx. 29.

51.] Verily, verily is peculiar to St. John. 'The other Evangelists use 'verily' once only in such asseverations. Stier remarks, that the Verily, verily, I say unto you of the Lord, is spoken in His coequality with the Father: not as the 'Thus saith the Lord' of the prophets.

unto you] The words following are then spoken to all the disciples present, not only to Nathanael.

With or without From henceforth, the meaning will be much the same. The glories of a period beginning from the opening of the Lord's public ministry, and at this day not yet completed, are described. For it is not the outward visible opening of the material heavens, nor ascent and descent, of angels in the sight of men, which our Lord here announces; but the series of glories which was about to be unfolded in His Person and Work from that time forward. Luther beautifully says: "When Christ became man and had entered on His ministerial office and begun to preach, then was the heaven opened, and remains open; and has from that time, since the baptism of Christ in the Jordan, never been shut, and never will be shut, although we do not see it with our bodily eyes... Christ says this: 'Ye are now heavenly citizens, and have your citizenship above in the heavenly Jerusalem, and are in communion with the holy angels, who shall without intermission ascend and descend about you.'"

The opening of heaven is a symbolical expression, signifying the imparting of divine grace, help, and revelation. See Gen, xxviii. 10–17: Ezek. i. 1: Isa. vi. 1: Mal. iii. 10: Isa, lxiv. 1: also Deut, xi. 17: 1 Kings viii. 35. The words have a plain reference to the ladder of Jacob, and imply that what he then saw was now to receive its fulfilment: that He, the Son of Man, was the dwelling of God and the gate of Heaven, and that through Him, and on Him in the first place, was to descend all communication of help and grace from above.

That no allusion is meant to the Transfiguration, or the Agony, is plain; for all those here addressed did not witness these appearances, but Peter and John only; nor to the Ascension, for they did not see heaven opened, nor did angels ascend nor descend.

The above has, remarks Olshausen, been the interpretation of all Commentators of any depth in all times: Origen as well as Augustine, Luther as well as Calvin, Lücke as well as Tholuck: and I may add, De Wette as well as Stier.

the Son of man] An expression originally (as appears) derived, in its Messianic sense, from Dan. vii. 13, 14, and thenceforward used as one of the titles of the Messiah (see ch. xii. 34). It is never predicated of our Lord by any but Himself, except in Acts vii. 56 by Stephen, in allusion apparently to Matt. xxvi. 64, and—which is hardly an exception—in the passages of the Revelation (ch. i. 13; xiv. 14) which are almost citations from Daniel.

John: Chapter 2

CHAP. II. 1-11.] The miracle of turning water into wine: the first fulfilment of the announcement in ch. i. 51: see ver. 11.

1.] the third day—reckoned from the day of Nathanael's calling. There would thus be but one day between that event and the marriage.

Cana of Galilee, see ch. iv. 46;—not far from Capernaum. Josephus calls it “a village of Galilee.” There is a Kanah in Josh. xix. 28, in the tribe of Asher, which must be distinct from this. Jerome however believes it to have been the same. This was the residence, and probably birthplace, of Nathanael. If his calling took place in its neighbourhood, our Lord may have gone on and spent the intervening day at Nazareth. Dr. Robinson satisfactorily establishes that Kâna-el-Jelîl, about 3 hours N. 1/2 E. from Nazareth, is the site of this miracle. The name is identical, and so stands in the Arabic Version of the N.T. He shews this to have been recognized in early tradition, and its honour to have been only recently usurped, by Kefr Kenna, a village 1 1/2 hour N.E. from Nazareth, on one of the roads to Tiberias. See a very interesting description of Kâna-el-Jelîl in “The Land and the Book,” pp. 426, 427.

the mother of Jesus] St. John never names her, as being already well known: or perhaps more probably from his own intimate connexion with her, in pursuance of the injunction ch. xix. 26, 27. He never names either himself, or his own brother, James.

2. and his disciples] It does not appear who these were, unless we assume that they were those called in ch. i., which seems most probable. John himself was most likely present. He does not relate so circumstantially any thing which he had not witnessed.

In this case, there must have been some other reason for the invitation, besides mere previous acquaintance. This would be the probable reason for Jesus himself being invited; but the disciples, being from various places in the district, can hardly all have been (De Wette) friends of the family. The fact of Jesus having attached disciples to Himself must have been known, and they were doubtless invited from consideration to Him.

Our Lord at once opens His ministry with the character which He gives of himself, Matt. xi. 18, 19, as distinguished from the asceticism of John. He also, as Trench admirably remarks (Miracles, edn. 2, p. 98, note), gives us his own testimony against the tendency which our indolence ever favours, of giving up those things and occasions to the world and the devil, which we have not Christian boldness to mingle in and purify. Even Cyprian, for instance, proscribes such festivals,—“Let the wicked feasts and licentious banquets at marriages be avoided, of which the contagion is perilous.” And such is the general verdict of modern religionism, which would keep the leaven distinct from the lump, for fear it should become unleavened. ‘The especial honour conferred upon marriage by the Lord should also be noticed. ‘He here adorned and beautified it with his presence, and first miracle that he wrought.’”

3.] There is no necessity to suppose that the feast had lasted several days, as Do Wette and Lücke do. It has been suggested that the unexpected presence of the disciples may have occasioned a failure in the previously sufficient supply: a gloss in one of the old Latin MSS. has, “And it came to pass, that through the great number of guests the wine was used up.”

The mother of Jesus evidently is in a position of authority (see ver. 5) in the house, which was probably that of a near relative. The conjectures and traditions on the subject are many, and wholly unsatisfactory.

A graver question arises as to the intent with which this, They have no wine, was said. She cannot have had from experience any reason to suppose that her Son would work a miracle, for this (ver. 11) was His first. Chrysostom and others suggest that, knowing Him to be Who He was, she had been by the recent divine acknowledgment of Him and His calling disciples to Himself, led to expect the manifestation of His Messianic power about this time; and here seemed an occasion for it. Some of the other explanations are: “that she had always found Him a wise counsellor, and mentioned the want to Him merely that He might suggest some way of remedying it.” Cocceius. “Do thou depart, that the other guests may do the same, before the lack of wine is noticed.” Bengel. “That by some pious exhortation He might prevent the guests from feeling annoyance, and at the same time spare the bridegroom's shame." Calvin, "Jesus had wrought miracles, but in secret, before this." Tholuck.

On the whole, the most probable explanation is that of Lücke, which somewhat modifies the first hero mentioned,—that our Lord Himself had recently given some reason to expect that He would shew forth His glory by wonderful works. So, very nearly, Stier. 4.] The answer of our Lord is beyond question one of reproof, and disclaimer of participation in the grounds on which the request was made. See instances, besides reff. in Josh. xxii, 24: Mark i, 24. And so all the early expositors understood it. Irenæus says, "The Lord, repelling her unseasonable urgency, said,"&c.;—and Chrysostom, "She wished.... to gain glory to herself by means of her Son," and therefore He "answered her with severity."

The Romanist expositors mostly endeavour to divest the answer of any aspect of rebuke, and maintain that it was so uttered for our sakes alone, to teach us that He did not perform His miracles from regard to human affinity, but solely from love and His object of manifesting His glory. So Maldonatus. And this is true:—but first among those to be taught this, was she herself, who had tempted Him to work a miracle from that regard.

It has perhaps not been enough noticed, that in this answer the Lord declares His period of subjection to her as His earthly parent to be at an end. Henceforth His thoughts are not her thoughts. At twelve years of age, see Luke ii. 49, He answers, 'thy father and I,' by 'My Father:'—now, He is to be no longer before the world as Mary's son, but as sanctified by the Father and sent into the world:—compare Matt. xii. 48–50, and Luke xi. 27, 28.

Woman] There is no reproach in this term: but rather respect. The Lord henceforth uses it towards her, not calling her 'mother,' even on the Cross (see ch. xix. 26), doubtless for the reason alleged above.

mine hour is not yet come] This expression, mine hour, is generally used in John of the time of the Death of Christ:—see reff. But it is only so used because His death is in those passages the subject naturally underlying the narrative. It is, any fixed or appointed time;—and therefore here, the appointed time of His self-manifestation by miracles. This time was not yet come, but was close at hand. Some have supposed that the wine was not yet wholly exhausted, and that our Lord would wait till the miracle should be undoubted (so Trench): but Stier well remarks that the known depth of all His early sayings forbids us from attaching only this meaning to it;—and he sees in it a reference to the great marriage-feast and the new fruit of the vine in the Kingdom of God. If this be so, it can be only in the background; the words must have had a present meaning, and I believe it to be, 'My time, the time at which, from the Father's appointment and my own concurring will, I am to begin miraculous working, is not yet arrived: forestall it not' Very similarly he speaks, ch. vii. 6, to His brethren, and yet afterwards goes up to the feast. The notion that mine hour refers to the hour of our Lord's human infirmity on the Cross when (ch. xix. 27) He "acknowledged her as His mother," Wordsw., seems wholly unfounded. Where do we find any such special acknowledgment there? And why should we go out of our way for a fanciful sense of words which bear an excellent meaning as referring to circumstances then present?

5.] There certainly seems beneath this narrative to lie some incident which is not told us. For not only is Mary not repelled by the answer just given, but she is convinced that the miracle will be wrought, and she is not without an anticipation of the method of working it: for how should He require the aid of the servants, except the miracle were to take place according to the form here related? I believe we shall find, when all things are opened to us, that there had been a previous hint given her,—where or how I would not presume to say,—by our Lord, of His intention and the manner of performing it, and that her fault was, the too rash hastening on of what had been His fixed purpose.

6.] These vessels were for the washings usual at feasts: see Mark vii. 4. There could be no collusion or imposture here, as they were water-vessels, and could have no remnants of wine in them (see also ver. 10). And the large quantity which they held could not have been brought in unobserved. The word here rendered firkin is probably equivalent to the Jewish "bath" (which held 8 gall. 7–4 pints), and stands for it in the LXX, ref. 2 Chron. According to this, the quantity of wine thus created would be 6 times[2 or 3 times]8 gallons 7–4 pints: i. e. 6 times[17 or 25 gallons: i. e. (say, taking the mean,) 6 times 21 gallons: i. e., 126 gallons. The large quantity thus created has been cavilled at by unbelievers. We may leave them to their cavils with just one remark,—that He who creates abundance enough in this earth to "put temptation in men's way," acted on this occasion analogously with His known method of dealing. We may answer an error on the other side (if at be on the other side), by saying that the Lord here most effectually and once for all stamps with His condemnation that false system of moral reformation, which would commence by pledges to abstain from intoxicating liquors. He pours out His bounty for all, and He vouchsafes His grace to each for guidance; and to endeavor to evade the work which He has appointed for each man,—by refusing the bounty, to save the trouble of seeking the grace, is an attempt which inst ever end in degradation of the individual motives, and in social demoralization,—whatever present apparent effects may follow its first promulgation. One visible sign of this degradation, in its intellectual form, is the miserable attempt made by some of the advocates of this movement, to shew that the wine here and in other places of Scripture is unfermented wine, not possessing the power of intoxication.

The filling with water,—and drawing out wine, is all that is related. 'The moment of the miracle,' says Lücke, 'is rather understood than expressed. It seems to lie between vv. 7 and 8' (i. 471). The process of it is wholly out of the region of our imagination. In order for wine to be produced, we have the growth and ripening of the grape; the crushing of it in proper vessels; the fermentation;—but here all these are in a moment brought about in their results, by the same Power which made the laws of nature, and created and unfolded the capacities of man. See below on ver. 11.

8.] The ruler of the feast seems to be the same with the “master of a feast” spoken of Eccl. xxxii. 1, and with the Latin “king,” or “master,” “of the feast.” It would seem, from the place in Ecclesiasticus, that he was one of the guests raised to the post of presiding over the arrangements of the feast. This is however doubted by the older Commentators, who make him not one of the guests, but a person holding this especial office, and attending on feasts. Here, he tastes the wine; and therefore probably was a guest himself.

10.] The saying of the ruler of the feast is a general one, not applicable to the company then present.

We may be sure that the Lord would not have sanctioned, nor ministered to, actual drunkenness. Only those who can conceive this, will find any difficulty here; and they will find difficulties every where.

The account of the practice referred to is, that the palates of men become after a while dull, and cannot distinguish between good wine and bad. Pliny speaks of persons “who even give their guests other wine than they drink themselves, or bring it in as the banquet proceeds.” But the practice here described is not precisely that of which Pliny speaks, nor is there any meanness to be charged on it: it is only that, when a man has some kinds of wine choicer than others, he naturally produces the choicest, to suit the most discriminating taste. The word rendered have freely drank, in its common meaning, implies, “are intoxicated,” “are drunken”; but while there is no reason here to press its ordinary meaning, so neither is there any to shrink from it, as uttered by the ruler of the feast. ‘The safest rendering is that of Tyndall and Cranmer, “when men be dronke: and so it is in the Vulgate also.

11.] The words may also be rendered. according to the reading of most of our ancient MSS., This wrought Jesus as the beginning of his miracles.

This assertion of St. John excludes all the apocryphal miracles of the Gospel of the Infancy, and such like works, from credit.

The word sign, which occasionally occurs in the other Gospels and the Acts in this absolute sense of a miracle (e. g. in the original of Mark xvi. 17, 20; Luke xxiii. 8; Acts iv. 16, 22; viii. 6), is St. John’s ordinary word for it.

his glory] The glory, namely, which is referred to in ch. i. 14, where see note. It was a miracle eminently shewing forth the glory of the Word, by whom all things were made, in His state of having become flesh. And this ‘believing on Him,’ here predicated of the disciples, was certainly a higher faith than that which first led them to Him. They obtained new insight into His power:—not yet reflectively, so as to infer what all this implied, but so as to increase their faith and trust in Him. Again and again ‘they believed:’ new degrees of faith being attained; just as this has since been the case, and will continue to be, in the Church, in the continual providential development of the Christian spirit,—the leavening of the whole lump by degrees.

This important miracle, standing us it does at the very entrance of the official life of Christ, has been the subject of many doubts, and attempts to get rid of, or explain away, the power which was here manifested. But never did a narrative present a more stubborn inflexibility to the wresters of Scripture:—never was simple historical veracity more strikingly stamped on any miracle than on this. And doubtless this is providentially so arranged: sec the objections to it treated, and some admirable concluding remarks, in Lücke, i. 478.

To those who yet seek some sufficient cause for the miracle being wrought, we may—besides the conclusive answer that we are not in a position to treat this question satisfactorily,—assign the unmistakeable spiritual import of the change here made, as indicating the general nature of the beneficent work which the Lord came on earth to do. So Cornelius a Lapide: “Chuist, at the beginning of His ministry, by changing water into wine, signified, that He was about to change the Mosaic law, insipid and cold as water, into the Gospel of Grace, which is as wine, generous, full-flavoured, ardent, and powerful.” Similarly Eusebius, Augustine, Bernard, and Gregory the Great. II 12—IV. 54.] FIRST MANIFESTATION OF HIMSELF AS THE SON OF GOD:—and herein, ii. 13—iii. 36, IN JERUSALEM AND JUDÆA.

12.] went down, because Capernaum lay on the lake,—Cana higher up the country. There is no certainty as to this visit, whether or not it is the same with that hinted at in Luke iv. 23: so that no chronological inferences can be built on the hypothesis with any security.

On his brethren see Matt. xiii. 55 and note.

Notice the transition from His private to His public life. His mother and brethren are still with Him, attached merely by nature: His disciples, newly attached by faith. In the next verse He has cast off His mere earthly ties for His work. Also in the not many days notice less a mere chronological design, than one to shew that He lost no time after His first miracle, in publicly manifesting Himself as the Son of God.

13–22.] The first official visit to Jerusalem, at a Passover: and cleansing of the Temple.

13.] No data are given to determine whether the reason of the short stay at Capernaum was the near approach of the Passover.

Nothing is said of those who accompanied Jesus: but at all events, His already called disciples would be with Him (see ver. 22, and ch. iii. 22), and among them in all probability the Evangelist himself;—but not the rest of the Twelve, who were not yet called. Of this visit, the narrative of the three other Evangelists records nothing.

14.] On the distinctness of this cleansing from that related in Matt. xxi. 12 ff, see note there.

in the temple] In the court of the Gentiles, the outer temple, as distinguished from the sanctuary, or the inner temple. This market appears to have sprung up since the captivity, with a view to the convenience of those Jews who came from a distance, to provide them with the beasts for offering, and to change their foreign money into the sacred shekel, which alone was allowed to be paid in for the temple capitulation-tax (Matt. xvii. 24 ff). This tax was sometimes, as in Matthew, 1. c., paid elsewhere than in Jerusalem; but generally there, and in the temple. The very fact of the market being held there would produce an unseemly mixture of sacred and profane transactions, even setting aside the abuses which would be certain to be mingled with the traffic. It is to the former of these evils that our Lord makes reference in this first cleansing; in the second, to the latter.

15.] The small cords were probably the rushes which were littered down for the cattle to lie on. That our Lord used the scourge on the beasts only, not on the sellers of them, is almost necessarily contained in the form of the sentence here: which, according to the grammar of the original, should be rendered as in margin, “He drove all out of the temple, both the sheep and the oxen.” It has been imagined, that He dealt more mildly with those who sold the doves, which were for the offerings of the poor. But this was not so; He dealt alike with all. No other way was open with regard to them, than to order them to take their birds away.

This cleansing of the temple was in the direct course of His manifestation as the Messiah. Immediately after the prophetic announcement of the Forerunner, Mal. iii. 1, is that of the Lord’s coming suddenly to His temple and purifying it. This act also answers (but like the fulfilment last mentioned, only in an imperfect and still prophetic sense) to the declaration of the Baptist “Whose fan is in His hand,” &c., Matt. iii. 12.

His proceeding was not altogether unexampled nor unauthorized, even in an uncommissioned person: for all had the right to reform an abuse of this sort, and the zealots put this right in practice, ‘The disciples by their allusion in ver. 17 seem to refer the action to this latter class.

16. my Father’s house] The coincidence with Luke ii. 49 is remarkable. By this expression thus publicly used, our Lord openly announces His Messiahship. Nathanael had named Him ‘the Son of God’ with this meaning—see on ch. i. 50,—and these words, coupled with the expectation which the confession of John the Baptist would arouse, could leave no doubt on the minds of the Jews as to their import: see on ch. iii. 2.

an house of merchandise] not yet as at the end of His ministry; see above on ver. 14.

17.] his disciples remembered, at the time, not afterwards, which would have been expressed, as in ver. 22. But the very remembrance itself was prophetic. The “eating up” spoken of in that passion-Psalm, was the marring and wasting of the Saviour’s frame by His zeal for God and God’s Church, which resulted in the buffeting, the scourging, the Cross.

18.] On the demand of the Jews, see Deut. xiii. 1–3. It was not only to justify His having driven out the abomination; this any one might have done;—but to justify the mission and the whole course of action which the words my Father’s house implied. They used the same expression at the end of His ministry, Matt. xxi. 23.

19.] This answer of our Lord has been involved in needless difficulty. That in uttering the words, this temple, He pointed to His own Body, is inconceivable;—for thus both the Jews and His own disciples must have understood Him, which (see vv. 20, 22) neither of them did. That He implied in saying, Destroy this temple, that their lawless proceedings in the temple would at last bring it to an end, is equally inconceivable; both on account of the latter part of His declaration, which would thus have no meaning,—and because of the use in this case of the peculiar word,—which signifies the holy and the holiest place, the temple itself,—as distinguished from the whole enceinte of the sacred buildings. Stier has well remarked that our Lord in this saying comprehended in the reality,—His own Body, its type and symbol,—the temple then before them. That temple, with all its ordinances and holy places, was but the shadow of the Christian Church;—that, the type of the Body of the Lord, represented the Church, which is veritably His Body. And so the saying was fulfilled by the slaying of His actual Body, in which rejection of Him the destruction of the Jewish temple and city was involved,—and the raising of that Body after three days, in which resurrection we, all the members of His new glorified Body, are risen again. The difficulties attending the interpretation are,—besides the double meaning which I have treated above,—

(1) the use of the imperative, as applied to the death of Christ. But this surely may be understood as used hypothetically, and not by way of command. Matt. xii. 33 (“muke the tree good, &c.”) is an instance in point.

(2) The words I will raise it up—seeing that the resurrection of the Lord is ever spoken of as the work of the Father. Yes,—but by power committed to Christ Himself;—see ch. x. 18, where this is distinctly asserted: and ch. vi. 39, 40, 44, where it is implied, for He is the first-fruits of them that sleep,—and (though the whole course of His working was after the will of the Father,—and in the Spirit, which wrought in Him) strictly and truly raised Himself from the dead in the sense here intended.

(3) The utterance of such a prophecy at so early a period of His official life. But it was not a prophecy known and understood,—but a dark saying, from which no one could then draw an inference as to His death or resurrection. The disciples did not understand it; and I cannot agree with Stier that the Jews could have had any idea of such being His meaning. Chrysostom says, “He speaks many such things, which were not plain to men at the time, but to those who should come after. Why does He do this? that He might be shewn to Lave foreknown future events, when the accomplishment of the prophecy should have come: which has come to pass in the case of this very prophecy.” Lücke remarks, that the circumstance of the words being spoken so long before his trial by the Sanhedrim, would make it more easy for the false witnesses to distort them. This they did, but not so as to agree with one another. They reported it, ‘I can destroy,’ &c. which makes a wide difference, and represents our Lord as an enemy of the temple (Matt. xxvi. 61), and some added to this temple the epithet “which is made with hands,” and that He would raise another “made without hands” (Mark xiv. 58).

20.] The building of the temple by Herod the Great is stated by Josephus in one place to have been begun in the eighteenth year of his reign; in another, in the fifteenth; the difference being made by counting his reign from the death of Antigonus, or from his appointment by the Romans. Reckoning from this latter, we shall have twenty years till the birth of Christ, and thirty years since that event, from which fifty, however, four must be taken, since our era is four years too late. This gives forty-six. The temple was not completed till A.D. 64, under Herod Agrippa II., and the procurator Albinus; so that was in building must refer to the greater part of the work now completed.

22.] the Scripture, by all analogy, must mean the O.T. scriptures. That the resurrection of the Lord is the subject of O.T. prophecy, we find in several passages of the N.T., see ch. xx. 9; Luke xxiv. 26, 27; 1 Cor. xv. 4. At first sight it appears difficult to fix on any passage in which it is directly announced: but with the deeper understanding of the Scriptures which the Holy Spirit gave the Apostles and still gives the Christian Church, such prophecies as that in Ps. xvi. are recognized as belonging to Him in Whom alone they are properly fulfilled; see also Hos. vi. 2.

23–25.] MANY BELIEVE ON JESUS AT THE PASSOVER: HIS KNOWLEDGE OF THEIR CHARACTER, AND WITHHOLDING OF HIMSELF FROM THEM.

23. when they beheld the miracles which he did] “They believed on Him, but not firmly. Those converts believed in a stricter sense, who believed not owing to the miracles only, but owing to His teaching.” Euthymius. What miracles these were, is not related:—certainly some notable ones, see ch. iii. 2.

The mention of them precludes us from understanding ch. iv. 54, as indicating that the healing of the ruler’s son was absolutely His second miracle.

24, 25.] The meaning is, He did not trust Himself (in the original, the same verb is used for ‘believed,’ in ver. 23, and for ‘trust’ in this verse) to them,—i. e. treat them as true and earnest disciples: they entered into no spiritual relation with Him, and He in consequence into none with them. The fact of this being narrated shews that it made an impression on the Evangelist, and led him perhaps first to the conclusion which he here expresses, and which higher knowledge enabled him afterwards to place, as he here does, on its right ground;—His knowing what was in man. Nothing less than divine knowledge is here set forth; the words are even stronger than if the reference had been to the persons here mentioned (“needed not that any should testify of them: for He knew what was in them”): as the text now stands, it asserts an entire knowledge of all that is in all men.

John: Chapter 3

CHAP. III. 1–21.] The Lord’s discourse with Nicodemus,—one of these believers on account of His miracles,—of the spiritual nature of the kingdom of God and the necessity of the new birth.

1.] There is mentioned in the Talmud a Nicodemus ben Gorion, who was properly called Bonai, and said to have been a disciple of Jesus: but he is found living at the destruction of Jerusalem. This might certainly have been; still it must be quite uncertain whether he be the same with this Nicodemus. He is mentioned again ch. vii. 50; xix. 39. He was a member of the Sanhedrim, and, besides, a teacher of the law (ver. 10).

2.] by night, for fear of the Jews: see ch. xii, 42. The discourse seems to have taken place between Jesus and Nicodemus alone,—and may have been related by our Lord to the Evangelist afterwards. If this be deemed improbable (though I do not see why it should),—of the two other alternatives I would rather believe that St. John was present, than that Nicodemus should have so minutely related a conversation which in his then position he could not understand.

we know] This plural may be merely an allusion to others who had come to the same conclusion, e.g. Joseph of Arimathea; or it may express that Nicodemus was sent in the name of several who wished to know the real character of this Person who wrought such miracles. It is harsh, in this private conversation, to take the plural as merely of singular import, as Lightfoot seems to do. His other rendering, “it is commonly acknowledged,” is better,—but not satisfactory; for the common people did not generally confess it, and Nicodemus, as a “ruler,” would not be likely to speak in their name (see ch. vii. 49). I would rather take it to express the true conviction respecting Jesus, of that class to which Nicodemus belonged—the “rulers:” and see in it an important fact, that their persecutions and murder of the Prince of Life hence found their greatest aggravation, that they were carried on against the conclusions of their own minds, out of bitter malice, and worldly disappointment at His humble and unobtrusive character, and the spiritual purity and self-sacrifice which He inculcated. Still this must not, though undoubtedly it has truth in it, be carried too far: compare Acts iii. 17, and Acts xiii. 27; 1 Cor. ii. 8. Some degree of ignorance there must necessarily have been in all of them, even Caiaphas included, of our Lord’s office and Person. Stier seems to think that Nicodemus, by using the plural, is sheltering himself from expressing his own conviction, so as to be able to draw back again if necessary.

art.... come] Stier and others think that there is involved in this word a recognition by Nicodemus of the Messianic mission of Jesus:—that it expresses His being “He that was to come” (Matt. xi. 3 al.). It is never used of any but the Messiah, except by the Lord Himself, when speaking of John the Baptist as the subject of prophecy (see Matt. xi. 14 al.)

a teacher] In this and the following words, Nicodemus seems to be cautiously withdrawing from his admission being taken as expressing too much. For who of the Jews ever expected a teacher to come from God? They looked for a King, to sit on David’s throne,—a Prophet, to declare the divine will;—but the Messiah was never designated as a mere teacher, till the days of modern Socinianism. So that he seems trying to qualify or recall his “art... come” by this addition.

The following words exhibit the same cautious inconsistency. No man can do, &c. unless—we expect some strong expression of the truth, such as we had from Nathanael in ch. i. 50, but the sentence drops to merely—God be with him, which is a very poor and insufficient exponent of “art come from God.” Against this inconsistency,—the inner knowledge that the Kingdom of God was come, and He who was to found it, on the one hand,—and the rationalizing endeavour to reduce this heavenly kingdom to mere learning, and its Founder to a mere teacher, on the other,—is the following discourse directed.

3.] We are not to imagine that any thing is wanting to complete the sense or connexion. Our Lord replies, It is not learning, but life, that is wanted for the Messiah’s Kingdom; and life must begin by birth. Luther says: “My teaching is not of doing and leaving undone, but of a change in the man;—so that it is, not new works done, but a new man to do them; not another life only, but another birth.” And only by this means can Nicodemus gain the teaching for which he is come,—“see the Kingdom of God,”—‘become a disciple of Christ:’—”see, that is, understand,” says Theophylact,—‘understand, by sharing’—‘have any conception of.’

anew] “some say, from heaven, some, from the beginning.” Chrysostom:—who, as also Euthymius, explains it by ‘regeneration:’—Origen, Cyril, and Theophylact taking the other meaning.

The true meaning is to be found by taking into account the answer of Nicodemus, who obviously understood it of a new birth in mature life. Born anew or afresh is a better rendering than ‘born again,’ being closer to the meaning of the Greek word, ‘from the very beginning,’—‘unless a man begin his life anew altogether (see Gal. iv. 9), he cannot’&c.

It is not impossible that the other meaning may lie beneath this,—as the kingdom is of God, and so must the birth be;—but Grotius has made the important remark, that in the language in which our Lord probably spoke, there is no word of double meaning corresponding to the Greek word here:—so that He must have expressed it, as Nicodemus understood it, of an entirely new birth.

4.] It is impossible that Nicodemus can have so entirely and stupidly misunderstood our Lord’s words, as his question here would seem to imply. The idea of new birth was by no means alien from the Rabbinical views. They described a proselyte when baptized as “like an infant just born.” Lightfoot. I agree with Stier in thinking that there was something of the spirit that would not understand, and the disposition to turn to ridicule what he heard. But together with this there was also considerable real ignorance. ‘The proselyte might be regarded as born again, when he became one of the seed of Abraham: this figure would be easily explained on the Judaical view: but that every man should need this, was beyond Nicodemus’s comprehension. He therefore rebuts the assertion with a reduction to an absurdity, which in spirit expresses, as in ch. vi. 60,—‘This saying is hard; who can hear it?’” when he is old: probably he himself was old, and he instances his own case.

5.] Our Lord passes by the question of Nicodemus without notice, further than that this His second assertion takes as it were the ground from under it, by explaining the token and means of the new birth.

There can be no doubt, on any honest interpretation of the words, that to be born of water refers to the token or outward sign of baptism,—to be born of the Spirit to the thing signified, or inward grace of the Holy Spirit. All attempts to get rid of these two plain facts have sprung from doctrinal prejudices, by which the views of expositors have been warped. Such we have in Calvin: who explains the words to mean, “the Spirit, who cleanses us, and by diffusing His influence in us inspires the vigour of heavenly life:”—Grotius, “the Spirit, who cleanses like water;”—Cocceius, “the grace of God, washing away our uncleanness and sins;”—Tholuck, who holds that not Baptism itself, but only its idea, that of cleansing, is referred to;—and others, who endeavour to resolve water and the Spirit into a figure, so as to make it mean ‘the cleansing or purifying Spirit.’ All the better and deeper expositors have recognized the coexistence of the two, water and the Spirit.

This being then recognized, to what does water refer? At that time, two kinds of baptism were known: that of the proselytes, by which they were received into Judaism,—and that of John, by which, as a preparatory rite, symbolizing repentance, the people were made ready for Him who was to baptize them with the Holy Ghost. But both these were significant of one and the same truth; that, namely, of the entire cleansing of the man for the new and spiritual life on which he was to enter, symbolized by water cleansing the outward person. Both were appointed means,—the one by the Jewish Church,—the other, stamping that first with approval, by God Himself,—towards their respective ends. John himself declared his baptism to be incomplete,—it was only with water; One was coming, who should baptize with the Holy Ghost. That declaration of his is the key to the understanding of this verse. Baptism, complete, with water and the Spirit, is the admission into the kingdom of God. Those who have received the outward sign and the spiritual grace, have entered into that Kingdom. And this entrance was fully ministered to the disciples when the Spirit descended on them on the day of Pentecost. So that, as spoken to Nicodemus, these words referred him to the baptism of John, which probably (see Luke vii. 30) he had slighted. But they were not only spoken to him. The words of our Lord have in them life and meaning for all ages of His Church: and more especially these opening declarations of His ministry, He here unites together the two elements of a complete Baptism which were sundered in the words of the Baptist, ch. i. 33—in which united form He afterwards (Matt. xxviii. 19, 20; Mark xvi. 16) ordained it as a Sacrament of His Church. Here he speaks of spiritual Baptism, as in ch. vi. of spiritual Communion, and in both places in connexion with the outward conditions and media of these ‘sacraments. It is observable that here as ordinarily (with a special exception, Acts x. 44 ff.), the outward sign comes first, and then the spiritual grace, vouchsafed in and by means of it where duly received.

enter into is more than “see” above, though no stress is to be laid on the difference. The former word was perhaps used because of Nicodemus’s expectation of teaching being all that was required; but now, the necessity of a real vital change having been set forth, the expression is changed to a practical one—the entering into the Kingdom of God.

6.] The neuter gender (that which is born....) denotes not only the universal application of this truth, but (see Luke i. 35) the very first beginnings of life in the embryo, before sex can be predicated. So Bengel: “It denotes the very first elements of life.”

The Lord here answers Nicodemus’s hypothetical question of ver. 4, by telling him that even could it be so, it would not accomplish the birth of which He speaks.

In this flesh is included every part of that which is born after the ordinary method of generation: even the spirit of man, which, receptive as it is of the Spirit of God, is yet in the natural birth dead, sunk in trespasses and sins, and in a state of wrath. Such ‘flesh and blood’ cannot inherit the Kingdom of God, 1 Cor. xv. 50. But when the man is born again of the Spirit (the water does not appear any more, being merely the outward form of reception,—theless included in the greater), then just as flesh generates flesh, so spirit generates spirit, after its own image, see 2 Cor. iii. 18 end; and since the Kingdom of God is a spiritual kingdom, such only who are so born can enter into it.

7.] The weightiest word here is Ye. The Lord did not, could not, say this of Himself. Why?—Because in the full sense in which the flesh is incapacitated from entering the kingdom of God, He was not born of the flesh. He inherited the weakness of the flesh, but His spirit was not, like that of sinful man, alien from holiness and God; and therefore on Him no second birth passed; when the Holy Spirit descended on Him at his baptism, the words spoken by the Father were indicative of past approval, not of renewal. His obedience was accepted as perfect, and the good pleasure of the Father rested on Him. Therefore He includes not Himself in this necessity for the new birth.

The Marvel not points on to the next verse, in which Nicodemus is told that he has things as wonderful around him every day in the natural world.

8.] Our Lord might have chosen any of the mysteries of nature to illustrate the point:—He takes that one, which is above others symbolic of the action of the Spirit, and which (in both languages, that in which He spoke, as well as that in which His speech is reported) is expressed by the same word as it;—Pneuma being both wind and spirit. So that the words as they stand apply themselves at once to the Spirit and His working, without any figure. Bengel, after Origen and Augustine, takes the word pneuma with which this verse opens, and which we have rendered wind, of the Holy Spirit exclusively: but this can hardly be. The form of the sentence, as well as its import, is against it. The words “bloweth,” “hearest,” “knowest,” are all said of well-known facts. And the comparison would not hold on that supposition—‘As the Spirit is in His working on those born of Him, so is every one that is born of the Spirit. But on the other interpretation, we have The wind bloweth, &c.:—so is, i.e. ‘so it is with’ (see a similar construction Matt. xiii. 45) every one born of the Spirit.

The word pneuma is not the violent wind, which is otherwise expressed, but the gentle breath of the wind;—and it is heard, not felt;—a case in which “thou knowest not, &c.” is more applicable than in that of a violent wind steadily blowing. It is one of those sudden breezes springing up on a calm day, which has no apparent direction, but we hear it rustling in the leaves around. The where it listeth, in the application, implies the freedom (2 Cor. iii. 17) and unrestrained working of the Spirit (1 Cor. xii. 11).

every one that is born of the Spirit] Our Lord can hardly, as Stier explains, mean Himself by these words; or if He does, only inclusively, as being one born of the Spirit,—not principally. He describes the mystery of the spiritual life: we see its effects, in ourselves, and others who have it; but we cannot trace its beginnings, nor can we prescribe to the Holy Spirit His course: He works in us and leads us on, accompanying us with His witness,—His voice, spiritually discerned.

This saying of the Lord—in contradiction to all so-called Methodism, which prescribes the time and manner of the working of the Spirit—assures us of the manifold and undefinable variety of both these. ‘The physiognomies of those who are born again, are as various as those of natural men.’ Draseke.

9.] The question of Nicodemus is evidently still one of disbelief, though no longer of frivolity see ver. 12.

11.] Henceforward the discourse is an answer to the unbelief, and in answering that, to the question (How can these things be?) of Nicodemus: by shewing him the appointed means of this. new birth, and of being upheld in the life to which it is the entrance, viz. faith in the Son of God.

We speak that we do know...] Why these plurals? Various interpretations have been given: “Either He speaks concerning Himself and the Father, or concerning Himself alone.” Euthymius;—‘He speaks of Himself and the Spirit’ (Bengel);—of Himself and the Prophets (Beza, Tholuck);—of Himself and John the Baptist (Knapp);—of Teachers like Himself (Meyer);—of all the born of the Spirit (Lange, Wesley);—of the three Persons in the Holy Trinity (Stier);—or, the plural is only rhetorical (Lücke, De Wette). I had rather take it as a proverbial saying; q.d. “I am one of those who,”&c. Our Lord thereby brings out the unreasonableness of that disbelief which would not receive His witness, but made it an exception to the general proverbial rule.

ye receive not, addressed still to Nicodemus, and through him to the Jews: not to certain others who were present, as Olshausen supposes.

12.] The words receive our testimony prepared the way for the new idea which is brought forward in this verse—believing. Faith is, in the most pregnant sense, ‘the receiving of testimony;’ because it is the making subjectively real the contents of that testimony. So the believing in him (see ver. 15) is, the full reception of the Lord’s testimony; because the burden of that testimony is, grace and truth and salvation by Himself. This faith is neither reasoning, nor knowledge, but a reception of divine Truth declared by One who came from God; and so it is far above reasoning and knowledge:—we believe above we know.

But what are the earthly things? The matters relating to the new birth which have hitherto been spoken of;—called so because that side of them has been exhibited which is upon earth, and happens among men. That the parable about the wind is not intended, is evident from “and ye believe not,” which in that case would be ‘ye understand not.’ And the heavenly things are the things of which the discourse goes on to treat from this point: viz. the heavenly side of the new birth and salvation of man, in the eternal counsels of God regarding His only-begotten Son.

Stier supposes a reference in this verse to Wisd. ix. 16, "Hardly do we guess aright at things that are upon the earth, and with labour do we find the things that are before us: but the things that are in heaven who hath searched out?"

13.] The whole verse seems to have intimate connexion with and reference to Prov. xxx. 4, "Who hath ascended up to heaven, or descended?" and as spoken to a learned doctor of the law, would recall that verse,—especially as the further question is there asked, 'Who hath gathered the wind in His fists?' and 'What is His name, and what His Son's name?' See also Deut. xxx. 12, and the citation, Rom. x. 6–8.

All attempts to explain away the plain sense of this verse are futile and ridiculous. The Son of Man, the Lord Jesus, the Word made Flesh, was in, came down from, heaven,—and was in heaven (heaven about Him, heaven dwelling on earth, ch. i. 52), while here, and ascended up into heaven when He left this earth;—and by all these proofs, speaking in the prophetic language of accomplished Redemption, does the Lord establish, that He alone can speak of heavenly things to men, or convey the blessing of the new birth to them. Be it remembered, that He is here speaking by anticipation, of results of His course and sufferings on earth,—of the way of regeneration and salvation which God has appointed by Him. He regards therefore throughout the passage, the great facts of redemption as accomplished, and makes announcements which could not be literally acted upon till they had been so accomplished. See vv. 14 ff., whose sense will be altogether lost, unless this hath ascended up be understood of His exaltation to be a Prince and a Saviour.

which is in heaven] See ch. i. 18 and note. Doubtless the meaning involves 'whose place is in heaven;' but it also asserts the being in heaven of the time then present: see ch. i. 52. Thus majestically does the Lord characterize His whole life of humiliation in the flesh, between His descent and His ascent. As uniting in Himself God, whose dwelling is Heaven, with man, whose dwelling is on earth, He ever was in heaven. And nearly connected with this fact is the transition to His being the fountain of eternal life, in vv. 14 ff: cf. 1 Cor. xv. 47–50, where the same connexion is strikingly set forth.

To explain such expressions as "to ascend up into heaven," &c., as mere Hebrew metaphors (Lücke, De Wette, &c.) is no more than saying that Hebrew metaphors were founded on deep insight into divine truth:—these words in fact express the truths on which Hebrew metaphors were constructed. Socinus is quite right, when he says that those who take 'hath ascended up into heaven' metaphorically, must in all consistency take 'he that came down from heaven' metaphorically also; "the descent and ascent must be both of the same kind."

14.] From this point the discourse passes to the Person of Christ, and Redemption by His Death.

The Lord brings before this doctor of the Law the mention of Moses, who in his day by divine command lifted up a symbol of forgiveness and redemption to Israel.

In interpreting this comparison, we must avoid all such ideas as that our Lord merely compares His death to the elevation of the brazen serpent, as if only a fortuitous likeness were laid hold of by Him. This would leave the brazen serpent itself meaningless, and is an explanation which can only satisfy those who do not discern the typical reference of all the ceremonial dispensation to the Redeemer.

It is an important duty of an expositor here, to defend the obvious and only honest explanation of this comparison against the tortuous and inadequate interpretations of modern critics. The comparison lies between the exalted serpent of brass, and the exalted Son of Man. The brazen serpent sets forth the Redeemer. This by recent commentators (Lücke, De Wette, and others) is considered impossible: and the thing compared is held to be only 'the lifting up.' But this does not satisfy the construction of the comparison. 'The brazen serpent was lifted up: every one who looked on it, lived;' this sentence, in its terms, represents. this other,— 'The Son of Man must be lifted up: every one who believes on Him, shall live.' The same thing is predicated of the two;—both are lifted up; cognate consequences follow,—body-healing and soul-healing (as Erskine, On the Brazen Serpent). There must then be some reason why the only two members of the comparison yet unaccounted for stand where they do,—considering that the brazen serpent was lifted up not for any physical efficacy, but by command of God alone. Now on examination we find this correspondence fully established. The 'serpent' is in Scripture symbolism, the devil, —from the historical temptation in Gen. iii. downwards. But why is the devil set forth by the serpent? How does the bite of the serpent operate? It pervades with its poison the frame of its victim: that frame becomes poisoned:—and death ensues. So sin, the poison of the devil, being instilled into our nature, that nature has become a poisoned nature,—a flesh of sin (see Rom. viii. 3). Now the brazen serpent was made in the likeness of the serpents which had bitten the children of Israel. It represented to them the poison which had gone through their frames, and it was hung up there, on the banner-staff, as a trophy, to shew them that for the poison, there was healing;—that the plague had been overcome. In it, there was no poison; only the likeness of it. Now was not the Lord Jesus made in the likeness of the flesh of sin, Rom. viii. 3? Was not He made 'Sin for us, who knew no sin' (2 Cor. v. 21)?

Did not He, on His Cross, make an open shew of, and triumph over, the Enemy, so that it was as if the Enemy himself had been nailed to that Cross (Col. ii. 15)? Were not Sin and Death and Satan crucified, when He was crucified? “In that case, since the injury was by the serpent, by the serpent was also the cure: and in this, since by man death came into the world, by man entered life also.” Euthymius.

must the Son of man be lifted up: i.e. it is necessary, in the Father’s counsel—it is decreed, but not arbitrarily;—the very necessity of things, which is in fact but the evolution of the divine Will, made it requisite that the pure and sinless Son of Man should thus be uplifted and suffer; see Luke xxiv. 26.

In the word lifted up there is more than the mere crucifixion. It has respect in its double meaning (of which see a remarkable instance in Gen. xl. 13, 19) to the exaltation of the Lord on the Cross, and through the Cross to His Kingdom; and refers back to “hath ascended up into heaven” before.

15.] The corresponding clause applying to the type is left to be supplied—‘And as every one who looked on it was healed, so....’

believeth in him] This expression, here only used by John, implies his exaltation,—see ch. xii. 32. It is a belief in (abiding in, see note on ver. 18) His Person being what God by his sufferings and exaltation hath made Him to be, and being that TO ME. This involves, on the part of the believer, the anguish of the bite of the fiery serpent,—and the earnest looking on Him in Whom sin is crucified, with the inner eye of faith.

have eternal life] Just as in the type, God did not remove the fiery serpents,—or not all at once,—but healing was to be found in the midst of them by looking to the brazen serpent (‘every one that is bitten, when he looketh upon it shall live,’ Num. xxi. 8),—so the temptations and conflicts of sin shall not leave the believer,—but in the midst of these, with the Eye of Faith fixed on the uplifted Son of Man, he has eternal life; perishes not of the bite, but shall live.

See on this verse the remarkable passage, Wisd. xvi. 5–13, where as much of the healing sign is opened as could be expected before the great Antitype Himself appeared.

16.] Many Commentators—since the time of Erasmus, who first suggested the notion,—have maintained that the discourse of our Lord breaks off here, and the rest, to ver. 21, consists of the remarks of the Evangelist. (So Tholuck, Olshausen, Lücke, De Wette; which last attributes vv. 13, 14 also to John.) But to those who view these discourses of our Lord as intimately connected wholes, this will be as inconceivable, as the idea of St. Matthew having combined into one the insulated sayings of his Master. This discourse would be altogether fragmentary, and would have left Nicodemus almost where he was before, had not this most weighty concluding part been also spoken to him. This it is, which expands and explains the assertions of vv. 14, 15, and applies them to the present life and conduct of mankind.

The principal grounds alleged for supposing the discourse to break off here seem to be

(a) that all allusion to Nicodemus is henceforth dropped.

But this is not conclusive, for it is obvious that the natural progress of such an interview on his part would be from questioning to listening: and that even had he joined in the dialogue, the Evangelist would not have been bound to relate all his remarks, but only those which, as vv. 2, 4, and 9, were important to bring out his mind and standing-point.

(b) that henceforth past tenses are used; making it more probable that the passage was added after the great events alluded to had taken place. But does not our Lord speak here, as in so many other cases, proleptically, of the fulness of the accomplishment of those designs, which in the divine counsels were accomplished? Is not this way of speaking natural to a discourse which is treating of the development of the new birth, itself not yet brought in till the Spirit was given? See a parallel instance, with the Evangelist’s explanation, ch. vii. 37–39. (c) on account of this use of only-begotten, verses 16, 18, which is peculiar to John. But, as Stier well enquires, whence did John get this word, but from the lips of his divine Master? Would he have ventured on such an expression, except by an authorization from Him? (d) It is asserted that John often continues our Lord’s discourses with additions of his own;—and ver. 31, and ch. i. 16, are alleged as instances. Of these, ch. i. 16 is beside the question;—for the whole prologue is spoken in the person of the Evangelist, and the Baptist’s testimony in ver. 15 is merely confirmatory of ver. 14, and then the connexion goes on with ver. 16. On the untenability of the view with regard to vv. 31 ff., see notes there.

It would besides give us a very mean idea of the honesty or reverence of one who sets forth so sublime a view of the Divinity and Authority of our Lord, to suppose him capable, in any place, of attributing to his Master words and sentiments of his own invention. And that the charge amounts to this, every simple reader can bear testimony. The obvious intention of the Evangelist here is, that the Lord shall have said these words. If our Lord did not say them, but the Evangelist, we cannot stop with the view that he has added his own remarks to our Lord’s discourse, but must: at once pronounce him guilty of an imposture and a forgery. I conclude therefore on all these grounds that the words following, to ver. 21, cannot be otherwise regarded than as uttered by our Lord in continuation of His discourse.

loved] The indefinite past tense, signifying the universal and eternal existence of that love which God Himself is (1 John iv. 8).

the world, in the most general sense, as represented by, and included in, man,—Gen. iii. 17, 18, and i. 28;—not, the elect, which would utterly destroy the force of the passage; see on ver. 18.

The Lord here reveals Love as the one ground of the divine counsel in redemption,—salvation of men, as its one purpose with regard to them.

he gave his only-begotten Son] These words seem to carry a reference to the offering of Isaac; and Nicodemus in that case would at once be reminded by them of the love there required, the substitution there made, and the prophecy there uttered to Abraham, to which the following words of our Lord so nearly correspond.

gave—absolute, not merely to the world—gave up,—Rom. viii. 32; where, as Stier remarks, we have again, in the “spared not,” an unmistakeable allusion to the same words, said to Abraham, Gen. xxii. 16.

that whosoever...] By the repetition of this final clause verbatim from ver. 15, we have the identity of the former clauses established: i.e. the uplifting of the Son of Man like the serpent in the wilderness is the manifestation of the divine Love in the gift of the Son of God: “the Son of Man” of ver. 14 is equivalent, in the strictest sense, to “his only-begotten Son” of ver. 16.

17.] the world,—the Gentile world,—was according to Jewish ideas to be judged and condemned by the Messiah. This error our Lord here removes. The assertion ch. ix. 39, “for judgment (or, condemnation) came I into this world,” is no contradiction to this. The judgment there, as here, results from the separation of mankind into two classes,—those who will and those who will not come to the light; and that result itself is not the purpose why the Son of God came into the world, but is evolved in the accomplishment of the higher purpose, viz. Love, and the salvation of men. Observe, the latter clause does not correspond to the former—it is not that He might save the world, but that the world through Him might be saved:—the free will of the world is by this strikingly set forth, in connexion with verses 19, 20. Not that the Lord is not the Saviour of the world (ch. iv. 42), but that the peculiar cast of this passage required the other side of the truth to be brought out.

18.] cometh not into judgment—see ch. v. 24, where the same assertion is made more fully; and note there.

is judged already, implying,—by no positive act of judgment of Mine,—but by the very nature of things themselves. God has provided a remedy for the deadly bite of sin; this remedy the man has not accepted, not taken: he must then perish in his sins: he is already judged and sentenced.

hath not believed] The perfect sets before us the deliberate choice of the man, q.d. ‘he hath not chosen to believe’ see 2 Thess. ii. 11, 12.

in the name—not without meaning: that name was “JESUS, for He shall save his people from their sins,” Matt. i. 21.

The word only-begotten also here sets before us the hopelessness of such a man’s state: he has no other Saviour.

19.] The particular nature of this decided judgment is now set forth,—that the light (see ch. i. 7, and notes) is come into the world, and men (men in general; an awful revelation of the future reception of the Gospel) loved (the perversion of the affections and will is the deepest ruin of mankind) the darkness (see note on ch. i. 5; = the state of sin and unbelief) rather than (not to be resolved into ‘and not;’ but, as Bengel says, “The loveliness of the light struck them, but they persevered in the love of the darkness,” see ch. v. 35; xii. 43; 2 Tim. iii. 4) the light, because their deeds were evil (their habits, thoughts, practices,—all these are included,—were perverted).

loved and were are the indefinite past tense, implying the general usage and state of men, when and after the light came into the world.

20.] This verse analyzes the psychological grounds of the preceding. The light is not here ‘the common light of day,’ nor light in general: but, as before, the Light; i.e. the Lord Jesus, and His salvation: see ver. 21 end.

There is here a difference between the verbs used in the original in the expressions doeth evil and doeth the truth, which is too remarkable to be passed over,—especially as the same distinction is observed in ch. v. 29. I think the distinction is perhaps this,—that the first verb represents more the habit of action; so that we might say ‘he that practises evil;’ but the second the true doing of good, good fruit, good that remains. He who practises, has nothing but his practice, which is an event, a thing of the past, a source to him only of condemnation; he has nothing to shew for it, for it is also empty, worthless (which is the real primitive meaning of the adjective here rendered “evil”); whereas he that does, makes, creates (for this is the force of the second verb), has his deed, or thing made,—he has abiding fruit; his works do follow him. So that the expressions will not perhaps here admit of being interchanged. In the allusion to darkness, there may possibly be a hint at the coming by night of Nicodemus, but surely only by a distant implication. He might gather this from what was said, that it would have been better for him to make open confession of Jesus; but we can hardly say that our Lord reproves him for coming even as he did.

21.] Who is this doer of the truth? the end of ch. i. will best explain to us,—in whom there is no guile, see also Luke viii. 15, and Ps. xv. The practiser of wickedness is crooked and perverse; he has a light, which he does not follow; he knows the light, and avoids it; and so there is no truth, singleness, in him; he is a man at variance with himself. But the simple and single-minded is he who knowing and approving the light, comes to it; and comes that he may be carried onward in this spirit of truth and single-mindedness to higher degrees of communion with and likeness to God. “The good man seeks the light, and to place his works in the light, not from a vain love of praise, but from a desire for communion wherein he finds strength and security,” De Wette. But this is not all: the manifesting his works, that they are wrought in God, is and can be only by the candle of the Lord being kindled within him, and he himself born again in the Kingdom of God; see Ps. cxxxix. 23, 24.

We hear nothing of the effect produced on Nicodemus by this interview. It certainly did not alienate him from Jesus, see ch. vii. 50; xix. 39, also ch. xii. 42. “It speaks for the simplicity and historic truthfulness of our Evangelist, that he adds nothing more, and even leaves untold the immediate result which the discourse had.” Baumgarten-Crusius.

22–36.] Removal of Jesus and His disciples into the neighbourhood of the Baptist, who, upon occasion given, bears another notable testimony to Him.

22.] After these things: the sequence is not immediate; for this, St. John uses “after this” or “that,” see ch. xi. 7, 11; xix. 28.

the land of Judæa] The rural districts of Judæa, in distinction from the metropolis.

baptized, viz. by means of His disciples;—see ch. iv. 2, and note. The place is not named: perhaps He did not remain in one fixed spot.

23.] The situation of these places is uncertain, Eusebius and Jerome place Salim eight Roman miles south of Scythopolis, and Ænon at the same distance, on the Jordan. If Scythopolis was the ancient Bethshan, both places were in Samaria: and to this agree Epiphanius, and the Samaritan chronicle called Abul Phatach. In Judith iv. 4, we find mention of “the valley of Salem” in Samaria (see note on Heb. vii. 1). An Ænon in the wilderness of Judah is mentioned Josh. xv. 61 (in the Alexandrine text of the LXX, not in our English Bible) and ib. ver. 32, Shilhim (Seleem, LXX) and Ain, both in Judah, where it is certainly more probable, both from the text here and from other considerations, that John would have been baptizing, than in Samaria. The name Ænon is an intensitive form of Ain, a fountain, which answers to the description here given. Both places were West of the Jordan: see ver. 26, and compare ch. i. 28.

they came, and were baptized, i.e. the multitudes.

24] There is much difficulty, which probably never will be cleared up, about the date of the imprisonment of John, and its reference to the course of our Lord’s ministry. Between Matt. iv. 11, 12, there seems to be a wide hiatus, in which (see note there) the first chapters of this Gospel should be inserted. But the records from which the three Gospels have arisen were apparently unconscious of any such interval. Our Evangelist seems here to refer to such records, and to insert this remark, that it might not be imagined, as it would be from them, that our Lord’s public ministry (in the wider sense, see below on ver. 26) began with the imprisonment of the Baptist.

25.] The circumstances under which this dispute arose seem to have been these:—John and our Lord were baptizing near to one another. (On the relation of their baptisms, see below on ver. 26.) They were both watched jealously (see ch. iv. 1) by the Pharisees. One of these (a Jew, i.e. a certain Jew, which, in St. John’s use of that term, would mean, one of the rulers or chief men) appears to have entered into dispute with the disciples of John about the relative importance of the two baptisms; they perhaps maintaining that their master’s purification preparatory to the Messiah was absolutely necessary for all, and he (the Jew) pointing out to them the apparent inconsistency of this Messiah himself authorizing a baptism in his name, and alleging that if so, their master’s baptism was rendered superfluous. We are driven to these conjectures, because the text gives us no further insight into the fact, than what the circumstances and the answer of John render probable.

26.] Compare ch. i. 28.

all men come to him] Not, probably, any who had been baptized already by John; but multitudes of persons. The baptism now carried on by the disciples appears to have stood very much in the same position as that of John. It was preparatory to the public ministry of our Lord properly so called, which began in Galilee after the imprisonment of John. It was not accompanied with the gift of the Spirit, see ch. vii. 39. As John's commission was now on the wane, so our Lord's was expanding. The solemn cleansing of the temple was its opening; and now it is proceeding onwards, gathering multitudes around it (see ch. iv. 1).

27.] The subject of this answer is,—the divinely-appointed humiliation and eclipsing of the Baptist himself before the greater majesty of Him who was come after him. Accordingly he begins in this verse by answering to the zeal of his disciples, ‘that he cannot go beyond the bounds of his heaven-appointed mission.’ ‘I cannot arrogate to myself and take upon me what God has not given.’ Wetstein. Some apply the words to Jesus:— ‘If His circumstances are more illustrious, and all men come to Him, it is no matter of wonder; for such would be the case with Divinity.’ Chrysostom. But the whole tone of the answer makes the other view more likely. Of course the remark, being general, may in the background have reference to the greater mission of Jesus; but not primarily. The parallelism of “a man” here, and himself, as the subject of “I said” in the next verse, also supports this view; see Heb. v. 4.

