The eight days’ interval is the first testimony of the recurring day of the resurrection being commemorated by the disciples:—but, it must be owned, a weak one;—for in all probability they had been thus assembled every day during the interval. It forms however an interesting opening of the history of THE LORD’ S DAY, that the Lord Himself should have thus selected and honoured it.

27.] Our Lord says nothing of the “marks of the nails:”—He does not recall the malice of his enemies.

The words imply that the marks were no scars, but the veritable wounds themselves;—that in His side being large enough for a hand to be thrust into it. This of itself would shew that the resurrection Body was bloodless. It is “reach hither and behold” in the case of the hands, which were exposed—but merely “reach hither and put” in the case of the side, which was clothed. So Meyer: but it may be questioned, whether this was so.

be not faithless] not merely, ‘Do not any longer disbelieve in my Resurrection;’—but Be not (do not become)—as applied generally to the spiritual life, and the reception of God’s truth—faithless, but believing. That Thomas did not apply his finger or his hand, is evident from the reason given by our Lord for his faith below, being, not, “Thou hast touched me,” but, Thou hast seen me.

28.] The Socinian view, that these words, My Lord and my God, are merely an exclamation, is refuted, (1) By the fact that no such exclamations were in use among the Jews. (2) By the introduction to them, “Thomas said to him.” (3) By the impossibility of referring the words my Lord to another than Jesus: see ver. 13. (4) By the utter psychological absurdity of such a supposition: that one just convinced of the presence of Him whom he deeply loved, should, instead of addressing Him, break out into an irrelevant cry. (5) By the further absurdity of supposing that if such were the case, the Apostle John, who of all the sacred writers most constantly keeps in mind the object for which he is writing, should have recorded any thing so beside that object. (6) By the intimate conjunction of the seeing and believing in our Lord’s answer, which necessarily makes this his saying the expression of his belief:—see below. Dismissing it therefore, we observe that this is the highest confession of faith which has yet been made;—and that it shews that (though not yet fully) the meaning of the previous confessions of His being ‘the Son of God’ was understood. Thus St. John, in the very close of his Gospel (see on vv. 30, 31) iterates the testimony with which he began it—to the Godhead of the Word who became flesh: and by this closing confession, shews how the testimony of Jesus to Himself had gradually deepened and exalted the Apostles’ conviction, from the time when they knew Him only as “the Son of Joseph” (ch. i. 46), till now, when He is acknowledged as their LORD and their GOD. 29.] The reason, because thou hast seen me, blames the slowness and required ground of the faith: the assertion, thou hast believed, recognizes and commends the soundness of that faith just confessed. Wonderful indeed, and rich in blessing for us who have not seen Him, is this, the closing word (see below) of the Gospel. For these words cannot apply to the remaining Ten: they, like Thomas, had seen and believed. ‘All the appearances of the forty days,’ says Stier, ‘were mere preparations for the believing without seeing.’ On the record of them, we now believe: see 1 Pet. i. 8.

30.] Yea, and,—or, moreover: meaning, ‘This book must not be supposed to be a complete account.’

signs] not, as many interpret the word, ‘proofs of His resurrection,’—but, as ch. xii. 37 and elsewhere in this Gospel, miracles, in the most general sense—these after the Resurrection included:—for St. John is here reviewing his whole narrative, this book.

31.] The mere miracle-faith, so often reproved by our Lord, is not that intended here. This is faith in Himself, as the Christ the Son of God: and the Evangelist means, that enough is related in this book to be a ground for such a faith, by shewing us His glory manifested forth (see ch. ii. 11).

that believing ye may have life] Thus he closes almost in the words of his prologue, ch. i. 4, 12.

in his name] These words (see Acts iv. 10; 1 Cor. vi. 11) describe the whole standing of the faithful man in Christ,—by which and in which he has life eternal.

John: Chapter 21

CHAP. XXI. 1–23.] THE APPENDIX. THE GLIMPSE INTO THE FUTURE. And herein,

1–8.] The significant draught of fishes. I reserve the remarks on this chapter to the end, thereby better to put the reader in possession of the evidence which I shall there gather up into one, but which will present itself as we go on. I will only state here, that whether written by St. John himself (of which I feel no doubt) or not, it is evidently an appendix to the Gospel, which latter has already concluded with a formal review of its contents and object at ch. xx. 30, 31.

1.] After these things, compare ch. v. 1; vi. 1, at a subsequent time.

manifested himself] This expression is nowhere else used by St. John of the Lord’s appearances, but only in Mark xvi. 12, 14. The use of the verb here indicates that the usual state of the Lord at this time was one not of manifestation, but of invisibility to them.

2.] Nathanael is named by St. John only: see ch. i. 46 ff.: Thomas also by St. John only, except in the catalogues of the Apostles.

the sons of Zebedee are nowhere else named by John;—they may however be here mentioned as in reminiscence of the draught of fishes which occurred before: see Luke v. 1 ff. two other of his disciples] Who these were does not appear. Probably (as Luthardt) some two not named in the Gospel, and therefore not specified in its appendix.

3.] The disciples returned to their occupation of fishing, probably as a means of livelihood, during the time which the Lord had appointed them in Galilee between the feasts of the Passover and Pentecost. This seems to be the first proposal of so employing themselves.

They went forth] from the house where they were together.

they caught nothing] as before, Luke v. 5. The correspondence of this account with that is very remarkable—as is also their entire distinctness in the midst of that correspondence. The disciples must have been powerfully reminded of that their former and probably last fishing together. And after the “fishers of men” of that other occasion, the whole could not but bear to them a spiritual meaning in reference to their apostolic commission:—their powerlessness without Christ,—their success when they let down the net at His word. Their present part was not to go fishing of themselves, but “to wait for the promise of the Father,” Acts i. 4 (Luthardt).

4.] stood on the shore—the preposition rendered by on is here, as in ch. xx. 19, one of motion—He came and stood on the shore. A sudden appearance is indicated by the words.

5. Children] In ch. xiii. 33 we have the similar expression, “little children.” have ye any fish?] This substantive is said to signify any thing eaten as an additament to bread, but especially fish. So that here the best rendering is as in margin.

6.] See Luke v. 6.

7.] The therefore here seems distinctly to allude to that former occasion in Luke v. 1 ff.—the similarity of the incident having led the beloved Apostle to scrutinize more closely the person of Him who spoke to them. "John is the more keen-sighted, Peter the more ardent. So John recognizes Him before Peter; but Peter goes forth to Him before John." Euthymius.

He put on his fisher's coat, or shirt for decorum: he bound it round him, to facilitate his swimming.

for he was naked] i.e. he was stripped for his fisher's work;—some say, only without his upper garment. Some take it literally, that he was absolutely naked, which is more probable, and understand the putting on of the coat as above. Theophylact explains the word rendered "fisher's coat" to be "a linen cloth which the Pheenicians and Syrians gird round them."

8.] 200 cubits = 100 yards. The lake was about five miles broad, according to Josephus: according to Stanley, six in the widest part: according to Dr. Thomson, nine.

9-14.] The significant meal: see below, on ver. 14.

9.] The rationalist and semi-rationalist interpreters have taken great offence at the idea of a miracle being here intended. But is it possible to understand the incident otherwise? As Stier says, let any child reading the chapter be the judge. And what difficulty is there in such a fire and fish being provided, either by the Lord Himself, or by the ministry of angels at His bidding?

11.] went aboard into the boat, which apparently was now on the beach, in the shallow water.

an hundred and fifty and three] This enumeration is singular, and not to be accounted for by any mystical significance of the number, but as betokening the careful counting which took place after the event, and in which the narrator took a part.

was not the net rent: herein differing from what happened Luke v. 6, when it was broken.

12. Come and dine] The word used implies the morning meal:—see ver. 3, 4.

none of the disciples durst ask him] I take these words to imply that they sat down to the meal in silence,—wondering at, while at the same time they well knew, Him who was thus their Host. Chrysostom says, "for they no longer had their former confidence,... but in silence and much fear and reverence they sat down, looking on Him:... seeing His form changed and very wonderful, they were much amazed, and wanted to ask Him respecting it, but their fear, and their knowledge that it was no other than He himself, hindered them."

The verb rendered ask signifies more:—to question or prove Him.

13.] cometh,—from the spot where they had seen Him standing, to the fire of coals, The words taketh bread, and giveth them, bear evident trace of the same words used on another occasion, (Matt. xxvi. 26 and parallels,) and remind us of the similar occurrence at Emmaus, Luke xxiv. 30.

14. This is now the third time] The number here is clearly not that of all appearances of Jesus up to this time, for that to Mary Magdalene is not reckoned; but only those to the disciples,—i. e. any considerable number of them together. This one internal trait of consistency speaks much for the authenticity and genuineness of the addition.

Without agreeing with all the allegorical interpretations of the Fathers, I cannot but see much depth and richness of meaning in this whole narrative. The Lord appears to His disciples, busied about their occupation for their daily bread; speaks and acts in a manner wonderfully similar to His words and actions on a former memorable occasion, when we know that by their toiling long and taking nothing, but at his word enclosing a multitude of fishes, was set forth what should befall them as fishers of men. Can we miss that application at this far more important epoch of their apostolic mission? Besides, He graciously provides for their present wants, and invites them to be His guests: why, but to shew them that in their work hereafter they should never want but He would provide? And as connected with the parable, Matt. xiii. 47 ff., has the net enclosing a great multitude and yet not rent, no meaning? Has the 'taking the bread and giving to them, and the fish likewise' no meaning, which so closely binds together the miraculous feeding, and the institution of the Lord's Supper, with their future meetings in His Name and round His Table? Any one who recognizes the teaching character of the acts of the Lord, can hardly cast all such applications from him;—and those who do not, have yet the first rudiments of the Gospels to learn.

15-23.] The calling, and its prospect.

15. So when they had dined] There appears to have been nothing said during the meal. Surely every word would have been recorded. One great object of this appearance, observes Stier, certainly was the confirmation, and encouragement of the 'fisher of men,’ in his apostolic office.

Simon son of Jonas] A reminiscence probably of his own name and parentage, as distinguished from his apostolic name of honour, Cephas, or Peter, see ch. i. 43. Thus we have the same address, Matt. xvi. 17, connected with the mention of his natural state of flesh and blood, which had not revealed to him the great truth just confessed—and Luke xxii. 31, ‘Simon, Simon,’ when he is reminded of his natural weakness. See also Mark xiv. 37, and Matt. xvii. 25, where the significance is not so plain.

more than these] more than these thy fellow-disciples, compare Matt. xxvi. 33; Mark xiv. 29, ‘Though all should be offended, yet not I.’ That St. John does not record this saying, makes no difficulty here; nor does it tell against the genuineness of this appendix to the Gospel. The narrator tells that which he heard the Lord say, and tells it faithfully and literally. That it coincides with what Peter is related to have said elsewhere, is a proof of the authenticity, not of the connexion, of the two accounts.

The word these has been strangely enough understood (Whitby, and others) of the fish, or the ‘employment and furniture of a fisherman.’—Olshausen sees a reference to the pre-eminence given to Peter, Matt. xvi. 19,—and regards the words as implying that on that account he really did love Jesus more than the rest;—but surely this is most improbable, and the other explanation the only likely or true one. Perhaps there is also a slight reference to his present just-shewn zeal, in leaping from the ship first to meet the Lord. ‘Has thy past conduct to Me truly borne out thy former and present warmth of love to Me above these thy fellows?’ “Wonderful is the wisdom of Christ, who in so few words makes Peter render account to Him whom He had denied, and to his brother-apostles, to whom he had made himself superior in love;—thus giving us an example for the exercise of church discipline.” Grotius.

Peter’s answer shews that he understood the question as above. He says nothing of the more than these—but dropping all comparison of himself with others, humbly refers to the Searcher of hearts the genuineness of his love, however the past may seem to have called it in question.

We may note that two Greek verbs, both signifying to love, are used in this conversation. The one (agapain) is applied to the ordinary love which men have to one another, or to the reverential love which is borne towards God and man by the child of God: the other (philein) to the closer love of a man for his own friend or his dearest relatives. The former word is used in ch. xi. 5, where it is said “Jesus loved Martha and her sister, and Lazarus;” the latter by the Jews in ch. xi. 37, when judging by the tears of Jesus for Lazarus, they exclaimed, “See how he loved him.” “Now in observing this conversation in the original, we notice, that the Lord’s two first questions contain the former word, while Peter’s answers have the latter and warmer one:—whereas, the third time the question and answer both have the warmer word (philein). This does not look like accident. Peter in his two answers uses a less exalted word, and one implying a consciousness of his own weakness, but a persuasion and deep feeling of personal love. Then in the third question, the Lord adopts the word of Peter’s answer, the closer to press the meaning of it home to him. The answer, thou knowest, the two first times, seems to refer to the Lord’s personal knowledge of Peter’s heart—in His having given him that name, ch. i. 43, Matt. xvi. 17; Luke xxii. 31, and the announcement of his denial of Him. The last time, he widens this assertion ‘Thou knowest me,’ into ‘Thou knowest all things,’ being grieved at the repetition of a question which brought this Omnipotence so painfully to his mind.

Feed my lambs] This, and the following answers of the Lord, can hardly be regarded as the reinstating of Peter in his apostolic office, for there is no record of his ever having lost it: but as a further and higher setting forth of it than that first one, Matt. iv. 18 ff.—both as belonging to all of them on the present occasion, and as tending to comfort Peter’s own mind after his fall, and reassure him of his holding the same place among the Apostles as before, owing to the gracious forgiveness of his Lord.

Our Lord’s three injunctions differ in their mode of expression. The first is, Feed my lambs. ‘The second, Keep, tend, or shepherd (the same word is used in Acts xx. 28: 1 Pet. v. 2) my sheep. The third, Feed my sheep, but with this difference, that the word sheep is the diminutive, expressive of affection. Perhaps the feeding of the lambs was the furnishing the apostolic testimony of the Resurrection, and facts of the Lord’s life on earth, to the first converts; the shepherding or ruling the sheep, the subsequent government of the Church, as shewn forth in the early part of the Acts: the feeding of the sheep (diminutive, the choicest, the loved of the flock), the furnishing the now maturer Church of Christ with the wholesome food of the doctrine contained in his Epistles. The notice of these distinctions, which only the cold and undiscerning will attempt to deny, may serve to shew the English reader, how entirely inadequate even the best version must be to represent the sense of Holy Scripture. For our language is quite unable to express its minute beauties and differences. But those must strangely miss the whole sense, who dream of an exclusive primatial power here granted or confirmed to this Apostle. A sufficient refutation of this silly idea, if it needed any other than the fact, that Peter was grieved at the question leading to the commission, is found in the “fellow-elder” (so in the original) of 1 Pet. v. 1, where he refers apparently to this very charge; see note on Matt. xvi. 17 ff.

17. Peter was grieved] not merely on account of the repetition of the question, but because of its being asked the third time, answering to the number of his own denials of Christ.

thou knowest all things] See above.

18.] The end of his pastoral office is announced to him:—a proof of the knowledge of all things which he had just confessed to be in his Lord;—a contrast to the denial of which he had just been reminded;—a proof to be hereafter given of the here recognized genuineness of that love which he had been professing.

When thou wast young] This may be said merely in contrast to when thou shalt be old. Or it perhaps includes his life up to the time prophesied of.

thou girdedst thyself] As in ver. 7, he had girt his fisher's coat to him: but not confined in its reference to that girding alone,—‘thou girdedst thyself up for My work, and wentest hither and thither—but hereafter there shall be a service for thee harder and more strictly confined.’

thou shalt stretch forth thy hands] ‘but not as just now, in swimming;—in a more painful manner, on the transverse beam of the cross; and another—the executioner—shall gird thee,—with the cords binding to the cross.’ Such is the traditional account of the death of Peter. Jerome says, that “he was crowned with martyrdom under Nero, being crucified with his head downwards and his feet upwards, because he alleged himself to be unworthy of being crucified in the same manner as his Lord.”

shall carry thee] viz. in the lifting up after the fastening to the cross—or perhaps in making thee go the way to death, bearing thy cross.

whither thou wouldest not] “For,” says Augustine, “who wishes to die? Truly no one: and so universal is this feeling, that it was said to St. Peter, Another shall gird thee and carry thee whither thou wouldest not.”

19. Follow me] Not to be understood, I think, of any present gesture of the Lord calling Peter aside;—but, from the next verse, followed perhaps by a motion of Peter towards Him, in which John joined. The words seem to be a plain reference to ch. xiii. 36;—and the following,—a following through the Cross to glory;—see Matt. xvi. 24; Mark x. 21. Now, however, “taking up the cross” is omitted. He had made this so plain, that it needed not expressing. There was also a forcible reminding Peter of the first time when he had heard this command on the same shore, Matt. iv. 19.

20.] The details necessary to complete the narrative are obscure, and only hinted at in the background. It seems that Peter either was at the time of the foregoing conversation walking with Jesus, and turned round and saw John following,—or that he moved towards Him on the termination of it (but certainly not from a misunderstanding of the words “Follow Me,” see ver. 21). I can hardly conceive Him moving away on uttering these words, and summoning Peter away in private. It seems in the highest degree unnatural. This description and identification of the disciple whom Jesus loved is evidently inserted to justify his following, and is a strong token of St. John's hand having written this chapter; see ch. xiii. 23.

21.] Peter's question shews that he had rightly understood the Lord's prophecy respecting him. He now wishes to know what should befall his friend and colleague,—“giving him a return (for his similar service in ch. xiii. 23 just referred to), and, in the idea that he too might be desirous to ask about himself, but might lack the courage, Peter took up the enquiry.” Chrysostom. This was not mere idle curiosity, but that longing which we all feel for our friends. “Is he not to follow Thee too? is he not to go the same way of death with us?” Euthymius.

22.] The words what is that to thee? imply a rebuke;—not perhaps however so sharp a one as has been sometimes seen in them. They remind Peter of the distinctness of each man's position and duty before the Lord; and the subsequent command, follow thou Me, directs his view along that course of duty and suffering, which was appointed for him by his divine Master. In the original, both thou and Me are in emphatic positions: “His appointed lot is no element in thy onward course: it is ME that thou must follow.”

On the words, if I will that he tarry till I come...., three opinions have been held (for that which refers the words to John's remaining where he then was, on the shore, till the Lord returned from His colloquy with Peter, is not worth more than cursory mention): (1) that of Augustine and others (it being allowed on all hands, that to tarry means to remain in this life: see abideth (the same word in the original), ch. xii. 34), ‘If I will that he remain till I fetch him,’ i.e. by a natural death. But this is frigid, and besides inapplicable here. Peter's death, although by the hands of another, was just as much the Lord's ‘coming for him,’ as John's, and there would thus be no contrast. (2) That that ‘coming of the Lord’ is meant, which is so often in the three Gospels alluded to (see especially notes on Matt. xxiv.), viz. the establishment in full of the dispensation of the Kingdom by the destruction of the nation and temple of the Jews, This is the view of some mentioned by Theophylact, of Bengel, and others,—and is upheld by the similar place, Matt. xvi. 28. (3) That the Lord here puts a case only,—‘Even should I will that he remain upon earth till My last coming—what would that be to thee?’ This view is upheld by Trench; but I think must be rejected on maturer consideration of the character of the words of our Lord, in whose mouth such a mere hypothetical saying would be strangely incongruous, especially in these last solemn days of His presence on earth.

The second view seems then to remain, and I adopt it with some qualification. At the destruction of Jerusalem began that mighty series of events of which the Apocalypse is the prophetic record, and which is in the complex known as the ‘COMING OF THE LORD,’ ending, as it shall, with His glorious and personal Advent. This the beloved Apostle alone lived to see, according to ancient and undoubted tradition.

23.] the brethren is an expression of later date than any usually occurring in the Gospels. It is however frequent in the Acts: e.g. ix. 30: xi. 1, 12: xii. 17: xv. 1, &c.

The following words are to me a proof that this chapter was written during St. John’s lifetime. If written by another person after St. John’s death, we should certainly, in the refutation of this error, have read, that St. John was dead and buried, as we do read of David in Acts ii. 29.

This notion of St. John’s not having died, was prevalent in the early Church,—so that Augustine himself seems almost to credit the story of the earth of St. John’s tomb heaving with his breath. ‘The English sect of the “seekers,” under Cromwell, expected the reappearance of the Apostle as the forerunner of the coming of Christ.’ Tholuck. The simple recapitulation of the words of the Lord shews that their sense remained dark to the writer, who ventured on no explanation of them; merely setting his own side of the apostolic duty over against that of Peter, who probably had already by following his Master through the Cross, glorified God, whereas the beloved disciple was, whatever that meant, to tarry till He came.

24, 25.] IDENTIFICATION OF THE AUTHOR, AND CONCLUSION. See remarks below.

24.] The words these things certainly refer to the whole Gospel, not merely to the Appendix—and are quite in St. John’s style: —see ch. xii. 41; xx. 31.

25.] The purpose of this verse seems to be to assert and vindicate the fragmentary character of the Gospel, considered merely as an historical narrative:—for that the doings of the Lord were so many,—His life so rich in matter of record,—that in a popular hyperbole, we can hardly imagine the world containing them all, if singly written down; thus setting forth the superfluity and cumbrousness of any thing like a perfect detail, in the strongest terms,—and in terms which certainly look as if fault had been found with this Gospel for want of completeness, by some objectors.

The reader will have perceived in the foregoing comment on the chapter a manifest leaning to the belief that it was written by St. John himself. Of this I am fully convinced. In every part of it, his hand is plain and unmistakeable: in every part of it, his character and spirit is manifested in a way which none but the most biased can fail to recognize. I believe it to have been added by him, some years probably after the completion of the Gospel; partly perhaps to record the important miracle of the second draught of fishes, so full of spiritual instruction, and the interesting account of the sayings of the Lord to Peter;—but principally to meet the error which was becoming prevalent concerning himself. In order to do this, he gives a complete account, with all minute details,—even to the number of the fish caught,—of the circumstances preceding the conversation,—and the very words of the Lord Himself: not pretending to put a meaning on those words, but merely asserting that they announced no such thing as that he should not die. Surely nothing can be more natural than this.

External evidence completely tallies with this view. The chapter is contained in all the principal MSS.; and there is no greater variety of reading than usual. In these respects it differs remarkably from John vii. 53—viii. 11, and indeed from even Mark xvi. 9—20. Internal evidence of style and diction is nearly balanced. It certainly contains several words and constructions not met with elsewhere in John (see these noticed in my Greek Test.); but, on the other hand, the whole cast of it is his;—the coupling particles are his;—the train of thought, and manner of narration. And all allowance should be made for the double alteration of style of writing which would be likely to be brought about, by lapse of time, and by the very nature of an appendix,—a fragment,—not forming part of a whole written continuously, but standing by itself. The last two verses, from their contents, we might expect to have more of the epistolary form; and accordingly we find them singularly in style resembling the Epistles of John.

On the whole, I am persuaded that in this chapter we have a fragment, both authentic and genuine, added, for reasons apparent on the face of it, by the Apostle himself, bearing evidence of his hand, but in a ‘second manner,’—a later style;—probably in the decline of life.

THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES

On the title, see Introduction.

Acts: Chapter 1

CHAP. I. 1–3.] INTRODUCTION.

1. The former treatise....] The latter member of this sentence, but the present one.... is wanting, and the Author proceeds at once to his narration, binding this second history to the first by recapitulating and enlarging the account given in the conclusion of the Gospel.

of all that Jesus....] Whatever latitude may be given to the word all, it must at all events serve to refute the notion that St. Luke had at this time seen the Gospels of Matthew or Mark, in which many things which Jesus did and taught are contained, which he had not related in his former treatise. On Theophilus, see notes, Luke i. 3.

that Jesus began both to do and teach] I cannot think began here to be merely superfluous. Its position here shews that it is emphatic, and the parallel cases (Matt. iv. 17: Mark i. 45: Luke xiii. 25; xxiii. 5) all point to a distinct and appropriate meaning for the word. That meaning here seems to be, that the Gospel contained the beginnings, the outset, of all the doings and teachings of our Lord, as distinguished from this second treatise, which was to relate their sequel and results. Meyer understands it—which Jesus first of all men did, &c. But this introduces a meaning irrelevant to the context, besides not giving the emphasis to the word began, which it must have by the arrangement of the original, but to the word Jesus. The position of emphasis given to the verb shews, that the beginning of the doing and teaching of Jesus must be contrasted with the continuance of the same, now about to be related.

had given commandments unto the apostles] See Luke xxiv. 48 ff., and ver. 4 below.

The words through the Holy Ghost may, in the original, be joined either with had given commandments, or with had chosen. There are ancient authorities both ways. In the former case, our Lord is said to have given His commands to the Apostles through, or in the power of, the Holy Ghost. Similarly He is said, Heb. ix. 14, “through the Eternal Spirit to have offered Himself without spot to God.” In the latter, He is said to have chosen the Apostles by the power of the Holy Ghost. Similarly, in ch. xx. 28, Paul tells the Ephesian elders, that the Holy Ghost had made them bishops in the Church of God. The former construction however appears much the best, as expressing not, as might at first seem, a mere commonplace, but the propriety of the fact,—that His last commands were given in the power of (see John xx. 22) the Holy Ghost.

3. by infallible proofs] See Luke xxiv. 31, 39, 43.

being seen of them forty days] It is hardly possible to give in English the exact force of the original, which implies that He was occasionally seen by them during a period of forty days. “He was not always with them as before the Resurrection,” says Chrysostom: for the “Evangelist does not say He was seen for forty days, but [at times] during forty days.” This is the only place where the duration of the interval between the Resurrection and the Ascension is specified.

the things pertaining to the kingdom of God] What things these were, we are not told. Certainly, not future events in their detail,—as the next portion of the narrative shews us. I should rather believe them to have concerned the future founding and government of the Church: though even here the greatest Apostles were apparently left to the unfolding of the teaching of the Holy Spirit as years went on.

4–14.] THE LAST DISCOURSES AND ASCENSION OF THE LORD. RETURN OF THE APOSTLES TO JERUSALEM; RECAPITULATION OF THEIR NAMES.

4. being assembled together with them] so the original word imports, not “eating together with them,” which marginal reading of the A.V. originated in a mistake as to the etymology of the word.

that they should not depart from Jerusalem] See Luke xxiv. 49. “They are commanded to remain together, because they were all to be endowed with one Spirit. If they had been dispersed, the unity of the Church would have been less manifestly known.” Calvin.

The ancient idea, that our Lord commanded the Apostles to remain at Jerusalem for twelve years after the Ascension, is sufficiently refuted by His own words here, and by the subsequent history: compare ch. viii. &c. That, in the main, they confined themselves to circuits in Palestine for some years, appears to be true; but surely would not be in compliance with such a command. the promise of the Father] See note on Luke xxiv. 49.

5.] The Lord cites these words from the mouth of John himself, Luke iii. 16 and parallels;—and thus announces to them that, as John’s mission was accomplished in baptizing with water, so now the great end of His own mission, the Baptism with the Holy Ghost, was on the point of being accomplished. Calvin remarks, that He speaks of the Pentecostal effusion as being the Baptism with the Holy Ghost, because it was a great representation, on the whole Church, of the subsequent continued work of regeneration on individuals: and was as it were a common baptism of the whole Church. I may add, also because it was the beginning of a new period of spiritual influence, totally unlike any which had preceded. See ch. ii. 17.

not many days hence] literally, after these not many days. This expression serves to bind on the time which should elapse to the day then current; as we say, ‘one of these days.’ Bengel observes, that the time was not precisely defined, for a trial of their faith.

6.] This coming together does not belong to another assembling, different from the former; but takes up again the “assembling” of ver. 4.

Lord, wilt thou restore] literally, dost thou restore? The stress of the question is in the words, which in the original are prefixed for emphasis, at this time. That the Kingdom was, in some sense, and at some time, to be restored to Israel, was plain; nor does the Lord deny this implication (see on ver. 8). Their fault was, a too curious enquiry on a point reserved among the secrets of God. Lightfoot’s idea, that the disciples wondered at the Kingdom being about to be restored to the ungrateful Jews, at this time, now that they had crucified Him, &c., would make our Lord’s answer irrelevant.—See Micah iv. 8.—Meyer would refer at, or in this time, to the interval designated by “not many days hence,” “during this time;” “wilt thou, during this time, restore?” But this does not seem natural. I should rather understand it, at this present, period,—now. The present tense, dost thou restore (see above), is often used in speaking with reference to matters of prophecy, importing fixed determination. So that we must not understand it, “Art thou restoring?” but “wilt,” or “dost thou restore?”

7.] This is a general reproof and assertion, spoken with reference to men, as forbidden to search curiously into a point which Omniscience has reserved—the times and seasons of the future divine dealings. But it is remarkable that not “God,” but the Father is here used; and this cannot fail to remind us of that saying (Mark xiii, 32), “But of that day or hour knoweth none, no not an angel in heaven, (so in our oldest MSS.,) nor even the Son, but the Father.” It may be observed however, that the same assertion is not made here: only the times and seasons said to be in the power of the Almighty Father, Who ordereth all things “according to the counsel of His will.” The Knowledge of the Son is not here in question, only that of the disciples. It is an enquiry intimately connected with the interpretation of the two passages, but one beyond our power to resolve, how far, among the things not yet put under His feet, may be this very thing, the knowledge of that day and hour.—Bengel attempts to evade the generality of the assertion It is not for you to know.... “It was not yet for the Apostles to know these,” he says; “but they were afterwards signified by the Apocalypse.” But signified to whom? What individual, or portion of the Church, Than ever read plainly these times or seasons in that mysterious book?—There is truth in Olshausen’s remark, that the Apostles were to be less prophets of the future, than witnesses of the past; but we must not limit the word you to the Apostles, nor forget that the knowledge of times and seasons has very seldom been imparted by prophecy, which generally has formed a testimony to this very fact, that God has them in His foreknowledge, and, while He announces the events, conceals for the most part in obscurity the times.

times or seasons] The two do not signify the same thing: times being the wider term, applicable to any kind of portion or point of duration, whereas a season is always a definite, limited space of time, and involves the idea of transitoriness.| “As the best means of 8.] “As the best means of bridling their curiosity, Christ recalls them both to God’s promise and to His command.” Calvin.

Howbeit “marks the contrast between that which did belong to the disciples and that which did not: as also between that which was to happen at that time, and that which was reserved for the future.” Bengel.

ye shall receive power] that power, especially, spoken of ch. iv. 33, connected with their office of witnessing to the resurrection; but also all other spiritual power. See. Luke xxiv. 49.

ye shall be my witnesses] So they say of themselves, ch. v. 32, “We are His witnesses of these things.” This was the peculiar work of the Apostles. See on verses 21, 22, and Introduction, ch. i. §3, paragraph 5.

both in Jerusalem.....] By the extension of their testimony, from Jerusalem to Samaria, and then indefinitely over the world, He reproves, by implication, their carnal anticipation of the restoration of the Kingdom to Israel thus understood. The Kingdom was to be one founded on testimony, and therefore reigning in the convictions of men's hearts; and not confined to Judæa, but coextensive with the world.—The Apostles understood this command only of Jews scattered through the world, see ch. xi. 19.—De Wette observes, that these words contain the whole plan of the Acts: Ye shall receive power by the Holy Ghost coming upon you, ch. ii. 1 to end; the witnesses in Jerusalem, ch. iii. 1—vi. 7; then the martyrdom of Stephen dispersed them through Judæa, vi. 8—viii. 3; they preach in Samaria, viii. 4—40; and, from that point, the conversion of the Apostle of the Gentiles, the vision of Peter, the preaching and journeys of Paul. In their former mission, Matt. x. 5, 6, they had been expressly forbidden from preaching either to Samaritans or Gentiles.

9.] This appears (see Introduction, ch. iv. §4, paragraph 2) to be an account of the Ascension furnished to St. Luke subsequently to the publication of his Gospel, more particular in detail than that found in it. He has not repeated here details found there; see Luke xxiv. 50—52. On the Ascension in general, see note on Luke, as above.

he was lifted up] We may understand this of the commencing ascent, when He was first lifted from the ground where they were standing: the next clause, a cloud received him out of their sight, describes the close of the scene, as far as it was visible to the spectators. There was a manifest propriety in the last withdrawal of the Lord, while ascending, not consisting in a disappearance of His Body, as on former occasions since the Resurrection; for thus might His abiding Humanity have been called in question. As it was, He went up, past the visible boundary of Heaven, the cloud,—in human form, and so we think of and pray to Him.

10.] as he went (or was going) up, not “when He had gone up:” implying that the cloud remained visible for some time, probably ascending with Him.

two men] These were evidently angels. See Luke xxiv. 4: John xx. 12.

11.] which (not only appeared but) also said. There is a propriety in the address, Ye men of Galilee. It served to remind them of their origin, their call to be His disciples, and the duty of obedience to Him resting on them in consequence.

in like manner as;—to be taken literally; as you beheld Him going, so shall He be seen coming: in the same human form, and in the clouds of heaven, Luke xxi. 27. His corporeal identity is implied in the words, this same Jesus. “Notice, it is not said that they who saw Him ascending should also see Him come again. Between the Ascension and the glorious Advent no exertion is interposed which can be put in comparison with either of them: and in consequence these two are placed together. It was then with reason that the Apostles, before the giving of the Apocalypse, looked to the day of Christ as very near. And it is agreeable to the Majesty of Christ, that He should be expected without intermission during the whole interval between the Ascension and His Advent.” Bengel.

12.] In so careful a writer (see Luke i. 3), there must be some reason why this minute specification of distance should be here inserted, when no such appears in the Gospel. And I believe this will be found, by combining the hint dropped by Chrysostom,—“It seems to me that these things must have happened on a Sabbath: for the Evangelist would not have thus stated the distance... except they had had their journey limited by its being the Sabbath day,”—with the declaration in the Gospel (xxiv. 50) that he led them out as far as to Bethany. This latter was (John xi. 18) fifteen stadia from Jerusalem, which is more than twice the Sabbath day’s journey (2000 cubits = about six furlongs). Now if the Ascension happened on the Sabbath, it is very possible that offence may have arisen at the statement in the Gospel: and that therefore the Evangelist gave here the more exact notice, that the spot, although forming part of the district of Bethany, was yet on that part of the Mount of Olives which fell within the limits of the Sabbath day’s journey. This of course must be a mere conjecture; but it will not be impugned by the fact of the Ascension being kept by the Church in after ages on a Thursday. This formed no hindrance to Chrysostom in making the above supposition: although the festival was certainly observed in his time. Forty days from the Resurrection is an expression which would suit as well the Saturday of the seventh week as the Thursday.—The distance of the Mount of Olives from Jerusalem is stated by Josephus at five stadia, in one passage,—at six stadia, in another; different points being taken as the limit. The present church of the Ascension rather exceeds the distance of six stadia from the city.

13. when they were come in] viz. ‘into the city.’

the upper chamber] The idea that this was a chamber in the Temple has originated in low literal-harmonistic views, St. Luke having stated (Luke xxiv. 53) that they were “continually in the temple.” As if such an expression could be literally understood, or taken to mean more than that they were there at all appointed times (see ch. iii. 1). It is in the highest degree improbable that the disciples would be found assembled in any public place at this time. The upper chamber was perhaps that in which the last Supper had been taken; probably that in which they had been since then assembled (John xx. 19, 26), but certainly one in a private house. Lightfoot shews that it was the practice of the Jews to retire into a large chamber under the flat roof for purposes of deliberation or prayer. Epiphanius relates that “when Hadrian came to Jerusalem, he found the whole city levelled with the ground, and the temple of God trodden down, with the exception of a few houses, and the church of God, which was but small, where the disciples, on their return, after the Saviour had been received up from the Mount of Olives, went up into the upper chamber. For there it was built, that is, in the region Zion; which survived the desolation.... even to the time of Bishop Maximus, and the Emperor Constantine: like a cottage in a vineyard, as it is written.” And Nicephorus says that the Empress Helena enclosed in her larger church the room where took place the descent of the Holy Spirit in the upper chamber.

where they were sojourning] not to be taken, as in A.V. ‘where abode both Peter,’ &c.; which gives the idea that Peter, &c. were already in the chamber, and the rest joined them there:—but on entering the city, they went up into the upper chamber, where they (usually) sojourned (not ‘dwelt’: they did not all dwell in one house; see John xix. 27, note), namely, Peter, &c.—On the catalogue of the Apostles, see Matt. x. 2, note.

14. with the women] viz. those spoken of by St. Luke himself, Luke viii. 2, 3,—where, besides those named, he mentions many others. Some have proposed to render the phrase “with their wives:” but many of these were certainly not wives of the Apostles; and that those women who were ‘last at the Cross and earliest at the tomb’ should not have been assembled with the company now, is very improbable.

and Mary the mother of Jesus] The and gives eminence to one among those previously mentioned. This is the last mention of her in the N.T. The traditions, which describe her as (1) dying at the age of fifty-nine, in the fifth year of Claudius, or (2) accompanying St. John to Ephesus, and being buried there, are untrustworthy. Other accounts, with the authorities, may be seen in Butler’s Lives of the Saints, Aug. 15. The fable of the Assumption has no foundation even in tradition.

and his brethren] This clearly shews, as does John vii. 5 compared with vi. 67, 70, that none of the brethren of our Lord were of the number of the Twelve. When they were converted, is quite uncertain. See the whole subject discussed in note on Matt. xiii. 55, and in the Introduction to the Epistle of James.

15–26.] ELECTION OF A TWELFTH APOSTLE TO FILL THE ROOM OF JUDAS ISCARIOT.

15. in those days] In the days between the Ascension and Pentecost: during which it appears that the number of the assembly had increased, not probably by fresh conversions, but by the gathering round the Apostles of those who had previously been disciples.

the number of names] that is, of persons: but the term would hardly be used except where the number is small. See Rev. iii. 4, and note.

an hundred and twenty] De Wette asks, ‘where were the 500 brethren of 1 Cor. xv. 6?’ We surely may answer, ‘not in Jerusalem.’

16.] We may enquire, by what change in mind and power Peter was able, before the descent of the Spirit, thus authoritatively to speak of Scripture and the divine purposes? The answer will be found in the peculiar gift of the Spirit to the Apostles, John xx. 21, 23; where see note.—The pre-eminency of Peter here is ‘the commencement of the fulfilment of Matt. xvi. 18, 19 (see note there).

17.] Because gives the reason of the previous assertion, viz. that Judas held, and had betrayed, that place of high trust of which the prophecy spoke. Thus it has reference to the substance of the prophecy, already in Peter’s mind, and serves to explain the words “his habitation,” and “his bishoprick,” which occur in the prophecy.

had obtained the lot] not literally, but inasmuch as the lot of every man is regarded as being cast and appointed by God.

18.] This verse cannot be regarded as inserted by St. Luke; for, 1. the place of its insertion would be most unnatural for an historical notice: 2. the form of its introduction in the original forbids the supposition: 3. the whole style of the verse is rhetorical, and not narrative, e.g. “this man,” “the reward of iniquity.”—The statement, that he bought a field, does not appear to agree with the account in Matt. xxvii, 6–8; nor, consistently with common honesty, can they be reconciled, unless we knew more of the facts than we do. If we compare the two, that of St. Matthew is the more particular, and more likely to give rise to this one, as a general inference from the buying of the field, than vice versa. Whether Judas, as Bengel supposes, began the purchase, and so gave occasion for its being completed by the Chief Priests, we cannot say: such a thing is of course possible, but is certainly not contemplated by St. Matthew’s account, where the priests settle to buy the field, on deliberation, what they should do with the money. At all events we hence clearly see that St. Luke could not have been acquainted with the Gospel of St. Matthew at this time, or surely this apparent discrepancy would not have been found. The various attempts to reconcile the two narratives, which may be seen in most of our English commentaries, are among the saddest examples of the shifts to which otherwise high-minded men are driven by an unworthy system. A notable example occurs in a solution lately proposed, that as the Jews are said to have crucified our Lord when they were only the occasion of his being crucified, so Judas may be said to have bought the field when he only gave occasion to its being bought by the Chief Priests. I need hardly say to any intelligent and ingenuous reader, that this is entirely precluded here by the words with the reward of his iniquity, which plainly bind on the purchase to Judas as his personal act.

and falling headlong] The connexion of this with the former clause would seem to point to the death of Judas having taken place in the field which he bought. See also ver. 19.

falling headlong will hardly bear the meaning assigned to it by those who wish to harmonize the two accounts,—viz. that, having hanged himself, he fell by the breaking of the rope. It would rather point, as the word used is explained, to a sudden fall forward on the face by a stroke from God, or by an accident. Nor again is it at all probable that the Apostle would recount what was a mere accident accompanying his death, when that death itself was the accursed one of hanging. What then are we to decide respecting the two accounts? That there should have been a double account actually current of the death of Judas at this early period, is in the highest degree improbable, and will only be assumed by those who take a very low view of the accuracy of the Evangelists. Dismissing then this solution, let us compare accounts themselves. In this case, that in Matt. xxvii. is general,—ours particular. That depends entirely on the exact sense to be assigned to the word which we render “hanged himself:” whereas this directly assigns the manner of his death, without stating any cause for the falling on his face. It is obvious that, while the general term used by Matthew points mainly at self-murder, the account given here does not preclude the catastrophe related having happened, in some way, as a divine judgment, during the suicidal attempt. Further than this, with our present knowledge, we cannot go. An accurate acquaintance with the actual circumstances would account for the discrepancy, but nothing else.—Another kind of death is assigned to Judas by Οecumenius, quoting from Papias: “Papias, the disciple of the Apostle John, relates, that Judas, as he walked about, was a great example of God’s judgments on impiety in this world; for that he swelled up to a fearful size, and once on attempting to pass through (a gateway) at the same time with a waggon which left ample space, he was crushed by the waggon, so that his bowels gushed out.” This tradition may be in accordance with, and may have arisen from an exaggerated amplification of, our text. See more in the note in my Greek Test.

he burst asunder: the word implies bursting with a noise. It is quite possible that this catastrophe happening in the field, as our narrative implies, may have suggested its employment as a burial-place for strangers, as being defiled.

19.] It is principally from this verse that it has been inferred that the two verses 18, 19 are inserted by St. Luke. But it is impossible to separate it from ver. 18; and I am disposed to regard both as belonging to Peter’s speech, but freely given by St. Luke, inserting into the speech itself the explanations, “in their proper tongue,” and “that is to say, the field of blood,” as if the speech had been spoken in Greek originally. This is much more natural, than to parenthesize these clauses; it is, in fact, what must be more or less done by all who report in a language different from that actually used by the speaker. The words and idioms of a mother tongue contain allusions and national peculiarities which never could have been in the mind of one speaking in a different language; but the ear tolerates these, or easily separates them, if critically exercised.

it was known....] See Luke xxiv. 18.

The field of blood] In Matt. xxvii. 8, the name ‘the field of blood’ is referred to the fact of its having been bought with the price of blood: here, to the fact of Judas having there met with a signal and bloody death. On the whole, I believe the result to which I have above inclined will be found the best to suit the phenomena of the two passages,—viz. that, with regard to the purchase of the field, the more circumstantial account in Matthew is to be adopted; with regard to the death of Judas, the more circumstantial account of Luke. The clue which joins these has been lost to us: and in this, only those will find any stumbling-block, whose faith in the veracity of the Evangelists is very weak indeed.

The field originally belonged to a potter, and was probably a piece of land which had been exhausted of its clay fit for his purposes, and so was useless. Jerome relates that it was still shewn on the South side of Mount Sion, in which neighbourhood there is even now a bed of white clay.

20.] For, the connexion being, ‘all this happened and became known,’ &c., ‘in accordance with the prophecy.’ &c. Ps. lxix. is eminently a Messianic psalm,—spoken in the first place of David and his kingdom and its enemies, and so, according to the universal canon of Old Testament interpretation, of Him in whom that kingdom found its true fulfilment, and of His enemies. And Judas being the first and most notable of these, the Apostle applies eminently to him the words which in the Psalm are spoken in the plural of all such enemies. The same is true of Ps. cix., and there one adversary is even more pointedly marked out. See also Ps. lv.

bishoprick] not necessarily such, in technical accuracy: the word may signify any overseership, office, or charge. But, considering the usage of the word and its cognates, in this and the following books of the N.T., and in the church, I regard it as best to keep every where the literal rendering, leaving each passage to explain itself.

21.] Wherfore, since all this has happened to Judas, and since it is the divine will that another should take the charge which was his.

all the time] This definition of the necessary qualification of an apostle exactly agrees with our Lord's saying in John xv. 27: "And ye also are witnesses, because ye have been with me from the beginning." See Introduction, ch. i., §3, paragraph 5.

22.] the baptism of John is mentioned as a well-known date, including of course the opening event of our Lord's ministry, His own baptism by John. That John continued to baptize for some time after that, can be no possible objection to the assignment of 'John's baptism' generally, as the date of the commencement of the apostolic testimony. We may notice, that from this point, the baptism of John, the testimony of the Evangelists themselves in their Gospels properly begins, Matt. iii. 1, Mark i. 1, Luke iii. 1, John i. 6.

a witness.... of his resurrection] This one event was the passage-point between the Lord's life of humiliation and His life of glory,—the completion of His work below and beginning of His work above. And to 'give witness with power' of the Resurrection (ch. iv. 33), would be to discourse of it as being all this: in order to which, the whole ministry of Jesus must be within the cycle of the Apostle's experience.—It is remarkable that Peter here lays down experience of matters of fact, not eminence in any subjective grace or quality, as the condition of Apostleship. Still, the testimony was not to be mere ordinary allegation of matters of fact: any who had seen the Lord since His resurrection were equal to this;—but belonged to a distinct office (see John xiv. 26: also ch. v. 31, note), requiring the especial selection and grace of God.

23. they appointed] they, viz. the whole company, to whom the words had been spoken; not the eleven Apostles.

Joseph....] The names Jose ph and Jose s, different forms of the same, are confused in the MSS., both here and in ch. iv. 36. But Barsabas and Barnabas are not to be confounded: they are different names (Barsabas is son of Saba: on Barnabas, see iv. 36, note); and Barnabas is evidently introduced in iv. 36 as a person who had not been mentioned before. Of Joseph Barsabas, nothing further is known. There is a Judas Barsabas mentioned in ch. xv. 22, whom some take to be his brother. Eusebius states, on the authority of Papias, that he drank a cup of poison Without being hurt.—In all probability both the selected persons belonged to the number of the Seventy, as it would be natural that the candidates for apostleship should be chosen from among those who had been already distinguished by Christ Himself among the brethren.—Justus (the Just) is a Roman second name, assumed according to a custom then prevalent. The name Justus seems to have been common: Schöttgen, on this place, gives two instances of Jews bearing it.

Matthias] Nothing historical is known of him, Traditionally, according to Nicephorus, he suffered martyrdom in Aethiopia; according to others, in Colchis: another account makes him preach in Judea, and be stoned by the Jews.

24.] It is a question, to Whom this prayer was directed. I think all probability is in favour of the Apostle (for Peter certainly was the spokesman) having addressed his glorified Lord. And with this the language of the prayer agrees. No stress can, it is true, be laid on the word Lord being used: see ch. iv. 29, where unquestionably the Father is so addressed: but the expression, thou hast chosen, compared with Did I not choose you twelve? John vi. 70, seems to me almost decisive. See also ver. 2; Luke vi. 13; John xiii. 18, xv. 16, 19. The instance cited on the other side by Meyer, "God made choice"..., ch. xv. 7, is not to the point, as not relating to the matter here in hand; nor are the passages cited by De Wette, 2 Cor. i. 1; Eph. i. 1; 2 Tim. i. 1, where Paul refers his apostleship to God, since obviously all such appointment must be referred ultimately to God:—but the question for us is,—In these words, did the disciples pray as they would have prayed before the Ascension, or had they Christ in their view? The expression, which knowest the hearts of all men (used by Peter himself of God, ch. xv. 8), forms no objection: see John xxi. 17, also in the mouth of Peter himself. We are sure, from the words, they worshipped Him, Luke xxiv. 52, that even at this time, before the descent of the Spirit, the highest kind of worship was paid to the ascended Redeemer. Still I do not regard it as by any means certain that they addressed Christ, nor can the passage be alleged as convincing, in controversy with the Socinian.

The words are not, as in E.V., 'shew whether of these two Thou hast chosen', but appoint one of these two [him] whom Thou hast chosen. The difference is of some import: they did not pray for a sign merely, to shew whether of the two was chosen, but that the Lord would, by means of their lot, Himself appoint the one of His choice.

25.] the place, instead of part, is from internal evidence, as well as MS. authority, the preferable reading. It has been altered to suit ver. 17.

that he might go to his own place] With the reading place in the former part of the verse, I think these words may be interpreted two ways: 1. that Judas deserted this our place, our office and ministry, to go to his own place, that part which he had chosen for himself, viz. the office and character of a traitor and enemy of God; 2. regarding the former word place as being selected to correspond to the more proper and dreadful use of the word here, that Judas deserted his appointed place, here among us, that he might go to his own appointed place elsewhere, viz. among the dead in the place of torment. Of these two interpretations, I very much prefer the second, on all accounts; as being more according to the likely usage of the word, and as more befitting the solemnity of such a prayer. At the same time, no absolute sentence is pronounced on the traitor, but that dark surmise expressed by the phrase his own place, which none can help feeling with regard to him. To understand “he” of Judas’s successor,—that he (the new Apostle) might enter on his own place of dignity destined for him by God, (1) is contrary to the form of the sentence in the original; (2) is inconsistent with the words, which are unexampled in this sense; (3) would divest a sentence, evidently solemn and pregnant, of all point and meaning, and reduce it to a mere tautology. It appears to have been very early understood as above; for Clement of Rome says of Peter, “Thus having borne a martyr’s testimony, he went to his appointed place of glory,” an expression evidently borrowed from our text. Lightfoot quotes from a Rabbinical work on Numb. xxv. 25, “Balaam went to his own place,” i.e. “to hell.”

26. they cast lots for them] These lots were probably tablets, with the names of the persons written on them, and shaken in a vessel, or in the lap of a robe (Prov. xvi. 33); he whose lot first leaped out being the person designated.

was voted in amongst the eleven apostles] The lot being regarded as the divine choice, the suffrages of the assembly were unanimously given (not in form, but by cheerful acquiescence) to the candidate thus chosen, and he ‘voted in’ among the eleven Apostles, i.e. as a twelfth. That St. Luke does not absolutely say so, and never afterwards speaks of the twelve Apostles, is surely no safe ground on which to doubt this.—Stier was disposed to question whether this step of electing a twelfth Apostle was altogether suitable to the then waiting position of the Church, and whether Paul was not in reality the twelfth, chosen by the Lord Himself. But I do not see that any of his seven queries touch the matter. We have the precedent, of all others most applicable, of the twelve tribes, to shew that the number, though ever nominally kept, was really exceeded. And this incident would not occupy a prominent place in a book where St. Paul himself has so conspicuous a part, unless it were by himself considered as being what it professed to be, the filling up of the vacant Apostleship.

CHAP. II. 1-4.] THE OUTPOURING OF THE HOLY SPIRIT ON THE DISCIPLES.

1.] while the day of Pentecost was being fulfilled: “during the progress of that particular day:” necessitated by the present tense. In sense, it amounts to ‘when the day of Pentecost was fully come,’ as A.V.

the day of Pentecost] The fiftieth day (inclusive) after the sixteenth of Nisan, the second day of the Passover (Levit. xxiii. 16),—called in Exodus xxiii. 16, ‘the feast of harvest,’—in Deut. xvi. 10, ‘the feast of weeks:’—one of the three great feasts, when all the males were required to appear at Jerusalem, Deut. xvi. 16. At this time, it was simply regarded as the feast of harvest: among the later Jews, it was considered as the anniversary of the giving of the law from Sinai. This inference was apparently grounded on a comparison of Exod. xii. 2 and xix. 1. Josephus and Philo know nothing of it, and it is at the best very uncertain. Chrysostom’s reason for the event happening when it did is probably the true one: “It was fitting that this should take place on the recurrence of a feast: that they who had been present at the cross of Christ might see this also.” The question, on what day of the week this day of Pentecost was, is beset with the difficulties attending the question of our Lord’s last passover; see notes on Matt. xxvi. 17, and John xviii. 28. It appears probable however that it was on the Sabbath,—i. e. if we reckon from Saturday, the 16 th of Nisan. Wieseler supposes that the Western Church altered the celebration of it to the first day of the week, in conformity with her observance of Easter on that day. If we take the second day of the Passover as Sunday, the 17 th of Nisan, which some have inferred from John xviii. 28, the day of Pentecost will fall on the first day of the week.

they were all together in one place] Not the Apostles only, nor the hundred and twenty mentioned ch. i. 15; but all the believers in Christ, then congregated at the time of the feast in Jerusalem. The former is manifest from ver. 14, when Peter and the eleven stand forward and allude to the rest as these: and the latter follows on the former being granted. Both are confirmed by the universality of the promise cited by Peter, ver. 17 ff. See Chrysostom below, on ver. 4.

together: the other but not so well supported reading, “with one accord,” implies more, viz. that their purpose, as well as their locality, was the same.

in one place] Where? evidently not in the temple, or any part of it. The improbability of such an assemblage, separate and yet so great, in any of the rooms attached to the temple,—the words “all the house” in ver. 2 (where see note),—the notice, that “the multitude came together,” ver. 6,—the absence of any mention of the temple,—all these are against such a supposition.

Obviously no à priori consideration such as Olshausen alleges, that “thus the solemn inauguration of the Church of Christ becomes more imposing by happening in the holy place of the Old Covenant,” can apply to the enquiry. Nor can the statement that they were “continually in the temple,” Luke xxiv. 53, apply here (see above on ch. i. 13); for even if it be assumed that the hour of prayer was come (which it hardly could have been, seeing that some time must have elapsed between the event and Peter’s speech), the disciples would not have been assembled separately, but would, as Peter and John, in ch. iii. 1, have gone up, mingled with the people. See more below.

2.] The words of the description could not be better rendered than in A.V., a sound as of a rushing mighty wind. It was the sound as of a violent blowing, borne onward, which accompanied the descent of the Holy Spirit. To treat this as a natural phænomenon,—even supposing that phænomenon miraculously produced, as the earthquake at the crucifixion,—is contrary to the text, which does not describe it as a sound of a rushing mighty wind, but a sound as of a rushing mighty wind. It was the chosen vehicle by which the Holy Spirit was manifested to their sense of hearing, as by the tongues of fire to their sense of seeing.

it filled all the house] Certainly Luke would not have used this word of a chamber in the Temple, or of the Temple itself, without further explanation. Our Lord, it is true, calls the Temple “your house,” Matt. xxiii. 38,—and Josephus informs us that Solomon’s Temple was furnished with thirty small houses (or rooms), and that over these were other houses; but to suppose either usage here, seems to me very far-fetched and unnatural,

3. cloven tongues like as of fire] They were not of fire, as not possessing the burning power of fire, but only as it were of fire, in appearance like that element.

it sat, viz. the appearance; not the Spirit, nor the tongue, but the appearance described in the preceding clause. I understand the word sat as usually interpreted, lighted on their heads. This also was no effect of natural cause, either ordinarily or extraordinarily employed: see on ver. 2.

4.] On the word all, Chrysostom says, “The Evangelist would not have said all, the Apostles being there, had not the rest also been partakers.”

began to speak with other tongues] There can be no question in any unprejudiced mind, that the fact which this narrative sets before us is, that the disciples began to speak in VARIOUS LANGUAGES, viz. the languages of the nations below enumerated, and perhaps others. All attempts to evade this are connected with some forcing of the text, or some far-fetched and indefensible explanation. This then being laid down, several important questions arise, and we are surrounded by various difficulties. (1) Was this speaking in various languages a gift bestowed on the disciples for their use afterwards, or was it a mere sign, their utterance being only us they were mouth-pieces of the Holy Spirit? The latter seems certainly to have been the case. It appears on our narrative, even as the Spirit gave them utterance. But, it may be objected, in that case they would not themselves understand what they said. I answer, that we infer this very fact from 1 Cor. xiv.; that the speaking with tongues was often found, where none could interpret what was said. And besides, it would appear from Peter’s speech, that such, or something approaching to it, was the case in this instance. He makes no allusion to the things said by those who spoke with tongues; the hearers alone speak of their declaring the wonderful works of God. So that it would seem that here, as on other occasions (1 Cor. xiv. 22), tongues were for a sign, not to those that believe, but to those that believe not. If the first supposition be made, that the gift of speaking in various languages was bestowed on the disciples for their after-use in preaching the Gospel, we are, I think, running counter to the whole course of Scripture and the evidence of the early fathers on the subject. There is no trace whatever of such a power being possessed or exercised by the Apostles (see ch. xiv. 11, 14) or by those who followed them. I believe, therefore, the event related in our text to have been a sudden and powerful inspiration of the Holy Spirit, by which the disciples uttered, not of their own minds, but as mouth-pieces of the Spirit, the praises of God in various languages, hitherto, and possibly at the time itself, unknown to them. (2) How is this “speaking with other tongues” related to the “speaking with tongues” (or, “with a tongue”) afterwards spoken of by St. Paul? I answer, that they are one and the same thing. See this further proved in notes on 1 Cor. xiv. Meantime I may remark, that the two are inseparably connected by the following links,—ch. x. 46, xi. 15,—xix. 6,—in which last we have the same juxtaposition of speaking with tongues and prophesying as afterwards in 1 Cor. xiv. 1–5 ff. (3) Who were those that partook of this gift? I answer, the whole assembly of believers, from Peter’s application of the prophecy, vv. 16 ff. It was precisely the case supposed in 1 Cor. xiv. 23. The unlearned and unbelievers of that passage were represented by the others of our ver. 13, who pronounced them to be drunken, (4) I would not conceal the difficulty which our minds find in conceiving a person supernaturally endowed with the power of speaking, ordinarily and consciously, a language which he has never learned. But there is to my mind no such difficulty, in conceiving a man to be moved to utterance of sounds dictated by the Holy Spirit. And the fact is clearly laid down by St. Paul, that the gift of speaking in tongues, and that of interpreting, were wholly distinct. So that the above difficulty finds no place here, nor even in the case of a person both speaking and interpreting: see 1 Cor. xiv. 13.—On the question whether the speaking was necessarily always in a foreign tongue, we have no data to guide us: it would seem that it was; but the conditions would not absolutely exclude rhapsodical and unintelligible utterance. Only there is this objection to it: clearly, languages were spoken on this occasion,—and we have no reason to believe that there were two distinct kinds of the gift. (5) It would be quite beyond the limits of a note to give any adequate history of the explanations of the passage. A very short summary must suffice. (a) The idea of a gift of speaking in various languages having been conferred for the dissemination of the Gospel, appears not to have originated, until the gift of tongues itself had some time disappeared from the Church. Chrysostom adopts it, and the great majority of the Fathers and expositors. (b) Some, both in ancient and in modern times, have supposed that the miracle consisted in the multitude hearing in various languages that which the believers spoke in their native tongue: that one language was spoken, but many were heard. To this it may be replied, as is done by Gregory Nazianzen, that "thus the miracle would be wrought, not on the speakers, but on the hearers." This view, besides, would make a distinction between this instance of the gift and those subsequently related, which we have seen does not exist. On the courses taken by the modern German expositors, see note in my Greek Test.

even as (i. e. 'in such measure and manner in each case as') the Spirit granted to them to speak (bestowed on them utterance)] The words rendered gave them utterance have been supposed here to imply that they uttered short ejaculatory sentences of praise. But this seems to be unfounded: and our word to utter, to speak out, seems exactly to render it. Their utterance was none of their own, but the simple gift and inspiration of the Holy Spirit: see above.

5.] De Wette maintains that these dwellers at Jerusalem cannot have been persons sojourning for the sake of the feast, but residents: but see above on ver. 1. I see no objection to including both residents and sojourners in the term, which only specifies their then residence.

devout men] Not in reference to their having come up to the feast, nor to their dwelling from religious motives at Jerusalem, but stated as imparting a character and interest to what follows. They were not merely vain and curious listeners, but men of piety and weight.

out of every nation under heaven] Not perhaps used so much hyperbolically, as with reference to the significance of the whole event. As they were samples each of their different people, so collectively they represented all the nations of the world, who should hear afterwards in their own tongues the wonderful works of God.

6.] Whatever this sound (literally, voice) may mean, one thing is clear,—that it cannot mean, 'this rumour' ('when this was noised abroad,' A.V.): which would be unexampled. We have then to choose between two things to which the word voice, or sound, might refer:—(1) the "sound as of a mighty rushing wind" of ver. 2, which would hardly be used of a speaking which was still going on when the multitude assembled;—and (2) the speaking with tongues of ver. 4. To this reference, besides the objection just stated, there is also another, that the voices of a number of men, especially when diverse as in this case, would not be indicated by the singular number, voice, but by voices: comp. St. Luke's own usage, even when the voices cried out the same thing, Luke xxiii. 23, "They were instant with loud voices, requiring that he might be crucified. And the voices of them and of the chief priests prevailed." And when he uses the singular, he explains it, as in ch. xix. 34, "All with one voice... cried out." So that we may safely decide for the former reference. The noise of the rushing mighty wind was heard over all the neighbourhood, probably over all Jerusalem.

the multitude] including the scoffers of ver. 13, as well as the pious strangers: but these latter only are here regarded in the description that they were confounded, and that every man heard&c. On these latter words, see above on ver. 4. Each one heard them speaking—i. e. either various disciples speaking various tongues, each in some one only: or the same persons speaking now one, now another, tongue. The former is more probable, although the latter seems to agree with some expressions in 1 Cor. xiv., e.g. ver. 18.

were confounded] The same word, both in the LXX and in our English version, is used in Gen. xi. 9.

7.] They were not, literally, all Galilæans; but certainly the greater part were so, and all the Apostles and leading persons, who would probably be the prominent speakers.

8-11.] As regards the catalogue here given,—of course it cannot: have been thus delivered as part of a speech by any hearer on the occasion, but is inserted into a speech expressing the general sense of what was said, and put, according to the usage of all narrative, into the mouths of all. The words in our own tongue (literally, dialect), wherein we were born are very decisive as to the nature of the miracle. The hearers could not have thus spoken, had they been spiritually uplifted into the comprehension of some ecstatic language spoken by the disciples. They were not spiritually acted on at all, but spoke the matter of fact: they were surprised at each recognizing, so far from his country, and in the mouths of Galilæans, his own native tongue.

9. Parthians] The catalogue proceeds from the N.E. to the W. and S. Mede notices, that it follows the order of the three great dispersions of the Jews, the Chaldæan, Asyrian, and Egyptian.

Medes] Media, W. of Parthia and Hyreania, S. of the Caspian sea, E. of Armenia, N. of Persia.

Elamites] in pure Greek, Elymæans, inhabitants of Elam or Elymais, a Semitic people (Gen. x. 22). Elam is mentioned in connexion with Babylon, Gen. xiv. 1; with Media, Isa. xxi. 2; Jer. xxv. 25; with, or as part of, Assyria, Ezek. xxxii. 24; Isa. xxii. 6; as a province of Persia, Ezra iv. 9; as the province in which Susan was situated, Dan. viii. 2. According to Josephus, the Elamæans were the progenitors of the Persians. We find scattered hordes under this name far to the north, and even on the Orontes near the Caspian.

Mesopotamia] the well-known district between the Euphrates and Tigris, so called merely as distinguishing its geographical position, between the rivers (so the word imports in Greek): it never formed a state. The name does not appear to be older than the Macedonian conquests. The word is used by the LXX and A.V. in Gen. xxiv. 10 to express the Hebrew “Aram Naharaim,” Aram of the two rivers.

Judæa] I can see no difficulty in Judæa being here mentioned. ‘The catalogue does not proceed by languages, but by territorial division; and Judæa lies immediately S. of its path from Mesopotamia to Cappadocia. It is not Jews by birth and domicile, but devout men who are spoken of; the dwellers in Judæa settled in Judæa. And even if born Jews were meant, doubtless they also would find a place among those who heard in their mother tongue the wonderful works of God.

Cappadocia] At this time (since the year of Rome 770) a Roman province embracing Cappadocia proper and Armenia minor.

Pontus] the former kingdom of Mithridates, lying along the S. coast of the Euxine (whence its name, from the Pontus Euxinus, the Euxine Sea) from the river Halys to Colehis and Armenia, and separated by mountains from Cappadocia on the S. It was at this time divided into petty principalities under Roman protection, but subsequently became a province under Nero.

Asia] i.e. here Asia proper, or rather the W. division of it, as described by Pliny, as bounded on the E. by Phrygia and Lycaonia, on the W. by the Ægean, on the S. by the Egyptian sea, on the N. by Paphlagonia. Ephesus was its chief city. See ch. xvi. 6, where the same appears to be intended.

10. Phrygia] It was at this time part of the Roman province of Asia.

Pamphylia] a small district, extending along the coast from Olbia, or Phaselis, to Ptolemais. It was a separate tributary district: we find it at one time classed with Galatia, and ruled by the same person.

Egypt] Having enumerated the principal districts of Asia Minor, the catalogue passes (see above on the arrangement, ver. 9) to Egypt, a well-known habitation of Jews, Two-fifths of the population of Alexandria consisted of them, and they had an Ethnarch, or governor, of their own.

the parts of Libya about Cyrene] By this expression is probably meant Pentapolis, where Josephus, quoting from Strabo, testifies to the existence of very many Jews,—amounting in Cyrene to a fourth part of the whole population. The Cyrenian Jews were so numerous in Jerusalem, that they had a special synagogue (see ch. vi. 9). Several were Christian converts: see ch. xi. 20; xiii. 1.

Roman sojourners (so literally)] ‘The Roman Jews dwelling (or then being) in Jerusalem.’

Jews and proselytes] This refers more naturally to the whole of the past catalogue, than merely to the Roman Jews. It does not take up a new designation, but expresses the classes or divisions of those which have gone before.

11. Cretans and Arabians] These words would seem as if they should precede the last.

13. Others] Probably native Jews, who did not understand the foreign languages. Meyer supposes,—persons previously hostile to Jesus and his disciples, and thus judging as in Luke vii. 34 they judged of Himself.

sweet wine] Sweet wine, not necessarily new wine: perhaps made of a remarkably sweet small grape, which is understood by the, Jewish expositors to be meant in Gen. xl ix. 11; Isa. v. 2; Jer. ii. 21,—and is still found in Syria and Arabia. Suidas interprets it “that which oozes out of the grapes before they are pressed.”