28.] ‘Not only so, but I have always given the same consistent testimony; that I was only the forerunner of One greater than myself.’ The word him in the original does not refer to “the Christ,” but to Jesus, as the subject of ver. 26; and thus is not merely a general testimony with regard to the Messiah, but a personal one to Jesus. In reading this verse therefore, strong emphasis should be laid on the word him.

29.] Here first, (and here only in our Gospel,) comes, from the mouth of the Forerunner, this great symbolical reference, which is so common in the other Gospels and in the Epistles. It is remarkable that our Lord brings it forward in His answer to the disciples of John respecting fasting, Matt. ix. 15: where see note on the further import of the terms used.

The friend of the bridegroom was the regular organ of communication in the preliminaries of marriage, and had the ordering of the marriage feast. It is to this last time, and not to any ceremonial custom connected with the marriage rites, that this verse refers. The friend rejoices at hearing the voice of the bridegroom, (see Jer. vii. 34; xvi. 9; xxv. 10: Rev. xviii. 23,) in his triumph and joy, at the marriage. He rejoiceth with joy because he hears in the voice of the Bridegroom an assurance of the happy completion of his mission, and on account of the voice itself,— “so sweet, so lovely, so telling of salvation.”

The words standeth and belong merely to the graphic setting forth of the similitude.

this my joy therefore is fulfilled] ‘Because I have presented the bride to Him, and fulfilled, as is elsewhere said, the ministry entrusted to me.’ Euthymius.

30.] decrease, ‘as the morning-star at the rise of the sun.’ Euthymius. See note on Matt. xi. 2 ff.

31.] Many modern critics maintain that after ver. 30 we have the words, not of the Baptist, but of the Evangelist. Lücke and De Wette assume that the Evangelist has put his own thoughts into the Baptist's mouth, or at least mixed them with his words. The reason of this arbitrary hypothesis is, (a) That the sentiments of the following verses seem to them not to be congruous with the time and position of the Baptist. But some of them confess that this very position of the Baptist is to them yet unexplained, and are disposed to question the applicability to their idea of it of very much which is undoubtedly recorded to have been said by him. So that we cannot allow such a view much critical weight, unless it can be first clearly shewn, what were the Baptist's convictions concerning the Person and Office of our Lord, (b) That the diction and sentiments of the following verses are so entirely in the style of our Evangelist. But first, I by no means grant this, in the sense which is here meant. It will be seen by the reff. in my Greek Test. that the Evangelist does not so frequently repeat his own favourite expressions as in most other passages of equal length. And even were this so the remark made above on vv. 16–21, would apply here also; that the Evangelist's peculiar style of theological expression was formed on some model; and on what more likely than in the first place the discourses of his divine Master, and then such sententious and striking testimonies as the present? But there is a weightier reason than these for opposing the above view, and that arises from what modern criticism has been so much given to overlook,—the inner coherence of the discourse itself; in which John explains to his disciples the reason why HE must increase; whereas his own dignity was to be eclipsed before Him. This will!be seen below as we proceed.

And there is nothing inconsistent with what the Lord himself says of the Baptist in these verses. He (the Baptist) ever speaks not as a disciple of Jesus, not as within the Kingdom,—but as knowing the blessedness of those who should be within it; as standing by, and hearing the Bridegroom's voice.

Nor again is there any thing inconsistent with the frame of mind which prompted the question sent by John to our Lord afterwards in the onward waning of his days in prison; see note on Matt. xi. 2.

he that cometh from heaven] This gives us the reason why HE must increase: His power and His words are not from below, temporary, limited; but are divine and inexhaustible; and, ver.

32] His witness is not, like John's, only of what he has been forewarned to expect, but of that which He has seen and heard. But no man,—i. e. in reference to the world, into which He is come, the darkness in which His light shines,—no one comparatively,—receives His testimony. The state of men's minds at Jerusalem with regard to Jesus must ere this have been well known to the Baptist.

33, 34.] This exception shews the correctness of the sense just assigned to “no man.” “He that hath received His testimony, and believeth Him, hath confirmed, shewn, that God is true who sent Him, Whose are the words which He speaks; but he that hath not received it and disbelieveth Him, doeth the contrary, and in fact is an open withstander of God,” Euthymius.

true, not as Wetstein, that God has been true to His promises by the prophets: this does not suit the context; but as above from Euthym., true in Himself: a revealer, and fountain of truth.

for God giveth not the Spirit by measure] Seeing that the contrast is between the unlimited gift of the Spirit to Him that comes from above, and the limited participation of Him by those who are of the earth; we must not understand the assertion generally, but supply to Him as has usually been done. The Rabbinical books say that the Holy Spirit was only given to the prophets by measure. This unmeasured pouring of the Spirit on Him accounts for his speaking the words of God.

35.] This, again, is the ground why the Father gives not the Spirit by measure (to Him): see Matt. xi. 27–29, with which this verse forms a remarkable point of connexion, shewing that what is commonly known as John's form of expression was not confined to him, but originated higher, having its traces in the narrative of the other Gospels, which is confessedly, in its main features, independent of him.

36.] Compare ch. i. 12, 13; ver. 15. The word rendered “believeth not” may mean disobeyeth, and is so rendered Rom. ii. 8; x. 21: 1 Pet. ii. 7, and elsewhere. Unbelief implies disobedience.

abideth] It was on him, see ver. 18, in his state of darkness and nature,—and can only be removed by faith in the Son of God, which he has not.

John: Chapter 4

CHAP. IV. 1–54.] MANIFESTATION OF HIMSELF AS THE SON OF GOD IN SAMARIA AND GALILEE.

1–42.] On his way back to Galilee through Samaria, he discourses with a Samaritan woman. Confession of his Messiahship by the Samaritans.

1.] An inference may be drawn from this, that our Lord knew the anger of the Pharisees to be more directed against Him than against the Baptist,—probably on account of what had passed in Jerusalem.

that Jesus, not “that He”.... because the report which the Pharisees had heard is given verbatim.

2.] Probably for the same reason that Paul did not baptize usually (1 Cor. i. 14–16); viz. because His office was to preach and teach;—and the disciples as yet had no office of this kind. To assume a further reason, e.g. that there might not, be ground for those whom the Lord himself had baptized to boast of it, is arbitrary and unnecessary.

4] If He was already on the borders of Samaria, not far from Ænon (see note on ch. iii. 23), the direct way was through Samaria. Indeed without this assumption, we know from Josephus that the Galilæans ordinarily took this way. But there was probably design also in the journey. It could not have been mere speed,—since He made two days' stay on the way.

5.] Sychar is better known by the O.T. name of Shechem. It was a very old town on the range of Mt. Ephraim, in a narrow valley between Mt. Ebal and Mt. Gerizim, Judg. ix. 7. Some think that Sychar, which means “drunken,” was originally a contemptuous name applied by the Jews to Shechem,—which had supplanted the proper appellation.

Very near it was afterwards built Flavia Neapolis. There is a long and interesting history of Sychem, and the Samaritan worship on Gerizim, and the Christian church in the neighbourhood, in Robinson's Palestine, iii. 113–136. See also Dr. Thomson, The Land and the Book, p. 472 ff. He thinks that Sychar and Shechem are not the same, because at Shechem (Nablus) there are delicious fountains of water, which the woman would hardly have left to draw from a deep well two miles off.

the parcel of ground that Jacob gave to his son Joseph] This is traditional: finds however support from Gen. xxxiii. 19 where we find Jacob buying a field near Shechem, and Josh. xxiv. 32, where, on the mention of Joseph's bones being laid there, it is said that it became the inheritance of the children of Joseph. Our Lord does not allude to the tradition in the conversation, though the woman does.

6.] Robinson (iii, 112) can only solve the difficulty of the present well standing in a spot watered by so many natural fountains, by supposing that it may have been dug, according to the practice of the patriarchs, by Jacob, in connexion with the plot of ground which he bought, to have an independent supply of water.

thus refers to being wearied with his journey, and might be expressed by accordingly. There is no authority for the meaning 'just as he was,' or 'just as it happened,' i.e. on the bare stone.

the sixth hour, i.e. mid-day. Townson supposed the sixth hour, according to St. John, to mean six in the evening, 'after the way of reckoning in Asia Minor';—but, as Lücke observes, this way of reckoning in Asia Minor is a pure invention of Townson's. A decisive answer however to such a supposition here, or any where else in our Evangelist, is that if would naturally have specified whether it was 6 A.M. or P.M. The unusualness of a woman coming to draw water at mid-day is no argument against its possibility; indeed the very fact of her being alone seems to shew that it was not the common time.

8.] The disciples had probably taken with them the baggage, among which would be the vessel for drawing water,—see ver. 11.

The Rabbis say that a Jew might not eat the bread or drink the wine of a Samaritan: but that appears from this verse to be exaggerated.

9. being a Jew] She knew this perhaps by his dress, more probably by his dialect. 'There seems to be a sort of playful triumph in the woman's question, q.d. 'even a Jew, when weary and athirst, can humble himself to ask drink of a Samaritan woman.'

for Jews have no dealings with Samaritans are the words of the Evangelist to explain her question. The word rendered have no dealings is properly spoken of trade,—but hero is in a wider signification. The fact is abundantly illustrated in the Rabbinical writings. The question of the woman shews a lively, naïve disposition, which is further drawn out and exemplified by Him who knew what is in man, in the following dialogue.

10.] The important words the gift of God have been misunderstood by many Commentators. Some suppose them to mean 'our Lord Himself', and to be in apposition with the next clause, and who it is, &c. Others, 'this opportunity of speaking with Me' Doubtless both these meanings are involved,—especially the former: but neither of them is the primary one, as addressed to the woman. The WATER is, in this first part of the discourse, the subject, and serves as a point of connexion, whereby the woman's thoughts may be elevated, and her desire aroused. The process of the discourse in this particular is similar to that in Acts xiv. 17, From recognizing this water as the gift of God, in its limitation, ver. 13, and its parabolic import, ver. 14, her view is directed to Him who was speaking with her, and the Gift which He should bestow,—THE GIFT OF THE HOLY SPIRIT: see ch. vii. 37–39.

who it is] These pregnant words form the second step in our Lord's declaration. He who speaks with thee is no ordinary Jew, nor any ordinary man, but One who can give thee the gift of God; One sent from God, and God Himself. All this lies in the words, which however only serve to arouse in the woman's mind the question of ver. 12 (see below).

living water] Designedly used in a double sense by our Lord, that the woman may lay hold of the material meaning, and by it be awakened to the higher one (see reff.). The words bring with them, and in our Lord's inner meaning involved, the performance of all such prophetic promises as Ezek. xxxvi. 25; Zech. xiii. 1 (see also Jer. ii, 13); but, as regarded the woman, the ordinary sense was that intended for her to fasten on, which she does accordingly. On the question, how this living water could be now given, before Jesus was glorified, see on ch. vii. 38, 39.

11, 12.] Though "Sir" (the same word as that commonly rendered "Lord") is not to be pressed as emphatic, it is not without import; it surely betokens a different regard of the stranger than the words "thou being a Jew" did:—* "She calls him 'Sir,' thinking Him to be some great man." Euthymius. The course of her thoughts appears to be: "Thou canst not mean living water ('bubbling up and leaping,' Euthymius), from this well, because thou hast no vessel to draw with, and it is deep; whence then hast thou (knowest thou of, drawest thou) the living water of which thou speakest? Our father Jacob was contented with this, used it, and bequeathed it to us: if thou hast better water, and canst give it, thou must be greater than Jacob." There is something also of Samaritan nationality speaking here. Claiming Jacob as her father (Josephus says of the Samaritans, 'When they see the Jews prospering, they call them their relatives, as being themselves sprung from Joseph; but when they see them in trouble, they profess to have no connexion with them'), she expresses by this question an appropriation of descent from him, such as almost to exclude, or at all events set at a greater distance, the Jews, to one of whom she believed herself to be speaking.

13, 14.] Our Lord, without noticing this, by His answer leaves it to be implied, that, assuming what she has stated, He is greater than Jacob: for his (Jacob's) gift was of water which cannot satisfy; but the water which He should give has living power, and becomes an eternal fountain within. This however, 'that He was greater than Jacob,' lies only in the background: the water is the subject, as before.

The words apply to every similar quenching of desire by earthly means: the desire springs up again;—is not satisfied, but only postponed. The manna was as insufficient to satisfy hunger,—as this water, thirst, see ch. vi. 49, 58: it is only the living water, and the bread of life, which can satisfy.

In the original, the words Every one that drinketh set forth the recurrence, the interrupted seasons, of the drinking of earthly water;—but whosoever shall have drunk sets forth the once having tasted, and ever continuing in the increasing power, and living forth-flowing, of that life-long draught.

shall thirst no more for ever, shall never have to go away and be exhausted, and come again to be filled;—but shall have the spring at home, in his own breast,—so that he can “draw water with joy out of the wells of salvation” (Isa. xii. 3) at his pleasure. “When thirst does recur, it is the defect of the man, not of the water.” Bengel.

shall become a well] All earthly supplies have access only into those lower parts of our being where the desires work themselves out—are but local applications; but the heavenly gift of spiritual life which Jesus gives to those who believe on Him, enters into the very secret and highest place of their personal life, the source whence the desires spring out:—and, its nature being living and spiritual, it does not merely supply, but it lives and waxes onward, unto everlasting life, in duration, and also as producing and sustaining it.

It should not be overlooked, that this discourse had, besides its manifold and wonderful meaning for us all, an especial moral one as applied to the woman,—who, by successive draughts at the ‘broken cistern’ of carnal lust, had been vainly seeking solace:—and this consideration serves to bind on the following verses (ver. 16 ff.) to the preceding, by another link besides those noticed below.

15.] This request seems to be made still under a misunderstanding, but not so great an one as at first sight appears. She apprehends this water as something not requiring a water-pot to draw as something whose power shall never fail;—which shall quench thirst for ever;—and half in banter, half in earnest, wishing perhaps besides to see whether the gift would after all be conferred, and how,—she mingles in with “this water,”—implying some view of its distinct nature,—her ‘not coming hither to draw,’—her willing avoidance of the toil of her noonday journey to the well. We must be able to enter into the complication of her character, and the impressions made on her by the strange things which she has heard, fully to appreciate the spirit of this answer.

16.] The connexion of this verse with the foregoing has been much disputed; and the strangest, and most unworthy views have been taken of it. Some (e. g. Grotius) have strangely referred it to the supposed indecorum of the longer continuance of the colloquy with the woman alone; some more strangely still (Cyril of Alexandria) to the incapacity of the female mind to apprehend the matters of which He was to speak. Both these need surely no refutation. The band of women from Galilee, ‘last at the cross, and earliest at the tomb,’ are a sufficient answer to them.

Those approach nearer the truth, who believe the command to have been given to awaken her conscience; or to shew her the divine knowledge which the Lord had of her heart. But I am persuaded that the right account is found, in viewing this command, as the first step of granting her request, “give me this water.” The first work of the Spirit of God, and of Him who here spoke in the fulness of that Spirit, is, to convince of sin. The ‘give me this water’ was not so simple a matter as she supposed. The heart must first be laid bare before the wisdom of God: the secret sins set in the light of His countenance; and this our Lord here does. The command itself is of course given in the fulness of knowledge of her sinful condition of life. In every conversation which our Lord held with men, while He connects usually one remark with another by the common links which bind human thought, we perceive that He knows, and sees through, those with whom He speaks.

17.] This answer is not for a moment to be treated as something unexpected by Him who commanded her. He has before Him her whole life of sin, which she in vain endeavours to cover by the doubtful words of this verse.

18.] There was literal truth, but no more, in the woman’s answer: and the Lord, by His divine knowledge, detects the hidden falsehood of it. Notice it is true (a fact—bare truth), not truly: this one word was true: further shewn by the emphatic position of the word husband in our Lord’s answer,—which was not so placed in hers.

thou hast had five husbands] These five were certainly lawful husbands; they are distinguished from the sixth, who was not;

—probably the woman had been separated from some by divorce (the law of which was but loose among the Samaritans),—from some by death,—or perhaps by other reasons more or less discreditable to her character, which had now become degraded into that of an openly licentious woman, The conviction of sin here lies beneath the surface: it is not pressed, nor at the moment does it seem to have worked deeply, for she goes on with the conversation with apparent indifference to it; but our Lord's words in vv. 25, 26 would tend to infix it more deeply, and we find at ver. 29, that it had been working during her journey back to the city.

19.] In speaking this her conviction, she virtually confesses all the truth. That she should pass to another subject immediately, seems, as Stier remarks, to arise, not from a wish to turn the conversation from a matter so unpleasing to her, but from a real desire to obtain from this Prophet the teaching requisite that she may pray to God acceptably. The idea of her endeavouring to escape from the Lord's rebuke, is quite inconsistent with her recognition of Him as a prophet. Rather we may suppose a pause, which makes it evident that He does not mean to proceed further with His laying open of her character.

20.] in this mountain—Mount Gerizim, on which once stood the national temple of the Samaritan race, In Neh. xiii. 28, we read that the grandson of the high priest Eliashib was banished by Nehemiah because he was son-in-law to Sanballat, the Persian satrap of Samaria. Him Sanballat not only received, but made him high priest of a temple which he built on Mount Gerizim. Josephus makes this appointment sanctioned by Alexander, when at Tyre;—but the chronology is certainly not accurate, for between Sanballat and Alexander is a difference of nearly a century. This temple was destroyed 200 years after by John Hyrcanus (B. c. 129); but the Samaritans still used it as a place of prayer and sacrifice, and to this day the few Samaritans resident in Nablus (Sychem) call it the holy mountain, and turn their faces to it in prayer.

They defended their practice by Deut. xxvii. 4, where our reading and the Heb. and LXX is Ebal, but that of the Samaritan Pentateuch, Gerizim (probably an alteration): also by Gen. xii. 6, 7; xiii, 4; xxxiii. 18, 20; Deut. xi. 26 ff.

Our fathers most likely means not the patriarchs, but the ancestors of the then Samaritans.

the place where men ought to worship] The definite place spoken of in Deut. xii. 5.

She pauses, having suggested, rather than asked, a question,—seeming to imply, ‘Before I can receive this gift of God, it must be decided, where I can acceptably pray for it,’ and she leaves it for Him whom she now recognizes as a prophet, to resolve this doubt.

21.] Our Lord first raises her view to a higher point than her question implied, or than indeed she, or any one, without His prophetic announcement, could then have attained.

The concluding words mean, Ye shall worship the Father but not (only) in this mountain, nor in Jerusalem.... The prophetic ye shall worship, though embracing in its wider sense all mankind, may be taken primarily as foretelling the success of the Gospel in Samaria, Acts viii. 1–26.

the Father, as implying the One God and Father of all. There is also, as Calvin remarks, a “tacit opposition” between the Father,—and our father Jacob, ver. 12, our fathers, ver. 20.

22.] But He will not leave the temple of Zion and the worship appointed by God without His testimony. He decides her question not merely by affirming, but by proving the Jewish worship to be the right one. In the Samaritan worship there was no leading of God to guide them, there were no prophetic voices revealing more and more of His purposes. The neuter, that which, is used to shew the want of personality and distinctness in their idea of God:—the second that which, merely as corresponding to it in the other member of the sentence. Or perhaps better, both, as designating merely the abstract object of worship, not the personal God. The word we is remarkable, as being the only instance of our Lord thus speaking. But the nature of the case accounts for it. He never elsewhere is speaking to one so set in opposition to the Jews on a point where Himself and the Jews stood together for God's truth. He now speaks as a Jew. The nearest approach to it is in His answer to the Canaanitish woman, Matt. xv. 24, 26.

because: this is the reason why we know what we worship, because the promises of God are made to us, and we possess them and believe them; see Rom. iii. 1, 2.

salvation (or, literally, the salvation [of men]) cometh of the Jews] It was in this point especially, expectation of the promised salvation by the great Deliverer (see Gen. xl ix. 18), that the Samaritan rejection of the prophetic word had made them so deficient in comparison of the Jews. But not only this;—the Messiah Himself was to spring from among the Jews, and had sprung from among them;—not “shall come,” but cometh, the abstract present, but perhaps with a reference to what was then happening. See Isa. ii. 1–3.

23.] The discourse returns to the ground taken in ver. 21, but not so as to make ver. 22 parenthetical only: the spiritual worship now to be spoken of is the carrying out and consequence of the salvation just mentioned, and could not have been brought in without it.

and now is] “This which was not added in ver. 21, is now added, that the woman might not think that the locality of this true worship was to be sought in Judæa alone,” Bengel.

the true worshippers, as distinguished (1) from hypocrites, who have pretended to worship Him: (2) from all who went before, whose worship was necessarily imperfect.

The words in spirit and in truth (not without an allusion to “in this mountain”) are, in their first meaning, opposed to in mere habit and falsehood,—and denote the earnestness of spirit with which the true worshippers shall worship; so Ps. exlv. 18, “The Lord is nigh.... unto all that call upon him in truth.” A deeper meaning is brought out where the ground of this kind of worship is stated, in the next verse.

Such worshippers God not only ‘requires,’ from His very nature, but seeks,—is seeking. This seeking on the part of the Father naturally brings in the idea, in the woman’s answer, of the Messiah, by Whom He seeks (Luke xix. 10) His true worshippers, to gather them out of the world.

24.] God is a Spirit, was the great Truth of Judaism, whereby the Jews were distinguished from the idolatrous people around them. And the Samaritans held even more strongly than the Jews the pure monotheistic view. Traces of this, remarks Lücke, are found in the alterations made by them in their Pentateuch, long before the time of this history. This may perhaps be partly the reason why our Lord, as Bengel remarks, ‘never delivered, even to His disciples, things more sublime,’ than to this Samaritan woman.

God being pure spirit (perhaps better not ‘a Spirit,’ since it is His Essence, not His Personality, which is here spoken of), cannot dwell in particular spots or temples (see Acts vii. 48; xvii. 24, 25); cannot require, nor be pleased with, earthly material offerings nor ceremonies, as such: on the other hand, is only to be approached in that part of our being, which is spirit,—and even there, inasmuch as He is pure and holy, with no by-ends nor hypocritical regards, but in truth and earnestness. But here comes in the deeper sense alluded to above. How is the Spirit of man to be brought into communion with God? “Thou seekest to pray in a temple: pray in thyself. But first be the temple of God,” Augustine. And how is this to be? Man cannot make himself the temple of God. So that here comes in the gift of God, with which the discourse began,—the gift of the Holy Spirit, which Christ should give to them that believe on Him: thus we have ‘praying in the Holy Spirit,’ Jude 20. So beautifully does the expression the Father here bring with it the new birth by the Spirit,—and for us, the readers of the Gospel, does the discourse of ch. iii. reflect light on this. And so wonderfully do these words form the conclusion to the great subject of these first chapters: GOD IS BECOME ONE FLESH WITH US, THAT WE MIGHT BECOME ONE SPIRIT WITH HIM.’ 25.] These words again seem uttered under a complicated feeling. From her “story,” ver. 29, she certainly had some suspicion (in her own mind, perhaps over and beyond His own assertion of the fact: but see note there) that He who had told her all things, &c., was the Christ; and from her breaking in with this remark after the weighty truth which had been just spoken, it seems as if she thought thus, ‘How these matters may be, I cannot understand;—they will be all made clear when the Christ shall come’ The question of ver. 20 had not been answered to her liking or expectation: she therefore puts aside, as it were, what has been said, by a remark on that suspicion which was arising in her mind.

It is not certain what expectations the Samaritans had regarding the Messiah. The view here advanced might be well derived from Deut. xviii. 15;—and the name, and much that belonged to it, might have been borrowed from the Jews originally.

which is called Christ appear to me to be the words of the woman, not of the Evangelist; for in this latter case he would certainly have used Messias again in ver. 29. See also the difference of expression where he inserts an interpretation, ch. i. 42: xix. 13, 17. It is possible that the name “Christ” had become common in popular parlance, like many other Greek words and names.

The verb rendered will tell us is used especially of enouncing or propounding by divine or superior authority.

26.] Of the reasons which our Lord had, thus to declare Himself to this Samaritan woman and through her to the inhabitants of Sychem (ver. 42), as the Christ, thus early in his ministry, we surely are not qualified to judge. There is nothing so opposed to true Scripture criticism, as to form a preconceived plan and rationale of the course of our Lord in the flesh, and then to force recorded events into agreement with it. Such a plan will be formed in our own minds from continued study of the Scripture narrative:—but by the arbitrary system which I am here condemning, the ver facts which are the chief data of such a scheme, are themselves set aside. When De Wette says, ‘This early and decided declaration of Jesus is in contradiction with Matt. viii, 4, and xvi. 20,’—he forgets the very different circumstances under which both those injunctions were spoken:—while he is forced to confess that it is in agreement with the whole spirit of the Sermon on the Mount. He who knew what was in man, varied His revelations and injunctions, as the time and place, and individual dispositions required.

I] In saying I that speak unto thee, He intends a reference to her words, “will tell us all things,”—I am He, who am now speaking to thee—fulfilling part of this telling all things; see also her confession ver. 29.

27.] The ground of their wonder, as given in the original, was the circumstance, that our Lord was talking with a woman. None of them said either—to the woman—What seekest thou? or to the Lord, Why disputest thou, or Why talkest thou with her?—or perhaps both questions to Him. Why talkest thou with her?—I rather prefer the former interpretation.

28–30.] She does not mention to the men His own announcement of Himself,—but as is most: natural under such circumstances, rests the matter on the testimony likely to weigh most with them,—her own. We often, and that unconsciously, put before another not our strongest, but what is likely to be his strongest reason. At the same time she shews how the suspicion expressed in ver. 25 arose in her own mind.

30.] came,—more properly, were coming,—had not arrived, when what follows happened.

31, 32.] The bodily thirst (and hunger probably, from the time of day) which our Lord had felt before, had been and was forgotten in the carrying on of His divine work in the soul of this Samaritan woman. Although I and you are emphatic, the words are not spoken in blame, for none was deserved: but in fulness and earnestness of spirit; in a feeling analogous to that which comes upon us when called from high and holy employment to the supply of the body or to the business of this world.

33.] It is very characteristic of the first part of this Gospel to bring forward instances of unreceptivity of spiritual meaning; compare ver. 11; ch. ii. 20; iii. 4; vi. 42, 52. The disciples probably have the woman in their thoughts.

34.] Christ alone could properly say these words. In the believer on Him, they are partially true,—true as far as he has received the Spirit, and entered into the spiritual life;—but in Him they were absolutely and fully true. His whole life was the doing of the Father’s will. We can ‘eat and drink, &c. to the glory of God,—but in Him the hallowing of the Father’s name, doing His will, bringing about His Kingdom, was His daily bread, and superseded the thoughts and desires for the other, needful as it was for His humanity.

My meat is to be (better, that I may be) doing, &c.] That is, it was our Lord’s continued sustenance, to be ever carrying onward to completion that performance of His Father’s will for which He came into the world. In the words finish his work, the way is prepared for the idea introduced in the next verse. These words give an answer to the questioning in the minds of the disciples, and shew that He had been employed in the Father’s work during their absence.

35.] The sense of these much-controverted words will be best ascertained by narrowly observing the form of the sentence.

Say not ye.... surely cannot be the introduction to an observation of what was matter of fact at the time. Had the words been spoken at a time when it wanted four months to the harvest, and had our Lord intended to express this,—is it conceivable that He should have thus introduced the remark? Would not, must not, the question have been a direct one in that case—‘are there not four months?’ &c. I know not how to account for this Say not ye that.... except that it introduces some common saying which the Jews, or perhaps the people of Galilee only, were in the habit of using. Are not ye accustomed to say, that....? That we hear of no such proverb elsewhere, is not to the point;—for such unrecorded sayings are among every people. That we do not know whence to date the four months, is again no objection:—there may have been, in the part where the saying was usual (possibly in the land west of the lake of Tiberias, for those addressed were from thence, and the emphatic ‘ye’ seems to point to some particular locality), some fixed period in the year,—the end of the sowing, or some religious anniversary,—when it was a common saying, that it wanted four months to harvest. And this might have been the first date in the year which had regard to the harvest, and so the best known in connexion with it.

If this be so, all that has been built on this saying, as giving a chronological date, must fall to the ground. (Lightfoot, Wieseler, and others, maintain, that since the harvest began on the 16th of Nisan, we must reckon four months back from that time for this journey through Samaria, which would bring it to the middle of Chisleu, i.e. the beginning of December.)

To get the meaning of the latter part of the verse, we must endeavour to follow, as far as may be, the train of thought which pervades the discourse. He that soweth the good seed is the Son of Man: our Lord had now been employed in this His work. But not as in the natural year, so was it to be in the world’s lifetime. One-third of the year may elapse, or more, before the sown seed springs up; but the sowing by the Son of Man comes late in time, and the harvest should immediately follow. The fields were whitening for it; these Samaritans (not that I believe He pointed to them approaching, as Chrysostom and most expositors, but had them in his view in what He said), and the multitudes in Galilee, were all nearly ready. In the discourse as far as ver. 38, He is the sower, the disciples (see Acts viii.) were the reapers:—He was the one who had laboured, they were the persons who had entered into his labours. The past is used, as descriptive of the office which each held, not of the actual thing done. I cannot also but see an allusion to the words spoken by Joshua (xxiv. 18), on this very spot;—«I have given you a land for which ye did not labour.'

Taking this view, I do not believe there was any allusion to the actual state of the fields at that time. The words Lift up your eyes, &c., are of course to be understood literally;—they were to lift up their eyes and look on the lands around them;—and then came the assurance; ‘they are whitening already towards the harvest.’ And it seems to me that on this view—of the Lord speaking of spiritual things to them, and announcing to them the approach of the spiritual harvest,—and none else,—the right understanding of the following verses depends.

It is of course possible that it may have been seed-time;—possible also, that the fields may have been actually whitening So the harvest;—but to lay down either of these as certain, and build chronological inferences on it, is quite unwarranted.

36.] The wages of the reaper is in the “joy” here implied, in having gathered many into eternal life, just as the meat of the sower was His joy already begun in His heavenly work. See Matt. xx. 1–16 and notes.

38.] Here, as often, our Lords speaks of the office and its work as accomplished, which is but beginning (see Isa. xlvi. 10).

By other men here our Lord cannot mean the O.T. prophets as some say, for then His own place would be altogether left out;—and besides, all Scripture analogy is against the idea of the O.T. being the seed of which the N.T. is the fruit;—nor can it be right, as Olshausen maintains, to leave Him out, as being the Lord of the Harvest:—for He is certainly elsewhere, and was by the very nature of the case here, the Sower. The plural is I believe merely inserted as the correspondent word to ye in the explanation, as it was one soweth and another reapeth in the proverb.

39–42.] The truth of the saying of ver. 35 begins to be manifested. These Samaritans were the foundation of the church afterwards built up there. It does not seem that any miracle was wrought there: the feeling expressed in the words “we have heard Him ourselves” was enough to raise their faith to a point never attained by the Jews, and hardly as yet by the disciples, —that He was the Saviour of the world. Their view seems to have been less clouded by prejudice and narrow-mindedness than that of the Jews; and though the conversion of this people lay not in the plan of the official life of our Lord, or working of His Apostles during it (see Matt. x. 5),—yet we have abundant proof from this history, of His gracious purposes towards them. A trace of this occurrence may be found ch. viii, 48, where see note. Compare throughout Acts viii. 1–25. The word rendered story (literally, “this talking”) is one in which it is hardly possible not to see something of allusion to the woman’s eager and diffuse report to them.

43–54.] The second miracle of Jesus in Galilee. The healing of the Ruler’s son.

43.] after the two days, viz. those mentioned above.

We find no mention of the disciples again, till ch. vi. 3.

And thus the “therefore” in the next verse will be a word connecting it with this preliminary reason given.

The reason (ver. 1) why Jesus left Judæa for Galilee was, because of the publicity which was gathering round Himself and his ministry. He betakes himself to Galilee therefore, to avoid fame, testifying that His own country (Galilee) was that where, as a prophet, He was least likely to be honoured. See on the difficulties which have been found in the connexion of this verse, in my Greek Testament. The above explanation seems to me completely satisfactory.

45.] They received Him, but in accordance with the proverbial saying just recorded;—not for any honour in which they themselves held Him, or value which they had for His teaching; but on account of His fame in Jerusalem, the metropolis,—which set them the fashion in their estimate of men and things.

for they also went unto the feast is inserted for those readers who might not be aware of the practice of the Galileans to frequent the feasts at Jerusalem.

46. a certain nobleman] literally, “a royal person.” “Either,” say Euthymius and Chrysostom, “one of the royal race, or one in possession of some dignity from which he was called ‘royal’;” or, Euthymius adds, “because he was a servant of the King.” Origen thinks he may have been one of the household of Cæsar, having some business in Judæa at that time. But the usage of Josephus is perhaps our surest guide. He uses this word “royal,” to distinguish the soldiers, or courtiers, or officers of the kings (Herods or others), from those of Rome,—but never to designate the royal family. So that this man was probably an officer of Herod Antipas. He may have been Chuza, Herod’s steward, Luke viii. 3: but this is pure conjecture. The man seems to have been a Jew: see below.

47, 48.] This miracle is a notable instance of our Lord ‘not quenching the smoking flax.’ just as His reproof of the Samaritan woman was of His ‘not breaking the bruised reed.’ The little spark of faith in the breast of this nobleman is by Him lit up into a clear and enduring flame for the light and comfort of himself and his house.

come down: see on ch. ii. 12.

The charge brought against them, Except ye see signs and wonders, &c., does not imply, as some think, that they would not believe signs and wonders heard of, but required to see them—for in this case the expression would certainly have been fuller, “see with your eyes,” or something similar;—and it would not accord with our Lord’s known low estimate of all mere miracle-faith, to find Him making so weighty a difference between faith from miracles seen and faith from miracles heard. The words imply the contrast between the Samaritans, who believed because of His word, and the Jews (the plural reckoning the nobleman among them), who would not believe but through signs and prodigies:—see 1 Cor. i. 22. And observe also that it is not implied that even when they had seen signs and wonders, they would believe:—they required these as a condition of their faith, but even these were rejected by them: see ch. xii. 37.

But even with such inadequate conceptions and conditions of faith, our Lord receives the nobleman, and works the sign rather than dismiss him. It was otherwise in Matt. xvi. 1 ff.

49.] Here is the same weakness of faith as there,—but our Lord’s last words have made visible impression. It is like the Syrophenician woman’s rejoinder,—‘Yea, Lord; but...,’ only the faith is of a far less noble kind than hers. He seems to believe it necessary that Jesus should be on the spot;—not that there was any thing strange or blameable in this, for Martha and Mary did the same, ch. xi. 21, 32:—and to think that it would be too late when his child had expired;—not, imagining that He to whom he spoke could raise the dead.

50.] The bringing out and strengthening of the man’s faith by these words was almost as great a spiritual miracle, as the material one which they indicated.

We may observe the difference between our Lord’s dealing here and in the case of the centurion (Matt. viii. 6 ff. and parallel places). There, when from humility the man requests Him to speak the word only, He offers to go to his house: here, when pressed to go down, He speaks the word only. Thus (as Trench observes, after Chrysostom) the weak faith of the nobleman is strengthened, while the humility of the centurion is honoured.

51.] He appears (see below) to have gone leisurely away—for the hour (1 P.M.) was early enough to reach Capernaum the same evening (twenty-five miles)—in confidence that an amendment was taking place, which he at present understood to be only a gradual one.

52, 53. the fever left him] This was probably more than he expected to hear; and the coincidence of so sudden a recovery with the time at which Jesus had spoken the words to him raises his faith at length into a full belief of the Power and Goodness and the Messiahship of Him, who had by a word commanded the disease, and it had obeyed. The word believed, absolutely, implies that in the fullest sense he and all his became disciples of Jesus. It is very different from “believed the word that Jesus spake” in ver. 50—as believing on HIM must be always different from believing on any thing else in the world, be it even His own word or His own ordinances. The cure took place in the afternoon: the nobleman probably set out, as indeed the narrative implies, immediately on hearing our Lord’s assurance, and spent the night on the way.

54.] The meaning of the Evangelist clearly is, that this was the second Galilean miracle (see ch. iii. 2, and ver. 45). But (1) how is that expressed in the words? The miracles which He did at Jerusalem in the feast being omitted, the words naturally carry the thoughts back to a former one related; and the clause added (“when He was come out of Judaea into Galilee”) shews, not that a miracle prior to this, during this return visit, has been passed over,—but that as the scene of this second was in Galilee, so that former one, to which “second” refers, must be sought in Galilee also. And then (2) why should this so particularly be stated? Certainly, it seems to me, on account of the part which this miracle bore in the calling out and assuring of faith by the manifestation of His glory, as that first one had done before. By that (ch. ii. 11), His disciples had been convinced: by this, one (himself a type of the weak and unworthy in faith) outside the circle of His own. By both, half-belief was strengthened into faith in Him: but in each case it is of a different kind.

It is an interesting question, whether or not this miracle be the same as the healing of the centurion’s servant (or son, Matthew?) in Matt. viii. 5: Luke vii. 1. Ireneus appears to hold the two narratives to be the same history (appears only; for his words are, “He healed the centurion’s servant when absent, saying, ‘Go thy way, thy son liveth:’” which remark may be simply explained by his having cited from memory, and thus either made this nobleman a centurion,—or, which is more probable, having understood the word in Matt. viii. to signify a son, and made our Lord there speak very similar words to those really uttered by Him, but which are in reality found here): so Eusebius also in his canons. Chrysostom notices, but opposes the view:—and it has never in modern times gained many advocates, being chiefly held by the interpreters of the Straussian school. Indeed, the internal evidence is all against it: not only (Chrys) “in station, but also in the nature. of his faith,” does the man in one case differ from the man in the other. The inner kernel of the history is, in our case here,—the elevation of a weak and mere wonder-seeking faith into a deep conviction of the personal power and love of our Lord; in the other, the commendation of a noble confession of our Lord’s divine power, indicating great strength and grasp of faith, and inducing the greatest personal humility. And the external point brought out in the commendation there, “I have not seen such faith, no, not in Israel,” is not only different from, but stands in absolute contrast with, the depreciating charge here, “Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will not believe.”

Olshausen well remarks, that this narrative may be regarded as a sequel to the foregoing one.

John: Chapter 5

CHAP. V.—XII.] Second great division of the Gospel. JESUS IN CONFLICT WITH THE JEWS. V., VI. JESUS THE LIFE. Beginning of the conflict.

V. 1–47.] Healing of a cripple at the pool of Bethesda, during a feast; and the discourse of Jesus occasioned by the persecution of the Jews arising thereupon.

1. After these things] Lücke remarks that when John wishes to indicate immediate succession, he uses “after this” (or “that”), ch. ii. 12; xi. 7, 11; xix. 28; when mediate, after an interval, “after these things,” ch. iii. 22; v. 14; vi. 1; vii. 1; xix. 38. So that apart from other considerations which would lead us to the same conclusion, we may infer that some interval has elapsed since the last verse of ch. iv.

a feast of the Jews] Few points have been more controverted, than the question, what this feast was. I will give the principal views, and then state my own conclusion. (1) Irenæus understands it to be the second Passover of our Lord’s ministry. Origen (whose commentary on this chapter is lost) mentions this view, but apparently does not approve it. This is the view of Luther, Grotius, Lightfoot, and others. (2) Cyril of Alexandria, Chrysostom, and others think it to be the Pentecost. This opinion prevailed in the Greek Church; and has found many defenders in modern times. (3) Kepler first suggested the idea that it might be the feast of Purim, (Esth. ix. 21, 26,) almost immediately preceding the Passover (the 14th and 15th of Adar). This has been the general view of the modern chronologists. (4) The feast of Tabernacles has been suggested by Cocceius, and is supported by one of our MSS., but of late date. (5) Kepler and Petavius thought it also possible that the feast of Dedication (see ch. x. 22) might be meant.

So that almost every Jewish feast finds some supporters. I believe, with Lücke, De Wette, and Tholuck, that we cannot with any probability gather what feast it was. Seeing as I do no distinct datum given in ch. iv. 35, nor again in ch. vi. 1, and finding nothing in this chapter to determine the nature of this feast, I cannot attach any weight to most of the elaborate chronological arguments which have been raised on the subject. It can hardly have been a Passover, both because it is called a feast, not the feast, as in ch. vi. 4, and because if so, we should have an interval of a whole year between this chapter and the next, which is not probable. Nor can it have been the Dedication, in the winter; for then the multitude of sick would have hardly been waiting in the porches of Bethesda. The feast of Purim would nearest agree with the subsequent events; and it seems as if our Lord did not go up to Jerusalem at the Passover next following (ch. vi. 4; vii. 1), so that no difficulty would be created by the proximity of the two feasts, unless, with De Wette, we believe that the interval was too little for what is related ch. vi. 1–3 to have happened. But it may be doubted, (1) whether it was a general practice to go up to Jerusalem at the Purim: (2) whether our Lord would be likely to observe it, even if it was.

No reason need be given why St. John does not name the feast; it is quite in accordance with his practice of mentioning nothing that does not concern his subject-matter. Thus the Passover is mentioned ch. ii. 13, because of the buying and selling in the temple; again, ch. vi. 4, to account for the great multitude, and as eminently suiting (see notes) the subject of His discourse there; the feast of Tabernacles, ch. vii. 2, because of the practice alluded to by our Lord in ver. 37; that of the Dedication, ch. x. 22, to account for His being in Solomon’s porch, because it was winter; but in this chapter, where there is nothing alluding to the time or nature of the feast, it is not specified.

Jesus] and probably His disciples: for the same expression is used ch. ii. 13, whereas we find, ch. iii. 22, that His disciples were with Him; compare also ch. vii. 10 and ch. ix. 2.

2.] The expression there is has been thought to import that St. John wrote his Gospel before the destruction of Jerusalem. But this must not be pressed. He might have spoken in the present without meaning to be literally accurate with regard to the moment when he was writing.

The locality given means, probably, near the sheep-gate,—mentioned by Nehemiah, see reff. The situation of this gate is unknown;—it is traditionally supposed to be the same with that now called St. Stephen's gate; but inaccurately, for no wall existed in that quarter till the time of Agrippa. Eusebius, Jerome, and the Jerusalem Itinerary speak of a sheep-pool, as indeed the Vai. gate renders here.

Bethesda,—in Syriac, the house (place) of mercy, or of grace. Its present situation is very uncertain. Robinson established by personal inspection the fact of the subterranean connexion of the pool of Siloam (see ch. ix. 7 note) and that called the Fountain of the Virgin; and has made it probable that the Fountain under the grand Mosk is also connected with them; in fact that all these are but one and the same spring. Now this spring, as he himself witnessed, is an intermittent one, as indeed had been reported before by Jerome, Prudentius, William of Tyre, and others. There might have been then, it is obvious, some artificially constructed basin in connexion with this spring, the site and memory of which have perished, which would present the phenomenon here described.

I have received an interesting communication from a traveller who believes that he has identified Bethesda in the present pool of Siloam. It appears from his account: that there are still visible four bases of pillars in the middle of the water, and four corresponding ones in the wall, shewing that at one time the pool has been arched over by five equal porches. This pool is, as above noticed, intermittent, and is even now believed to possess a certain medicinal power. See the account of my informant. at length at the end of vol. i., edn. 5, of my Greek Testament.

The spot now traditionally known as Bethesda is a part of the fosse round the fort or tower Antonia, an immense reservoir or trench, seventy-five feet deep. But, as Robinson observes, there is not the slightest evidence that can identify it with the Bethesda of the N.T.

This pool is not mentioned by Josephus.

having five porches] Probably these were for the shelter of the sick persons, and were arches or porticos, opening upon and surrounding the reservoir: see above.

3. withered] Those who were afflicted with the loss of vital power in any of their limbs by stiffness or paralysis. Of this kind was the man on whom the miracle was wrought.

“waiting for the moving of the water,” and the whole of ver. 4.] The spuriousness of this controverted passage can hardly be questioned. See the critical considerations dwelt on in my Greek Test, I may mention that the Vatican, Paris, Cambridge, and Sinaitic MSS. omit it: while at the same time the Alexandrine MS. contains it, but with the important variation of “an angel washed in” instead of “went down into.”

5.] Observe, he had been lame thirty-eight years, not at Bethesda all that time.

6.] knew, namely, within Himself, as on other similar occasions. Our Lord singled him out, being conscious of the circumstances under which he lay there, by that superhuman knowledge of which we had so striking an example in the case of the woman of Samaria.

Wilt thou be made whole?] Some would supply, “notwithstanding that it is the sabbath.” But this is very improbable, see ver. 17. Our Lord did not thus appeal to his hearers’ prejudices, and make His grace dependent on them. Besides, the “being made whole” had in the mind of the man no reference to a healing such as there would be any objection to on the Sabbath; but to the cure by means of the water, which he was there to seek.

The question is one of those by which He so frequently testified his compassion, and established (so to speak) a point of connexion between the spirit of the person addressed, and His own gracious purposes. Possibly it may have conveyed to the mind of the poor cripple the idea that at length a compassionate person had come, who might put him in at the next troubling of the water. It certainly is possible that the man’s long and apparently hopeless infirmity may have given him a look of lethargy and despondency, and the question may have arisen from this: but there is no ground for supposing blame conveyed by it, still less that he was an impostor labouring under some trifling complaint, and wishing to represent it more important than it was.

7.] The man’s answer implies the popular belief that whoever stepped in immediately after the bubbling up of the water was made whole: no more than this. Bauer asks why the person who brought him there every day, could not have put him in? But no such person is implied. The same slow motion which he describes here, would suffice for his daily coming and going.

8.] The command, Take up thy bed, has been treated as making a difference between the man lame from his birth in Acts iii. 8, who walked and leaped and praised God; and this man, who, since sin had been the cause of his disease (ver. 14), is ordered to carry his bed, ‘a present memento of his past sin.’ Possibly; but our Lord must have had in his view what was to follow, and have ordered it also to bring about this his first open controversy with the Jews.

10.] The Jews, never the multitude, but always those in authority of some kind, whom John ever puts forward as the representatives of the whole people in their rejection of the Lord.

it is not lawful] The bearing of burdens on the Sabbath was forbidden not only by the glosses of the Pharisees, but by the law itself. See Neh. xiii. 15–19; Exod. xxxi. 13–17; Jer. xvii. 21, 22. And our Lord does not, as in another case (Luke xiii. 15, 16), appeal here to the reasonableness of the deed being done on the Sabbath, saving the sanctity of the Sabbath, but takes altogether loftier ground, as being One greater than the Sabbath. The whole kernel of this incident and discourse is not, that it is lawful to do works of mercy on the Sabbath: but that the Son of God (here) is Lord of the Sabbath.

11.] The man's excuse is simple and sufficient; and for us, important, inasmuch as it goes into the depth of the matter, and is by the Jews themselves accepted. He who had power to make him whole, had power to suspend that law which was, like the healing, God's work. The authority which had overruled one appointment of Providence, could overrule another. I do not mean that this reasoning was present to the man's mind;—he very likely spoke only from intense feeling of obligation to One who had done so much for him;—but it lay beneath the words, and the Jews recognized it, by transferring their blame, from the man, to Him who healed him.

12.] Not, ‘who is he that healed thee?’ but they carefully bring out the unfavourable side of what had taken place, as malicious persons always do.

13.] Difficulty has been found here from the supposed improbability that some should not have told him, seeing that Jesus was by this time well known in Jerusalem. But this is wholly unnecessary. His fame had not been so spread yet, but that He might during the crowd of strangers at the feast pass unnoticed.

Jesus passed on unobserved by him: just spoke the healing words, and then went on among the crowd; so that no particular attention was attracted to Himself, either by the sick man or others. The context requires this interpretation: being violated by the ordinary one, that Jesus ‘conveyed himself away, because a multitude was in the place.’ for that would imply that attention had been attracted towards Him which He wished to avoid; and in that case He could hardly fail to have been known to the man and to others.

14.] The knowledge of our Lord extended even to the sin committed thirty-eight years ago, from which this long sickness had resulted, for so it is implied here. The some worse thing, as Trench observes, ‘gives us an awful glimpse of the severity of God's judgments;’—see Matt. xii. 45.

15.] The man appears to have done this partly in obedience to the authorities; partly perhaps to complete his apology for himself. We can hardly imagine ingratitude in him to have been the cause; especially as the words “which had made him whole” speak so plainly of the benefit received; compare ver. 11 and note.

17.] The true keeping of the rest of the Sabbath was not that idle and unprofitable cessation from even good deeds, which they would enforce: the Sabbath was made for man;—and, in its Jewish form, for man in a mere state of legal discipline (which truth could not yet be brought out to them, but is implied in this verse, because His people are even as He is—in the liberty wherewith He hath made them free); whereas He, the only-begotten of the Father, doing the works of God in the world, stands on higher ground, and hallows, instead of breaking the Sabbath, by thus working on it. “He is no more a breaker of the Sabbath than God is, when He upholds with an energy that knows no pause the work of His creation from hour to hour, and from moment to moment; ‘My Father worketh hitherto, and I work;’ My work is but the reflex of His work. Abstinence from outward work belongs not to the idea of a Sabbath, it is only more or less the necessary condition of it for beings so framed as ever to be in danger of losing the true collection and rest of the spirit in the multiplicity of earthly toil and business. Man indeed must cease from his work, if a higher work is to find place in him. He scatters himself in his work, and therefore he must collect himself anew, and have seasons for so doing. But with Him who is one with the Father, it is otherwise. In Him the deepest rest is not excluded by the highest activity.” (Trench on the Miracles.)

18.] The ground of the charge is now shifted; and by these last words (ver. 17), occasion is given for one of our Lord's most weighty discourses.

The Jews understood His words to mean nothing short of peculiar personal Sonship, and thus equality of nature wit!God. And that this their understanding was the right one, the discourse testifies. All might in one sense, and the Jews did in a closer sense, call God their, or our, Father; but they at once said that the individual use of ‘MY FATHER’ by Jesus had a totally distinct, and in their view a blasphemous, meaning: this latter especially, because He thus made God a participator in His crime of breaking the sabbath. Thus we obtain from the adversaries of the faith a most important statement of one of its highest and holiest doctrines.

19.] The discourse is a wonderful setting forth of the Person and Office of the Son of God in His Ministrations as the Word of the Father. It still has reference to the charge of working on the Sabbath, and the context takes in our Lord's answer both to this, ver. 17, and to the Jews' accusation, ver. 18. In this verse, He states that He cannot work any but the works of God: cannot, by his very relationship to the Father, by the very nature and necessity of the case;—the working of himself being an impossible supposition, and purposely set here to express one:—the Son cannot work of Himself, because He is the Son: His very Person presupposes the Father's will and counsel as His will and counsel,—and His perfect knowledge of that will and counsel. And this, because every creature may abuse its freedom, and will contrary to God: but THE SON, standing in essential unity with God, cannot, even when become Man, commit sin,—break the Sabbath; for His whole Being and Working is in and of God.

for what things soever...] This clause converts the former proposition, and asserts its truth when thus converted. ‘For it is the very nature of the Son to do whatever the Father doeth.’ Also, to do these works in like manner; after the same plan and proceeding, so that there can be no discord, but unity.

20.] For (this last is ensured by the fact, that) the Father loveth the Son, and sheweth him (in this the Lord sets forth to us the unfolding of the will and purposes of the Father to [Mark xiii. 32: Acts i. 7] and by Him, in His Mediatorial office) all things that himself doeth (all the purposes of His secret counsel;—for with the Father, doing is willing; it is only the Son who acts in time); and this manifestation will go on increasing in majesty, that the wonder which now is excited in you by these works may be brought out to its full measure (in the acceptance or rejection of the Son of God—wonder leading naturally to the “honour” of ver. 23).

21.] It is very important to observe the distinction here between the working of the Eternal Son (in creation, e.g.) as He is “in heaven” with God, and His working in the state of His humiliation, in which the Father should by degrees advance Him to exaltation and put His enemies under His feet. Of the latter of these mention is made (ver. 20) in the future, of the former in the present. The former belong to the Son as His proper and essential work: the latter are opened out before Him in the process of His passing onward in the humanity which He has taken. And the unfolding of these latter shall all be in the direction of, and in accordance with, the eternal attributes of the Son: see ch. xvii. 6; resulting in His being exalted to the right hand of the Father. So here,—as it is the Father's essential work to vivify the dead (see Rom. viii, 11; 1 Sam. ii. 6 al.), so the Son vivifies whom He will: this last whom He will not implying any selection out of mankind, nor said merely to remove the Jewish prejudice that their own nation alone should rise from the dead,—but meaning, that in every instance where His will is to vivify, the result invariably follows.

Observe, this quickeneth (maketh alive) lays hold. of life in its innermost and deepest sense, and thus finds its illustration in the waking both of the outwardly and the spiritually dead.

22.] In the words neither doth is implied, that as the Father does not Himself, by His own proper act, vivify any, but commits all quickening power to the Son:—so is it with judgment also. And judgment contains eminently in itself the “whom He will,”—when the act of quickening is understood—as it must be now—of bestowing everlasting life. Again, the raising of the outwardly dead is to be understood as a sign that He who works it is appointed Judge of quick and dead, for it is a part of the office of that Judge:—in the vivifying, the judgment is made: see below, ver. 29, and Ps, lxxii. 1–4.

23.] This being so, the end of all is, the honour of the Father in and by the Son. He (the Son) is the Lord of life, and the Judge of the world;—all must honour Him with equal honour to that which they pay to the Father:—and whosoever does not, however he may imagine that he honours or approaches God, does not honour Him at all;—because He can only be known or honoured by us as ‘THE FATHER wHO SENT HIS SON.’

24.] What follows, to ver. 30 inclusive, is an expansion of the two assertions in vv. 21, 22,—the quickenning and the judging,—intimately bound up as they are together. There is a parallelism in verses 24 and 25 which should be noticed for the right understanding of the words. “He that heareth my word,” in the one, answers to “the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God” in the other. It is a kind of hearing which awakens to life,—one accompanied by “believing Him that sent Me.” And this last is not barely ‘Him who sent Me,’ but Him, the very essence of belief in Whom is in this, THAT HE SENT ME (see ch. xii. 44). And the expression believeth Him (not ‘on Him,’ which is quite unauthorized by the original) expresses that belief in the testimony of God that He hath sent His Son, which is dwelt on so much 1 John v. 9–12, where, ver. 10, we have the same expression, “he that believeth not God,” even in the A.V.

hath everlasting life: so 1 John v. 12, 13. The believing, and the having everlasting life, are commensurate:—where the faith is, the possession of eternal life is:—and when the one remits, the other is forfeited. But here the faith is set before us as an enduring faith, and its effects described in their completion (see Eph. i. 19, 20).

cometh not into judgment] Judgment being the separation,—the effect of which is to gather out of the Kingdom all that offendeth;—and thus regarding especially the damnatory part of judgment,—he who believes comes not into, has no concern with, judgment. Compare Ps. cxlii. 2. The reckoning which ends with “Well done, good servant,” is not judgment: the reward is of free grace. In this sense, the believers in Christ will not be judged according to their works: they are justified before God by faith, and by God—God is he that justifieth, who is he that condemneth? Their ‘passage over’ from death into life has already taken place,—from the state of spiritual death into that everlasting life, which in their believing state they have already. It is to be observed that our Lord speaks in very similar terms of the unbelieving being condemned already, in ch. iii. 18.

The perfect sense of the word hath passed must not be weakened nor explained away.

25.] This verse continues to refer to spiritual awakening from the dead. The words The hour is coming, and now is are an expression used of those things which are to characterize the spiritual Kingdom of Christ, which was even now begun among men, but not yet brought (until the day of Pentecost, Acts ii.) to its completion. ‘Thus it cometh, in its fulness,—and even now is begun.

the dead,—in reference to the words “out of death” of the preceding verse—the spiritually dead:—see below on ver. 28.

the voice of the Son of God] His call to awake, in its widest and deepest sense;—by His own preaching, by His Apostles, His ministers, &c. &c. In all these He speaks to the spiritually dead. Not merely, “and when they have heard it, they shall live:” but, and THEY WHO have heard it (or, who hear it) shall live. This determines the verse to be spoken of spiritual, not bodily awakening.

they that have heard are the persons to whom the Lord cried so often “he that hath ears to hear, let him hear:”—the persons who stand opposed to those addressed in ver. 40.

shall live is explained in the next verse.

26, 27.] We have here again vivifying and judging bound together as the two great departments of the Son’s working;—the former, as substantiating the word “shall live” just uttered; the latter, as leading on to the great announcement of the next verse. But the two departments spring from two distinct sources, united in the Person of the Incarnate Son of God. The Father hath given Him to have life in Himself, as He is THE SON OF GOD. We have none of us life in ourselves: in Him we live and move and have our being. But He, as the Father is, is the source of Life. Then again the Father hath given Him power to pass judgment, because He is THE SON OF MAN; man is to be judged by Man,—by that Man whom God hath appointed, who is the inclusive Head of humanity, and to whom mankind, and man’s world, pertain by right of covenant-purchase. This executing judgment leads the thought to the great occasion when judgment shall be executed; which accordingly is treated of in the next verse.

28.] Marvel not at this, as in ch. iii. 7, introduces a matter of even greater wonder to them;—the astounding proof which shall be given in the face of the universe that this is so.

the hour cometh, but not “and now is” this time,—because He is now speaking of the great day of the resurrection: when not merely “the dead,” but all that are in the graves, shall hear His voice, and “they that have heard” are not specified, because all shall hear in the fullest sense. Observe that here, as elsewhere, when the judgment according to works is spoken of, it is the great general resurrection of Matt. xxv. 31–46, which (and the notes) compare. So here we have not “they that have believed,” and “they that have not believed,” but the descriptions reach far wider, including indeed in this most general form the first resurrection unto life also—and the two great classes are described as they that have done (wrought) good and they that have done (practised, see on ch. iii. 20, 21) evil (vain, worthless things).

Observe that life and judgment stand opposed here, as in ver. 24:—not that there is no such thing as a resurrection of death, but that it is involved in this judgment. Olshausen observes that this, and Acts xxiv. 15, are the only direct declarations in the N.T. of a bodily resurrection of the unjust as well as of the just. It is implied in some places, e.g. Matt. x. 28, and less plainly in Matt. xxv. 34 ff.: Rev. xx 5, 12, and directly asserted in the O.T., Dan. xii. 2. In 1 Cor. xv.,—as the object was to convince believers in Christ of the truth of the resurrection of their bodies,—no allusion is made to those who are not believers.

30.] Here begins the second part of the discourse,—but bound on most closely to the first (ver. 23),—treating of the testimony by which these things were substantiated, and which they ought to have received. This verse is, however, perhaps rather a point of transition to the next, at which the testimony is first introduced.

As the Son does nothing of Himself,—but His working and His judgment all spring from His deep unity of will and being with the Father,—this His great and last judgment, and all His other ones, will be just and holy (He being not separate from God, but one with Him); and therefore His witness given of Himself ver. 17, and called by them blasphemy, is true and holy also.

Observe, the discourse here passes into the first person, which was understood before, because He had called himself the Son of God,—but is henceforth used expressly.

31.] This assertion is not to be trifled away by an accommodation, or supposed to be introduced by ‘Ye will say to Me:’—see by all means ch. viii, 12–14 and notes.

The words are said in all earnestness, and are strictly true. If such a separation, and independent testimony, as is here supposed, could take place, it would be a falsification of the very conditions of the Truth of God as manifested by the Son, Who being the Word, speaks, not of himself, but of the Father. And in this sense ch. viii. 14 is eminently true also, the light being the “brightness of the Father’s glory.”

32.] This other can, by the inner coherence of the discourse, be no other than THE FATHER, of Whom so much has been said in the former part, but Who is hinted at rather than mentioned in this (the word “Father” in ver. 80 being spurious). It cannot be John,—from whom (ver. 34) our Lord took not his testimony. Similar modes of alluding to the Father occur ch. 50: see also ch. viii. 18, and Matt. x. 28 and parallel places.

and I know...] This is the Son’s testimony to the Father’s truth: see ch. (iii. 38) vii. 28; viii, 26, 55. It testifies to the full consciousness on the part of the Son, even in the days of his humiliation, of the righteousness of the Father: and (for the testimony of the Father to the Son is contained in the Scriptures) also to His distinct recognition and approval (Ps. xl. 6–8) of psalm and type and prophecy, as applied to Himself and His work.

33.] See ch. i. 19. The connexion is,—another testifies of Me (ver. 32)—‘not John only, although he, when sent to, did certainly testify to the truth; for’&c.

he bare witness unto the truth, not merely (Grot.) modestly said;—but necessarily. Bare witness to Me would have been asserting what the next verse denies.

34.] ‘I receive not my testimony (the testimony to Me of which I have spoken) from man, but I mention John’s testimony, that you may make the intended use of it, to be led to Me for salvation.’

35.] This was shews, as Stier rightly observes, that John was now cast into prison, if not executed.

the lamp] The article has been taken by some to point to the prophecies concerning John, But we have no passage in the O.T. which designates Elias in such terms. In Eccl. xlviii. 1 we read of him, “Then stood up Elias the prophet as fire, and his word burned like a lamp,” which Stier thinks may be referred to here. We may, as indeed he also suggests, believe that those words represent or gave rise to a common way of speaking of Elias, as certain Rabbis were called ‘The candle of the Law,’&c. De Wette takes the article as meaning, ‘the lamp which was to lead you,’&c.

On John as the light lighted not lighting, see note, ch. i. 8.

and shining] The description sets forth the derived, and transitory nature of John’s light.

and ye....] See Ezek. xxxiii, 30, 32. ‘But you wished only to disport yourselves in his light for a time—came out to him in crowds at first,—and—like silly children who play with the fire till it burns and hurts them, and then shrink from and loathe it,—when he began to speak of deep repentance as the preparation for God’s Kingdom, and laid the axe to the root of the trees, you left him.’ No one cared, when he was imprisoned and put to death. And even those few who remained true to him, did not follow his direction to Christ. For the mass of the people, and their leaders, his mission was in vain.

36.] Literally, I have my witness greater than John; or, than that of John;—but perhaps this is not needed, for John himself was a testimony.

for the works, not His miracles alone, although those principally; but the whole of His life and course of action, full as it was of holiness, in which, and as forming harmonious parts of which, His miracles were testimonies of His divine mission. His greatest work (ch. vi. 29) was the awakening of faith, the quickening of which we have heard before, to which the miracles were but as means to an end.

the same works that I do] The repetition is to shew that His life and working was an exact fulfilment of the Father’s will. The works which the Father hath given me to do, those very works which I am doing..... 37–39.] The connexion of these verses has been much disputed. I believe it will be found to be this: ‘The works of which I have spoken, are only indirect testimonies; the Father Himself, who sent Me, has given direct testimony concerning Me. Now that testimony cannot be derived by you, nor any man, by direct communication with Him; for ye have never heard His voice nor seen His shape. (Or perhaps,—have not heard His voice, as your fathers did from Sinai,—nor seen His visional appearance, as the Prophets did.) Nor (ver. 38), in your case, has it been given by that inward witness (ch. iii. 33 5 1 John iv. 13, 14) which those have (and had in a measure, even before the gift of the Spirit—see, among other places, Ps. li. 11), in whom His word abides; for ye have not His word abiding in you, not believing on Him whom He hath sent. Yet (ver. 39) there is a form of this direct testimony of the Father, accessible even to you;—“Search the Scriptures,”&c.’ Chrysostom and others understand the word voice to refer to the voice at our Lord’s baptism: but, as Lücke observes, the addition, at any time, forbids this. Observe that the testimony in the Scriptures is not the only, nor the chief one, intended in ver. 37, but the direct testimony in the heart of the believer;—which, as the Jews have not, they are directed to another form of the Father’s testimony, that in the Scriptures.

39.] The word Search may be indicative, Ye search: then the sense will be, ‘Ye search the Scriptures, for ye believe ye have&c., and they are they that testify of Me: and (yet, ver. 40) ye will not come to Me that ye may have life:’ or imperative, as in the text, in which case generally a period has been placed after me, and a fresh sentence begins at And yet ye are not willing.... Authorities are very divided between these: the Greek Fathers, who should best understand their own language, took them (with one remarkable exception, Cyril of Alexandria) as imperative. And I believe the imperative sense only will be found to cohere with the previous verses:—see above, where I have given the context. And no other sense will suit the word search: which cannot be used, as in the indicative it would be, with blame attached to it,—‘ye make nice and frivolous search into the letter of Scripture;’ but implies a thorough search (see also 1 Pet. i. 11) into the contents and spirit of Scripture.

Ye (emphatic) imagine that in them (emphatic) ye have eternal life. We may find testimonies to this from the Rabbis: “He who acquires the words of the law, acquires for himself eternal life,”&c. But they, like all other secondary ordinances, have a spiritual end in view, and that end is to testify, from first to last (it is their office); they are they that testify of ME.

40.] I would connect these words with the former, and regard them as describing the inconsistency of those who think that they have life in the Scriptures, and yet will not come to Him of whom they testify, that they may have life.

Observe, this command to the Jews to search their Scriptures, applies even more strongly to Christians; who are yet, like them, in danger of idolizing a mere written book, believing that in the Bible they have eternal life, and missing the personal knowledge of Him of whom the Scriptures testify.

The words Ye are not willing to come here set forth strikingly the free dom of the will, on which the unbeliever’s condemnation rests: see ch. iii. 19.

41–44.] The connexion seems to be;—the standing-points of our Lord and of the Jews were not only different, but were inconsistent with and exclusive of one another. He sought not glory from below, from man’s praise or report: the Father testified to Him, in all the ways which have been specified; but this testimony they could not receive, nor discover Him in their Scriptures, because human regards and ambition and intrigue had blinded their eyes, and they had not the love of God (the very first command in their law, Deut. vi. 4, 5) in their hearts.

41.] I receive not, not merely, ‘I do not desire,’—but I do not receive;—‘no such praise nor testimony accrues to Me, nor has in Me that on which it can lay hold’ ‘My glory is altogether from another source.’

42.] But (nevertheless, howbeit) draws forcibly the distinction, setting Himself and them in strong contrast.

I know you] By long trial and bearing with your manners these many generations; and personally also.

The words are spoken, not of an ungodly mind in general, but of an absence of that love which God’s covenant people should have for Him, ‘They would none of Jesus: for they were not true Israelites.’ This love, if they had it, would teach them,—the whole heart, and soul, and mind, and strength being given to God,—to seek honour only from him,—and thus to appreciate the glory which He hath given to His Son, and His testimony concerning Him.

43.] The first clause is clear. In the latter we have a prophetic declaration regarding the Jews in the latter days. This another is in strong contrast with the “another” of ver. 32. ‘The testimony of that Other, who is greater than I, ye will not receive; but if another come in his own name, him ye will receive.’ The words are perhaps spoken primarily of the false or Idol-Messiah, the Antichrist, who shall appear in the latter days (2 Thess. ii. 8–12); whose appearance shall be according to the working of Satan (their father, ch. viii. 44), shewing himself that he is God, 2 Thess. ii. 4;—and doubtless, in that their final reference, embrace also all the cases in which the Jews have more or less received those false Messiahs who have been foreshadowers of the great Antichrist, and indeed all the cases in which such a spirit has been shewn by them, even in the absence of false Messiahs.

44.] How can ye (emphatic) is grounded on “ye are not willing”—is the consequence of the carnal regards in which they lived.

from the only God, not ‘from God only’ (A. V.), which is ungrammatical: in contradistinction to the idolatry of the natural heart, which is ever setting up for itself other sources of honour, worshipping man, or self,—or even, as in the case alluded to in the last verse, Satan,—instead of God. The words “the only God” are very important, because they form the point of passage to the next verses; in which the Jews are accused of not believing the writings of Moses, the very pith and kernel of which was the unity of God, and the having no other gods but Him.

45.] The work of Christ is not to accuse, even as He is Judge;—but to judge, by the appointment of the Father. And therefore—though He has said so much of the unbelief of the Jews, and charged them in the last verse with breach of the central law of God—He will not accuse them; nay, it is not needful;—for Moses, whom they disbelieved, while vainly hoping in him (see above on ver. 39), “making their boast in the law,” Rom. ii. 17,—already accused them: see Deut. xxxi. 21, 26, and ch. vii. 19.

46. he wrote of me] ‘This is an important testimony by the Lord to the subject of the whole Pentateuch;—it is concerning Him. It is also a testimony to the fact, of Moses having written those books, which were then, and are still, known by his name.

47.] The meaning is: ‘men give greater weight to what is written and published, the letter of a book, than to mere word of mouth;—and ye in particular give greater honour to Moses, than to Me: if then ye believe not what he has written, which comes down to you hallowed by the reverence of ages,—how can you believe the words which are uttered by Me, to whom you are hostile?’ This however is not all:—Moses leads to Christ:—is one of the witnesses by which the Father hath testified of Him: ‘if then ye have rejected the means, how shall ye reach the end? If your unbelief has stopped the path, how shall ye arrive at Him to whom it leads?’

CHAP. VI. JESUS THE LIFE IN THE FLESH.]

1-15.] Miraculous feeding of five thousand men. Matt. xiv. 13–21. Mark vi. 30–44. Luke ix. 10–17, in each of which compare the notes throughout. Here we have another example of John relating a miracle with the view: of introducing a discourse, and that discourse carries on the testimony of Jesus to Himself. In the last, He was the SON OF GOD, testified to by the Father, received by faith, rejected by unbelief: here He is SON OF MAN, the incarnate Life of the world, and we have the unbelief of the Jews and His own disciples set in strong contrast with the feeding on and participating in Him as the Bread of Life.

1.] After these things gives us no fixed date;—see on ch. v. 1. As Lücke remarks, the words went over the sea of Galilee..., if connected with the preceding discourse, would be unintelligible,—and can only be understood by the fragmentary character of this Gospel as relates to mere narration, and the well-known fact being presupposed, that His Ministry principally took place in Galilee.

Matthew gives this passage over the lake in connexion with the execution of John the Baptist: Mark and Luke, with the return of the Twelve from their mission. (The Twelve were probably gathered, or their gathering finished, in the interval since ch. v. 47, during which time their mission also had taken place.)

which is the sea of Tiberias] The last appellation is probably inserted for the sake of Gentile readers, to whom it was best known by that name. It was more usually called, as by Josephus, Gennesar, or Gennesaritis: see also, 1 Mace. xi. 67.

2.] It is evident from this that a circuit in Galilee and works of healing are presupposed (see Matthew, ver. 13; Mark, ver. 33; Luke, ver. 11).

3.] the mountain, perhaps ‘the hill country’ on the shore of the lake: expressed in Matthew by “a desert place apart.” The expression is used by John only here and in ver. 15, but no inference can be drawn from that, for this is the only portion of the Galilæan Ministry related by him.

4.] This will account, not for so great a multitude coming to Him, but perhaps (?) for the circumstance that the people at that time were gathered in multitudes, ready to set out on their journey to Jerusalem. We must remember also that the reference of the following discourse to the Passover being so pointed, the remark would naturally be here inserted by the Evangelist: but I would not insist on this as the only reason for his making it.

5.] Here there is considerable difficulty, on account of the variation from Matthew, Mark, and Luke, who relate that. the disciples came to the Lord after He had been teaching and healing the multitudes, and when it was now evening,—and asked Him to dismiss the multitudes, that they might buy food;—whereupon He commanded, ‘Give ye them to eat;’—whereas here apparently, on their first coming, the Lord Himself suggests the question, how they were to be fed, to Philip. This difference is not to be passed over, as it has usually been by English Commentators, without notice. Still less are we to invent improbable and hardly honest harmonistic shifts to piece the two narratives together. There can be no doubt, fairly and honestly speaking, that the narratives, in their mere letter, disagree. But those who are not slaves to the mere letter will see here that inner and deeper accordance of which Augustine speaks in commenting on this passage sage: "From which general variety in the verbal narrative amidst agreement in the facts and sense, it is evident enough that we are wholesomely instructed that nothing is to be looked for in the words of Scripture but the general purport of those who spoke: to display which purpose should be the watchful care of all truthful narrators, whether relating concerning man, or angel, or God Himself." I repeat the remark so often made in this Commentary,—that if we were in possession of the facts as they happened, there is no doubt that the various forms of the literal narrations would fall into their places, and the truthfulness of each historian would be apparent:—but as we cannot at present reconcile them in this way, the humble and believing Christian will not be tempted to handle the word of God deceitfully, but to admire the gracious condescension which has given us the evidence of so many independent witnesses, whose very difference in detail makes their accordance in the great central truths so much the more weighty. On every point of importance here, the four sacred historians are entirely and absolutely agreed. That every minor detail related by them had its ground in historical fact, we fully believe; it is the tracking it to this ground in each case, which is now beyond our power; and here comes in the simplicity and reliance of faith: and the justification of those who believe and receive each Gospel as they find it written.

unto Philip] Why to Philip, does not appear; perhaps some reason lay in the words "this He said to prove him," which is now lost to us. From his words in ch. xiv. 8, we cannot infer, as has been done by Cyril of Alexandria and others, that he was weaker in faith, or tardier in spiritual apprehension, than the rest. Of all the Apostles who appear in the sacred narrative, something might be quoted, shewing equal unreadiness to believe and understand. I would take the circumstance as simple matter of fact, implying perhaps that Philip was nearest to our Lord at the moment. We must not fall into the mistake of supposing that Philip being of Bethsaida the city of Andrew and Peter (ch. i. 45) throws any light on the question: for the Bethsaida near which our Lord now was, Luke ix. 10, was another place: see notes there.

Whence—‘from what store?’ Hence Philip’s answer.

6.] he knew:—by this St. John must be understood not only to rescue our Lord from the imputation of asking counsel of Philip, but to refer the miraculous act, on His part, to His purpose of exhibiting Himself as the Son of Man the Life of the World in the flesh.

7.] See notes on Mark.

8.] Meyer remarks, that the words one of His disciples may seem strange, seeing that Philip also was this: but that it has its value in the narrative, seeing that, Philip, having been asked in vain, one from among the circle of the disciples answers, and is afterwards specified as having been Andrew.

In the three other Gospels, the loaves and fishes appear as the disciples’ own;—and we have thus a very simple but very instructive instance of the way in which differences in detail arose. They were their own,—but not till they had bought them.

9.] barley loaves—this was the usual barley bread which formed the food of the lower orders.

10.] much grass, in accordance with the time of year, the latter end of spring, after the rainy season.

the men] Before, when our Lord commanded, as in A.V., “make the men sit down,” it was the general word, signifying both men and women indiscriminately. And I have therefore substituted in the margin, people. But now it is the word signifying men, as distinguished from women and children. And this is a particular touch of accuracy in the account of an eye-witness, which has not I think been noticed. Why in the other accounts should mention be made only of the men in numbering them? St. Matthew has, it is true, “beside women and children,” leaving it to be inferred that there was some means of distinguishing;—the others merely give “[about] five thousand men” without any explanation. But here we see how it came to be so—the men alone were arranged in companies, or alone arranged so that any account was taken of them: the women and children being served. promiscuously; who indeed, if the multitude were a paschal caravan (?), or parts of many such, would not be likely to be very numerous;—and here again we have a point of minute truthfulness brought out.

11.] On the process of the miracle, see notes on Matthew. St. John describes the distribution as being the act of the Lord Himself, and leaves the intervention of the disciples to be understood.

The giving thanks here answers to blessing in the other Gospels. It was the ‘grace’ of the father of the family; perhaps the ordinary one in use among the Jews. St. John seems to connect with it the idea brought out by St. Luke, “He blessed them,” i.e. the loaves: see ver. 23.

12.] Peculiar to John, The command, one intent of which was certainly to convince the disciples of the power which had wrought the miracle, is given by our Lord a moral bearing also. They collected the fragments for their own use, each in his basket (cophinus), the ordinary furniture of the travelling Jew, to carry his food, lest he should be polluted by that of the people through whose territory he passed; see note on Matt. xv. 32. Observe, that here the 12 baskets are filled with the fragments of the bread alone: but in Mark, with those of the fishes also.

We must not altogether miss the reference to the 12 tribes of Israel, typifying the church which was to be fed with the bread of life to the end of time.

14.] On the prophet see note on ch. i. 21,— “Art thou the prophet?”

15.] After such a recognition, nothing was wanting but that the multitudes who were journeying to the Passover should take Jesus with them, and proclaim Him king of the Jews in the holy City itself.

The other three Evangelists, while they do not give any intimation of this reason of our Lord’s withdrawal, relate the fact, and St. Luke preserves in the very next verse a trace of its motive,—by the question ‘Whom do the people say that I am?’ and the answer, expressing the very confession of the people here.

16–21.] Jesus walks on the sea. Matt. xiv. 22–383. Mark vi. 45–52. Omitted by St. Luke. An important and interesting question arises, Why is this miracle here inserted by St. John? That he ever inserts for the mere purpose of narration, I cannot believe. The reason seems to me to be this: to give to the Twelve, in the prospect of so apparently strange a discourse respecting His Body, a view of the truth respecting that Body, that it, and the things said of it were not to be understood in a gross corporeal, but in a supernatural and spiritual sense. And their very terror, and reassurance, tended to impress that confidence in Him which kept them firm, when many left Him, ver. 66.

16.] even, here, will be during the time between the “evening” of Matt. xiv. 15, and that of the same, ver. 23. The Jews commonly reckoned two evenings: see the note on Matt. xxvi. 17, p. 182, bottom of col. 1.

went down] By the command of Jesus (Matthew, Mark).

17.] were going—denoting the unfinished action—they were making for the other side of the sea, in the direction of Capernaum; “unto Bethsaida,” Mark, which would be the same thing. It would appear as if the disciples were lingering along shore with the expectation of taking in Jesus: but night had fallen, and He had not come to them, and the sea began to be stormy (ver. 18). Having therefore set out (ver. 19), and rowed, &c. The word So, with which ver. 19 begins, seems to me to render this supposition necessary,—to bind their having rowed twenty-five or thirty stadia, with the fact that the Lord had not come, and it was dark, and the sea swelling into a storm. The lake is forty furlongs wide: so that, as we can hardly assume the passage to have been to a point directly opposite, they were somewhere about “in the midst of the sea,” Matthew, ver. 24.

18. was rising] was becoming thoroughly agitated.

19. walking on the sea] There surely can be no question in the mind of an unprejudiced reader, that it is John’s intention to relate a miracle;—nor again,—that there could be in the minds of the disciples no doubt about that miracle,—no chance of a mistake as to what they saw. I have treated of on the sea on Matthew, ver. 25.

They were afraid:—but upon being reassured by His voice, they were willing to take Him into the ship; and upon their doing so, the ship in a comparatively short time (or perhaps immediately by miracle, but I prefer the other) was at the land to which they had been going, viz. by the storm ceasing, and the ship making smooth way (“the wind ceased,” Matthew, Mark).

It seems to me that the above interpretation of “they were willing therefore to receive Him” is absolutely necessary to account for the therefore.

22–59.] The multitudes follow Jesus to Capernaum, where, in the synagogue, He discourses to them on Himself as the Bread of Life.

22–24.] These verses are involved and parenthetical in construction, but very characteristic of the minute care with which the Evangelist will account for every circumstance which is essential to his purpose in the narrative.

the multitude] We are not to understand the whole multitude who were fed,—but that portion of them which had remained on the coast over the night. Many had probably dispersed to the villages about, or perhaps taken up their night quarters more inland.

on the other side of the sea] i.e. on the east coast. We are supposed to be at Capernaum.

The other boats had perhaps brought some of them thither: or the spot nigh unto the place where they ate the bread, &c., might have been some landing-place of merchandise.

25.] on the other side of the sea is now the west bank;—we have been crossing the sea with the multitude.

when? as Stier remarks, includes “how?” in its meaning. Our Lord leaves the question unanswered, because it was not for a sign to these people that He had miraculously crossed the lake.

26.] The seeking Him, on the part of these people,—to Him, who saw the hearts,—was merely a low desire to profit by His wonderful works,—not a reasonable consequence of deduction from His miracles that He was the Saviour of the world. And from this low desire of mere satisfaction of their carnal appetite, He takes occasion in the following discourse to raise them to spiritual desire after HIMSELF THE BREAD OF LIFE. The discourse forms a parallel with that in ch. iv. 27.

Work not for] The A.V., ‘Labour not for,’ does not give the sense. They had not laboured in this case for the meat that perisheth, but it had been furnished miraculously. A better rendering would be, Busy not yourselves about,—Do not weary yourselves for,—which they were doing, by thus coming after our Lord: but best of all, Work not for, because in the original the root of the word is the same in verses 27, 29, 30.

“The meat whose nourishing power passes away,” De Wette. Better literally, which perisheth, as in text:—the useless part of it, in being cast out;—the useful, in becoming part of the body which perishes (see 1 Cor. vi. 13).

but for that meat] It is important to bear in mind that the “working for” spoken of above, which also applies to this, was not a ‘labouring for,’ or ‘bringing about of’ but a following Christ in order to obtain. So the meaning will be, but seek to obtain, by following after Me....

which endureth unto everlasting life] See ch. iv. 14, If this “meat” remains to eternal life, it must be spiritual food.

which the Son of man shall give unto you] See eh. iv. ib.

which agrees with “meat,” not with “life.”

shall give, future, because the great Sacrifice was not yet offered: so in ch. iv.

the Son of man, emphatic here, and belonging to this discourse, since it is of His Flesh that He is about to speak.

for Him the Father sealed, even God] This rendering is made necessary by the grammatical form of the original.

sealed, by undoubted testimony, as at His baptism; and since, by His miracles, see ch. x. 36: not, ‘stamped with the image of His Person,’ which is altogether beside the present subject, and inconsistent with the meaning of the verb.

28.] The people understand His working literally, and dwell upon it. They quite seem to think that the food which is to endure for ever is to be spiritually interpreted; and they therefore ask this question,—referring the “working” to the works of the law.

the works of God must not be taken to mean ‘the works which God works,’ but, as in Jer. xlvi. 10; 1 Cor. xv. 58, the works well pleasing to God.

29.] The meaning is not,—that faith is wrought in us by God, is the work of God; but that the truest way of working the work of God is to believe on Him whom He hath sent.

work, not works, because there is but this one, properly speaking, and all the rest are wrapt up in it (see James i. 25).

This is a most important saying of our Lord, as containing the germ of that teaching afterwards so fully expanded in the writings of St. Paul. “I know not,” says Schleiermacher, “where we can find any passage, even in the writings of the Apostles, which says so clearly and significantly, that all eternal life in men proceeds from nothing else than faith in Christ.”

30, 31.] This answers to ch. iv. 12, “Art thou greater than our father Jacob,” &c. Ibis spoken in unbelief and opposition; not, as many have supposed, as a request for the Bread of Life, meaning it by the sign, but in the ordinary sign-seeking spirit of the Jews. Stier says well, "They have been hesitating between better and worse thoughts, till at last unbelief prevails." The sign here demanded is the sign from heaven, the proof of the sealing by God; such a proof would be, in their estimation, compared with His present miracles, as the manna (bread from heaven) was, compared to the multiplied loaves and fishes.

The manna was extolled by the Jews, as the greatest miracle of Moses. Josephus calls it "a divine and wondrous food:" see also Wisd. xvi. 20, 21. "They forgot that their fathers disbelieved Moses almost from the time when they began to eat the manna; and that the Psalm from which they quote most strongly sets forth this;—that they despised the manna, and preferred ordinary meat to it." Stier.

Observe our Lord's believe on him in ver. 29, and their believe thee. The former, the casting their whole hopes and faith on Him, is what He requires: but they will not even give the latter, common credence, to Him.

Their what dost thou work? Meyer remarks, is a retort of our Lord's question, ver. 27. The stress, in these words, should be not on the thou, which is not expressed in the original, but on the what.

32.] Our Lord lays open the course of their argument. They have not mentioned Moses,—nor was the giving of the manna a miracle performed by Moses;—but He knew that the comparison between Moses and Himself was in their minds, and answers by exposing the error which represented Moses as the giver of the manna. Neither again was that the true bread from heaven. It was, in one sense, bread from heaven;—but not in this sense. It was a type and shadow of the true bread from heaven, which my Father is giving (or perhaps the abstract present,—signifying that it is His office to give it) to you. Our Lord does not here deny, but asserts the miraculous character of the manna.

33.] the bread of God answers to "the bread which my Father giveth." The words that which cometh down from heaven.... are the predicate of the bread, and do not apply, in the construction of this verse, to Christ personally, however truly they apply to Him in fact. The A.V. is here wrong: it should be, The bread of God is that (not He) which cometh, &c. Not till ver. 35 does Jesus first say, 'I AM the bread of life.' The manna is still kept in view, which 'when the dew fell on the camp....fell' (the Greek word in the LXX is the same as here, came down) upon it,' Num. xi. 9. And the present tense, here used in reference to the manna, is dropped when the Lord Himself is spoken of: see vv. 38, 41, 58, and especially the distinction between ver. 50 and ver. 51.

34.] ch. iv. 15 is exactly parallel. The Jews understand this bread, as the Samaritan woman understood the water, to be some miraculous kind of sustenance which would bestow life everlasting:—perhaps they thought of the heavenly manna, which the Rabbis speak of as prepared for the just in the future world;—see Rev. ii. 17.

evermore] emphatic:—not now only, but always.

35.] As in ch. v. 30, so here, our Lord passes from the indirect to the direct form of speech. Henceforward it is 'I,' 'Me,' throughout the discourse.

In the genitive of life, is implied, "which came down from heaven and giveth life unto the world." So living water in ch. iv.

On the assurance of never hungering or thirsting, see note at ch. iv. 14. It is possible that our Lord placed the all-satisfying bread of life in contrast to the manna, which was no sooner given, Exod. xvi., than the people began to thirst, Exod. xvii.;—but I would not lay any stress on this.

he that cometh to me is in the same sense as in ch. v. 40—that of acceptance of and faith in Him.

36. I said unto you] "When did He say this to them? perhaps it was said, but has not been recorded." Euthymius. But perhaps the reference may be to ch. v. 37–44, and unto you may be said generally. Stier and others think that ver. 26 is referred to: but this is far-fetched.

We have instances of reference to sayings not recorded, in ch. x. 26; xii. 34.

have even seen] 'Ye have seen the true Bread from heaven, the sign greater than the manna, even Me Myself: and yet have not believed.'

37.] The whole body of believers on Christ are spoken of by Him, here and in ch. xvii, as given to Him by the Father. But Bengel's observation is very important: 'all that which'—a most significant expression, and, compared with what follows, most worthy of consideration. For in our Lord's discourses, that, which the Father hath given Him, is spoken of in the singular number and neuter gender, "all that which:" whereas they who come to Him, the Son, are spoken of in the masculine gender, and sometimes also in the plural number: "every man," or "all they." The Father hath given to the Son as it were one mass, that all whom He hath given should be one: that whole mass the Son unfoldeth one by one in this following out of the Father's design. Hence also that which we read in ch. xvii. 2, "that all that which Thou hast given Him (so literally), to them He may give eternal life." See also 1 John v. 4.

I will in no wise cast out does not refer here to the office of the Son of God as Judge; but is another way of expressing the grace, and readiness with which He will receive all who come to Him.

38, 39, 40.] His reception of men is not capricious, nor even of His own arbitrary choice; but as He came into the world to do the Father's will, and that will is that all who come to Him by faith shall have life, so He receives all such;—loses none of them;—and will raise them all up (here, in the fullest and blessed sense) at the last day. Olshausen remarks, that 'in ch. iv. we had only the inexhaustible refreshing of the soul by the water of life; but this discourse goes further;—that not even death itself shall destroy the body of him who has been nourished by this bread of life.'

raise it up again refers to the only resurrection which is the completion of the man in his glorified state;—it does not set aside the "resurrection of judgment" (ch. v. 29), but that very term is a debasement of "resurrection?" its true sense is only "resurrection of life."

Bengel has beautifully given the connexion of this last promise with what went before: "this is the end, beyond which there is no danger." But there is much more than this in it. In this declaration (vv. 39, 40) is contained the key of the following discourse, vv. 44–59. The end of the work of God, as regards man, is the glorification of his restored and sanctified nature, —body, soul, and spirit,—in eternity. Without this,—salvation, restitution, would be incomplete. The adoption cannot be consummated without the redemption of the body. Rom. viii. 18–23. And the glorification of the body, soul, and spirit,—of the whole man,—cannot take place but by means of the glorified Body of the second Adam. 'He who does not see this, will never understand either the Holy Communion, or this testimony of the Lord in its inner meaning.' Stier.

The looketh on here is a different thing from the mere seeing of ver. 36. It is the awakening of the attention preparatory to faith, answering to the looking on the serpent of brass: with the eyes of the soul, as Euthymius says; but we must not make the looking equivalent to believing, to which it is only preparatory.

41.] Not different hearers, nor does the scene of the discourse here change: they were the same,—perhaps the principal among them, the official superintendents of the synagogue:—for St. John generally uses "the Jews" in this official sense, 42.] They rightly supposed that this having come down from heaven must imply some method of coming into the world diverse from ordinary generation. Meyer gathers from the word we know, that our Lord's reputed father was then still alive. But surely the verb will bear the sense of knowing, as matter of fact, who they were, and need not be confined to personal knowledge.

43.] Our Lord does not answer their objection, because it lay far from His present purpose to disclose aught of those mysteries which the answer must have indicated. It was not till the faith of the apostolic Christians was fully fixed on Him as the Son of God, and the outline of the doctrine of His Person was firmly sketched out, that the Spirit brought out those historical records which assure us of His supernatural conception.

44.] The connexion seems to be this: They were not to murmur among themselves because He had said this; for the right understanding of what He had said is only to be gained by being taught of God, by being drawn by the Father, who alone can give the desire to come to Christ, and bring a man to Him. That this 'drawing' is not irresistible grace, is confessed even by Augustine himself, the great upholder of the doctrines of grace. "If a man is drawn, says an objector, he comes against his will. (We answer) if he comes unwillingly, he does not believe: if he does not believe, he does not come. For we do not run to Christ on our feet, but by faith; not with the movement of the body, but with the free will of the heart... Think not that thou art drawn against thy will: the mind can be drawn by love." Calvin and others understand irresistible grace to be here meant: "It is false and profane," says Calvin, "to say that only the willing are drawn." The Greek expositors take the view which I have adopted above. Chrysostom says, "This expression does not remove our part in the coming, but rather shews that we want help to come." See Article X. of the Church of England, at the end.

This drawing towards Christ may be exemplified in the legal dispensation, which was to the Jews a schooling for Christ. It now is being exerted on all the world,—in accordance with the Lord's prophecy ch. xii. 32 (see note there), and His command Matt. xxviii. 19, 20,—by Christian preaching and missions; but, after all, the individual will must be turned to Christ by the Father, Whose covenanted promise is, that He will so turn it in answer to prayer. "Art thou not yet drawn? pray that thou mayest be drawn." Augustine. The same solemn and joyous refrain, as Meyer well calls it, follows, as in vv. 39, 40.

45.] in the prophets may be a general form of citation (Mark i. 2. Acts vii. 42; xiii. 40), or may mean that the sense is found in several places of the prophets: see especially Jer. xxxi. 33, 34. This clearly intimates the kind of drawing meant in the last verse:—the opening the eyes of the mind by divine teaching.

hath heard and hath learned are expansions of the word taught in the citation from the prophets.

cometh unto me] This is the final decision of the human will, acted on by the divine attraction to Christ. The beginning is, The Father draws him: the progress, he hears and learns—here is the consenting will—‘Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth:’—the end, he cometh to Christ—here is the will acting on the whole man.

46.] The connexion is: the mention of hearing from the Father might lead them to think of a personal communication from the Father to each man, and thus the necessity of the mission of the Son might be invalidated. This was the only way in which a Jew could misunderstand ver. 45; he could not dream of a seeing of the Father with bodily eyes.

he which is of God, is Jesus Himself; see ch. vii. 29. His knowledge of the Father is complete and immediate; ours, partial, and derived through Him only.

47.] Our Lord now recurs to the subject of their murmurs, and gives the answer for which He has been preparing the way, repeating nearly ver. 40 and adding,

48.] If so, (see ver. 47,) there is full reason for my naming Myself the Bread of Life.

49.] That bread from heaven had no power to keep off death, and that, death owing to unbelief:—our Lord by thus mentioning your fathers and their death, certainly hints at the similar unbelief of these Jews. And the same dubious sense of “dying” prevails in ver. 50. Death is regarded as being swallowed up in the glory of the resurrection, and the second death—which was hidden in the former term died—has over him who eats this Bread of Life, no power: nay, he is brought, even here into a resurrection state from sin and death; see Rom. vi. 1 ff. and Col. iii. 1 ff.

51.] the living bread; ‘containing life in itself,’ not merely supplying the waste of life with lifeless matter: see on ch. iv. 13, 14.

yea, and the bread that I will give] From this time we hear no more of bread: this figure is dropped, and the reality takes its place.

Some difficult questions arise regarding the sense and reference of this saying of our Lord. (1) Does it refer to HIS DEATH? and, (2) is there any reference to the ORDINANCE OF THE LORD’S SUPPER?

(1) In treating this question I must at once reject all metaphorical and side-interpretations, as, that the teaching of Christ is the Bread, and to be taught by Him is feeding upon it (so Grotius, and the modern rationalists): that the divine Nature of Christ, or His sending of the Holy Spirit, or His whole life of doing good on earth, can be meant: all such have against them the plain sense of the words, which, as Stier observes, are very simple ordinary words; the only difficulty arising, when we come to enquire into their application to His own Person. The Bread of Life is Himself: and, strictly treated, when we come to enquire what, of that body, soul, and spirit, which constituted Himself, this Bread specifically is, we have His answer that it is His Flesh, which He will give (for this will be the meaning, whether the words “which I will give” are to be regarded as part of the text or not) on behalf of the life of the world. We are then specifically directed to His Flesh as the answer.

Then, what does that Flesh import? The flesh of animals is the ordinary food of men: but not the blood. The blood, which is the life, is spilt at death, and is not in the flesh when eaten by us. Now this distinction must be carefully borne in mind. The flesh here, (see ver. 53,) and the eating of the flesh, are distinct from the blood, and the drinking of the blood. We have no generalities merely, to interpret as we please: but the terms used are precise and technical. It is then only through or after the Death of the Lord, that by any propriety of language, His Flesh could be said to be eaten.

Then another distinction must be remembered: The flesh of animals which we eat is dead flesh. It is already the prey of corruption; we eat it, and die (ver. 49). But this Bread, is living Bread; not dead flesh, but living Flesh. And therefore manducation by the teeth materially is not to be thought of here; but some kind of eating by which the living Flesh of the Son of God is made the living sustenance of those who partake of it. Now His Flesh and Blood were sundered by Death. Death was the shedding of His precious Blood, which (most probably) He did not afterwards resume: see ch. xx. 27, and Luke xxiv. 39. His Flesh is the glorified substance of His Resurrection-Body, now at the right hand of God. It is then in His Resurrection form only that His Flesh can be eaten, and be living food for the living man. I cannot therefore see how any thing short of His Death can be here meant. By that Death, He has given His Flesh for the life of the world: not merely that they who believe on Him may, in the highest sense, have life; but that the world may have life. The very existence of all the created world is owing to, and held together by, that Resurrection-Body of the Lord. In Him all things are gathered together and reconciled to God: “by Him all things consist,” i.e. “hold together,” Col..

(2) The question whether there is here any reference to the ORDINANCE OF THE LORD' S SUPPER, has been inaccurately put. When cleared of inaccuracy in terms, it will mean, Is the subject here dwelt upon, the same as that which is set forth in the ordinance of the Lord's Supper? And of this there can surely be no doubt. To the ordinance itself, there is here no reference; nor could there well have been any. But the spiritual verity which underlies the ordinance is one and the same with that here insisted on; and so considered, the discourse is, as generally treated, most important towards a right understanding of the ordinance.

52.] The inference conveyed in the word eat, which word, be it noted, first comes from the Jews themselves, is yet a right one. If He is the Bread, and that Bread is His Flesh, we must eat His Flesh, though not in the sense here meant by them. They contended against one another, probably some having more insight into the possibility of a spiritual meaning than others.

53.] Our Lord not only ratifies their own word, eat, but adds to it a more wonderful thing; that they must also do that against which a prohibition might seem to have existed from Noah downwards,—drink His Blood. But observe, this Blood is not to be eaten in the Flesh, which was the forbidden thing (Gen. ix. 4: Levit. xvii. 10–16), in its strict literal form: but to be drunk, separate from the flesh: again pres posing death. Now as the Flesh of Ch (see above) is the Resurrection-Body which: He now has, and in which all things consist; so is His Blood (“the blood is the life,” Lev. xvii. 11, 14) the Life which He gave up, paid down, as the penalty for the sin of the world. By the shedding, pouring forth, of that Blood, is remission of sin.

It is quite impossible that these words should, as De Wette maintains, be merely an expansion of “eating His flesh.” Even had the idea of drinking blood been one familiar to the Jews, the construction would not have allowed such an interpretation;—but new as it was, and abhorrent from their habits and law, we must regard it as specially and purposely added.

But what is this eating and drinking? Clearly, not merely faith: for faith answers to the hand reached forth for the food, but is not the act of eating. Faith is a necessary condition of the act: so that we can hardly say with Augustine, “believe, and thou hast eaten,” but “believe, and thou shalt eat.” Inasmuch as Faith will necessarily in its energizing lead to this partaking, we sometimes incorrectly say that it is Faith: but for strict accuracy this is not enough. ‘To eat the flesh of Christ, is to realize, in our inward life, the mystery of His Body now in heaven,—to digest and assimilate our own portion in that Body.

To drink His Blood, is to realize, in our inward life, the mystery of His satisfaction for sin,—to digest and assimilate our own portion in that satisfaction, the outpouring of that Blood. And both these definitions may be gathered into one, which is: The eating of His Flesh and drinking of His Blood import the making to ourselves and using as objectively real, those two great Truths of our Redemption in Him, of which our Faith subjectively convinces us.

And of this realizing of Faith he has been pleased to appoint certain symbols in the Holy Communion, which He has commanded to be received; to signify to us the spiritual process, and to assist us towards it.

ye have no life in you Ye have not in you that spring of life, which shall overcome death, and lead 54.] to the resurrection in the true sense:’ see above, ver. 44, and notice again the solemn refrain.

55.] The sense is not here, ‘My Flesh is the true meat&c.,’ but My Flesh is true meat, i.e. really TO BE EATEN, which they doubted. The adverb, “meat indeed,” or “drink indeed,” as in A.V., falls short of the depth of the adjective. This verse is decisive against all explaining away or metaphorizing the passage. Food and drink, are not here mere metaphors;—rather are our common material food and drink mere shadows and imperfect types of this only real reception of refreshment and nourishment into the being.

56.] He who thus lives upon Me, abides in Me (see ch. xv. 5 and note);—and I (that living power and nourishment conveyed by the bread of life, which is the Lord Himself) abide in him.

57.] The same expanded further—see ch. v. 26. The two branches of the feeding on Christ are now united under the general expression, eateth ME.

because of expresses the efficient cause. ‘The Father is the Fountain of all Life: the Son lives in and by the Father: and all created being generally, lives (in the lower sense) in and by Him; but he that eateth Him, shall (eternally and in the highest sense) live by Him.

58.] forms the solemn conclusion of the discourse, referring back to the Bread with which it began and to its difference from the perishable food which they had extolled:—and setting forth the infinite superiority of its effects over those of that sustenance.

which came down,—past, now: because He has clearly identified it with Himself.

60–65.] Murmuring of some of the disciples at the foregoing discourse, and the answer of Jesus to them.

60.] It has been shewn by Lampe, that the word rendered hard signifies not so much absurdity as impiety. It seems clear that it was not the difficulty, so much as the strangeness of the saying, which scandalized them. It is the whole discourse,—the turn given to it,—the doctrine of the Bread of Life,—the giving His Flesh and Blood to eat,—at which they take offence.

who can hear it? i.e. who can listen to it?—‘Who can stay and hear such sayings as this?’ not, Who can understand it?

61.] in himself, by His divine knowledge.

62.] What then if ye see... not meaning ‘will ye not then be much more scandalized’ or, ‘what will ye say (or do), then?’—but appealing to an event which they should witness, as a certain proof of one part of the “hard saying,” with which indeed the rest of it was bound up,—His having descended from heaven. All attempts to explain this otherwise than of His ascent into heaven, are simply dishonest,—and spring from laxity of belief in the historical reality of that event. That it is not recorded by John, is of no moment here. And that none but the Twelve saw it, is unimportant; for how do we know that our Lord was not here speaking to some among the Twelve? To explain it of His death, as part of His going up where he was before, is hardly less disingenuous.

63.] spirit and flesh do not mean the spiritual and carnal sense of the foregoing discourse, as many Commentators explain them: for our Lord is speaking, not of teaching merely, but of vivifying: He is explaining the life-giving principle of which He had been before speaking. ‘Such eating of My flesh as you imagine and find hard to listen to, could profit you nothing,—for it will have ascended up, &c.; and besides, generally, it is only the Spirit that can vivify the spirit of man; the flesh (in whatever way used) can profit nothing towards this.’ He does not say ‘My Flesh profiteth nothing,’ but ‘the flesh.’ To make Him say this, as the Swiss anti-sacramentalists do, is to make Him contradict His own words in ver. 51.

the words that I have spoken] viz. the words my flesh and my blood, above. They are spirit and life:—spirit, not flesh only:—living food, not carnal and perishable. This meaning has been missed by almost all Commentators: Stier upholds it, and it seems to me beyond question the right one. The common interpretation is, ‘the words which I have spoken,’ i.e. ‘My discourses,’ are ‘to be taken in a spiritual sense, ‘and are life’ But this is any thing but precise, even after the forcing of the meaning of the word “spirit.”

64.] ‘This accounts for your murmuring at what I said, that ye do not believe.’

For Jesus knew...] De Wette remarks, that the foreknowledge of our Lord with regard to Judas renders it impossible to apply the ordinary rules of moral treatment, as ‘Why did He then continue him as an Apostle? Why did He give him the charge of the purse, knowing him to be a thief?&c.’—to the ease: and it is therefore better not to judge at all on the matter.

The fact is, we come here to a form of the problem of divine foreknowledge and human free-will, which, in any of its endless combinations of expression, it is equally impossible for us to solve.

from the beginning, from their first coming to Him;—the first beginning of their connexion with Him.

65.] These unbelievers had not that drawing to Christ, which leads (ver. 44) to true coming to Him. Observe the parallelism between it were given him here, and all that which the Father giveth me, ver. 37. Both these gifts are in the Father’s power.

66–71.] Many of the disciples leave Him. The confession of the Twelve through Peter: and the Lord’s warning to them.

66. Upon this] The temporal meaning prevails, but does not exclude the causal. It was upon this being said, and it was also because this had been said.

many, viz. of those that believed not: but not all.

67.] The first mention of the Twelve by John. The question is asked in order to extract from them the confession which follows, and thus to bind them closer to Himself. We must not forget likewise, in the mystery of our Lord’s human nature, that at such a moment of desertion, He would seek comfort in the faith and attachment of His chosen ones.

68.] Peter answers quickly and earnestly for the rest, as in Matt. xvi. 16.

to whom shall we go?] What they had heard and seen had awakened in them the desire of being led on by some teacher towards eternal life; and to whom else should they go from Him who had, and brought out of His stores for their instruction, the words (see ver. 63) of eternal life?

69.] we have believed seems to be used absolutely, as in ver. 64: we believe [in Thee], and have long done so.

In the following words the readings vary; the common text having been to all appearance introduced from Matt. xvi. 16. The circumstance of the Lord not being elsewhere called the Holy One of God by John, is of course in favour of the reading: on the principle that an unusual expression was generally by the transcribers altered to a more usual one, not vice versa. ‘The idea however is found (ch. x. 36). I regard the coincidence with the testimony of the demoniacs, Mark i. 24 and parallel places, as a remarkable one. Their words appear to have been the first plain declaration of the fact, and so to have laid hold on the attention of the Apostles.

70.] The selection of the Twelve by Jesus is the consequence of the giving of them to Him by the Father, ch. xvii. 6,—in which there also Judas is included. So that His selecting, and the Father's giving and drawing, do not exclude final falling away.

a devil] It is doubtful in what sense this word should be taken, However we explain it, it will be an expression only once used in the N.T. In the dark act here prophesied, Judas was under the immediate instigation of and yielded himself up to Satan (compare our Lord’s reply to Peter, Matt. xvi. 23); and I would understand this expression as having reference to that league with and entertainment of the Evil One in his thoughts and purposes, which his ultimate possession by Satan implies. This meaning can perhaps hardly be rendered by any single word in another language. The A.V. ‘a devil,’ is certainly too strong; devilish would be better, but not unobjectionable. Compare “The son of perdition,” ch. xvii. 12.

71.] On the name Iscariot (here applied to Simon, Judas’s father), see on Matt. x. 4.

John: Chapter 7

CHAP. VII.—X.] JESUS THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD. The conflict at its height.

VII. 1–52.] JESUS MEETS THE UNBELIEF OF THE JEWS AT JERUSALEM. The circumstances [verses 1–13].

1.] The chronology of this period is very doubtful. I have remarked on it in my note on Luke ix. 51. Thus much we may observe here, that after these things cannot apply emphatically to ch. vi., but must be referred back to ch. v., as indeed must the Jews seeking to kill Him, and the miracle alluded to in ver. 28. But it will not follow from this, that ch. vi. is not in its right place: it contains an independent memoir of a miracle and discourse of our Lord in Galilee which actually happened in the interval, and only serves to shew us the character of this Gospel as made up of such memoirs, more or less connected with one another, and selected by the Evangelist for their higher spiritual import, and the discourses arising from them. I would understand this verse as merely carrying on the time from ch. v. and ch. vi.,—and its contents as introductory to the account of Jesus not going up at first to the feast. Ch. vi. is in some measure presupposed in our ver. 3, as indicating that He had not constantly observed the festal journeys of late.

2.] See Deut. xvi. 13–17. Josephus calls this the holiest and greatest feast. It began on the 15th (evening of 14th) of Tisri (Sept. 28), and lasted till the evening of the 22nd (Oct. 6).

3–5.] Respecting the BRETHREN OF THE LORD, see note on Matt. xiii. 55. They seem to have had at this time a kind of belief in the Messianic character of Jesus, but of the very lowest sort, not excluding the harsh and scoffing spirit visible in these words. They recognized his miracles, but despised his apparent want of prudence and consistency of purpose, in not shewing himself to the world. In the words that thy disciples also may see, &c., there is perhaps a reference to the desertion of many of his disciples just before. Nay, more than this: the indication furnished by this verse of the practice of our Lord with regard to His miracles up to this point is very curious. He appears as yet to have made His circuits in Galilee, and to have wrought miracles there, in the presence of but a small circle of disciples properly so called; and there would seem to have been a larger number of disciples, in the wider sense, in Judæa, or to be gathered in Judæa by the feast, who yet wanted assuring, by open display, of the reality of His wonderful works.

In ver. 5 (as well as by “thy disciples,” ver. 8), we have these brethren absolutely excluded from the number of the Twelve (see ch. vi. 69); and it is impossible to modify the meaning of the word “believe,” so as to suppose that they may have been of the Twelve, but not believers in the highest sense. This ‘verse also excludes all His brethren: it is inconceivable that John should have so written, if any among them believed at that time.

The emphatic expression, for even his brethren, &c., is a strong corroboration of the view that they were really and literally brethren;—see also Ps. lix. 8.

6–9.] My time can hardly be taken as directly meaning ‘the time of my sufferings and death,’—but as the same expression in ch. ii. 4: ‘My time for the matter of which you speak, viz. manifestation to the world’ That (ch. xii. 82), was to take place in a very different manner. But they, having no definite end before them, no glory of God to shew forth, but being of the world, always had their opportunity ready of mingling with and standing well with the world. Then (ver. 7), ‘you have no hatred of the world in your way: but its hatred to Me on account of my testimony against it, causes me to exercise this caution which you so blame.’

In ver. 8, it is of little import whether we read not or not yet: the sense will be the same, both on account of the present, go not up (not ‘will not go up,’ which would express the disavowal of an intention to go up), and of “not yet,” which occurs afterwards. I go not up would mean, I am not (at present) going up. Meyer attributes to our Lord change of purpose, and justifies his view by the example of His treatment of the Syrophenician woman, whom He at first repulsed, but afterwards had compassion on. Matt. xv. 26 ff. The same Commentator directs attention to the emphatic term, “this feast,” as implying that our Lord had it in His mind to go up to some future feasts, but not to this one.

is not yet full come: see Luke ix. 51 and note.

10.] not openly, i.e. not in the usual caravan-company, nor probably by the usual way. Whether the Twelve were with Him, we have no means of judging; probably so, for they appear ch. ix. 2; and after their becoming once attached to the Person of our Lord as Apostles, we find no trace of His having been for any long time separated from them, except during their mission Matt. x., which was long ago accomplished.

11.] These Jews are, as usual, the rulers, as distinguished from the multitudes. Their question itself (that man) shews a hostile spirit.

12.] the multitudes (the different groups of which the multitude was composed) would include the Galilean disciples, and those who had been baptized by the disciples in Judæa,—whose view the words “He is a good man” would represent,—as expressed mildly in protest against His enemies.

he deceiveth the multitude, possibly in reference to the feeding of and then the discourse to the multitude, which had given so much offence.

13. no man spake openly of him] This was true only of the side who said “He is a good man:” they dared not speak their mind: the others spoke plainly enough. Here again “the Jews” are distinguished from the multitudes.

14–39.] Jesus testifies to Himself in the Temple.

15–24.] His teaching is from the Father.

14, 15. when it was now the midst of the feast] Probably on a sabbath. It appears to have been the first time that He taught publicly at Jerusalem;—whence (therefore) the wonder of the Jews, i.e. the rulers of the hierarchy.

letters] Particularly, scripture-learning,—perhaps because this was all the literature of the Jews. Probably His teaching consisted in exposition of the Scripture.

having never learned: never having been the scholar of any Rabbi. He was taught of God. These words are spoken in the true bigotry and prejudice of so-called ‘learning.’

These words of His enemies, testifying to matter of fact well known to them, are, as Meyer observes, decisive against all attempts of unbelievers to attribute our Lord’s knowledge to education in any human school of learning. Such indications are not without their value in these times.

16.] The words may bear two meanings:—either, ‘the sense of Scripture which I teach is not my own, but that in which it was originally penned as a revelation from God;’ or, My teaching (generally) is not mine, but that of Him who sent me. The latter is preferable, as agreeing better with what follows, and because the former assumes that He was expounding Scripture, which, though probable, is not asserted.

17.] The rendering of this verse in the A.V. is much to be deplored. The word signifying be willing to should not have been slurred over, for it is important.

If any man’s will be, to do His will,&c. As it now stands in the A.V., a wrong idea is conveyed: that the bare performance of God's outward commands will give a man sufficient acquaintance with Christian doctrine:—whereas what our Lord asserts to the Jews is, that if the will be set in His ways, if a man be really anxious to do the will of God, and thus to fulfil this first great commandment of the law, the singleness of purpose, and subjection to the will of God, will lead him on to faith in the promised and then apparent Messiah, and to a just discrimination of the divine character of his teaching.

18.] This gives us the reason why he, who wishes to do God's will, will know of the teaching of Christ: viz. because both are seeking one aim—the glory of God:—and the humility of him, whose will it is to do God's will, can best appreciate that more perfect humility of the divine Son, who speaks not of himself, but of Him that sent him,—see ch. v. 41–44, of which this verse is a repetition with a somewhat different bearing. In its general sense, it asserts that self-exaltation and self-seeking necessarily accompany the unaided teaching of man, but that all true teaching is from God. But then we must remember that, simply taken, the latter part of the sentence is only true of the Holy One Himself; that owing to human infirmity, purity of motive is no sure guarantee for correctness of doctrine;—and therefore in this second part He does not say “the glory of God,” which would generalize it to all men, but his glory that sent him, which: confines it to Himself.