14–36.] THE SPEECH OF PETER. “St. Luke gives us here the first sample of the preaching of the Gospel by the Apostles, with which the foundation of Christian preaching, as well as of the Church itself, appears to be closely connected. We discover already, in this first sermon, all the peculiarities of apostolic preaching. It contains no reflections nor deductions concerning the doctrine of Christ,—no proposition of new and unknown doctrines, but simply and entirely consists of the proclamation of historical facts. The Apostles appear here as the witnesses of that which they had seen: the Resurrection of Jesus forming the central point of their testimony. It is true, that in the after-development of the Church it was impossible to confine preaching to this historical announcement only: it gradually became invested with the additional office of building up believers in knowledge. But nevertheless, the simple testimony to the great works of God, as Peter here delivers it, should never be wanting in preaching to those whose hearts are not yet penetrated by the Word of Truth." Olshausen. The discourse divides itself into two parts: 1. (vv. 14–21) 'This which you hear is not the effect of drunkenness, but is the promised outpouring of the Spirit on all flesh,'—2. (vv. 22–36) 'which Spirit has been shed forth by Jesus, whom you crucified, but whom God hath exalted to be Lord and Christ.'

14. with the eleven] Peter and the eleven come forward from the great body of believers. And he distinguishes (by the word "these" in ver. 15) not himself from the eleven, but himself and the eleven from the rest. De Wette concludes from this, that the Apostles had not themselves spoken with tongues, as being an inferior gift (1 Cor. xiv. 18 ff.); perhaps too rashly, for this view hardly accords with the word all which is the subject of the whole of ver. 4.

men of Judæa] the Jews, properly so called: native dwellers in Jerusalem.

all ye that dwell at Jerusalem] the sojourners (ver. 5) from other parts.

the third hour of the day] the first hour of prayer: before which no pious Jew might eat or drink.—But perhaps we need not look further than the ordinary intent of such a defence—the improbability of intoxication at that hour of the morning. See Eccl. x. 16; Isa. v. 11; 2 Thess. v. 7.

16.] This prophecy is from the LXX, with very slight variations.

this is, i.e. 'this is the fact, at which those words pointed.' See a somewhat similar expression, Luke xxiv. 44.

17.] in the last days is an exposition of the words "after these things" in the LXX and Hebrew, referring it to the days of the Messiah, as Isa. ii. 2; Micah iv. 1, al. See also 2 Tim. iii. 1; Heb. i. 1. saith God does not occur in the verse of Joel, but at the beginning of the whole passage, ver. 12, and is supplied by Peter here.

18.] The Hebrew does not express the word my either time, but has, as in our English text, 'the servants and handmaids.' The words and they shall prophesy are not in the LXX nor in the Hebrew text.

19.] The words above, signs, and beneath are not in the LXX, nor in the Hebrew text.

blood, and fire,....] Not, 'bloodshed and wasting by fire,' as commonly interpreted:—not devastations, but prodigies, are foretold:—bloody and fiery appear:—pillars of smoke, as in the Hebrew.

the... day of the Lord] Not the first coming of Christ,—which interpretation would run counter to the whole tenor of the Apostle's application of the prophecy but clearly, His second coming: regarded in prophetic language as following close upon the outpouring of the Spirit, because it is the next great event in the divine arrangements.—The Apostles probably expected this coming very soon (see note on Rom. xiii. 11); but this did not at all affect the accuracy of their expressions respecting it. Their days witnessed the Pentecostal effusion, which was the beginning of the signs of the end: then follows the period, KNOWN TO THE FATHER ONLY, of waiting—the Church for her Lord,—the Lord Himself till all things shall have been put under His feet,—and then the signs shall be renewed, and the day of the Lord shall come. Meantime, and in the midst of these signs, the covenant of the spiritual dispensation is, ver. 21—'Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord, shall be saved.' The gates of God's mercy are thrown open in Christ to all people:—no barrier is placed,—no union with any external association or succession required: the promise is to individuals, AS individuals: whosoever: which individual universality, though here, by the nature of the circumstances, spoken within the limits of the outward Israel, is afterwards as expressly asserted of Jew and Gentile, Rom. i. 17, where see note.

22. Ye men of Israel] This address binds all the hearers in one term, and that one reminds them of their covenant relation with God: comp. "all the house of Israel," ver. 36.

of Nazareth] This title does not here seem to be emphatically used by way of contrast to what follows, as some have thought, but only as the ordinary appellation of Jesus by the Jews, see John xviii. 5, 7; ch. xxii. 8; xxvi. 9.

The words of (by) God, belong to approved, and denote the source whence the proof came. approved must be taken in its fuller and stricter meaning: viz. as importing,—shewn to be that which He claimed to be. The connexion of the passage is, that the Man Jesus of Nazareth was by God demonstrated, by God wrought in among you, by God's counsel delivered to death, by God raised up (which raising up is argued on till ver. 32, then taken up again), by God (ver. 36), finally, made Lord and Christ. This was the process of argument then with the Jews,—proceeding on the identity of a man whom they had seen and known,—and then mounting up from His works and His death and His resurrection, to His glorification,—all THE PURPOSE AND DOING OF GOD.

which God did by him] This is not, as De Wette characterizes it, a low view of the miracles wrought by Jesus, nor is it inconsistent with John ii. 11; but it is in strict accordance with the progress of our Lord through humiliation to glory, and with His own words in that very Gospel (v. 19), which is devoted to the great subject, the manifestation, by the Father, of the glory of the Son. This side of the subject is here especially dwelt on in argument with these Jews, to exhibit (see above) the whole course of Jesus of Nazareth, as the ordinance and doing of THE GOD OF ISRAEL.

23. delivered] by whom, is not said, but was supplied by the hearers, The counsel and foreknowledge of God are not to be joined as in the A.V. to “delivered,” with “by,” as if they were the agents—the connexion in the original is that of accordance and appointment, not of agency. The same connexion is expressed in ch. xv. by “after the manner of Moses.” See 2 Pet. i. 21 and note.

by the hand of lawless men] viz. of the Roman soldiers. The same word is used by St. Paul to express those without law, to whom he became as without law, 1 Cor. ix. 21.

The counsel and foreknowledge of God are not the same: the former designates His Eternal Plan, by which He has arranged all things (hence the determinate counsel)—the latter, the omniscience, by which every part of this plan is foreseen and unforgotten by Him.

nailed up] The harshness and unworthiness of the deed are strongly set forth by a word expressing the mechanical act merely, nailed up, as in contrast with the former clause, in which the dignity and divine mission of Jesus are set forth.—Peter lays the charge on the multitude, use they abetted their rulers,—see ch. iii. 17, where this is fully expressed: not for the farfetched reason given by Olshausen, that ‘all mankind were in fact guilty of the death of Jesus:’ in which case, as Meyer well observes, Peter must have said ‘we,’ not ‘you.’

24.] On the difficulty, and probable account to be given of the expression having loosed the pains of death, see note in my Greek Test. They cannot well be explained to the English reader.

The assertion, it was not possible that he should be holden of it, depends for its proof on the “For” which follows.

25.] The xvith Psalm was not by the Rabbis applied to the Messiah: but Peter here proves to them that, if it is to be true in its highest and proper meaning of any one, it must be of Him. We are met at every turn by the shallow objections of the Rationalists, who seem incapable of comprehending the principle on which the sayings of David respecting himself are referred to Christ. To say, with De Wette, that Peter’s proof lies not in any historical but only in an ideal meaning of the Psalm, is entirely beside the subject. To interpret the sayings of David (or indeed those of any one else) ‘historically,’ i.e. solely as referring to the occasion which gave rise to them, and having no wider reference, would be to establish a canon of interpretation wholly counter to the common sense of mankind. Every one, placed in any given position, when speaking of himself as in that position, speaks what will refer to others similarly situated, and most pointedly to any one who shall in any especial and pre-eminent way stand in that position. Applying even this common rule to David’s sayings, the applicability of them to Christ, will be legitimized:—but how much more, when we take into account the whole circumstances of David’s theocratic position, as the prophetic representative and type of Christ. Whether the Messiah were present or not to the mind of the Psalmist, is of very little import: in some cases He plainly was: in others, as here, David’s words, spoken of himself and his circumstances, could only be in their highest and literal sense true of the great Son of David who was to come. David often spoke concerning himself: but THE SPIRIT WHO SPOKE IN DAVID, concerning Christ. The citation is almost word for word according to the LXX version, differing from the Hebrew original as noticed below.

that I may not be moved] In the Hebrew, and English Bible, this is, ‘I shall not be moved.’

26. my tongue] In the Hebrew, and English Bible, ‘my glory:’ so in Ps. cviii. 1, where our prayer-book version renders “I will give praise with the best member that I have.” Compare also Ps. lvii. 8.

28.] Thou hast made known: in the Hebrew, and English Bible, ‘Thou wilt make known.’

thou shalt make me full of joy with thy countenance is in the Hebrew, and English Bible, “In (Heb. with) thy presence is fulness of joy.’ These two last clauses refer to the Resurrection and the Ascension respectively.

29. Brethren (literally “Men, brethren”)] He implies, ‘I am your brother, an Israelite, and therefore would not speak with disrespect of David’ He prepares the way for the apologetic sentence which follows.

The title ‘Patriarch’ is only here applied to David as the progenitor of the kingly race:—Abraham and the sons of Jacob are so called in ch. vii. 8, 9, and in Heb. vii. 4. In the LXX, the word is used of chief men, and heads of families, with the exception of 2 Chron. xxiii. 20, where it represents “captains of hundreds.” We learn from 1 Kings ii. 10, and Neh. iii. 16, that David was buried at Jerusalem, in the city of David, i.e. the stronghold of Zion, 2 Sam. v. 7.—Josephus gives an account of the high priest, Hyreanus, when besieged by Antiochus Eusebes,—and afterwards King Herod, opening the tomb and taking treasure from it. Dio Cassius mentions, among the prodigies which preceded Hadrian’s war, that the tomb of Solomon (the same with that of David) fell down. Jerome mentions that the tomb of David was visited in his time; i.e. at the end of the fourth century.

30.] a prophet, iv the stricter sense, a foreteller of future events by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. knowing that God had sworn] See 2 Sam. vii. 12. The words in this case are not cited from the LXX, but rendered from the Hebrew.

31.] The term seeing this before distinctly asserts the prophetic consciousness of David in the composition of this Psalm. But of what sort that prophetic consciousness was, may be gathered from this same Apostle, 1 Pet. i. 10–12: that it was not a distinct knowledge of the events which the prophets foretold, but only a conscious reference in their minds to the great promises of the covenant, in the expression of which they were guided by the Holy Spirit of prophecy to say things pregnant with meaning not patent to themselves but to us.

32.] From ver. 25, the Apostle has been employed in substantiating the Resurrection as the act of God announced by prophecy in old time: now the historical fact of its accomplishment is affirmed, and the vouchers for it produced.

The word rendered “whereof” may also mean of whom: and this latter is the more probable; see ch. i. 8. It includes the other rendering. ‘We are His witnesses,’ implies, ‘We testify to this His work,’ which work implied the

we all,—first, and most properly, the Twelve: but, secondarily, the whole body of believers, all of whom, at this time, had probably seen the Lord since His Resurrection; see 1 Cor. xv. 6.

33.] Peter now comes to the Ascension—the exaltation of Jesus to be, in the fullest sense, Lord and Christ.

being by the right hand of God exalted] Some would render, “being exalted to the right hand of God.” But plausible as this seems, it is inadmissible. The great end of this speech is to shew forth (see above) the GOD OF ISRAEL as the Doer of all these things.

the promise] Christ is said to have received from the Father the promise above cited from Joel, which is spoken of His days. This, and not of course the declarations made by Himself to the same effect, is here referred to, though doubtless those were in Peter’s mind. The very expression, shed forth, refers to “I will pour out” above, ver. 17 (in the original they are the same word).

this: i.e. ‘this influence,’ this merely; leaving to his hearers the inference that this, which they saw and heard, must be none other than the promised effusion of the Spirit.

which ye now see need not imply, as Dr. Burton thinks, that “there was some visible appearance, which the people saw as well as the apostles:”—very much of the effect of the descent of the Spirit would be visible,—the enthusiasm and gestures of the speakers, for instance; not, however, the tongues of flame,—for then none could have spoken as in ver. 13.

34.] This exaltation of Christ is also proved from prophecy—and from the same passage with which Jesus Himself had silenced His enemies. See notes, Matt. xxii. 41 ff. The connexion is, For David himself is not ascended into the heavens, —as he would be, if the former prophecy applied to him: BUT he himself says, removing all doubt on the subject, &c.

36.] THE CONCLUSION FROM ALL THAT HAS BEEN SAID. The Apostle says, let all the house of Israel know, because all hitherto said has gone upon proofs and sayings belonging to Israel, and to all Israel. In the words God hath made, we have as before, the ground-tone of the whole discourse.

Lord, from ver. 34.

Christ, in the full and glorious sense in which that term was prophetically known. The same is expressed in ch. v. 31 by “hath exalted [to be] a Prince and a Saviour.”—The final clause sets in the strongest and plainest light the fact to which the discourse testifies—ending with whom ye crucified,—the remembrance most likely to carry compunction to their hearts. “In the close of his discourse, he again reproaches them with His crucifixion, that they may be touched with the greater compunction of conscience, and may be eager to seek the remedy for their sin.” Calvin. Bengel calls this “the sting at the end” of the discourse.

37-41.] EFFECT OF THE DISCOURSE.

37.] The compunction arose from the thought that they had rejected and crucified Him who was now so powerful, and under whose feet they, as enemies, would be crushed.—“St. Luke gives us the fruit of the discourse, that we may know that the power of the Spirit was put forth, not only in the diversity of tongues, but also in the hearts of the hearers.” Calvin.

38. Repent] The word imports change of mind: here, change from thinking Jesus an impostor, and scorning Him as one crucified, to being baptized in His name, and looking to Him for remission of sins, and the gift of the Spirit.—The miserable absurdity of rendering this word by ‘do penance,’—so the Rheims (Roman-Catholic) Version,—or understanding it as referring to a course of external rites, is well exposed by this passage—in which the internal change of heart and purpose is insisted on, to be testified by admission into the number of Christ’s followers.

be baptized every one of you] Here, on the day of Pentecost, we have the first mention and administration of CHRISTIAN BAPTISM. Before, there had been the baptism of repentance for the remission of sins, by John, Luke iii. 3; but now we have the important addition, in (or, on) the name of Jesus Christ, —in the Name—i. e. on the confession of that which the Name implies, and into the benefits and blessings which the Name implies.—The Apostles and first believers were not thus baptized, because, ch. i. 5, they had received the BAPTISM BY THE HOLY GHOST, the thing signified, which superseded that by water, the outward and visible sign.—The result of the baptism to which he here exhorts them, preceded by repentance and accompanied by faith in the forgiveness of sins in Christ, would be, the receiving the gift of the Holy Spirit.

39.] your children, viz. as included in the prophecy cited ver. 17, your little ones: not, as in ch. xiii, 32, ‘your descendants,’ which would be understood by any Jew to be necessarily implied. Thus we have a providential recognition of Infant Baptism, at the very founding of the Christian Church.

to all that are afar off] i.e. to the Gentiles; see Eph. ii. 13. There is no difficulty whatever in this interpretation. The Apostles always expected the conversion of the Gentiles, as did every pious Jew who believed in the Scriptures. It was their conversion as Gentiles, which yet to be revealed to Peter. It is surprising to see Commentators finding a difficulty where all is so plain. The very expression, as many as the Lord our God shall call, shews in what sense Peter understood those afar off; not all, but as many as the Lord our God shall summon. to approach to Him, —bring near, —which, in his present understanding of the words, must import —by becoming one of the chosen people, and conforming to their legal observances.

40.] The words cited appear to be the concluding and inclusive summary of Peter’s many exhortations, not only their general sense: just as if ver. 36 had been given as the representative of his whole speech above.

The Apostle’s command is improperly rendered in A.V. ‘save yourselves’ it is strictly passive,—be saved,—‘let: us save you’—‘let God by us save you.’ In saying this crooked generation, St. Peter alludes to Deut. xxxii. 5.

41.] This first baptism of regeneration is important on many accounts in the history of the Christian Church. It presents us with two remarkable features: (1) It was conferred, on the profession of repentance, and faith in Jesus as the Christ. There was no instruction in doctrine as yet. The infancy of the Church in this respect corresponded to the infancy of the individual mind; the simplicity of faith came first,—the ripeness of knowledge followed. Neander well observes that, among such a multitude, admitted by a confession which allowed of so wide an interpretation, were probably many persons who brought into the church the seeds of that Judaizing form of Christianity which afterwards proved so hostile to the true faith; while others, more deeply touched by the Holy Spirit, followed humbly the unfolding of that teaching by which He perfected the apostolic age in the doctrine of Christ. (2) Almost without doubt, this first baptism must have been administered, as that of the first Gentile converts was (see ch. x. 47, and note), by affusion or sprinkling, not by immersion. The immersion of 3000 persons, in a city so sparingly furnished with water as Jerusalem, is equally inconceivable with a procession beyond the walls to the Kedron, or to Siloam, for that purpose.

42-47.] DESCRIPTION OF THE LIFE AND HABITS OF THE FIRST BELIEVERS, This description anticipates; embracing a period extending beyond the next chapter. ‘This is plain from ver. 43: for the miracle related in the next chapter was evidently the first which attracted any public attention: vv. 44, 45, again, are taken up anew at the end of chap. iv., where we have a very similar description, evidently applying to the same period.

and in community] The living together as one family, and having things in common. It is no objection to this meaning, that the fact is repeated below, in ver. 45; for so is the breaking of bread in ver. 46, and the continuing in prayers. The meaning given in the A.V., “in the Apostles’ fellowship,” is not objectionable in itself, but still I conceive bears no meaning defensible in construction. See further in my Greek Test.

breaking of bread] or, the breaking of the bread. This has been very variously explained. Chrysostom, “In mentioning bread here he seems to me to signify fasting, and ascetic life: for they partook, not of luxuries, but simply of subsistence” And similarly Bengel: “The breaking of bread, that is, a frugal diet, common among them all.” But on ver. 46 he recognizes a covert allusion to the Eucharist.—The interpretation of the breaking of bread here as the celebration of the Lord’s supper has been, both in ancient and modern times, the prevalent one. Chrysostom himself, in another place, interprets it, or at all events the whole phrase, of the Holy Communion. And the Romanist interpreters have gone so far as to ground an argument on the passage for the administration in one kind only. But,—referring for a fuller discussion of the whole matter to the notes on 1 Cor. x. xi,—barely to render [the] breaking of [the] bread to mean the breaking of bread in the Eucharist, as now understood, would be to violate historical truth. The Holy Communion was at first, and for some time, till abuses put an end to the practice, inseparably connected with the agapæ, or love-feasts, of the Christians, and unknown as a separate ordinance. To these agapæ, accompanied as they were at this time by the celebration of the Lord’s supper, the “breaking of [the] bread” refers,—from the custom of the master of the feast breaking bread in asking a blessing; see ch. xxvii. 35, where the Eucharist is out of the question.

in prayers] or, in the prayers:—the ap-pointed times of prayer: see ver. 46. But it need not altogether exclude prayer among themselves as well, provided we do not assume any set times or forms of Christian worship, which certainly did not exist as yet. See notes on Rom. xiv. 5; Gal. iv. 10.

43.] every soul, designating generally the multitude,—those who were not joined to the infant Church, This is evident by the words “all that believed,” when the church is again the subject, ver. 44. They were filled with fear, dread, reverential astonishment, at the effect produced by the outpouring of the Spirit. On the anticipatory character of the latter part of the verse, see general remarks at the beginning of this section.

44.] If it surprise us that so large a number should be continually assembled together (for such is certainly the sense of were together, not that they were joined by brotherly love, as Calvin)—we must remember that#large portion of the three thousand were persons who had come up to Jerusalem for the feast, and would by this time have returned to their homes.

and had all things (in) common] i.e. no individual property, but one common stock: see ch. iv. 32. That this was literally the case with the infant church at Jerusalem, is too plainly asserted in these passages to admit of a doubt. Some have supposed the expressions to indicate merely a partial community of goods: contrary to the express assertion of ch. iv. 32. In order, however, rightly to understand this community, we may remark:

(1) it is only Sound in the church at Jerusalem. No trace of its existence is discoverable any where else: on the contrary, St. Paul speaks constantly of the rich and the poor, see 1 Tim. vi. 17; Gal. ii. 10; 2 Cor. viii. 13, 15; ix. 6, 7; 1 Cor. xvi. 2: also St. James, ii, 1–5; iv. 18.—And from the practice having at first prevailed at Jerusalem, we may partly perhaps explain the great and constant poverty of that church, Rom. xv. 25, 26; 1 Cor 1–3; 2 Cor. viii. also ch. xi. 30; xxiv. 17.—The non-establishment of this community elsewhere may have arisen from the inconveniences which were found to attend it in Jerusalem: see ch. vi, 1.

(2) This community of goods was not, even in Jerusalem, enforced by rule, evident from ch. v. 4 (xii. 12), but, originating in free-will, became perhaps an understood custom, still however in the power of any individual not to comply with,

(3) It was not (as Grotius thought) borrowed from the sect of the Essenes, with whom the Apostles, who certainly must have sanctioned this community, do not appear historically to have had any connexion.

But (4) it is much more probable that it arose from a continuation, and application to the now increased number of disciples, of the community in which our Lord and His Apostles had lived (see John xii, 6; xiii. 29) before.—The practice probably did not long continue even at Jerusalem; see Rom. xv. 26, note.

45.] possessions probably mean landed property, ch. v. 1—goods, any other possession; moveables, as distinguished from land.

parted them, i.e. their price; see a similar way of speaking, Matt. xxvi. 9.

46. continuing daily with one accord in the temple] See Luke xxiv. 53. The words need ‘not mean, though they may mean, that they were assembled in Solomon's porch, as in ch. v. 12—but most probably, that they regularly kept the hours of prayer, ch. iii, 1.

at home] i.e. privately, as contrasted with their public frequenting of the temple: not, ‘from house to house,’ as A V.:—the words may bear that meaning (seo Luke viii. 1), but no have no trace of such a practice, or holding the agapæ, or love-feasts, successively at different houses,—The breaking of bread took place at their house of meeting, wherever that was: cf. ch. xii, 12.

did eat their meat] i.e. they partook of food: viz. in these agapæ, or breakings of bread.

singleness of heart] The word rendered singleness originally implies freedom from stones or rocks, and thus simplicity, evenness, purity.

more that were in the way of salvation: compare the Apostle's command, ver. 40;—those who were being saved. Nothing is implied by this word, to answer one way or the other the question, whether all these were finally saved. It is only asserted, that they were in the way of salvation when they were added to the Christian assembly. Doubtless, some of them might have been of the class alluded to Heb. x. 26–29: at least there is nothing in this word to preclude it.

CHAP. III. 1–10.] HEALING OF A LAME MAN BY PETER AT THE GATE OF THE TEMPLE.

1. the ninth hour] See ch. x. 3, 30. There were three hours of prayer; those of the morning and evening sacrifice, i.e. the third and ninth hours, and noon.

2.] The word is literally, was being carried. They took him at the hours of prayer, and carried him back between times.

the gate... which is called Beautiful] The arrangement of the gates of the Temple is, from the notices which we now possess, very uncertain. Three entrances have been fixed on for the “Beautiful Gate.”

(1) The gate thus described by Josephus: “Nine of the gates were covered with gold and silver, as were also the posts and lintels. But one gate, that outside the temple itself, was of Corinthian brass, and far surpassed the silver and gilt gates in splendour.” This gate was also called Nicanor's gate, and lay on the Eastern side of the Temple, towards the valley of Kedron. Josephus mentions it again, as “the Eastern gate of the inner enclosure, which is of brass,” and gives a remarkable account of its size and weight: adding, that when, before the siege, it was discovered supernaturally opened in the night, “this to unskilled persons seemed a most favourable omen: for they said, that God had opened to them the gate of prosperity.” But some find a difficulty in this. The lame man, they say, would not he likely to have been admitted so far into the Temple (but it appears that lepers used to stand at Nicanor's gate): and besides, he would have taken up his station naturally at an outer gate, where he might ask alms of all who entered. These conditions suit better

(2) the gate Susan; as does also the circumstance mentioned ver. 11, that the people ran together to Solomon's porch; for this gate was op the east side of the court of the Gentiles, and close to Solomon's porch. Another suitable circumstance was, that by this gate the market was held for sheep and cattle and other offerings, and therefore a greater crowd would be attracted.

(3) Others again refer the epithet “Beautiful” to two gates opening towards the city on the western side. So that the matter must remain in uncertainty.

4. Look on us] Calvin's note is important: “Peter would not have thus spoken without being certain of the design of God; and his words command the man to look for some singular and unusual benefit. Yet we may enquire, whether the Apostles had the power of working miracles when it pleased them. I answer, that their ministration of divine influence: did not empower them to attempt any thing of their own will or motive, but the Lord wrought by them when He saw it expedient. Hence it arose, that they healed one, not all without distinction. So that in this, as in other things, they had God's Spirit for their guide and direction. Therefore, Before Peter orders the lame man to rise, he cast and fixed his eyes on hin. That look was not without the express prompting of God's Spirit, And hence it was that he spoke with such certainty of the waning miracle, The Apostle suramoned the lame man by this command to receive the gift of God: be for his part looked for nothing but an alms.”

6.] “There is no doubt, that it was the custom to give alms even to those who were not of the community of the faithful, but

Peter then either had nothing about hisn, going as he was to the temple, or he could not bestow enough to help the poor man's need. Notice the Apostles moderation in his discharge of so important a stewardship: compare ch. ii. 45 iv. 35." Bengel. But perhaps it is more simple to conclude that Peter spoke here of his own station and means in life—'I am no rich man, nor have I silver or gold to give thee,'

7.] "Thus also did Christ: He often cured by a word, often by an act; often also He put forth His hand, when the objects were weak in faith,—that the healing might not seem to take place of itself." Chrysostom.

he took him by the right hand... his feet and ankle-bones received strength] Luke, the physician, had made himself acquainted with the peculiar kind of weakness, and described it accordingly.

8.] leaping up describes his first joyous liberation from his weakness: as soon as he felt himself strengthened, he leapt up, for joy. No suppositions need be made, such as that perhaps he was trying the experiment (Chrysostom): or that it was from ignorance how to walk (Bloomfield). His joy is quite sufficient to explain the gesture, and it is better to leave the narrative in its simplicity.

11-26.] THE DISCOURSE OF PETER THEREUPON.

11.] The lame man was holding Peter and John, physically: not spoken of mental adhesion, but of actual holding by the hand or arm, that he might not be separated from them in the crowd, but might testify to all, who his benefactors were.

the porch that is called Solomon's] See John x. 23, note.

12.] answered, viz. to their expressions of astonishment implied in the following verse. See a similar usage of "answered," Matt. xi. 25; ch. v. 8. This second discourse of St. Peter may be thus divided: This is no work of ours, but of God for the glorifying of Jesus, vv. 12, 13:—whom ye denied and killed, but God hath raised up, vv. 13–15:—through whose name this man is made whole, ver. 16:—y e did it in ignorance, but God thereby fulfilled His counsel, vv. 17, 18. Exhortation to repent, that ye may be forgiven, and saved by this Jesus Christ at His coming, vv. 19–21: whose times have been the subject of prophecy from the first, ver. 21. Citations to prove this, vv. 22–24: its immediate application to the hearers, as Jews, vv. 25, 26. There the discourse seems to be broken off, as ch. iv. 1 relates.

why marvel ye] Their error was not the wonder itself,—though even that would shew ignorance and weakness of faith, for it was truly no wonderful thing that had happened, viewed by a believer in Jesus,—but their wondering at the Apostles, as if they had done it by their own power. "Thus we see," says Calvin, "that our wonder is wrong, when it stops at human agency."

power,—such as magical craft, or any other supposed means of working miracles: godliness, meritorious efficacy with God, so as to have obtained this from Him on our own account. 'The distinction is important:—'holiness', of the A.V., is not expressive of the word, which bears in it the idea of operative cultive piety, rather than of inherent character.

13. The God of Abraham, &c.] "An appellation more frequent in the Acts than in the other books of the New Testament, and suitable to that period of time." Bengel. "See," says Chrysostom, "how he is always connecting God with their ancestors, that he may not seem to be introducing any new doctrine. Before (ch. ii.) he brought in the patriarch David, and now he introduces Abraham."

glorified] Not, as A.V., 'hath glorified,' implying, by thus honouring His name: it is the historic past tense, glorified, viz. by His exaltation through death—see John xii. 23; xvii. 10.

Not 'His Son', but His Servant: servant, however, in that distinct and Messianic sense which the same expression bears in Isa. xl.–lxvi. The above meaning is adopted by all the best modern Commentators.

in the presence of Pilate, or, perhaps, to the face of Pilate. when he was determined to let him go: see Luke xxiii. 20; John xix. 4, 12.

14. the Holy One and the Just] Not only in the higher and divine sense present to St. Peter's mind, but also by Pilate's own verdict, and the testimony of the Jews' consciences. 'The sentence is full of antitheses: the "Holy One and the Just" contrasts with the moral impurity of "a murderer,"—"the Prince of life," with the destruction of life implied in "murderer,"—while "ye killed" again stands in remarkable opposition to "the Prince of life?" This last title given to our Lord implies, as the Vulgate renders it, "the Author of life."—It is possible, that the words "Prince of life" may contain an allusion to the great miracle which was the immediate cause of the enmity of their rulers to Jesus. But of course St. Peter had a higher view in the title than merely this.

16.] The A.V. is right; through, or better, on account of, faith in his name. ‘The meaning, for the sake of (i. e. of awakening in you, and in the lame man himself) faith in his name, though grammatically justified, seems against the connexion with the Apostle’s profession, “whereof we are witnesses,” just before. It is evident to my mind, that the faith in His name, here spoken of, is the faith of these witnesses themselves. His name (the efficient cause), by means of, or on account of (our) faith in his name (the medium), &c.

yea, the faith which is [wrought] by him—not ‘faith in Him;’ which is an inadmissible rendering. Peter’s own words (1 Pet. i. 21) are remarkably parallel with, and the best interpreters of, this expression: “who by Him do believe in God that raised Him up from the dead and gave Him glory, so that your faith and hope are in God.” Some of the Commentators are anxious to bring in the faith of the lame man himself in this verse. Certainly it is according to analogy to suppose that he had such faith, from and after the words of Peter:—but, as certainly, there is no allusion to it in this verse, and the thread of Peter’s discourse would be broken by any such, It is the firm belief in His name on the part of us His witnesses, of which he is here speaking, as the medium whereby His name (the Power of the great dignity to which He has been exalted, the authorship of life) had in this case worked.

17.] now, introducing a new consideration: see 2 Thess. ii. 6. Here it softens the severer charge of ver. 14: sometimes it intensifies, as ch. xxii. 16; 1 John ii. 28:—especially with “behold,” ch. xiii. 11; xx. 22. No meaning such as ‘now that the real Messiahship of Him whom ye have slain is come to light’ (Meyer) is admissible.

through ignorance] There need be no difficulty in the application of the term “ignorance” to even the rulers of the Jews. It admits of all degrees—from the unlearned, who were implicitly led by others, and hated Him because others did,—up to the most learned of the scribes, who knew and rightly interpreted the Messianic prophecies, but from moral blindness, or perverted expectations, did not recognize them in our Lord. Even Caiaphas himself, of whom apparently this could least be said, may be brought under it in some measure: even he could hardly have delivered over Jesus to Pilate with the full consciousness that He was the Messiah, and that he himself was accomplishing prophecy by so doing. Some degree of ignorance there must have been in them all.

18. of all the prophets] See Luke xxiv. 27 and note. There is no hyperbole, nor adaptation to Jewish views. The assertion of the Rabbinical books, “All the prophets together prophesied not but of the days of the Messiah,” was not merely a Jewish view, but the real truth.—The prophets are here regarded as one body, actuated by one Spirit: and the sum of God’s purpose, shewn by their testimony, is, that HIS CHRIST should suffer.

19. that your sins may be blotted out] The faith implied in the command, “Be converted,” has for its aim, is necessarily (by God’s covenant, see John iii. 15, 18) accompanied by, the wiping out of sin.

that the times of refreshing may come] This passage has been variously rendered and explained. To deal first with the rendering,—that of the A.V.,—“when the times... shall come,”—is entirely unjustifiable, and alien from the meaning of the words. They can have but one sense,—that given in the marginal reading. This being so, what are the times (for such is the right reading, and not “times” only) of refreshment? What is refreshment? Clearly, from the above rendering, some refreshment, future, and which their conversion was to bring about. But hardly, from what has been said, refreshment in their own hearts, arising from their conversion: besides other objections, the following words, may come from the presence of the Lord, are not likely to have been used in that case. No other meaning, it seems to me, will suit the words, but that of the times of refreshment, the great season of joy and rest, which it was understood the coming of the Messiah in His glory was to bring with it. That this should be connected by the Apostle with the conversion of the Jewish people, was not only according to the plain inference from prophecy, but doubtless was one of those things concerning the kingdom of God, which he had been taught by his risen Master. The same connexion holds even now. If it be objected to this, that thus we have the conversion of the Jews regarded as bringing about the great times of refreshment, and those times consequently as delayed by their non-conversion, I answer, that, however true this may be in fact, the other is fully borne out by the manner of speaking in Scripture: the same objection might lie against the efficacy of prayer, See Gen. xix. 22; xxxii. 26; Mark vi. 5; 2 Thess. ii. 3; 2 Pet. iii. 12.

from the presence of the Lord (the Father), who has reserved these seasons in His own power. When they arrive, it is by His decree, which goes forth from His presence. Compare the expression “there went out a decree from Cesar Augustus,” in Luke ii. 1.

20.] and that he may send (see above), literally,—not figuratively, by the Spirit:—even if the word send be nowhere else applied to the second coming of the Lord, there is no reason why it should not be here: the whole ground and standing-point of these two orations of Peter are peculiar, and the very mention of the ‘times of refreshment’ proceeding forth from the presence of the Father would naturally lead to the position here assigned to the Son, as one sent by the Father. See below, on

unto you,—as your Messiah.