19.] There is a close connexion with the foregoing. Our Lord now takes the offensive against them. The being willing to do His will was to be the great key to a tyme appreciation of His teaching: but of this there was no example among them:—and therefore it was that they were no fair judges of the teaching, but bitter opponents and persecutors of Jesus, of whom, had they been anxious to fulfil the law, they would have been earnest and humble disciples (ch. v. 46). The law was to be read before all Israel every seventh year in the feast of tabernacles (Deut. xxxi. 10–13):—whether this was such a year is uncertain: but this verse may allude to the practice, even if it was not.

Why seek ye to kill me?] In their killing the Lord of Life was summed up all their transgression of God's law. It was the greatest proof of their total ignorance of and disobedience to it.

20.] The multitude, not the rulers, replied this. Indeed their question, “Who seeketh to kill thee?” shews their ignorance of the purpose of their rulers, which our Lord had just exposed and charged them with. It would not now be their policy to represent Him as possessed.

21.] The one work was the sabbath healing in ch. v.

22.] The argument seems to be, Moses on this account gave you circumcision, not because it is of Moses, but of the fathers; i.e. it is no part of the law of Moses, properly so called,—but was adopted by Moses, and thereby becomes part of his law. Now you circumcise on the Sabbath, to avoid breaking the law of Moses, &c. If our Lord had said these last words (in ver. 23) merely, the argument would not have been strict: they might have answered, that circumcision was not only a command of the law, but anterior to it; whereas ver. 22 takes this answer from them; reminding them that though they regarded its sanction as derived from Moses, it was in fact older,—and tacitly approving their doing it on the Sabbath. Then the argument is, If this may be done on the Sabbath if an ordinance strictly Mosaic (which the Sabbath in its Jewish mode of observance was) may be set aside by another, Mosaic also, but more ancient, and borrowed from a more general and direct command of God (for, as Grotius observes, circumcision was older than the enactment of strict rest on the Sabbath by the law), how much more may it by a deed of mercy, a benevolent exercise of divine power, the approval of which is anterior to and deeper than all ceremonial enactment?

23.] that the law of Moses should not be broken, viz. that which (after the fathers) ordains circumcision on the eighth day.

a man every whit whole] The distinction is between circumcision, which purified only part of a man, by which he received ceremonial cleanness,—and that perfect and entire healing which the Lord bestowed on the cripple.

25–31.] HE HIMSELF IS FROM THE FATHER.

25, 26.] The inhabitants of Jerusalem know better than the multitude the mind of their rulers towards Jesus; and suspect some change in their purpose, on account of His being thus permitted to teach freely.

27.] Perhaps they refer to the idea (see quotation from Justin Martyr in note on ch. i. 31) that the Messiah would not be known until anointed by Elias, when He would suddenly come forth from obscurity.

They may allude to Isa. liii. 8.

The place of the Messiah's birth was known, ver. 42.

At all events we see here, that the Jews regarded their Messiah not as a mere man, but one to be supernaturally sent into the world.

28, 29.] cried,—in the same open undisguised manner referred to in the words “speaketh boldly” above; but it was, in the course of His teaching.

Ye both know me....] It has been questioned whether these words are to be taken ironically, interrogatively, or affirmatively. I incline to the latter view, for this reason:—obviously no very high degree of knowledge whence He was is implied, for they knew not Him that sent Him (see also ch. viii. 14, 19), and therefore could not know whence He was, in this sense. The answer is made in their own sense:—they knew that He was from Nazareth in Galilee, see ver. 41,—and probably that He was called the son of Joseph. In this sense they knew whence He was; but further than this they knew not.

and I am not come; and moreover—i. e. besides this.

The sense of true must be gathered from the context. I have not come of Myself, but He who sent Me is true—ye know Him not, but I know Him—for I came from Him, and He sent Me. The matter here impressed on them is the genuineness, the reality of the fact:—that Jesus was sent, and there was one who sent Him, though they knew Him not, and consequently knew not whence He was. The nearest English word would be real: but this would not convey the meaning perspicuously to the ordinary mind;—perhaps the A.V. true is better, provided it be explained to mean really existent, not ‘truthful.’

30.] they, namely, the rulers,—instigated by what had been above remarked by the people, vv. 25, 26. There was some secondary hindrance to their laying hands on Him,—possibly the fear of the people: but the Evangelist passes at once to the real cause;—that God’s appointed time was not yet come.

31.] The But here contrasts with what went before—nay, many&c.

32–36.] HE WILL RETURN TO THE FATHER.

32.] The wavering of the multitude appears to the Pharisees a dangerous sign: and the Sanhedrim (consisting of the Chief Priests and the Pharisees) send officers specially to lay hold on Him.

33, 34.] The omission or insertion of “unto them”? makes very little difference. The words were spoken, not to the officers only, but to all the people.

Yet a little while....] This appears to be said in reference to ver. 30, to shew them the uselessness of their attempting to lay hands on Him till His hour was come, which it soon would do.

unto him that sent me] It has been asked, ‘If Jesus thus specified where He was going, how could the Jews ask the question in ver. 35?’ but De Wette answers well, that the Jews knew not “Him that sent Him,” and therefore the saying was a dark one to them.

Ye shall seek me, and shall not find me] These words must not be pressed too much, as has been done by in any interpreters, who would make them mean ‘Ye shall seek My help and not find it? (viz. in your need, at the destruction of Jerusalem); for this would not be true even of the Jews, any one of whom might have at any time turned and looked on Him whom he had pierced, by faith,—and have been saved;—nor again must it be taken as meaning, ‘Ye shall seek to lay hands on Me, and shall not be able,’—which is vapid and unmeaning. Neither of these interpretations, nor any like them, will agree with the parallel place, ch. xiii. 33, where the same words are used to the disciples. The meaning is simply (as in reff.), ‘My bodily presence will be withdrawn from you; I shall be personally in a place inaccessible to you.’ see ch. xiii. 36.

where I am] We need not supply “then;” the present tense is used in the solemn sense of ch. i. 18, and ch. iii. 13, to signify essential truth.

Compare “ye cannot” addressed to the Jews, with “thou canst not follow me now, but thou shalt follow me afterwards,” addressed to Peter, ch. xiii. 36, and it will be evident that the Lord had their spiritual state in view: ‘Ye cannot, as ye are now, enter there.’

On the whole, see Luke xvii. 22.

35, 36.] The Jews understood not his death to be meant, but some journey which He would take in the event of their rejecting him.

Their intent in this hypothesis, that He was going to the dispersed among the Greeks, is, to convey contempt and mockery.

They do not however believe the hypothesis; but ask again, What is this saying?

37–52.] JESUS THE GIVER OF THE SPIRIT (37–39). CONSEQUENCES OF THE DISCOURSE (40–52).

37, 38.] It is not certain what is meant by this last day, which was the great day of the feast. The command, Levit. xxiii. 34, 35, was to keep the feast seven days; the first to be a solemn assembly and a feast-sabbath,—then on the eighth day another solemn assembly and a feast-sabbath:—so also ib. ver. 39. (But in Deut. xvi. 13 nothing is said of the eighth day.) In Neh. viii. 18 the feast is kept seven days, and on the eighth is a solemn assembly, “according unto the manner?” In Num. xxix. 12–38, where minute directions are given for every day of the feast, the eighth day is reckoned in, as usual. Josephus, Antt. iii, 10. 4, gives a similar account. In 2 Macc. x. 6, we read “eight days.... as in the feast of the tabernacles.” But the eighth day was not properly one of the feast days; the people ceased to dwell in the tabernacles on the seventh day. Philo says of it, that it was the solemn conclusion, not of that feast alone, but of all the feasts in the year, being the last day in the year. And though this may be pure conjecture, it is valuable, as shewing the fact the reason of which is conjectured; viz. that the eighth day was held in more than ordinary estimation. The eighth day then seems here to be meant, and the last of the feast to be popularly used, as in some of the citations above. But a difficulty attends this view. Our Lord certainly seems to allude here to the custom which prevailed during the seven days of the feast, of a priest bringing water in a golden vessel from the pool of Siloam with a jubilant procession to the temple, standing on the altar and pouring it out there, together with wine, while meantime the Hallel (Ps. cxiii—cxviii.) was sung. This practice was by some supposed—as the dwelling in tabernacles represented their life in the desert of old—to refer to the striking of the rock by Moses:—by others, to the rain, for which they then prayed, for the seed of the ensuing year:—by the elder Rabbis, to Isa. xii. 3, and the effusion of the Holy Spirit in the days of the Messiah. But it was almost universally agreed, that on the eighth day this ceremony did not take place. Now, out of this difficulty I would extract what I believe to be the right interpretation. It was the eighth day, and the pouring of water did not take place. But is therefore all allusion to the ceremony excluded? I think not: nay, I believe it is the more natural. For seven days the ceremony had been performed, and the Hallel sung. On the eighth day the Hallel was sung, but the outpouring of the water did not take place: something was missed, which took place on the other days. ‘Then Jesus stood and cried, &c.’ Was not this the most natural time? Was it not probable that He would have said it at such a time, rather even than while the ceremony itself was going on?

On the sense of our Lord’s words, see notes on ch. iv. 13, 14.

as the scripture hath said] These words must apply to the words “out of his belly shall flow, &c.,” since the words “he that believeth on me” could not form part of the citation. But we look in vain for such a text in the O.T., and an apocryphal or lost canonical book is out of the question.

I believe the citation to be intimately connected with the ceremony referred to, and that we must look for its place by consulting the passages where the flowing out of water from the temple (see above) is spoken of. The most remarkable of these is found in Ezek. xlviij, 1–12. There a river of water of life (see ver. 9 especially) flows from under the threshold of the temple. Again in Zech. xiv. 8, living waters shall go out from Jerusalem. I believe these expressions to be all to which the citation applies, and the words “out of his belly” to be the interpretation of the corresponding words in the prophecies. For the temple was symbolic (see ch. ii. 21) of the Body of the Lord; and the Spirit which dwells in and flows forth from His glorified Body, dwells in and flows forth from His people also, who are made like unto Him, Gal. iv. 6; Rom. viii. 9–11; 1 Cor. iii. 16.

39.] The difficulties raised concerning this interpretation of the saying of our pont have arisen from a misapprehension. John does not say that the words were a prophecy of what happened on the day of Pentecost; but of the Spirit, which the believers were about to receive. Their first reception of Him must not be illogically put in the place of all His indwelling and working, which are here intended. And the symbolism of the N.T. is fully satisfied by the interpretation. Granted that the water is the water of life,—what is that life but the life of the Spirit? “The mind of the Spirit, is life,” Rom. viii. 6; and again, “the Spirit, is life,” ib. ver. 10.

was not yet] The additions “given,” “upon them,” as some authorities read,—and the like, are all put in by way of explanation, to avoid a misunderstanding which no intelligent reader could fall into. Chrysostom writes, “The Evangelist says, ‘for the Holy Ghost was not yet,’ i.e. was not yet given, because Jesus was not yet glorified: meaning by the Glory, the Cross.” It is obvious that the word was cannot refer to the essential existence of the Holy Spirit, as this would be not only in flat contradiction to ch. i. 32., 33; iii. 5, 8, 34, but to the whole Old Test. in which the agency of the Spirit in the outward world is recognized even more vividly than in the N.T. The word implied is not exactly “given,” but rather “working,” or some similar word: was not,—had not come in; ‘the dispensation of the Spirit was not yet.’ glorified, through death. The glorified Body of the Lord is the temple from under whose threshold the Holy Spirit flows forth to us; see ch. i. 16; Rom. viii. 11; Col. ii. 9.

40.] the Prophet is here clearly distinguished from the Christ: see note on ch. i. 21, and Deut. xviii. 15.

41–43.] The mention of the question about Bethlehem seems to me rather to corroborate our belief that the Evangelist was well aware how the fact stood, than, as some have said, to imply that he was ignorant of it. That no more remarks are appended, is natural. St. John had one great design in writing his gospel, and does not allow it to be interfered with by explanations of matters otherwise known. Besides, we may note that the so-called “probability, that John knew nothing of the birth at Bethlehem,” reaches much further than may appear at first. If St. John knew nothing of it, and yet the Mother of the Lord lived with him, the inference must be that she knew nothing of it,—in other words, that it never happened.

The word rendered division implies a violent dissension,—some taking up His cause, some wishing to lay hands on Him.

44.] These were from among the multitude. Those who wished to lay hands on Him were, as Euthymius remarks, invisibly restrained.

45–52.] Return of the officers to the Sanhedrim; consultation on their report.

Either these officers had been watching Jesus for some days, or the present section goes back a little from what has preceded. The latter is more probable.

49.] There is no intention to pronounce a formal ban upon the followers of Jesus;—the words are merely a passionate expression of contempt.

50.] The Jews had, since the sabbath-healing, condemned Jesus, and were seeking to kill him. But in Exod. xxiii. 1, 2; Deut. 1. 16, 17, justice is commanded to be done in the way here insisted on by Nicodemus. Observe the consistency, and development, of the character of Nicodemus; and see more on ch. xix. 39.

51.] See Deut. i. 16.

52.] They taunt him with being disposed to join those (mostly Galilaeans) who had attached themselves to Jesus. Whether we read ariseth or hath arisen, the assertion is much the same: for the expression “no prophet” cannot include the Prophet, or the Messiah. It was not historically true;—for two prophets at least had arisen from Galilee: Jonah of Gathhepher and the greatest of the prophets, Elijah of Thisbe; and perhaps also Nahum and Hosea. Their contempt for Galilee made them lose sight of historical accuracy.

[This passage is to be treated very differently from the rest of the sacred text.

In the Alexandrine, Vatican, Paris, and Sinaitic MSS., the ancient Syriac Versions, and all the early fathers, it is omitted: the Cambridge MS. alone of our most ancient authorities contains it. Augustine states, that certain expunged it from their MSS., because they thought it might encourage sin. But this will not account for the very general omission of it, nor for the fact that ch. vii. 53 is included in the omitted portion. Eusebius assigns it apparently to the apocryphal “Gospel according to the Hebrews.” Other things to be noted respecting it are, (1) that in the MSS. which contain it, the number of variations is very much greater than in any equal portion of Scripture: so much is this the case, that there are in fact three separate texts, it being hardly possible to unite them into one. (2) That in the original, the style, and manner of narrating, are entirely different from those of our Evangelist. It is not merely that many words and idioms occur which John never uses, but that the whole cast and character of the passage is alien from his manner, in whichever of the existing texts we read it. (3) The great majority of those MSS. which contain the passage, place it here. Some however insert it after the end of Luke xxi., which certainly seems a more fitting place, seeing that the incidents evidently belong to the later part of our Lord’s ministry. (4) I have adopted the plan also followed in the last edition of my Greek Testament, and have printed it beneath the text of St. John, which I have allowed to go on independently of the inserted passage. See the whole matter discussed and the authorities given, in my Greek Testament.

53.] The circumstance that this verse is included in the dubious passage is remarkable, and seems to shew, as remarked above, that the doubt has not arisen from any ethical difficulty, as Augustine hints,—for then the passage would have begun with ch. viii, 1. Nor can this verse have been expunged to keep up the connexion with ch. viii. 12—for that is just as good with it,—if understood, as usually, of the members of the Sanhedrim. We must now regard it as fragmentary, forming the beginning of the account of the woman taken in adultery. It is therefore not clear to what the words apply. Taken in conjunction with what follows (see on ch. viii. 5.), I should say that they indicate some time during the last days of the Lord’s ministry, when He spent the nights on the Mount of Olives, as the date of the occurrence. Certainly the end of Luke xxi. seems to be its fitter place.

John: Chapter 8

CHAP. VIII. 1.] St. John never elsewhere mentions the Mount of Olives (not even in ch. xviii. 1): and when he introduces a new place, it is his habit to give explanations (see ch. 1. 45; xix. 13, 17). Stier, who says, “The simple answer to Alford’s remark is, that John here, and here only, mentions the Mt. of O.,” omits all allusion to this habit of the Evangelist, which alone gives weight to my remark.

Most of the many differences from the style and expression of St. John must be gathered from the notes in the Greek Test., as they cannot be made clear to the mere English reader.

3.] St. John never mentions, “the Scribes” elsewhere, but usually calls the opponents of Jesus “the Jews,” or “the rulers.
“The Scribes and Pharisees” is a very common expression in the three Gospels.

The account gives no light as to the capacity in which these Scribes and Pharisees acted when they brought the woman. Probably, only as tempting Jesus, and not in the course of any legal proceedings against her. Such would have required (Lev. xx. 10; Deut. xxii. 22) that the man also should have been put to death.

4.] The words “s ay unto him, tempting him” savour much more of the three Gospels than of John: see Mt. xvi. 1; xix. 3; xxii, 18, 35; Mk. viii. 11; x. 2; xii. 15, &c. Obviously our ch. vi. 6 is no example to the contrary. The difficulty is even greater than the last, to say, in what sense this was a temptation, to lead to His accusation. The principal solutions of it have been, (1) that the command of the law had fallen into disuse from the frequency of the crime, and to re-assert it would be contrary to the known mildness of Jesus. But what reason had any of His sayings,—who came to fulfil the Law, not to destroy it,—given them to expect such mildness in this case? And suppose He had re-asserted the law,—how could they have accused Him? (2) That some political snare was hereby laid for Him, whereby the Roman power might have been brought to bear against Him. But this does not in any way appear; for (a) the Romans certainly allowed to the Jews (by connivance) the power of putting to death according to their law,—as they did in the case of Stephen: (b) our Lord’s answer need not have been so worded as to trench upon this matter: and (c) the accusers would have been more deeply involved than Himself, if such had been the case, being by the law the prominent persons in the execution.

So that I leave the difficulty unsolved. Lucke observes: ‘Since Jesus seems to avoid every kind of decision on the question put. to Him, it follows that He found in it no reference to the great subjects of His teaching, but treated it as a purely civil or political matter, with which in His ministry He had no concern. Some kind of civil or political collision the question certainly was calculated to provoke: but from the brevity of the narration, and our want of more accurate knowledge of criminal proceedings at the time, it is impossible to lay down definitely, wherein the collision would have consisted.’

5.] I will just remark that the very fact of their questioning thus, ‘Moses commanded,... but what sayest Thou?’ belongs to the last days of the Lord’s ministry, and cannot: well be introduced chronologically where it here stands: nor does St. John anywhere introduce these questions between the law of Moses and Jesus; but the other Gospels often do.

The command here mentioned is not to be found, unless “putting to death” generally, is to be interpreted as stoning;—compare Exod. xxxi. 14; xxxv. 2, with Num. xv. 35, 36, in which the special order given by God would sanction such a view. But the Rabbis taught that every punishment of death in Scripture put absolutely, without specification, was to be understood as meaning strangulation. The passage Ezek. xvi. 38, 40 woman taken in adultery are forced and harsh. It was, say they, the early morning (ver. 2) and the sun was just rising, to which these words “the light of the world” allude,—and the walking in darkness is an allusion to the woman, whose proves nothing, or proves too much; for it is added, ‘and thrust thee through with their swords.’ I would rather suppose that from Deut. xxii. 21, 23, 24, an inference was drawn what kind of a death was intended in ver. 22, the crime being regarded as the same; “he hath humbled his neighbour’s wife.” We have similar indefiniteness in ib. ver. 25, where evidently the same punishment is meant.

6. wrote on the ground] The habit was a usual one to signify pre-occupation of mind, or intentional inattention. The addition, “as though he heard them not,” is an explanatory gloss.

It does not follow that any thing was actually written. Stier refers to Jer. xvii. 13, but perhaps without reason.

This minute circumstance speaks strongly for the authenticity of the narration.

7.] The expression, “without sin,” is not here used in the general sense, meaning, entirely sinless, nor in the strictest, ‘free from the crime of adultery’ (it can hardly be that any of the Pharisees should have held themselves sinless,—or that all should have been implicated in adultery):—but—as the word “a sinner,” in Luke vii. 37,—of the sin of uncleanness generally. Stier, who contends strongly for the genuineness of this narrative in this place, finds in ver. 46 an allusion to this saying. I cannot say that his attempts to establish a connexion with the subsequent discourse are to me at all satisfactory: I am much more inclined to think with Luthardt, that the whole arrangement and plan of our Gospel is broken by the insertion of this passage.

The Lord Jesus was not sent to be a ruler and a judge in this or that particular case of crime, see Luke xii. 14; but the Ruler and Judge of all: and His answer expresses this, by convicting them all of sin before Him. Some of our MSS. read, “the stone:” in that case, our Lord refers to the first stone, which by Deut. xvii. 7 the witnesses were to cast.

8.] Euthymius remarks that our Lord adopted this gesture, of again writing on the ground, in His goodness, to allow them to pass out without being specially observed by Him. One of our MSS. reads, ‘ ‘He wrote on the ground the sins of each of them.’ ’

9.] They had said, ver. 5, “such women”—they now perceive that they themselves were such men. There is no historical difficulty in this conduct of the Pharisees, as Olshausen finds;—they were struck by the power of the word of Christ. It was a case somewhat analogous to that in which His saying, “I am he,” struck His foes to the ground, ch. xviii. 6.

The variations of reading are very wide in the latter part of the verse. We can hardly (with some) lay any stress on “beginning at the eldest,” as indicating the natural order of conviction of sin. If the consciences of older sinners have heavier loads on them, those of younger ones are more tender.

alone, i.e. with the multitude and the disciples; the woman standing between Him and the disciples on one hand,—and the multitude on the other.

10, 11.] The question is evidently so worded as it is, “hath no man condemned thee?” for the sake of the form of the answer, “Neither do I condemn thee:” but it expresses the truth in the depth of their hearts. The Lord’s challenge to them would lead to a condemnation by comparison with themselves, if they con-demned at all: which they had not done. The words of Jesus were in fact a far deeper and more solemn testimony against the sin than could be any mere penal sentence. And in judging of them we must never forget that He who thus spoke knew the hearts,—and what was the peculiar state of this woman as to penitence. We must not apply in all cases a sentence, which requires His divine knowledge to make it a just one.]

12–59] THE CONFLICT BETWEEN JESUS AND THE JEWS, AT ITS HEIGHT

12–20] Testimony to Himself as the Light.

12.] The attempts of Bengel, Stier, and others, to establish a connexion with the passage concerning the women taken in adultery are forced and harsh. It was, say they, the early morning (ver. 2) and the sun was rising, to which these words “the light of the world” allude,—and the walking in darkness is an allusion to the woman, whose deed of darkness had been detected in the night. But not to dwell on other objections to this view,—e. g. that such an allusion to the woman would be wholly out of character after our Lord’s previous treatment of her,—how come these Pharisees, who on the hypothesis of the above Commentators are the same as those who accused the woman, to be again so soon present? Was this at all likely? We cannot escape from this difficulty with Stier, by supposing a multitude of the people to have been witnesses on both occasions: the “Pharisees” of the one must surely extend through the other, if this connexion is to be maintained.

On the other hand, this discourse comes in very well after ch. vii. 52. The last saying of Jesus (ch. vii. 37, 38) had referred to a festal usage then just over; He now adds another of the same kind. It was the custom during the first night, if not during every night, of the feast of tabernacles, to light up two large golden chandeliers in the court of the women, the light of which illuminated all Jerusalem. All that night they held a festal dance by the light.

Now granted that this was on the first night only,—what is there improbable in the supposition that our Lord—standing in the very place where the candlesticks had been or perhaps actually were—should have alluded to that practice, as He did to the outpouring of water in ch. vii. 87, 38? Surely to say in both cases, as Lücke and De Wette do, that the allusion could not have been made unless the usage took place on that day, is mere trifling. While the feast lasted, and the remembrance of the ceremonies was fresh, the allusion would be perfectly natural. See on ch. i. 9, and xi. 9, 10. See also Isa. xlvi. 6; Mal. iv. 2; and on “the light of life,” ch. i. 4, and vi. 48.

13.] See ch. v. 31. The assertion there was, that His own unsupported witness (supposing that possible) would not be trustworthy, but that His testimony was supported by, and in fact coincident with, that of the Father. The very same argument is here used, but the other side of it presented to us. He does witness of Himself, because His testimony is the testimony of the Father;—He being the Word of God, and the Father witnessing in Him.

14.] because I know, &c.—see on ch. vii. 29. This reason binds His testimony to that of the Father; for He came forth from the Father, ch. xvi. 28, and was returning to Him.

"Light," says Augustine, "demonstrates other things, and itself also... light gives testimony to itself: opens the eyes that are capable of beholding it, and is its own witness that it may be known to be light."

Then again, he only who knows can witness: and Jesus only knew this.

Notice I know whence I came:—this goes back to the "existence in the beginning" of ch. i. 1; but ye know not whence I come,—'do not recognize even My present mission.'

We must not, for a moment understand "Though I bear witness," with Grotius, "even though I Should bear witness," &c.: i.e. "even though there were no previous testimonies to me of the prophets or of 'John the Baptist?'" Our Lord's words do not suppose a case, but allows the fact.

15, 16.] There is no allusion to the foregoing history; the train of thought is altogether another.

'The end of all testimony, is the forming, or pronouncing, of judgment. Ye do this by fleshly rules, concerning me and my mission: I judge no man, i.e. it is not the object nor habit of this My mission on earth; but even if I be called on to exercise judgment, my judgment is decisive:' the word meaning not exactly true in its ordinary meaning, but rather, genuine; which a judgment can only be by being true and final; see ch. v. 30 and note.

17.] The word your seems to give this sense to the clause:—'So that if you will have the mere letter of the law, and judge my testimony by it, I will even thus satisfy you:' your thus implying, 'The law which you have made so completely your own by your kind of adherence to it.'

19.] Augustine and others imagine that the Jews thought of a human Father, in thus speaking. But surely before this, as Stier remarks, the Jews must have become too well accustomed to the words "my Father," from our Lord, to mistake their meaning. It is rather a question asked in mere scorn, by persons who know, but will not recognize, the meaning of a word uttered by another.

if ye had known me] See ch. xiv. 9 ff. and note.

20. the treasury] See Luke xxi. 1, and note on Mark xii. 41, It was in the court of the women.

his hour was not yet come] See ch. vii. 8, 30.

21–59.] Further discourses of Jesus. The Jews attempt to stone Him.—This forms the great conclusion of the series of discourses to the Jews. In it our Lord testifies more plainly still to His divine origin and sinlessness, and to the cause of their unbelief; until at last their enmity is worked up to the highest pitch, and they take up stones to cast at Him. It may be divided into four parts: (1) vv. 21–24,—announcing to them the inevitable consequence of persistence in their unbelief, on His withdrawal from them: (2) vv. 25–29,—the things which He has to say and judge of them, and the certainty of their own future recognition of Him and His truthfulness: (3) vv. 30–47,—the first springing up of faith in many of them is by Him corrected and purified from Jewish pride, and the source of such pride and unbelief detected: (4) vv. 48–58,—the accusation of the Jews in ver. 48, gives occasion to Him to set forth very plainly His own divine dignity and pre-existence.

21.] The time and place of this discourse are not definitely marked; but in all probability they were the same as before. Only no stress must be laid on the therefore as connected with ver. 20, for it is only the accustomed carrying forward by the Evangelist of the great self-manifestation of Jesus.

ye shall seek me includes the idea 'and shall not find me,' which is expressed in ch. vii. 34, 36:—ye shall continue seeking Me and shall die (perish) in your sin] This sin is not unbelief, for, ver. 24, it is clearly distinguished from that: but, 'your state of sin, unremoved, and therefore abiding on you, and proving your ruin' (see on ver. 24).

The words do not refer to the destruction of Jerusalem, but to individual perdition. In these discourses in John, the public judgment on the Jews is not prominently brought forward, as in the other Evangelists.

whither I go, ye cannot come, the consequence, not the cause (by any absolute decree) of their dying in their sins (see ch. vii. 34; xiii. 33). 'This latter sense would have required the insertion of "for" before the clause.'

22.] It is at least probable that they allude to the idea mentioned by Josephus, himself a Pharisee, in his speech at Jotapata, "As many as have laid violent hands on themselves, for their souls there is a darker Hadés reserved." Heracleon, as cited by Origen, gives this interpretation of their saying:— ‘and with the bitterest malice taunt Him with thus being about to go where they, the children of Abraham, could never come.’ De Wette thinks this too refined, and that such a meaning would, if intended, have been marked in our Lord’s answer.

23.] ‘Ye cannot come where I am going, because we both shall return thither whence we came: I to the Father from Whom (from above) I came: ye to the earth and under the earth (for that more awful meaning surely is not excluded) whence ye came’ (from beneath).

Then the term this world of course does not only imply ‘this present state of things, but involves the deeper meaning, of the origin of that state of things (see ver. 44) and its end, ver. 24.

24.] Since this (ver. 23) is the case,—if ye do not believe that I am He, the Deliverer,—and be renewed by Faith, ye shall die in your sins (plural here, as struck nearer home to their consciences, and implying individual acts of sin, the results of the carnal state).

25.] Their question follows on the words “I am from above,” ver. 23, and on the dubious elliptical expression I am (he) of the last verse. It is intended to bring out a plain answer on which their enmity might fasten.

Our Lord’s reply has been found very difficult, from reasons which can hardly be explained to the English reader. The A.V., “even the same that I said unto you from the beginning,” cannot well be right. The verb rather means to speak or discourse, than to say: the connecting particle cannot well be rendered “even:” and the word rendered “from the beginning” far more probably means “essentially,” or “in very deed.¹”

This being premised, the sentence must be rendered (literally) thus: Essentially, that which I also discourse unto you: or, In very deed, that same which I speak unto you. He is the Word—His discourses are the revelation of Himself. And there is especial propriety in this:—When Moses asked the name of God, ‘I am that which I AM,’ was the mysterious answer; the hidden essence of the yet unrevealed One could only be expressed by self-comprehension; but when God manifest in the flesh is asked the same question, it is ‘I am that which I SPEAK?’ what He reveals Himself to be, that He is (see on next verse). The above sense is maintained by De Wette, and strikingly expanded and illustrated by Stier. See an account, and discussion, of other proposed interpretations, in my Greek Test.

26.] He is, that which He speaks; and that, He has received from the Father;—He has His definite testimony to give, and His work to do: and therefore, though He has much that He could speak and judge about the Jews, He does it not, but overlooks their malice,—not answering it,—that He may go forward with the speaking unto the world, the revelation of Himself: the truth of which is all-important, and excludes less weighty things. This verse is in the closest connexion with the foregoing.

27.] They did not identify “him that sent me” with “my Father.” However improbable this may be, after the plain words “the Father that sent me,” in ver. 18, it is stated as a fact; and the Evangelist certainly would not have done so without some sure ground:—“It is probable, that they questioned one with another, ‘Who is he that sent him?’” Euthymius. There is no accounting for the ignorance of unbelief, as any minister of Christ knows by painful experience.

28.] This connects (therefore being the continuation of the foregoing, see above on ver. 21) with ver. 26, and also with ver. 27, as the words then shall ye know shew, referring to the expression in that verse, “They knew not.” On lifted up, see ch. iii. 14. ‘When ye shall have been the instruments of accomplishing that death by which He shall enter into His glory:’ for the latter idea is clearly implied here.

then shall ye know] Perhaps, in different ways:—some, by the power of the Holy Spirit poured out after the exaltation of Christ, and to their own salvation; others, by the judgments which were to follow ere long, and to their own dismay and ruin.

The interchange of do and speak is remarkable. The construction is not elliptical, so that “do and speak” should be understood in both cases; but the declaration of ver. 25 is still in the Lord’s mind, His doing being all a declaration of the Father,—a speaking forth in the widest sense. Bengel says well: “Ye shall know by fact, that which ye now believe not by word.”

29.] left me not alone, referring to the appointment of the Father by which His work was begun, and which the continued presence of the Father (he that sent me is with me) carries on through that work: see ch. xvi. 32.

because I do always....; not ‘for,’ as if what follows were merely a token that it is so. The doing always these things that please him is the very essential being of the Son, and is the cause why the Father is ever with Him.

30.] They believed on Him with a higher degree of faith than those in ch. ii. 23, inasmuch as faith wrought by hearing is higher than that by miracles; but still wanted confirming.

31.] continue in my word means to “abide in Me,” ch. xv. 7, though that perhaps is spoken of a deeper entrance into the state of union with Christ. Remaining in His word is not merely obeying His teaching, but is the inner conviction of the truth of that revelation of Himself, which is his word. ye are, for probably they had given some outward token of believing on Him, e.g. that of ranging themselves among His disciples.

32.] In opposition to the mere holding of the truth. The knowing of the truth answers to the feeding on Christ;—is the inner realization of it in the man. And in the continuing increase of this comes true freedom from all fear and error and bondage.

33.] The answerers are those that believed, not some others among the hearers, as many Commentators have maintained;—see, as a proof of this, ver. 36, addressed to these same persons. They had not yet become disciples indeed, were not yet distinct from the mass of the unbelieving; and therefore, in speaking to them, He ascribes to them the sins of their race, and addresses them as part of that race.

We be Abraham's seed: see Matt. iii. 9. The assertion that they had never been in bondage to any man was so contrary to historical truth, that we must suppose some technical meaning to have been attached to the word bondage, in which it may have been correct. ‘The words cannot be meant. of that generation only, for the word never (never yet at any time, literally) connects with their assertion that they were Abraham's seed, and generalizes it. As usual (see ch. iii. 4; iv. 11; vi. 52), they take the words of our Lord in their outward literal sense. Perhaps this was not always an unintentional misunderstanding.

34.] doeth sin, not merely “sinneth,” for that all do; but in the same sense as “work iniquity” is said, Matt. vii. 23. It implies living in the practice of sin, doing sin, as a habit: see reff. ‘he mere moral sentiment, of which this is the spiritual expression, was common among the Greek and Roman philosophers.

35.] I believe, with Stier and Bengel, the reference to be to Hagar and Ishmael, and Isaac: the bond and the free. They had spoken of themselves as the seed of Abraham. The Lord shews them that there may be, of that seed, two kinds; the son, properly so called, and the slave. The latter does not abide in the house for ever: it is not his right nor his position—‘Cast out the bondwoman and her son.’ ‘But the son abideth ever. For the application, see on following verses.

36.] Ye then, being in sin, are carnal: the sons of the bondwoman, and therefore need liberation. Now comes in the spiritual reality, into which the discourse passes from the figure. This liberation can only take place by means of Him of whom Isaac was the type—the Seed according to promise; those only who of His Spirit are born again, and after His image, are free indeed—truly sons of God, and no longer children of the bondwoman, but of the free. See by all means Gal. iv. 19 (where the subject really begins, not at ver. 21) to end, which is the best commentary on this verse. There neither is, nor can be here, any allusion either to the liberation of the sabbatical year, or to the subject of Heb. iii. 5, 6.

37.] ‘Ye are Abraham's seed, according to the flesh and the covenant: but’—and here the distinction appears—’ ye are doers of sin by seeking to kill Me, because My word (see above on ver. 31) gaineth no ground—does not work (spread, go forward,—‘ne marche pas’) in you’ (not, among you).

38.] We have the same remarkable relation between speaking and doing, as in ver. 28: except that here the doing is applied to the Jews only; speaking being used in the same comprehensive sense as there.

But notice the distinction in the restored text between I have seen with my father and ye heard from your father. The possessive pronouns my, and your, are not expressed in the original; the term father is common to both sentences, and on it the stress should be laid in reading. The speaking and doing were in each case from the father of each. But Jesus was “with God,” in a relation of abiding unity with His Father: they were sprung from their father the devil,—he was the suggester of their course, the originator of their acts. Jesus was the son, who remains in the house and sees the father's acts: they the bond-slaves, merely prescribed to, and under coercion.

The word too implies accordingly,—by the same rule.

39, 40.] There is a distinction between seed and children. The former our Lord grants that they were (ver. 37), but the latter (by implication; see below on the construction) He denies them. See Rom. ix. 6, 7, “They are not all Israel, which are of Israel: neither, because they are the seed of Abraham, are they all children.”

41. We were not born of fornication] Stier remarks, that they now let fall Abraham as their father, being convicted of unlikeness to him. They see that a spiritual paternity must be meant, and accordingly refer to God as their Father. This consideration will rule the sense of the words not born of fornication, which must therefore be spiritual also. And spiritually the children of fornication (see Hos. ii. 4) are idolaters. Ishmael cannot well be alluded to; for they would not call the relation between Abraham and Hagar one of fornication. Still less can there be, as Origen thought, any allusion on the part of the Jews to our Lord giving Himself out as being miraculously born, but being in reality that which they would insinuate: for our Lord never proclaimed this of Himself. There may possibly be a reference to the Samaritans (ver. 48), who completely answered in the spiritual sense to the children of fornication: see Deut. xxxi. 16; Isa. i. 21; Ezek. xvi. 15 ff; xx. 30 al.

42.] ‘If you were the children of God, the moral proof of such descent would be, that you would love Me, who am specially the Son of God, and who am come by the mission, and bearing the character of God.’

am come conveys the result of proceeded forth, as Meyer; who also remarks that mere sending will not exhaust the term proceeded forth, which must be taken in its deeper theological meaning, of the proceeding forth of the Eternal Son from the essence of the Father.

43.] to understand a man’s speech,—as here used, is literally to understand the idiom or dialect in which a man speaks, his manner of speech;—see Matt. xxvi. 73, where the same word is used in the original. But this of course does not here refer to the mere outward expression of the Lord’s discourses, but to the spiritual idiom in which He spoke, and which can only be spiritually understood. Then my word is the matter of those discourses, the Word itself. The connexion of the two clauses is, Why do ye not understand my speech? Because ye cannot receive, hear with the inner ear (see ch. vi. 60), that which I say. And the verification and ground of this cannot, is in the next verse.

44.] This verse is one of the most decisive testimonies for the objective personality of the devil. It is quite impossible to suppose an accommodation to Jewish views, or a metaphorical form of speech, in so solemn and direct an assertion as this.

ye like to do] The rendering of the A.V. here, as in several other places where the same expression is used in the original (compare for instance ch. v. 40; Matt. xi. 27; Luke xi. 31), is wholly inadequate and misleading. The words “Ye will do” convey to the mind of the reader a mere future, whereas the original means, your will is to do, you love, or, are inclined, to do. The expression indicates, as in ch. v. 40, the freedom of the human will, as the foundation of the condemnation of the sinner.

a murderer] The most obvious reference seems to be, to the murder of Abel by Cain:—see the Apostle’s own comment on these words, 1 John iii. 12, 15. But this itself was only a result of the introduction of death by sin, which was the work of the devil: Adam and Eve were the first whom he murdered. But then again both these were only manifestations of the fact here stated by divine omniscience respecting him: that he was a murderer.

from the beginning, the author and bringer in of that hate which is equivalent to murder, 1 John iii. 15.

The mention of murder is introduced because the Jews went about to kill Jesus; and the typical parallel of Cain and Abel is certainly hinted at in the words.

The A.V. “abode,” is ungrammatical, the original word being present in sense. Still, it is not a mere present, but a present dependent on and commencing with an implied past fact. And that fact here is, the fall of the devil, which was not an insulated act, but in which state of apostasy from the truth he standeth,—it is his condition.

the truth is objective: the truth of God:—in this he standeth not, because there is no truth (‘truthfulness,’ subjective) in him. His lie has become his very nature, and therefore he is thoroughly alien from the truth of God. He shewed this when he spoke a lie to our first mother.

of his own, not, ‘according to his character,’—but ‘out of his own resources,’ ‘treasures:’ see Matt. xii. 35.

the father thereof] i.e. either of that which is false,—the lie, implied in the word liar, which has just preceded,—or, of the liar generally. The former is not the fact,—for the devil is not the father of that which is false, but of liars, by being himself one whose very nature has become a lie. Certainly by this he has become the author, promoter, of falsehood among men; but this kind of paternity is not here in question: the object being to shew that he was the father of these lying Jews. I therefore hold the latter interpretation, with Bengel, Meyer, and Stier.

45.] And the very reason why ye do not believe Me (as contrasted with him) is, because I speak the truth;—you not being of the truth, but of him who is falsehood itself. This implies a charge of wilful striving against known and recognized truth. Euthymius fills up the context—“If I told you lies, ye would have believed me, as speaking that which belongs to your father:” see ch. v. 43.

46.] The meaning here of sin is to be strictly adhered to, and not softened into ‘error in argument,’ or ‘falsehood.’ This would be to introduce, in this most, solemn part of our Lord’s discourse, a vapid tautology. The question is an appeal to His sinlessness of life, as evident to them all,—as a pledge for His truthfulness of word: which word asserted, be it remembered, that He was sent from God. And when we recollect that He who here challenges men to convict him of sin, never could have upheld outward spotlessness merely (see Matt. xxiii. 26–28), the words amount to a declaration of His absolute sinlessness, in thought, word, and deed. Or, the connexion may be as stated by Enthymius: “If it is not because I speak the truth that ye disbelieve me, tell me, which of you convicts me of any sin done by me, on account of which you may have a pretext for disbelieving?”

If I say the truth] and if it be thence (from the impossibility of convicting me of sin) evident, that I speak the truth, why do ye not believe me? (not “believe on me,” but simply believe me, give credence to me.”)

47.] gives the answer to the previous question, and concludes the discourse with the final disproof of their assertion, ver. 41. This verse is cited 1 John iv. 6.

48.] The Jews attempt no answer, but commence reviling Him. These are now properly the Jews, in St. John’s sense,—the principal among the Jews.

a Samaritan] So they called ‘outcasts from the commonwealth of Israel:’ and so afterwards they called the Christians. They imply, that He differed from their interpretation of the law,—or perhaps, as He had convicted them of not being the genuine children of Abraham, they cast back the charge with a senseless recrimination. There may perhaps be a reference to the occurrence related in ch. iv. 5 ff.; but it has been shewn that Thou art a Samaritan is found in the Rabbis as addressed to one whose word is not to be believed.

and hast a devil] ‘As in the first clause they sundered Him from the communion of Israel, so now from that of Israel’s God.’ Stier. Or perhaps they mean the reproach more as expressing aggravated madness owing to dæmoniacal possession. The Say we not well? alludes probably to the charge twice brought against Him by the Pharisees, ‘of casting out devils by the prince of the devils.’ See Matt. ix. 34; xii. 24.

49.] The former term of reproach Jesus passes over, and mildly answers (1 Pet. ii. 23) the malicious charge of having a devil, by an appeal to his whole life and teaching (see ch. iv. 34), which was not the work of one having a devil. There is no retort of the charge in the emphatic I (it is not I but you that have a devil), as Cyril and Lücke imagine. At present the I, followed by you, both emphatic, only brings out the two parties into stronger contrast.

and ye do dishonour me] ‘Our mutual relation is not that which you allege, but this: that I honour Him that sent me, and ye, in dishonouring me, dishonour Him.’ It is the same contrast, the heiug (sprung) “of (from) God” and “not of God,” as before, ver. 47, which lies at the root.

50.] ‘Ye dishonour me;—not that I seek my own honour, but His who sent me. There is One who seeketh my honour (ch. v. 23), and will have me honoured; and who judgeth between me and you, between truth and falsehood.’

Supply the words “my glory” after seeketh, but not after judgeth.

51.] There is no pause (De Wette) between ver. 50 and this. This is the direct carrying on of the discourse, arising out of judge in the last verse, and forming a new attempt of grace to plead with them, as Lampe calls it. Ye are now children of the devil, but if ye keep My word, ye shall be rescued from that murderer.

to keep my word, as “to continue in my word,” ver. 31, is not only outward obedience, but the endurance in, and obedience of faith.

to behold death, as to taste of death, is a Hebrew way of speaking for to die, and must not be pressed to mean, ‘shall not feel (the bitterness of) death, in a temporal sense, as Stier has done. The death of the body is not reckoned as death, any more than the life of the body is life, in our Lord’s discourses; see ch. xi. 25, 26, and notes. Both words have a deeper meaning.

52, 53.] The Jews, not knowing what “death” really imports, regard the saying as a decisive proof of their surmise ver. 48. ‘Their misunderstanding (says De Wette) keeps to the well-known type (ch. iii. 4; iv. 11 ff.), but this time theocratic pride is added to carnal sensuousness:—“the Old Test. Saints died!”’

54, 55.] The argument in these verses is: ‘The same God who is the God of Abraham, is my Father;—He it is who honours (glorifies) me, and it is His word that I keep. I was promised by Him to Abraham.’

If I glorify myself, i.e. ‘glorify myself to this high designation, of being able to deliver from death.’

of whom ye say] Whom you are in the habit of calling your God—i. e. the God of Israel. A most important identification, from the mouth of our Lord Himself, of the Father, with the God of Israel in the Old Test.

55.] The sense is, of Whom ye say ‘He is our God,’ and (not “yet” nor “but”) know Him not. Then what follows sets forth the contrast between them, the pretended children of Abraham, who know not Abraham’s God (the liars), and Him who knows Him, and keeps His word, so that His word works in and by Him; yea, He is the Word of God. His allowing their denial of this state of knowledge and union would be as great a lie in Him, as their assumption of it was in them.

56.] The Lord does not deny them their outward title of children of Abraham:—it. is of spiritual things that He has been speaking, in refusing them the reality of it.

rejoiced to see] literally, rejoiced, that He should see. The intent is to shew that Abraham did in his time keep Christ’s word, viz. by a prospective realizing faith; and therefore that he, in the sense of ver. 51, had not seen death. This is expressed by and he saw it, and was glad: see below. But what is the meaning of My day? Certainly, the day of Christ’s appearance in the flesh. When that was over, and the attention was directed to another and future appearance, the word came to be used of His second coming, 1 Cor. i. 8, &c. &c. But this, as well as the day of His Cross, is out of the question here;—and the word was used by the Rabbis for the time of the Messiah’s appearance. So we have it, Luke xvii. 22, 26: but here, as there, the expression must not be limited exclusively to the former appearance. From the sense, it is evident that Abraham saw by faith and will see in fact, not the first coming only, but that which it introduces and implies, the second also. Technically however, in the form of the sentence here, the First is mainly in view. And to see that day, is to be present at, witness, it;—to have experience of it.

and he saw it, and was glad, viz. in his Paradisiacal state of bliss. And his ‘seeing of Christ’s day’ was not by revelation, but actual—the seeing of a witness. ‘Abraham then has not seen death, but lives through my word;—having believed and rejoiced in the promise of Me, whom he has now seen manifest in the flesh.’

57.] No inference can be drawn from this verse as to the age of our Lord at the time, according to the flesh. Fifty years was with the Jews the completion of manhood.

58.] As Lücke remarks, all unbiased explanation of these words must recognize in them a declaration of the essential præ-existence of Christ. All such interpretations, as ‘before Abraham became Abraham,’ i.e. father of many nations (Socinus and others), and as ‘I was predetermined, promised by God’ (Grotius and the Soeinian interpreters), are little better than dishonest quibbles. The distinction between was made (or was born) and am is important. The present, I am, expresses essential existence, see Col. i. 17, and was often used by our Lord to assert His divine Being.

In this verse the Godhead of Christ is involved; and this the Jews clearly understood, by their conduct to Him.

59.] Probably there were stones (for building) lying about in the outer court of the temple, where these words seem to have been spoken. The reason of the Jews’ doing this is given by them on a similar occasion, ch. x. 33, f or that thou, being a man, makest thyself God.

There does not appear to be any miraculous escape intended here, although certainly the assumption of one is natural under the circumstances. Jesus was probably surrounded by His disciples, and might thus hide Himself (see ch. xii. 36), and go out of the temple.

John: Chapter 9

CHAP. IX. X.] JESUS THE LIGHT, FOR THE HEALING OF THE WORLD AND THE JUDGMENT OF THE JEWS.

IX. 1–41.] Manifestation of Jesus as the Light by a miracle. Judgment of the Jews by the healed man, and by Jesus.

1.] If the concluding words of ch. viii. in the ordinary text are genuine, this would appear to have happened on the same day as the incidents there related, which is hardly likely, for we should thus have the whole history from eh. vii. 37 (omitting ch. vii. 53–viii. 12), belonging to one day, and that day a sabbath (ver. 14). And besides, the circumstances under which Jesus here appears are too usual and tranquil to have succeeded immediately to His escape in ch. viii. 59. I would rather therefore suppose that there is a break before this verse: how long, we cannot of course say. Thus we have the commencement of a new narrative here, as in ch.

vi. 1, and vii. 1.

The blind man was sitting begging (ver. 8), possibly proclaiming the fact of his having been so born; for otherwise the disciples could hardly have asked the following question. The incident may have been in the neighbourhood of the temple (Acts iii. 2): but doubtless there were other places where beggars sat, besides the temple entrances.

2.] According to Jewish ideas, every infirmity was the punishment of sin (see ver. 34). From Exod. xx. 5, and the prevailing views on the subject, the disciples may have believed that the man was visited for the sins of his parents: but how could he himself have sinned before his birth? Beza and Grotius refer the question to the doctrine of the transmigration of souls, that he may have sinned in a former state of existence; this however is disproved by the consideration adduced by Lightfoot, that the Pharisees believed that the good souls only passed into other bodies, which would exclude this case. Lightfoot, Lücke, and Meyer refer it to the possibility of sin in the womb; Tholuck to predestinated sin, punished by anticipation: De Wette to the general doctrine of the pre-existence of souls, which prevailed both among the Rabbis and Alexandrians: see Wisd. viii, 19, 20.

The question may have been asked vaguely, without any strict application of it to the circumstances, merely taking for granted that some sin must have led to the blindness, and hardly thinking of the non-applicability of one of the suppositions to this case. Or perhaps, as Stier inclines to suppose, the question may mean, ‘this man, or, for that is out of the question, his parents?’

8.] Our Lord does not of course assert the absolute sinlessness of the man, or of his parents, but answers the question with reference to the reason why it was asked. Supply therefore after his parents, “that he should be born blind.” Also after but supply “he was born blind.” In the economy of God’s Providence, his suffering had its place and aim, and this was to bring out the works of God in his being healed by the Redeemer. De Wette denies this interpretation, and refers the saying merely to the view of our Lord to bring out his own practical design, to make use of this man to prove His divine power. But see ch. xi. 4, which is strictly parallel.

4.] Connected by the words, work the works, to the former verse. There certainly seems to be some reference to its being the sabbath; see the similar expressions in ch. v. 17. From ver. 5, it seems evident that the day is the appointed course of the working of Jesus on earth, and the night the close of it (see the parallel, ch. xi. 9, 10). It is true, that, according to St. John’s universal dictum, the death of Jesus is His glorification; but the similitude here regards the effect on the world, see ver. 5; and the language of Rom. xiii. 12 is in accordance with it, as also Luke xxii. 53: John xiv. 30.

5.] This partly explains the day and night of the former verse, partly alludes to the nature of the healing about to take place. As before the raising of Lazarus (ch. xi. 25), He states that He is the Resurrection and the Life; so now, He sets forth Himself as the source of the archetypal spiritual light, of which the natural, now about to be conferred, is only a derivation and symbol.

6.] See Mark vii. 33; viii. 23. The virtue especially of the fasting saliva, in cases of disorders of the eyes, was well known to antiquity. In the accounts of the restoring of a blind man to sight attributed to Vespasian, the use of this remedy occurs. The use of clay also for healing the eyes was not unknown. No rule can be laid down which our Lord may seem to have observed, as to using, or dispensing with, the ordinary human means of healing. He Himself determined, by considerations which are hidden from us. Whatever the means used, the healing was not in them, but in Him alone. The ‘conductor’ of the miraculous power was generally the faith of the recipient: and if such means served to awaken that faith, their use would be accounted for.

7.] The reason of his being sent to Siloam is uncertain. It may have been as part of the cure,—or merely to wash off the clay. The former is most probable.

A beggar blind from his birth would know the localities sufficiently to be able to find his way; so that there is no necessity to suppose a partial restoration of sight before his going.

The situation of the fountain and pool of Siloam is very doubtful. On the subject of a recent suggestion respecting the identity of Siloam and Bethesda, see note on ch. v. 1.

which is interpreted] The reason of this derivation being stated has been much doubted. Some consider the words to have been inserted as an early gloss of some allegorical interpreter. But there is no external authority for this supposition, Euthymius says, “I suppose, on account of the blind man being then sent thither;” and Meyer takes this view. But it would be a violent transfer,—of the name of the fountain, to the man who was sent thither. I should rather regard the healing virtue imparted to the water to be denoted, as symbolical of Him who was sent, and whose mission it was to give the healing water of life.

came, i.e. came back;—apparently to his own house, by the next verse.

8.] had beheld, rather than “had seen.” The choice of the word implies attention and habit.

11.] The word rendered received sight is literally, recovered sight. Sight being natural to men, the deprivation of it is regarded as a loss, and the reception of it, though never enjoyed before, as a recovery.

13.] The neighbours appear to have brought him to the Pharisees, out of hostility to Jesus (see ver. 12); and ver. 14 alleges the reason of this:—or perhaps from fear of the sentence alluded to in ver. 22. The “Pharisees” here may have been the court presiding over the synagogue, or one of the lesser local courts of Sanhedrim. Lücke inclines to think they were an assembly of the great Sanhedrim, whom St. John sometimes names the Pharisees:—see ch. vii. 47; xi. 46: Meyer regards them as some formal section of the Pharisees, as a body: but were there such sections?

14.] Lightfoot cites from a Rabbinical treatise on the Sabbath, that it was forbidden even to put saliva on the eyelids. But the making the clay, as a servile work, seems to be here prominently mentioned. Meyer notices,—and it is interesting, as a minute mark of accuracy,—that the man, in verses 11 and 15, only relates what he himself, as being blind, had felt: he says nothing of the spittle.

15.] again refers back to ver. 10. The enquiry was official, as addressed to the chief witness in the matter. We cannot hence infer that no one else was present at the healing but Jesus and His disciples.

16. some..... others] Among the latter party would be such as Nicodemus, Joseph, [Gamaliel?]; who probably (Joseph certainly, Luke xxiii. 51) at last withdrew, and left the majority to carry out their hate against Jesus.

17.] The question is but one, What sayest thou of him, that he hath opened (i. e. for having opened) thine eyes? The stress is on thou. ‘What hast thou to say to it, seeing we are divided on the matter?’ Both parties are anxious to have the man’s own view to corroborate theirs. a a prophet, and therefore, from God.

18.] The hostile party (the Jews,—those in authority among these variously-minded Pharisees) disappointed at his direct testimony against them, betake themselves to sifting more closely the evidence of the fact. The parents are summoned as witnesses.

19.] The question is three-fold, and in strict legal formality: ‘Is this your son? Was he born blind? How is it that he now sees?’

21.] The pronouns in the latter part of the verse are emphatic: who hath opened his eyes we know not: ask him: he is of age: he shall speak for himself.

22.] It is not said when this resolution was come to; and this also speaks for an interval between ch. vii., viii., and this incident. It could hardly have been before the council at the conclusion of ch. vii.

put out of the synagogue] Probably the first of the three stages of Jewish excommunication,—the being shut out from the synagogue and household for thirty days, but without any anathema. The other two, the repetition of the above, accompanied by a curse,—and final exclusion,—would be too harsh, and perhaps were not in use so early. Trench regards the resolution not as a token that the Sanhedrim had pronounced Him a false Christ, but as shewing that they forbade a private man to anticipate their decision on this point by confessing Him. But perhaps this may be questioned.

24. Give glory to God] not, ‘Give God the praise’ (A. V.) i.e. ‘the glory of thy healing:’ for the Pharisees want to overawe the man by their authority, and make him deny the miracle altogether. The words are a form of adjuration (see Josh. vii. 19), to tell the truth, q.d. ‘Remember that you are in God’s presence, and speak as unto Him.’

25.] The man shrewdly evades the inference and states again the simple fact. We must render his words at the end of the verse, not “whereas I WAS blind, now I see,” as A.V.: but being a blind man, or as in text, though a blind man, I now see. The shrewd and naïve disposition of the man furnishes the key to the ænigmatical expression. He puts it to them as the problem, the fact of which he knows for certain but the reason of which it was for them to solve, that he, whom they all knew as a blind man, now saw.

26.] They perhaps are trying to shake his evidence,—or to make him state something which should bring out some stronger violation of the sabbath.

27.] did not hear must be in its special meaning of ‘did not heed it.’ The latter clause is of course ironical: ‘you seem so anxious to hear particulars about Him, that you must surely be intending to become His disciples.’

29.] God hath spoken, not spoke, is important: it betokens the abiding finality of God's revelation to Moses, in their estimation: as if they said, "We stand by God's revelation to Moses." from whence,—'whether from God or not.' But see ch. vii. 27, 28, where a very different reason is given for disbelieving Him to be the Christ. 30.] Why herein is, &c. This well expresses the sense of the original. Tho man takes what their words had conceded, and proceeds to argue upon it. ye is emphatic: you, whose business it is to know such things.

31.] He expresses a general popular conviction, that one who could do these things, must be a pious man: and (ver. 32) very eminently so, since this miracle was unprecedented.

33.] nothing, i.e.—nothing of this kind, much less such a thing as this.

34.] See on ver. 2.

altogether,—deeply and entirely, as thy infirmity proved. 'They forget that the two charges,—one that he had never been born blind, and so was an impostor,—the other, that he bore the mark of God's anger in a blindness that reached back to his birth,—will not agree together.' Trench.

they cast him out: i.e. they excommunicated him: see on ver. 22. It cannot merely mean, 'they cast him out of the court', as many, both ancient and modern, interpret it: see next verse, where it would hardly be stated that Jesus heard of it, unless it had been some public formal act.

35.] 'Art thou he, whom our rulers have severely treated on account of thy belief in Jesus whom men call Christ? Dost thou, even after this treatment, believe on the Son of God?' Lampe.

36.] This Son of God surpasses his present comprehension: and therefore, true to his simple and guileless character, he asks for further information about Him.

37.] These words, Thou hast both seen him, &c. serve to remind the man of the benefit he has received, and to awaken in him the liveliest gratitude: compare Luke ii. 30. They do not refer to a former seeing, when he was healed: this was the first time that he had seen his Benefactor.

39.] There seems to be an interval between the last verse and this, and the narrative appears to be taken up again at some subsequent time when this miracle became again the subject of discourse. The blind man had recovered sight in two senses,—bodily and spiritual. And as our Lord always treats of the spiritual as paramount, including the bodily, so here He proceeds to speak of spiritual sight.

'We are all, according to the spirit of nature, no better than persons born blind; and to know and confess this our blindness, is our first and only true sight, out of which the grace of the Lord can afterwards bring about a complete receiving of sight. The "becoming blind," on the other hand, is partly an ironical expression for remaining blind, but partly also has a real meaning in the increasing darkening and hardening which takes place through unbelief.' Stier.

they which see here answer to "they which are whole," and "the righteous" of Matt. ix. 12, 13; see note there.

40.] They ask the question, not understanding the words of Jesus in a bodily sense, but well aware of their meaning, and scornfully rejoicing, 'Are then we meant by these blind, we, the leaders of the people?"

41.] The distinction in expression between the two clauses must be carefully borne in mind. Our Lord is referring primarily to the unbelief of the Pharisees and their rejection of Him. And He says, 'If ye were really blind (not, 'confessed yourself s blind'), ye would not have incurred guilt; but now ye say, "We see;" ye believe ye have the light, and boast that ye know and use the light; and therefore your guilt abideth, remaineth on you.' Observe there is a middle clause understood, between 'ye would never have incurred guilt,' and 'your guilt remaineth;' and that is, 'ye have incurred guilt,' which makes it necessary to take the words, ye say, we see, as in a certain sense implying that they really did see: viz. 'by the Scriptures being committed to you, by God's grace, which ought to have led you to faith in me.'

John: Chapter 10

CHAP. X. 1-21.] Of true and false shepherds, Jesus the good Shepherd. This discourse is connected with the pre-ceeding miracle; and the conduct of the Pharisees towards the man who had been blind seems to have given occasion to this description of false shepherds, which again introduces the testimony of Jesus to Him-self as the true Shepherd. So that, as Meyer remarks, the paragraph should begin at ch. ix. 35. The more we study carefully this wonderful Gospel, the more we shall see that the idea of this close connexion is never to be summarily dismissed as imaginary, and that our Evangelist never passes without notice to an entirely different and disjointed occurrence or discourse. See on the whole subject of the parable, Jer. xxiii. 1-4; Ezek. xxxiv.; Zech. xi. 4-17.

These opening verses (to ver. 5) set forth the distinction between false and true shepherds. Then (vv. 7, 8, 9) He brings in Himself, as the door, by which both shepherds and sheep enter the fold. Then (ver. 10) He returns to the imagery of the first verses, and sets forth Himself as THE GOOD SHEPHERD; and the rest (to ver. 18) is occupied with the results and distinctions dependent on that fact.

1. the sheepfold] The word thus rendered is described by the old writers as meaning a space walled round and open to the air: just answering, except in this being a per-manent enclosure, to our term fold. This fold is the visible Church of God, primarily, as His people Israel were His peculiar fold; the possibility of there being other folds has been supposed to be alluded to in ver. 16: but see note there.

The terms in this first part are general, and apply to all leaders of God's people; in ver. 1, to those who enter that office without having come in by the door (i. e. Christ, in the large sense, in which the Old Testament faithful looked to and trusted in Him, as the covenant promise of Israel's God); and in ver. 2 to those who do enter this way; and whosoever does is the shepherd of the sheep (not emphatic—not, "the Good Shepherd," as below, ver. 11, but here it is merely predicated of one who thus enters, that he is the shepherd of that particular fold: it is the attribute of a shep-herd thus to enter).

The sheep, throughout this parable, are not the mingled multitude of good and bad; but the real sheep, the faithful, who are, what all in the fold should be. The false sheep (goats, Matt. xxv. 32) do not appear; for it is not the character of the flock, but that of the shepherd, and the relation between him and his sheep, which is here prominent.

3.] Perhaps the porter (doorkeeper): it is the same word as that used in ch. xviii. 16, Mark xiii. 31) should not be too much pressed as significant; but certainly the Holy Spirit is especially He who opens the door to the shepherds; see frequent uses of this symbolism by the Apostles, Acts xiv. 27; 1 Cor. xvi. 9; 2 Cor. ii. 12; Col. iv. 3;—and instances of the Holy Spirit shutting the door, Acts xvi. 6, 7.

the sheep hear his voice] The voice of every such true shepherd is heard (heeded, understood) by the sheep (generally): and he calls by name his own sheep, that portion of the great flock entrusted to him, and leads them out to pasture, as his office is.

This distinction between the sheep and his own sheep has given rise to mistakes, from not observing that shepherd here is still in its mere general sense, and not spiritually applied until ver. 7, or rather ver. 11 above. It has been imagined that Christ is here spoken of, and that therefore these two descriptions of sheep must be different, and so the whole exposition has been confused. Even Stier has fallen into this mistake.

4.] When he has led forth to pasture all his sheep (there shall not an hoof be left behind), he goes before them (see "The Land and the Book," p. 202, where there is an interesting description of this following the shepherd); in his teaching pointing out the way to them; they follow him, because they know his voice; his words and teaching are familiar to them. But observe that the expression here becomes again more general; not his own sheep, but the sheep as in ver. 8. The sheep know the voice of every true shepherd.

5.] So that the stranger is not the shepherd of another section of the flock, but an alien: the robber of ver. 1. Meyer takes it as merely meaning a stranger, one who is not their shepherd: but this hardly seems strong enough for the context.

6.] The word here rendered in the A.V. "parable" is not exactly what is commonly socalled: not properly a parable: but rather a parabolic allegory. The parable requires narrative to set it forth; and St. John relates no such. The right word here would be allegory. The original term, in its etymology, signifies, any saying diverging from the common way of speech. We have other examples in ch. xv. 1 ff. and in Matt. ix. 37, 38.

7.] What follows is not so much an exposition, as an expansion of the allegory.

The key to this verse is the right understanding of what went before. Bear in mind, that verses 1-5 were spoken of shepherds in general. But these shepherds themselves go into and out of the fold by the same door as the sheep: and Christ is that door; THE DOOR OF THE SHEEP: the one door both for sheep and shepherds, into the fold, into God's Church, to the Father.

8.] I believe that the right sense of these words, All that ever came before me, has not been apprehended by any of the Commentators.

First, they can only be honestly understood of time; all who came before me (not, ‘without regard to me,’ nor ‘passing by me as the door,’ nor ‘instead of me:’ nor ‘pressing before me,’ (ch. v. 7,) which would have been “come,” not “came:? nor “before taking the trouble to find me, the door:” nor any other of the numerous shifts which have been adopted).

What pretended teachers then came before Christ? Remember the connexion of these discourses. He has taught the Jews that Abraham and the prophets entered by Him (ch. viii. 56): but He has set in strong opposition to Himself and His, them (these Jews) and their father, the Devil (ib. ver. 44). He was, as Milton has it, ‘the first thief who clomb into God’s fold;’ and all his followers are here spoken of inclusively in the language of the allegory, as coming in by and with him. His was the first attempt to lead human nature, before Christ came; before the series of dispensations of grace began, in which pasture and life is offered to man by Him.

Meyer understands the Pharisees, &c. who taught the people before Christ appeared as the Door of the sheep: but this does not seem to reach the depth of the requirements of the saying.

are, not were, because their essential nature as belonging to and being of the evil one is set forth, and the inclusion of these present Pharisees in their ranks.

but the sheep did not hear them...] This of course cannot be understood absolutely,—‘the sheep never for one moment listened to them;’ but, did not listen to them in the sense of becoming their disciples eventually. So that the fall of our first Parents would be no exception to this; whom of all men we must conclude, by the continuing grace and mercy of God to them after that fall, to have been of His real sheep. And since then, the same is true; however the sheep may for a while listen to these false shepherds, they do not hear them, so as to follow them. Those who do, belong not to the true flock.

9.] expands and fixes ver. 7. “There is no entrance for salvation into the church but by Me, whether it be for shepherd, or for sheep.” Erasmus. See Numb. xxvii. 16, 17. The sequel of the verse shaws that this combined meaning is the true one. Meyer, who understands it all of shepherds alone, finds great difficulty in the interpretation of the latter words: “shall go in and out before the sheep, and find pasture for them,” is certainly a forced meaning.

10.] the gracious intent of the Saviour in this;—to give life, and in abundance. This verse forms the transition from Him as the Door, to Him as the Shepherd. He is here set in opposition to the thief (see on ver. 8), and thus insensibly passes into the place of a shepherd, who has been hitherto thus opposed. Then the words, that they might have life, bind on to those in the last verse, “shall find pasture”—and that they might have it more abundantly: as if it had been said, not merely as a door to pass through, but actively, abundantly, to bestow abundance of life. We are thus prepared for—

11.] the announcement of Himself as THE GOOD SHEPHERD—the great antagonist of the robber—the pattern and Head of all good shepherds, as he of all thieves and robbers: the Messiah, in His best known and most loving office: cf. Ezek. xxxiv. 11–16, 23; xxxvii. 24, and Isa. xl. 11. But He is the good Shepherd in this verse, as having most eminently the qualities of a good shepherd, one of which is to lay down His life for the sheep. These words here are not so much a prophecy, as a declaration, implying however that which ver. 15 asserts explicitly.

12.] The imagery is here again somewhat changed. The false shepherds are here compared to hirelings, i.e. those who serve merely for gain; the hireling who fulfils the character implied by the word. The idea is brought in by the words “layeth down his life for the sheep,” which introduce the thought of a time of danger, when the true and false shepherds are distinguished.

the wolf] The purposes of this wolf are the same as those of the thief in ver. 10, and in the allegory he is the same;—the great Foe of the sheep of Christ. Lücke and De Wette deny this, and hold ‘any enemies of the theocracy’ to be meant;—but no deep view of the parable will be content with this,—see Matt. vii. 15, where the “ravelling wolves” are “false prophets,” the “thieves and robbers” of ver. 8;—and their chief and father would therefore be the wolf, just as our Lord is the Shepherd.

14, 15.] The knowledge of His sheep here spoken of is more than the mere knowing by name; it is a knowledge corresponding to the Father’s knowledge of Him;—i. e. entire, perfect, all-comprehensive: and their knowledge of Him corresponds to His of the Father,—i. e. is intimate, direct, and personal: both being bound together by holy and inseparable Love.

Beware of rendering the former clause of ver. 15, as in A.V., as an independent sentence, “As my Father knoweth me, even so know I the Father:” it is merely the sequel to ver. 14, and should stand as in margin, as the Father knoweth me and I know the Father.

the sheep] i.e. for those my sheep—not, for all; that, however true, is not the point brought out here: the Lord lays down His life strictly and properly, and in the depths of the divine counsel, for those who are his sheep.

16.] The other sheep are the Gentiles;—not the dispersion of the Jews, who were already in God’s fold. By these wonderful words, as by those in Acts xviii. 10, and by the conclusion of Matt. xxv. (see notes there), our Lord shews that, dark and miserable as the Gentile world was, He had sheep even there. Observe they are not in other folds, but scattered; see ch. xi. 52. Cf. also Eph. ii. 14 ff.

I must bring....] i.e. in the purpose and covenant of the Father. The Lord speaks of His bringing them, and their hearing His voice: meaning that His servants in His name and by His power would accomplish this work. Admirably illustrative of the converse method of speaking, which He employs Matt. xxv. 40, 45. The one flock, is remarkable—not one fold, as characteristically, but erroneously rendered in A.V.:—not ONE FOLD, but ONE FLOCK: no one exclusive enclosure of an outward church, but one flock, all knowing the one Shepherd and known of Him. On one shepherd, compare Heb. xiii. 20.

17.] The speaking in allegories is now over, and He speaks plainly,—My Father. In this wonderful verse lies the mystery of the love of the Father for the Son;—because the Son has condescended to the work of humiliation, and to earn the crown through the cross (see Phil. ii. 8, 9). The that here is strictly of the ultimate purpose, in order that. ‘Without this purpose in view,’ says Stier, ‘the Death of Christ would neither be lawful nor possible.’

18.] The truth of this voluntary rendering up was shewn by His whole sufferings, from the falling of His enemies to the ground in the garden (ch. xviii. 6) to His last words, I commend (render up) my Spirit, Luke xxiii. 46 (see note there). His resurrection also was eminently His own work, by virtue of the Spirit of the Father dwelling in and filling Him: the power in both these cases being the commandment, appointment, ordinance of the Father, from the counsel of whose will the whole mediatorial office of Christ sprung: see ch. xii. 49.

19–21.] The concluding words bind this discourse to the miracle of ch. ix., though not necessarily in immediate connexion.

22–39.] Discourse at the Feast of Dedication. It may be, that Jesus remained at, or in the neighborhood of, Jerusalem during the interval (two months) between the Feast of Tabernacles and that of the Dedication. Had He returned to Galilee, we should have expected some mention of it. Still, by the words in Jerusalem, it would seem as if a fresh period and a new visit began; for why should such a specification be made, if the narrative proceeded continuously? See on Luke ix. 51 ff.

22] This feast had become usual since the time when Judas Maccabæus purified the temple from the profanations of Antiochus. It was held on Chislev (December) 25, and seven following days: see 1 Mace. iv. 41–59; 2 Mace. x. 1–8.

it was winter] The notice is inserted to explain to Gentile readers the reason of our Lord’s walking in Solomon’s portico. This latter was on the east side of the temple, called also by Josephus, “the Eastern porch.” He says that it was an original work of Solomon, which had remained from the former temple.

25.] He had often told them, in unmistakeable descriptions of Himself: see ch. v. 19; viii. 36, 56, 58, &c. &c. But the great reference here is to His works, as in ver. 37.

26.] The difficulty of the words as I said unto you is considerable warrant for their genuineness: and they come much more naturally with this than with the following verse. I believe them to refer more to the whole allegory, than to any explicit saying of this kind; and this is shewn to my mind by the following words in ver. 27:—the link between the two, ‘but ye hear not my voice,’ being understood. This was an obvious deduction from the allegory, and thus it might be said, “as I said unto you.” This reference to the allegory some two months after it was spoken, has been used by the rationalists as an argument against the authenticity of the narrative. But, as Meyer observes, it in reality implies that the conflict with the Jewish authorities is here again taken up after that interval, during which it had not broken out.

27–29.] This leads to a further description of these sheep. The form of the sentence is a climax; rising through the words “I give” and “out of my hand,” to “my Father which hath given them me,” and “out of my Father’s hand.” Then the apparent diversity of the two expressions, “out of my hand” and “out of my Father’s hand,” gives occasion to the assertion in ver. 30, that Christ and the Father are ONE: one in essence primarily, but therefore also one in working, and POWER, and in will. Notice, one is neuter in gender, not masculine: the Father and the Son are not personally one, but essentially. That the Jews understood our Lord’s words to assert this essential unity, is plain from the next verse.

31.] i.e. as having spoken blasphemy, Levit. xxiv. 10 ff.

32.] See Mark vii. 37.

from my Father, because (cf. vv. 37, 38) He Himself proceeded forth from the Father, and the Father wrought in Him.

have I shewed you,—because they were part of the manifestation of Himself as the Son of God.

33.] makest thyself God is equivalent to “making himself equal to God,” ch. v. 18.

34.] The word law here is in its widest acceptation,—the whole Old Testament, as ch. xii. 34; xv. 25. The Psalm (lxxxii.) is directed against the injustice and tyranny of judges (not, the Gentile rulers of the world, nor, the angels) in Israel. And in the Psalm reference is made by “I have said” to previous places of Scripture where judges are so called, viz. Exod. xxi. 6; xxii. 9, 28.

35.] unto whom the word of God came, i.e. to whom. God (in those passages) spoke.

The expression, and the scripture cannot be broken (which is not a parenthesis, but constructionally part of the sentence, depending on if), implies, ‘and if you cannot explain this expression away,—if it cannot mean nothing,—for it rests on the testimony of God’s word’—

36.] The argument is from the greater to the less. If in any sense they could be called gods,—how much more properly He, whom&c. They were only officially so called, only called gods—but He, the only One, sealed and hallowed by the Father, and sent into the world (the time referred to, in sanctified and sent, is that of the Incarnation), is essentially God, inasmuch as He is the Son of God. The deeper aim of this argument is, to shew them that the idea of man and God being one, was not alien from their Old Testament spirit, but set forth there in types and shadows of Him, the real God-Man. Observe ye, set in emphatic contrast to the authority of Scripture,—as “he whom the Father sanctified”... is to “them to whom the word of God came” above.

37, 38.] Having put the charge of blasphemy aside, our Lord again has recourse to the testimony of His works, at which He hinted ver. 32; and here, to their character, as admitted by them in ver. 33. ‘If they bear not the character of the Father, believe Me not: but if they do (which even yourselves admit), though ye may hate and disbelieve Me, recognize the unquestionable testimony of the works;—that ye may be led on to the higher faith of the unity of Myself and the Father.’

that ye may perceive and know] The former of these is the introductory act, the latter the abiding state, of the knowledge spoken of. See further in the notes in my Greek Test.

39.] The attempt to stone Him seems to have been abandoned, but (see ch. vii. 30) they tried again to take Him into custody: and, as before, He (miraculously?) withdrew Him-self from them.

40–42.] Jesus departs to Bethany be-yond Jordan, and is there believed on by many.

40.] On Bethany beyond Jor-dan, see ch. i. 28 and note.

41.] The locality reminds them of John and his testimony. The remark seems to have a double tendency:—to relate their now confirmed persuasion, that though John did not fulfil their expectations by shewing a sign or working miracles, yet he was a true prophet, and really, as he professed, the forerunner of this Person, who in consequence must be, what John had declared Him to be, the Messiah. And (ver. 42) the result followed;—many believed on Him. “The word John repeated ver. 42, belongs to the simplicity of the speech, which is reproduced literally as spoken, and expresses the honour paid by the people to the holy man whose memory still lived among them.” Meyer.

John: Chapter 11

CHAP. XI., XII.] JESUS, DELIVERED TO DEATH, THE RESURRECTION, AND THE LIFE, AND THE JUDGMENT.

XI. 1–44.] The raising of Lazarus. On the omission of this, the chief of our Lord’s miracles, by the three other Evangelists, see the Introduction, ch. i. §v. 1.

1. But] This conjunction here is not merely a word of passage to another subject, but expresses a contrast to the sojourn in Peræa, and thus conveys the reason why our Lord’s retirement (see ch. x. 40) was broken in upon.

Bethany is designated as ‘the village of Martha and Mary,’ to distinguish it from that Bethany be-yond Jordan, which has just been alluded to (not named, perhaps to avoid the con-fusion), ch. x. 40. Mary and Martha are mentioned as already well known from the current apostolic teaching (see Introduction, chap. v. §ii, 11).

2.] Another reference to a fact which, as our Lord prophesied, was known wherever the Gospel was preached. This reference containing, as it does, the expression the Lord or our Lord, implying, ‘as we all well know,’—is a striking illustration of that prophecy. St. John himself relates the occurrence, ch. xii. 3, being necessary for the course of his narrative.

3.] The message (see vv. 21, 32) evidently was to request the Lord to come and heal him: and implies that the sickness was of a dangerous kind.

4.] The only right understanding of this answer, and our Lord's whole proceeding here is,—that He knew and foresaw all from the first,—as well the termination of Lazarus's sickness and his being raised again, as the part which this miracle would bear in bringing about the close of His own ministry.

is not unto death] Its result as regards Lazarus will not be death (see Matt. ix. 24 and parallel places, and notes):—but (see ch. ii. 11; ix. 3) it has a higher purpose,—the glory of God;—the glorification, by its means, of the Son of God. And this glorification—how was it accomplished? By this miracle leading to His death,—which in St. John's diction is so frequently implied in the word glorification. It need hardly be remarked, with Olshausen and Trench, that the glorifying of the Son of God in Lazarus himself is subordinately implied. Men are not mere tools, but temples, of God.

It is doubtful whether these words were the answer sent back to the sisters, or were said to the disciples. In either case, they evidently carried a double meaning, as again those in ver. 11.

5.] explains he whom thou lovest in ver. 3.

6.] therefore connects with ver. 4, 'Having then said this,—although He loved, &c., He abode,' &c.

In all probability Lazarus was dead, when He spoke the words ver. 4;—or at all events before the messenger returned.

7.] The question, why our Lord did not go immediately on receiving the message, is not to be answered by any secondary reasons, such as the trial of the faith of those concerned, or the pressing nature of His own ministry in Peraea,—but by referring back to ver. 4,—because, for the glory of God, He would have the miracle happen as it did and no otherwise.

9, 10.] Our Lord's answer is first general, vv. 9, 10,—then particular, ver. 11.

Are there not twelve hours in the day?] See on ch. ix. 4, where the same thought is expressed. But here it is carried further, — 'I have a fixed time during which to work, appointed me by my Father; during that time I fear no danger, I walk in His light, even as the traveller in the light of this world by day: and (by inference) ye too are safe, walking in this light, which light to you is Myself,—walking with Me: —whosoever walks without this light,—without Me,—without the light of the divine purpose illumining the path of duty, stumbles,—because he has no light in him.' In him, for 'the light of the body is the eye,' and the light must be in us in order to guide us. Shut it out by blinding the eyes, and we are in darkness. So too of spiritual light.

The twelve-hour division of the day was common among the Jews by this time, being probably borrowed from Babylon. As the day in Palestine varied in length from 14h. 12m. in summer to 9h. 48m. in winter, these hours must also have varied considerably in length at the different seasons. I may remark that this verse refutes the fancy of Townson and others, that St. John adopts the so-called Asiatic method of reckoning time: see on ch. i. 40; iv. 6, al.

11.] The special reason for going, which the disciples appear not to have borne in mind, having probably supposed from ver. 4 that Lazarus would recover.

Our friend] Bengel notices, with what condescension our Lord shares the friendship with His disciples. And the word our gives a reason why they should go too.

This term, is fallen asleep, might have recalled to three at least of the disciples that other saying, Matt. ix. 24. But the former expression, "is not unto death," had not been understood,—and that error ruled in their minds.

12. if he is fallen asleep] They evidently understand the sleep announced to them by Jesus as a physical fact, and a token of a favourable crisis, and think that his recovery will probably be the result.

15.] "Notice that Jesus rejoices not over the sad event itself, but that He was not there, which might prove salutary to the disciples' faith." Meyer. The intent, [that] ye may believe, is not to be taken as the great end of the miracle (expressed in ver. 4), but the end as regarded them.

nevertheless breaks off the discourse, implying that enough had been said.

16.] The meaning of Thomas, in the Aramaic, which was the dialect of the country, is the same as that of the Latin Didymus, viz. a twin.

The remark means, Let us also go (with our Master), that we may die with him (not, with Lazarus, as Grot.). This is in exact accord with the character of Thomas, as shewn in ch. xiv. 5; xx. 25;—ever ready to take the dark view, but deeply attached to his Lord.

17.] Jesus remained two days after the receipt of the message: one day the journey would occupy: so that Lazarus must have died on the day of the messenger's being sent, and have been buried that evening, according to Jewish custom: see ver. 39, and Acts v. 6–10.

18.] The geographical notice is given, to account for the occurrence detailed in the next verse. A furlong or stadium, was $\frac{1}{8}$ of a Roman mile. Meyer remarks, that the use of the past tense, was nigh, does not necessarily imply that the places no longer existed when the Apostle wrote, but may arise from the word occurring in context: with a history which is past. But seeing that St. John alone uses this form of designation (compare ch. xviii. 1; xix. 41), and that he probably wrote after the destruction of Jerusalem, it is more natural (as Meyer himself confesses) to explain the past tense by his regarding Jerusalem and its neighbourhood as laid waste at the time when he published his Gospel.

19.] Lightfoot gives an account of the ceremonies practised during the thirty days of mourning.

20.] The behaviour of the two sisters is quite in accordance with their character, Luke x. 38–42: and thus we have a most interesting point of connexion between two gospels so widely various in their contents and character. Stier thinks, as also Trench, that Mary did not hear of the approach of Jesus, and that we must not bring the characters to bear on this case. But this is at least questionable.

21.] This saying has evidently been the leading thought of the four days since their brother's death. Mary repeats it, ver. 32.

22.] She seems to express some expectation of the raising of her brother; but it is too great a thing for her to venture to mention:—possibly she had not dared to form the thought fully, but had some vague feeling after help, such as she knew He would give. I can hardly see, as some have done, an unworthy spirit in the form of her expression, in ver. 22. It was said in the simplicity of her faith, which, it is true, was not yet a fully ripened faith: but it differs little from our Lord's own words, ver. 41. The repetition of the word God is to be noticed, as expressive of her faith in the unity of purpose and action between Jesus and God.

23.] I believe these words of our Lord to contain no allusion to the immediate restoration of Lazarus; but to be designedly used to lead on to the requisite faith in her mind.

24.] She understands the words rightly, but gently repels the insufficient comfort of his ultimate resurrection.

25, 26.] These words, as Stier observes, are the central point of the history; the great testimony to Himself, of which the subsequent miracle is the proof. The intention of the saying seems to have been, to awaken in Martha the faith that He could raise her brother from the dead, in its highest and proper form. This He does by announcing Himself (it is the expressed emphatic personal pronoun,—I, and no other...) as ‘THE RESURRECTION’ (meaning,—that resurrection in the last day shall be only by my Power, and therefore I can raise now as well), and more than that, THE LIFE ITSELF: so that he that believeth in me (i. e. Lazarus, in her mind), even though he have died, shall live; and he that liveth (physically;—‘is not yet dead’) and believeth in me, shall not die for evermore: i.e. ‘faith in Me is the source of life, both here and hereafter; and those who have it, have Life, so that they shall NEVER DIE;’ physical death being overlooked and disregarded, in comparison with that which is really and only death. The word liveth must be (against Lampe, Olshausen, and Stier) taken of physical life, for it stands opposed to though he have died.

he that believeth in me is the subject of both clauses; in the former it is said that he “though he have died, shall live:” in the second, that he “living and believing, shall never die.” Olshausen’s remark, that living and dying, in the second clause, must both be physical, if one is, is wrong; the antithesis consisting, in both clauses, in the reciprocation of the two senses, physical and spiritual; and serving in the latter clause, as a key hereafter to the condition of Lazarus, when raised from the dead.

There can hardly be any reference in ver. 26 to the state of the living faithful at the Lord’s coming (1 Cor. xv. 51),—for although the Apostle there, speaking of believers primarily and especially, uses the first person,—the saying would be equally true of unbelievers, on whose bodies the change from the corruptible to the incorruptible will equally pass, and of whom the “shall never die” here would be equally true,—whereas the saying is one setting forth an exclusive privilege of the man that liveth and believeth on me. Besides, such an interpretation would set aside all reference to Lazarus, or to present circumstances.

27.] Her confession, though embracing the great central point of the truth in the last verse, does not enter fully into it. Nor does she (ver. 40) seem to have adequately apprehended its meaning. "That He spoke great things about Himself, she knew: but in what sense He spoke them, she did not know: and therefore when asked one thing, she replies another." Euthymius.

I—emphatic: I for my part: and the word believe is in the original in the perfect tense, "have believed and continue to believe:" i.e. 'have convinced myself, and firmly believe.'

28.] Her calling her sister is characteristic of one who (as in Luke x. 40) had not been much habituated herself to listen to his instructions, but knew this to be the delight of Mary. Besides this, she evidently has hopes raised, though of a very faint and indefinite kind.

secretly] "Lest the Jews who were present should know it, and should perhaps give information against Him to those who were conspiring against His life." Euthymius. This fear was realized (ver. 46).

calleth thee] This is not recorded. Stier thinks that the Lord had not actually asked for her, but that Martha sees such an especial fitness for her hearing in the words of vv. 25, 26, that she uses this expression. But is it not somewhat too plainly asserted, to mean only calling by inference? Surely, we must regard Martha's words as proving it to have been a fact.

31.] to weep there—as is the custom even now in the East: see an affecting account in Lamartine's Pilgrimage to the Holy Land, English translation, vol. ii. pp. 76–78.

32.] The words of Mary are fewer, and her action more impassioned, than those of her sister: she was perhaps interrupted by the arrival of the Jews: cf. ver. 33.

33.] In explaining this difficult verse, two things must be borne in mind: (1) that the word rendered by the A.V. "groaned" can bear but one meaning,—the expression of indignation and rebuke, not of sorrow. This has been here acknowledged by all the expositors who have paid any attention to the usage of the word. (2) That both from the words, "When Jesus saw her weeping," &c.,—from the expression "he troubled himself," and from ver. 35,—the feeling in the Lord was clearly one of rising sympathy, which vented itself at last in tears. These two things being premised, I think the meaning to be, that Jesus, with the tears of sympathy already rising and overcoming His speech, checked them, so as to be able to speak the words following. I would understand the words as expressing the temporary check given to the flow of His tears,—the effort used to utter the following question. And I would thus divest the self-restraint of all stoical and unworthy character, and consider it as merely physical, requiring indeed an act of the will, and a self-troubling,—a complication of feeling,—but implying no deliberate disapproval of the rising emotion, which indeed immediately after is suffered to prevail. What minister has not, when burying the dead in the midst of a weeping family, felt the emotion and made the effort here described? And surely this was one of the things in which He was made like unto His brethren. 'Thus Bengel: "Jesus for the present austere repressed his tears, and presently, ver. 38, they broke forth. So much the greater was their power, when they were shed."

Meyer's explanation deserves mention; that our Lord was indignant at seeing the Jews, His bitter enemies, mingling their hypocritical tears with the true ones of the bereaved sister. But, not to say how unworthy this seems of the Person and occasion, the explanation will find no place in ver. 38: for surely the question of the Jews in ver. 37 is not enough to justify it. Still perhaps, any contribution to the solution of this difficult word is not to be summarily rejected.

Indignation over unbelief, and sin, and death the fruit of sin, doubtless lay in the background; but to see it in the words (with Olsh., Stier, and Trench) seems unnatural.

troubled himself is understood by Meyer, and perhaps rightly, as describing an outward motion of the body,—He shuddered: and so Euthymius, "He trembled, as is usual with those who are thus affected." Cyril's comment is to the same effect: that it was His divinity, rebuking, and in conflict with, His human feelings, which caused His frame to shudder.

35–38.] It is probable that the second set of Jews (ver. 37) spoke with a scoffing and hostile purport: for St. John seldom uses but as a mere copula, but generally as expressing a contrast: see vv. 46, 49, 51.

It is (as Trench remarks) a point of accuracy in the narrative, that these dwellers in Jerusalem should refer to a miracle so well known among themselves, rather than to the former raisings of the dead in Galilee, of which they probably may have heard, but naturally would not thoroughly believe on rumour only. Again, of raising Lazarus none of them seem to have thought, only of preventing his death.

This second being greatly moved of our Lord I would refer to the same reason as the first. “He wept, as allowing nature to manifest herself:.... there again he rebukes the affections.” Euthymius. Only he assigns a didactic purpose, to teach us moderation in our tears; I should rather believe the self-restraint to have been exercised as a preparation for what followed.

The caves were generally horizontal, natural or artificial,—with recesses in the sides, where the bodies were laid. There is no necessity here for supposing the entrance to have been otherwise than horizontal, as the word cave would lead us to believe. Graves were of both kinds: we have the vertically sunk mentioned Luke xi. 44. Compare Isa. xxii. 16; 2 Chron. xvi. 14; 2 Kings xxiii. 16.

Probably, from this circumstance, as from ‘the Jews’ coming to condole,—and the costly ointment (ch. xii. 3),—the family was wealthy.

39.] The corpse had not been embalmed, but merely ‘wrapped in linen clothes with spices, as the manner of the Jews is to bury,’—see ch. xix. 40, and ver. 44 below. The expression, the sister of him that was dead, as Meyer remarks, notes the natural horror of the sister’s heart at what was about to be done.

There is no reason to avoid the assumption of the plain fact (see below) stated in by this time he stinketh. I cannot see that any monstrous character (as asserted by Olshausen and Trench) is given to the miracle by it; any more than such a character can be predicated of restoring the withered hand. In fact, the very act of death is the beginning of decomposition. I have no hesitation, with almost all the ancient, and many of the best modern Commentators, in assuming her words as expressing a fact, and indeed with Stier, believing them to be spoken not as a supposition, but as a (sensible) fact. The entrances to these vaults were not built up,—merely defended, by a stone being rolled to them, from the jackals and beasts. of prey.

40.] I can hardly think she supposed merely that Jesus desired to look on the face of the dead;—she expected something was about to be done, but in her anxiety for decorum (Luke x. 40) she was willing to avoid the consequence of opening the cave, This feeling Jesus here rebukes, by referring her to the plain duty of simple faith, insisted on by Him before (in verses 25, 26? or in some other teaching?) as the condition of beholding the glory of God (not merely in the event about to follow,—for that was seen by many who did not believe,—but in a deeper sense,—that of the unfolding of the Resurrection and the Life in the personal being).

41, 42.] In the filial relation of the Lord Jesus to the Father, all power is given to Him: the Son can do nothing of Himself:—and during His humiliation on earth, these acts of power were done by Him, not by that glory of His own which He had laid aside, but by the mighty working of the Father in Him, and in answer to His prayer: the difference between Him and us in this respect being, that His prayer was always heard,—even (Heb. v. 7) that in Gethsemane. And this, Thou hast heard me, He states here for the benefit of the standers-by, that they might know the truth of His repeated assertions of His mission from the Father. At the same time He guards this, ver. 42, from future misconstruction, as though He had no more power than men who pray, by I knew that Thou hearest me always;—‘because Thou and I are One.’

When He prayed, does not appear. Probably in Peræa, before the declaration in ver. 4.

43.] Some suppose that the revivification had taken place before the previous thanksgiving of our Lord,—and that these words were merely a summoning forth. But this is highly improbable. The comparison of ch. v. 25, 28, which are analogically applicable, makes it clear that they who have heard, shall live, is the physical, as well as the spiritual order of things.

To cry out, shout aloud, was not His wont; see Matt. xii. 19. This cry signified that greater one, which all shall hear, ch. v. 28.

44.] The word rendered grave-clothes is explained to mean a sort of band, of rush or tow, used to swathe infants, and to bind up the dead. It does not appear whether the bands were wound about each limb, as in the Egyptian mummies, so as merely to impede motion—or were loosely wrapped round both feet and both hands, so as to hinder any free movement altogether. The latter seems most probable, and has been supposed by many. Basil speaks of the bound man coming forth from the sepulchre, as a miracle in a miracle: and ancient pictures represent Lazarus gliding forth from the tomb, not stepping; which apparently is right.

The napkin, or handkerchief, appears to have tied up his chin.

let him go, probably, to his home.

45–57.] THE DEATH OF JESUS THE LIFE OF THE WORLD. Consequences of the miracle. Meeting of the Sanhedrim; and final determination, on the prophetic intimation of the High Priest, to put Jesus to death. He retires to Ephraim.

46.] We must take care rightly to understand this. In the last verse, it is not many of the Jews which had come, but many of the Jews, viz. those which had come, “many... to wit, those that came.” All these believed on Him (see a similar case in ch. viii. 30 ff). Then, some of them, viz. of those which had come, and believed, went, &c. The but (see on ver. 37) certainly shows that this was done with a hostile intent: not in doubt as to the miracle, any more than in the case of the blind man, ch. ix., but with a view to stir up the rulers yet more against Him. This Evangelist is very simple, and at the same time very consistent, in his use of particles: almost throughout his Gospel the great subject, the manifestation of the Glory of Christ, is carried onward by then, or therefore, whereas but as generally prefaces the development of the antagonist manifestation of hatred and rejection of Him. If it seem strange that this hostile step should be taken by persons who believed on Jesus, we at least find in the passage above cited, ch. vii. 30 ff

48.] They evidently regarded the result of ‘all believing on Him,’ as likely to be, that Me would be set up as king: which would soon bring about the ruin here mentioned. Augustine understands it differently: that, all men being persuaded by Him to peaceful lives, they would have no one to join them in revolt against the Romans; but this seems forced: for no coming of the Romans would in that ease be provoked.

our place] not, the temple (the holy place, Acts vi. 13), but our place, as in reff.: i.e. our local habitation, and our national existence. Both these literally came to pass.

Whether this fear was earnestly expressed, or only as a covert for their enmity, does not appear. The word our is emphatic, detecting the real cause of their anxiety. Respecting this man’s pretensions, they do not pretend to decide: all they know is that if he is to go on thus, THEIR standing is gone.

49–52.] The counsel is given in subtlety, and was intended by Caiaphas in the sense of political expediency only. But it pleased God to make him, as High Priest, the special though involuntary organ of the Holy Spirit, and thus to utter by him a prophecy of the death of Christ and its effects. That this is the only sense to be given, appears from the consideration that the whole of verses 51, 52 cannot for a moment be supposed to have been in the mind of Caiaphas; and to divide it, and suppose the latter part to be the addition of the Evangelist, is quite unjustifiable.

high priest that year] repeated again, ch. xviii. 13. He was High Priest during the whole Procuratorship of Pontius Pilate, eleven years. In the words that year, there is no intimation conveyed that the High Priesthood was changed every year, which it was not: but we must understand the words as directing attention to ‘that (remarkable) year,’ without any reference to time past or to come. THAT YEAR of great events had Caiaphas as its High Priest. See on ver. 57.

Ye know nothing at all] Probably various methods of action had been suggested.

Observe people here, the usual term for the chosen people, and then nation, when it is regarded as a nation among the nations: compare also ver. 52.

not of himself] i.e. not merely of himself, but under the influence of the Spirit, who caused him to utter words, of the full meaning of which he had no conception.

being high priest... he prophesied] There certainly was a belief, probably arising originally from the use of the Urim and Thummim, that the High Priest, and indeed every priest, had some knowledge of dreams and utterance of prophecy. Philo the Jew says, “A true priest is ipso facto a prophet.” That this belief existed, y account for the expression here; however does not confirm it in all cases, but asserts the fact that the Spirit in this case made use of him as High Priest, for this purpose. This confirms the above view of the words that year, here again repeated. See on ver. 49.

that Jesus was about to die...] the purport (unknown to himself) of his prophecy. And the term the nation, is guarded from misunderstanding by what follows.

the children of God] are those who are called by the same name in ch. i. 12, the “ordained to eternal life” of Acts xiii. 48 (where see note), among all nations; compare ch. x. 16.

53.] The decision, to put Him to death, is understood: and from that day they plotted that they might slay Him (not, how they might slay Him).

54.] Observe the word Jews here, used as designating the official body. He was still among Jews at Ephraim. This city is mentioned 2 Chron. xiii. 19 in connexion with Bethel, as also by Josephus. It was near to the wilderness, i.e. to the desert of Judah. Its situation is at present unknown. Robinson supposes it to be the same with Ophrah (Josh. xviii. 23: 1 Sam. xiii. 17: not Judg. vi. 11, 24; viii. 27) and Ephron of the O.T. (2 Chron. xiii. 19), and the modern et-Taiyibeh, twenty Roman miles from Jerusalem.

55.] The words, the country, do not mean that country, spoken of in the last verse, but, the country generally. They went up thus early, that they might have time to purify themselves from any Levitical uncleanness, that they might be able to keep the P: over; see Num. ix. 10: 2 Chron. xxx. 17: Acts xxi. 24, 26; xxiv. 18.

57.] The verse depends on the insertion or omission of the “both” before “the chief priests.” Without it, the verse is merely an explanation of the people’s question, which was asked in consequence of the order having been issued by the chief priests&c.: with it, it would mean, ‘And besides, the chief priests’&c.; i.e. ‘not only did the people question, but’&c. The former is in my view most probable; for the command having been given would satisfactorily account for the questioning, and not be stated merely as co-ordinate with it.

CHAP. XII. 1–36.] PROPHETIC ANTICIPATIONS OF THE LORD’ S GLORIFICATION BY DEATH.

1–11.] The arrival, and anointing, at Bethany, according to the ordinary sense of the words, six days before the passover, was on the eighth of the month Nisan, if the passover was on the fourteenth. That day was a Sabbath; but this makes no difficulty, as we know not from what point our Lord came, or whether He arrived at the commencement of the Sabbath, i.e. sunset,—or a little after, on Friday evening, from Jericho.

2. they made him a supper] It is not said who. It was, from Matthew and Mark, in the house of Simon the leper. From Lazarus being there, and Martha serving, he may have been a near relative of theirs. See notes on Matthew.

Lazarus is mentioned throughout the incident, as forming an element in the unfolding of the hatred of the Jews which issued in the Lord’s death: notice the climax, from mere connecting mention in ver. 1, then nearer connexion in ver. 2,—to his being the cause of the Jews flocking to Bethany in ver. 9,—and the joint object with Jesus of the enmity of the chief priests, in ver. 10.

3.] On spike-nard, see note on Mark.

anointed the feet of Jesus] His head, according to Matthew and Mark. See note on Luke vii. 38.

4.] For Judas, we have “His disciples,” Matthew,—“some,” merely, Mark. See note on Matthew, ver. 8.

The clause, which was about to betray him, is not inserted, nor are any such notices in St. John, without significance. It has a material connexion with the narrative in hand. Only one with thoughts alien from Jesus could have originated such a murmur. And on the other hand, it may well be, as some have supposed, that by the rebuke of the Lord on this occasion, the traitorous scheme of Judas, long hidden in his inmost soul, may have been stimulated to immediate action.

5. three hundred pence] Common (with the slight difference of the insertion of “more than”) to our narrative, and Mark. The sum is about 9*l.* 16*s.* of our money.

6.] The word rendered bag originally signified a box in which to keep the reeds, or tongues, of wind instruments:—thus, generally, any kind of pouch, or money-chest.

took away] The word may have the sense given in the A.V., “bare,” “carried:” but it seems hardly possible, with St. John use of the same word in the original in ch. xx. 15 before us (“if thou have borne him hence”), altogether to deny that the sense of carrying off, i.e. purloining, may be here intended. Of this sense we have examples; see my Gr. Test. And so this place was interpreted by Origen, Theophylact, and others.

7.] See note on Matt. xxvi. 12. To suppose that the ointment was a remnant from that used at the burial of Lazarus, is not only fanciful, but at variance with the character of the deed as apparent in the narrative. The common reading, “against the day of my burying she hath kept this,” seems to be an adaptation to Mark xiv. 8, in order to escape from the difficulty of understanding how she could keep for His burial, what she poured out now. Meyer understands the words to apply to the remnant: but Luthardt rightly observes, that the history clearly excludes the idea of a remnant. I understand the words, which, like all our Lord’s anticipatory expressions, have something enigmatical in them, of her whole act, regarded as a thing past, but spoken of in the abstract, as to be allowed or disallowed: Let her keep it for the day of my burial: not meaning a future day or act, but the present one, as involving that future one.

8.] See note on Mark, vv. 7, 8.

9 ff.] Remember here, as elsewhere in John, the Jews are not the people, but the rulers, and persons of repute: the representatives of the Jewish opposition to Jesus.

10.] consulted, not, ‘came to a (formal) resolution,’ but were in the mind,—had an intention: see Acts v. 33; xv. 37.

The chief priests, named here and in ch. xi. 57, were of the sect of the Sadducees; and therefore disbelieved the fact of the raising of Lazarus; only viewing him as one whom it would be desirable to put out of the way, as an object of popular attention in connexion with Jesus.

11. were going away (to Bethany)]. The word contains in it the sense of mere falling away, viz. from under the hand and power of the chief priests.

12–19.] The triumphal entry into Jerusalem. Matt. xxi. 1–17. Mark xi. 1–11. Luke xix. 29–44. On the chronology, see note on Matt. xxi. 1. 12.] On the next day, ie. on the Sunday;—see on ver. 1.

when they heard] From the multitude who had returned from Bethany, ver. 9. The order of the narrative seems to require that these people should have visited Bethany late on the Sabbath, after sunset, and the anointing.

13. the branches of the palm trees] The articles shew that the palm trees were on the spot: or perhaps that the custom was usual at such festivities.

14–16.] The Evangelist seems to suppose his readers already acquainted with the circumstances of the triumphal entry, and therefore relates it thus compendiously.

The having found does not involve any discrepancy with the three Evangelists, but is a compendious term, implying their details.

15.] The prophecy is more fully cited by St. Matthew.

16.] Important, as shewing that this, and probably other prophetic citations under similar circumstances, were the effect of the light poured into the minds of the Apostles by the Holy Spirit after the Ascension.

they had done these things unto him] viz. the going out to meet Him, strewing clothes and branches in the way, and shouting ‘Hosanna’ before Him: also perhaps, the setting Him on the ass, implied in the concise narrative. Notice the thrice-repeated these things each time signifying “this which was written by the prophet,” “the above citation.”

17.] The testimony which they bore is given in Luke xix. 37, 38.

18.] I see no necessity for supposing this multitude distinct from that in the last verse. We have had no account of any multitude coming from Bethany with Him,—nor does this narrative imply it: and surely the multitude in the two verses must mean the same persons. The also here does not imply another multitude, but And on this account the multitude also went out to meet Him: i.e. their coming out to meet Him and their testimony on the Mount of Olives, had one and the same cause, —the raising of Lazarus.

19.] The term gone away can hardly be altogether without allusion to the fact, or likelihood, of apostasy from Judaism. It is used to signify entire devotion to Him whithersoever He might lead them: and thus implies escape and alienation from themselves.

20–36.] FUTURE SPREAD OF THE KINGDOM OF GOD AMONG GENTILES FROM THE DEATH OF JESUS. Some Greeks desire to see Jesus. His discourse thereupon.

20.] These Greeks were not Grecian Jews,—who would not have been so called: but Gentiles, ‘proselytes of the gate,’ who were in the habit of coming up to the feast; see ch. vii. 35, and note: also Acts viii. 27.

21.] For what reason Philip was selected, it is impossible to say. ‘The form of his name is Greek, and may imply some connexion with Grecian Jews, who may have been friends or relatives of these Greeks. If they were from the neighbourhood of Bethsaida, they would indeed have been familiar with the person of Jesus:—but what they here requested was evidently a private interview.

22.] Andrew (ch. i. 45) was of the same city as Philip: and this reason of Philip conferring with him is perhaps implied in the words which was from Bethsaida of Galilee. Bengel remarks on this touch of nature: “when associated with his companion, he makes bold, and does it.”

23.] Did these Greeks see (i. e. speak with) Jesus or not? Certainly not, if I understand His discourse rightly. But they may have been present, at, and have understood it. The substance of His answer (made to Philip and Andrew, not to the Greeks) is, that the time was now come for His glorification, which should draw all nations to Him:—but that glorification must be accomplished by His Death. The very appearance of these Greeks is to Him a token that His glorification is at hand. Stier strikingly says, “These men from the West at the end of the Life of Jesus, set forth the same as the Magi from the East at its beginning:—but they come to the Cross of the King, as those to His cradle.” The rejection of the Jews for their unbelief is the secondary subject, and is commented on by the Evangelist, vv. 37–43.

24.] Meyer thinks, that our Lord begins His declaration with the double asseveration verily, verily, on account of the slowness of the mind of the disciples to receive the announcements of His Death. But St. John always uses “verily, verily.” The grain of wheat perishes, and is not apparent (as the seeds of dicotyledonous plants are) in the new plant:—see 1 Cor. xv. 36. The saying is more than a mere parabolic similitude: the divine Will, which has fixed the law of the springing up of the wheat-corn, has also determined the law of the glorification of the Son of Man, and the one in analogy with the other: i.e. both through Death. The symbolism here lies at the root of that in ch. vi., where Christ is the BREAD of life.

it abideth by itself alone, with its life uncommunicated, lived only within its own limits, and not passing on.

25.] And this same divine Law prevails for the disciples, as well as for their Master:—see Matt. x. 39 and note. But the saying here proclaims more plainly its true extent,—by its immediate connexion with ver. 24 and by the words, unto life eternal.

The word soul (or, life, but here better, soul) is not really in a double sense: as the wheat-corn retains its identity, though it die, so the soul: so that the two senses are, in their depth, but one. Notice, that the soul involves the life in both cases, and must not be taken in the present acceptance of that term.

26.] Connexion:—The ministering to, or intimate union with, Christ (the position of Philip and Andrew and the rest, and that into which these Greeks seemed desirous to enter) implies following Him,—and that, through tribulation to glory.

where I am] The word refers, not to the place of our Lord at that moment, but to His essential, true place, i.e. (ch. xvii. 24) in the glory of the Father.

him will the Father honour] By glorifying him in My glorification, ch. xvii. 24.

27.] Bengel observes that the horror of death and the ardour of obedience were in conflict. And to express both these together in human speech was impossible: therefore our Lord exclaims, What shall I say?

The following words, Father, save me from this hour, must not be taken interrogatively, as if our Lord were doubting whether to say them or not: for thus the whole sense is destroyed, besides the sentiment being most unworthy of Him who uttered it. The prayer is a veritable prayer; and answers to the prophetic Messianic prayers in the Psalms, which thus run—‘My soul is troubled; Lord, help me’ (Ps. lxxix. 1; xl. 12, 13; xxv. 17; vi. 3, 4, al.); and to that prayer afterwards in Gethsemane, Matt. xxvi. 39.

for this cause] The misunderstanding of these words has principally led to the erroneous punctuation just noticed. for this cause really means, “in order that I may be saved from this hour”: i.e. ‘I came to this hour for this very purpose,—that I might be saved from this hour.’ i.e. ‘the going into, and exhausting this hour, this cup, is the very appointed way of my glorification.’ This interpretation does not, as Luthardt says, fall if we give up the interrogative punctuation of the previous clause, but holds equally good when that is relinquished. The other interpretation of the words for this cause, that of Meyer and others, is, that Thy Name may be glorified. But surely this is to do violence to the order of thought. This particular does not come in till the next clause, and cannot without an improbable transposition be drawn into this.

28.] The glorifying the Name of the Father can only take place by the glorification of the Son; and this latter only by His death: so that this is the ‘ardour of obedience’ triumphant.

a voice from heaven] This ‘voice’ can no otherwise be understood, than as a plain articulate sound, miraculously spoken, heard by all, and variously interpreted. So all the ancients, and the best of the modern expositors. On the saying of the crowd (ver. 29) has been built the erroneous and unworthy notion, that it was only thunder, but understood by the Lord and the disciples to mean as here stated.

I have glorified it] In the manifestation hitherto made of the Son of God, imperfect as it was (see Matt. xvi. 16, 17); in all Old Testament type and prophecy; in Creation; and indeed before the world was made.

The word again here implies no mere repetition, but an intensification, of the glorification a yet once more: and this time fully and finally.

29.] Some heard words, but did not apprehend their meaning; others a sound, but no words. I should rather believe this difference to have been proportioned to each man's inner relation to Christ, than fortuitous.

30.] The voice had been heard by those, who did not apprehend its meaning, as thunder. But the words, this voice, could not by any possibility have been said to them, if it had only thundered.

Our Lord does not say that the assurance was not made for His sake:—He had prayed, and His prayer had been answered:—but that it had not been thus outwardly expressed for His, but for their sake. This is likewise true in the case of all testimonies to Him; and especially of those two other voices from heaven,—at His Baptism and His Transfiguration.

Those addressed in the words, for your sakes, are the whole multitude, not merely the disciples. All heard, and all might have understood the voice: see ch. xi. 42.

31.] All this is a comment on the declaration, that the hour was come, ver. 23: and now a different side of the subject is taken up, and one having immediate reference to the occasion: viz. the drawing of the Gentile world to Him.

Now... now] He speaks of Himself as having actually entered the hour of His passion, and views the result as already come.

the judgment of this world is not, as Chrysostom, Augustine, and others think, ‘the deliverance of this world from the devil;’—nor, ‘decision concerning this world,’ who is to possess it (Bengel):—but (see ch. xvi. 11) judgment, properly so called, the work of the Spirit who was to come, on the world, of which it is said that “the whole world lieth in wickedness (the wicked one),” 1 John v. 19.

the prince of this world] The “prince of the age” of the Jews, Satan, the “god of this world” of 2 Cor. iv. 4: see also Eph. ii. 2; vi. 12. Observe it is shall be cast out, not “is cast out,” because the casting out shall be gradual, as the drawing in the next verse. But after the death of Christ the casting out began, and its firstfruits were, the coming in of the Gentiles into the Church.

32. if I be lifted up] See the references. Here there is more perhaps implied than in either of those places: viz. the Death, with all its consequences. The Saviour crucified, is in fact the Saviour glorified; so that the exalting to God's right hand is set forth by that uplifting on the Cross. There is a fine touch of pathos, corresponding to the feeling of ver. 27, in the words, if I be lifted up. The Lord Jesus, though knowing that the lifting up would really take place, yet in the weakness of His humanity, puts Himself into this seeming doubt, ‘if is so to be:’ cf. Matt. xxvi. 42. All missed by the shallow and unscholarlike rendering “when I shall be lifted up,” which the original will not bear.

will draw all men unto me] By the diffusion of the Spirit in the Church: manifested in the preaching of the Word meditately, and the pleading of the Spirit immediately. Before the glorification of Christ, the Father drew men to the Son (see ch. vi. 44 and note), but now the Son Himself to Himself. Then it was “no man can come except the Father draw him:” now the Son draws all. And, to Himself, as thus uplifted, thus exalted;—the great object of Faith: see ch. xi. 52.

33. by what manner of death] The words here can hardly point to more than the external circumstances of His death. Some have found in the expression the whole consequences and character of His Death; but see ch. xviii. 32.

St. John does not say that this was all that the “lifting up” meant, but that it was its first and obvious reference.

34.] In such passages as Ps. lxxxix. 36, and perhaps cx. 4; Dan. vii. 13, 14.

the law must be taken in its wider sense, as including the whole of the Old Testament: see ch. x. 34.

The actual words, the Son of man must be lifted up, had not been on this occasion used by Jesus; but in His discourse with Nicodemus, ch. iii. 14, and perhaps in other parts of His teaching which have not been recorded.

who is this Son of man?] They thought some other Son of Man, not the Messiah, was meant; because this lifting up (which they saw implied taking away) was inapplicable to their idea of the Messiah, usually known as the Son of Man.

35.] He does not answer them, but enjoins them to make use of the time of His presence yet left them.

while does not exactly express the sense of the conjunction in the original: it is rather, walk, according to your present state of privilege in possessing the Light: which indeed can only be done while it is with you.

the light, i.e. ‘Myself:’—see ch. vii. 33; viii. 12; ix. 4, 5.

This reference to the light is an easy transition from their question, if, as above supposed, Ps. lxxxix. 36 was alluded to: “His (David’s) seed shall endure for ever, and his throne as the sun before Me.”