21. whom the heaven must receive] The words thus translated admit of a double rendering: (1) ‘Whom the heaven must receive.’ (2) ‘Who must possess the heaven’ Of these the former is in my view decidedly preferable, both as best suiting the sense, and as being the natural rendering, whereas the other is forced. The reason given by Bengel for rejecting the right rendering, “To be received, i.e. contained, shut into, the heaven, is a violent interpretation, and seems to imply, that the heaven is greater than Christ, and to detract from His exaltation above all heavens,” is best answered by himself, “Yet there is a sense, in which it may be said that the heaven receives Christ, viz. that it admits Him, as a throne its proper King;” only I would rather understand it locally, and recognize a parallel expression with that in ch. i., also local, “a cloud received Him out of their sight.” And so far from seeing in it any derogation from the Majesty of Christ, it seems to me admirably to set it forth: it behoves the heaven (which is his, obeying his will) to receive Him till the time appointed.

until] Not during, as the advocates of the present spiritual sense of the passage wish to render it, but until; see below. The key both to the construction and meaning here, is our Lord’s saying, Matt. xvii. 11, “Elias truly first cometh, and shall restore all things.” From this we see that the restoration of all things stands alone: and that which does not belong to “all things.” Next, what is this restoration? According to the usage of the word, it cannot be applied to the works of the Spirit in the hearts of men, but must be understood of the glorious restoration of all things, the regeneration (Matt. xix. 28), which, as Peter here says, is the theme of all the prophets from the beginning.—No objection can be raised to this from the meaning of the word times: see ch. vii. 17, and St. Peter’s own language, 1 Pet. i. 20, “in the last times.”—On the testimony of the prophets, see ver. 18 note.

22.] This citation is a free but faithful paraphrase of the text in Deuteronomy.—That the words, as spoken by Moses, seem to point to the whole line of prophets sent by God, is not any objection to their being applied to Christ, but rather necessitates, and entirely harmonizes with, that application. See the parable Matt. xxi. 33–41, And none of the whole prophetic body entirely answered to the words like unto me, but Christ. The Jews therefore rightly understood it (though not always consistent in this, comp. John i. 21 with vi. 14) of the Messiah.

24.] See ver. 18, note.—St. Peter’s aim is to shew the unanimity of all the prophets in speaking of these times.—Samuel is named, more as being the first great prophet after Moses, than as bearing any part in this testimony. The prophetic period of which David was the chief prophet, began in Samuel.

these days] i.e. these days now present, not the times of restoration, as some understand: which would require “those days.” ‘These days’ are, in fact, connected with the times of restoration, as belonging to the same dispensation and leading on to them; and thus the Apostle identifies the then time with this preparation for and expectation of those glories: but to make “these days” identical with the times of refreshing and the times of restitution, is to make him contradict himself.

25.] He applies this to them as being inheritors of the promises. They were descendants, according to the flesh, and fellow-partakers, according to the spirit.—For a full comment on this promise made to Abraham, see Gal. iii. 16.

26.] first: implying the offer to the Gentiles (but as yet, in Peter’s mind, only by embracing Judaism) afterwards: see ch. xiii. 46; Rom. i. 16.—It is strange how Olshausen can suppose that the Spirit in Peter overleapt the bounds of his subsequent prejudice with regard to the admission of the Gentiles:—he never had any such prejudice, but only against their admission uncircumcised, and as Gentiles.

Again, not His Son, but His Servant: see note, ver. 13.

sent him, indefinite, of the sending in the flesh; it does not apply to the present time, but to God’s procedure in raising up His Servant Jesus, and His mission and ministry: and is distinct from the sending spoken of in ver. 20. This is also shewn by the present participle, blessing you, ingeniously, but not quite accurately rendered in the A.V. ‘to bless you’ He came blessing you (His coming was an act of blessing)—in (as the conditional element of the blessing)—turning every one from your iniquities: thus conferring on yon the best of blessings. The word blessing is chosen in allusion to the terms of the prophecy, ver. 25. The application to the present time is made by inference:—‘as that was His object then, so now:’—but the discourse is unfinished.—It did not come to a final conclusion as in ch. ii. 36, because it was interrupted by the apprehension of the Apostles.

CHAP. IV. 1–4.] APPREHENSION AND IMPRISONMENT OF THE TWO APOSTLES.

1.] the priests, i.e. the officiating priests, as soon as they were released from their duties.—The captain of the temple was the chief officer of the Levitical guard of the temple. In 2 Macc. iii. 4, we hear of the governor of the temple, who appears to have been the same officer.

the Sadducees] see note on Matt. iii. 7. Perhaps they on this occasion had moved the guard and the priests to notice the matter: for the statement in the next verse of the offence given by preaching the resurrection, seems only to refer to them. Compare also ch. v. 17.

2.] in Jesus,—not, as A.V., ‘through Jesus, but in the person (or example) of Jesus, alleging Him as an example of that which the Sadducees denied: preaching by implication, inasmuch as one resurrection would imply that of all, the resurrection of the dead. We have a similar use of “in,” 1 Cor. iv. 6, where “in us” means, in the case of myself and Apollos. ‘The resurrection through Jesus’ does not appear on the present occasion to have formed part of their preaching.

3.] it was now eventide, perhaps, from their adjourning the case till the next day, the second evening, beginning with the twelfth hour: see Matt. xiv. 15, and note.

4. the number of the men] The Greek word for “men” here is that which signifies males as distinguished from females. But it does not appear whether we are to take this strictly as masculine, or more loosely, as if it were the more general term. Meyer thinks the former: Olshausen, that as yet only men attached themselves to the church (but see ch. i. 14): De Wette objects to the stricter that St. Luke does not so reckon, ch. ii. 4 (see however Luke ix. 14, and cf. the parallel place in Matthew): but leaves it undecided. The laxer use of this stricter term occurs Luke xi. 31, and James i. 20. In ch. v. 14, men and women both are mentioned as being added to the Lord.

5–12.] THE APOSTLES EXAMINED BEFORE THE SANHEDRIM. PETER’ S SPEECH.

5. their rulers, &c.] i.e. the rulers &c. of the Jews; a construction frequently used where there can be little chance of mistaking to whom or what the pronoun refers.

The rulers, elders, and scribes together make up the Sanhedrim, or great council: see Matt. ii. 4; xxvi. 59; ch. v. 21.

6. at Jerusalem] Why is this specified? I believe it merely implies that the meeting was not held in the temple, but in the city.

On Annas and Caiaphas, both called high priests, Luke iii. 2,—see note there.

7.] By (literally, in) what (manner of) power? of what kind was the enabling cause, the element in which, as its condition, the deed was wrought?—by (in, see above) what (manner of) name, spoken as a word of power: see ch. iii. 6, 16.

this,—not the teaching (as some think),—nor both the miracle and the teaching (as others), but the miracle: and that only.

8.] filled with the Holy Ghost, i.e. specially, for the occasion.

10.] whom ye crucified, whom God raised... the copula (and, or but) is omitted, to make the contrast more striking.

11.] See Matt. xxi. 42, note.

13–18.] CONSULTATION AND SENTENCE OF THE SANHEDRIM.

13.] having previously known, i.e. they did not then perceive it for the first time; this is stated as the reason for their wonder: not as the A.V.

they recognized them; their astonishment setting them to think, and reminding them that they had seen these men with Jesus: —that they (once) were with Jesus.

18.] in (literally, upon) the name of Jesus; i.e. so as to make that Name the subject (basis) of their discoursing.

19–22.] THE APOSTLES’ ANSWER AND DISMISSAL.

21.] when they had further threatened them;—i. e. with threats super-added to the inhibition of ver. 18.

finding no means] The difficulty with the Sanhedrim was, to find any means of punishing them which should not stir up the people.

22.] The circumstance of his being more than forty years old both gave notoriety to his person as having long resorted there, and made the miracle more notable, his malady being more confirmed.

23–31.] PRAYER OF THE CHURCH THEREUPON.

23.] their own company, i.e. the other Apostles, and possibly some others assembled with them. There is nothing in ver. 31 to mark that only the Apostles were present on this occasion.

24. they lifted up their voice to God with one accord] i.e. not, as Meyer supposes, literally all speaking together in a known formula of prayer, but led by some one, and all assenting; not “their voices,” but their voice: see note on ch. ii. 6.

thou art God, which hast made] It is an acknowledgment that it was the same God, who was now doing these things, that had beforetime prophesied them of Christ.

27.] The for implies an acknowledgment of the truth of God in the fulfilment of the prophecy: Thou art the God who hast, &c., for these events have happened accordingly.

The clause, in this city, which has been excluded from the text on account of its apparent redundancy, answers to the clause “on his holy hill of Zion,” Ps. ii. 6. See also Matt xxiii. 37; Luke xiii. 33. The parts of this verse correspond accurately to those of the prophecy just quoted.

The appellation here given to our Lord is not “child,” but Servant, as before, ch. iii. 26. Jesus, the Servant of Jehovah, is the antitype and completion of David, and of all other servants of the Lord: what is said of them only partially and hyperbolically, is said literally and entirely of Him.

28.] There is an ellipsis in the thought between the verb to do, and its object whatsoever, &c.: “to do [as they thought, their own counsel; but really] whatsoever Thy hand and Thy counsel determined.” thy hand and thy counsel] thy hand indicates the Power, thy counsel the Wisdom of God. The Wisdom decreed, the Hand performed.

31.] As the first outpouring of the Spirit, so this special one in answer to prayer, was testified by an outward and visible sign: but not by the same sign,—for that, first baptism by the Holy Ghost, the great fulfilment of the promise, was not to be repeated. It was on every ground probable that the token of the especial presence of God would be some phenomenon which would be recognized as such by those present. The idea was not derived from profane sources, as some would have us believe, but from the Scriptures: see Ps xxix. 8; Isa. ii. 19, 21; xiii. 13; Ezek. xxxviii. 19 (especially); Joel iii. 16; Hagg. ii. 6. 7.

32–37.] THE STATE OF THE CHURCH AT THIS TIME. This passage forms the conclusion of this division of the history, and the transition to ch. v.

32.] “Where faith reigns, it conciliates men’s minds so that all will the same thing. For hence comes discord, because we are not ruled by this divine spirit of Christ.” Calvin. On the community of goods, see note at ch. ii. 45. We have the view there taken strikingly confirmed here by the expressions used No one called (reckoned) any thing of his goods (which were still “his goods,” not alienated) [to be] his own, No one called his possessions his own: this shews, says Bengel, that he had not altogether in reality renounced the possession of them.

33.] The Apostles were the specially appointed witnesses of the Resurrection, ch. i. 22: and this their testimony they gave with power, i.e. with a special gift of the Holy Spirit to enforce and illustrate, to persuade and dispute on, those facts of which their own experience (see ver. 20) informed them. That the Spirit did not inspire them with unbroken uniformity in matters of fact, our present Gospels, the remnants to us of this very testimony, sufficiently witness. Nor was this necessary: each man reported what he had heard and seen;—and it was in the manner of delivering this report that the great power of the Spirit was shewn. See, on the whole subject, Introduction, ch. i. §iii. 5 ff.

great grace, i.e. from God: this is better than to understand it “great favour,” i.e. from the people, which would hardly be so absolutely designated.

34.] For gives a proof of God's grace working in them, in that they imparted their goods to the poor: see especially 2 Cor. viii. 7.

the things that were sold] Literally, the things which were being sold:—the process of selling, as regarded the whole church, yet going on, though completed in individual cases.

35. at the apostles' feet] This expression is to be literally taken. The Apostles probably sat upon a raised seat, on the step of which, at their feet, the money was laid, in token of reverence.

36.] Barnabas, in Hebrew “the son of prophecy,”—and the interpretation has been generally made good by taking the word rendered by the A.V. “consolation,” in the sense of exhortation: see ch. xi. 23.

a Levite] The Levites might possess land at all times within the precincts of the Levitical cities: such was the case, for example, in Jer. xxxii. 7. At the division of the kingdoms, the priests and Levites all resorted to Rehoboam in Judah (and Benjamin), 2 Chron. xi. 13; from that time probably, but certainly after the captivity, when the Mosaic division of the land was no longer accurately observed. The possession of land by Levites seems to have been allowed. The whole subject is involved in some uncertainty: compare Levit. xxv. 32 ff.; Num. xxxv. 1–8; Dent. xii. 12; xviii. 8, al.

of the country of Cyprus] For the state of C at this time, see notes on ch. xi. 19; 4–7,

Acts: Chapter 5

CHAP. V. 1–11.] THE HISTORY OF ANANIAS AND SAPPHIRA. This incident, though naturally connected with the end of the last chapter, forms an important independent narrative.

1.] Ananias signifies in Hebrew,—The cloud of God, or The mercy of God.

Sapphira is probably a Greek name for the precious stone sapphire.—The crime of these two is well described by Meyer: ‘By the sale of their field, and the bringing in of the money, they in fact professed to give the whole price as a gift of brotherly love to the common stock: but their aim was to get for themselves the credit of holy love and zeal by one portion of the price, whereas they had selfishly kept back the other portion for themselves. They wished to serve two masters, but to appear to serve only One.’

3.] The question implies the power of resistance to Satan, and is equivalent to, Why hast thou allowed Satan to fill, &c.?

4.] Whiles it remained, did it not remain (so literally) thine own? i.e. was it not in thine absolute power? and when sold, was it not (i. e. the price of it) in thine own power, to do with it what seemed good to thee?

why hast thou conceived this thing in thine heart? literally, put this thing in thine heart, Dan. i. 8; Mal. ii. 2. Satan suggested the lie, which Ananias ought to have repelled; instead of that, he put it in his heart,—placed it there where the springs of action are, and it passed out into an act.

thou hast not lied unto men, but unto God] This mode of expression, not... but... is not always an absolute and exclusive negation and assertion, see Mark ix. 37; John xii. 44. But here it seems to be so, and to imply, ‘Thine attempt to deceive was not to deceive us, men; but to deceive the Holy Ghost,—God, abiding in His church, and in us its appointed superintendents.’ This verse is of weighty doctrinal import, as proving the Deity of the Holy Spirit; unless it be held, that the Holy Spirit whom (ver. 3) Ananias attempted to deceive, and God to whom he lied, are different. Bengel says, “This is the meaning: Ananias lied to God and His Spirit, not to men and Peter. Dare if thou canst, O Socinian, to say, he lied not to the Holy Ghost and to Peter, but to God.”

5.] The deaths of Ananias and Sapphira were beyond question supernaturally inflicted by Peter, speaking in the power of the Holy Spirit. This is the only honest interpretation of the incident. Many, however, and among them even Neander, attempt to account for them on natural grounds,—from their horror at detection, and at the solemn words of Peter. But, in addition to all other objections against this (see on ver. 9.),—it would make man and wife of the same temperament, which would be very unlikely. We surely need not require any justification for this judicial sentence of the Apostle, filling as he did at this time the highest place in the church, and acting under the immediate prompting of the Holy Spirit. If such, however, be sought, we may remember that this was the first attempt made by Satan to obtain by hypocrisy, a footing among Christ's flock: and that however, for wise reasons, this may since then have been permitted, it was absolutely necessary in the infancy of the church, and great fear came...] "They that heard these things" can hardly be those present, who not only heard, but saw: the remark is anticipatory, and is in fact equivalent to that in ver 11.

6.] Were these young men a class in the congregation accustomed to perform such services,—or merely the younger men, from whom they would naturally be expected? Some maintain the former: some the latter. We can hardly assume, as yet, any such official distinctions in the congregation as would mark off younger men from the elders, which latter are first officially mentioned ch. xi. 30. Besides which, we have no such ecclesiastical class as these younger men. And the use of a different word in the original, "the youths," in ver. 10, as applying to these same persons, seems to decide that, they were merely the younger members of the church, acting perhaps in accordance with Jewish custom,—perhaps also on some hint given by Peter.

wound him up] So Ezek. xxix. 5; Tobit xii. 13; Eccl. xxxviii. 16, wrapped the body up,—probably in their own mantles, taken off in preparing to carry him out. The context will not permit any more careful enfolding of the body to be understood.—The speedy burial of the dead, practised among the later Jews, was unknown in earlier times, see Gen. xxiii. It was grounded on Num. xix. 11 ff. The practice was to bury before sunset of the same day. The immediate burial in this case adds to the probability that the young men obeyed an intimation from the Apostle.

8.] answered unto her, perhaps to her salutation: but more probably to that which he knew to be her intent in entering in before him.

so much, naming the sum: or perhaps pointing to the money lying at his feet.

9.] To try the omniscience of the Spirit then visibly dwelling in the Apostles and the church, was, in the highest sense, to tempt the Spirit of God. It was a saying in their hearts 'There is no Holy Spirit:' and certainly approached very closely to a sin against the Holy Ghost. Peter characterizes the sin more solemnly this second time, because by the wife's answer it was now proved to be no individual lie of a bad and covetous man, but a preconcerted scheme to deceive God.

the feet of them...] Not that Peter heard the tread of the young men outside (they were probably barefooted), but it is an expression common in the poetical or lively description of the Hebrews, and indeed of all nations (see Isa. iii. 7; Nah. i. 15; Rom. x. 15); making the member whereby the person acts, the actor. I take the words to mean, that the time was just at hand for their return: see James v. 9. The space of three hours was not too long: they would have to carry the corpse to the burying-ground at a considerable distance from the city, and when there, to dig a grave, and bury it.

shall carry thee out] This word, spoken before her death, decisively proves that death to have been not a result merely of her detection, but a judicial infliction.

10.] when they came in: not implying that they immediately entered, but leaving room for some interval of time: see above.

12–16.] PROGRESS OF THE FAITH; MIRACULOUS POWER, AND DIGNITY, OF THE APOSTLES.

12.] they were all, i.e. the Apostles only, not all the Christians. It does not follow from the word all referring to all the believers in ch. ii. 1 (see note there), that it necessarily refers to the same here also. The Apostles are the subject of the paragraph: and it is to set forth their unanimity and dignity that the description is given. They are represented as distinct from all others, believers and unbelievers (both which I take to be included under the term "the rest") : and the Jewish people itself magnified them. The further connexion see on ver. 14.

Solomon's porch] See ch. iii. 11; John x. 23, note.

13.] the rest: i.e. all else, whether believers or not: none dared to join himself to, as being one of, or equal to, them: but (so far was this from being the ease that) the very multitude magnified them.

14.] And (these clauses are not parenthetical, but continue the description of the dignity of the Apostles) the result of this was, that believers were the more added to the Lord, multitudes of men and women.

15.] This verse now takes up afresh the main subject of vv. 12 and 13, the glorification of the apostolic office, insomuch that... It is connected not only with the multitude magnifying them, but also with ver. 12.

the shadow of Peter] As the greatest, in pre-eminence and spiritual energizing, of the Apostles. Now especially was fulfilled to him the promise of Matt. xvi. 18 (see note there):—and even the shadow of the Rock (Isa. xxxii. 2, Heb., and E.V., spoken primarily of His divine Master) was sought for. We need find no stumbling-block in the fact of Peter's shadow having been believed to be the medium (or, as is surely implied, having been the medium) of working miracles. Cannot the 'Creator Spirit' work with any instruments, or with none, as pleases Him? And what is a hand or a voice, more than a shadow, except that the analogy of the ordinary instrument is a greater help to faith in the recipient? Where faith, as apparently here, did not need this help, the less likely medium was adopted.—See, on the whole, ch. xix. 12, and note: and remark that only in the case of our Lord (Luke viii. 46 and parallel places) and His two great Apostles in the New Test.,—and of Elisha in the Old Test., have we instances of this healing virtue in the mere contact with or accessories of the person. But what a fertile harvest of superstition and imposture has been made to spring out of these scanty examples!

16.] Observe, that the sense is, that 'the multitude, &c., was coming together to Jerusalem, bringing, &c.,—and all such were healed:' viz. when the next incident, which forms a contrast to this waxing prosperity of the Church, happened.

17–42.] IMPRISONMENT, MIRACULOUS LIBERATION, EXAMINATION BEFORE THE SANHEDRIM, AND SCOURGING OF THE APOSTLES.

17. the high priest] Annas,—ch. iv. 6, and note on Luke iii. 2.

rose up is not redundant, but implies being excited by the popularity of the Apostles, and on that account commencing a course of action hostile to them. "He thought he ought to be quiet no longer." Bengel. 'He was roused to action by what had been done.' Chrysostom. To suppose that the High Priest 'rose up' after a council held is far-fetched, and against the following words, which point to the kindling zeal of men first stirred up to action.

they that were with him: (see ch. iv. 13; xix. 38; xxii. 9.)—Not the members of the Sanhedrim: but the friends and kindred (ch. iv. 6) of the High Priest: see ver. 21.

which is the sect of the Sadducees] which is implies more than who were:—the movement extended through the whole sect. On the sect of the Sadducees, see Matt. iii. 7, note. Josephus also shews that the family of Annas, if not he himself, were connected with the sect of the Sadducees. They (see ch. iv. 1, note) were the chief enemies of the Apostles, for teaching the resurrection.

20.] all the words of this life, an unusual expression, seems to refer to the peculiar nature of the enmity shewn towards them by the Sadducees, for preaching the resurrection unto life: as if it were said, "all the words of this LIFE," which they call in question. Or perhaps the expression may import, that the religion of Jesus had its issue in life. A similar expression, "the word of this salvation," occurs ch. xiii. 26. See also Rom. vii. 24. The deliverance, here granted to all the Apostles, was again vouchsafed to Peter in ch. xii., and is there related more in detail. It is there a minute touch of truth, that he should mistake for a dream (ver. 9) what he saw: having lain so long in prison, and his mind naturally dwelling on this his former miraculous liberation.

The high priest came to the ordinary session-chamber in the Temple, on the south side of it, and therefore if the Apostles were teaching in Solomon's porch (ver. 12), not in their immediate vicinity. Perhaps the words, which imply that the summons was not issued till after the arrival of the High Priest and his friends, may point to a meeting of the Sanhedrim hurriedly and insufficiently called, for the purpose of 'packing' it against the Apostles. If so, they did not succeed, see ver. 40: perhaps on account of the arrival of some who had been listeners to the Apostles' preaching.

all the senate] Probably the elders, including perhaps some who were not members of the Sanhedrim: the well-known foes of Jesus and his doctrine. The expression, the senate of the children of Israel, common in the LXX, is perhaps translated from the form of words in which they were summoned.

24.] the priest, if genuine (and the varieties of reading seem to have arisen from the difficulty it has occasioned), must designate the High Priest; not that the word itself can bear the meaning (compare 1 Macc. xv. 1 and 2), but that the context points out the priest thus designated to be the High Priest. On the captain of the temple, see note ch. iv. 1. He appears to have been summoned to meet the Sanhedrim, perhaps as the offence had taken place within his jurisdiction. But he was probably one of the chief priests. 'These latter were the titular High Priests, partly those who had served the office, partly the presidents of the twenty-four courses, partly the kindred of the High Priest (see Matt. ii. 4).

concerning them] i.e. 'concerning the Apostles', the persons mentioned in ver. 22; not 'these words,' as would appear at first

whereunto this would grow, i.e. to what this would come, is the correct translation of the original: not, as some have maintained, ‘how this had come about.’ nor, ‘what was the meaning of this.’

26.] The clause, lest they should have been stoned, depends upon “brought them without violence,” not upon “for they feared the people.” to bring this man’s blood upon us] Not meaning that divine vengeance would come on them for the murder of Jesus; but with a stress on us—that the people would be incited to take vengeance on them, the Sanhedrim, for that murder, The preceding clause, “ye have filled Jerusalem with your doctrine,” shews this to be their thought. Compare the pointed address of Peter to the Sanhedrim, ch. iv. 8–12, and the distinction between them and the people in iv. 21.—This being so, the resemblance between this expression and the imprecation of the people in Matt. xxvii. 25 must not be too closely pressed, though the coincidence is too striking to escape notice.

23.] “They ought to have enquired first, How did ye escape? But as if nothing had happened, they ask them, saying&c.” Chrysostom. “The same shyness of open allusion to the names or facts connected with Jesus and the spread of his doctrine may be traced in the words “this name,” and “this man’s blood,” and is a strong mark of truth and circumstantiality—“The High Priest will not name Jesus: Peter names and celebrates Him.” Bengel.

29.] Peter, by word of mouth; the Apostles, as a body, by assent, implied in his own utterance and their silence. There is no occasion to insert “other,” as done in the A.V.—This defence of Peter divides itself into the propositions of an ordinary syllogism—(1) The statement of the general truth that we must obey God rather than men: (2) The reduction of the present circumstances under that general truth, as being the work of the God of their Fathers—shewn in his having raised and glorified Jesus, for a definite purpose, to give, &c.—(3) The identification of themselves with the course of action marked out by the duty of obeying God rather than men... in that they were bearing witness to God’s work, under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit given them as men obedient to God.—The whole is a perfect model of concise and ready eloquence, and of unanswerable logical coherence; and a notable fulfilment of the promise “it shall be given you in that hour what ye shall speak” (Matt. x. 19).

We ought to obey] Much stronger than their former saying in ch. iv. 19, “whether it be right... to hearken unto you more than unto God, judge ye,”—as their conduct, in persisting after prohibition, had been more marked and determined. That: was a mere ‘listening to’ the proposition then made to them; this a course of deliberate action, chosen and entered on.

to obey God—opposed to the words your doctrine of the High Priest; and to his designation of our Lord as this man. In the background, there would be the command of the angel, ver. 20: but it is not alleged: the great duty of preaching the Gospel of Christ is kept on its highest grounds.

30. The God of our fathers] Thus binding on Christ and his work to the covenant whereof all present were partakers.

ye, emphatic: answering to the emphatic “upon us” of the High Priest.

on a tree (or, beam of wood)] Compare the similar contrast in ch. iii. 14, 15. The manner of death is described thus barely and ignominiously, to waken compunction in the hearers, to whom the expression was well known as entailing curse and disgrace on the victim.

31.] with (not to) his right hand, as in ch. ii. 33, where see note. The great aim here, as there, is to set forth God as the DOER of all this.

a Prince and a Saviour, not, ‘to be a Prince and a Savior;’ but the words are the predicate of Him—as a Prince and a Saviour.

a Prince] as in ch. iii. 15, which see.

and a Saviour] Jesus was to be King and Captain of Israel, and also their Saviour, The two offices, though inseparably connected in fact, had each its separate meaning in Peter’s speech: a Prince—to whom you owe obedience—a Saviour, by whom you must be saved from your sins.

for to give, in his Kingly prerogative; repentance and remission of sins, to lead to salvation by him as a Saviour.—The key to this part of the speech is Luke xxiv. 47–49, where we have, in our Lord’s command to them, the same conjunction ‘of repentance and re-mission of sins,—and immediately follows, as here, “ye are witnesses of these things,” appointing them to that office which they were now discharging,—and, parallel with the mention of the Holy Ghost in our text, there follows there, “and behold, I send the promise of my Father upon you.” By conjoining the Holy Ghost, as a witness, with themselves,—they claim and assert the promise of John xv. 26, 27: see also the apostolic letter of ch. xv. 28. When we remember how much of the apostolic testimony was given in writing, as well as by word of mouth, this declaration of Peter becomes an important element for judging of the nature of that testimony also. See a very similar conjunction, 1 John v. 9.—They were God’s witnesses, in the things which they had seen and heard as men: the Holy Ghost in them was God’s Witness, in purifying and enlarging by His inspiration that their testimony to facts, and in unfolding, from (and as inseparable from) these witnessed facts,—the things which eye hath not seen nor ear heard. And in the Scripture THESE SAME TESTIMONIES are conjoined; that of the Apostles, holy men under the guidance and reminiscence of the Holy Spirit, faithfully and honestly reporting those things which fall under human observation: and that of God the Spirit Himself, testifying, through them, those loftier things which no human experience can assure, nor human imagination compass.

32. things] literally, words: meaning, histories, things expressed in words: see note on Luke i. 4.

to them that obey him] He does not say, “to us,” which might make an unreal distinction between the Apostles and the then believers, and an implied exclusion of the hearers from this gift,—but generally, to all that obey Him, by this word recalling the opening of the speech, and binding all together. So that the sense of the whole is, ‘We are acting in obedience to God, and for the everlasting good of our common Israel: and otherwise we cannot do.’ And a solemn invitation is implied ‘Be ye obedient likewise.’ It is remarkable that a similar word, “were obedient to the faith,” is used of the multitude of converted priests, ch. vi. 7.

33.] When they heard that, they were cut asunder (so literally: i.e. in heart).

34.] Gamaliel (see Num. i. 10; ii, 20) is generally, and not without probability, assumed to be identical with the celebrated Rabban Gamaliel, also entitled “the old man,” one of the seven, to whom, among their Rabbis, the Jews give this title Rabban, a wise and enlightened Pharisee, the son of Rabban Symeon (traditionally the Symeon of Luke ii, 25) and grandson of the famous Hillel. His name often appears in the Talmud, as an utterer of sayings quoted as authorities. He died eighteen years before the destruction of the city. He was the preceptor of St. Paul (ch. xxii. 3). Ecclesiastical tradition makes him become a Christian, and be baptized by Peter and John, and in the Clementine Recognitions, he is stated to have been at this time a Christian, but secretly. The Jewish accounts do not agree, which make him die a Pharisee, with much more probability. Nor is the least trace of a Christian leaning to be found in his speech: see below on ver. 39. And considering that he was a Pharisee, opposing the prevalent faction of Sadduceism in a matter where the Resurrection was called in question,—and a wise and enlightened man opposing furious and unreasoning zealots,—considering also, that when the anti-pharisaical element of Christianity was brought out in the acts and sayings of Stephen, his pupil Saul was found the foremost persecutor,—we should, I think, be slow to suspect him of any favouring of the Apostles as followers of Jesus. (See particulars respecting Gamaliel collected in Conybeare and Howson’s St. Paul, edn. 2, vol. i.p. 69, f.) He does not here appear as the president of the Sanhedrim, but only as a member.

to put the apostles forth, i.e. to cause them to withdraw. They are recalled in ver. 40.

35.] The words as touching these men may be joined either with take heed to yourselves, or with what ye intend to do. The latter would give the more usual construction: and seems the more probable of the two.

36.] A great chronological difficulty arises here. Josephus relates, that when Cuspius Fadus was Procurator of Judaea, an impostor named Theudas persuaded a very great multitude to break up their households and follow him to the Jordan, in expectation that he would divide the river for them to go over. He then relates how Fadus sent a squadron of horse against him, killing many of his followers, and taking many prisoners, and bringing his head to Jerusalem. But this was in the reign of Claudius, not before the year A. D. 44: and consequently at least twelve years after this speech of Gamaliel’s. On this difficulty I will remark, that we are plainly in no position (setting all other considerations aside) to charge St. Luke with having put into the mouth of Gamaliel words which he could not have uttered. For Josephus himself, speaking of a time which would accord very well with that referred to by Gamaliel, viz. the time when Archelaus went to Rome to be confirmed in the kingdom, says, “Meantime numerous seditional movements took place among the Jews, many men feeding their own ambition by the enmity of the Jews against the Romans, and breaking out in acts of war.” And among these there may well have been an impostor of this name. But all attempts to identify Theudas with any other leader of outbreaks mentioned by Josephus have failed to convince any one except their propounders. See them quoted in my Greek Test. The assumption of Josephus having misplaced his Theudas is perhaps improbable; but by no means impossible, in an historian teeming with inaccuracies. All we can say is, that such impostors were too frequent, for any one to be able to say that there was not one of this name, which was by no means uncommon, at the time specified. It is exceedingly improbable, considering the time and circumstances of the writing of the Acts, and the evident supervision of them by St. Paul, the pupil of Gamaliel, that a gross historical mistake should have been here put into his mouth.

about four hundred hardly agrees with Josephus's words above, "a very great multitude," which may mean even more, the greatest part of the multitude: and this confirms the idea that different events are pointed at in the two accounts. But the Jewish historian speaks very widely about such matters: see note on ch. xxi. 38.

37.] The decided words, after this man, fix beyond doubt the place here assigned to Theudas. 'The revolt of Judas, and the occasion of his revolt are related by Josephus. It arose on the mission of Quirinus to enroll the inhabitants of Judæa. They took it quietly at first, but afterwards rose in revolt under Judas as their leader. Ife says he was a Gaulonite, from a city named Gamala, and in returning to the mention of him as the founder of the fourth sect among the Jews, he calls him "Judas of Galilee"? From the above citation it is plain that this enrolment was that so called beyond all others, under Quirinus: see Luke ii. 2 and note. His revolt took a theocratic character, his followers maintaining, as Josephus tells us, that God was the only ruler and master. His end is not related by Josephus.

were dispersed] Strictly accurate—for they still existed, and at last became active and notorious again, under Menahem, son of Judas the Galilean, as Josephus also relates.

38.] if it be of men... if it is of God: implying by the first, perhaps, the manifold devices of human imposture and wickedness, any of which it might be, and all of which would equally come to nought,—and, on the other hand, the solemnity and fixedness of the divine purpose by the indicative mood, which are also intimated by the present tense, ye cannot.—Or perhaps the indicative mood is used in the second place, because that is the case assumed, and on which the advice is founded. At all events, the distinction ought to be prescribed, which it is not in our A.V.

this counsel] The whole plan—the scheme, of which this work, the fact under your present cognizance, forms a part.