Walk] i.e. make use of the Light, do your work in it, and by it.

knoweth not whither he goeth] Has no guide nor security, no principle to lead him.

36.] It is by believing on the Light, that men become sons of Light: see ch. i. 12.

Our Lord probably went on this occasion to Bethany, Luke xxi. 37.

37–50.] FINAL JUDGMENT ON THE UNBELIEF OF THE JEWS.

37–43.] The Evangelist’s judgment on their unbelief (37–41), and their half-belief (42, 43). I do not regard these verses as forming the conclusion to the narrative of the public ministry of the Lord, on account of vv. 44–50 (where see note): but doubtless the approaching close of that ministry gives occasion to them, and is the time to which they refer.

37. they believed not] i.e. the generality did not;—they did not, as a people: see ver. 42.

38.] On the words that the saying of Esaias might be fulfilled see note Matt. i. 22: beware of understanding them to mean merely “so that the saying of Esaias was fulfilled,” which the original will not bear.

39.] For this cause refers to the last verse, and because sets forth the reason more in detail: see ch. v. 16: 1 John iii. 1: Matt. xxiv. 44.

they could not believe] i.e. it was otherwise ordained in the divine counsels. No attempt to escape this meaning (as “they would not believe,” Chrysostom and others) will agree with the prophecy cited ver. 40. But the inability, as thus stated, is coincident with the fullest freedom of the human will: compare “Ye have no mind to come to Me,” ch. v. 40. Then, in what follows, a more special ground is alleged why they could not believe:—see above.

40.] The prophecy is freely cited, after neither the Hebrew nor the LXX, which is followed in Matt. xiii, 14 f. What God bids the prophet do, is here described as done, and by Himself: which is obviously implied in the Hebrew text.

41. because he saw] “This apocalyptic vision was the occasion of that prophecy.” Meyer.

his glory: i.e. the glory of Christ. The Evangelist is giving his judgment,—having (Luke xxiv. 45) had his understanding opened to understand the Scriptures,—that the passage in Isaiah is spoken of Christ. And indeed, strictly considered, the glory which Isaiah saw could only be that of the Son, Who is the brightness (shining forth) of the glory of the Father, Whom no eye hath seen. The last clause is independent of “because,” and contains another assertion,—and he spake concerning Him.

42] For example, Nicodemus, Joseph, and others like them. On the putting out of the synagogue, see note, ch. ix. 22.

43.] is a reference to ch. v. 44.

44–50.] Proof of the guilt of their unbelief, from the words of Jesus Himself. It was by the older Commentators generally thought, that these verses formed part of some other discourse delivered at this period. But this is improbable, from no occasion being specified,—from ver. 36,—and from the form and contents of the passage, and its reference to the foregoing remarks of the Evangelist. I take it—with almost all modern Commentators—to be a continuation of those remarks substantiating them by the testimony of the Lord Himself. The words are taken mostly, but not altogether, from discourses already given in this Gospel.

44, 45.] On the close connexion with the Father, see ch. v. 24, 38; viii, 19, 42; xiv. 10. The words are in logical sequence to ver. 41, in which the Evangelist has said that the glory of Jehovah and His glory were the same.

46.] See ver. 35; ch. viii. 12; ix. 5. The may not remain in the darkness here implies that all are originally in darkness,—as the same kind of expression in ch. iii. 36.

47.] See ch. iii. 17; v. 45; viii. 15.

48.] See ch. iii. 18, also v. 45 ff., and Heb. iv. 12.

49.] See ch. v. 30; vii. 16, 17, 28, 29; viii, 26, 28, 38. On the Father giving the Son commandment, ch. x. 18.

There does not appear to be any real difference here, though many have been suggested, between the words say and speak.

50.] See ch. vi. 63 (and note), 68.

his commandment is, results in, not as a means merely, but in its accomplishment and expansion, eternal life: see ch. iii. 15; v. 24; vi. 40.

Thus all who do not believe are without excuse;—because Jesus is not come, and speaks not, of Himself, but of the Father, se will and commandment respecting Him is, that He should be and give, Life to all. They who reject Him, reject Life, and (ch. iii. 19) prefer darkness to Light.

John: Chapter 13

CHAP. XIII.—XX.] Third division of the Gospel. JESUS AND HIS OWN.

XIII.—XVII.] HIS LOVE, AND THE FAITH OF HIS OWN.

XIII. 1–30.] HIS LOVE IN HUMILIATION.

1–11. His condescension in washing their feet. On the chronological difficulties, see notes on Matt. xxvi. 17, and ch. xviii. 28.

There can be no reasonable doubt that this meal was the same as that at which the Lord's Supper was instituted, as related in the three Evangelists. The narrative proceeds without any break until ch. xvii. 26, after which our Lord and the disciples go to Gethsemane.

1. before the feast of the passover] How long, is not said: but probably, a very short time;—not more than one day at the most;—see ch. xviii. 28 and note. The words belong to the whole narrative following, not to knowing or having loved.

knowing] The view with which our Lord washed His disciples' feet, is shewn by the repetition of this word in verses 1, 3, and by the mention of His love for His disciples. The connexion is:—‘Jesus loved His own even to the end (of His life in the flesh), and gave them in the washing of their feet a proof of His love; and to this act He was induced by the knowledge that He must soon leave this world; and although this knowledge was united (ver. 3) with the highest consciousness of His divine mission and speedy glorification, yet this latter did not prevent Him from giving this proof of His self-humiliating love’ (De Wette).

his own which were in the world] See ch. xvii. 11.

2.] The sense is not, as A.V., ‘supper being ended,’ for (ver. 12) He reclined again, and in ver. 26, the supper is still going on;—but, supper having begun or having been served. See this shewn from the usage of the original in my Greek Test.

The verse may be otherwise read and rendered, The devil having by this time suggested (to Judas) that Judas Iscariot the son of Simon (i. e. that he should betray Him). Judas had before this covenanted with the Sanhedrim to betray Him, Matt. xxvi. 14 and parallel places, which must here be meant by the devil having put it into his heart:—the thorough self-abandonment to Satan which led to the actual deed, being designated ver. 27.

St. Luke (xxii. 3) expres: the steps of his treasonable purpose otherwise,—meaning the same. The fact is here stated, to enhance the love which Jesus shewed in the following action.

3.] See above. He did what follows with a full sense of the glory and dignity of His own Person. “The prefatory mention of His glory is as it were a protestation, lest it should be thought that the Lord did any thing beneath His dignity in washing the disciples' feet." Bengel.

4. laid aside his garments] "viz. those which might hinder the act of washing." Bengel. He put Himself into the ordinary dress of a servant. Or, which is far more probable, on the deepest grounds, did He not humble Himself so far as literally to divest Himself, and gird Himself merely, as the basest of slaves?

5.] the bason, viz. the vessel usually at hand for such purposes. The context seems to shew that He had washed the feet of one or more before the incident of the next verse: were it not so, the words, "began to wash," might merely express His doing something unusual and unlooked for.

6.] And so (the so taking up the narrative again after the word began, as if it were said, 'in pursuance of this intention') He comes to Simon Peter; not first, as some have maintained, both with and without reference to the primacy of Peter:—for that would be hardly consistent (see on the preceding verse) with the context, which seems to require that the washing should have begun and been going on, before He came to Peter.

art Thou washing (intending to wash) my feet?] He thinks the act unworthy of the Lord; even as many think that great act of Love to have been, which was typified by it.

The word my is not emphatic. The having his feet washed is a matter of course: it is the Person who is about to do it that offends him.

7.] Hitherto our Lord had been silent. He emphasizes the I and thou, but so as to set forth Himself as the Master, Peter as the disciple, not wholly cognizant of His will and purpose, and therefore more properly found in subjection to it.

What I do] i.e. (1) this washing itself, as a lesson of humility and love, ver. 14. (2) Its symbolical meaning, vv. 9, 10. (3) The great Act of Love, the laying aside My glory, and becoming in the form of a servant, that the washing of the Holy Spirit may cleanse men.

afterwards] Taking up again the numbers used in the last note, (1) was known very soon, but (2) and (3) not till after the Spirit was given.

8.] The rash and self-opinionated Apostle opposes to our Lord's afterwards his own never (literally, no, not for ever). In interpreting our Lord's answer, we must remember, that He replies more to the spirit of Peter's objection, than to his words. The same well-meaning but false humility would prevent him (and does prevent many) from stooping to receive at the hands of the Lord that spiritual washing which is absolutely necessary in order to have any part in Him, Rom. viii. 9, 'If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with Me;' but the affirmative proposition, that those who are washed, have a part in Jesus, is not equally true; witness the example of Judas, who was washed, but yet had no part with Jesus. In the spiritual sense of washing, this is not so. Whoever is washed by Jesus, has part in Him. We are here in the realm of another and deeper logic: the act being no longer symbolic, but veritable.

9.] The warm-hearted Peter, upon learning that exclusion would be the consequence of not being washed, can hardly have enough of a cleansing so precious. There surely is implied in this answer an incipient apprehension of the meaning of our Lord's words. The expression, if I wash thee not, has awakened in him, as the Lord's presence did, Luke v. 8, a feeling of his own want of cleansing, his entire pollution.

10.] Reference appears to be made to the fact that one who has bathed, after he has reached his home, needs not entire washing, but only to have his feet washed from the dust of the way. This bathing, the bath of the new birth, but only yet in its foreshadowing, in the purifying effect of faith working by love, the Apostles, with one exception, had; and this foot-washing represented to them, besides its lesson of humility and brotherly love, their daily need of cleansing from daily pollution, even after spiritual regeneration, at the hands of their divine Master. See 2 Cor. vii. 1: James i. 21: Acts xv. 8, 9: 2 Pet. ii. 22.

12–20.] This act, a pattern of self-denying love for His servants.

12. Know ye what I have done to. you?] These words are uttered, not so much in expectation of an answer, as to direct their attention to the following.

14.] The command here given must be understood in the full light of intelligent appreciation of the circumstances, and the meaning of the act. Bengel remarks, that one intent of our Lord's washing the feet of His disciples must necessarily be absent from any such deed on our part: viz. its symbolic meaning, pressed by our Lord on St. Peter, "If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with Me." The command will rather find its fulfilment in all kinds of mutual condescension and help, than in any literal observance. "In these times," continues Bengel, "pontiffs and princes obey this injunction to the letter: but it would be a more wonderful thing to see a pontiff, for example, wash the feet of one equal, than of twelve poor beggars." The custom of literally and ceremonially washing the feet in obedience to this command, is not found before the fourth century.

15.] Notice that our Lord commands us to do, not "that which I have done to you," but "as, in like manner as, I have done to you." Our Lord's action was symbolical, and is best imitated in His followers by endeavouring, "if a man be overtaken in a fault, to restore such an one in the spirit of meekness:" Gal. vi. 1.

16, 17.] The proverbial expression, There is no servant greater than his lord, is used here in a different sense from that which it has in ch. xv. 20. Here it is, "if the Master thus humbles Himself, much more should His servants and messengers;" see Matt. x. 24; Luke vi. 40; and on ver. 17, Luke xii. 47, 48. The mere recognition of such a duty of humility, is a very much more easy matter than the putting it in practice.

18.] I say it not (viz. the "if ye do them") of you all: for there is one who can never be blessed. Our Lord repeats his words, "but not all," of ver. 10, and the sad recollection leads to His trouble in spirit, ver. 21.

I know] The I is emphatic; and the reason of its emphasis is given in ver. 19.

Connexion: 'It might be supposed that this treachery has come upon Me unawares; but it is not so: I (for my part) know whom I have selected (viz. the whole twelve; see ch. vi. 70, not only the true ones, as in ch. xv. 16, said when Judas was not present): but this has been done by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, declared in the Scriptures.'

The words of the citation here are given freely, the LXX having, "magnified the lifting up of the heel against me."

This is another instance of the direct and unhesitating application of the words of the Psalms by our Lord to Himself.

his heel] Bengel observes that this saying is pertinent to the washing of the feet, and also to the custom of reclining in eating bread. See on ver. 23.

19.] 'Now, from this time, I announce it to you, that when it shall have happened, you may believe that I am (the Christ).' See ch. xvi. 1, and above on "I know," ver. 18.

20.] See Matt. x. 40. 'The connexion is very difficult, and variously set down. It has been generally supposed that the words were to comfort the Apostles for the disgrace of their order by Judas, or in prospect of their future labours. But then would not the words "whomsoever I send" have been expressed by "you?" Another view is to refer back to vv. 16, 17, and suppose the connexion to have been broken by the allusion to Judas. But is this likely, in a discourse of our Lord? I rather believe that the saying sets forth the dignity of that office from which Judas was about to fall: q.d. 'not only was he in close intercourse with Me (ver. 18), but invested with an ambassadorship for Me, and in Me, for the Father; and yet he will lift up his heel against Me.' And the consideration of this dignity in all its privileges, as contrasted with the sad announcement just to be made, leads on to the troubling of our Lord's spirit in the next verse.'

21–30.] Contrast of the manifestations of love and hate. See notes on Matt. xxvi. 21–25. Mark xiv. 18–21. Luke xxii. 21–23.

21.] See above. This was one of those mysterious troublings of spirit, which passed over our Lord,—ch. xi. 33 and xii. 27.

The word testified implies the delivery of some solemn and important announcement. This was the first time He had ever spoken so plainly. All four Evangelists agree in the substance of the announcement.

22.] In Matthew and Mark they express their questioning in words. St. Luke's beginning to enquire among themselves would appear to imply the same. We seem called on here to decide a much-controverted question,—where, in St. John's narrative, the institution of the Lord's Supper is to be inserted? I believe certainly before this announcement, as in Luke: and if before it, perhaps before the washing of the disciples' feet: for I see no break which would admit it between our ver. 1 and ver. 21.

whom Jesus loved] The disciple meant is John himself, see ch. xxi. 20; also designated thus, ch. xix. 26; xxi. 7 (see Introduction to John, §i. 6).

24–26.] See note on Matt. ver. 23. Peter characteristically imagines that John, as the beloved disciple, would know: but he, not knowing, asks of the Lord.

25. leaning back on Jesus' breast] I understand it, that John, who was before lying close to the bosom of Jesus, now leaned his head absolutely upon His breast, to ask the question. This escaped the notice of the rest at the table:—see on Matt. as above.

26.] This represents Matt. ver. 23, Mark ver. 20.

the sop, probably a piece of the unleavened bread, dipped in the broth made of bitter herbs.

27.] Bengel observes that it was after the sop, not with it, that Satan entered into him. Observe the word sop, in this sentence, stands for the act in which it played a principal part. This giving the sop was one of the closest testimonies of friendly affection.

The

word then carries a graphic power and pathos with it: at that moment.

Satan entered into him] See ver. 2 and note. Satan entered fully into him, took full possession of him,—so that his will was not only bent upon doing the deed of treachery, but fixed and determined to do it then and there. The words must be understood literally, not as merely betokening the decision of his mind in the direction of the devil's counsels.

What thou doest (art doing)...] These words are not to be evaded, as being permissive or Dismissive (this latter view is taken by Chrysostom, who says, “The words are not to be taken as commanding or exhorting, but as reproaching, and intimating that there was in him the wish to act decidedly, but as he was undecided, the Lord permits him to depart and do it”). They are like the saying of God to Balaam, Num. xxii. 20,—and of our Lord to the Pharisees, Matt. xxiii. 32. The course of sinful action is presupposed, and the command to go on is but the echo of that mysterious appointment by which the sinner in the exercise of his own corrupted will becomes the instrument of the purposes of God. Thus it is not “What thou art about to do,” but—that which thou art doing, hast just now fully determined to put in present action, do quickly—reproving his lingering, and his pretending (Matt. ver. 25) to share in the general doubt.

28.] Not even St. John: who knew he was the traitor, but had no idea the deed was so soon to be done. Stier supposes St. John to exclude himself in saying “no man at the table,” and that he knew.

29.] The first supposition agrees with ver. 1,—that it was “before the feast of the passover.” Had it been the night of the passover, the next day being hallowed as a sabbath, nothing could have been bought. On the whole question see notes on Matt. xxvi. 17, and cy xviii. 28. On the second supposition, see ch. xii. 5. The gift to the poor might be, to help them to procure their paschal lamb.

30.] The remark, and it was night, seems to be added to bring the whole narrative from ch. xiii. 1 to ch. xviii. 3 into precision, as happening on one and the same night. It is perhaps fanciful to see, as many have done, an allusion to the darkness in Judas's soul, or to the fact expressed in Luke xxii. 53, “this is your hour, and the power of darkness;” though doubtless there the Lord alludes to its being also night: but I quite feel, with Meyer, that there is something awful in this termination—it was night. 31—XVI. 38.] HIS LOVE IS KEEPING AND COMPLETING HIS OWN. And herein, 31—XIV. 31.] He comforts them with the assurance that He is going to the Father.

31—88.] Announcement of the fact—its effect on Peter. Here commences that solemn and weighty portion of the Gospel (ch. xiii. 81—xvii. 26) which Olshausen not without reason calls ‘the most holy place’ He beautifully remarks, ‘These were the last moments which the Lord spent in the midst of His own before His Passion, and words full of heavenly meaning flowed during them from His holy lips:—all that His heart, glowing with love, had yet to say to His own, was com-pressed into this short space of time. At first the conversation with the disciples takes more the form of usual dialogue: reclining at the table, they mournfully reply to and question Him. But when (ch. xiv. 81) they had risen from the super, the discourse of Christ took a higher form: surrounding their Master, the disciples listened to the Words of Life, and seldom spoke (only ch. xvi. 17, 29). Finally, in the sublime prayer of the great High Priest, the whole Soul of Christ flowed forth in earnest intercession for His own to His Heavenly Father’ Olsh. ii. 329.

31. Now is the Son of man glorified] It was not that the presence of Judas, as some have thought, hindered the great consummation imported by this glorification, but that the work on which he was gone out, was the ACTUAL COMMENCEMENT of that consummation. “Now at length,” says Lampe, “as if an obstacle were broken down, the rushing rivers of grace flow from the lips of Jesus." It is true that Judas's presence hindered the expression of these gracious words. The glorification is spoken of by anticipation, as if accomplished, because the deed was actually in doing, which was to accomplish it. The glorifying spoken of here, and in ver. 32, is not the same. This is the glorifying of God by Christ on earth, in His course of obedience as the Son of Man, which was completed by His death ("he became obedient even unto death," Phil. ii. 8). And His death was the sition-point between God being glorified in Him, and He being glorified in God—manifested to be the Son of God with power by His resurrection, and received up to the Father, to sit at the right hand of God. This latter (ver. 32) is spoken of by Him here as future, but immediate (straightway) on His death, and leads on to the address in ver. 33.

32.] in himself is in God (the Father), not in Christ. The word himself reflects back on the subject of the sentence: and in does not mean 'by means of,' but keeps its literal force;—by the resurrection of Him into that glory, which He had indeed before, but now has as the Son of Man, with the risen Manhood; so "glorify thou me with thyself," ch. xvii. 5. Grotius compares 1 Sam. ii. 30, which stands in the LXX, "them that glorify me I will glorify." Origen remarks, "The Father recompenses to Him more than the Son of

33. Little children] This term,—here only used by Christ,—affectionately expresses His not only brotherly, but fatherly love (Isa. ix. 6) for His own, and at the same time their immature and weak state, now about to be left without Him.

as I said unto the Jews] "He would not say this to his disciples before, but to those who rejected Him." Bengel. But naturally the two clauses, 'Ye shall seek Me and not find Me, and shall die in your sins,' also spoken to the Jews (ch. vii. 33; viii. 21), are here omitted: and by this omission the connexion with ver. 34 is supplied;—'Ye shall be left here: but, unlike the Jews, ye shall seek Me and shall find Me, and the way is that of Love,—to Me, and to one another—forming (ver. 35) an united Body, the Church, in which all shall recognize My presence among you as My disciples.'

34.] The newness of this commandment, consists in its simplicity, and (so to speak) unicity. The same kind of love was prescribed in the Old Test. (see Rom. xiii. 8):—'as thyself' is the highest measure of love, and it is therefore not in degree that the new commandment differs from the old, nor in extent, but in being the commandment of the new covenant,—the firstfruit of the Spirit in the new dispensation (Gal. v. 22); see 1 John ii. 7, 8 (and note), where the word new is commented on by the Apostle himself.

35.] all men,—all the world,—and the object is to be, not mere vain praise or display before the world, but that men may be attracted by the exhibition of the Spirit of Christ, and won over to Him. The world, notwithstanding this proof of His presence among them, shall hate them: see 1 John iii. 10–15. But among all men they themselves are also included—brotherly love is the true sign to them of being children of God, 1 John ii. 3–5.

36.] This announcement of Peter's denial is probably the same with that in Luke xxii. 33 ff, where see notes: but distinct from that on the way to Gethsemane, Matt. xxvi. 34: Mark xiv. 30.

but thou shalt follow me afterwards] Alluding probably both to the future reception of His Apostle into His glory, and to the particular path by which he should come to that glory;—as in ch. xxi. 18, 19.

37.] Peter understands our Lord's death to be meant as the time of his following;—see Luke, ver. 33.

38.] The question is not answered—but Peter's boast solemnly questioned. See a somewhat similar question, ch. i. 51. There was at the same time a startling inversion of the subsequent facts, in this boast; to which our Lord, I think, alludes in His question,—"wilt thou lay down thy life for Me?"

The words, The cock shall not crow, necessarily imply, as it was night, those also which follow in Matthew and Mark, "in this night,"—and bind the whole events of this chapter to ch. xviii.

John: Chapter 14

CHAP. XIV. 1–31.] This first division of the great discourse (see above on ch. xiii. 31) is spent in more directly comforting the disciples for their Lord's departure, by the assurance of His going to the Father, and its consequences.

1–10.] HE, in his union with the Father, will take His own to Him.

1.] A pause has intervened; Peter is humbled and silent; the rest are troubled in heart on account of the sad things of which they had been hearing;—Judas's treachery,—Peter's denial,—the Lord's departure from them.

The verb believe both times is imperative. Many (as in A.V. take the first as indic., the second as imper., ‘Ye believe in God: believe also in me.’) But this is inconsistent with the whole tenour of the discourse, which presupposes a want of belief in God in its full and true sense, as begetting trust in Him. Luther takes both as indicative. The command is intimately connected with ch. xiii. 31, 32—faith in the glorification of Christ in the Father, and of the Father in Him.

2.] This comfort—of being reunited to their Lord—is administered to them as “little children,” in forms of speech simple, and adapted to their powers of apprehension of spiritual things. The house spoken of is Heaven: Ps. xxxiii. 13, 14; Isa. lxiii. 15. In it are many (in number—it may be also in degree of dignity, but no such meaning is here conveyed) abiding-places; room enough for them all. If not,—if they could not follow Him thither, He would not have concealed this from them. This latter assurance is one calculated to beget entire trust and confidence; He would not in any matter hold out vain hopes to them; His word to them would plainly state all difficulties and discouragements,—as indeed He does, ch. xv. 18; xvi. 1, 4. This preparing a place for us is that of which we sing,—‘When Thou hadst overcome the sharpness of death, Then didst open the Kingdom of heaven to all believers:’ see note on Luke xxiii. 43. And thus it is a place, not the many mansions that He is preparing:—the place as a whole, not each man's place in it.

3.] In order to understand this, we must bear in mind what Stier well calls the ‘perspective’ of prophecy. The coming again of the Lord is not one single act,—as His resurrection, or the descent of the Spirit, or His second personal advent, or the final coming to judgment; but the great summary of all these, the result of which shall be, His taking His people to Himself to be where He is. This coming of His is begun (ver. 18) in His Resurrection—carried on (ver. 23) in the spiritual life (see also ch. xvi. 22 ff.), the making them ready for the place prepared;—further advanced when each by death is fetched away to be with Him (Phil. i. 23); fully completed at His coming in glory, when they shall for ever be with Him (1 Thess. iv. 17) in the perfected resurrection state.

4.] And whither I go ye know, and the way ye know: or, as in the various reading, whither I go, ye know the way, i.e. “ye know the way to the place to which I am going.” They might have known, and doubtless did know in some sense; but, as Lampe remarks, “sometimes we praise a man to put him in mind of his duty.” We use thus, ‘you know,’—leaving to be supplied, ‘if you would give the matter thought.’ whither, viz. to the Father; the way,—(in our Lord's own case, of which this verse treats) His death.

5.] Thomas is slow of belief and apprehension. The answer to “whither goest thou?” ch. xiii. 37, which Peter seems to have apprehended, was not sufficient for him; see ch. xx. 25: “for he thought,” says Euthymius, “that it was some material place to which the Lord was going, and that the road thither was of the same kind.”

6.] Our Lord inverts the order of Thomas's question, and in answering it practically, for them, speaks of ‘the Way’ first. He is THE WAY; not merely the Forerunner; which would imply on our part only an outward connexion with Him as His followers: but the way, in and on which we must go, having an inner union with and in Him (see Heb. x. 20).

the truth] more is implied in this title, than “that He ever spoke truth, and what He said was sure to come to pass,” as Euthymius explains it. It is another side of the same idea of the Way;—God being true, and only approached by and in truth. Christ IS THE TRUTH, in Whom only (Col. ii. 3) that Knowledge of Him is gained, which (ch. xvii. 3) is eternal life.

the life] not merely because “not even death shall separate you from Me,” Euthymius:—but as being THE LIFE (see ver. 19: Gal. ii. 20) of all His in Whom only they who live can come to the living Father (ch. vi. 57).

no man cometh unto the Father, but by me...] This plainly states whither He was going, and the way also: He was going to the Father: and the way was, through Him-self.

7.] See ch. viii. 19.

from henceforth] There is no difficulty, if we bear in mind the now of ch. xiii. 31. The henceforth is the future time, beginning with our Lord's glorification, which was now at hand. Lücke remarks: ‘Henceforth is not entirely future nor entirely present, but the moment of transition, the identification of the present and future. Christ speaks here by anticipation in reference to the hour of His glorification being come’ (ii. 598).

8.] Philip misunderstands the words ye have seen him to mean ‘seeing in a vision,’—and intimates that one such sight of God would set at rest all their fears, and give them perfect confidence.

9.] The Son is the only Exponent of the Father to men: see ch. xii. 44, 45; Col. i. 15; Heb. i. 3; 1 Tim. vi. 16. This seeing of the Father in Him, is not only seeing His bodily presence, but knowing Him (dost thou not know me?).

10.] See ch. x. 30, 38, and for the latter clause ch. viii. 28, where the contrast is, as here, purposely inexact in diction,—words being placed in one member and works in the other; and, as there, works and words are taken as correlative and co-extensive;—all the working of the Lord Jesus being a speaking, a revelation of the Father. According to the probably genuine reading in the margin, it will be, doeth his works: they are not Mine, but His, done in and by Me: but in Me present and abiding, so that “he that hath seen Me hath seen the Father.”

11–24.] Jesus will make proof of His abiding union with the Father, in His union with His own: and this vv. 12–14, in answering prayer: vv. 15–17, in the sending of the Spirit: vv. 18 ff., as a pledge of the completion of this union in His personal return. The Lord now unfolds out of these words, the Father dwelleth in Me, doeth his works, the great promise of the Paraclete or Comforter.

11. for the very works' sake] See ch. x. 38. The object here seems to be, to fix their attention on the works as a plain testimony even to such as could not simply believe so deep a thing on His assertion, and one which—12.] should become a matter felt and known in themselves hereafter,—by virtue of their living union with Him who is gone to the Father, and become the dispenser and channel of the Spirit. ‘He who believes Christ speaking concerning Himself, believes on Christ.’ Bengel.

greater works than these shall he do] This word is not to be evaded (so as to mean greater in number), but taken in its full strict sense. And the keys to its meaning will be found ch. i. 51; v. 20. The works which Jesus did, His Apostles also did,—viz. raising the dead, &c.;—greater works than those, they did—not in degree, but in kind: spiritual works, under the dispensation of the Spirit, which had not yet come in. But they did them not as separate from Him: but in Him, and by Him; and so (ch. v. 21) He is said to do them. The work which He did by Peter’s sermon, Acts ii., was one of these greater works—the firstfruits of the unspeakable gift.

This union of them with and in Him is expressed here by “the works that I do, shall he do also.” ‘He has sown, we reap; and the harvest is greater than the seed-time.’ Stier.

13.] I have retained the period at the end of ver. 12 (many editors place a comma only and connect this verse with the word because in the former), because the sense remains much the same, and the style is better preserved.

ye shall ask, viz. the Father: so ch. xv. 16; xvi. 23. But this does not exclude, but distinctly includes, prayer to Christ; so blended are these two (as the seeing ver. 9), that we have not “that will He do,” but, ver. 14, emphatically “that will I do.” He who prays to the Father, prays to the Son. This doing answers to the doing in ver. 12; the reason why you shall do these greater works, is, on account of the all-powerful Spirit of grace and supplication which My going to the Father shall bring down upon the Church; in answer to which Spirit, I will do by you whatever in My Name (i. e. in union with Me, as being Mine, manifesting forth Jesus as the Son of God) ye shall ask, And the end of this is, that by these greater works, the wonders of grace and triumphs of the Spirit, the Father may be glorified (His glory shewn forth) in and by the Son.

14.] solemnly repeats as a promise, what was incidentally asserted before: ‘For this is a truth, that whatever’ &c. And besides, there is added in the original an emphatic I; it is I myself that will do it: shewing that the use of the first person before was emphatic. “This I myself already points to the glorification of Jesus.” Bengel.

15.] is a following out of the condition in the former verse, “If ye shall ask any thing in my name:” ‘That way of prayer is the way of loving obedience, in which the Spirit is ever found, and which is only trodden by His help?’—and also of the purpose stated there, “that the Father may be glorified in the Son:” ‘As the Father is honoured in the Son, so must the Son be honoured in you;’—see ch. xv. 10.

16.] And then the Spirit shall proceed forth upon you. The word rendered I will pray betokens, probably, a manner of asking implying actual presence and nearness,—and is here used of the mediatorial office in Christ’s ascended state.

Comforter—literally Paraclete. Olshausen remarks that the interpretations of this word range themselves in two classes, which again by no means exclude one another:—those of ‘COMFORTER,’ and those of ‘ADVOCATE.’ The etymology of the word requires the latter as its strict meaning, and in this strict meaning it satisfies 1 John ii. 1, “we have an Advocate (Paraclete, as here) with the Father,” but not so all the places where it is used of the Holy Spirit,—nor this verse, where of the Son and Spirit both. And therefore the other meaning,—Comforter, including as it does in its fulness (see Rom. viii. 26, where both, the helping and the interceding, are united) the Advocate also, has been both here and in Germany (Luther has the equivalent term) sanctioned by Christian usage as the most adequate rendering. Wycliff, from whom we have our word Comforter, often used ‘comfort’ for the Latin confortari, which means to strengthen, as e.g. Luke xxii, 43; Acts ix. 19&c. Thus the idea of help and strength is conveyed by it, as well as of consolation. It was this office, of Comforter in this double sense, which Jesus had filled to His disciples while with them:—and which the Holy Spirit was to fill even more abundantly (and in a higher sense, because their state would be higher) on the removal of Jesus from them.

17.] This Comforter is, not ‘the true Spirit,’—but ‘THE SPIRIT OF TRUTH;’—the Spirit Who is truth, 1 John v. 6,—of Whom all truth comes, and who alone leads into the whole truth, the truth of God, ch. xvi. 13.

the world] equivalent to the “carnal” of 1 Cor. ii. 14 (where see note), those who live according to the desires of the flesh and the mind, and have no receptivity of the things of God.

beholdeth] This word behold, when used in a spiritual sense, is sometimes equivalent to know: but this cannot be so here, because it is separated from knoweth by neither: ‘recognizes not in His operations, nor knows:’—has neither sight nor knowledge of.

ye know him] present, but spoken of their state as disciples opposed to the world,—and by anticipation, as before. They were even now not of the world (ch. xv. 19), and are therefore viewed in the completion of their state as opposed to it. dwelleteth (not shall dwell) is future in signification, as any present assertion of that which is to be permanent must necessarily be; abideth, as in ch. viii. 35. Euthymius understands dwelleteth with you, of the Spirit abiding in Jesus, who was among them: but. wrongly.

is in you] This was perhaps corrected to the future, “shall be,” because, though their knowledge of the Spirit proper to their complete state, and His dwelling, remaining, among them, had in some inferior sense begun,—His dwelling in them had not. With the verb in the present, the speaking by anticipation is still stronger.

18.] The original word should be literally rendered, orphans, as indeed it is in the margin of the A.V.

The office of the Comforter is to connect the disciples with the Father: if therefore they had Him not, they would be fatherless. The expression is closely connected with “little children” ch. xiii. 33, and, as Euthymius says, springs from paternal compassion. This makes our Lord’s declaration, that He was coming to them, plain, as applying to the coming by the Spirit, who is one with Christ;—not only to the ultimate personal coming, which is but the last step of the Advent, nor only the bodily coming again to them and not to the world at the Resurrection, which was but a pledge of His lasting presence in the Spirit: see on ver. 3. The coming is (as there) the summary of these—the great Revisitation, in all its blessed progress. The absence of any connecting particle, as “for,” with this clause, arises from the depth of affection in the Lord’s heart.

19–21.] This coming is explained to consist in His presence among them by the life of His Resurrection, which is theirs; by (ver. 20) the witness of the Spirit in their hearts; and (ver. 21) their sanctification by the Spirit in love, and the consequent manifestation of Jesus to them.

Luthardt attempts to confine this coming (and the whole passage) to the last great Advent, 1 in spite of the plain sense of vv. 19, 20, relying on the analogy of Rev. xxii, 17, and saying that, on the common interpretation, the Church would have no cause to long for her Lord: and so Augustine and others. But manifestly the context is against them: and they must thus explain away many other pa: (e. g. Matt. xviii. 20). The presence Christ by the Spirit is none the less real, for being incomplete.

19.] The immediate reference of this, ye behold me, is to the forty days (see Acts x. 41)—but only as leading on to its wider and deeper reference to the spiritual life. I live, not “I shall live”—the principle of Life being immanent in Him. ye shall live, live in all fulness, including the most blessed sense of life,—the Life of the Spirit,—here and hereafter.

20.] At that day, no particular day: but ‘each of these periods, as its continually increasing light breaks upon you, shall bring increased knowledge of your unity in Me with the Father, and my dwelling in you by the Spirit’ If any particular day is to be thought of, it would naturally be the Pentecost.

21.] hath...and keepeth,—“that is,” says Augustine, “hath, in memory, and keepeth, in life:” or perhaps more accurately, ‘He who has my commandments, as being my disciple by outward profession (not thus only: but holds them, by the inner possession of a living faith), and keeps them.’ see Luke xi. 28, And this keeping is more of the inner will to keep them, than the absolute observance, which can only follow on high degrees of spiritual advancement.

I will manifest myself to him] by the Holy Spirit: see ch. xvi. 14. This (as Stier observes) is the highest promise which can be made to man (see ver. 23), and yet it is made to every man who has and keeps the commandments of the Lord Jesus. Compare EXOD. xxxiii. 13.

22.] Judas, not Iscariot is the same person as “Judas the [brother] of James,” in Luke vi. 16: see note on Matt. x. 3. Meyer remarks that the words not Iscariot are in reality superfluous, after ch. xiii. 30, but are added by St. John from his deep horror of the Traitor who bore the same name.

The question seems to be put with the Jewish idea, that the Messiah, the King and Judge of the nations, must necessarily manifest himself to the world.

[In reference to the reading in the margin, “And how is it, &c.?”, we may remark, that and, preceding an interrogation, expresses astonishment at what has just been said, and, assuming it, connects to it a conclusion which appears to refute or cast doubt on it.]

how is it that] literally, What has happened, that...?

28, 24.] These verses contain the answer to the question in both its parts:—“how is it, that Thou wilt manifest Thy-self to us,”—because love to Christ, leading to the keeping of His word, is the necessary condition of the indwelling and manifestation in man of the Father and the Son;—“how is it, that Thou wilt not manifest Thyself to the world?” because want of love to Christ, leading to neglect of His words, necessarily excludes from communion with the Father and the Son, and the Spirit, who reveals the Son in man. “The addition, we will come unto him, and make our abode with him, makes this incapacity still plainer and more deeply felt.” Meyer. For (and meaning,—hence you may infer what I am setting forth) the word which ye hear (and which the world keepeth not, but neglects),—is not Mine, but the Father's. On the gracious and wonderful promise of ver. 23, see Rom. viii. 15.

25–31.] His farewell, and the parting bequest of His Love.

25.] have I spoken is anticipatory, referring, as “I said” (ver. 26), to the futures, “shall teach,” and “shall bring to remembrance.” Meyer supposes that a pause took place here, and the Lord looks back on what He had said to them. But this does not seem so natural.

26.] But—as if He had said, ‘I know that ye do not understand them yet: but’ &c.

the Holy Ghost] The Paraclete, or Comforter, is now more closely defined by this well-known Name,—and, by the words, whom (which) the Father will send, and the pronoun He..., designated personally, as One sent, and One acting on them.

in my name] not, ‘in My stead,’ but in regard of me—‘in answer to My prayer, and prayers in My name,—to those who hear My name,—and as a means of manifesting Me.’

shall teach you all things stands by itself, not with “whatsoever I have said unto you:” shall teach you all things,—‘all that can and may be learnt by you, all that belongs to your work and life in Me.’

and bring all things to your remembrance] What is not understood is liable to be forgotten;—and therefore in this word is implied the giving them a right understanding of, as well as recalling, what Jesus had said to them: see ch. ii. 22; xii. 16.

It is on the fulfilment of this promise to the Apostles, that their sufficiency as Witnesses of all that the Lord did and taught, and consequently THE AUTHENTICITY OF THE GOSPEL NARRATIVE, is grounded.

27.] This is introduced by ver. 25, which suggests the speedy close of the discourse. It was customary to take leave with wishes of peace:—so 1 Sam. i, 17: Luke vii. 50: Acts xvi. 36: 1 Pet. v. 14: 3 John 15. Also, to reassure by such words; see Gen. xlivi 23: Judg. vi. 23. But our Lord distinguishes His peace, true peace, ‘the peace which I have and give’ (see ch. xv. 11), from the mere empty word used in the world’s form of greeting. Peace (in general) He leaves with them;—His peace He gives to them, over and above that other. The words, as the world giveth, must refer, I think, to the world’s manner of giving,—not to the unreality of the world’s peace, of which, however true, there is no direct mention here. The world can only give peace in empty formulæ, saying ‘Peace, peace,’ when there is no peace: Jer. vi. 14 al.

28.] The former part of the verse gives a reason why their heart should not be troubled;—then the rest of the verse removes all ground of fear, since it is an exaltation of Him whom they loved, which is about to happen; and therefore a ground of joy, and not of fear.

my Father is greater than I] And therefore the going of Jesus to the Father is an advancement. This word greater, as Luther well remarks, is not here used as referring to the Nature or Essence of the Son as related to the Father,—but as indicating that particular subordination to the Father in which the Lord Jesus then was,—and the cessation of the state of humiliation, and entering into His glory, which would take place on His being received up to the Father. So also Calvin: “Christ is not here comparing the Divinity of the Father with His own, nor His human nature with the divine essence of the Father, but rather His present state with the heavenly glory to which He was soon to be exalted." And Cocceius: "The inferiority here is not to be understood as meaning, according to His human nature; for the words point to an inferiority which would be laid aside, on His going to the Father." And this removes all reason for fear, as they will be exalted in Him.

The whole doctrinal controversy which has been raised on these words (especially by the Fathers against the Arians), seems not to belong to the sense of the passage. That there is a sense in which the Father is greater than even the glorified Son, is beyond doubt (see especially 1 Cor. xv. 27 f.); but as on the one hand that concession is no concession to Arianism, because it is not in the essential being of the Son, but in His Mediatorial office, that this His inferiority consists,—so on the other hand this verse implies in itself no such inferiority, the discourse being of another kind.

29.] I have told you—viz. 'the prophecies of My Resurrection and Ascension,'&c.

ye may believe] See ch. xiii. 19, where the words "that I am He" are supplied. That ye may believe, in the fullest sense of the word. "Not that they did not previously believe Him to be the Son of God: but then, when that was fulfilled in Him, which He had before predicted,—this their faith, which now, when he was speaking to them, was small, and, when He died, was almost extinguished, revived and flourished." Augustine. See 1 John v. 13.

30.] I will no more talk much with you :—then, as Stier remarks, He had some words more to say, and was not about to break off at ver. 31, as some have supposed. The necessity of the time broke off further words.

the prince of this world] i.c. Satan:—not, Satan in Judas, but Satan himself, with whom the Lord was in conflict during His passion: see Luke iv. 13 (and note), and xxii. 53.

hath nothing in me] i.e. as Augustine, "findeth no sin in Me." This is the only true interpretation: has nothing in Me—no point of appliance whereon to fasten his attack. But Meyer well observes, that this is rather the fact to be assumed as the ground of what is here said, than the thing itself which is said. Tholuck, and many others render it, 'has no power over me,' or as Euthymius, finds nothing worthy of death.

31.] 'But My Death is an act of voluntary obedience, that it may be known that I love and obey the Father—that the glory of the Father in and by Me may be manifested.' The construction is elliptic: supply, 'But (his power over Me for death will be permitted by Me) that,'&c. And the period should be at so I do, as in the text.

Meyer and others would put only a comma here, and carry on the sense, 'But that the world may know that I love the Father, and as the Father commanded me, thus I do, arise, let us go hence.' I need only put it to the inner feeling of any who have learned to appreciate the majesty and calmness of our Lord's discourses, whether a sentence so savouring of theatrical effect is likely to have been spoken by Him. We may notwithstanding safely believe that the words "Arise, let us go hence," without this connexion, do undoubtedly express the holy boldness of the Lord in going to meet that which was to come upon Him, and are for that reason inserted by St. John.

Arise, let us go hence] These words imply a movement from the table to depart. Probably the rest of the discourse, and the prayer, ch. xvii., were delivered when now all were standing ready to depart. There would be some little pause, in which the preparations for departure would be made. But the place is clearly the same, see ch. xviii. 1, "when Jesus had spoken these words, He went forth:"—besides which, we can hardly suppose, as Grotius and others, discourses of a character like those in ch. xv. xvi. to have been delivered to as many as eleven persons, while walking by the way, and in a time of such publicity as that of the Paschal feast. Still less is the supposition of Bengel and Beausobre probable,—that ch. xiii. xiv. happened outside the city, and that between ch. xiv. and xv. the paschal meal takes place. Compare also ch. xiii. 30, which is decisive against this idea.

John: Chapter 15

CHAP. XV. 1–27.] Injunction to vital union in love with Jesus and one another.

1–11.] Their relation to Him. Various circumstances suggestive of this similitude, of the vine and its branches, have been imagined; but none of them are satisfactory. The vineyards on the way to Gethsemane,—the carved vine on the great doors of the temple,—a vine trained about the window of the guest-chamber,—are all fanciful, and the two first (see on ch. xiv. 31) inapplicable. The cup, so lately partaken, is certainly nearer,—see below. But I believe that most probably the Lord did not take the similitude from any outward suggesting occasion, but as a means of illustrating the great subject, the inner unity of Himself and His. Occasion enough was furnished, by the Old Test. symbolism of the vineyard and the vine,—Isa. v. 1 ff.; Jer. ii. 21; Ezek. xix. 10 ff., and especially Ps. lxxx. 8–19: by the intimate analogy of vegetable life (of which the tree bearing fruit is the highest kind, and of such trees the vine the noblest) with spiritual, and perhaps also by the fruit of the vine having been so recently the subject of their attention and the Lord's prophecy, Luke xxii. 18 and the parallel places.

1.] The Vine and branches stand in a much nearer connexion than the Shepherd and the sheep, or the lord of the vineyard and the vines; and answer to the Head and members in Eph. v. 23, 30; Col. ii. 19, linked together by a common organization, and informed by one and the same life.

the TRUE vine] not only, 'the vine by which prophecy is fulfilled:' not only, 'the vine in which the organism and qualities of the vine are most nobly realized,' but, as in ch. i. 9, the true, i.e. the original, or archetypal: that which served for the pattern of all such afterwards. The material creations of God are only inferior examples of that finer spiritual life and organism, in which the creature is raised up to partake of the divine nature; only figures of the true, Heb. ix. 24; "patterns (i. e. representations) of things in the heavens," ib. 23; see ch. vi. 32.

the husbandman] Not only the tiller of the land, but the vine-planter and dresser; He who has originated the relation between the vine and branches by planting the Vine in this earth (the nature of man), and who looks for and ensures the bringing forth of fruit.

2.] The Vine contains fruitful and unfruitful branches. Who are these unfruitful branches? Who are the branches? Clearly, all those who, adopting the parallel image, are made members of Christ by baptism, Rom. vi. 3, 4; compare "planted together," ib. ver. 5, also Rom. xi. 17 ff. The Vine is the visible Church here, of which Christ is the inclusive Head: the Vine contains the branches; hence the unfruitful, as well as the fruitful, are in Me.

Every such unfruitful branch the Father pulls off and casts away: and every one that beareth fruit He prunes, by cleansing it of its worthless parts, and shortening its rank growth, that it may ripen and enlarge its fruit better.

3.] clean, see ch. xiii. 10. In Eph. v. 26, we have both the washing by reason of the word, and the word itself, united. The word of Christ dwelling in them by Faith (see ver. 7) is the purifying principle (ch. xvii. 17). But the word clean here is not to be taken as equivalent to cleansed, or pruned, in the sense of ver. 2. The ad-verb now or already limits it to their present capacities and standing. There was more pruning at hand, when the sap should begin to flow,—when the Spirit should be shed abroad; and this future handling of the husbandman is indicated by the command, "Abide in me."

4.] And I in you must not be taken as a promise ("Abide in me, and then I will abide in you"), which (see on ver. 2 above) would be contrary to the sense: but as a clause dependent on the former, 'Take care that ye abide in Me and I in you:' both these being necessary to the bringing forth fruit: see ver. 5, where the two are similarly bound together.

Here the natural strictness of the similitude is departed from. The branch cannot sever itself from the vine: but, such a case supposed, every one will see the inevitable consequence. Bengel says well, "This passage plainly shews the difference between what takes place in nature and what takes place in grace." It is the permitted free-will of the creature which makes the difference between the branches in the two cases.

5.] The interpretation of the allegory which each mind was forming for itself, the Lord solemnly asserts for them. Notice the term the same—he and no other: "it is he, that beareth much fruit."

The separation indicated in the last clause of the verse is more than 'without Me', the words are best rendered apart, or separate from Me, from being in Me and I in you. The word because has respect rather to the sense, than to the words themselves: because union with Me is the sole efficient cause of fruit being produced, you having no power to do any thing, to bring any thing to perfection, to do any of those things which belong to that which ye are, separate from Me.

6.] This verse is a most important testimony against supra-lapsarian error, shewing us that falling from grace is possible, and pointing out the steps of the fall. Observe this is not said of the unfruitful branch, which the Father takes away (in judgment): but of one who will not abide in Christ, becomes separate from Him: (1) he is cast out (of the vineyard, or of the Vine) like a branch in such a case: (2) he becomes dried up, having lost the supply of life-giving sap ('quenched the Spirit,' 1 Thess. v. 19): (3) he is gathered up with other such (Matt. xiii. 40) by the angels at the great day: (4) is cast into the fire, as the result of that judgment; and finally (5) 'burneth;' not, 'is burned,' in any sense of being consumed; "and must burn," as Luther renders it.

7.] All bringing forth fruit is the result of answered prayer for the assisting grace of God: and therefore the answer of all prayer is here promised to those who abide in Christ and have His word (Heb. vi. 5) abiding in them. The imperative is used by anticipation, of the future time. This not having been seen, it has probably been altered to the future, as in the A.V.: see ch. xiv. 13.

whatsoever ye will, in the supposed case, is necessarily in the way of God's will, and as tending to bearing much fruit.

8.] Herein belongs to the following words, not the preceding: as in the text.

The much fruit is not merely ‘large success in the apostolic mission,’ but ‘individual advance in bringing forth the fruits of the Spirit.’

According to the reading cited in the margin, the Father’s glorification is continued by another result, and that ye may become My (true) disciples] “It is the foundation of being a Christian, to become a disciple of Christ: it is the completion of being a Christian, to be a disciple of Christ.” Bengel.

According to the reading with the verb in the future, the actual result of what precedes is stated: and so ye shall become My disciples.

9.] The Love between the Father and Christ is compared with that between Christ and His disciples. ‘As the Father hath loved the Son, so the Son His disciples.’

The words my love may be understood as meaning the love of Me;—but the sense is not good, and the expression is not parallel with the same expression in ver. 10; so that I prefer my love, the love which I have towards you; remain in it; do not cast yourselves out of it. The other sense is implied in this, but not expressed.

10.] The way thus to remain is prescribed; even that way of simple obedience to His Will, which He followed to the Will of the Father.

On the words my love, see above.

11. have I spoken] Again anticipatory, hastening to the end of the discourse, and treating it as ended.

my joy] not ‘joy concerning Me,’ nor ‘joy derived from Me,’ nor ‘My joy over you,’ but My joy, properly speaking (see 2 Cor. ii. 3, “My joy is the joy of you all”): “His own holy exultation, the joy of the Son in the consciousness of the love of God, of His Unity with the Father: see ver. 10.” (Lücke.)

and that your joy might be full] That their joy might, by the indwelling of that His Joy, be uplifted and ennobled even to fulness,—to the extreme of their capability and satisfaction,—and might remain so.

12–17.] Union in love with one another enjoined on them.

12.] That He may shew them that it is no rigid code of keeping commandments in the legal sense, ver. 11 is inserted, and now the command-ment (as including all others) is again explained (see ch. xiii. 34) to be, mutual love,—and that, after His example of Love to them.

13.] A difficulty has been unnecessarily found in this verse, because St. Paul, Rom. v. 6 ff, cites it as a nobler instance of love, that Christ died for us when we were enemies. But manifestly here the example is from common life, in which if a man did lay down his life, it would naturally be for his friends; and would be, and is cited as, the greatest example of love. Nor again is there any doctrinal difficulty: our Lord does not assert of himself, that He laid down his life only for his friends (as defined in the next verse), but puts forward this side of his Love as a great and a practical example for his followers. His own great Sacrifice of Himself lies in the background of this verse; but only in the background, and with but one side of it seen, viz. his Love to them. See 1 Tim. iv. 10, and compare 1 John iii. 16.

14.] parallel to ver. 10,—and like it, guarded, in vv. 15, 16, 17, from legal misinterpretation.

15.] Spoken, by anticipation, of the state in which He would place them under the Spirit. Nor is there any discrepancy with eh. xiii. 13, 16, and ver. 20 here, which are also spoken of their future condition: for in that sense both relations subsist together. It is the lower sense of the word rendered servant (signifying both servant and slave), which is brought out in this verse. The anticipatory character of the saying is clearly shewn in the words, “Knoweth not what his lord doeth,” for this was precisely their present condition, but was after His Ascension changed into light and knowledge. I made known unto you] Here again the allusion must be (see chi. xvi. 12) to their future state under the dispensation of the Spirit: nay, even to the fulness and completion of it, as Augustine remarks; compare the confession of one of the greatest Apostles, 1 Cor. 10. “As we look for immortality of the flesh and salvation of the soul in the future, although, having received the pledge of both, we are said to be already saved: so we should hope for in the future the knowledge of all things which the Only-begotten has heard from the Father, although Christ says He has already made them known to us.” Augustine.

16.] See 1 John iv. 10, 19. Further proof of His love, in his choosing His, when they had not chosen Him.

appointed] See Acts xili, 47: 1 Thess. v. 9, and reff. Chrysostom and others explain it as meaning “planted,” in reference to the similitude of the vine. But the parable seems to be no further returned to than in the allusion implied in bearing fruit. “Ordained,” in A. V., is objectionable, as conveying a wrong idea, that of appointing to the Ministry, which is not here present.

that ye should go and bear fruit] The word go probably merely expresses (see Matt. xvili. 15; xix. 21, and Luke viii. 14) the activity of living and developing principle; not the missionary journeys of the Apostles, as some have explained it. The fruit is not the Church, to be founded by the Apostles, and endure;—this is evident, for here the fruit is spoken of with reference to themselves, and their ripening into the full stature of Christ. Much of their fruit will be necessarily the winning of others to Christ: but that is not the prominent idea here.

that your fruit should remain] See 2 John 8; Rev. xiv. 13.

that whatsoever ye ask...] This second that is parallel with the former one, not the result of it; the two, the bringing forth of fruit and the obtaining answer to prayer, being co-ordinate with each other; but (vv. 7, 8) the bearing fruit to God’s glory is of these the greater, being the result and aim of the other.

17.] The expression these things refers (as almost always in John, see verses 11, 21; xvi. 1, 25, 33; xvii. 1; xviii. 1 al.) back to what has gone before. ‘The object of my enjoining these things on you is (for all since ver. 12 has been an expansion of the words “as I loved you”) that ye love one another’ (see 1 John iv. 11). Then from the indefiniteness of this term, one another, our Lord takes occasion to forewarn them that however wide their love to one another, they cannot bring all within this category; there will be still the world outside, which will hate them.

18–27.] Their relation to the world: and vv. 18–21, ground of the world’s hatred. On the connexion, see above.

18.] See ch. vii. 7.

The verb rendered in the A.V. “ye know,” is most likely imperative, know ye. The assertion of their knowledge of the fact would in all likelihood have been otherwise expressed in the original. See more in the note in my Greek Test. The great proof of this hatred to Him was yet to come, but is viewed as past. This knowledge brings comfort, 1 Pet. iv. 12, 13.

19.] not only explains this hatred, but derives additional comfort from it, as a sign that they were not (any longer) of the world; but chosen out of it by Him, and endued with a new life from above.

By the result being expressed in the words, would love his (its) own, not “would love you,” we have the true practice of the world hinted at, and the false character of the world’s love, as a mere self-love, set forth. In this ‘loving their own,’ the children of this world fall into hating one another. Meyer remarks the solemnity of the world thus repeated five times.

20.] Our Lord had said it to them in ch. xiii. 16, but with a different reference: the sense here being, ‘Remember the saying, for it is true in this matter also;’ see Matt. x. 24, where it is used in the same sense. They, i.e. the world—the persons constituting it.

A difficulty has been raised on the latter clause of this verse, because “they” did not in any sense “keep” Christ’s word, whereas they did persecute Him: and an attempt has been made to give to the word “keep” the sense of watching with a hostile intent, which it will not bear. Nor is irony (Lampe, Stier) in this latter clause at all in keeping with the solemnity of the discourse. There is no real difficulty: the words simply mean, ‘the keeping My word and the keeping yours are intimately joined, and when you find the world or any part of the world do the first, you may infer the other.’ The issue of the condition, “If they kept My saying,” was to be proved by their rejection and killing of the Lord Jesus.

21.] Howbeit—stronger than merely “But:”—nay, so far is this from being so, that it is on this very account, because ye belong to Me, that they will thus treat, you.

all these things—all that is im-plied in hating and persecuting.

It was on account of bearing the Name of Christ that the Christians were subjected to persecution in the early ages, and that, they are even now hated by those who know Him not: but this is to them comfort and joy, see Acts v. 41: 2 Cor. xii. 10: Gal. vi. 17: 1 Pet. iv. 14.

they know not] not, ‘They know Him not as having sent Me’—but they know not Him who has sent Me. Ignorance of God

(not desiring the knowledge of His ways) is the great cause of hostility to Christ and His servants.

22.] The sinfulness of this hate. See ch. ix. 41 and note.

If I had not come and spoken unto them, i.e. discoursed to them, generally: not, acquainted them with their sin. The sin spoken of is, not the generally sinful state of the world,—nor the sin of unbelief in Christ, which they of course could not have committed, had He never come: but, the sin of hatred to Him and His, which might have been excused otherwise, but now that He had come and discoursed with them, had no excuse, since He had plainly shewn them the proofs of His mission from the Father.

Thus He shews that they embraced the side of evil of their own accord, and had no pretext of self-justification.

23.] See ch. xiv. 9. Human regards, whether of love or of hatred, towards Him who is the only manifestation of the Father to His creatures, are in fact directed towards the Father Himself; see Ps. Ixix. 9, cited in Rom. xv. 3.

24.] He refers to the testimony of His works among them also, as leaving them again without excuse;—they had had ocular witness of His mission.

25.] But all this not as an accidental thwarting of My word and work among them, but as a matter predicted in Scripture.

in their law, ch. x. 34 and note. To suppose any irony in these words, as De Wette does (‘they are true followers-out of their law’), is manifestly against, the whole spirit of our Lord’s reference to the law. It is called ‘their law,’—“the law which they are ever turning over and vaunting themselves about,” as Bengel says,—as condemning them, though their boast and pride.

without a cause, as answering to “they have no excuse for their sin,” ver. 22.

The citation is probably from Psalm lxix., which treats of the rejection and sufferings of the Messiah.

26.] This assurance carries on the testimony concerning Christ,—which the world should see and hear, and yet reject and hate Him,—even to the end of time, by means of the Spirit of Truth: so that on the one hand this seeing and hating must not be expected to cease as long as the Spirit bears this witness,—and on the other, He, the Spirit of Truth, will never cease to overcome the hating world by this His testimony.

the Comforter (Paraclete)] See ch. xiv. 16 and note.

whom I will send] Stier dwells on the accurate division of the clauses here, “the Comforter whom I will send,”—but “the Spirit of Truth which proceedeth from the Father.” The first clause he regards as spoken with reference to the mediatorial dispensation, of the Spirit in His office as Paraclete, sent from the Father by the glorified Son (or, by the Father in the Son’s name, ch. xiv. 26), and bringing in the dispensation of the Spirit;—the second, in strictness of theological meaning, of the essential nature of the Spirit Himself, that He proceedeth forth from the Father. (And if from the Father, from the Son also,—see ch. xvi. 15, and those passages where the Spirit is said to be His Spirit, Rom. viii. 9; Gal. iv. 6; Phil. i. 19; 1 Pet. i. 11, also Rev. xxii. 1.) Perhaps however it is better to take the whole as spoken with reference to the mediatorial dispensation. Then the former description is parallel with the latter, and the procession from the Father is the sending by the Son. At all events, this passage, as Beza remarks, cannot be alleged either one way or the other in the controversy with the Greek church, which maintains that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father alone, not as we (see Nicene Creed) from the Father and the Son.

27.] The disciples are not, as some have supposed, here mentioned as witnesses separate from and working with the Holy Spirit. The witness is one and the same; the Spirit will witness in and by them: the introductory clause, when the Comforter is come, belongs to the whole; see Luke xxiv. 48, 49, where this is strongly expressed. This verse alludes to the historical witness which the Holy Ghost in the ministers and eye-witnesses of the word, Luke i. 2, should enable them to give,—which forms the human side of this great testimony of the Spirit of truth, and OF WHICH OUR INSPIRED GOSPELS ARE THE SUMMARY: the Divine side being, His own indwelling testimony in the life and heart of every believer in all time. But both the one and the other are given by the self-same SPIRIT;—neither of them inconsistent with, or superseding the other.

from the beginning, as in Luke i. 2, and in the sense of Acts i. 21;—‘from the beginning of the Lord’s ministry,’ The present tenses set forth the connexion between the being (continuing to be) witnesses, and the being (having been throughout) companions of the Lord in His ministry. Thus we have in 1 John iii. 8, “the devil sinneth from the beginning.”

John: Chapter 16

CHAP. XVI. 1–33.] The promise of the Comforter expanded in its fulness. And herein, vv. 1–15, the conditions of His coming and His office.

1.] These things, viz. ch. xv. 18–27,—not only the warning of the hatred of the world, but the promise of the testifying Spirit (Stier).

2.] On putting out of the Synagogue, see ch. ix. 22; xii. 42.

The word yea introduces a yet more grievous and decisive proof of their nature.

that he offereth a service to God] The verb in the original is the technical word for offering a sacrifice. The Rabbinical books say that “he who sheds the blood of an infidel is as one offering a sacrifice.” See 1 Cor. iv. 13, and note.

3.] See Luke xxiii. 34; ch. xv. 21; Acts iii. 17; and 1 Tim. i. 13.

4.] Nevertheless here indicates no contrast, but only breaking off the mournful details, and passing back to the subject of ver. 1. If we are to seek any contrast, it will be between the “non-knowledge” of the world, and the “remembering” of the church. The one know not what they are doing: the other know well what they are suffering.

their hour] i.e. the time of their happening.

The “I” before told you of them is emphatic, ‘I MYSELF:—that it was I MYSELF who told you. A difficulty has been found in the latter part of the verse, because our Lord had repeatedly announced to them future persecutions, and that at least as plainly as here, Matt. v. 10; x. 16, 21–28, and elsewhere. And hence some Commentators find ground for supposing that the chronological order of the discourses has not been followed in the three first Gospels. But there is in reality no inconsistency, and therefore no need for such a supposition. This declaration, as here meant, was not made before, because He was with them. Then clearly it is now made, in reference to His immediate departure. And if so, to what will these things most naturally refer? To that full and complete account of the world’s motives, and their own office, and their comfort under it, which He has been giving them. This He had never before done so plainly, though occasional mention has been made even of the help of the Spirit under such trials; see Matt. x. 19, 20.

because I was with you] While the Lord was with them (compare Matt. ix. 15), the malice of the world was mainly directed against Him,—and they were overlooked: see ch. xviii. 8.

In this past tense, I was, we have the anticipatory character of the discourse again manifest. The Lord looks upon His earthly course as ended.

5.] This is occasioned by the foregoing, but in fact begins the new subject, the condition of the Comforter’s coming.

and none of you asketh me....] They had (see ch. xiii, 36; xiv. 5) asked this verbally before: our Lord therefore cites the question here in some other and deeper sense than they had used it there. I believe the meaning to be: ‘None of you enquires into the NATURE of My departure, so as to appear anxious to know what advantages are to be derived from it; but (ver. 6) you are all given up to grief on account of what I have said’

6.] ‘Grief has filled, entirely occupied, your heart (not “your hearts,” but singular, as common to all, see Rom. i, 21), to the exclusion of any regard of my object in leaving you.’ ‘These are the same disciples who afterwards, when their risen Lord had ascended to heaven,—without any pang at parting with Him, returned with great joy to Jerusalem, Luke xxiv. 52.’ Augustine remarks that “there is beneath this mild rebuke a tacit consolation. For while He blames them in that they neglected enquiring whither He was going, He virtually excuses this their negligence, in that it arose from their being overwhelmed with sorrow.”

7.] Nevertheless refers to the last clause,—notwithstanding that no one of you asks me, I Myself will tell you the real state of the case.

It is expedient for you, implies that the dispensation of the Spirit is a more blessed manifestation of God than was even the bodily presence of the risen Saviour.

Every rendering of this verse ought to keep the distinction between the two verbs which our Lord uses in speaking of His departure; which is not accurately done in the A.V. Depart and go seem to be the best words: the first expressing merely the leaving them, the second, the going up to the Father.

The I before depart is again emphatic: ‘that I, for my part, should leave you.’

This saying of our Lord, that the Comforter will not come, except He himself depart, is a convincing proof, if one more were needed, that the gift of the Spirit at and since the day of Pentecost, was and is something TOTALLY DISTINCT from any thing before that time: a new and loftier dispensation.

8-11.] We have here, in a few deep and wonderful words, the work of the Spirit on the world set forth. This work He shall begin when He is come,—come, that is, to you: not, however, merely ‘by your means,’ but personally: so that it is not the work and witness of the Apostles which is spoken of, except in so far as they are servants of the Holy Spirit, but His own immediate personal working.

8. will convict] It is difficult to give in one word the deep meaning of the original term: ‘convince’ approaches perhaps near to it, but does not express the double sense, which is manifestly here intended—of a convincing unto salvation, and a convicting unto condemnation:—‘reprove’ is far too weak, conveying merely the idea of an outward rebuke, whereas this reaches into the heart, and works inwardly in both the above-mentioned ways. See the whole question amply discussed in Archdeacon Hare’s “Mission of the Comforter,” vol. ii. note K.

Lücke’s comment is valuable: ‘The testimony of the Holy Ghost in behalf of Christ as opposed to the unbelieving world (ch. xv. 26) is essentially a refutation, a demonstration of its wrong and error. All the apostolic preaching, as addressed to the world, takes necessarily this polemical form (1 Tim. v. 20; 2 Tim. iv. 2; iii. 16; Titus i. 9, 13; ii. 15). And the more difficult was the disciples’ conflict, against the power of this world with only the Word for their weapon, the more comfort was it for them, that the power of God the Spirit working by this refutation was their help. In Matt. x. 19, 20; Luke xii. 11, 12, the apologetic side of their conflict, which was in close connexion with the polemical, is brought into view. In the word here used is always implied the refutation, the overcoming of an error, a wrong,—by the truth and the right. And when, by means of the “refutation” the truth detects the error, and the right the wrong, so that a man becomes conscious of them,—then arises the feeling of guilt, which is ever painful. Thus every such “refutation” is a chastening, a punishment. And hence this office has been called the punitive office of the Spirit. The effect of the “refutation” carried on by the divine Spirit in the world may be to harden: but its aim is the deliverance of the world. This term the world, in John, includes those who are not yet delivered (from the power of Satan to God) who may be yet delivered,—not the condemned. If the “refutation” of the world is a moral process, its result may just as well be conversion, as non-conversion. Only thus did the refutation carried on by the Spirit answer the end of Christ’s coming;—only thus could it be a cheering support to the Apostles. Certainly, the judgment with which it closes is condemnation, not however of the world, but of the Prince of the world.’

De Wette denies the salutary side of this convicting process—but he is certainly wrong: see below. These three words, sin, righteousness, judgment, comprehend the three great steps of advance in spiritual truth among men. Of itself the world does not know what Sin is, what Righteousness is, what Judgment is. Nor can either of these be revealed to any man, except by the Spirit of God working within him. Each man’s conscience has some glimmering of light on each of these; some consciousness of guilt, some sense of right, some power of judgment of what is transitory and worthless: but all these are unreal and unpractical, till the convicting work of the Spirit has wrought in him.

9.] And the great opening of Sin to the world is to shew them that its root and essence is, unbelief in Christ as the Son of God. UNBELIEF:—for, mankind being alien from God by nature, the first step towards their recovery must be to lay hold on that only safety which He has provided for them; and that laying hold is faith, and the not doing it, when revealed and placed before them, is sin. Beforetime, it was also unbelief;—‘The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God:’—but now,—for we can only believe as God has revealed Himself,—it is unbelief in Christ the Son of God,—the having no desire to come to Him: see this pointedly asserted 1 John v. 10–12. Remember, this unbelief is not a mere want of historical faith,—but unbelief in its very root,—the want of a personal and living recognition of Jesus as the Lord (1 Cor. xii. 3), which, wherever the Spirit has ‘opened His commission’ by the planting of the visible Church, is the condemning sin of the world. Of this He shall convince those who are brought out of the world, and ultimately convict those who remain in it and die in their sins (see Hare, “Mission of the Comforter,” vol. ii. note Q).

10.] The righteousness here spoken of cannot be only the righteousness of Christ, the mere conviction of which would only bring condemnation to that world which rejected and crucified Him: but as Stier remarks rightly, the conviction of the world concerning sin, righteousness, and judgment must be concerning a sin that is theirs, a righteousness that is (or, in the case of condemnation might have been) theirs, a judgment which is theirs (see below). Then what is the world’s righteousness? Not their own, but that of the accepted Man Christ Jesus standing at the right hand of God (seen by us no more, but by that very withdrawal testified to be the Son of God, THE RIGHTEOUS ONE), manifested in the hearts of men by the Spirit to be their only righteousness;—and thereby that righteousness, which they had of their own before, is demonstrated to be worthless, and as filthy rags. It is His going to the Father by which this righteousness is assured to us, and by the effect of which, the Spirit, the conviction respecting it is wrought in our hearts. The condemnatory side of this part of the Spirit’s work of conviction is, —that remorse, wherewith they whose day of grace is past shall look on the perfect righteousness which might have been theirs, and on the miserable substitute with which they contented themselves.

11.] As the righteousness spoken of was the world's righteousness, and the convicting them of it was the manifesting to them how worthless it (their righteousness after its old conception) was of their own by nature, but how perfect and complete it (the same as now newly and more worthily apprehended) is in and by Christ,—so now the judgment spoken of is the world's judgment:—on the one side, their judgment or estimate, or discrimination of things,—on the other side, God's judgment, to which it is opposed. This their judgment by nature they form in subjection to the prince of this world, the Devil, of whose power they are not conscious, and whose existence they even deny: but the Spirit of God shall convict this judgment of wrong;—shall shew them how erroneous and destructive it is, and what a bondage they have been under;—shall detect to them the Prince of this world reigning in the children of disobedience, and give them a better judgment, by which they shall ‘not be ignorant of his devices’ (2 Cor. ii. 11). But this better judgment itself is that very truth of God manifested in the Lord Jesus, by which (ch. xii. 31) the Prince of this world is cast out;—by which the follower of Christ is enabled to say, ‘Get thee behind me, Satan;’ by which the unbelieving world, and its Prince, are finally condemned in the judgment hereafter.

I have preferred giving pointedly what I believe to be the sense of this most important passage, to stringing together a multitude of opinions on it: seeing that of even the best Commentators no two bring out exactly the same shade of meaning, and thus classification is next to impossible. It will be seen that in my view the subjective (internal, acting in and on the mind of its subject) and objective (external, viewed from without, belonging to the object regarded, not to him who regards it) bearing of the three words are both to be kept in sight, and that the great convictive work of the Spirit is to bring man OUT OF HIMSELF INTO CHRIST, Who (in His objective manifestation) must be made unto him (subjectively), 1. redemption, 2. righteousness, 3. wisdom (the fourth, sanctification, not being here treated of, as being another part of the Spirit's work, and on those who are no longer “the world,” see ch. xvii. 16, 17); and to condemn those who remain in the world finally, in all these points, as having rejected Christ. And this convictive work of the Spirit is a complex and progressive work; including the ministry of the Apostles, and every step taken towards divine truth in the history of the Church, as well as the conversion of individuals, and condemnation of the unbelieving.

12.] The many things which our Lord does not say to them are, the things belonging to “all the truth” in the next verse, which were gradually unfolded, after the Ascension, by the Spirit.

13.] he, emphatical, as in ver. 8: see note, ch. vii. 29.

all the truth] viz. on those points alluded to in ver. 12. The Lord had ever told them the truth, and nothing but the truth, in spiritual things,—but not yet the whole truth, because they could not bear it. This the Spirit should lead them into, open the way to it, and unfold it by degrees.

No promise of universal knowledge, nor of infallibility, is hereby conveyed; but a promise to them and us, that the Holy Spirit shall teach and lead us, not as children, under the tutors and governors of legal and imperfect knowledge, but as sons (Gal. iv. 6) making known to us the whole truth of God. This was in an especial manner fulfilled to them, as set to be the founders and teachers of the Churches.

for he shall not speak of himself] The Spirit does not, any more than the Son, work or speak of Himself: both are sent, the one from the Father, the other from the Father and Son: the one to testify “whatssoever He shall hear” of the Father, the other of the Father and the Son.

whatssoever he shall hear] from God, the Father and the Son.

he shall tell you the things to come] As the direct fulfilment to the Apostles of the leading into the whole truth was the unfolding before them those truths which they have delivered down to us in their Epistles,—so, though scattered traces of the fulfilment of this part of the promise are found in the Acts and those Epistles, its complete fulfilment was the giving of the Apocalypse, in which “the things to come” are distinctly the subject of the Spirit's revelation, and with which His direct testimony closes: see Rev. i. 1; xxii, 6, 20. On the whole of this verse, see Eph. iv. 7–16.

14.] This is in connexion with ver. 12—and sets forth that the Spirit guiding into truth is in fact the Son declaring the truth, for He shall shew forth the glory of Christ, by revealing the matters of Christ,—the riches of the Father's love in him (ver. 15).

This verse is decisive against all additions and pretended revelations subsequent to and besides Christ; it being the work of the Spirit to testify to and declare THE THINGS OF CHRIST; not any thing new and beyond Him. And this declaration is coincident with inward advance in the likeness and image of Christ (2 Cor. iii. 17, 18), not with a mere external development.

15.] Here we have given us a glimpse into the essential relations of the Blessed Trinity. The Father hath given the Son to have life and all things in Himself (Col. i. 19; ii. 2, 3), the relation being, that the Son glorifies not Himself but the Father, by revealing the Father, whom He alone knows (Matt. xi. 27). And this Revelation, the Revelation of the Father by Christ—is carried on by the blessed Spirit in the hearts of the disciples of Christ; Who receives (i. e. whose Office it is to receive) of the things of Christ, and declares, proclaims, to them.

for this cause I (rightly) said.... i.e. ‘this was the ground of My asserting.’ not the reason why it was said, but the justification of it when said.

This verse contains the plainest proof by inference of the orthodox doctrine of the Holy Trinity.

16–24.] The Lord speaks of His withdrawal, and its immediate mournful, but ultimate (and those soon to begin) joyful consequences for His disciples.

The connexion is: ‘Very soon will the Spirit, the Comforter, come to you: for I go to the Father, without any real cessation of the communion between you and Me.’ Lücke.

16.] The mode of expression is (purposely) enigmatical;—the beholding: and seeing not being co-ordinate;—the first referring merely to physical, the second also to spiritual sight. So before, ch. xiv. 19, where see note. It is important to observe the distinction between the two verbs, which the A.V. has obliterated by rendering both “see.” The “beholding” implies the long, constant, usual sight of Him which they then had in the flesh: the “seeing” the glimpses obtained by occasional appearances and visions, and the dimmer and more interrupted spiritual sight gained by faith.

The promise of seeing Him after a little while, began to be fulfilled at the Resurrection;—then received its main fulfilment at the day of Pentecost;—and shall have its final completion at the great return of the Lord hereafter. Remember again, that in all these prophecies we have a perspective of continually-unfolding fulfilments presented to us: see note on ch. xiv. 3.

17, 18.] The disciples are perplexed by this little while, as connected with what our Lord had before asserted ver. 10, “I go to my Father.” That seemed to them a long and hopeless withdrawal: how was it then to be reconciled with what he now said of a short absence? What was this little while? This connexion not being observed, has led to the insertion by the copyists of the clause because I go to the Father in ver. 16.

19.] The real difficulty being in the “little while,” our Lord applies himself only to this, not noticing the other part of the question: which confirms the view of the connexion taken above.

20.] The words weep and lament are to be literally taken: see Luke xxiii. 27. They would mourn for Him as dead:—see also ch. xx. 11.

ye, emphatic, as opposed to the world. And the joy of the world found its first exponent in the scoffs of the passers-by at the crucifixion.

ye shall be sorrowful] ‘This goes deeper than the weeping and wailing before: and plainly shews that the whole does not only refer to the grief while the Lord was in the tomb, but to the grief continually manifesting itself in the course and conflict of the Christian, which is turned into joy by the advancing work of the Spirit of Christ;—and, in the completion of the sense, to the grief and widowhood of the Church during her present state, which will be turned into joy at the coming of her Lord.

shall be turned into joy] not merely changed for joy, but changed into so as itself to become,—so that the very matter of grief shall become matter of joy; as Christ’s Cross of shame has become the glory of the Christian, Gal. vi. 14.

21.] The object of comparison is, grief which is turned into joy: but the comparison itself goes far beyond this mere similitude.

A woman] The original has the definite article, the woman. This is said by some Commentators to be in allusion to the frequent use and notoriety of the comparison. We often have it in the O.T.,—see Isa. xxi. 3; xxvi. 17, 18; xxxvii. 3; lxvi. 7, 8; Hos. xiii. 13, 14; Mic. iv. 9, 10.

when she is in travail] literally, is bringing forth.

The deeper reference of the comparison has been well described by Olshausen: ‘Here arises the question, how are we to understand this similitude? We might perhaps think that the suffering Manhood of Christ was the woman in her pangs, and the same Christ glorified in the Resurrection, the Man born; but the Redeemer (ver. 22) applies the pangs to the disciples: how then will the “man” who is born apply to them?’ Then, after condemning the shallow and unsatisfactory method of avoiding deep research by asserting that the details of parables are not to be interpreted, he proceeds: ‘Hence the proper import of the figure seems to be, that the Death of Jesus Christ was as it were an anguish of birth belonging to all Humanity, in which the perfect Man was born into the world; and in this very birth of the new man lies the spring of eternal joy, never to be lost, for all, inasmuch as through Him and His power the renovation of the whole is rendered possible.' And indeed the same is true of every Christian who is planted in the likeness of Christ. His passing from sorrow to joy—till 'Christ be formed in him,' is this birth of pain. And the whole Church, the Spouse of Christ,—nay, even the whole Creation, travaleth in pain together (Rom. viii. 23) till the number of the elect be accomplished, and the eternal joy brought in.

22.] I will see you again—in the same manifold meaning as before noticed—will see you—at My Resurrection—by My Spirit—at My second Advent.

23.] that day, in its full meaning, cannot import the forty days: for, Acts i. 6, they did then ask the Lord questions—nor this present dispensation of the Spirit, during which we have only the firstfruits, but not the full understanding so as not to need to ask any thing; (for is not prayer itself an asking?)—but that great completion of the Christian's hope, when he shall be with his Lord, when all doubt shall be resolved, and prayer shall be turned into praise. The Resurrection-visiting, and the Pentecost-visiting of them, were but foretastes of this. Stier well remarks, 'The connexion of the latter part of this verse is,—the way to asking nothing any more, is to ask and to pray the more diligently, till that day comes.'

It has been supposed wrongly that the words me and the Father are in opposition in this verse, and thence gathered that it is not lawful to address prayer to Christ. But such an opposition is contrary to the whole spirit of these discourses,—and asking the Father in Christ's name, is in fact asking HIM.

In the latter clause, notice the right reading, He will give it you in my name, He being the element, the region, of all communication between God and the Church. Compare Rom. i. 8, where thanks are offered through Jesus Christ.

24.] It was impossible, up to the time of the glorification of Jesus, to pray to the Father in His Name. It is a fulness of joy peculiar to the dispensation of the Spirit, to be able so to do, Eph. ii. 18.

ask, and ye shall receive] See Matt, vii. 7, and mark the difference between the command then and now,—that in my name is added.

25–33.] Their present real weakness and imperfection, though fancied strength: their future high blessedness and share in His triumph, though in tribulation in the world.

25.] The word used here signifies literally, as rendered in A.V., a proverb: but it is better for the English reader to render it parable, because proverb has the technical appropriated sense of a short pithy saying of concentrated wisdom, whereas this implies generally something dark and enigmatical—deep truth wrapped up in words, as in a parable.

This is true of the whole discourse—and of the discourses of the Lord in general, as they must then have seemed to them, before the Holy Spirit furnished the key to their meaning.

the hour cometh] viz. the same as that indicated in vv. 16 and 23;—but here again, not one hour only exclusive of all others, but to be understood of the several steps of spiritual knowledge.

Olshansen finely remarks, that all human language is a parable, or dark saying, only able to hint at, not to express fully, the things of God; and that the Lord contrasts the use of this weak and insufficient medium, with the inward teaching of the Holy Spirit. This inward teaching, because it is a real imparting of the divine Nature and Life, brings with it not only prayer in the name of Jesus, but a free access to the Father Himself. This speaking plainly however, he continues, is described here by the Lord in its ideal perfection (as it will hereafter be): and is only approximated to on earth; for, as long as the old man yet lives in us, we require still the Lord's intercessory prayer (ch. xvii. 15), daily washing from the pollution of the world; by which Intercession alone the faithful man, notwithstanding his imperfection, can enjoy in peace the grace of God vouchsafed to him.

26.] 'The more knowledge, the more prayer in the name of Jesus,' Lücke. 'Knowledge begets prayer,' Bengel. The approaching the Father through Him shall be a characteristic of their higher state under the dispensation of the Spirit

I say not unto you....] This has been variously understood. Grotius's rendering, "I pass by this, as a lesser thing than that which Tam about to mention," comes I believe the nearest to the truth, though it does not express the whole meaning. The Lord is now describing the fulness of their state of communion with Himself and the Father by the Spirit. He is setting in the strongest light their reconciliation and access to the Father. He therefore says, Ye shall ask the Father in My name: and I do not now say to you,—I do not now state it in this form,—as if there were no relation of love and mercy between the Father and yourselves:—(27) for the Father Himself(i. e. of His own accord) loveth you; why? Because ye love and believe on Me.

The whole mind of the Father towards mankind is Love: both in Redemption itself (ch. iii. 16),—and then in an especial manner by drawing those who come to Christ (vi. 44),—and again by this fuller manifestation of His love to those who believe on and love Christ. The aim of this saying is, to shew them that His intercession (which is still going on under the dispensation of the Spirit, 1 John ii. 1) does not imply their exclusion from access to the Father, but rather ensures that access, by the especial love which the Father bears to them who believe in and love His Son: CHRIST being still the efficient cause of the Father's love to them, and the channel of that Love. No stress must be laid (Lücke) on ye have loved here coming before ye have believed, as to Faith coming after Love: probably “ye have loved” is placed first as corresponding to the word “lovest” just before:—and it might be said with just as much reason that the Faith contains the ground of the Love, as the converse.

29, 30.] The stress is on Now: as if they said, “Why announce that as future, which Thou art doing now?” The hour was not yet come for the speaking plainly: so that we must understand the disciples' remark to be made in weakness, however true their persuasion, and heartfelt their confession. “They so little understand Him, that they do not even understand, that they did not understand. For they were as babes.” Augustine. “They are annoyed that they should be accounted by their Master as unskilful and not comprehending His discourses, and wanting another Teacher, the Spirit whom He promised. And thus they go so far as to contradict Christ and dispute His plain words, and deny that He was speaking enigmatically to them.” Lampe. But by the word now they probably only mean, in verses 26–28.

30.] ‘Thou hast spoken so clearly of our feeling towards Thee, and of Thyself, that we have no occasion to ask Thee any thing;—and this was what Thou didst announce would be;—we know therefore, by its being so, that Thou knowest the secrets of our hearts (all things by inference),—and hence believe that Thou camest forth from God.’ The whole being a understanding of what had gone before, vv. 23, 25.

31.] Our Lord does not clear up their misunderstanding, but leaves that for the coming day of the Spirit. He only assures them that their belief, though sincere and loving, was not so deeply grounded in knowledge of Him and His appointed course, as they imagined.

The opening words of our Lord's answer are much better taken not as a question; for this very belief was by our Lord recognized and commended, see ch. xvii. 8, also Matt. xvi. 17, 18. And as Stier remarks, “it was the aim and purpose of the whole prophetic office of Jesus, to prepare some first disciples (not the Apostles alone) for the reception of the Spirit of Truth and the fruits of His Death, by grounding in them firm belief in His Person.” He therefore recognizes their faith; but shews them how weak it as yet was.

32.] See Matt. xxvi. 31, to which same prophecy the reference here is.

I am not alone] The Father can never leave the Son, even in the darkest hour of His human suffering:—the apparent desertion implied in the cry ‘Why hast Thou forsaken me?’ being perfectly consistent with this; see note, Matt. xxvii. 46.

33.] On the first clause, especially the words in me, see ch. xv. 7. This presupposes the return from the scattering in ver. 32,—the branches again gathered in the vine.

ye have tribulation] The words are spoken of their normal state in the world.

This tribulation is not only persecution from the world, but trouble, inward distress, while we are in the world,—ch. xvii. 11;—a comforting sign that we are not of the world.

And this latter idea is implied between the two clauses: ‘Be of good cheer; for ye belong not to the world, but to Me, who have (anticipation again,—by that which is now at hand) overcome the world, so that it shall have no power over you, externally by persecution, or internally by temptations and discouragements.’ See 1 Jolin v. 4, 5.

John: Chapter 17

CHAP. XVII. 1–26.] HIS LOVE IN THE GLORIFICATION OF THE SON OF GOD. The parting prayer of the Lord Jesus: and herein, for Himself (1–5): for His disciples (6–19): for all believers, that they may be one (20, 21),—that they may be glorified in the completion of that unity (22–24),—for their abiding in the union of love, the perfection of divine knowledge (25, 26). Bengel observes that this, of all chapters in Scripture, is the simplest in words, and the deepest in meaning. “Our Lord, the Only-begotten, and co-eternal with the Father, when in the form of a servant, might, from this His condition of humiliation, have prayed in silence, if He had need of prayer: but it was His pleasure so to shew Himself as a suppliant to the Father, as to be mindful that He was our Teacher. Accordingly, the prayer which He made for us, He made known also to us: such a Master taught His disciples not only by His discourses to them, but by His prayers to the Father for them. And if them, who were to hear these words, then us also, who were to read them when written.” Augustine.

1.] These words, the foregoing discourse.

St. John very seldom depicts the gestures or looks of our Lord, as here. But this was an occasion of which the impression was indelible, and the upward look could not be passed over.

to heaven] Nothing hereby is determined as to the locality. The guest-chamber no doubt was the place of this prayer. The eyes may be lifted to heaven in doors, as well as out-of-doors; heaven is not the sky, but that upper region, above our own being and thoughts, where we all agree in believing God to be especially present; and which we indicate when we direct our eyes or our hands upward. The Lord, being in all such things like as we are, lifted up His eyes to heaven when addressing the Father (not His hands, for He prays not here as a suppliant—but as an intercessor and a High Priest, standing between earth and heaven, see ver. 24, where he says, I will, that.....).

It is impossible to regard the following prayer otherwise than as the very words of our Lord Himself,—faithfully rendered by the beloved Apostle in the power of the Holy Spirit.

Father] not, Our Father,—which He never could say,—nor, My Father,—which would be too great a separation between Himself and His for such a prayer (see Matt. xxv. [39,] 42, where He prays for Himself only)—but simply FATHER; that Great Name in which all the mystery of Redemption is summed up.

the hour is come] See ch. xii. 23, 28; xiii. 31, 32. The Glorification is—the exaltation by Death and Resurrection: He prays in the Manhood, and for the exaltation of the Manhood, but in virtue of His Godhead, ver. 5.

thy Son] He prays first as concerning Himself, in the third person, to set the great matter forth in all its majesty; then from Himself, in the first person, ver. 5, putting Himself into the place of “thy Son” here.

that thy Son also may glorify thee] “These words are a proof that the Son is equal to the Father as touching His Godhead. What creature could stand before his Creator and say, ‘Glorify Thou me, that I may glorify Thee?’” Stier.

This glorifying of the Father by the Son is, the whole great result of the glorification of the Son by the Father,—the manifestation of God to and in men by the Son through the Spirit.

2.] ‘The causal connexion expressed by according as is this, that the glorification, the end, must correspond to the beginning, to the sending, the preparation, and office of the Son.’ (Lücke.) We must also bear in mind that the ‘giving of power’ in this verse is the ground and source, as well as the type and manner, of the glorification: see Rom. i. 28; 1 Cor. i. 6.

all flesh is not only ‘all mankind,’ but (see Gen. vii. 15, 16, 21) all that has life, all that is subject to death, all that is cursed on account of sin. But of this all, mankind is the head and crown, and in the full blessings of the Lordship of Christ mankind only can participate. All flesh is given by the Father, from before the foundation of the world, to Christ; the whole creation is His to rule, His to judge, by virtue of His being, in the root of that human nature, to which sovereignty over the world was given, THE SECOND AND RIGHTEOUS ADAM.

But in this wide gift, there is a more special gift,—whatsoever thou hast given him in the stricter sense,—the chosen, they who believe on Him. And to them, and them only, He imparts the further and ineffable gift consequent on union with Him their God in the Spirit,—viz. ETERNAL LIFE (compare ch. v. 26, 27; also vi. 37).

3.] See a similar definition of a term just used, in ch. iii. 19.

this IS life eternal, not is the way to it. The knowledge spoken of is no mere head or heart knowledge,—the mere information of the mind, or excitation of the feelings,—but that living reality of knowledge and personal realization,—that oneness in will with God, and partaking of His nature, which IS itself life eternal:—the knowledge, love, enjoyment, of Him who is infinite, being themselves infinite. “The beginning of life is the result of the participation of God: and participation of God is the knowing God and enjoying His goodness.” Irenaeus. The Latin Fathers, Augustine, Ambrose, and Hilary, anxious to avoid the inference unwarrantably drawn by some from this verse against the Godhead of Christ, tried to arrange it thus: “that they might know Thee, and Jesus Christ whom Thou didst send, (to be) the only true God.” But this treatment of the original is inadmissible. Others, as Chrysostom and Euthymius, construing rightly, yet regarded Jesus Christ as included in the words “the only true God.” But all such violences to the text are unnecessary. For, first, the very juxtaposition of Jesus Christ here with the Father, and the knowledge of both being defined to be eternal life, is a proof, by implication, of the Godhead of the former. The knowledge of God and a creature could not be eternal life, and the juxtaposition of the two would be inconceivable. Secondly, the words whom Thou didst send most distinctly express the coming forth from God, ver. 8—imply the unity expressed in ver. 22, and cannot, in connexion with what follows, possibly be understood in a Socinian, or an Arian sense. I do not scruple to use and preach on the verse as a plain proof of the co-equality of the Lord Jesus in the Godhead.

A difficulty has been found in the use of the name JESUS CHRIST by the Lord Himself:—and inferences have been hence made that we have St. John's own language here:—but surely without any ground. He who said “Thy Son,” ver. 1, might well here, before the change to the first person in ver. 4, use that prophetic Name JESUS, which had been divinely given Him as the Saviour of men, and its weighty adjunct CHRIST, in which Names are all the hidden treasures of that knowledge of which He here speaks. And as to the later use of the two names together having led to their insertion here by the Apostle,—what if the converse were the case, and this solemn use of them by our Lord had given occasion to their subsequent use by the Church? This is to me much more probable than the other.

4, 5.] The past tenses are anticipatory. The past tenses are, in the original, inde-finite; I glorified Thee... I finished... Our Lord stands by anticipation at the end of His accomplished course, and looks back on it all as past, as historically gathered up in one act. In English we can hardly retain these indefinite past tenses. They admit with us of another meaning, seeming to refer to a period far removed, and not to one just completed. Wherever they can be retained in their proper force, I have done so.

the work which thou gavest me to do is not only the ministerial life of our Lord, but the whole Life, with all its appointed manifestations of humility and purity;—the perfect righteousness which by that life He has planted in our nature,—and His prophetic and declarative office, terminated by His Passion and Death.

5. glorify thou me] Notice the relation between I have glorified Thee before and glorify Thou Me now. The same Person who had with the Father glory before the world, also glorified the Father in the world, and prays to be again received into that glory. A decisive proof of the unity of the Person of Christ, in His three estates of eternal pre-existence in glory, humiliation in the flesh, and glorification in the Resurrection Body.

This direct testimony to the eternal præ-existence of the Son of God has been evaded by the Socinian and also the Arminian interpreters, by explaining the word had to mean, “possessed by Thy decree which destined it for Me.” On the identity of the glory in ver. 22 with this glory, see note there.

before the world was] i.e. ‘before all creation.’

with thee] See ch. i. 1, 18.

6-19.] He prays for His disciples.

6.] This verse particularizes ver. 4, and forms the transition to the intercessory prayer.

thy name] Thy Name of FATHER, which was so constantly on the lips of our Lord;—and which derived its living meaning and power from His teaching; see Exod. xxiii. 21.

the men which thou gavest me] The Father gave them to Christ, by leading them to Christ, see ch. vi. 37, 44, 45.

thine they were—Israelites—Thy people before:—not only outwardly, but Israelites indeed, see ch. i. 48, and thus prepared to receive Christ. And thus the expression out of the world answers to the taking to Himself a nation out of another nation, Deut. iv. 34. But see the fuller sense below, on ver. 9.

they have kept thy word—walked in the path of Thy commandments;—see ch. viii. 51, 52; xiv. 23.

Stier understands their walking in the Old Test. ordinances blameless, as Luke i. 6,—and thus (compare ch. i. 42, 46) recognizing Christ as the Messiah when He came. But this is perhaps hardly likely to have been set at the end of the sentence, after “Thou hast given them Me.”

7.] all things whatsoever thou hast given me, ‘My whole words and works.’

On this their conviction, which however had not reached its ripeness yet, see ch. xvi. 30.

8.] I have given unto them the words..., and the similar sayings ch. xv. 15 al., seem to be a reference to Deut. xviii. 18, 19, where it is said that the Prophet ‘shall speak unto them all that I shall command Him.’ The imparting to them of these “words” was the efficient cause of their faith:—see their confession ch. vi. 68, 69, where “we have believed and know” are connected as here.

On the two last clauses we may notice, that our Lord’s coming forth from the Father is with them more a matter of conviction from inference, and is therefore connected with they knew (see eh. iii. 2):—whereas the other side of the same truth, thou didst send me, the act of the Father unseen by us, is more a matter of pure faith,—and is therefore connected with they believed. In the first, the expression knew surely (truly) stamps our Lord’s approval on their knowledge, and distinguishes it from such knowledge as the bare assumption of knowing (John iii. 2) by Nicodemus and his colleagues.

9.] Stier remarks, that the Lord here begins to fulfil His promise Matt. x. 32.

I pray not for the world] The misconceptions which have been made of this verse, as implying a decree of exclusion for the vessels of wrath, may be at once removed by considering the usage of the term the world in this Prayer. The Lord does pray distinctly for the world, vv. 21, 23, that they may believe and know that the Father hath sent Him. He cannot therefore mean here that He does not pray (absolutely) for the world, but that He is not now asking for the world, does not pray this thing for the world. These “whom Thou gavest me” have already believed and known; the prayer for them is therefore a different one, viz. that in vv. 11, 15. The mistake would be at once precluded for English readers by the paraphrase, I am praying for them; I am praying not for the world....

for they are thine] in a fuller sense than “they were Thine,” ver. 6. That was their preparation for Christ; this is their abiding in Him, which is abiding in the Father, see next verse.

10.] Compare ch. xvi. 15 and note. “It were not so much if He had only said, ‘All Mine is Thine;’ for that we may all say, that all we have is God’s. But this is a far greater thing, that He inverts this and says, ‘All Thine is Mine.’ This can no creature say before God.” Luther.

The A.V.,—‘All Mine are Thine,’ &c.—gives the erroneous impression that persons only are meant, whereas it is all things, in the widest meaning,—the Godhead itself included,—of which this is asserted.

I am glorified in them] not ‘by their means,’ but in them; by that “I in them” of ver. 23, the life of the vine in the branches; so that the fruit of the branches is the glory of the vine, by the sap of the vine living in the branches. All this again is anticipatory.

11.] The occasion, and substance of His prayer for them.

I am no more in the world] This shews us that “the world” is not said of place alone, for the Lord Jesus is still here; but of state, the state of men in the flesh; sometimes viewed on its darker side, as overcoming men and bringing in spiritual death,—sometimes, as here, used in the most general sense.

and these are..] not but; it expresses the simultaneous state of the Lord and His, see ch. xvi. 32, and note.

Holy Father] Holy, as applied to God, peculiarly expresses that penetration of all His attributes by LOVE, which He only who here uttered it sees through in its length, breadth, and height:—which angels (Isa. vi. 3; Rev. iv. 8) feel and express:—which men are privileged to utter, but can never worthily feel:—but which devils can neither feel nor worthily utter (see Mark i. 24). They know His Power and His Justice only. But His Holiness is especially employed in this work of keeping in His name now spoken of.

in thy name] not ‘through Thine own Name,’ as A.V., which yet renders the same expression ‘in Thy Name’ ver. 12—but in the NAME of verses 6 and 12; see below.

thy name, which thou hast given me] Not only the best supported, but the best reading.

The Name of God is that which was to be in the Angel of the Covenant, Exod. xxiii. 21, see also Isa. ix. 6; Jer. xxiii. 6.

This Name,—not the essential Godhead, but the covenant name, JEHOVAH OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS,—the Father hath given to Christ, see Phil. ii. 9; and it is the being kept in this, the truth and confession of this, for which He here prays. ‘That which the Son has given to His disciples is no other than that which He himself has received from the Father, viz. the essential revelation of the Father.’ Luthardt. Compare Matt. x. 27.

that they may be one, even as we are] The oneness here is not merely harmony of will or of love,—as some have interpreted it, and then tried to weaken the Oneness of the Godhead,—but oneness by the indwelling of the Spirit of Christ, the gift of the Covenant (1 Cor. vi. 17), and ultimately (as the close union implied by even as requires) oneness of nature, 2 Pet. i. 4, where the expression “whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises” answers to the words “thy name which thou hast given me” here. The Lord does not say, “that they may be one with us,” nor, “that they and we may be one,” but “that they may be one as we are.” Augustine.

12.] I kept them: see ch. x. 28–30. The Lord here, as Cyril remarks, compares His keeping of His own, to that by the Father, —in a way only accountable by both Persons being of equal Power and Dignity.

not one of them perished, but...] So that Judas was one of the number which were given to Christ by the Father, mentioned in ver. 9:—shewing us (1) the sense in which those words must be understood (see above); and (2) that of such persons it is true that there is for them no ‘irresistible grace,’ no ‘keeping in God’s Name’ independently of their ‘keeping God’s word,’ ver. 6, which Judas did not do.

the son of perdition] See 2 Thess. ii. 3. As the other disciples, by true keeping of the divine words given to them, rose from being natural men to be the children of God, so Judas, through want of the same, sunk from the state of the natural man to that of the lost—the children of the devil.

Remark, it is not “I lost none, but the son of perdition.”—Christ did not lose him (compare ch. xviii. 9, where there is no exception), but he lost himself. It may be well to notice, for the English reader, that in the original, the noun perdition is the derivative of the verb perished. None perished but the one who should perish; whose very state and attribute it was to perish.

the scripture] in which this was indicated, viz. the passages alleged by St. Peter, Acts i. 20; see ch. xiii. 18.

13.] But now.... opposed to “While I was with them”... ver. 12, implying, ‘But I shall be here to keep them no more. And therefore I pray this prayer in their hearing, that’&c.

On my joy, see ch. xv. 11; xvi. 24; also the reference to these words in 1 John i. 4.

14–16.] See ver. 8.

Ver. 14 contains the manner in which He guarded them by giving them the Divine Word;—and the reason of the keeping prayed for, viz. because they would be objects of hatred to the world: I and the world being opposed.

even as I am not of the world] See ch. xv. 18.

15. I pray not...] Said mostly for their sakes, for whom it was necessary that they should abide yet in the flesh, to do God’s work, and (ver. 17) to be sanctified by God’s truth.

Not ‘from the evil,’ as A.V.; but from the evil one: see the usage of our Apostle in 1 John ii. 13, 14, y. 18, and compare iii. 12.

16.] repeated, as the ground both of the not praying that they might be taken out of the world; for they are already not of the world, above the world, so that they need not be removed from it in order to distinction from it;—and of the praying, that they might be kept from the evil one,—for they are clean (ch. xiii. 10); ‘Keep them from the polluter.’ This leads on to 17–19.] the process of sanctification through the knowledge of the truth imparted to them by Christ, and expanded in them by the Spirit.

The word sanctify, here and in ver. 19, carries the meaning, which unites the two uses, of consecration to God. (1) In them, this setting apart for Him was a long and gradual process, to be accomplished by conflicts, and the deeper sinking in of the Truth by the blows of affliction, and the purifying fire of the Spirit: in them it was strictly sanctification, the making holy: but (2) in HIM it was that pure and entire self-consecration by His submission to the Father’s holy will, the entire possession of His sinless Humanity with the living and speaking Truth of God, which should be at the same time the efficient cause of their sanctification and their Pattern. Such an High Priest became us (see Heb. vii. 26), who are to be ourselves priests unto God. Rev. xx. 6.

The A.V. is wrong in rendering through Thy truth; it should be, in Thy truth; see on ver. 11. The truth is the element in which the sanctification takes place.

thy word] Compare Acts xx. 32. Thy word, in its inner power on the heart.

Ver. 18. is anticipatory,—and received its fulfilment ch. xx. 21, He does not merely leave them in the world, but sends them into it, to witness to this same truth of God; see ch. xv. 16.

19.] See above on ver. 17. It is clear against all Socinian inferences from this verse, that all that part of the sanctification of the Son of God implied in ch. x. 36 is here excluded: and only that intended, which is expressed Heb. ii. 10 by making perfect through sufferings. Of this, His Death was the crowning act, and was also the one to which the expression for their sakes most directly applies; but the whole is included. The confining the meaning to His sacrifice, and the purpose stated, that they also... to their martyrdom, or their spiritual self-offering, Rom. xii. 1, is insufficient for the depth of the words.

sanctified in truth: what truth, is evident from ver. 17, viz. God's word and will, which is Truth, and the Truth.

20.] The connexion is with the words "I sent them into the world," ver. 18. The description, them which believe (not, "that shall believe," as in A.V.) expresses the state of faith in which all believers are found; the future would refer more to the act of belief by which that state is begun. But perhaps it is best to take the present tense as anticipatory. It is strikingly set forth here, that all subsequent belief on Christ would take place through the apostolic word: see Rom. x. 16, 17.

21.] The word that here hardly can regard the subject-matter of the prayer, ver. 20, but rather we should understand it as expressing the object of the prayer respecting both. The subject-matter of the prayer is, that they may be kept in God's name and sanctified in God's truth; and if this be so, their unity with the Son and the Father follows, 1 John i. 3. But here it is not merely 'with,' but in, the Son and the Father;—because the Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son, and 'He that is joined to the Lord, is one Spirit.' see ver. 11. This unity has its true and only ground in faith in Christ through the Word of God as delivered by the Apostles; and is therefore not mere outward uniformity, nor can such uniformity produce it. At the same time its effects are to be real and visible, such that the world may see them.

that the world may believe] This clause is not parallel with the former, as if the world believing meant the same as they all being one, that all may be brought to believe. Nor again can the words mean that the unbelieving and condemned world, at the end, may be persuaded 'that Thou hast sent Me.' Such a rendering would surely be repugnant to the spirit of the prayer, and to the use of the word believe in our Gospel. Rather is it,—'that this their testimony, being borne by them all, and in all ages, may continue to convince the world, so that many in the world may believe,' &c.

The "believing that thou didst send me" implies belief in the whole Work and Office of Christ. Here our Lord certainly prays for the world,—see above on ver. 9.

See a remarkable parallel, Rev. iii. 9, where, as Stier truly remarks, the persons spoken of are penitents.

22, 23.] Grotius and others interpret this glory to mean, the power of working miracles, and refer to ch. ii. 11 and ch. xi. 40; but wrongly:—for if so, in the words I have given them our Lord must refer to the Apostles only, whereas it is distinctly referred to the believers of all time. The glory is the glory of Christ as the only-begotten Son (ch. i. 14), full of grace and truth (see ver. 5 and note), which by virtue of His exaltation and the unity of all believers in Him through the Spirit, has become (not, shall be) theirs, Eph. ii. 6; Rom. viii. 30; Eph. i. 18; not yet fully, nor as it is His. but as each can receive and shew it forth. The perfection of it is spoken of, ver. 24.

We have the same recurrences of that as in ver. 21, and the same dependence. The second of them here expresses not merely the similarity of their unity to that of the Son and Father,—but the actuality of its subsistence, in Christ abiding in them and the Father in Christ.

"That the world may know" here, parallel as it is to "that the world may believe" above, cannot be interpreted of a bare recognition, or of a recognition at the final judgment,—but must be taken to mean that salutary knowledge by which from time to time the children of the world are by God called to become the children of light. See the same words, and note, ch. xiv. 31, also ch. xiii. 35, and observe that in all three places the recognition is that of love;—in ch. xiii. 35, of the disciples one to another; in ch. xiv. 31, of Jesus to the Father; here, of the Father to believers, as perfected into unity in the Son of His love.

"Observe," says Meyer, "how the glance of the Intercessor reaches in these verses even to the highest aim of His work on earth, when the world shall be believing, and Christ Himself actually the Saviour of the world, ch. iv. 42, cf. ch. x. 16."

24. that which thou hast given me (see the text in margin)] The neuter gender has a peculiar solemnity, uniting the whole Church together as one gift of the Father to the Son: see ch. vi. 39, note. Then the words that they also resolve it into the great multitude whom no man can number, and come home to the heart of every individual believer with inexpressibly sweet assurance of an eternity with Christ.

I will is not like in meaning to "we would" of ch. xii. 21 or "I would" of 1 Cor. vii. 7, but more like the same word in Mark vi. 25,—an expression of will founded on acknowledged right: compare Luke xxii. 29.

Compare also his expression with ch. v. 21; vi. 44.

where I am] i.e. in the glorified state:—see ch. xii. 26 and note: also ch. xiv. 3.

that they may behold my glory] This is the completion of ver. 22,—the open beholding of His glory, spoken of 1 John iii. 2, which shall be coincident with our being changed into His perfect image.

This word behold includes behold and partake—the very case supposes it. No mere spectator could behold this glory. See Rom. viii. 17 end, and 2 Cor. iii. 18.

because thou lovedst me...] The most glorious part of this sight of glory will be, to behold the whole mystery of redemption unfolded in the glory of Christ's Person,—and to see how, before the being of the creature, that eternal Love was, which gave the glory to Christ, of which all creation is but the exponent.

25, 26.] The epithet righteous, here applied to the Father, is connected with the final clause of ver. 24. The Righteousness of the Father is witnessed by the beginning of Redemption before the foundation of the world, and by the glorification of the elect from Christ; but also by the fact of the world's not knowing the Father,—the final distinction made by His Justice between the world and His. The making known, here spoken of, is carried on by the whole work and testimony of the Spirit completed in the Kingdom of God. This promise has been in fulfilment through all the history of the Church. And the great result of this manifestation of the Father's Name is, that the wonderful Love wherewith He loved Christ, may dwell in (not the Apostles merely—the future tense, I will make it known, has again thrown the meaning onward to the great body of believers) them,—i. e. the perfect, living knowledge of God in Christ, which reveals, and in fact is, this love. And this can only be by I in them—by Christ dwelling in their hearts by faith, and renewing and enlightening them by His Spirit. He does not say, ‘Thou in them’—but ‘I in them,’ and ‘Thou in Me:’ see ver. 23.

CHAP. XVIII.—XX.] FINAL MANIFESTATION OF JESUS AS THE LORD, IN REFERENCE TO THE NOW ACCOMPLISHED REJECTION OF HIM BY THE UNBELIEF OF ISRAEL, AND THE SORELTY TRIED BUT EVENTUALLY CONFIRMED FAITH OF HIS OWN. And herein

XVIII. 1—XIX. 16.] His voluntary submission of Himself to His enemies and to the unbelief of Israel.

1—11.] His betrayal and apprehension.

1—3.] Matt. xxvi. 30—47. Mark xiv. 26—43. Luke xxii. 39—53. On the omission by St. John of the conflict of the Redeemer's soul in Gethsemane, I would remind the reader of what has been said in the Introduction, on the character of this Gospel. The attempt to find in this omission a discrepancy between the setting forth of the Redeemer by St. John and the Three Gospels, is, as usual, unsuccessful. St. John presents us with most striking instances of the troubling of the human soul of Christ by the suffering which was before Him: see ch. xii, 23—27; xiii. 21. Compare notes on Matthew, ver. 36, and throughout the section.

1. the brook Cedron] The name given to this brook in the oldest text, of the cedars, seems to furnish an instance of the common practice of changing foreign, or unmeaning names, into other words bearing sense in the new language: the Hebrew word Ce-or Ke-dron signifying “of cedars” in Greek.

The ravine in the bottom of which flows the Kidron, is to the East of Jerusalem, between the city and the Mount of Olives.

a garden] Lücke suggests that the owner of this garden may have been friendly to (or a disciple of?) Jesus. It was called Gethsemane,—Matthew, Mark.

Traditions as to its site are, as usual, various. A square plot of ground in the depth of the ravine is now usually pointed out, and seems to have been fixed on at the time when the empress Helena visited Jerusalem, A.D. 326. Eusebius says Gethsemane was at the Mount of Olives: Jerome, at the foot of the mount. The language of Luke xxi. 37 leads to a belief that it may have been higher up the mount.

2.] oftentimes,—see Luke xxi. 37 [ch. viii. 1]. These accurate notices of our Evangelist are especially found in this last portion of his Gospel: cf. vv. 13, 24, 28; ch. xix. 14, 20, 41, &c.

3.] See, on this band of men, the note on Matthew ver. 47. Lanterns and torches were part of the utensils of military on a night march.

The latter of these appear to be strictly torches,—some blazing substance held in the hand;—and the former, lights, fed with oil.

The weapons were swords and staves,—Matthew, Mark. The fact of its being full moon did not make the lights unnecessary, as, in searching for a prisoner, they might have to enter dark places.

4-11.] Matt. xxvi. 48–56. Mark xiv. 44–52. Luke xxii. 48–53.

4.] On our Lord's foreknowledge of all that was to happen to Him, see Matt. xxvi. 45.

went forth] probably, from the shade of the trees into the moonlight; hardly, as De Wette and Lücke suggest, from some building in the garden.

Whom seek ye?) spoken,—as was the question to Judas in Matt. xxvi. 50, “Friend, wherefore art thou come?”—to carry reproof to the conscience of those addressed: and also to obtain for so solemn an act as the delivering Himself up to them, the formal declaration of their intention to take Him. “When men sought Him to make Him a king, He fled: now that they seek Him to put Him to death, He goes forth to meet them.” Stier.

5.] Some among them knew Him (Matt. xxvi. 55), others probably not. This answer may have been given by some one in authority among the Roman soldiers, who had it in command ‘to apprehend Jesus of Nazareth.’

Judas.... was standing with them] I believe these words to be the description of an eye-witness;—St. John detected Judas standing among them, and notices the detail, as is his constant habit, by way of enhancing the tragic character of the history. The narrative common to the three Gospels related the kiss which presently took place; but this self-tradition of our Lord was not related in it. St. John therefore adds this touch of exactness, to shew that the answer, Jesus of Nazareth, was not given because they were ignorant of His Person, so as not to be able to say ‘Thee;’—but because they feared to say it.

6.] The question on the miraculous nature of this incident is not whether it was a miracle at all (for it is evident that it must be regarded as one), but whether it were an act specially intended by our Lord, or a result of the superhuman dignity of His person, and the majestic calmness of His reply. I believe the latter alternative to be the right one. Commentators cite various instances of the confusion of the enemies of innocent men before the calmness and dignity of their victims: how much more was this likely to be the case when He in whom was no sin, and who spake as never man spake, came forth to meet His implacable foes as the self-sacrificing Lamb of God. So that I regard it rather as a miracle consequent upon that which Christ said and did, and the state of mind in which His enemies were,—than as one, in the strict sense, wrought by Him: bearing however always in mind, that to Him nothing was unexpected, or a mere result, but every thing foreknown. With this view what follows is also consistent, rather than with the other.

The distinction is an important one, as the view which we take of our Lord's mind towards His captors must enter, as an element, into our understanding of the whole of this scene, and indeed of the solemn occurrences which follow. Such incidents as this are not related by the Evangelists, and least of all by St. John, as mere astounding facts, but as grounds on which we are to enquire, and determine for ourselves, as to the “glory, full of grace and truth,” which was in Him, whom, not having seen, we love.

8.] Bengel strikingly says of this reply of our Lord, “He will say it once again hereafter.” And Augustine, “What will He do when He cometh to judge, who did this when He was to be judged? What will be His power when about to reign, who could do this when about to die?”

let these go their way] The band of soldiers, in their ignorance, appear to have been laying hands on the Apostles. This saying was sufficient to shew Peter and the rest what was the appointed course for them;—the command to let them go addressed to the band, is a command for them to go, when interpreted by the Apostles.

9.] See ch. xvii. 12. An unquestionable proof, if any were wanted, that the words of ch. xvii. are no mere description of the mind of our Lord at the time, nor free arrangement of His words, but His very words themselves.

On the application of the saying, we may remark that the words unquestionably had a much deeper meaning than any belonging to this occasion; but that the remarks so often made in this commentary on the fulfilment of prophecies must be borne in mind;—that to “fulfil” a prophecy is not to exhaust its capability of being again and again fulfilled:—that the words of the Lord have many stages of unfolding;—and that the temporal deliverance of the Apostles now, doubtless was but a part in the great spiritual safe-keeping which the Lord asserted by anticipation in these words.