39.] He warns them, lest they be found opponents not only to them, but also to God:—‘even’ in A.V., does not give the sense.—As regards Gamaliel's advice we may remark that it was founded on a view of the issues of events, agreeing with the fatalism of the Pharisees: that it betokens no leaning towards Christianity, nor indeed very much even of worldly wisdom;—but serves to shew how low the supreme council of the Jews had sunk both in their theology and their political sagacity, if such a fallacious laissez-aller view of matters was the counsel of the wisest among them. It seems certainly, on a closer view, as if they accepted, from fear of the people (see ver. 26), this opportunity of compromising the matter, which Gamaliel had designedly afforded them.

40. when they had... beaten them] See Deut. xxv. 2,—for disobedience to their command.

41. the Name] Not “his Name,” as A.V., nor “this Name” (as others), but the Name, par excellence, viz. of Christ. So the term “the Name” is used Levit. xxiv. 11, 16.

42.] On in the houses see note, ch. ii. 46.

CHAP. VI. 1-7.] ELECTION OF SEVEN PERSONS TO SUPERINTEND THE DISTRIBUTION OF ALMS.

1.] But, in contrast to the former entire unity of the church: introducing that great and important chapter in her history, of Judaizing divisions, which from this time onward disquieted her.

in these days] See ch. i. 15:—but not necessarily as there, ‘within a very few days:’ the expression is quite indefinite. Some time must have elapsed since ch. iv. 32.

The Hellenists were the Grecian Jews: not only those who were themselves proselytes, nor only those who came of families once proselytized,—but all who, on account of origin or habitation, spoke Greek as their ordinary language, and used ordinarily the LXX version.—The Hebrews were the pure Jews, not necessarily resident in Palestine (for example, St. Paul, who was “an Hebrew, descended from Hebrews,” Phil. iii. 5. See also 2 Cor. xi. 22),—nor necessarily of unmixed Jewish descent, else the words of St. Paul just cited would hardly have conveyed an additional distinction,—but rather distinguished by language, as speaking the Syro-Chaldaic, and using the Hebrew Scriptures.

were neglected] literally, overlooked. The use of this appropriate word shews, I think, that Olshausen's supposition, that the term, their widows, implies all their poor, is not correct. Those poor who could attend for themselves and represent their case, were served: but the widows, who required more searching out at their own houses, were overlooked. And this because the Apostles, who certainly before this had the charge of the duty of distribution, being already too much occupied in the ministry of the Word to attend personally to it, had entrusted it apparently to some deputies among the Hebrews, who had committed this oversight. It has been shewn by Biscoe, that the Hellenistic Jews were held in low estimation by the Hebrews.

in the daily ministration] Some have argued from this, that there must have been ‘deacons’ before: and that those now elected (see below on their names) were only for the service of the Hellenistic Jews. But I should rather believe that the Apostles had as yet, by themselves or by non-official deputies, performed the duty. The ministration spoken of was the daily distribution of food: see on ver. 2.

2.] the multitude of the disciples,—i. e. ‘the whole number of disciples in Jerusalem.’ summoning a general meeting of the church. How many they were in number at the time, is not said. Clearly the 120 names of ch. i. 15 cannot be meant.

It is not our pleasure] Not, it is not reasonable, as Beza, Calvin, and the A.V. The meaning of the original word is always as above.

leave the word of God] For to this it would come, if the Apostles were to enquire into, and do justice in, every case of asserted neglect.

serve tables] It is a question, whether this expression import the service of distributing money—or that of apportioning the daily public meals. The latter seems to me most probable, both on account of the word “daily” above, and of the usage of the word ministration. That both kinds of tables may be meant, is possible: but hardly probable.

3. look ye out] The similarity to Gen. xli. 33 may be noticed, and seems to shew that the look ye out of the A.V. is the right rendering.

seven men] Some have supposed a reference to the number of nations of which the Hellenistic Jews would per-haps be composed: some, to 7000, to which number the believers would by this time amount: some, to the mystic number seven, so common in Jewish writings:—but the best remark is Lightfoot’s:—‘why seven were to be chosen, let him say, who has boldness to make the guess.’—Some present consideration of convenience probably regulated the number.

over this business (or duty)] The duty (see above) was, not that of ministering to the Hellenistic Jews only, but that of superintending the whole distribution.

4.] the ministry of the word, in opposition to the ministry, or serving, of tables. “This is the noblest portion of the work, which no bishop can delegate to another, as being himself occupied in more important matters.” Calvin.

5.] full of faith,—not in the lower sense of ‘truthfulness,’ but in the higher of faith, the root of all Christian virtues: see ch. xi. 24.—Of these seven, Stephen and Philip (ch. viii. 5, 26, 40; xxi. 8) only are elsewhere mentioned. On the idea of Nicolas having founded the heretical sect of the Nicolaitans, Rev. ii. 6, 15, see note there. From his being called a proselyte of Antioch, some have argued that he only was a proselyte, and none of the rest: some that all were proselytes,—but the rest, of Jerusalem. But neither inference seems justified: rather I should say that the addition simply imports that he became better known than the rest, from the very circumstance perhaps of Antioch having been afterwards so important a spot in the Christian history (ch. xi. 19, note).—These names are all Greek: but we cannot thence infer that the seven were all Hellenistic Jews: the Apostles Philip and Andrew bore Greek names, but were certainly not Hellenists. There does appear however, in the ease of these two Apostles, to have been a connexion with Greeks of some sort, see John xii, 20–22. Possibly, though Hebrews, they may not have been descended from Hebrews (see above on ver. 1), but sprung from intermarriage with Hellenists. And so these seven may have been partly Hebrews, though their names seem to indicate, and their office would appear to require, that they were connected with Hellenists, and not likely to overlook or disparage them. The title of ‘deacons’ is nowhere applied to these seven in Scripture, nor does the occur in the Acts at all. In 1 Tim. iii. 8 ff. there is no absolute identification of the duties of deacons with those allotted to these seven, but at the same time nothing to imply that they were different. The universal consent of all Christian writers in regarding this as the institution of the office of deacons should not be overlooked: but at the same time we must be careful not to imagine that we have here the institution of the ecclesiastical order so named. The distinctness of the two is stated by Chrysostom plainly, whose opinion is that these are not to be confounded with any ecclesiastical order, but were merely appointed for the purpose then in hand. So also Ecumenius. But that the subsequent office of deacon was founded upon this appointment, is very probable. The only one of these seven who appears in the subsequent history (ch. xxi. 8) is called “Philip the Evangelist,” probably from the success granted him as recorded in ch. viii. 12. In these early days titles sprung out of realities, and were not yet mere hierarchical classifications.

6.] they had, viz. the Apostles. Their office of giving themselves to prayer is here specially exercised.—The laying on of hands, the earliest mention of which is connected with blessing only (Gen. xlvi. 14), was prescribed to Moses as the form of conferring office on Joshua, Num. xxvii. 18, and from that time was used on such occasions by the Jews. From its adoption by the Apostles, it has ever been the practice of the Christian church in ordaining, or setting apart her ministers. It was also used by the Apostles on those who, having been baptized, were to be fully endowed with the gifts of the Holy Spirit: see ch. viii.

7.] And, i.e. on this measure being completed; as would be the case, seeing that these seven were not only servants of tables, but men full of the Holy Ghost and of wisdom: and we soon hear of the part which Stephen bore in the work.

a great multitude of the priests] The number of priests who returned from Babylon, Ezra ii. 36–39, was 4289; and the number would probably have much increased since then. No evasion of the historian's assertion is to be attempted, as has been done by some Commentators.—At this time was probably the culminating point of popularity of the church at Jerusalem. As yet, all seemed going on prosperously for the conversion of Israel. ‘The multitude honoured the Apostles; the advice of Gamaliel had moderated the opposition of the Sanhedrim: the priests were gradually being won over. But God's designs were far different. At this period another great element in the testimony of the church is brought out, in the person of Stephen,—its protest against Pharisaism. This arrays against it that powerful and zealous sect, and henceforward it finds neither favour nor tolerance with either of the parties among the Jews, but increasing and bitter enmity from them both,

8–CH. VII. 60.] THE ACCUSATION, DEFENCE, AND MARTYRDOM OF STEPHEN.

8.] This is the first instance of any, not an Apostle, working signs and wonders. The power was perhaps conferred by the laying on of the Apostles' hands; though, that having been for a special purpose merely, and the working miracles being a fulfilment of the promise, Mark xvi. 17, 18, to believers, I should rather refer the power to the eminence of Stephen's faith.

full of grace, i. e. divine grace (not ‘favour with the people’): the effects of which, the miracles were called gifts of Grace (charismata, from charis, grace).

9.] The word Libertines is rightly explained by Chrysostom to mean, the freedmen of the Romans. Philo speaks of a large district of Rome beyond the Tiber as inhabited by Jews, who were mostly freedmen that had originally been brought in captivity to Italy. Tacitus relates under A.D. 19, that a decree of the senate passed, to banish to Sardinia four thousand libertines or freedmen, who were inf Jewish and Egyptian superstitions, and the rest were ordered either to abjure their religion or to leave Italy. In this Josphus agrees, relating a story as one of its causes, in which Ida, a freedwoman, was the agent of the mischief. Here then we have abundant reason for numbers of these Jews of libertine race having come to Jerusalem, being among the rest, who were ordered to quit Italy: and what place so likely a refuge for Jews as Jerusalem?—Those who find a difficulty in this interpretation suppose them to have been inhabitants of Libertum, a town in proper or proconsular Africa, from which we find a bishop of Libertum sitting in the synod of Carthage in 411. But none of their suppositions will bear examination, and the best interpretation is the usual one—that they were the descendants of Jewish freedmen at Rome, who had been expelled by Tiberius.—There is no difficulty in their having had a synagogue of their own: for there were 460 or 480 synagogues at Jeru-salem.

Cyrenians] See ch. ii. 10, note.

Alexandrians] Two of the five regions of Alexandria were inhabited by Jews. It was also the seat of the learning and philosophy of the Grecian Jews, which was now at its height. This metropolis of the Hellenists would certainly have a synagogue in Jerusalem. I understand three distinct synagogues to be meant, notwithstanding the somewhat equivocal construction,—and the words “which is called” only to apply to the unusual term “Libertines.”

Cilicia was at this time a Roman province, the capital being the free city of Tarsus, see note on ch. ix. 11.—Asia,—not exactly as in ch. ii. 9, where it is distinguished from Phrygia,—here and usually in the Acts implies proconsular Asia, a large and important Roman province, including Mysia, Lydia, Caria, and Phrygia—known also as “Asia this side of the Taurus.”

11.] Neander well remarks that this false charge, coupled with the character of Stephen's apologetic speech, shews the real character of his arguments with his opponents:—that he seems to have been the first who plainly set forth the transitory nature of the law and temple, as compared with the permanence of the latter and better covenant, thus being in a remarkable manner the forerunner of St. Paul.

came upon him] The same persons,—acting now by the authority of the Sanhedrim; Saul, among those from Cilicia, being, as is afterwards (ch. vii. 58) implied, among the foremost,—came upon him, and seized him.

13. false witnesses] The falsehood of their witness consisted, as in the similar case of our Lord, in taking Stephen's words out of their context, and misrepresenting what perhaps in so many words he had actually said.

this holy place] The temple: see Matt. xxiv. 15; ch. xxi. 28.

15.] It is a question with regard to this verse, Does it relate any supernatural appearance, glorifying the face of Stephen,—or merely describe the calm and holy aspect with which he stood before the council? The majority of commentators suppose the latter: and certainly the foregoing description of Stephen would lead us to infer, that there was something remarkably striking in his appearance and demeanour, which over-awed his adversaries. But both from the plain language of our text, well understood among the Jews to signify supernatural brightness, and from the fact that in St. Luke's own narrative we have supernatural brightness associated with angelic appearances more than once (see Luke ii. 9; ch. xii. 7), I should be inclined to think that the face of the martyr was lighted up with a divine radiance. That the effect on those present was not such as to prevent the examination proceeding, is no argument against this view: in the very mildness of the question of the High Priest which follows, I see the trace of some unusual incident exercising an influence over him. Chrysostom explains well the effect on the council: "God seems to me to have made him beautiful to look at, perhaps to prepare the way for his speech, and that he might immediately strike them with his look. For there is, yea there is, in faces full of spiritual grace that which is lovely to those that love them, and strikes awe and fear into those that hate them. Or perhaps the Evangelist mentions it to account for their tolerating his speech. For what answer does the High Priest make? Do you see, how mildly and unreproachfully he puts his question?"

CHAP. VII. 1.] On the High Priest's question, see Chrysostom just quoted.—It is parallel with Matt. xxvi. 62, but singularly distinguished from that question by its mildness: see above.

2–53.] STEPHEN'S DEFENCE. In order to understand this wonderful and somewhat difficult speech, it will be well to bear in mind, (1) that the general character of it is apologetic, referring to the charge made against him: but (2) that in this apology, forgetting himself in the vast subject which he is vindicating, he every where mixes in the polemic and didactic element. A general synopsis of it may be thus given: (1) He shews (apologetically) that, so far from dishonouring Moses or God, he believes, and holds in mind, God's dealings with Abraham and Moses, and grounds upon them his preaching; that, so far from dishonouring the temple, he bears in mind its history and the sayings of the prophets respecting it; and he is proceeding,—when (interrupted by their murmurs—or inattention? but see note, ver. 51) he bursts into a holy vehemence of invective against their rejection of God, which provokes his tumultuary expulsion from the council, and execution. (2) But simultaneously and parallel with this apologetic procedure, he also proceeds didactically, shewing them that a future Prophet was pointed out by Moses as the final Lawgiver of God's people,—that the Most High had revealed His spiritual and heavenly nature by the prophets, and did not dwell in temples made with hands. And (3) even more remarkably still does the polemic element run through the speech. "It is not I, but YOU, who from the first times till now have rejected and spoken against God." And this element, just appearing ver. 9, and again more plainly vv. 25–28, and again more pointedly still in ver. 35, becomes dominant. in vv. 39–44, and finally prevails, to the exclusion of the apologetic and didactic, in vv. 51–53.—That other connected purposes have been discovered in the speech, as, for example, that so ably followed out by Chrysostom, of shewing that the covenant and promises were before the law, and sacrifice and the law before the temple,—is to be attributed to the wonderful depth of words uttered like these under the immediate inspiration of the Holy Spirit, presenting to us, from whichever side they are viewed, new and inimitable hues of heavenly wisdom. Many of these will be brought out as we advance.—The question, from what probable source St. Luke derived his report of this speech, so peculiar in its character and citations as to bear, even to the most prejudiced, decisive evidence of authenticity, can be only conjecturally answered: but in this case the conjecture can hardly be wrong. I have discussed the point in the Introduction to the Acts, ch. i. §ii. 12 (a).

2. Brethren (men who are brethren), and fathers] So Paul, ch. xxii. 1, before a mixed assembly of Jews. The brethren would embrace all: the fathers would be a title of respect to the members of the Sanhedrim, in this case, but hardly in ch. xxii. 1.

The God of glory] Not equivalent to the glorious God, but the God of (i. e. who possesses and manifests Himself by) glory, viz. the Shechinah, or divine appearance, see Exod. xxiv. 16, 17, and ver. 55.—The words our father decide nothing as to Stephen's genuine Hebrew extraction. Any Jew would thus speak.

before he dwelt in Charran] This was the Jewish tradition, though not asserted in Genesis. Thus Philo, having paraphrased the divine command, says, "For this reason Abraham is said to have made his first move from the land of the Chaldæans to that of the Charraëans." But he accurately distinguishes between the divine command, which he obeyed in leaving Chaldæa, and the vision afterwards, adding a reason after his manner, why God could not be seen nor apprehended by him while he was yet a Chaldæan and an astrologer. The fact of his having left Ur by some divine intimation is plainly stated in Gen. xv. 7, and referred to in Neh. ix. 7. It was surely both natural and allowable to express this first command in the well-known words of the second.

Charran] So the LXX for Haran, Gen. xi. 31, &c.; 4 Kings xix. 12; Ezek. xxvii. 23. It is in Mesopotamia, and is celebrated in Roman history as Carrhae, where happened the defeat and slaughter of Crassus by the Parthians. It lay on an ancient road, in a large plain surrounded by mountains; it was still a great city in the days of the Arabian caliphs. 4. when his father was dead] In Gen. xi. 26, we read that Terah lived 70 years and begot Abram, Nahor, and Haran; in xi. 32, that Terah lived 205 years, and died in Haran; and in xii. 4, that Abram was 75 years old when he left Haran. Since then 70 added to 75 makes 145, Terah must have lived about 60 years in Haran after Abram's departure.—It seems evident, that the Jewish chronology, which Stephen follows, was at fault here, owing to the circumstance of Terah's death being mentioned Gen. xi. 32, before the command to Abram to leave Haran;—it not having been observed that the mention is anticipatory. And this is confirmed by Philo having fallen into the same mistake, and stated the removal of Abraham from Haran, in almost these same words, to have been after his father's death. It is observable that the Samaritan Pentateuch, in Gen. xi. 32, for 205, reads 145, which has most probably been an alteration to remove the apparent inconsistency.—The subterfuge of understanding the spiritual death of Terah, who is, as a further hypothesis, supposed to have relapsed into idolatry at Haran, appears to have originated with the Rabbis, on discovering that their tradition was at variance with the sacred chronology. They have not been without followers in modern Christendom. See in my Greek Testament instances of unworthy treatment of the assertion in the text in order to evade the difficulty. The way in which it has been met by some commentators, viz. that we have no right to assume that Abram was born when Terah was 70, but may regard him as the youngest son, would leave us in this equally unsatisfactory position:—Terah, in the course of nature, begets his son Abram at 130 (205 minus 75); yet this very son Abram regards it as incredible that he himself should beget a son at 99 (Gen. xvii. 1, 17); and on the fact of the birth of Isaac being out of the course of nature, most important Scriptural arguments and consequences are founded; cf. iv. 17–21; Heb. xi. 11, 12. We may fairly leave these commentators with their new difficulty: only remarking for our instruction, how sure those are to plunge into hopeless confusion, who, from motives however good, once begin to handle the word of God deceitfully.

God removed him] In these words Stephen clearly recognizes the second command, to migrate from Haran to Canaan; and as clearly therefore made no mistake in ver. 2, but applied the expressed words of the second command to the first injunction. 5. gave him none inheritance in it] There is no occasion here to wrest our text in order to produce accordance with the history. The field which Abraham bought for the burial of his dead surely did not come under the description of an inheritance, nor give him any standing as a possessor in the land.

6, 7.] A free citation from the LXX, with the words, “and they shall worship me in this place,” adapted and added from Exod. iii. 12. The shifts of some commentators to avoid this plain fact are not worth recounting: but again, the student who would not handle the word of God deceitfully should be here and every where on his guard against them.—The round number, 400 years, given here and in Genesis, is further specified Exod. xii. 40, as 430. (See Gal. iii. 17, and note.)

7.] said God is inserted by Stephen in passing from the narrative form (“his seed”) into the direct (“I will judge”).

8.] On the institution of circumcision, it is called a “covenant,” Gen. xvii. 10, and the immediate promise of that covenant is contained in the same chapter, ver. 8.

so, i.e. ‘in this new covenant state;’—or, ‘in fulfilment of the promise of seed implied in the above words.’ In this word so lies hid the germ of the subsequent teaching of the Holy Spirit by St. Paul, Gal. iii.

9.] Here we have the first hint of the rebellious spirit in Israel, which the progress of the history brings out.

10.] Observe the simple coupling of the clauses by and, as characteristic of this speech.

favour and wisdom] favour, so that he was acceptable to Pharaoh (see reff.); and wisdom, so that Pharaoh consulted him, and followed his suggestion, especially in the important case recorded Gen. xli. 38.

he made him] viz. Pharaoh: a change of subject.

14. threescore and fifteen souls] In the Hebrew text, Gen. xlvi. 27; Exod. i. 5; Deut. x. 22, seventy souls are reckoned, viz. sixty-six born of Jacob, Jacob himself, Joseph, and his two sons born in Egypt. So also Josephus. But the LXX, whom Stephen follows, insert in Gen. xlvi. 20 an account of the children and grandchildren of Manasseh and Ephraim, five in number: and in ver. 27 read thus: “And the sons of Joseph, who were born to him in the land of Egypt, were nine souls. All the souls of the house of Jacob, which entered with Jacob into Egypt, were seventy-five:”—reckoning, as it appears, curiously enough, among the sons of Joseph, Joseph himself, and his wife Asenath; for these are required to make up the nine, according to their ver. 20. And similarly in Exod. i. 5, and in some copies in Deut. x. 22. With regard to the various attempts to solve the difficulty, see in my Greek Testament.

16.] were carried over, viz. he and our fathers, not the latter only,—as some commentators have suggested, to evade part of the difficulty of the verse.—The facts, as related in the Old Testament, were these: Jacob, dying in Egypt, was (Gen. i. 13) taken into the land of Canaan, and buried in the cave of Macpelah, before Mamre (on the rest of the verse see below): Joseph, dying also in Egypt, was taken in a coffin (Gen. l. 26) at the Exodus (Exod. xiii. 19), and finally buried (Josh. xxiv. 32) at Shechem. Of the burial of the other patriarchs the sacred text says nothing, but rather by the specification in Exod. xiii. 19, leaves it to be inferred that they were buried in Egypt. Josephus, Antt. ii. 8. 2, relates that they were taken and buried in Hebron, and adds, “of whom the graves are shewn even to my time in the fortress Hebron, of very beautiful marble, and sumptuously wrought.” The Rabbinical traditions report them to have been buried in Sychem: and Jerome, relating the pilgrimages of Paula to the sacred places, says, “She passed by Sychem, and turning aside there saw the sepulchre of the twelve patriarchs.” These traditions probably Stephen followed; and, in haste or inadvertence, classed Jacob with the rest.

that Abraham bought] The burying-place which Abraham bought was not at Sychem, bnt (Gen. xxiii. 3–20) at Hebron, and was bought of Ephron the Hittite. It was Jacob who (Gen. xxxiii. 19) bought a field where he had pitched his tent, near Sychem, of the children of Hamor, Shechem’s father: and no mention is made of its being for a burying-place. The two incidents are certainly here confused; and no ingenuity of the commentators has ever devised an escape from the inference. I have mentioned a few such attempts in my Greek Testament.

17.] according as, i.e. ‘in proportion as,’ not “when,” as A.V.

20. fair unto God (so literally)] The expression here seems borrowed from tradition: Josephus calls the infant Moses “a child of divine beauty.” Philo says, “The child at its very birth presented an appearance of beauty greater than that of ordinary men.”

22.] The word “learned,” in our A.V. here, is used in its older meaning of “taught,” as in the Prayer-book version of the Ps. cxix. 66, “Learn me true understanding and knowledge.” This meaning having now become obsolete, the word here is misunderstood to mean learnéd, i.e. erudite, accomplished. It should therefore be altered into “instructed.” That Moses was instructed in the wisdom of the Egyptians, is not found in the Old Testament, but derived from tradition, and following as a matter of course from his adopted station as the son of Pharaoh’s daughter. This wisdom of the Egyptians, celebrated by so many ancient writers, consisted mainly in natural philosophy, medicine, and mathematics,—and its teachers were the priests.

mighty in words] So Josephus calls Moses admirably persuasive in haranguing multitudes, but late in his course, during the journey through the wilderness:—when the divine Spirit, as the book of Deuteronomy abundantly testifies, had turned his ‘slowness of speech’ into the most fervid eloquence. That he was so thus early, during his Egyptian course, was probably reported by tradition, but hardly seems to agree with Exod. iv. 10–16.

23. full forty years old] The text of Exod. ii. 11 has only “when Moses was grown.” The exact age was traditional.

24.] the Egyptian, from the history being so universally known, that the agent of the wrong would be readily supplied.

25.] Here we have again the resistance to the Holy Spirit hinted: see ver. 51, and note on ver. 2.

26.] unto them, two of them, taken as representing his brethren the children of Israel. Not, “he would have set them at peace,” as our A.V.: this explanation is not needed:—the act, on Moses’ part, was complete; but, he set them at peace.

27.] The further progress of resistance to the Spirit on the part of Israel.

29. Madian (or-am)] Winer supposes this Madian to have been a nomad detachment of the more settled Midianites,—which at that time was encamped in the neighbourhood of Sinai and Horeb. For Jethro, Moses’ father-in-law, is not found there in Exod. xviii. 1 ff., but comes to visit Moses from a distance. See also Num. x. 29 ff.

two sons] Exod. ii. 22; iv. 20; xviii. 3.

30. when forty years were expired] This follows from the tradition of ver. 23, combined with Exod. vii. 7. The Rabbinical books said that “Moses lived in Pharaoh’s palace forty years, and in Midian forty years, and then ministered to Israel forty years.”

mount Sina] Horeb, Exo. iii. 1. But both were points of the same mountain range, and the names were convertibly used. In Exod., Levit., and Num., the law is said to have been given from Sinai; in Deut. from Horeb. ‘The desert of Mount Sina’ is the desert in which Mt. S. is situated. So

‘the Peak of Derbyshire,’ originally no doubt some single hill, has come to mean the whole district in which that hill is situated.

an angel] Here, as continually in the Old Testament, the angel bears the authority and presence of God Himself: which angel since God giveth not His glory to another, must have been the great Angel of the covenant, the “Angel of the Face” of Isa. lxiii. 9, “the Angel of His Presence,”—the SON OF GOD. See below on ver. 53.—Stier remarks, that this second appearance of God, to Moses (see ver. 2), introduces the legal dispensation, as the first, to Abraham, the patriarchal.

32.] The order of Exod. iii. 6, is here somewhat varied. The command to put off the shoe was given on the approach of Moses, and before these words were spoken.

33.] See Josh. v. 15. Putting off the sandals was a mark of reverence. The priests performed all their ministrations barefooted. The Arabs to this day continue the practice: they always enter their mosques barefooted.

34. I have seen, I have seen (literally, seeing I saw)] This is the emphatic way of expression in the Hebrew.

35.] The words, this Moses, are repeated emphatically again and again, to impress on them God’s choice of one whom they rejected.

whom they refused, ver 27. The rejecter of Moses there is regarded as the representative of the nation: see note on ver. 26. In this express mention of the rejection of Moses by the Jews, and his election and mission by God, the parallel of Jesus Christ is no doubt in Stephen’s mind, and the inference intended to be drawn, that it does not follow that GOD REJECTS those whom THEY REJECTED.—The difficulty of hath God sent: has caused it to be altered into the historic tense, “did God send.” But the perfect tense sets forth not only the fact of God’s sending Moses then, but the endurance of his mission till—him hath God sent: with a closer reference than before, to Him whom God had now exalted as the true Ruler and Deliverer, see ch. y. 31.

37.] See ch. iii, 22, notes. Our text has probably been altered to agree verbally with the former citation.

38.] That Moses conversed with both the Angel of the covenant and our fathers, implies that he was the mediator between them, as indeed the words, who received the living oracles, more plainly declare.

the word rendered the church means, probably, the assembly held (Exod. xix.) for the promulgation of the law at Mt. Sinai, not ‘the Church’ generally. Dr. Wordsworth observes on the meaning which the words “the Church in the wilderness” carry for the student of Christian prophecy, Rev. xii. 1–6.

39.] Another instance, brought home again by the words our fathers, of rejection of God’s appointed messenger and servant.

they turned back in their hearts to Egypt: not ‘they wished to return to Egypt,’ of which in Exod. xxxii. there is no trace (but later, in Num. xiv. 4), and which would hardly suit the term to go before us; but ‘they apostatized in heart, to the Egyptian idolatries.’ The very title by which Aaron proclaims his idol, is, ‘These be thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt,’ Exod. xxxii. 4. See also Neh. ix. 18.

40. gods to go before us] As God had done in the pillar of the cloud and fire. The plural is not put for the singular, but is used categorically: not Perhaps without implying also, that the only two religions were, the worship of Jehovah, and that of idols, a multitude. The plural is used by Aaron, see above.—In the opprobrious term, this Moses, may be implied, as Meyer suggests, ‘who was the strong opponent of idolatry.’

41. they made a calf] apparently in imitation of Apis, a bull worshipped at Memphis as the living symbol of Osiris. The ox was a common symbolic form of idols in the East; it was one of the cherubic forms, Ezek. i. 10; and the most recent discoveries at Nineveh have brought to light colossal bulls. Sir Gardiner Wilkinson thinks the golden calves of Israel to have been imitations of Mnevis, a bull kept at Heliopolis as a living symbol of the sun. Jeroboam afterwards set up golden calves at Bethel and Dan, and with the same proclamation: see 1 Kings xii. 28.

42. God turned] i.e. God, who had hitherto watched over them for good, now provoked by their rebellion, changed, and delivered them up to their own ways.

gave them up—not ‘suffered them:’ all these explainings away of the strong expressions of Scripture belong to the rationalistic school of interpreters (which is not modern merely; even Chrysostom has here “He permitted them”): it was a judicial delivering up, not a mere letting alone, see Rom. i. 24, 26, 28.

to worship the host of heaven] This fact is not mentioned in the Pentateuch, but may refer to the worship of Baal. In after-times we have frequent traces of star worship: see 2 Kings xvii. 16; xxi. 3, 5; xxiii. 4, 5; Jer. xix. 13; Zeph. i. 5. See also Deut.

iv. 19; xvii. 3; Job xxxi. 26.

The book of the prophets, regarded as a whole, contained this prophecy. The citation is from the LXX. I should take the question here as a reproach, implying that God does not receive as offered to Him, sacrifices in which He has been made to share with idols:—it is not true that ye offered to Me (but no stress on Me) sacrifices,&c., ‘I regard it as never having happened.’

43.] The answer by God himself: Yea, ye took up, j.e. carried about with you, (not My tabernacle as your sole or chief holy place, but) the tabernacle (literally the portable tent for the image. We read of the sacred tent in the Carthaginian camp) of Moloch&c. Stephen was not the sole dishonourer, if a dishonourer, of the holy place—their fathers had done it before.

Moloch] So the LXX: the Heb. has Malchem, ‘of your king’ Moloch was the Phœnician Saturn: his image was of brass with the head of an ox, and outstretched arms of a man, hollow; and human sacrifices (of children) were offered, by laying them in these arms and heating the image by fire kindled within. The rigid prohibitions of the worship of Moloch (Lev. xviii. 21; xx. 2–5) were openly transgressed by Ahaz, 2 Kings xvi. 3; by Manasseh, ib. xxi. 6; see also xxiii. 10; Jer. vii. 31; xxxii. 35. In the kingdom of Israel this abomination had been long practised, see 2 Kings xvii. 17; Ezek. xxix. 37. We find traces of it at Carthage among the Phœnicians, among the Cretans and Rhodians, and the Assyrian colonists at Sepharvaim, 2 Kings xvii. 31.

the star of your god Remphan] For this word, Rephan or Remphan the Hebrew has “Chiun:” but what the meaning of either this or Remphan (the word is very variously read in our MSS. Rempham, Rompha, Rofa, Reffa, Rephan, &c.) is, we have nothing but conjecture to inform us. The most likely opinion has been that of Kircher, who maintains it to be a Coptic word, signifying the planet Saturn, and answering to the Arabic ‘Kewan.’ The prophecy, both in the LXX and Hebrew, has Damascus. But the fulfilment of the prophecy would make it very natural to substitute that name which had become inseparably associated with the captivity.

44. the tabernacle of witness] In opposition to the tabernacle just mentioned: but also in pursuance of one of the great aims of the speech, to shew that holiness is not confined to locality or building. This part of his subject Stephen now enters on more particularly.—The words, “the tabernacle of witness,” are the LXX rendering of the word in Num. xvi. 18, 19&c., which the A.V. renders ‘the tabernacle of the assembly,’ or ‘congregation.’

the fashion] This is another contrast: it is the same word as that rendered “figures” in ver. 43.

45.] inheriting, succeeding to its custody and privileges.

at (or ‘in’) their taking possession] The term is used of that final and settled possession which Israel took of the land, not of that transitory possession from which the Gentiles or nations were driven out. The martyr combines rapidly a considerable period, during which this taking possession and this expulsion was taking place (for it was not complete till the time of David) in order to arrive at the next great event of his history, the substitution of the temple of Solomon for the tabernacle.

46. asked permission] See 2 Sam. vii. 2 ff., in which this request is made through Nathan the Prophet, and at first conceded by Nathan, though afterwards, on a revelation made from God, denied:—not ‘desired,’ as A.V. The vow (a species of prayer) Kere referred to, is defined by the expression “find a tabernacle,” to be that mentioned Ps. cxxxii.

48.] But, though Solomon built Him an house, we are not to suppose, for all that, that He is confined to earthly spots.

as saith the prophet] We have in substance the same declaration by Solomon himself at the dedication of his temple, 1 Kings viii. 27: see also the beautiful prayer of David, 1 Chron. xxix. 10–19. The citation is freely from the LXX.—The student will not fail to be interested in observing the apparent reference to this declaration in Stephen’s apology, by St. Paul, ch. xvii. 24.

51.] I do not think there is any occasion to suppose an interruption from the audience to have occasioned this outbreak of holy indignation. At each separate recital (vv. 9, 25, 35, 39 ff.) he has dwelt, with continually increasing fervour, on the rebellions against and rejections of God by His people. He has now brought down the history to the establishment of the temple worship. From Solomon’s time to his own, he saw but a succession of apostasies, idolatries, rejection of God’s a dark and loathsome catalogue, terminated by the betrayal and murder of the Just One Himself. It is not at all beyond probability, to believe that the zeal of his fervent spirit was, by the view of this, the filling up of the measure of their iniquities, kindled into a flame of inspired invective. I find that this is also Neander’s view, in opposition to the generality of Commentators, as also that of Prof. Hackett, in his commentary on the Acts: and I cannot but think it far the most probable. “Henceforward he is borne along by vehemence in his discourse. His approaching death gave him great boldness of speech: for of this I believe him to have been fully aware." Chrysostom.

stiffnecked and uncircumcised] Words and figures familiar to the prophets in speaking of the rebellious Israel: see besides the references, Deut. ix. 6, 13; Neh. ix. 16:—Dent. x. 16; xxx. 6. See also Rom. ii. 29.

and ears] I should hardly think of any allusion to Ps. x1. 6,—because the LXX have rendered ‘mine ears hast thou opened’ by “a body hast thou pre-pared me.”

ye do always resist the Holy Ghost] Apparently reference to Isa. lxiii. 10. The instances as yet had been confined to their fathers: now he has arrived at their own times. The two are taken up again in the next verse. 52. Which of the prophets] See Matt. xxiii. 34 ff.: 2 Chron. xxxvi. 16: where the same general expressions are used of their persecuting the prophets. Such sayings are not to be pressed to the letter, but represent the uniform attitude of disobedience and hostility which they assumed to the messengers of God. See also the parable, Matt. xxi. 35.

them which shewed before of the coming of the Just One] The office of all the prophets, see ch. iii. 18. The assertion is repeated, to connect them, by this title, with Him, whom they announced.

the Just One] This name was used by the Jews to designate the Messiah. See note on James v. 6.

betrayers] by Judas's treachery, of which the Sauliedrists had been the accomplices;

Matt. xxvi. 14–16:—murderers, by the hands of the Romans; ch. ii. 23, note.

53. at the injunction of angels] Many explanations have been given of these words. An enumeration and description of them may be seen in my Greek Testament. The key to the right understanding of them seems to be the similar expression in Gal. iii. 19, “the law... ordained by [means of] angels.” The law was given by God, but announced by angels. The people received God’s law then, at the in-junction of angels.

55.] Certainly, in so far as the vision of Stephen was supernatural, it was not necessary that the material heavens should have been visible to him: but from the words looked up steadfastly into [the] heaven, it would seem that they were. We are not told where the Sanhedrim were assembled. It does not seem as if they were convened in the ordinary session room: it may have been in one of the courts of the temple, which would give room for more than the members of the Sanhedrin to be present, as seems to have been the case.

standing] A reason why the glorified Saviour was seen standing and not sitting, has been pleasingly given by Chrysostom, “Why standing and not sitting? that He may shew His attitude of help to the martyr. For of the Father also it is said, ‘Arise, O God.’” See also the collect for St. Stephen’s day. But not perhaps correctly: for ‘help’ does not seem here to be the applicable idea, but the confirmation of his faith by the ecstatic vision of the Saviour’s glory at God’s right hand.—I should be rather disposed to think that there was reference in the vision to that in Zech. iii. 1, where Zechariah sees “Joshua [Jesus] the High Priest standing before the angel of the Lord.” Stephen, under accusation of blaspheming the earthly temple, is granted a sight of the heavenly temple; being cited before the Sadducee High Priest, who believed neither angel nor spirit, he is vouchsafed a vision of the heavenly HIGH PRIEST, standing and ministering at the Throne, amidst the angels and just men made perfect.

56.] This is the only time that our Lord is by human lips called the SON OF MAN after His Ascension (Rev. i. 13; xiv. 14, are not instances). And why here? I believe for this reason. Stephen, full of the Holy Ghost, speaking now not of himself at all (ver. 55), but entirely by the utterance of the Spirit, repeats the very words, Matt. xxvi. 64, in which Jesus Himself, before this council, had foretold His glorification;—and assures them that that exaltation of the SON OF MAN, which they should hereafter witness to their dismay, was already begun and actual.

58. cast him out of the city] See Levit. xxiv. 14. The Rabbinical books say, “The place of stoning was outside the city: for all walled cities were considered to correspond to the camp of Israel.” Compare also Heb. xiii. 12, 13.

and stoned him] An anticipation of the fact, the details of which follow. Stoning was the punishment of blaspheming, Levit. xxiv. 16. The question whether this was a legal proceeding on sentence, or a tumultuary one, is not easy to answer. It would appear from John xviii. 31, that the Jews had not legally the power of putting any man to death (see note there). Certainly, from the narrative before us, and from the fact of a bloody persecution having taken place soon after it, it seems that the Jews did, by connivance of, or in the absence of the Procurator, administer summary punishments of this kind. But here no sentence is recorded: and perhaps the very violence and fanatical character of the execution might constitute it, not an encroachment on the power of the Procurator, as it would have been if strictly in form of law, but a mere outbreak, and as such it might be allowed to pass unnoticed. That they observed the forms of their own law, in the place and manner of the stoning, is no objection to this view.

the witnesses] See Deut. xvii. 7, where it is enacted that the hands of the witnesses were to be first on the criminal to put him to death, and afterward the hands of all the people.

they laid down their clothes] They disengaged themselves of their loose outer garments, that they might be light and unimpeded in the throwing of the stones. They laid them at Saul's feet that he might keep them in safety. Such notices are deeply interesting, when we recollect by whom they were in all probability carefully inserted. See ch. xxii. 19, 20, and note on ch. xxvi. 10:—from which it appears that Saul can certainly not have been less than thirty at this time. He was a member of the Sanhedrim, and soon after was despatched on an important mission with their authority.

59.] All attempts to escape from this being a direct prayer to the Saviour are vain, as I have shewn in my Greek Testament.

receive my spirit] The same prayer in substance had been made by our Lord on the Cross (Luke xxiii. 46) to His Father. To Him was now committed the key of David. Similarly, the young man Saul, in after years: “I am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed to him against that day.” 2 Tim. i. 12.

60. lay not this sin to their charge] This again was somewhat similar (though not exactly, see note there) to our Lord's prayer, Luke xxiii. 34.

he fell asleep] Not a Christian expression only: there are Jewish examples: and we have some even in Greek heathen poetry. But it became the usual Christian term for death. Its use here, when the circumstances, and the actors in them, are remembered, is singularly touching, from the contrast.

CHAP. VIII. 1–4.] PERSECUTION OF THE CHURCH BY SAUL, CONSEQUENT ON THE DEATH OF STEPHEN.

1. consenting] The same Greek word is rendered “allow” in Luke xi. 48: “have pleasure” in Rom. i. 32. Compare St. Paul's own confession, ch. xxvi. 9–11. From this time, the narrative takes up Saul, and, at with considerable interruptions (ch. viii. x. xi. xii.), but after ch. xiii. 1 entirely, follows his history.

in that day, can hardly mean, as some would render it, on that very day, viz. when Stephen was stoned. For what follows, “they were all scattered abroad”... cannot have happened on the same day, but would take some little time. We have the same expression used indefinitely, Luke vi. 23; John xiv. 20; xvi. 23, 26. In Luke xvii. 31, it has direct reference to a day just mentioned.

all] Not perhaps literally,—or some of them soon returned: see ch. ix. 26–30. It may describe the general dispersion, without meaning that every individual fled. Samaria] Connected with ver. 4: this word is not without importance, as introducing the next step in the dissemination of the Gospel, according to our Lord's command in ch. i.

except the apostles] Perhaps, from their exalted position of veneration by the people, the persecution did not extend to them: perhaps they remained, as possessed of superior firmness and devotion. But this latter reason is hardly applicable, after the command of our Lord ‘When they persecute you in one city, flee to another.’ Matt. x. 23. Stier refers their remaining to an intimation of the Spirit, to stay and strengthen those who were left. Mr. Humphry cites an ancient tradition, mentioned by Clement of Alexandria, and by Eusebius from the Apocryphal work called the Preaching of Peter, that the Apostles were ordered by our Lord to remain at Jerusalem twelve years. But this could not be the case, as we have Peter and John going down to Samaria, ver. 14.

2. devout men] Whether Jews or Christians, is not certain. Ananias is so called, ch. xxii. 12, and he was a Christian. Olshausen thinks that, if they had been Christians the term “brethren” would have been used: but this does not seem by any means certain: we can hardly reason so minutely from the diction of one section in the narrative to that of another, especially in the case of a section so distinct and peculiar as this one. Besides, “brethren” in this very general sense does not occur till ch. ix. 30. Probably they were pious Jews, not yet converts, but hearers and admirers of Stephen.

3. made havock of] The word so rendered is properly used of wild beasts or of hostile armies, devastating and ravaging.

4–12.] PREACHING OF THE GOSPEL IN SAMARIA BY PHILIP.

4.] So then resumes the subject dropped at the end of ver. 1, and determines this verse to be the opening of a new section, not the close of the former.

preaching the word] Here first we become acquainted with the missionary language so frequent in the rest of the book: and we have the word, an abbreviated expression very familiar among Christians when the book was written, for the fuller one which must have prevailed at first, “the word of God.”

5. Philip] The deacon: not one of the Twelve: this is precluded by vv. 1 and 14. And it is probable, that the persecution should have been directed especially against the colleagues of Stephen. Philip is mentioned again as the Evangelist,—probably from his having been the first recorded who preached (evangelized) the word,—in ch. xxi. 8,—as married, and having four daughters, virgins, who prophesied.

the city of Samaria] Verbatim as John iv. 5, in which case it is specified as being Sychar (Sichem). As the words stand here, seeing that Samaria (vv. 9, 14; ch. ix. 31; xv. 3) signifies the district, I should be inclined to believe that Syciem is here also intended. It was a place of rising importance, and in after-times eclipsed the fame of its neighbour Samaria, which latter had been, on its presentation by Augustus to Herod the Great, re-fortified and called Sebaste. It still, however, bore the name of Samaria.

6. gave heed...] If this place was Syciem, the narrative in John iv. will fully account for the readiness with which these people received ‘the proclamation of the Christ’

7.] According to the reading in the genuine text, which is too strongly upheld by manuscript authority to be rejected for the easier ordinary one, the literal rendering is as follows: For in the case of many who had unclean spirits, they crying out with a loud voice, came out. The A.V., though founded on a different reading, comes to the same.

9. Simon] Neander, in the course of some excellent remarks on this whole history (see further on ver. 14), identifies, and I believe with reason, this Simon with one mentioned as living from ten to twenty years after this by Josephus, and as having been employed by the procurator Felix to tempt Drusilla to leave her husband, and live with him. Simon is there called “a Jew, born in Cyprus, and held to be a magician.” The only difficulty seems to be, that Simon is stated by Justin Martyr, himself a Samaritan, to have been “a Samaritan, from a village called Gitton.” But it has struck me that either Justin, or perhaps more probably Josephus, may have confounded Ghittim with Chittim, i.e. Citium in Cyprus. The account in Josephus is quite in character with what we here read of Simon: not inconsistent with ver. 24, which appears to have been uttered under terror occasioned by the solemn denunciation of Peter.—Justin goes on to relate that he was worshipped as a god at Rome in the time of Claudius Cæsar, on account of his magical powers, and had a statue on the island in the Tiber, inscribed ‘Simoni Deo Sancto’ (to Simon the Holy God). Singularly enough, in the year 1574, a stone was found in the Tiber (or standing on the island in the year 1662, according to Smith’s Dictionary of Biography and Mythology), with the inscription SEMONI SANCO DEO FIDIO SACRUM, i.e. sacred to the god Semo Sancus, the Sabine Hereules;—which makes it probable that Justin may have been misled.—The history of Simon is full of legend and fable. He is said to have studied at Alexandria, and to have originally been, with the heresiarch Dositheus, a disciple of John the Baptist. Of Dositheus he became first the disciple, and then the successor. Origen makes Dositheus also a Samaritan, His own especial followers (Simoniani) had dwindled so much in the time of Origen, that he says there were at that day hardly thirty in the world. There are reports also of subsequent controversies between Simon Magus and Peter, of which the scene is laid at Cæsarea. According to some, he met with his death at Rome, having, during an encounter with Peter, raised himself into the air by the aid of evil spirits, and being precipitated thence at the prayer of Peter and Paul. I saw in the church of S. Francesca Romana, in the forum, a stone with two dents in it, and this inscription: “On this stone rested the knees of S. Peter, when the demons carried Simon Magus through the air.”—The fathers generally regard him as the founder of Gnosticism: this may be in some sense true: but, from the very little authentic information we possess, it is impossible to ascertain how far he was identified with their tenets. Origen distinctly denies that his followers were Christians in any sense.

using sorcery] viz. by exercising magic arts, such as then were very common in the East and found wide acceptance; impostors taking advantage of the very general expectation of a Deliverer at this time, to set themselves up by means of such trickeries as ‘some great ones.’ We have other examples in Elymas (ch. xiii.); Apollonius of Tyana; and somewhat later, Alexander of Abonoteichos; see these latter in Smith’s Dictionary of Biography and Mythology.

some great one] Probably not in such definite terms as his followers later are represented by Jerome as putting into his mouth: “I am the Word of God... I am the Paraclete, I am Almighty, I am all that is in God.”

10. the great power of God] Literally, according to the best MS. authorities, the power of God which is called great.

Neander and Meyer think that they must have referred to the Word, the creating and governing manifestation of God, so much spoken of in the Alexandrine philosophy, and must have regarded Simon as an incarnation of the Word; so that their erroneous belief would form some preparation for the great truth of an incarnate Messiah, preached by Philip. But to this De Wette well replies, that we can hardly suppose the Alexandrine philosophy to have been so familiar to the mass of the people; and refers the expression to their popular belief of a great angel, who might, as the angels were called by the Samaritans the powers of God, be designated by these remarkable words.

11.] The rendering “he had bewitched them” is grammatically wrong. The word rendered “bewitched” (which is perhaps the best translation here) is “amazed” in Matt. xii. 23,— “astonished” in Mark v. 42, Luke xxiv. 22&c.

13.] “Simon saw his followers dropping off, and was himself astounded at the miracles wrought by Philip: he therefore thought it best himself also to acknowledge this superior power. He attached himself to Philip, and was baptized like the rest: but we are not, as the sequel shews, to understand that the preaching of the Gospel had made any impression on his heart, but that he accounted for what he saw in his own fashion. He was convinced, from the works which Philip did, that he was in league with some powerful spirit: he viewed baptism as the initiation into communion with that spirit, and expected that he should be able to make use of the higher power thus gained for his own purposes, and unite this new magical power to his own. All were baptized who professed belief in Jesus as the Messiah: there was therefore no reason for rejecting Simon, considering besides, that from the nature of the case he would for the time have given up his magical practices.” Neander. “It is plain,” says Calvin, “from this example of Simon, that the grace which is figured in Baptism is not conferred on all indifferently. It is a dogma of the Papists, that unless a man place the bar of mortal sin in the way, all receive, with the outward sign, the verity and effect of the Sacraments. Thus they attribute a magical force to the Sacraments, making them profitable without faith. But it is for us to know, that we are offered by God in the Sacraments whatever the promises annexed to them contain, and this in no empty words merely, provided we are led by faith to Christ, and seek from Him what the Sacraments promise. For though the reception of Baptism was of no profit to him, as the matter stood, yet if his conversion had followed afterwards, as some think it did, in that case its profit was not extinguished nor abolished. For it often happens that it is a long time before the Spirit of God works, and causes the Sacraments to begin to prove their efficacy.”

14–25.] MISSION OF PETER AND JOHN TO SAMARIA. A question arises on this procedure of the Apostles:—whether it was as a matter of course, that the newly baptized should, by the laying on of hands subsequently, receive the Holy Ghost,—or whether there was in the case of these Samaritans any thing peculiar, which caused the Apostles to go down to them and perform this act. (1) The only analogous case is ch. xix. 5, 6: in using which we must observe that there it is distinctly asserted that the miraculous gifts of the Spirit followed the laying on of Paul’s hands; and that by the expression “when Simon saw” in ver. 18, which must be taken literally, the same is implied here. And on this point the remarks of Calvin are too important to be omitted: “Here a question arises. He says that they were only baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus, and consequently were not yet partakers of the Spirit. But either Baptism has no virtue and grace at all; or it has whatever efficacy it possesses from the Holy Spirit. In Baptism we are washed from sins: but Paul shews that this washing is the work of the Holy Ghost (Tit. iii. 5). The water of Baptism is the symbol of Christ’s blood: but Peter says that it is the Spirit by whom we are washed in the blood of Christ. In Baptism our old man is crucified that we may be raised into newness of life (Rom. vi. 6): whence is all this but by sanctification of the Spirit? So that Baptism will have nothing left, if it be dissociated from the Spirit. Therefore it must not be denied, that the Samaritans, who had duly put on Christ in Baptism, had been also invested with the Spirit (Gal. iii. 27). And indeed Luke here speaks, not of the ordinary grace of the Spirit by which God regenerates us as sons to Himself, but of those special gifts with which it was the Lord’s will to endow some persons in the beginning of the Gospel for the furnishing of the Kingdom of Christ.” And a little after: “The Papists, in their wish to extol their fictitious Confirmation, do not hesitate to go even so far as to utter this sacrilegious diction, that those are only half Christians, on whom hands have not yet been laid. It is intolerable that they should have fixed on the Church as a perpetual law, what was a mere temporal symbol... for even they themselves are obliged to confess, that the Church was only for a time adorned with those gifts. Whence it follows that the imposition of hands which the Apostles here performed, came to an end when its effect ceased.” The English church, in retaining the rite of Confirmation, has not grounded it on any institution by the Apostles, but merely declared the laying on of hands on the candidates, to certify them (by this sign) of God’s favour and goodness towards them, to be ‘after the example of the holy Apostles.’ Nor is there any trace in the office, of the conferring of the Holy Ghost by confirmation; but a distinct recognition of the former reception of the Holy Spirit (at Baptism), and a prayer for the increase of His influence, proportioned to the maturer life now opening on the newly confirmed. (2) If then we have here no institution of a perpetual ordinance, something peculiar to the case before us must have prompted this journey. And here again we have a question: Was that moving cause in the Samaritans, or in Philip? I believe the true answer to the question will be found by combining both. Our Lord’s command (ch. i. 8) had removed all doubt as to Samaria being a legitimate field for preaching, and Samaritan converts being admissible. (So also with regard to Gentile converts,—see ch. x., notes: but, as the church at this time believed, they must be circumcised, which the Samaritan already were,—and keep the law, which after their manner the Samaritans did.) The sudden appearance, however, of a body of baptized believers in Samaria, by the agency of one who was not one of the Apostles,—while it would excite in them every feeling of thankfulness and joy, would require their presence and power, as Apostles, to perform their especial part as the divinely appointed Founders of the Church. Add to this, that the Samaritans appear to have been credulous, and easily moved to attach themselves to individuals, whether it were Simon, or

Philip; which might make the Apostles desirous to be present in person, and examine, and strengthen their faith. Another reason may have been not without its influence: the Jewish church at Jerusalem would naturally for the most part be alienated in mind from this new body of believers. The hatred between Jews and Samaritans was excessive and unrelenting. It would therefore be in the highest degree important that it should be shewn to the church at Jerusalem, that these Samaritans, by the agency of the same Apostles, were partakers of the same visibly testified gifts of the one Spirit. The use of this argument, which was afterwards applied by Peter in the case of the Gentiles, unexpected even by himself, ch. xi. 17,—was probably no small part of the purpose of this journey to Samaria.

14. Peter and John] Perhaps two, in accordance with their having been sent out two and two on their first missionary journey (Mark vi. 7): so Paul and Barnabas afterwards (ch. xiii. 2): and the same principle seems to have been adhered to even when these last separated: Paul chose Silas, Barnabas took Mark.—PETER,—because to him belonged, in this early part of the gospel, in a remarkable manner, the first establishing of the church; it was the fulfilment of the promise “upon this rock I will build my church.” It was he who had (in common with all the Apostles, it is true, but in this early period more especially committed to him) the keys of the kingdom of heaven,—who opened the door to the 3000 on the day of Pentecost,—now (as a formal and ratifying act) to the Samaritans,—and in ch. x. to the Gentiles. So far, is plain truth of Scripture history. The monstrous fiction begins, when to Peter is attributed a fixed diocese and successors, and to those successors a delegated power more like that ascribed to Simon Magus than that promised to Peter.—This is the last time that JOHN appears in the Acts. He is only once more mentioned in the New Testament (except in the Revelation), viz. as having been present in Jerusalem at Paul’s visit, Gal. ii. 9.

15. prayed for them] So laying on of hands is preceded by prayer, ch. vi. 6; xiii. 3.

18. when Simon saw] Its effects were therefore visible (see above), and consequently the effect of the laying on of the Apostles’ hands was not the inward but the outward miraculous gifts of the Spirit.

he offered them money] De Wette excellently remarks, ‘He regarded the capability of imparting the Holy Spirit,—rightly, as something conferred, as a derived power (see Matt. x. 1), but wrongly, as one to be obtained by an external method, without an inward disposition: and, since in external commerce every thing may be had for gold, he wanted to buy it. This is the essence of the sin of Simony, which is intimately connected with unbelief in the power and signification of the Spirit, and with materialism.’—Clearly, from the narrative, Simon himself did not receive the Spirit by the laying on of hands. His nefarious attempt to treat with the Apostles was before he himself had been presented to them for this purpose.

20.] The solemn denunciation of Peter, like the declaration of Paul, 1 Cor. vi. 13, has reference to the perishableness of all worldly good, and of those with it, whose chief end is the use of it (see Col. ii. 22). ‘Thy gold and thou are equally on the way to corruption:’ thy gold, as its nature is: thou with it, as having no higher life than thy natural corrupt one: as being bound in the bond of iniquity. The expression of the same Peter, 1 Pet. i. 7, “gold that perisheth,” is remarkably parallel with this (see too 1 Pet. i. 18).

thou thoughtest] not ‘thou hast thought’, as A.V. The historic force of the tense is to be kept here: the Apostle uses it as looking forward to the day of his destruction, ‘Let thy lot be destruction, and that because thou thoughtest,’ &c.

to acquire, not passive, as A.V., ungrammatically.

21. neither part nor lot] The two words are apparently synonymous: the first being literal, the second figurative, but not without reference perhaps to the inheritance of the kingdom of God, the incorruptible inheritance, 1 Pet. i. 4.

this matter] i.e. the matter now spoken of,—‘to which I now allude.’

thy heart is not right,—sincere, single-meaning,—in God's presence, ‘as God sees it:’ i.e. ‘seen as it really is, by God, is not in earnest in its seeking after the gospel, but seeks it with unworthy ends in view.’

22. if perhaps] The uncertainty refers, not to the doubt whether Simon would repent or not (see below): but as to whether or not his sin may not have come under the awful category of those unpardonable ones specified by our Lord, Matt. xii. 31, to which words this sentence seems to have a tacit reference. Peter does not pronounce his sin to have been such, but throws in this doubt, to increase the motive to repent, and the earnestness of his repentance. This verse is important, taken in connexion with John xx. 23, as shewing how completely the Apostles themselves referred the forgiveness of sins to, and left it in, the sovereign power of God, and not to their own delegated power of absolution.

23.] For gives the reason, not why it would be difficult for forgiveness to take place, but why he had such extreme need of repentance and prayer, as being tied and bound by the chain of sin.

the gall of bitterness] See Deut. xxix. 18; Lam. iii. 15,—‘the gall which is the very seat and essence of bitterness’—a very gall of bitterness. The poison of serpents was considered to be seated in their gall: so “the gall of asps is within him,” Job xx. 14.

24.] Simon speaks here much as Pharaoh, Exod. (viii. 28; ix. 28) x. 17,—who yet hardened his heart afterwards. It is observable also that he wishes merely for the averting of the punishment. The words, “that none of the things which ye have spoken come upon me,” seem remarkably to set forth the mere terror of the carnal man, without any idea of the man becoming another man in thoughts and aims.

25–40.] Conversion of THE AETHIOPIAN EUNUCH BY PHILIP’S TEACHING.

25.] So then indicates (see note on ver. 4) that the paragraph should begin here, not at ver. 26 as commonly.

villages of the Samaritans] It is interesting to recall Luke ix. 52, where on their entering into a village of the Samaritans, the same John wishes to call down fire from heaven, and consume them. The gradual sowing of the seed further and further from Jerusalem is advancing: not only is this eunuch to carry it to a far distant land, but Philip is sent to a desert road, away from town or village, to seek him. The imperfect tenses, “were returning&c.,” are significant. They were on their way back to Jerusalem, and were evangelizing the Samaritan villages, when the angel spake to Philip.

26.] An angel, visibly appearing: not in a dream,—which is not, as some suppose, implied by the command to arise. The ministration of angels introduces and brings about several occurrences in the beginning of the church, see ch. v. 19; x. 3; xii. 7 (xxvii. 23). The appearance seems to have taken place in Samaria, after the departure of Peter and John. He would reach the place appointed by a shorter way than through Jerusalem: he would probably follow the high road (of the itineraries, see map in Conybeare and Howson’s St. Paul) as far as Gophna, and thence strike across the country south-westward to join, at some point to which he would be guided, the road leading from Jerusalem to Gaza.

GAZA] The southernmost city of Canaan (Gen. x. 19), in the portion of Judah (Josh. xv. 47), but soon taken from that tribe by the Philistines, and always spoken of as a Philistine city (1 Sam. vi. 17; 2 Kings xviii. 8; Amos i. 6–8; Zeph. iii. 4; Zech. ix. 5). In Jer. xlvi. 1, we have ‘before Pharaoh (Necho?) smote Gaza,’—implying that at one time it was under Egypt. Alexander the Great took it after a siege of five months, but did not destroy it, for we find it a strong place in the subsequent Syrian wars, see 1 Macc. ix. 52; xi. 61 f.; xiii. 43; xiv. 7; xv. 28; xvi. 1.—It was destroyed by the Jewish king Alexander Jannaens (96 A.C.), after a siege of a year, but rebuilt again by the Roman general Gabinius,—afterwards given by Augustus to Herod, and finally after his death attached to the province of Syria, Mela, in the time of Claudius, calls it ‘a vast city, and strongly fortified,’ with which agree Eusebius and Jerome. At present it is a large town by the same name, with from 15,000 to 16,000 inhabitants. The above chronological notices shew that it cannot have been “desert” at this time: see below.

this is desert] The words, I believe, of the angel, not of St. Luke. There appear to have been two (if not more) ways from Jerusalem to Gaza. But Robinson found, besides, an ancient road leading direct from Jerusalem to Gaza, through the Wadi Musurr, and over the Beit Jiibrin, which certainly at present is “desert,” without towns or villages. Thus the words will refer to the way: and denote, the way of which I speak to thee is desert. See in my Greek Test. further proofs of the inapplicability of the epithet “desert” to Gaza.

27. an eunuch] The very general use of eunuchs in the East for filling offices of confidence, and the fact that this man was minister to a female sovereign, makes it probable that he was literally an eunuch. If not so, the word would hardly have been expressed. No difficulty arises from Deut. xxiii. 1, for no inference can be drawn from the history further than that he may have been a proselyte of the gate, in whose case the prohibition would not apply.—Nay, the whole occurrence seems to have had one design, connected with this fact. The walls of partition were one after another being thrown down: the Samaritans were already in full possession of the Gospel: it was next to be shewn that none of those physical incapacities which excluded from the congregation of the Lord under the old covenant, formed any bar to Christian baptism and the inheritance among believers; and thus the way gradually to be paved for the great and as yet incomprehensible truth of Gal. iii. 28.

Candace (pronounced Candacé, not Candacé)] As Pharaoh among the Egyptians was the customary name of kings, so Candacé of the queens among the Aethiopians in upper Egypt, who dwelt in the island of Meroe, where Pliny relates that a queen reigned named Candace, and adds, “which name has now for many years passed from one queen to another.”

had come to Jerusalem for to worship...] This did not only Jews and proselytes, but also those pious Gentiles who adhered to Judaism,—the proselytes of the gate, see John xii. 20. Eusebius, taking for granted that this eunuch was a Gentile, calls him “the firstfruits of the Gentiles throughout the world.” There were (see below, ch. xi. 21) cases of Gentile conversion before that of Cornelius; and the stress of the narrative in ch. x. consists in the miscellaneous admission of all the Gentile company of Cornelius, and their official reception into the church by that Apostle to whom was especially given the power. We may remark, that if even the plain revelation by which the reception of Cornelius and his company was commanded failed finally to convince Peter, so that long after this he vacillated (Gal. ii. 11, 12), it is no argument for the eunuch not being a Gentile, that his conversion and baptism did not remove the prejudices of the Jewish Christians.

28. read Esaias] aloud, see next ver. Schöttgen quotes from the Rabbis: “He who journeyeth and hath no companion, let him study the Law.”—He probably read in the LXX, the use of which was almost universal in Egypt.

29.) This is the first mention of that inner prompting of the Spirit, referred to again probably ch. xiii. 2, but certainly ch. x. 19; xvi. 6, 7. Chrysostom understands the words of the appearance of an angel, but the text hardly allows it.

30.) Yea, but....: i.e. “It is well, thou art well employed: but....?” The form of the question assumes, modestly, that he did not understand what he was reading.

31.] For (see margin) gives the reason of the negative which is understood. The answer expresses at once humility and docility.

32.] Perhaps it is best to render, The contents of the (passage of) Scripture which he was reading were as follows.

33.] This stands in the Hebrew ‘He was taken away by distress and judgment’ (so in the margin of the A.V.): i.e. as Lowth, ‘by an oppressive judgment.’

his generation] i.e. the age in which he shall live—‘the wickedness of his contemporaries.’ The fathers, and Bede and some modern Commentators, explain ‘His generation’ of His eternal Sonship and His miraculous Incarnation. But the Hebrew does not seem to bear this out.

34. answered] to the passage of Scripture, considered as the question proposed: not, to the question in ver. 30. We can hardly suppose any immediate reference in the words some other man, to Christ.

86. a certain water] Traditions about the situation of this spring are found in some ancient notes to Jerome. It is said to be near a place named Bethsur. Eusebius states it to be twenty miles south of Jerusalem in the direction of Hebron: and so it is set down in the ancient itineraries. Pocock found there a fountain built over, and a village called Betur on the left. Fabri describes the fountain as the head of a considerable brook, and found near it the ruins of a Christian church. There is no improbability in the tradition, except that, even supposing a way going across from Hebron straight to Gaza to be called desert, this would not be on that portion of it, but on the high road.

what doth hinder me to be baptized?] There is no reason for supposing Philip to have preached to him the necessity of baptism: his own acquaintance with Jewish practices, and perhaps his knowledge of the progress of the new faith in Jerusalem, would account for the proposition.

37.) The authorities against this verse are too strong to permit its insertion. It appears to have been one of those remarkable additions to the text of the Acts, common in some of even our earliest MSS., few of which, however, have found their way into the revised text. This insertion is found as early as Irenæus (Century II.), who quotes it. It appears to have been made to suit the formularies of the baptismal liturgies, it being considered strange that the eunuch should have been baptized without some such confession.

38. he (viz. the eunuch) commanded] Some of our MSS., whose text apparently Jerome followed, read here, ‘the Spirit fell on the eunuch, and an angel of the Lord caught away Philip.’ This is curious, and has probably arisen from a desire to conform the results of the eunuch’s baptism to the usual method of the divine procedure, and the snatching away of Philip to his commission, ver. 26. But the Spirit did not fall on the Samaritans after baptism by Philip.—The text clearly relates a supernatural disappearance of Philip: compare 2 Kings ii. 16; no interpretation of his being suddenly hurried away by the prompting of the Spirit, will satisfy the analogy of the above-cited passage, and of (see below) a parallel one in St. Luke’s own Gospel.

39. saw him no more] Not ‘never saw him from that day,’ though (see below) that meaning may be indirectly included:—but as in Luke xxiv. 31, “He vanished from their sight,” and as in the strictly parallel words of 2 Kings ii. 12, “he saw him no more,”—after the going up of Elijah. These last words in my view decide the question, that the departure of Philip was miraculous.

for he went on his way] This refers to what follows:—Philip was found at Azotus: if the eunuch had gone that way, he might have met with him again: but he did not, for he went from the fountain on his own way, which did not lead through Azotus.

There has been some strange inadvertence in this verse on the part of the translators of the A.V. The Greek has plainly, and the eunuch saw him no more, for he went on his way rejoicing; and there is no variety of reading.

40.] The term “was found” again appears to refer to 4 Kings ii. ver. 17.—AZOTUS or ASHDOD (Josh. xiii. 3; 1 Sam. v. 5 al.) was one of the five principal cities of the Philistines, never, though nominally in Judah, thoroughly subjugated by the Jews: it was taken by Tartan the Assyrian general (Isa. xx. 1),—again by Psammetichus, Jer. xxv. 20,—again by Judas Maccabæus (1 Macc. v. 68) and Jonathan (1 Macc. x. 84), and the latter destroyed;—rebuilt by Gabinius, and belonged to the kingdom of Herod, who left it in his will to his sister Salome. At present it is a small village, retaining the name Esdud, but there are no remains.

all the cities] viz. Ekron, Jamnia, Joppa, Apollonia, on the direct road: or, if he deviated somewhat for the purpose, Lydda also (which seems implied ch. ix. 32).

Cæsarea] See note, ch. x. 1.

CHAP. IX. 1–30.] CONVERSION OF SAUL.

1.] The narrative is taken up from ch. viii. 3, but probably with some interval, sufficient perhaps to cover the events of ch. viii.

We should perhaps hardly render the original word here, as the A.V., “breathing out,”—but breathing; his ‘spirit,’ inhaled or exhaled, being threatenings and slaughter.

the high priest] See table in Introduction to Acts;—it would be Theophilus,—brother and successor to Jonathan, who succeeded Caiaphas.