10.] At this time took place the kiss of Judas, in accordance with the agreement entered into, and to assure the captors that the person thus offering himself was indeed Jesus of Nazareth, and no substitute for him: see note on Matt. ver. 49. The other view, that the kiss took place first, before the incidents of our verses 4–9, is to me quite inconceivable.

On Peter's act, see Matt. ver. 51. The names of Peter and Malchus are only found here:—the fact that it was the right ear, only here and in Luke.

The (external) ear, though severed, was apparently still hanging on the cheek;—for our Lord is said in Luke xxii. 51, to have touched his ear in performing the healing.

11.] the sheath here is “his (its place” in Matt., where see notes.

the cup] A striking allusion to the prayer in Gethsemane; for the image does not elsewhere occur in our Evangelist. See Matt. xx. 22, and the parallel places.

shall I not drink it?] literally, Am I not to drink it? for this, as Bengel remarks, was the tendency of Peter's struggle against what was about to happen.

12–24.] Peculiar to John. Jesus before the Jewish High Priests:—see below.

12.] The officers of the Jews were those sent by the Sanhedrim. Luthardt remarks: “He before whose aspect, and whose declaration, I am he, the whole band had been terrified and cast to the ground, now suffers himself to be taken, bound, and led away. This contrast the Evangelist has in mind here. To apprehend and bind ONE, all gave their help: the cohort, the captain, and the Jewish officers. This the Evangelist brings prominently forward, to shew how deep the impression of that previous incident still was: only by the help of all did they feel themselves secure. And thus it was ordered, that the disciples might escape with the more safety.”

13.] On Annas, see note Luke iii. 2. The influence of Annas appears to have been very great, and Acts iv. 6, he is called the High Priest, in the year following this. The narrative evidently rests upon some arrangement with regard to the High Priesthood now unknown to us, but accountable enough by foreign influence and the deterioration of the priestly class through bribes and intrigues, to which Josephus and the Talmud sufficiently testify. This hearing is entirely distinct from that in the other Gospels. There, no questions are asked of Jesus about His disciples or doctrine (ver. 19): there, witnesses are produced, and the whole proceedings are after a legal form. That hearing was in a public court of justice, before the assembled Sanhedrim; this was a private and informal questioning. That Annas should be so often called ‘the High Priest,’ is no objection to this view: see on Luke as above: see also note on ver. 24. The two hearings are maintained to be one and the same by many, among whom are Grotius, Bengel, Tholuck, &c.:—the view here taken is maintained by Chrysostom, Augustine, Olshausen, Neander, and others.

14.] See ch. xi, 49–52 and notes; also on the words, that year, ver. 13.

15.] the other disciple is here mentioned for the first time. There is no reason to doubt the universal persuasion that by this name John intends himself, and refers to the mention in ch. xiii. 23 of a disciple whom Jesus loved. The idea that it was Judas Iscariot, is surely too absurd to need confutation. The details mentioned concerning him, that he followed Jesus, that he was known to the High Priest (as a matter of individual notice), and the whole character of the incident, will prevent any real student of St. John's style and manner from entertaining such a supposition for a moment. How John was known to the High Priest, we have no means of forming a conjecture.

The palace of the High Priest was probably the dwelling of both Annas and Caiaphas.

16. her that kept the door] It was not unexampled to have female porters among the Jews. See Acts xii. 13.

17.] See the whole subject of Peter's denials discussed in notes on Matt. vv. 69–75.

This first denial was to all appearance rashly and almost inadvertently made, from a mere feeling of shame. Lücke suggests that Peter may have set himself among the servants of the High Priest to bear out his denial. The question, “Art thou also one of this man's disciples?” (ver. 25,) as Luthardt remarks, implies that the other disciple had already been recognized as a follower of Jesus, and had escaped annoyance.

19.] This preliminary enquiry seems to have had for its object to induce the prisoner to criminate himself, and furnish matter of accusation before the Sanhedrim.

of his disciples] His party, or adherents, as the High Priest would understand His disciples to be; how many, and who they were, and with what object gathered together;—and what His customary teaching of them had been. Of these, Jesus says nothing: compare vv. 8, 9. But He substitutes for them “the world,” to which He had spoken plainly.

20.] I, emphatic: as if it had been said, I am one, who...

plainly (referring to the character of the things said): not openly (referring to the outward circumstances under which they were s#id), which the word will not hear.

the world here is equivalent to “all the Jews,” or perhaps rather, “all who were there to hear.”

in secret spake I nothing] Stier thinks there was an allusion in these words to Isa. xlvi. 19; xlviii. 16,—in the last of which places the Messiah is speaking.

21.] See ch. v. 31, which appears to have been a legal maxim.

behold, THESE know] Our Lord appeals to persons there present in court, pointing at or otherwise designating them. The word “they” in the A.V., makes it appear as if He meant “those which heard Me.” Bengel. The “officers” mentioned in ch. vii. 46 may have been present: see next verse.

22.] See Acts xxiii. 2.

one of the officers which stood by] This was probably one of the band who took Jesus, and had brought Him hither. It is not quite certain whether the word here used implies a blow with the hand, or with a staff. They had staves, and perhaps thus used them: see note on Matt. xxvi. 67. This blow was a signal for the indignities which followed.

23.] bear witness in a legal way.

but if well] This latter supposition has the force of an assertion, that it was well. It has been often and well observed, that our Lord here gives us the best interpretation of Matt. v. 39—that it does not exclude the remonstrating against unjust oppression, provided it be done calmly and patiently.

24.] From what has been above said, it will be seen that I cannot acquiesce in the pluperfect rendering of this word sent, to bring about which the opening particle, So, has apparently been omitted by the copyists. I believe the verse simply to describe what followed on the preceding—So Annas (or Annas therefore) sent Him bound to Caiaphas the High Priest. “Then,” says Chrysostom, “not being able even thus to make progress in their decision, they send Him bound to Caiaphas.” There is no real difficulty in this rendering, if Annas and Caiaphas lived in one palace, or at all events transacted public affairs in one and the same. They would naturally have different apartments, and thus the sending from one to the other would be very possible; as also would the incident related by Luke xxii. 61:—see the extract from Robinson, Matt. xxvi. 69, note. “The Evangelist had no need to relate the hearing before Caiaphas, for he has related ch. xi. 47 ff.: and we have ere this been familiarized with the habit of our Evangelist not to narrate any further the outward process, where he has already by anticipation substantially given us its result.” Luthardt.

25–27.] Matt. xxvi. 71–74. Mark xiv. 69–72. Luke xxii. 58–61:—see note on Matt. xxvi. 69.

Peter was in the court-yard of the house.

26.] This was about an hour after the former,—Luke, ver. 59. The “I” is emphatic in the original: as we say, Did I not see thee with my own eyes?

28—CHAP. XIX. 16.] Jesus before the Gentile Governor. Matt. xxvii. 2, 11–30. Mark xv. 1–19. Luke xxiii. 1–25. Before this comes in the section of Luke, ch. xxii. 66–71, containing the close of the examination before the Sanhedrim, which did not happen till the morning. This undesigned agreement between St. Luke and St. John further confirms the justice of the view respecting the two hearings maintained above: see note on Luke, as above.

28–40.] Pilate's first attempt to deliver Him.

28. they themselves went not into the palace (literally, the Prætorium)] I have already discussed the difficulties attending the subject of our Lord's last Passover, in the note on Matt. xxvi. 17–19. I will add here some remarks of Friedlieb's. “The Jews would not enter the Prætorium that they might not be defiled, but that they might eat the Passover. For the entrance of a Jew into the house of a Gentile made him unclean till the evening. It is surprising, that according to this declaration of the Holy Evangelists, the Jews had yet to eat the Passover, whereas Jesus and His disciples had already eaten it in the previous night. And it is no less surprising, that the Jews in the early morning should have been afraid of rendering themselves unclean for the Passover,—since the Passover could not be kept till evening, i.e. on the next day, and the uncleanness which they dreaded did not, by the law, last till the next day. For this reason, the passage in John labours under no small exegetic difficulties, which we cannot altogether solve, from want of accurate knowledge of the customs of the time. Possibly the law concerning Levitical defilements and purifications had in that age been made more stringent or otherwise modified; possibly, they called some other meal, besides the actual Passover, by its name. This last we certainly, with our present knowledge of Hebrew antiquities, must assume: for the law respecting uncleanness will not allow us to interpret this passage of the proper Passover on the evening of the 14th of Nisan, nor indeed of any evening meal at all.”

The whole depends on this: can the words, eat the Passover, mean any thing else besides eating the paschal lamb in the strict sense? This is a question which in our day we have no power of answering. See the matter further discussed in the notes to my Greek Test. See note on ch. xix. 14. The tendency of what is there said is, to warn us, not to be rash in assuming a discrepancy between the Evangelists, where computations of time may have been so vague and various.

29.] Though Pilate, having granted the service of the band of soldiers to the Sanhedrim, must have been aware of the circumstances under which Jesus was brought before him, he demanded a formal accusation on which legally to proceed: “dissimulating his own information on the subject.”

30.] They do not mention the charge of blasphemy brought against Him by the Sanhedrim, for fear of the entire rejection of their cause, as by Gallio, Acts xviii. 16. The Procurators in such cases had a discretionary power. On what they did say, Grot. observes, “What was wanting to their proofs, they want to supply by an appeal to their own authority”

31.] This answer is best regarded as an ironical reproach founded on their apparently proud assertion in ver. 30—and amounting to this: ‘If you suppose I am to have such implicit confidence in your judgment concerning this prisoner as to take his guilt on your word, take him and put him to death (for so “Judge ye Him” must be understood,—see below) according to your law;’ reminding them that the same Roman power which had reserved capital cases for his jurisdiction, also expected proper cognizance to be taken of them, and not that he should be the mere executioner of the Sanhedrim.

It is not lawful for us to put any man to death] From the time when Archelaus was deposed (A. D. 6 or 7), and Judaea became a Roman province, it would follow by the Roman law that the Jews lost the power of life and death. Josephus tells us, that it was not lawful to hold a court of judgment in capital cases, without the consent of the Procurator. Some have thought that this power was reserved to them in religious matters, as of blasphemy and sacrifice; but no proof has been adduced of this; the passages commonly alleged in Josephus, and Acts vii. 58, not applying (see note on Acts). The Talmud relates that this had taken place forty years (or more) before the destruction of Jerusalem.

Biscoe, on the Acts, argues at great length that the Jews had this power; and that the words here merely mean that they could not put to death on the Sabbath, which, according to the usual custom of executing the next day after judgment, would now have been the case. But this treatment of the words is unjustifiable. Can we suppose for a moment that this can have been meant, when there is not a word in the text to imply it? We may hope that the day for such forced interpretations is fast passing away.

Friedlieb gives the most consistent account of the matter. In the Roman provinces generally, the Proprætor or Proconsul conducted judicial proceedings. But Judæa, which belonged to the province of Syria, was an exception. There was there a Procurator with full powers, who exercised the right of judicial cognizance. Jerusalem however possessed the privilege of judging all lighter causes before the three-and-twenty, and heavier causes, with the sole exception of capital trials, before the great Sanhedrim: so that none but these reserved cases remained for the Procurator. Pilate seems to have judged these cases at his visits during the festivals; which would fall conveniently for the purpose, it being the custom in Jerusalem, to execute great criminals at the Feasts. In other provinces the governors made circuits and held assizes throughout their jurisdictions.

32.] See Matt. xx. 19, and other places;—ch. xii. 32, 33. Had the Jews taken Him and judged Him, He would have been stoned, not crucified. And this whole section, vv. 28–32, serves to shew how the divine purpose was accomplished, 33.] This question probably arose out of what Pilate had previously heard, not from any charge to this effect being made between our vv. 31 and 34. Had such a charge been made, our Lord’s question ver. 34 would be unnatural.

Pilate summoned Jesus in, who had been as yet outside with the Jews. This was the formal reception of the case before him; —the Roman soldiers must now have formally taken charge of Jesus, as servants of the Roman authorities: having previously, when granted by Pilate to the Chief Priests, acted as their police.

The judgments of the Romans were always public and in the open air, see ch. xix. 13;—but the enquiries and examinations might be private. In this case Pilate appears to have wished to obtain an account from Jesus apart from the clamours of the chief priests and the mob.

34.] On this whole interview, see note on Luke vv. 3, 4.

I regard this question, Sayest thou this thing of thyself... as intended to distinguish the senses of the word King as applied to Jesus: and of course not for the information of Him who asked it, but to bring out this distinction in Pilate's mind. If he asked of himself, the word could certainly have but one meaning, and that one would be wrongly applied;—if from information derived from the Jews, this very fact would open the way to the true meaning in which He was King of the Jews. Stier and Ebrard think there may be some reference in the words of thyself, to a momentary earnestness in Pilate's own mind,—a suspicion that his prisoner was what he was charged with being (see ch. xix. 8, 12), from the mention of which he immediately (ver. 35) recoils, and implies the other side of the dilemma.

35.] Pilate at once repudiates the idea of his having any share in Jewish expectations, or taking any personal interest in Jewish matters: all his information he has derived from the public accusation of the people and chief priests. Then in the question, What hast Thou done?, is implied, ‘There is no definiteness in their charge: let me have thine own account, thy ex parte statement, that I may at least know something definite of the case.’

36.] This answer goes to explain the injustice of the charge of “perverting the nation” (Luke xxiii. 2), and to shew Pilate something of the nature of the kingdom which Jesus really came to establish.

My kingdom is not of this world] i.e. not belonging to (ch. viii. 23; x. 16) this world; not springing from, arising out of, this world;—and therefore not to be supported by this world's weapons. There is no denial that His Kingdom is over this world; but that it is to be established by this world's power.

The words not only deny, they affirm: if not of this world, then of another world. They assert this other world before the representative of those who boasted of their empire, which they called ‘orbis terrarum,’ i.e. the globe of the earth. Notice the solemn repetition of the words of this world.

my servants] certainly not angels (as Stier) nor angels and disciples (as Lampe). This sentence is elliptical, and the fact of “having servants” is included under the supposition introduced, that He was a King. ‘If&c.,—I should have had servants, and those servants would have fought.’

that I should not be delivered to the Jews] which was done by Pilate in ch. xix. 16.

now is my kingdom not from hence] The word now has been absurdly pressed by the Romanist interpreters to mean that at some time His Kingdom would be from hence, i.e. of this world: as if its essential character could ever be changed. But. now implies, ‘as the case now stands;’ it conveys an ocular demonstration, from the fact that no servants of His had contended or were contending in his behalf; see similar usages of now, ch. viii. 40; ix. 41; xv. 22, 24: Rom. vii. 16, 17.

37.] The word thou, in Pilate's question, is emphatic and sarcastic. “Art THOU, thus captured, bound, standing here as a criminal in peril of thy life, A KING?”

Thou sayest] A formula frequent in the Rabbinical writings: and conveying assent to the previous enquiry. It seems best, as in margin, to punctuate at it, and regard for, or because, as the reason for the affirmation conveyed in Thou sayest it. This agrees best with the continued affirmation which follows.

To this end have I been born...] Our Lord here preached the Truth of his mission, upholding that side of it best calculated to meet the doubting philosophic mind of the day, of which Pilate was a partaker. He declares the unity and outward reality of Truth:—and that Truth must come from above, and must come through a Person sent by God, and that that Person was Himself.

“I,” is both times emphatic, and majestically set (see above) against the preceding scornful thou of Pilate.

Our Lord implies that He was born a King, and that He was born with a definite purpose. The words are a pregnant proof of an Incarnation of the Son of God. This great truth is further expressed by what follows,—‘I have been born, but not therein commencing my being—I am (or, have) come into the world.’ Thns certainly are the words to be understood, and not of His public appearance, nor as synonymous with His having been born. It is this saying which began the fear in Pilate, which the charge of the Jews, ch. xix. 7, increased.

He is come into the world, not merely to speak truth, but to bear witness to the Truth, in its outward reality:—see ch. xvii. 17, 19, of which deep saying this is the popular exposition for his present hearer.

The Lord, besides, sets forth here in the depth of these words, the very idea of all kinghood. The King is the representative of the truth: the truth of dealing between man and man;—the truth of that power, which in its inmost truth belongs to the great and only Potentate, the King of Kings.

Again, the Lord, the King of manhood and the world, the second Adam, came to testify to the truth of manhood and the world, which sin and Satan had concealed. This testimony to the Truth is to be the weapon whereby His Kingdom will be spread;—‘every one who is of the truth,’ i.e. here in the most general sense, every one who is a true dealer with his own heart, who has an ear to hear,—‘of such are my subjects composed:—they hear my voice.’ But for the putting this true dealing on its proper and only ground, see ch. viii. 47; vi. 44.

38.] To this number Pilate did not belong. He had no ear for Truth. His celebrated question is perhaps more the result of indifferentism than of scepticism; it expresses, not without scoff and irony, a conviction that truth can never be found: and is an apt representative of the state of the polite Gentile mind at the time of the Lord’s coming. It was rather an inability than an unwillingness to find the truth.

He waits for no answer, nor did the question require any. Nay, it was no real question, any more than any other, behind which a negation lies hid.

I find no fault in him] I, opposed to you, who had found fault in Him. Pilate mocks both—the Witness to the Truth, and the haters of the Truth. His conduct presents a pitiable specimen of the moral weakness of that spirit of worldly power, which reached its culminating point in the Roman empire.

39.] At this place comes in Matt. xxvii. 12–14;—the repeated accusation of Jesus by the chief priests and elders, to which He answered nothing;—and Luke xxiii. 5–16, the sending to Herod, and second proclamation of His innocence by Pilate,—after which he adopts this method of procuring His release (Luke, ver. 17).

ye have a custom] See note Matt. xxvii. 15, and compare, for an instructive specimen of the variations in the Gospel narratives, the four accounts of this incident.

40.] They have not before “cried out” in this narrative: so that some circumstances must be presupposed which are not here related: unless verses 30 and 11 be referred to.

Now Barabbas was a robber] In Mark xv. 7, Luke xxiii. 19, a rioter;—but doubtless also a robber, as such men are frequently found foremost in civil uproar. There is a solemn irony in these words of the Apostle—a Robber! See the contrast strongly brought out Acts iii. 14. Luthardt remarks on the parallelism with Levit. xvi. 5–10. Thus was Jesus ‘the goat upon which the Lord’s lot fell, to be offered for a sin-offering.’

John: Chapter 19

CHAP. XIX. 1.] The reason or purpose of this scourging does not here appear; but in Luke xxiii, 21–23 we read that after the choice of Barabbas, Pilate asked them what should be done with Jesus? And when they demanded that He should be crucified, Pilate, after another assertion of his innocence, said “I will chastise him, and let him go.” Thus it is accounted for.

2, 3. and they approached him] This has been probably erased by the copyists, as not being understood. It was their mock-reverential approach, as to a crowned king: coming probably with obeisances and pretended homage. In the address, Hail, King of the Jews, they were insulting the Jews, as much as mocking Christ. See notes on Matt. vv. 27–30;—and on the purple robe, Mark, ver. 17.

4.] The unjust and cruel conduct of Pilate appears to have had for its object to satisfy the multitude by the mockery and degradation of the so-called King of the Jews: and with that view he now brings forth Jesus. His speech is equivalent to—“See what I have done purely to please you—for I believe Him innocent.”

5.] is the accurate and graphic delineation of an eye-witness, and intimately connected with the speech of Pilate which follows. For the cry, Behold the man! is uttered to move their contempt and pity;—‘See this man who submits to and has suffered these indignities—how can He ever stir up the people, or set Himself up for King? Now cease to persecute Him; your malice surely ought to be satisfied.’

6.] This had been cried before, see Matthew, ver. 22 and parallels. Possibly St. John may not have heard the cry. According as men have been in different parts of a mob, they will naturally report differently, as those nearest to them cried out.

Take him yourselves] The words of Pilate shew vacillation between his own sense of the innocence of Jesus and his fear of displeasing the Jews and their rulers. He now, but in ironical mockery, as before, ch. xviii. 31, delivers the matter entirely into their hands: perhaps after having received the message from his wife,-Matthew ver. 19.

7.] In consequence of this taunt, they now declare the cause of their condemnation of Him—see Levit. xxiv. 16—and their demand that, though found innocent by the governor, He should die.

8.] This charge served to increase the fear which Pilate had before: see note on ch. xviii. 37

The name Son of God served also to confirm the omen already furnished by the dream of his wife. That this fear was not a fear of the Jews, nor of acting unjustly, but of the Person of Jesus, is evident from what follows.

9.] He entered, taking Jesus with him.

Whence] i.e. not ‘from what province?’—for he knew this, Luke xxiii. 6, 7: nor, ‘of what parents?’—but whence? in reference to the name, the Son of God: Whence is thine origin? Observe that the fear of Pilate is not mere superstition, nor does it enter into the Jewish meaning of “the Son of God:” but arises from an indefinite impression made on him by the Person and bearing of our Lord. We must not therefore imagine any fear of Him as being a ‘son of the gods,’ in Pilate’s mind: this gives a wrong direction to his conduct, and misses the fine psychological truth of the narrative.

Our Lord, in His silence, was acting according to His own precept, Matt. vii. 6. Notwithstanding Pilate’s fear of Him, he was not in earnest;—not determined to be led by his conscience, but had already given way to the unjust demands of the people; and He who saw his heart, knew how unworthy he was of an answer to so momentous a question. Besides, this silence was the most emphatic answer to all who had ears to hear it;—was a reference to what He had said before, ch. xviii. 37, and so a witness to His divine origin. Would any mere man, of true and upright character, have refused an answer to such a question, so put? Let the modern rationalist consider this.

10.] As in ch. xviii. 35, Pilate at once recoils from his better conscience into the state-pride of office. As Lampe remarks, this speech is directly contrary to his previous expression of fear. This very boast was a self-conviction of injustice. No just judge has any such power as this, to punish or to loose (see 2 Cor. xiii. 8); but only patiently to enquire and give sentence according to the truth.

unto me, emphatic: it perhaps being implied, ‘Thou hast, I know, refused to reply to others before.’ That Pilate should put the releasing first, as it stands in the most ancient authorities, seems most natural, as appealing most to the prisoner: the power of crucifying follows as the alternative in case the other is rejected.

11.] This last testimony of our Lord before Pilate is a witness to the truth: opening in a wonderful manner the secret of Pilate’s vaunted power, of His own humble submission, and the sinfulness of His enemies. This saying, observes Meyer, breathes truth and grace. The great stress is on the term from above, on which Grotius strikingly says, “hence, that is, from whence I am sprung;” so that it furnishes a remarkable answer to the above. We must not dream of any allusion to Rome, or the Sanhedrim, in this question “Whence art thou?” as the sources of Pilate’s power:—the word was not so meant, nor so understood: see ver. 12.

The word it does not refer to power against me, but embraces in itself the whole delegation from above, power included: and the words “except it were given thee from above,” are equivalent to except by appointment from above. Lampe remarks: “Our Lord concedes to Pilate 1) Power. He acknowledged the authority of a human court, because His kingdom was not earthly, destroying human magistrates: nor did He dispute the authority of Pilate and the Romans over the Jews. 2) He even amplifies that power, as given from above. For this is the Christian doctrine, that all power is from God (Rom. xiii. 1, 2). 3) He acknowledges that that power extended even over Himself, since all concerning Him was being done by divine decree (Acts iv. 28).”

for this cause] viz. because of what has just been asserted, ‘Thou wouldest have no power&c.’

The connexion is somewhat difficult. I take it to be this: ‘God has given to thee power over me;—not insight into the character which I claim, that of being the Son of God—but simply power: that insight belonged to others, viz. the Sanhedrim, and their president, whose office it was to judge that claim; they have judged against the clearest evidence and rejected me, the Son of God; thy sin, that of blindly exercising thy power, sin though it be, is therefore less than theirs, who being God’s own people, and with God’s word of prophecy before them (and the High Priest, with his own prophetic word before him,— see ch. xviii. 14), deliberately gave me over into thy hand.' It is important to this, which I believe to be the only right understanding of the words, to remember that Pilate, from ver. 6, was making himself simply their tool;—He was the sinful, but at the same time the blind instrument of their deliberate malice.

he that delivereth me unto thee] Beyond question, Caiaphas,—to whom the initiative on the Jewish side belonged; by whose authority all was done. At the same time the whole Sanhedrim are probably included under the guilt of their chief.

In this word sin is an implied reference to a higher Judge—nay, that Judge Himself speaks.

12.] Upon this: or from this time: but the words in the original hardly bear so much as this latter meaning. See ch. vi. 66, where the same correction has been made.

Pilate himself was deeply struck by these words of majesty and mildness, and almost sympathy for his own weakness; and he made a last, and, as this verse seems to imply, a somewhat longer attempt than before, to deliver Him.

Cæsar's friend] There does not seem to be any allusion to this name being bestowed as a title of honour (indeed, a good deal of fancy has been employed in making out the fact of such a title having been in use) any further than that the appellation would naturally arise and be accounted honourable. The meaning is, 'well affected to Cæsar.'

This was a terrible saying, especially under Tiberius, with whom, as Tacitus assures us, the undefined charge of disaffection to the person of the emperor was used to fill up all other accusations.

every one that maketh himself a king] This was true: their application of it to Christ, a lie. But words, not facts, ave taken into account by tyrants, and this Pilate knew.

13.] these words—viz. these two last remarks. "In such a perplexity, a man like Pilate could not long hesitate. As Caiaphas had before said, it were better that one even innocent man should die, than that all should perish: so now in like case Pilate decided rather to sacrifice Jesus though innocent, than to expose himself to so great danger." Friedlieb.

forth: see on ch. xviii. 33. The judgment seat, or bema, was in front of the praetorium, on an elevated platform called Gabbatha, which was paved with a tessellated pavement. Such a pavement, Suetonius informs us, Julius Cesar carried about on his expeditions.

14. the preparation of the passover] The signification, 'Friday in the Passover week,' has found many, and some recent, defenders. But this is not the natural meaning of the words, nor would it ever have been thought of in this place, but for the difficulty arising from the whole Passover question, which I have discussed on Matt. xxvi. 17–19, and on ch. xviii. 28.

This preparation day is 'the vigil of the Passover', i.e. the day preceding the evening when the passover was killed. And so it must be understood here, especially when connected with ch. xviii. 28. See on the whole matter the notes above referred to.

about the sixth hour] There is an insuperable difficulty, as the text now stands. For St. Mark relates, ch. xv. 25, that the crucifixion took place at the third hour: and that it certainly was so, the whole arrangement of the day testifies. For on the one hand, the judgment could hardly have taken the whole day till noon: and on the other, there will not thus be time left for the rest of the events of the day, before the sabbath began. We must certainly suppose, as did Eusebius, Theophylact, and Severus, that there has been some very early erratum in our copies; whether the interchange of 3 and 6, which when expressed in Greek numeral letters, are not unlike one another (Γ and Ϛ), or some other, cannot now be determined.

We certainly may bring the two accounts nearer together by recollecting that, as the crucifixion itself certainly did not (see in Mark) take place exactly at the third hour, and as here it is about the sixth hour, some intermediate time may be described by both Evangelists. But this is not satisfactory: see note on Mark xv. 25. The solution given by Dr. Wordsworth, after Townson and others, that St. John's reckoning of the hours is different, and like our own, so that the sixth hour would be 6 A.M., besides being unsupported by any authority (see ch. i. 39; iv. 6, 52; xi. 9, and notes), would leave here the difficulty that there must thus elapse three hours between the hearing before Pilate and the Crucifixion. Besides which, we may ask, is it possible to imagine St. John, with the other gospels before him as these expositors believe him to have had, adopting without notice an independent reckoning of his own which would introduce utter confusion into that history which (again on their hypothesis) he wrote his gospel to complete and clear up?

The words Behold your King seem to have been spoken in irony to the Jews—in the same spirit in which afterwards the title, was written over the cross:—partly perhaps also, as in that case, in consequence of the saying in ver. 12,—to sever himself altogether from the suspicion there cast on him.

15.] We have no king but Cæsar, was a degrading confession from the chief priests of that people of whom it was said, ‘The Lord your God is your King.’ 1 Sam. xii. 12. “They were so earnest in repudiating Jesus,” says Bengel, “that they repudiate their Messiah altogether.” However, the cry furthered the present purpose, and to this all was sacrificed, including truth itself; for the confession was not only degrading, but false in their mouths. Some of those who now cried this, died miserably in rebellion against Cæsar forty years afterwards.

16.] Here the scourging seems (Matthew, Mark) to have taken place, or perhaps to have been renewed, since the former one was not that customary before execution, but conceded by Pilate to the mob in hope of satisfying them.

17–42.] Jesus surrenders himself to death. Matt. xxvii. 31–61. Mark xv. 20–47. Luke xxiii. 26–56. Compare the notes on the Four throughout.

they took Jesus] viz. the chief priests.

17–22.] His Crucifixion.

17.] See on Matt. ver. 33.

19.] Matt. ver. 37.

20–22.] The same spirit of mockery of the Jews shewed itself in the title, as before, ver. 14. They had prevailed on Pilate by urging this point, that Jesus had set Himself up for a king; and Pilate is willing to remind them of it by these taunts. Hence their complaint, and his answer.

The Latin was the official language, the Greek that usually spoken,—the Hebrew (i. e. Aramaic) that of the common people.

What I have written I have written] The first perfect denotes the past action; the second that it was complete and unalterable.

23–30.] His death.

23, 24.] There were four soldiers, a quaternion, Acts xii. 4, and perhaps a centurion, for we read elsewhere of a centurion sent to see punishment inflicted.

The garments of the executed were by law the perquisite of the soldiers on duty.

The coat was the tunic. It reached from the neck to the feet, and was fastened round the throat with a clasp. It was properly a priest’s garment, and was woven of linen, or perhaps of wool.

The citation is verbatim from the LXX.

25.] In Matt. xxvii. 55, 56, and the parallel places, we learn that two of these were looking on afar off, after Jesus had expired, with Salome. Considering then that St. John’s habit of not naming himself might extend to his mother (he names his father, ch. xxi. 2), we may well believe that his mother’s sister here represents Salome, and that four women are designated by this description. So Wieseler and Meyer, Luthardt opposing them. So also Ewald: and, which is no mean evidence, the ancient Syriac version, inserting and between, “the mother’s sister, and Mary....” This Mary was wife of Klopas (Alphæus, see Matt. x. 3, and Introd. to Ep. of James, §i. 4), the mother of James the Less and Joses; Matt., Mark.

26. behold thy son] The relationship in the flesh between the Lord and His mother was about to close; hence He commends her to another son who should care for and protect her. Thus,—as at the marriage in Cana, when His official independence of her was to be testified, so now,—He addresses her as Woman.

27.] The solemn and affecting commendation of her to St. John is doubly made,—and thus bound by the strongest injunctions on both. The Romanist idea, that the Lord commended all his disciples, as represented by the beloved one, to the patronage of His mother, is simply absurd. The converse is true: He did solemnly commend the care of her, especially indeed to the beloved disciple, but in him to the whole cycle of disciples, among whom we find her, Acts i. 14.

No certain conclusion can be drawn from this commendation, as to the ‘brethren of the Lord’ believing on Him or not at this time. The reasons which influenced Him in his selection must ever be far beyond our penetration:—and whatever relations to Him we suppose those brethren to have been, it will remain equally mysterious why He passed them over, who were so closely connected with His mother. Still the presumption, that they did not then believe on Him, is one of which it is not easy to divest one's self; and at least may enter as an element into the consideration of the whole subject, beset as it is with uncertainty.

from that hour is probably to be taken literally,—from that time;—so that she was spared the pangs of witnessing what was to follow. If so, John returned again to the Cross, ver. 35,

The words, he took her to his own home, need not imply that John had a house in Jerusalem. The name would equally apply to his lodging during the feast; only meaning, that henceforth, wherever he was, she was an inmate with him; and certainly that his usual habitation was fixed, and was his own.

Ewald remarks, “It was for the Apostle in his later years a sweet reward to recall vividly every such minute detail,—and for his readers a sign that he alone could have written all this.”

28.] After this is generally, but not necessarily, immediate. Here we must suppose the “Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani” to have been said meantime, and the three hours’ darkness to have taken place. Perhaps during some of this time John was absent: see above.

that the scripture might be accomplished] Various needless objections have been raised to the application of these words to the saying of the Lord which follows, and attempts have been made—having it in view to leave no pre-appointed particular of the circumstances of his suffering unfulfilled, thus: that all things were now finished, that the Scripture might be accomplished: i.e. that all was now done in order to the accomplishment of Scripture. But it is much more natural to connect them with what follows, and to understand, that Jesus, speaking doubtless also in intense present agony of thirst, but only speaking because He so willed it, and because it was an ordained part of the course which He had taken upon Him, said this word, I thirst. “He would not have sought this alleviation of His sufferings, had He not known that this also pertained to the distinguishing signs of the Messiah as given in the Prophets. Whence this second motive is stated in addition: that the Scripture might be accomplished.” Lampe. Notice, it is not, fulfilled, which is always otherwise expressed in the original, but accomplished.

29.] The vinegar was the sour wine, or vinegar and water, the common drink of the Koman soldiers.

a stalk of hyssop] An aromatic plant growing on walls, common in the south of England and on the Continent, with blue or white flowers, and having stalks about 1½ foot long, which would in this case be long enough, the feet of the crucified person not being ordinarily raised above that distance from the ground. It was much used for sprinkling, Exod. xii. 22; Levit. xiv. 4&c.; Ps. li. 7.

30.] It is finished expresses the fulfilling of that appointed course of humiliation, obedience, and suffering, which the Lord Jesus had undertaken. That was now over,—the redemption of man accomplished,—and from this time ‘the joy that was set before Him’ begins. It is beyond the purpose of a note to bring out the many meanings of this most important and glorious word.

he bowed his head] We have the minuteness of an eye-witness, on whom every particular of this solemn moment made an indelible impression.

yielded up his spirit] viz. in the words given by St. Luke, Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit—which was also the “loud voice” mentioned by St. Matthew and St. Mark. This “yielding up His spirit” was strictly a voluntary and determinate act—no coming on of death, which had no power over Him,—see ch. x. 18, and note on Luke xxiii. 46.

31–42.] Jesus in Death: and herein,

31–37.] Proof of His Death.

31.] On the Jewish custom, see note, Matt. xxvii. 57.

that sabbath day was an high day, being as it was (see note on ch. xviii. 28, and Matt. xxvi. 17) a double sabbath: the coincidence of the first day of unleavened bread (Ex. xii. 16) with an ordinary sabbath.

that their legs might be broken] The breaking of the legs was sometimes appended to the punishment of crucifixion, but does not appear to have been inflicted for the purpose of causing death, which indeed it would not do. Friedlieb supposes that the term involved in it the ‘coup de grace,’ which was given to all executed criminals, and that the piercing with the spear was this death-blow, and was also inflicted on the thieves.

34.] The lance must have penetrated deep, for the object was to ensure death,—and see ch. xx. 27, probably into the left side, on account of the position of the soldier, and of what followed.

blood and water] The spear perhaps pierced the pericardium or envelope of the heart, in which case a liquid answering the description of water may have flowed with the blood. But the quantity would be so small as scarcely to have been observed. It is hardly possible that the separation of the blood into placenta and serum should so soon have taken place, or that, if it had, it should have been by an observer described as blood and water. It is more probable that the fact, which is here so strongly testified, was a consequence of the extreme exhaustion of the Body of the Redeemer. The medical opinions on the point are very various, and by no means satisfactory. Meyer's view after all seems to be the safe and true one—that the circumstance is related as a miraculous sign, having deep significance as to the work of the Redeemer, and shewing Him to be more than mortal. It can be no reason against this, that St. John does not here dwell on any such typical significance: nor can I see how 1 John v. 6 ff. can be understood without reference to this fact: see note there.

35.] This emphatic affirmation of the fact seems to regard rather the whole incident, than the mere outflowing of the blood and water. It was the object of St. John to shew that the Lord's Body was a real body, and underwent real death. And both these were shewn by what took place: not so much by the phenomenon of the water and blood, as by the infliction of such a wound,—after which, even had not death taken place before, there could not by any possibility be life remaining.

The third person (he that saw it....) gives solemnity. It is, besides, in accordance with St. John's way of speaking of himself throughout the Gospel.

The usage of the word believe in St. John makes it probable that he lays the weight on the proof of the reality of the death, as above. The clause, that ye may believe, depends on the three preceding clauses, without any parenthesis, as the final aim of what has gone before: in order that your faith may receive confirmation.

36.] 'For'—i. e. as connected with the true Messiahship of Christ, 'these things were a fulfilment of Scripture.' It is possible that Ps. xxxiv. 20 may be also referred to;—but no doubt the primary reference is to the Paschal Lamb of Exod. xii. 46: Num. ix. 12; see 1 Cor. v. 7.

37.] The prophecy, they shall look on Him whom they pierced, does not refer to the Roman soldiers,—but to the repentant in the world, who, at the time the Gospel was written, had begun to fulfil the prophecy: and is not without a prophetic reference to the future conversion of Israel, who were here the real piercers, though the act was done by the hand of wicked men, Acts x. 28.

38–42.] His Burial.

38.] after these things—not immediately after this, but soon after. The narrative implies, though it does not mention (as St. Mark and St. Luke do), that Joseph himself took down the Body from the cross. Lücke thinks the soldiers would have done this: but their duty seems only to have extended to the ascertaining of the fact of death. The words of ver. 31, "that they might be taken away," need not imply, 'by their hands.'

It was customary to grant the bodies of executed persons to their friends.

On Joseph, and the other particulars, see notes on Matthew.

He came...—to Golgotha.

39.] St. John alone mentions Nicodemus. The Galilæan narrative had no previous trace of him, and does not recognize him here. Joseph bore too prominent a part not to be mentioned by all. Lüthardt beautifully remarks on the contrast between these men's secret and timid discipleship before, and their courage now, "Their love to Jesus was called out by the might of His love. His Death is the Power which constrains men. And thus this act of love on the part of both these men is a testimony for Jesus, and for the future effect of His death. Hence also it appears why the Evangelist mentions the weight of the spices, as a proof of the greatness of their love, as Lampe observes," myrth,—the gum of an aromatic plant, not indigenous in Palestine but in Arabia Felix, see Exod. xxx. 23; Prov. vii. 17; Song of Sol. iii. 6.

aloes] The name of various sorts of aromatic wood in the East. Both materials appear to have been pulverized (the wood either by scraping or burning) and strewed in the folds of the linen in which the body was wrapped. The quantity, about an hundred pound weight, is large; but perhaps the whole Body was encased, after the wrapping, in the mixture, and an outer wrapper fastened over all. The proceeding was hurried, on account of the approaching Sabbath: and apparently an understanding entered into with the women, that it should be more completely done after the Sabbath was over, This plentiful application of the aromatic substances may therefore have been made with an intention to prevent the Body, in its lacerated state, from incipient decomposition during the interval.

40.] See ch. xi. 44. Little is known with any certainty, except from these passages, of the Jews' ordinary manner of burying.

41.] See note on Matthew, ver. 60. The words, in the place where he was crucified, are so far in favour of the traditional site of the Holy Sepulchre, that Calvary and the Sepulchre are close together, under the roof of the same church, And those who have found an objection in that circumstance have forgotten this testimony of St. John.

a new sepulchre....] And therefore given for the purpose—so that the additional particular not here mentioned, that it belonged to Joseph, is almost implied. The newness of the tomb was important, that it should be seen that no one but Jesus had risen thence, and Jesus not by the power of another, as was once the case at the grave of Elisha: so that no room might be left for the CLES of unbelief

42.] the Jews' preparation day seems to indicate clearly the preparation of the Passover, as I have before maintained that the words mean; not the mere day of the week so called, which, as it was by the Christians also in the Apostles' time named the preparation (Parascévè), would not be qualified by the additional statement that it was “the Jews' preparation day.”

The words because the sepulchre was nigh at hand, may certainly at first sight appear as if St. John were not aware that the tomb belonged to Joseph; but it is more likely that the thought of asking for the Body may have been originally suggested to Joseph by his possessing a tomb close to the place of crucifixion, and so the nearness of the tomb may have been the real original reason of the whole proceeding; and St. John, not anxious to record every particular, may have given it as such.

It is much better to keep the order of the original in rendering this verse. There is weight and pathos in the concluding words, as completing the great subject of this part of the narrative, which is lost by transposing as in A.V.

John: Chapter 20

CHAP. XX. 1-29.] JESUS ALIVE FROM THE DEAD. COMPLETION OF THE DISCIPLES' FAITH WROUGHT THEREBY. And herein,

1-18.] Contrast between His former life, within the conditions of the flesh, and His present, in which His communion with His own partakes of his new relation to the Father. Compare Matt. xxviii. 1: Mark xvi. 1: Luke xxiv. 1.

On the chronology of the events of the Resurrection, see note on Matt. xxviii. 1.

I attempt no harmony of the accounts:—I believe all such attempts to be fruitless;—and I see in their failure strong corroboration of the truth of the evangelic narratives. It is quite impossible that so astounding an event, coming upon various portions of the body of disciples from various quarters and in various forms, should not have been related, by four independent witnesses, in the scattered and fragmentary way in which we now find it. In the depth beneath this varied surface of narration, rests the great central fact of the Resurrection itself, unmoved and immovable. As it was THIS above all other things to which the Apostles bore their testimony, so, in their testimony to this, we have the most remarkable proof of each having faithfully elaborated into narrative those particular facts which came under his own eye or were reported to himself by those concerned. Hence the great diversity in this portion of the narrative:—and hence I believe much that is now dark might be explained, were the facts themselves, in their order of occurrence, before us. Till that is the case, (and I am willing to believe that it will be one of our delightful employments hereafter, to trace the true harmony of the Holy Gospels, under His teaching of whom they are the record,) we must be content to walk by faith, and not by sight. We must also remember in this case, that our Evangelist is selecting his points of narration with a special purpose,—to shew us how the belief of the disciples was brought out and completed, after the unbelief of Israel: cf. vv. 30, 31.

1, 2. Mary Magdalene] She was not alone (Matthew, Mark, Luke). Does this appear in the plural verb, “we know not where they have laid Him,” below? This is not, as Meyer says, precluded by the use of “I know not” in ver. 13. Mary there speaks in her own person, which she might do, however accompanied. Still, probably not. She perhaps uses the plural, as involving all the disciples in her own feeling of ignorance and of consequent sorrow. So Meyer: and it is more natural to take it thus. One thing we may conclude for certain, that she, for some reason, did not see the vision related in the three other Gospels.

3.] St. Luke, ver. 12, speaks only of Peter's going.

4-8.] Full of most interesting and characteristic detail. John, probably the younger, outruns Peter;— but when there, reverently (not for fear of pollution, as some have thought) abstains from entering the sepulchre. The ardent and impetuous Peter goes directly in—John follows—and believes. What can exceed the inner truth of this description? And what is not related is as full of truth as that which is. For, vv. 6, 7, we seem to hear the very voice of Peter describing to his companion the inner state of the tomb.

On the napkin, see ch. xi. 44 and note.

seeth represents the original word used of the cursory glance of John, who did not go in,—beholdeth, that which describes the exhaustive gaze of Peter, who did. Notice also that John, when he stooped and looked in, saw only the linen clothes, which seem to have been lying where the Feet were, nearer the entrance, whereas Peter, on going in, saw the napkin, which was perhaps deposited further in, near the place of the Head.

8. he saw, and believed] Nothing is said of Peter—did he believe too? I think not;—and that John modestly suppresses it. But what did John believe? Was it merely, that the Body had been taken away, as Mary had reported (Bengel and others)? Surely not; the facts which he saw would prevent this conclusion: nor does John so use the word believe. He believed that Jesus was risen from the dead. He received into his mind, embraced with his assent, THE FACT OF THE RESURRECTION, for the first time. He did this, on the ocular testimony before him; for as yet neither of them knew the Scripture, so as to be previously convinced of the certainty that it would be so. But (see above) Peter does not seem to have as yet received this fact;—accounting probably for what he saw as Mary had done. Lampe beautifully says, ‘We conclude that from this moment, in the gloom of the sepulchre, the mind of John was enlightened by saving faith in the Resurrection of Jesus, as with a new ray of the risen Sun of Righteousness.’

10. went away again unto their own home] St. Luke, xxiii. 12, has the very same expression; see there in margin. This is remarkable, as he evidently has a fragment of the same incident.

11.] She had come with them, but more slowly.

12.] From what has been said above, my readers will not expect me to compare the angelic appearances in the four Gospels. What wonder, if the heavenly hosts were variously and often visible on this great day, when ‘the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy?’ What can be more accurate in detail than this description of the vision of Mary? Every word was no doubt carefully related to the Apostle, and as carefully recorded. And all is significant: they are in white, because from the world of light: they sit, as not defending, but peacefully watching the Body: at the Head and the Feet, for the Body of the Lord was from head to foot in the charge of His Father and of His servants.

13.] Here again the finest psychological truth underlies the narrative. The other women (Mark, ver. 5. Luke, ver. 5) were afraid at the vision; but now Mary, having but one thought or desire, to recover the lost Body of her Lord, feels no fear.

The angels doubtless are proceeding further to assure her as they did the women before:—but this is broken off by the appearance of the Lord Himself, or perhaps by Mary’s turning away.

14.] she turned herself back—having her attention attracted by consciousness of some one being present near her—not perhaps by the approach of Jesus. Or it might be with intent to go forth and weep again, or further to seek her Lord. Chrysostom’s reason is very beautiful, but perhaps hardly probable, from the fact that Mary on turning round did not recognize our Lord: “It seems to me that while she was saying these words, the sudden appearance of Christ behind her struck the angels, who saw their Lord, with amazement: and that they immediately shewed, both by their posture and by their look, that they saw the Lord: and this caused Mary to turn round and look behind her.” We need not surely enquire too minutely, why she did not know Him. The fact may be psychologically accounted for—she did not expect Him to be there, and was wholly preoccupied with other thoughts: or, as Dräseke says, ‘Her tears wove a veil, which concealed Him who stood before her. The seeking after the Dead prevents us from seeing the Living.’

15.] The same kind of repetition by the Lord of what the angel had before said is found in Matt. xxviii. 7–10.

It is idle to enquire why she thought Him to be the gardener: but I may once for all observe that we must believe the clothing of His risen Body to have been that which He pleased to assume; not earthly clothing, but perhaps some semblance of it. Certainly, in this case, He was clothed;—or she must at once have recognized Him. But see on the words “she turned herself” below.

Sir] The Greek word rendered both “Sir” and “Lord” is one and the same throughout the New Test. We can only judge from the circumstances in each case, which it represents. Here there can be no doubt, seeing that she did not recognize her Lord, that it is merely the appellation of courtesy to an unknown person.

I will take him away] She forgets her lack of strength for this, in the overbearing force of her love. (Meyer.)

16.] With one word, and that one word her name, the Lord awakens all the consciousness of His presence: calling her in that tone doubtless in which her soul had been so often summoned to receive divine knowledge and precious comfort.

She turned herself] seems to imply that she had not been looking full at Him before.

Rabboni may mean either my Master,—or only Master; which last appears to be the case here.

That she gives way to no impassioned exclamations, but pours out her satisfaction and joy in this one word, is also according to the deepest psychological truth. There is an addition found in some of our copies, “and she rushed forward to touch Him:” this is an explanatory gloss to the words “Touch me not”—but doubtless it represents what really was the fact. ‘It was the former name, with which He called her: His former appellation, in which she replied; and now she seeks to renew the former intercourse.’ (Luthardt.)

17.] The connexion between the prohibition and its reason is difficult, and has been very variously given. The sense seems to me to be connected with some gesture of the nature alluded to in the addition quoted above, but indicating that she believed she had now gotten Him again, never to be parted from Him. This gesture He reproves as unsuited to the time, and the nature of His present appearance. ‘Do not thus—for I am not yet restored finally to you in the body—I have yet to ascend to the Father.’ This implies in the background another and truer touching, when He should have ascended to the Father. “Thou desirest to touch Me, Mary, and to enjoy friendly intercourse with Me: but that may not be now, for I permit Myself to be seen only for a purpose connected with Mine Office, the confirmation of your faith. But when I shall have ascended to My Father, the time will come that thou mayst enjoy intercourse with the most perfect, not by earthly touch, but by such as befits that place,—heavenly and spiritual.” Grotius. With this my view nearly agrees, not confining (as indeed neither does he) the latter enjoyment to heaven itself, but understanding it to have begun here below. Leo the Great interprets very similarly: see in my Greek Test.

but go....] Stier remarks that this was a far greater honour than that which had been forbidden her;—just as the handling of the Lord allowed to Thomas was a far less thing than the not seeing and yet believing.

to my brethren] By this term He testifies that He has not put off his humanity, nor his love for his own, in his resurrection state: see Heb. ii. 11.

my Father, and your Father] This distinction, my... and your..., when “Our” seems so likely to have been said, has been observed by all Commentators of any depth, as indicating an essential difference in the relations. Cyril of Jerusalem says, “My Father, by nature: your Father, by adoption.” Similarly Augustine; adding, “Nor did He say Our God,” wherefore here also is a difference in the relation. “My God, in subjection to whom I am in my human nature, your God, between whom and you I myself am the Mediator.” So that the my is the ground and source of the your: God is His God, directly and properly: but our God, through Him. And the words my God indicate that He is still Man: see Eph. i. 3, and often in the epistles: 1 Cor. iii. 23; and especially Heb. ii. 11. In the words I ascend is included His temporary stay which He was now making with them —I am ascending—i. e. ‘I am on my way.’

19–23.] In the freedom of His spiritual and triumphant life, He appears to and commissions His own. Compare Luke xxiv. 36–49; Mark xvi. 14–18.

19.] The circumstance of the doors being shut is mentioned here and in ver. 26, to indicate what sort of appearances these were. Suddenly, unaccounted for by any approach,—the Lord rendered himself visible to his disciples. Nor did this affect the truth of that resurrection Body, any more than his occasionally withdrawing himself from mortal sight affected the truth of His fleshly Body. Both were done by that supernatural Power dwelling in Him, by which His other miracles were wrought. It seems to have been the normal condition of His fleshly Body, to be visible to mortal eyes:—of His risen Body, not to be. But both these He could suspend when He pleased, without affecting the substance or truth of either.

for fear of the Jews] This was natural enough;—the bitter hatred of the Jews (both people and rulers) to their Master,—and His own prophetic announcements,—would raise in them a dread of incipient persecution now that He was removed.

came Jesus] not, by ordinary approach; nor through the closed doors;—nor in any visible manner;—but the word describes that unseen arrival among them which preceded His becoming visible to them.

stood in (literally, into) the midst] Compare Luke, ver. 36. The into (see on ch. xxi. 4) denotes the coming and standing, in one—the standing without motion thither, which in ordinary cases would be standing as the result of motion thither.

Peace be unto you] See on Luke ver. 36, and ch. xiv. 27.

20.] answers to Luke, ver. 39.

Then were the disciples glad] ‘The first and partial fulfilment of ch. xvi. 20–22: see notes there.

The disciples seem to have handled Him: see Luke, ver. 39; 1 John i. 1, and below, ver. 25.

21.] ‘Peace be unto you’ is solemnly repeated, as the introduction of the sending which follows. The ministers and disciples of the Lord are messengers of peace. This view is more natural than that of Euthymius, “they were probably in excitement from their great joy, and He calms them, that they might listen to what He was about to say.”

as my Father hath sent me] He confirms and grounds their Apostleship on the present glorification of Himself, whose Apostleship (Heb. iii. 1) on earth was now ended, but was to be continued by this sending forth of them. This commission was not now first given them, but now first fully assured to them: and their sending forth by Him their glorified Head, was to be, in character and process, like that of Himself by the Father.

22.] To understand this verse as the outpouring of the Spirit, the fulfilment of the promise of the Comforter, is against all consistency, and most against St. John himself:—see ch. xvi. 7, and ch. vii. 39. To understand it rightly, we have merely to recur to that great key to the meaning of so many dark passages of Scripture, the manifold and gradual unfolding of promise and prophecy in their fulfilment. The presence of the Lord among them now was a slight and temporary fulfilment of His promise of returning to them; and so the imparting of the Spirit now, was a symbol and foretaste of that which they should receive at Pentecost:—just as, to mount a step higher, that itself, in its present abiding with us, is but the firstfruits and pledge (Rom. viii. 23. 2 Cor. i. 22) of the fulness which we shall hereafter inherit. ‘The relation of this saying to the effusion of the Spirit is the same which chap. iii. bears to Baptism, chap. vi. to the Lord’s Supper, chap. xvii. 1 to the Ascension,&c.’ (Luthardt.)

Further: this giving of the Spirit was not the Spirit’s personal imparting of Himself to them, but only a partial instilling of His influence. He proceeds forth in His work (as in His essence) from the Father and the Son: this breathing of His influence was an imparting of Him from the Son in His risen Body, but that Body had not yet been received up, without which union of the God-manhood of the Son to the glory of the Father the Holy Spirit would not come.

What was now conferred is plain from our ver. 23—whereby authority to discern spirits and pronounce on them is re-assured (see Matt. xviii. 18)—and from Luke, ver. 45, by which a discerning of the mind of the Spirit is given to them. We find instances of both these gifts being exercised by Peter in Acts i., in his assertion of the sense of Scripture, and his judgment of Judas. Both these however were only temporary and imperfect.

That no formal gifts of Apostleship were now formally conferred, is plain by the absence of Thomas, who in that case would be no apostle in the same sense in which the rest were.

he breathed on them] The very same word in the LXX version is that in Gen. ii. 7, expressing the act of God in the original infusion of the spirit of life into man. This act is now by God Incarnate repeated, sacramentally (so we have the words “Take, Receive” [they are the same in the original], in Matt. xxvi. 26 and the parallels) representing the infusion of the new life, of which He is become by his glorified Humanity the source to his members: see Job xxxiii. 4; Ps. xxxiii. 6; 1 Cor. xv. 45.

23.] The present meaning of these words has been spoken of above. They reach forward however beyond that, and extend the grant which they reassure to all ages of the Church.

The words, closely considered, amount to this: that with the gift and real participation of the Holy Spirit, comes the conviction, and therefore the knowledge, of sin, of righteousness, and judgment;—and this knowledge becomes more perfect, the more men are filled with the Holy Ghost. Since this is so, they who are pre-eminently filled with His presence are pre-eminently gifted with the discernment of sin and repentance in others, and hence by the Lord’s appointment authorized to pronounce pardon of sin and the contrary. The Apostles had this in an especial manner, and by the full indwelling of the Spirit were enabled to discern the hearts of men, and to give sentence on that discernment: see Acts v. 1–11; viii. 21; xiii. 9. And this gift: belongs to the Church in all ages, and especially to those who by legitimate appointment are set to minister in the Churches of Christ: not by successive delegation from the Apostles,—of which fiction I find in the New Testament no trace,—but by their mission from Christ, the Bestower of the Spirit for their office, when orderly and legitimately conferred upon them by the various Churches. Not however to them exclusively,—though for decency and order it is expedient that the outward and formal declaration should be so:—but in proportion as any disciple shall have been filled with the Holy Spirit of wisdom, is the inner discernment, the “judgment,” his.

The word retain here corresponds to “bind” in Matt. xvi. 19 (see the distinction there); xviii. 18, and the word remit here to “loose” there.

24–29.] He proves Himself to His own to be Lord and God, to be believed on by them, though not seen. Thomas's doubt, and its removal. Peculiar to John.

24.] was not with them—for what reason does not appear. Eutbymius says, “It is probable that he, since the scattering of the Apostles,... had not yet joined them.” But I incline, with Stier, to think that it could not have been accidentally (Lücke), nor because he was, as Grotius supposes, “occupied by some engagement.” On such a day, and in such a man, such an absence must have been designed. Perhaps he had abandoned hope;—the strong evidence of his senses having finally convinced him that the pierced side and wounded hands betokened such a death that revivification was impossible.

25.] He probably does not name the Feet, merely because the Hands and Side would more naturally offer themselves to his examination than the Feet, to which he must stoop. He requires no more than had been granted to the rest: but he had their testimony in addition, and therefore ample ground for faith to rest on. Olshausen calls him the ‘Rationalist among the Apostles.’

26.] There is not the least reason for supposing, with Olshausen, that this appearance was in Galilee. The whole narrative points out the same place as before.