2. letters] of authorization: written by the high priest (in this case, but not always, president of the Sanhedrim) in the name of the whole estate of the elders, ch. xxii. 5.

to Damascus] DAMASCUS is probably the oldest existing city in the world. We read of it in Abraham’s time (Gen. xiv. 15; xv. 2): then no more till David subdued it (2 Sam. viii. 6); it became independent again under Solomon (1 Kings xi. 24 ff.), and from that time was the residence of the kings of Syria (1 Kings xv. 18; xx. 1 ff.), who were long at war with Israel and Judah, and at last were permitted to prevail considerably over Israel (2 Kings x. 32; Amos i. 3, 4) and to exact tribute from Judah (2 Kings xii. 17, 18, see also 2 Kings xiii. 3, 22, 25). Damascus was recovered to Israel by Jeroboam II. (about 825 A.C. 2 Kings xiv. 28). Not long after we find Rezin, king of Syria, in league with Pekah, king of Israel, against Ahaz (2 Kings xv. 37). Ahaz invited to his assistance Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, who took Damascus and slew Rezin, and led the people captive (2 Kings xvi. 5–9; Isa. viii. 4). From this time we find it subject to Assyria (Isa. ix. 11; x. 9; xvii. 1), then to Babylon (2 Kings xxiv. 2; Jer. xxxv. 11),—Persia, the Syrian Seleucidae (1 Macc. xi. 62; xii. 32),—and from the time of Pompey (64 A.C.), to the Romans, and attached to the province of Syria. Many Jews were settled there, and the majority of the wives of the citizens were proselytes.—On its subjection to Aretas, see below, ver. 24, note. It was later the residence of the Ommiad Caliphs, and the metropolis of the Mahomedan world. At present it is a large city, with 250, 000 inhabitants, nearly 70, 000 of whom are Christians.—It is situated most beautifully, in a large and well-watered plain, on the river Chrysorrhœas (Barrada), which divides into many streams (see 2 Kings v. 12), and fertilizes the plain:—and is bounded on all sides by the desert. See a vivid description of Damascus in Conybeare and Howson’s Life of St. Paul, vol. i. pp. 104–108.

to the synagogues] i.e. to the presidents of the synagogues, who would acknowledge the orders of the Sanhedrim, and could, under the authority of the Ethnarch, carry them out.

of the way] Not ‘of this way,’ A.V., which rendering should be kept for the places where the pronoun is expressed, as ch. xxii. 4,—but of the way, viz. of ‘salvation,’ ch. xvi. 17, or ‘of the Lord,’ ch. xviii. 25. The expression ‘THE WAY’ had evidently become a well-known one among Christians (see in this edition ch. xix. 9, 23; xxii. 4; xxiv. 14, 22); and it only was necessary to prefix the pronoun when strangers were addressed.—The special journey to Damascus presupposes the existence of Christians there, and in some numbers. This would be accounted for by the return of many who may have been converted at the Pentecostal effusion of the Spirit, and perhaps also by some of the fugitives from the persecution having settled there. This latter is rendered probable by Ananias’s words, “I have heard from many of this man,” ver. 13.

3.] The journey from Jerusalem was probably made on the Roman road, i.e. that of the Itineraries, by Neapolis (Sichem) and Scythopolis, crossing the Jordan, south of the lake Tiberias,—Gadara, and so to Damascus. Or he might have joined,—either the Petra road, by Jericho and Heshbon, and so by Botsrah to Damascus,—or the Egyptian caravan-track, which passes to the north of the lake of Tiberias, and near Cæsarea Philippi. In either case the journey would occupy from five to six days, the distance being 130 to 150 miles.

there shined round about him...] It was (ch. xxii. 6) about noonday; and from ch. xxvi. 13, the light was above the brightness of the sun. These details at once cut away all ground from the absurd rationalistic attempt to explain away the appearance as having been lightning. Unquestionably, the inference is, that it was a bright noon, and the full splendour of the Oriental sun was shining.—His companions saw the light, and were also cast to the ground, ch. xxvi. 13, 14; xxii. 9: see below on ver. 7.

4. a voice saying unto him] in the Hebrew language, ch. xxvi. 14.

why persecutest thou me?] A remarkable illustration of Matt. xxv. 45. No stress should be laid on me; but the very lack of emphasis, assuming the awful fact, gives more solemnity to the question.

5.] That Saul saw, as well as heard, Him who spoke with him, is certain from Ananias's speech, ver. 17, and ch. xxii. 14,—that of Barnabas, ver. 27,—from ch. xxvi. 16 (‘I [have] appeared unto thee’), and from the references by Paul himself to his having seen the Lord, 1 Cor. ix. 1; xv. 8. These last I unhesitatingly refer to this occasion, and not to any subsequent one, when he saw the Lord in a trance, ch. xxii. 17. Such appearances could hardly form the subject of the testimony of an eyewitness which should rank with that of the other apostles: this, on the contrary, was no trance, but the real bodily appearance of the risen Jesus; so that it might be adduced as the ground of testimony to His Resurrection.—On the words excluded from our text, as having been interpolated from ch. xxvi. 14, and xxii. 10, see note at xxvi. 14. It is natural that the account of the historian should be less precise than that of the person concerned, relating his own history. In ch. xxvi. 15–18, very much more is related to have been said by the Lord: but perhaps he there, as he omits the subsequent particulars, includes the revelations made to him during the three days, and in the message of Ananias.

7.] In ch. xxii. 9, we read, “They that were with me saw indeed the light, and were afraid: but they heard not the voice of him that spake to me.” Two accounts seemingly (and certainly, in the letter) discrepant; but exceedingly instructive when their spirit is compared,—the fact being this: that the companions of Saul saw and were struck to the ground by the light, but saw no person:—that they stood (I should acknowledge the discrepancy here, and recognize the more accurate detail of ch. xxvi. 14, that they fell to the ground) mute, hearing the sound of the voice, but not the words spoken and their meaning. Compare John xii. 29, note. Two classes of readers only will stumble at this difference of the forms of narration; those who from enmity to the faith are striving to create or magnify discrepancies,—and those who, by the suicidal theory of verbal inspiration, are effectually doing the work of the former. The devout and intelligent student of Scripture will see in such examples a convincing proof of the simple truth of the narrative,—the absence of all endeavour to pare aware apparent inconsistencies or revise them into conformity,—the bonâ fide work of holy truthful men, bearing each his testimony to things seen and heard under the guidance, not of the spirit of bondage, but of that Spirit of whom it is said, “where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty.”—I should not too hastily determine that this account has not come from Saul himself, on account of the above differences: they are no more than might arise in narrations at different times by the same person.

8.] When his eyes were opened (it would seem that he had closed them on the first disappearance of the vision), he saw no one. He explains it, ch. xxii. 11, “when I could not see for the glory of that light.” He had seen, what those with him had not seen, the glorious Person of the Lord Jesus. See below on ver. 18.

9. he neither did eat nor drink] There is no occasion to soften these words; the effect produced on him by the heavenly vision (ch. xxvi. 19), aided by his own deeply penitent and remorseful state of mind, rendered him indifferent to all sustenance whatever.

10.] Paul adds, ch. xxii. 12, with particularity, as defending himself before the Jews, that Ananias was “a devout man according to the law, having a good report of all the Jews which dwelt there:” saying nothing of the command received by him, nor that he was a disciple. In ch. xxvi., speaking before the Roman governor, he does not mention him.—Mr. Howson remarks on the close analogy between the divine procedure by visions here, and in ch. x. Here, Ananias is prepared for his work, and Saul for the reception of him as a messenger, each by a vision: and similarly Peter and Cornelius in ch. x. I may add, that in ch. viii., where the preparation of heart was already found in the eunuch, Philip only was supernaturally prepared for the interview.

11.] “We are allowed to bear in mind that the thoroughfares of Eastern cities do not change, and to believe that the ‘straight street,’ which still extends through Damascus in long perspective from the eastern gate, is the street where Ananias spoke to Saul.” (Conybeare and Howson, p. 115.)

the house of Juda s] The houses of Ananias and Judas are still shewn to travellers. Doubtless they (or at least the former) would long be remembered and pointed out by Christians; but, in the long degradation of Christianity in the East, most of such identities must have been lost; and imposture is so easy, that it is hardly possible to cherish the thought that the spots now pointed out can be the true ones. And so of all cases, where we have not unalterable or unaltered data to go on. Still, true as this is, we have sometimes proofs and illustrations unexpectedly appearing, as research goes on, which identify as authentic, sites long pointed out by tradition. So that our way seems to be, to seek for all such elucidations, and meantime to suspend our judgment: but never to lose sight of, nor to treat contemptuously at first sight, a local belief.

of Tarsus] The first place where he is so specified.—TARSUS was the capital of the province of Cilicia, a large and populous city in a fruitful plain on the river Cydnus, which flowed through the midst of it, with a swift stream of remarkably cold water. Strabo speaks most highly of its eminence in schools of philosophy; and says that they excelled those even of Athens and Alexandria. He enumerates many learned men who had sprung from it. It was a “free city,” i.e. one which, though under Rome, lived under its own laws and chose its own magistrates. This freedom was granted to it by Antony: and much later we find it a Roman colony. It is now a town with about 20, 000 inhabitants, and is described as being a den of poverty, filth, and ruins. There are many remains of the old town.

behold, he prayeth] This word would set before Ananias, more powerfully than any other, the state of Saul.

12. a man named Ananias] A man, whose name in the same vision he knew to be Ananias. The sight of the man and the knowledge of his name were both granted him in his vision.

13. thy saints] This is the first time that this afterwards well-known appellation occurs as applied to the believers in Christ.

14.] It could hardly fail to have been notified to the Christians at Damascus by their brethren at Jerusalem, that Saul was on his way to persecute them.

15. a vessel of choice] i.e. a chosen vessel: as we say, ‘the man of his choice.’ St. Paul often uses this word vessel in a similar meaning, see 2 Cor. iv. 7; 1 Thess. iv. 4; 2 Tim. ii. 21; and especially Rom. ix. 22, 23, &c., where it is used in illustrating God’s sovereign power in election.

to bear, perhaps in reference to the metaphor in vessel.

nations] i.e. the Gentiles. This would hardly be understood at the time: it was afterwards on a remarkable occasion repeated to Paul by the Lord in a vision (see ch. xxii. 21), and was regarded by him as the specific command which gave the direction to his ministry, see Gal. ii. 7, 8.

kings] Agrippa, and probably Nero.

16. I will shew him...] The fulfilment of this is testified by Paul himself, ch. xx. 23, 25: see also xxi. 11.

17. and he filled with the Holy Ghost] I can hardly think that these words imply that the Lord had said to Ananias more than is above related: I would rather view them as a natural inference from what was said in ver. 15.—In ch. xxii. 14, where the command to Ananias is omitted, his speech contains much of the reason given in the command here. It is remarkable again how Paul, speaking there to an infuriated Jewish mob, gives the words spoken just that form which would best gain him a favourable hearing with them,—for example, “the God of our fathers,”—“to see that Just One,” “all men,” avoiding as yet the hateful word “Gentiles.” He there too gives, “Arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins, calling upon the name of the Lord,” as part of the exhortation of Ananias.

18. as it had been scales] The recovery of sight is plainly related as miraculous, the consequence of the divinely-appointed laying on of the hands of Ananias. And this scaly substance which fell from his eyes was thrown off in the process of the instantaneous healing.

was baptized] It has been well remarked by Olshausen, that great honour was here placed upon the sacrament of baptism, inasmuch as not even Saul, who had seen the Lord in special revelation and was an elect vessel, was permitted to dispense with this, the Lord’s appointed way of admission into His Church.

19. certain days] A few days; of quiet, and becoming acquainted with those as brethren, whom he came to persecute as infidels: but not to learn from them the gospel (for this he did not receive from man, neither was he taught it, Gal i. 12), nor was the time longer than to admit of straightway being used, ver. 20,—and indeed the same word is used of the whole space (including his preaching in our vv. 20, 21) preceding the journey to Arabia, in Gal. i. 16. See below.

20. he preached Jesus] The alteration to “Christ” has probably, as Meyer suggests, been made from doctrinal considerations, to fix on “the Son of God” the theological sense,—that Christ is the Son of God—instead of that which it now bears,—that Jesus is the Son of God, i.e. that Jesus of Nazareth, as a matter of fact, is the Son of God, i.e. the Messiah expected under that appellation.

21.] had come hither, implying the abandonment of the purpose.

22.] I regard the expression Saul increased the more in strength, as the only words beneath which can lie concealed the journey to Arabia. Paul mentions this journey (Gal. i. 17) with no obscure hint that it was to be assigned the reception by him, in full measure, of the Gospel which he preached. And such a reception would certainly give rise to the great accession of power here recorded. I am the more disposed to allot that journey this place, from the following considerations. The omission of any mention of it here can arise only from one of two causes: (1) whether Paul himself were the source of the narrative, or some other narrator,—the intentional passing over of it, as belonging more to his personal history (which it was his express purpose to relate in Gal. i.) than to that of his ministry: (2) on the supposition of Paul not having been the source of the narrative,—the narrator having not been aware of it. In either case, this expression seems to me one very likely to have been used:—(1) if the omission was intentional,—to record a remarkable accession of power to Saul's ministry, without particularizing whence or how it came: (2) if it was unintentional,—as a simple record of that which was observed in him, but of which the course was to the narrator unknown.

confounded the Jews which dwelt at Damascus] Chrysostom strikingly says, “Being learned in their law, he stopped their mouths and suffered them not to speak: they thought that they had got rid of such arguments in getting rid of Stephen, and behold they found another arguer more powerful than Stephen.”

23. many days] In Damascus, see above on ver. 19. The whole time, from his conversion to his journey to Jerusalem, was three years, Gal. i. 18.

took counsel to kill him] “The Jews again have recourse to the logic of force. They no longer seek for suborned men, and false accusers and false witnesses.” Chrysostom.

24.] In 2 Cor. xi. 32, St. Paul writes, “In Damascus the governor under Arētas the king kept the city of the Damascenes with a garrison, desirous to apprehend me.” A somewhat difficult chronological question arises respecting the subordination of Damascus to this Arētas. The city, under Augustus and Tiberius, was attached to the province of Syria: and we have coins of Damascus of both these emperors, and again of Nero and his successors. But we have none of Caligula and Claudius; and the following circumstances seem to point to a change in the rulership of Damascus at the death of Tiberius. There had been for some time war between Aretas, king of Arabia Nabatæa (whose capital was Petra), and Herod Antipas, on account of the divorce by Herod of Aretas' daughter at the instance of Herodias, and on account of some disputes about their frontiers. A battle was fought, and Herod's army entirely destroyed. On this Antipas, who was a favourite with Tiberius, sent to Rome for help: and Vitellius, the governor of Syria, was commissioned to march against Aretas, and take him, dead or alive. While on his march, he heard at Jerusalem of the death of Tiberius (March 16, A.D. 37), and no longer being able to carry out his intended war, on account of the change of the supreme power from Tiberius to Caligula, abandoned his march, and sent his army into their winter quarters, himself returning to Antioch. This change of the supreme power brought about a great change in the situation of Antipas and his enemy. Antipas was soon (A. D. 39) banished to Lyons, and his kingdom given to Agrippa, his foe (Antt. xviii. 7. 2), who had been living in habits of intimacy with the new emperor. It would be natural that Aretas, who had been grossly injured by Antipas, should by this change of affairs, be received into favour; and the more so, as there was an old grudge between Vitellius and Antipas, of which Josephus says, he concealed his anger until the reign of Caligula, when he followed it up. Now in the year 38 Caligula made several changes in the East, granting Ituræa to Soæmus, Lesser Armenia and parts of Arabia to Cotys, the territory of Cotys to Rhæmetalces,—and to Polemon, the son of Polemon, his father's government. These facts, coupled with that of no Damascene coins of Caligula and Claudius existing (which might be fortuitous, but acquires force when thus combined), make it probable that about this time Damascus, which belonged to the predecessors of Aretas, was granted to Aretas by Caligula. This would at once solve the difficulty. The other suppositions,—that the Ethnarch was only visiting the city (as if he could then have guarded the city to prevent Paul's escape),—or that Aretas had seized Damascus on Vitellius giving up the expedition against him (as if a Roman governor of a province would, while waiting for orders from a new emperor, quietly allow one of its chief cities to be taken from him),—are in the highest degree improbable.

25.] Further particularized by the addition of “through a window,” 2 Cor. xi. 33. Such windows in the walls of cities are common in the East: see Josh. ii. 15: and an engraving of part of the present wall of Damascus in Conybeare and Howson's Life of St. Paul, i.p. 124.

in a basket] The word here is the same as in Matt. xv. 37, where see note.

26.] He went to Jerusalem immediately: the purpose of this journey was to become acquainted with Peter, Gal. i. 18: a resolution probably taken during the conspiracy of the Jews against him at Damascus, and in furtherance of his announced mission to the Gentiles: that, by conference with the Apostles, his sphere of work might be agreed on. And this purpose his escape enabled him to effect.

27.] It is very probable that Barnabas and Saul may have been personally known to each other in youth. "Cyprus is only a few hours' sail from Cilicia. The schools of Tarsus may naturally have attracted one who, though a Levite, was a Hellenist: and there the friendship may have begun, which lasted through many vicissitudes, till it was rudely interrupted in the dispute at Antioch (ch. xv. 39)." Conybeare and Howson, edn. 2, i.p. 127.

brought him to the apostles] Only to Peter and James the Lord's brother, Gal. i. 18, 19. Probably there were no other Apostles there at the time: if there were, it is hardly conceivable that Saul should not have seen them. On his second visit, he saw John also (Gal. ii. 9). Perhaps he never saw in the flesh any other of the Apostles after his conversion.

29. the Grecian Jews] See ch. vi. 1 and note. This he did, partly, we may infer, to avoid the extreme and violent opposition which he would immediately encounter from the Jews themselves,—but partly also, it may well be believed, because he himself in the synagogues of the Hellenists had opposed Stephen formerly.

30. Which when the brethren knew....] There was also another reason. He was praying in the temple, and saw the Lord in a vision, who commanded him to depart, for they would not receive his testimony:—and sent him from thence to the Gentiles: see ch. xxii, 17–21 and notes. His stay in Jerusalem at this visit was fifteen days, Gal. i. 18.

to Cæsarea] From the whole cast of the sentence, and the words brought him down and sent him forth, we should infer this to be Cæsarea Stratonis (see on ch. x. 1), even if this were not determined by the word Cæsarea used absolutely, which always applies to this city, and not to Cæsarea Philippi (which some believe to be meant: see Matt. xvi. 13 and note). From Gal. i. 21, it would appear that Saul about this time traversed Syria (on his way to Tarsus?). If so, he probably went by sea to Seleucia, and thence to Antioch. The expression sent him forth, looks more like a 'sending off' by sea, than a mere 'sending forward' by land. They sent him towards, 'for,' Tarsus. He was not idle there, but certainly preached the Gospel, and in all probability was the founder of the churches alluded to ch. xv. 23 and 41.

31.] FLOURISHING STATE OF THE CHURCH IN PALESTINE AT THIS TIME. Commencement of new section: compare note, ch. xi. 19. The reading church, instead of "churches," can hardly (as Meyer) be an alteration to suit the idea of the unity of the church,—as in that case we should have similar alterations in ch. xv. 41; xvi. 5, where no variations are found in the chief MSS. More probably, it has been altered here to conform it to those places. This description probably embraces most of the time since the conversion of Saul. De Wette observes, that the attention of the Jews was, during much of this time, distracted from the Christians, by the attempt of Caligula to set up his image in the temple at Jerusalem, related by Josephus.

being built up, or edified: see Matt. xvi. 18. It probably refers to both external and internal strength and accession of grace. St. Paul commonly uses it of spiritual building up: see 1 Cor. viii, 1; x. 23; xiv. 4, 17; 1 Thess. v. 11.

and was multiplied by the exhortation of (i. e. inspired by) the Holy Spirit] This is the only rendering which suits the usage of the words. See on the others which have been given, in my Greek Testament.

32–35.] HEALING OF ÆNEAS AT LYDDA BY PETER. This and the following miracle form the introduction to the very important portion of Peter's history which follows in ch. x.,—by bringing him and his work before us again.

32. as Peter passed throughout all....] These words are aptly introduced by the notice in ver. 31, which shews that Peter's journey was not an escape from persecution, but undertaken at a time of peace, and for the purpose of visiting the churches.—The word all, to which no substantive is supplied in the original, may be neuter, 'all parts:' but it is probably masculine, and "all the saints" or "all the brethren" are understood. As I have implied on ver. 31, this journey of Peter's is not necessarily consecutive on the events of vv. 1–30. But an alternative presents itself here; either it took place before the arrival of Saul in Jerusalem, or after his departure: for Peter was there during his visit (Gal. i. 18). It seems most likely that it was before his arrival. For (1) it is St. Luke's manner in this first part of the Acts, where he is carrying on several histories together, to follow the one in hand as far as some resting-point, and then go back and take up another: see ch. viii. 2 thus taken up from ver. 1: ver. 4 going back to the dispersion:—ch. ix. 1 taken up from viii. 3:—xi. 19, from viii. 4 again:—and (2) the journey of Peter to visit the churches which were now resting after the persecution would hardly be delayed so long as three whole years. So that it is most natural to place this section, viz. ch. ix. 32–xi. 18 (for all this is continuous), before the visit of Saul to Jerusalem, and during his stay at Damascus or in Arabia. See further on xi. 19.

Lydda] Called Lod, Neh. vii. 37.—A large village near Joppa (ver. 38), on the Mediterranean, just one day's journey from Jerusalem. It afterwards became the important town of Diospolis.

33. Æneas] Whether a believer or not, does not appear; from Peter's visit being to the saints, it would seem that he was: but perhaps the indefinite term, a certain man, may imply the contrary, as also Peter's words, announcing a free and unexpected gift from One whom he knew not.

35. all that dwelt in L. and S. saw him;—which also (this is the literal rendering, and is equivalent to and they) turned to the Lord] A general conversion of the inhabitants to the faith followed.

Saron] Perhaps not a village, but the celebrated plain of that name [Sharon], extending along the coast from Cæsarea to Joppa, see Isa. xxxiii. 9; xxxv. 2; lxv. 10; Cant. ii. 1; 1 Chron. xxvii. 29. Mariti mentions a village Saren between Lydda and Arsuf (see Josh. xii. 18, marg. A.V.): but more recent travellers do not notice it.

36–43.] RAISING OF TABITHA FROM THE DEAD.

36. at Joppa] Joppa was a very ancient Philistine city, on the frontier of Dan, but not belonging to that tribe, Josh. xix. 46; on the coast (ch. x. 6), with a celebrated but not very secure harbour: (see 2 Chron. ii. 16; Ezra iii. 7; Jonah i. 3; 1 Macc. xiv. 5; 2 Macc. xii. 8)—situated in a plain (1 Macc. x. 75–77) near Lydda (ver. 38), at the end of the mountain road connecting Jerusalem with the sea. The Maccabean generals, Jonathan and Simon, took it from the Syrians and fortified it (1 Macc. x. 74–76; xiv. 5, 34). Pompey joined it to the province of Syria, but Caesar restored it to Hyrcanus, and it afterwards formed part of the kingdom of Herod and of Archelaus, after whose deposition it reverted to the province of Syria, to which it belonged at the time of our narrative. It was destroyed by Caius Cestius; but rebuilt, and became a nest of Jewish pirates, in consequence of which Vespasian levelled it with the ground, and built a fort there, which soon became the nucleus of a new town. It is now called Jaffa, and has about 7000 inhabitants, half of whom are Christians.

Tabitha] This name, in Aramaic, answers to Dorcas, in Greek, signifying a gazelle. It appears also in the Rabbinical books as a female name: the gazelle being in the East a favourite type of beauty. See Song of Sol. ii. 9, 17; iv. 5; vii. 3. Lightfoot remarks, that she was probably a Hellenist (i. e. a Grecian Jewess), and thus was known by both names.

39. all the widows] The widows of the place, for whom she made these garments.

made] i.e. used to make (i. e. weave): not 'had made.'

40. put them all forth] After the example of his divine Master, see Luke viii. 54.

43. a tanner] From the extracts in Wetstein and Schöttgen, it appears that the Jews regarded the occupation of a tanner as a half-unclean one. In this case it would shew, as De Wette observes, that the stricter Jewish practices were already disregarded by the Apostle. It also would shew, in how little honour he and his office were held by the Jews at Caesarea.

CHAP. X. 1–48.] CONVERSION (BY SPECIAL DIVINE PREARRANGEMENT) AND BAPTISM OF THE GENTILE CORNELIUS AND HIS PARTY. We may remark, that the conversion of the Gentiles was no new idea to Jews or Christians, but that it had been universally regarded as to take place by their reception into Judaism. Of late, however, since the Ascension, we see the truth that the Gospel was to be a Gospel of the uncircumcision, beginning to be recognized by some. Stephen, carrying out the principles of his own apology, could hardly have failed to recognize it: and the Cyprian and Cyrenæan missionaries of ch. xi. 20 preached the word to the Grecians (not the Grecian Jews) certainly before the conversion of Cornelius. This state of things might have given rise to a permanent schism in the infant church. The Hellenists, and perhaps Saul, with his definite mission to the Gentiles, might have formed one party, and the Hebrews, with Peter at their head, the other. But, as Neander admirably observes, ‘The pernicious influence with which, from the first, the self-seeking and one-sided prejudices of human nature threatened the divine work, was counteracted by the superior influence of the Holy Spirit, which did not allow the differences of men to reach such a point of antagonism, but enabled them to retain unity in variety. We recognize the preventing wisdom of God,—which, while giving scope to the free agency of man, knows how to interpose His immediate revelation just at the moment when it is requisite for the success of the divine work,—by noticing, that when the Apostles needed this wider development of their Christian knowledge for the exercise of their vocation, and when the lack of it would have been exceedingly detrimental,—at that very moment, by a remarkable coincidence of inward revelation with a chain of outward circumstances, the illumination hitherto wanting was imparted to them.’

1. Cæsarea] As this town bears an important part in early Christian history, it will be well to give here a full account of it. CÆSAREA (“of Palestine,” called “by the sea” [as we say, “super mare”]) in several places in Josephus, or Stratonis [see below],—distinguished from Cæsarea Philippi, see note Matt. xvi. 13) is between Joppa and Dora, 68 Roman miles from Jerusalem according to the Jerusalem Itinerary, 75 according to Josephus,—36 miles from Ptolemais (a day’s journey, Acts xxi. 8),—30 from Joppa;—one of the largest towns in Palestine, with an excellent haven, built by Herod the Great, and called Sebastos (Augustus) in honour of Cæsar. It was, even before the destruction of Jerusalem, the seat of the Roman Procurators (see ch. xxiii. 23 ff.; xxiv. 27; xxv. 1), and is called by Tacitus the capital of Judæa. It was chiefly inhabited by Gentiles, but there were also many thousand Jewish inhabitants. It was built by Herod the Great. Beforetime there was only a fort there, called the tower of Strato. It was fortified, provided with a haven (see ch. ix. 30; xviii. 22), and in honour of Cæsar Augustus named Cæsarea, more fully Cæsarea Sebasté. Vespasian made it a Roman colony. Abulfeda speaks of it as in ruins in his time (A. D. 1300). At present there are a few ruins only, and some fishers' huts.

a centurion] The subordinate officer commanding the sixth part of a cohort, or half a maniple.

of the band called the Italian band] i.e. of a cohort levied in Italy, not in Syria.

2. a devout man, and one that feared God] i.e. he had abandoned polytheism, and was a worshipper of the true God: whether a proselyte of the gate, or not, seems uncertain. That he may have been such, there is nothing in the narrative to preclude: nor does Meyer's objection apply, that it is not probable that, among the many thousand converts, no Greek proselyte had yet been admitted by baptism into the church. Many such cases may have occurred, and some no doubt had: but the object of this providential interference seems to have been, to give solemn sanction to such reception, by the agency of him who was both the chief of the Apostles, and the strong upholder of pure Judaism. It is hardly possible that the words "of good report among all the nation of the Jews" (ver. 22) should have been said of a Gentile not in any way conformed to the Jewish faith and worship. The great point (ch. xi. 3) which made the present event so important, was, that Cornelius was an uncircumcised person. Doubtless also among his company (ver. 24) there must have been many who were not proselytes.

prayed to God alway] From Cornelius's own narrative, ver. 31, as well as from the analogy of God's dealings, we are certainly justified in inferring, with Neander, that the subject of his prayers was that he might be guided into truth, and if so, hardly without reference to that faith which was now spreading so widely over Judæa. This is not matter of conjecture, but is implied by Peter's words, "ye know," &c., in ver. 37. Further than this, we cannot infer with certainty; but, if the particular difficulty present in his mind be sought, we can hardly avoid the conclusion that it was connected with the apparent necessity of embracing Judaism and circumcision in order to become a believer on Christ.

3. in a vision evidently] not in a trance, as ver. 10, and ch. xxii. 17,—but with his bodily eyes: thus asserting the objective truth of the appearance.

about the ninth hour of the day] It here appears that Cornelius observed the Jewish hours of prayer.

4. for a memorial] i.e. 'so as to be a memorial'—There has been found a difficulty by some in the fact that Cornelius's works were received as well pleasing to God, before he had justifying faith in Christ. But it is surely easy to answer, with Calvin and Augustine, that Cornelius could not have prayed, without faith. His faith was all that he could then attain to, and brought forth its fruits abundantly in his life: one of which fruits, and the best of them, was, the earnest seeking by prayer for a better and more perfect faith.

7. was departed] So in Luke i. 38:—another token of the objective reality of the vision: "coming in" (ver. 3) and "departing" denoting the real acts of the angel, not the mere deemings of Cornelius.

9. On the morrow] The distance was thirty Roman miles, part of which they performed on the preceding evening, perhaps to Apollonia,—and the rest that morning. By the word rendered the housetop, Jerome, Luther, Erasmus, and others, understand an upper chamber. But why do we not then find here the word which St. Luke so frequently uses for an upper chamber? It was the flat roof, much frequented in the East for purposes of exercise (2 Sam. xi. 2; Dan. iv. 29, marg.),—of sleeping in summer (1 Sam. ix. 26, by inference, and as expressed in LXX),—of conversation (ib. ver. 25),—of mourning (Isa. xv. 3; Jer. xlvi. 38),—of erecting booths at the feast of tabernacles (Neh. viii. 16),—of other religious celebrations (2 Kings xxiii. 12; Jer. xix. 13; Zeph. i. 5),—of publicity (2 Sam. xvi. 22; Matt. x. 27; Luke xii. 3. Jos. B.J. ii. 21. 5),—of observation (Judg. xvi. 27; Isa. xxii. 1),—and for any process requiring fresh air and sun (Josh. ii. 6).

the sixth hour] The second hour of prayer: also of the mid-day meal.

10. he fell into a trance, a trance fell upon him. The distinction of this appearance from the "vision" above (though the usage is not always strictly observed) is, that in this case that which was seen was a revelation shewn to the eye of the beholder when rapt into a supernatural state, having, as is the case in a dream, no objective reality: whereas, in the other case, the thing seen actually happened, and was beheld by the person as an ordinary spectator, in the possession of his natural senses.

11. tied by four rope-ends] Not, as A.V., ‘knit at the four corners,’ but as in margin. The ends of the ropes were attached to the sheet, and, in the vision, they only were seen.—These four ends are not without meaning, directed as they are to the four parts of heaven, and intimating that men from the North, South, East, and West, now were accounted clean before God, and were called to a share in his kingdom: see Luke xiii. 29. We must not wander away into childish exaggeration of symbolism as some have done, interpreting the four ends of the four gospels, &c.

12. all the fourfooted and creeping things of the earth] literally: not ‘many of each kind,’ nor ‘some of all kinds:’ in the vision it seemed to Peter to be an assemblage of all creation.

fourfooted... creeping things... fowls] In ch. xi. 6, Peter follows the more strictly Jewish division: see there.

14.] Peter rightly understands the command as giving him free choice of all the creatures shewn to him. We cannot infer hence that the sheet contained unclean animals only. It was a mixture of clean and unclean,—the aggregate, therefore, being unclean.

Lord] So Cornelius to the angel, ver. 4. It is here addressed to the unknown heavenly speaker.—On the clean and unclean beasts, &c., see Levit. xi.

15.] These weighty words have more than one application. They reveal what was needed for the occasion, in a figure: God letting down from heaven clean and unclean alike, Jew and Gentile,—represented that He had made of one blood all nations to dwell on the face of all the earth: God having purified these, signified that the distinction was now abolished which was ‘added because of transgressions’ (Gal. iii. 19),—and all regarded in his eyes as pure for the sake of His dear Son. But the literal truth of the representation was also implied;—that the same distinctions between the animals intended for use as food were now done away, and free range allowed to men, as their lawful wants and desires invite them, over the whole creation of God: that creation itself having been purified and rendered clean for use by the satisfaction of Christ. The same truth which is asserted by the heavenly voice in Peter’s vision, is declared Ephes. i. 10; Col. i. 20; 1 Tim. iv. 4, 5.—Only we must be careful not to confound this restitution with the restoration of all things of ch. iii. 21; see notes there.

16. thrice] denoting the certainty of the thing revealed: see Gen. xli. 32.

18.] The strict sense is, that having called out (some one), they were enquiring.

19.] See ch. viii. 29, note.

20. I (emphatic) have sent them] The Holy Spirit, shed down upon the Church to lead it into all the truth, had in His divine arrangements brought about, by the angel sent to Cornelius, their coming.

23. lodged them] This was his first consorting with men uncircumcised and eating with them (ch. xi. 3): though perhaps this latter is not necessarily implied.

certain brethren from Joppa] Six, ch. xi. 12; in expectation of some weighty event to which hereafter their testimony might be required, as indeed it was, as there appears.

24.] These near friends of Cornelius, like himself, must have been fearers of the true God, or at all events must have been influenced by his vision to wait for the teaching of Peter.

25. worshipped] St. Luke, observes Bengel, has not added “him;” doubtless from an euphemistic motive. It was natural for Cornelius to think that one so pointed out by an angel must be deserving of the highest respect; and this respect he shewed in a way which proves him not to have altogether lost the heathen training of his childhood. He must have witnessed the rise of the custom of paying divine honours first to those who were clothed with the delegated power of the senate, and then, even more conspicuously, to him in whom the imperial majesty centered.

26. I myself also am a man] This was the lesson which Peter’s vision had taught him, and he now begins to practise it:—the common honour and equality of all mankind in God’s sight.—Those who claim to have succeeded Peter, have not imitated this part of his conduct. See Rev. xix. 10; xxii. 8.

27.] This second going in (compare ver. 25) betokens the completion of his entering in; or the former, his entering the house, —this latter, the chamber.

28.] Ye (emphatic) know: i.e. you, of all men, [best] know: being those immediately concerned in the obstruction to intercourse which the rule occasioned.

how that it is an unlawful thing,... or ‘how unlawful a thing it is:’ better the former. There is some difficulty about this unlawfulness of consorting with those foreigners who, like Cornelius, worshipped the true God. It rests upon no legal prohibition, and seems, at first sight, hardly consistent with the zeal to gain predicated of the Pharisees, Matt. xxiii. 15, and with other, Jewish and Rabbinical, notices cited in my Greek Test. But, whatever exceptions there may have been, it was unquestionably the general practice of the Jews, to separate themselves in common life from uncircumcised persons. We have Juvenal testifying to this at Rome in his Satires,—that the Jews “would not shew the way except to their fellow-religionists, nor guide any but a circumcised person to a fountain of which he was in search.” And Tacitus says that “they cherished against all mankind the hatred of enemies, they were separate in hoard and bed,”&c.

and] (not, ‘but God hath shewed me,’ as A.V.) ‘Ye, though ye see me here, know, how strong the prejudice is which would have kept me away: and I, though entertaining fully this prejudice myself, yet have been taught, &c.’ The stress in reading must be laid on me.

30. until this hour] viz. the hour at which he was then speaking, which probably was the sixth, the hour of the mid-day meal, which was the only one partaken by the Jews on their solemn days.

in bright clothing] In Luke xxiii. 11, where the same word is used in the original, the brightness was in the colour: here, probably, in some supernatural splendour. The garment might have been white (as in ch. i. 11) or not,—but at all events, it was radiant with brightness.

33. all things that are commanded thee of God] He says this, not doubting that God, who had directed him to Peter, had also directed Peter what to speak to him.

34. opened his mouth] This is a phrase used on occasions of more than ordinary solemnity. See Matt. v. 2; xii. 35; ch. viii. 35.

Of a truth I perceive] ‘For the first time I now clearly, in its fulness and as a living fact, apprehend (grasp by experience the truth of) what I read in the Scripture (Deut. x. 17; 2 Chron. xix. 7; Job xxxiv. 19).’

35.] but gives the explanation,—what it is that Peter now fully apprehends: but, as opposed to God being a respecter of persons in its now apparent sense.

in every nation, &c.] It is very important that we should hold the right clue to guide us in understanding this saying. The question which recent events had solved in Peter’s mind, was that of the admissibility of men of all nations into the church of Christ. In this sense only, had he received any information as to the acceptableness of men of all nations before God. He saw, that in every nation, men who seek after God, who receive His witness of Himself without which He has left no man, and humbly follow His will as far as they know it,—these have no extraneous hindrance, such as uncircumcision, placed in their way to Christ, but are capable of being admitted into God’s church though Gentiles, and as Gentiles. That only such are spoken of, is agreeable to the nature of the case; for men who do not fear God, and work unrighteousness, are out of the question, not being likely to seek such admission. It is clearly unreasonable to suppose Peter to have meant, that each heathen’s natural light and moral purity would render him acceptable in the sight of God:—for, if so, why should he have proceeded to preach Christ to Cornelius, or indeed any more at all? And it is equally unreasonable to find any verbal or doctrinal difficulty in the expression worketh righteousness, or to suppose that righteousness must be taken in its technical and imputed sense, and therefore that he alludes to the state of men after becoming believers. He speaks popularly, and certainly not without reference to the character he had heard of Cornelius, which consisted of these very two parts, that he fear'd God, and abounded in good works.—The deeper truth, that the preparation of the heart itself in such men comes from God's preventing grace, is not in question here, nor touched upon.

36.] The construction of this and the following verse is very difficult. I have treated in my Greek Test., of the various ways in which it has been taken, and endeavoured to establish that one which I believe to be right. Set plainly before the English reader it will stand thus:—Of a truth I perceive, &c... (and recognize this as) the word which God sent to the children of Israel, preaching peace (see reff.) through Jesus Christ: (then, for the first time, truly perceiving this also, on the mention of Jesus Christ, he adds the ascription to Him of lordship over all men,) He is Lord of ALL MEN; with a strong emphasis on all.

by Jesus Christ belongs to preaching, not to peace.

37. the matter] Not the thing, but the thing said, the ‘material’ of the proclamation, in this case equivalent to ‘the history.’

began from Galilee] It was from Galilee first that the fame of Jesus went abroad, as Luke himself relates, Luke iv. 14, 37, 44; vii. 17; ix. 6. (xxiii. 5.) Galilee also was the nearest to Cæsarea, and may have been for this reason expressly mentioned.

after the baptism which John preached] So also St. Peter dates the ministry of our Lord in ch. i. 22. (See note there.)

38. Jesus of Nazareth] The personal subject of the matter which was published: ‘Ye know the subject which was preached..... viz. Jesus of Nazareth.’

how that God anointed him] Not as A.V., “how God anointed Jesus of Nazareth:” see the last note.—The fact of the anointing with the Holy Spirit, in His baptism by John, was the historical opening of the ministry of Jesus: this anointing however was not His first unction with the Spirit, but only symbolic of that which He had in His incarnation: which unction abode upon Him, John i. 32, 33, and is alleged here as the continuing anointing which was upon Him from God.—Stier well remarks, how entirely all personal address to the hearers and all doctrinal announcements are thrown into the background in this speech, and the Person and Work and Office of Christ put forward as the sole subject of apostolic preaching.

oppressed] literally, subdued, so that he is their master,—and his power is used for their oppression. Here, it alludes to physical oppression by disease (see Luke xiii. 16) and possession: in 2 Tim. ii. 26, a very similar description is given of those who are spiritually bound by the devil.

God was with him] So Nicodemus had spoken, John iii. 2; and probably Peter here used the words as well known and indicative of the presence of divine power and co-operation (see Judg. vi. 16): beginning as he does with the outer and lower circle of the things regarding Christ, as they would be matter of observation and inference to his hearers, and gradually ascending to those higher truths regarding His Person and Office, which were matter of apostolic testimony and demonstration from Scripture,—His resurrection (ver. 40), His being appointed Judge of living and dead (ver. 42), and the predestined Author of salvation to all who believe on Him (ver. 43).

39. And we...] Answering to ye know, ver. 37. ‘You know the history as matter of universal rumour: and we are witnesses of the facts.’ By this we, St. Peter at once takes away the ground from the exaggerated reverence for himself individually, shewn by Cornelius, ver. 25: and puts himself and the rest of the Apostles in the strictly subordinate place of witnesses for Another.

whom they slew] St. Peter omits all mention of the actors in the murder, speaking as he did to Gentiles: a striking contrast to ch. ii. 23; iii. 14; iv. 10; v. 30,—when he was working conviction in the minds of those actors themselves.

hanged on a tree] So also ch. v. 30, where see note.

41.] Bengel would understand this eating and drinking with Him of previous intercourse during His ministry, and would put “not to”... as far as “with him” in a parenthesis,—finding a difficulty in their having eaten and drunk with Him after His Resurrection. But this is most improbable from the construction of the sentence, besides that the fact of their having eaten and drunk with Him after His Resurrection gives most important testimony to the reality and identity of His risen Body. And there is no real difficulty in it: Luke xxiv. 41, 43 and John xxi. 12 give us instances; and, even if the drinking with Him, is to be pressed, it is no contradiction to Luke xxii. 18, which only refers to one particular kind of drinking.

42. unto the people] Here, as elsewhere (ver. 2; John xi. 50 al. fr.), the Jewish people: that was all which in the apostolic mind, up to this time, the command had absolutely enjoined. The further unfoldings of the Gospel had all been brought about over and above this first injunction. Ch. i. 8 is no obstacle to this interpretation; for although literally fulfilled by the leadings of Providence, as related in this book, they did not so understand it when spoken.

which is ordained of God] Had not Peter in his mind the Lord’s own solemn words, John xvii. 6?

Judge of quick and dead] See also St. Paul, ch. xvii. 31, preaching to Gentiles, brings forward the appointment of a Judge over all men as the central point of his teaching. This expression gives at once a universality to the office and mission of Christ, which prepares the way for the great truth declared in the next verse.—It is impossible that the living and dead here can mean (as the Augsburg Catechism, and Olshausen) the righteous and sinners:—a canon of interpretation which should constantly be borne in mind is, that a figurative sense of words is never admissible, EXCEPT WHEN REQUIRED BY THE CONTEXT. Thus, in the passage of John v. 25 (where see notes), the sense of “the dead” is determined to be figurative by the addition of “and now is” after the hour being mentioned, no such addition occurring in ver. 28, where the literally dead, “all that are in the graves,” are mentioned.

shall receive remission of sins] The legal sacrifices, as well as the declarations of the prophets, all pointed to the remission of sins by faith in Him. And the universality of this proclamation, applying to whosoever believeth in him, is set forth by the prophets in many places, and was recognized even by the Jews themselves in their expositions of Scripture, though not in their practice.

44.] Peter had spoken up to this point: and was probably proceeding (compare his own account of his speech, “as I began to speak,” ch. xi. 15) to include his present hearers and all nations in the number to whom this blessing was laid open,—or perhaps beyond this point his own mind may as yet have been not sufficiently enlightened to set forth the full liberty of the Gospel of Christ,—when the fire of the Lord fell, approving the sacrifice of the Gentiles (see Rom. xv. 16): conferring on them the substance before the symbol,—the baptism with the Holy Ghost before the baptism with water: and teaching us, that as the Holy Spirit dispensed once and for all with the necessity of circumcision in the flesh, so can He also, when it pleases him, with the necessity of water-baptism: and warning the Christian church not to put baptism itself in the place which circumcision once held. See further in note on Peter’s important words, ch. xi. 16.—The outpouring of the Spirit on the Gentiles was strictly analogous to that in the day of Pentecost; Peter himself describes it by adding (ch. xi. 15), as on us at the beginning. Whether there was any visible appearance in this case, cannot be determined: perhaps from ver. 46 it would appear not.

45.] We do not read that Peter himself was astonished. He had been specially prepared by the vision: they had not.—The speaking with tongues here is identified with the speaking with other tongues of ch. ii. 4, by the assertion of ch. xi. 15, just cited;—and this again with the speaking with tongues of ch. xix. 6: so that the gift was one and the same throughout. On the whole subject, see note, ch. ii. 4.

47.] One great end of the unexpected effusion of the Holy Spirit was, entirely to preclude the question which otherwise could not but have arisen, ‘Must not these men be circumcised before baptism?’ the water... the Holy Ghost] The TWO great PARTS of full and complete baptism: the latter infinitely greater than, but not superseding the necessity of, the, former. The article should here certainly be expressed: Can any forbid THE WATER to these who have received THE SPIRIT?—The expression forbid, used with the water, is interesting, as shewing that the practice was to bring the water to the candidates, not the candidates to the water. This, which would be implied by the word under any circumstances, is rendered certain, when we remember that they were assembled in the house.

48. he commanded them to be baptized] As the Lord Himself when on earth did not baptize (John iv. 2), so did not ordinarily the Apostles (see 1 Cor. i. 13–16, and note). Perhaps the same reason may have operated in both cases,—lest those baptized by our Lord, or by the chief Apostles, should arrogate to themselves pre-eminence on that account. Also, which is implied in 1 Cor. i. 17, as compared with Acts vi. 2, the ministry of the Word was esteemed by them their higher and paramount duty and office, whereas the subordinate ministration of the ordinances was committed to those who served tables.

CHAP. XI. 1–18.] PETER JUSTIFIES, BEFORE THE CHURCH IN JERUSALEM, HIS HAVING CONSORTED WITH MEN UNCIRCUMCISED.

1. in Judæa] perhaps more strictly, throughout Judæa.

that the Gentiles... also...] They seem to have heard the fact, without any circumstantial detail (but see on the words “the angel” below, ver. 13); and, from the charge in ver. 3,—from some reporter who gave the objectionable part of it, as is not uncommon in such cases, all prominence.

5.] it came even to me is a fresh detail.

12. these six brethren] They had accompanied him to Jerusalem, and were there to substantiate the facts, as far as they had witnessed them.

13. the angel] The use of the definite article almost looks as if the history of Cornelius’s vision were known to the hearers. The difference between the vision of Cornelius and that of Peter is here again strikingly marked. While the latter is merely “praying in the city of Joppa,” no place nor circumstance being named, the former sees the angel ‘standing in his house.’—Notice also that Peter never names Cornelius in his speech—because he, his character and person, was absorbed in the category to which he belonged,—that of “men uncircumcised.”

14. whereby thou and all thy house shall be saved] This is implied in the angel’s speech: especially if the prayer of Cornelius had been for such a boon, of which there can be little doubt.

15. as I began to speak....] See note on ch. x. 44, as also for the rest of the verse.

16.] Ch. i. 5. This prophecy of the Lord was spoken to his assembled followers, and promised to them that baptism which was the completion and aim of the inferior baptism by water administered to them by John. Now, God had Himself, by pouring out on the Gentiles the Holy Spirit, included them in the number of these persons addressed as “ye” in the prophecy, and pronounced them to be members of the church of believers in Christ, and partakers of the Holy Ghost, the end of baptism. This (in all its blessed consequences, = the gift of “repentance unto life,” see on ver. 18) was (ver. 17) the like (literally, equal) gift bestowed on them: and, this having been bestowed,—to refuse the symbolic and subordinate ordinance,—or to regard them any longer as strangers from the covenant of promise would have been, so far as in him lay, to withstand (hinder) God.

17.] when believing belongs to both them and us; setting forth the strict analogy between the cases, and the community of the faith to both.

19–30.] THE GOSPEL PREACHED ALSO IN ANTIOCH TO GENTILES. BARNANAS, BEING THEREUPON SENT BY THE APOSTLES FROM JERUSALEM, FETCHES SAUL FROM TARSUS TO ANTIOCH. THEY CONTINUE THERE A YEAR, AND, ON OCCASION OF A FAMINE, CARRY UP ALMS TO THE BRETHREN AT JERUSALEM. Our present section takes up the narrative at ch. viii. 2, 4. In vv. 19–21 it traverses rapidly the time occupied by ch. ix. 1–30, and that (undefined) of Saul’s stay at Tarsus, and brings it down to the famine under Claudius.

19. So then] A resumption of what had been dropt before, see ch. viii. 4, continued from ver. 2: not however without reference to some narrative about to follow which is brought out by a But—see ch. viii. 5, also ch. ix. 31, 32; xxviii. 5, 6,—and implying, whether by way of distinction or exception, a contrast to what is stated in this verse.

Phenice] properly, the strip of coast, about 120 miles long, extending from the river Eleutherus (near Aradus), to a little south of Tyre, and belonging at this time to the province of Syria: see ch. xv. 3; xxi. 2. Its principal cities were Tripolis, Byblos, Sidon, Tyre, and Berytos. It is a fertile territory, beginning with the uplands at the foot of Lebanon, and sloping to the sea, and held a distinguished position for commerce from the very earliest times.

Cyprus] Cyprus was intimately connected by commerce with Phenice, and contained many Jews. See on its state at this time, note on ch. xiii. 7.

Antioch] A city in the history of Christianity only second in importance to Jerusalem. It was situated on the river Orontes, in a large, fruitful, and well-watered plain, 120 stadia from the sea and its port Seleucia. It was founded by Seleucus Nicator, who called it after his father Antiochus. It soon became a great and populous city, and was the residence of the Seleucid kings of Syria (1 Macc. iii. 37; vii. 2; xi. 13, 44; 2 Macc. v. 21), and of the Roman proconsuls of Syria. Josephus (B. J. iii. 2, 4) says that, for greatness and prosperity, it was the third city of the Roman world. Seleucus the founder had settled there many Jews who had their own governor, or Ethnarch. The intimate connexion of Antioch with the history of the church will be seen as we proceed. reference to the principal passages will here be enough: see vv. 22, 26, 27; ch. xiii. 1; xv. 23, 35 ff; xviii. 22. It became afterwards one of the five great centres of the Christian church, with Jerusalem, Rome, Alexandria and Constantinople. Of its present state (Antakia, a town not one-third of its ancient size) a view is given in Conybeare and Howson, where also, edn. 2. vol. i. pp. 149 ff., is a minute and interesting description of the city and its history, ancient and modern. See also Mr. Lewin’s Life and Epistles of St. Paul, vol. i.p. 108 ff.

20. some of them] not, of these, last-mentioned Jews: but of those who were scattered abroad. This both the sense and the form of the sentence require.

men of Cyrene] of whom Lucius mentioned ch. xiii. 1, as being in the church at Antioch, must have been one, Symeon called Niger (black), also mentioned there, may have been a Cyrenean proselyte.

Grecians] Many retain and advocate here the reading Hellenists, or Grecian Jews. It appears mainly to have arisen from a mistaken view that the baptism of Cornelius must necessarily have preceded the conversion of all other Gentiles. But that reading gives, in this place, no assignable sense whatever: for (1) the Hellenists were long ago a recognized part of the Christian church—(2) among these who were scattered abroad themselves in all probability there were many Hellenists,—and (3) the term Jews includes the Hellenists,—the distinctive appellation of pure Jews being not Jews but Hebrews, ch. vi. 1. Nothing to my mind can be plainer, from what follows respecting Barnabas, than that these Grecians were GENTILES, uncircumcised; and that their conversion took place before any tidings had reached Jerusalem of the divine sanction given in the case of Cornelius. See below.

21. the hand of the Lord was with them] By visible manifestations not to be doubted, the Lord shewed it to be His pleasure that they should go on with such preaching; the word them implying, the preachers to the Gentiles, whose work the narrative now follows.

22. Barnabas] himself a Cyprian, ch. iv. 36.—His mission does not seem exactly to have been correspondent to that of Peter and John to Samaria (nor can he in any distinctive sense, be said to have been an Apostle, as they were: see ch. xiv. 14, and note): but more probably, from what follows, the intention was to ascertain the fact, and to deter these persons from the admission of the uncircumcised into the church: or, at all events, to use his discretion in a matter on which they were as yet doubtful: The choice of such a man, one by birth with the agents, and of a liberal spirit, shews sufficiently that they wished to deal, not harshly, but gently and cautiously,—whatever their reason was.

23, 24.] It is on these verses principally that I depend as determining the character of the whole narrative. It certainly is implied in them that the effect produced on Barnabas was something different from what might have been expected: that to sympathize with the work was not the intent of his mission, but a result brought about in the heart of a good man, full of the Holy Ghost and of faith, by witnessing the effects of divine grace (the force of the original can hardly be given in an English version. It is not merely, 'the grace of God', but the grace which [evidently] was that of God, which he recognized as that of God). And this is further confirmed to my mind by finding that he immediately went and sought Saul. He had been Saul's friend at Jerusalem: he had doubtless heard of the commission which had been given to him to preach to the Gentiles: but the church was waiting the will of God, to know how this was to be accomplished. Here was an evident door open for the ministry of Saul, and, in consequence, as soon as Barnabas perceives it, he goes to fetch him to begin his work in Antioch. And it was here, more properly, and not in Cæsarea, that the real commencement of the Gentile church took place,—although simultaneously, for the convincing of the Jewish believers at Jerusalem, and of Peter, and for the more solemn and authorized standing of the Gentile church, the important events at Cæsarea and Joppa were brought about.

25.] This therefore took place after ch. ix. 30: how long after, we have no hint in the narrative, and the question will be determined by various persons according to the requirements of their chronological system. Some chronologers make it not more than from half a year to a year: others, placing the conversion of Saul in A.D. 31,—nine years. Speaking from probability, it seems very unlikely that any considerable portion of time should have been spent by him before the great work of his ministry began. Even supposing him during this retirement to have preached in Syria and Cilicia,—judging by the analogy of his subsequent journeys, a few months at the most would have sufficed for this. For my own view, see Introduction to Acts, §6.

26. Christians] This name is never used by Christians of themselves in the N.T. (but "the disciples," "the faithful," "the believers," "the brethren," "the saints," "they of this [or the] way"), only (see ch. xxvi. 28; 1 Pet. iv. 16) assspoken by, or coming from, those without the church. And of those, it cannot have arisen with the Jews, who would never have given a name derived from the Messiah to a hated and despised sect. By the Jews they were called Nazarenes, ch. xxiv. 5, and Galilaens: and the Emperor Julian (the Apostate), who wished to deprive them of a name in which they gloried (see below), and to favour the Jews, ordered that they should not be called Christians, but Galilaens. The name soon became matter of glorying among its bearers: see 1 Pet. iv. 16. In the epistle of the churches of Lyons and Vienne, given by Eusebius, we read, that when the governor asked Epagathus whether he too were a Christian, he confessed it with a loud voice: and again that Sanctus, to every question, replied in Latin, "I am a Christian." And in the Clementine Liturgy we have these words, "We give thanks to Thee that the name of thy Christ is named upon us, and that we are called Thine." Before this, while the believers had been included among Jews, no distinctive name for them was needed: but now that a body of men, compounded of Jews and Gentiles, arose, distinct in belief and habits from both, some new appellation was required.—It may be observed, that the inhabitants of Antioch were famous for their propensity to jeer and cal] names; see instances in Conybeare and Howson, i.p. 148, note 2.

27. in these days] It was during this year, ver. 26.

prophets] Inspired teachers in the early Christian church, referred to in the Acts, and in the Epistles of Paul (see reff. and ch. xix. 6; xxi. 9; Rom. xii. 6; 1 Cor. xii. 10; xiii. 2, 8; xiv. 6; 1 Thess. v. 20). They might be of either sex (ch. xxi. 9). The foretelling of future events was not the usual form which their inspiration took, but that of an exalted and superhuman teaching, ranked by St. Paul above 'speaking with tongues,' in being the utterance of their own conscious intelligence informed by the Holy Spirit. This inspiration was, however, occasionally, as here, and ch. xxi. 10, made the vehicle of prophecy, properly so called.

28. Agabus] The same who prophesied Paul's imprisonment in Jerusalem, ch. xxi. 10 ff. From the form of his announcement there, we may infer the manner in which he signified by the Spirit here. It was, "Thus saith the Holy Ghost."

throughout all the world] not, 'all Judæa,' though in fact it was so: the expression is probably a hyperbolical one in ordinary use, and not to be pressed as strictly implying that to which its literal meaning would extend. That it occurs in a prophecy is no objection to this: the scope, and not the wording of the prophecy is given. But see below.

in the days of Claudius Cæsar] In the fourth year of Claudius, A.D. 44, there was a famine in Judæa and the neighbouring countries. And three others are mentioned during his reign: one in Greece, and two in Rome, so that scarcity in the days of Claudius Cæsar did extend through the greater part of the Roman world, if it be thought necessary to press the words of the prophecy. The queen Helena of Adiabene and her son Izates helped the Jews with subsidies on the occasion (in relating which, Josephus calls it “the great famine”), both of corn and money.—I do not believe that the words ‘in the days of Claudius Cæsar’ imply that the events just related were not also in the reign of Claudius: but they are inserted to particularize the famine as being that well-known one, and only imply that the author was not writing under Claudius.

29.] There is no need to suppose that the prophecy of Agabus preceded by any long time the outbreak of the famine: nor would it be any derogation from its prophetic character to suppose it even coincident with its first beginnings; it was the greatness and extent of the famine which was particularly revealed, and which determined the Christians of Antioch to send the relief. Baumgarten, in tracing the gradual transition of the apostolic narrative from Jewish to Gentile Christianity, calls this contribution, sent from Antioch to Jerusalem, the first stretching out of the hand by the Gentile world across the ancient gulf which separated it from Israel.

The church at Jerusalem was poor, probably in connexion with the community of goods, which would soon have this effect; see ch. ii. 44, note.

30. the elders] These were the overseers or presidents of the congregation,—an office borrowed from the synagogues, and established by the Apostles in the churches generally, see ch. xiv. 23. They are in the N.T. identical with bishops, see ch. xx. 17, 28; Titus i. 5, 7; 1 Pet. v. 1, 2. So Theodoret on Phil. i. 1, “He calls the elders, bishops: for at that time they had both names.” The title “episcopus,” as applied to one person superior to the elders, and answering to our ‘bishop,’ appears to have been unknown in the apostolic times.—Respecting the chronology of this journey to Jerusalem, see note on ch. xii. 25, and the table in the Introduction.

CHAP. XII. 1–25.] PERSECUTION OF THE CHURCH AT JERUSALEM BY HEROD AGRIPPA. MARTYRDOM OF JAMES THE BROTHER OF JOHN. IMPRISONMENT AND MIRACULOUS DELIVERANCE OF PETER. DEATH OF HEROD AT CÆSAREA. RETURN OF BARNABAS AND SAUL FROM JERUSALEM TO ANTIOCH.

1. about that time] Before the arrival of Barnabas and Sanlin Jerusalem. The famine in Judæa broke out under Cuspius Fadus, and continued under Tiberius Alexander, procurators of Judæa. Now Cuspius Fadus was sent to Judæa by Claudius on the death of Agrippa (i. e. after Aug. 6, A.D. 44). The visit of Barnabas and Saul must have taken place about the time of, or shortly after, Agrippa’s death.

Herod the king] HEROD AGRIPPA I., grandson of Herod the Great,—son of Aristobulus and Berenice. Having gone to Rome, to accuse Herod the Tetrarch (Antipas), and fallen under the displeasure of Tiberius for paying open court to Caius Cæsar (Caligula), he was imprisoned and cruelly treated; but, on the accession of Caligula, released, and at once presented with the tetrarchy of Philip (Trachonitis),—who had lately died,—and the title of king. On this, Antipas, by persuasion of his wife Herodias, went to Rome, to try to obtain the royal title also, but was followed by his enemy Agrippa, who managed to get Antipas banished to Spain, and to obtain his tetrarchy (Galilee and Peraea) for himself. Finally, Claudius, in return for services rendered to him by Agrippa, at the time of Caligula’s death, presented him with Samaria and Judæa (about 41 A.D., Jos. Antt. xix. 5. 1), so that he now ruled (Jos. ibid.) all the kingdom of Herod the Great. His character, as given by Josephus, Antt. xix. 7. 3, is important as illustrating the present chapter. He describes him as munificent in gifts and very ambitious of popular favour, making himself conspicuous by lavish expenditure; and a great observer, for popularity’s sake, of the law and customs of the Jews. This character will abundantly account for his persecuting the Christians, who were so odious to the Jews, and for his vain-glorious acceptance of the impious homage of the people, ver. 23.

2. James the brother of John] Of him we know nothing besides what is related in the Gospels. He was the son of Zebedee, called (Matt. iv. 21) together with John his brother: was one of the favoured Three admitted to the death-chamber of Jairus’s daughter (Mark v. 37), to the mount of transfiguration (Matt. xvii. 1), and to the agony in the garden (Matt. xxvi. 37). He, together with John his brother (named by our Lord ‘Boanerges,’ ‘sons of thunder’), wished to call down fire on the inhospitable Samaritans (Luke ix. 54),—and prayed that his brother and himself might sit, one on the right hand and the other on the left, in the Lord’s kingdom (Matt. xx. 20–24). It was then that He foretold to them their drinking of the cup of suffering and being baptized with the baptism which He was baptized with: a prophecy which James was the first to fulfil.—This is the only Apostle of whose death we have any certain record. With regard to all the rest, tradition varies, more or less, as to the place, or the manner, or the time of their deaths.—Eusebius relates, from a work of Clemens, who had received it by tradition of those before him, that the accuser of James struck by his confession, became a Christian, and was led away with him to martyrdom. As they went to execution, he asked the Apostle's forgiveness. After a moment's thought, he replied "Peace be to thee," and kissed him: and so both were beheaded together.

with the sword] Probably according to the Roman method of beheading, which became common among the later Jews. It was a punishment accounted extremely disgraceful by the Jews.

the days of unleavened bread] Wieseler regards the whole of the following narrative as having happened on one and the same day and night, viz. that of the 14th of Nisan (April 1), A.D. 44. He takes the words in the strict meaning: that it was the very day of the passover, and that "after the passover" means, after the eating of the passover on the evening of the 14th of Nisan, and that Herod was intending to bring Peter forth on the next morning. He finds support for this in the four quaternions of soldiers, the guard for one night (see below), and maintains that the expression the Passover cannot apply to the whole festal period, which would have been "the feast" or "those days." But Bleek calls this view most arbitrary and even unnatural; and I own, with all respect for Wieseler's general acumen, I am disposed to agree with this criticism. The whole cast of the narrative,—the use of days, not "day," as in St. Luke's own expression in his Gospel, xxii. 7,—the intimation of enduring custody in the delivering him to the soldiers to keep him, the delay implied in the word intending,—the specification of that same night presupposing more nights preceding,—all this would be unaccountable in the precise historical diction of St. Luke, unless he had intended to convey an impression that some days elapsed. But still more decisive is his own definition of the Passover Luke xxii. 1, "the feast of unleavened bread which is called the Passover." So that "after the Passover" may well be equivalent to "after the feast of unleavened bread." The argument from the four quaternions of soldiers proves nothing: the same sixteen (see below) may have had him in permanent charge, that number being appointed as adequate to the duties required.

4. to four quaternions of soldiers] In military arrangements, Herod seems to have retained the Roman habits, according to which the night was divided into four watches, and each committed to four soldiers, to two of whom the prisoner was chained, the other two keeping watch before the doors of the prison, forming the first and second guards of ver. 10. It is plain that this number being mentioned is no sign that the custody was only for one night.

after the Passover] (see above) after the days of the feast, i.e. after the 21st of Nisan. Herod, who (ver. 1, note) observed rigorously the Jewish customs, would not execute a prisoner during the feast.

5.] On the duration implied by this verse, see above.

6. the same night] emphatic: that very night, viz. which preceded the day of trial.—The practice of attaching a prisoner to one keeper or more by a chain is alluded to by several ancient authors. In the account of the imprisonment of Herod Agrippa himself by Tiberius, Jos. Antt. xviii. 6. 7, we read of the soldier who was chained with him. See note on ch. xxiv. 23; see also ch. xxviii. 16, 20.

7.] It is in St. Luke's manner to relate simultaneously the angelic appearance and the shining of a light around: cf. Luke ii. 9; xxiv. 4; ch. x. 30. The light accompanied, or perhaps shone from, the angel.

9.] went out, viz. from the chamber or cell.

10.] The first and second watch or guard cannot mean the two soldiers to whom he was chained, on account of the mention of his going out above: but are probably the other two, one at the door of the chamber, the other at the outer door of the building. Then 'the iron gate leading into the city' was that outside the prison buildings, forming the exit from the premises. The situation of the prison is uncertain, but seems to have been in the city. The additional clause in the margin is remarkable, and can hardly be other than genuine.

11.] when Peter was come to himself: i.e. when he had recovered his self-consciousness. He was before in the half-consciousness of one who is dreaming and knows that it is a dream: except that in his case the dream was the truth, and his supposition the unreality.

12.] And now having become aware of it,—for this, and not "when he had considered the thing," is the meaning,—he proceeds at once to action.

John, whose surname was Mark] It is uncertain whether this John Mark was the same as the Evangelist Mark: but they have been generally believed to be the same. For a full account of him, see Introduction to Mark. His mother Mary was not sister, but aunt of Barnabas: see Col. iv. 10, note.

15. It is his angel] No other rendering but his angel will suit the sense: and with a few exceptions all Commentators, ancient and modern, have recognized this meaning. Our Lord plainly asserts the doctrine of guardian angels in Matt. xviii. 10 (see note there): and from this we further learn in what sense His words were understood by the early church. From His words, “take heed that ye despise not one of these little ones,” taken with the context, we infer that each one has his guardian angel: from this passage we find not only that such was believed to be the case, but that it was supposed that such angel occasionally appeared in the semblance (seeing that he spoke with the voice) of the person himself. We do not, it is true, know who the speakers were; nor is the peculiar form in which they viewed the doctrine binding upon us: it may have been erroneous, and savouring of superstition. But of the doctrine itself this may not be said, as the Lord Himself has asserted it. For what purpose they suppose this angel to have come, does not appear in the narrative.

17. beckoning unto them] His motive was haste: he tells briefly the particulars of his deliverance, and, while it was yet night, hastily departs.

unto James] James, the brother of the Lord, whom we find presiding over the church at Jerusalem, ch. xv. 13; xxi. 18: Gal. ii. 12. See Gal. i. 19; ii. 9. I believe him to have been one of those “brethren of the Lord” mentioned Matt. xiii. 55; John vii. 5; ch. i. 14; 1 Cor. ix. 5, of whom I have in the note on the first of these passages maintained, that they were His real maternal brethren, sons of Joseph and Mary:—and to have been an Apostle, as Paul and Barnabas, but not of the number of the twelve (see note on ch. xiv. 14):—and to have been therefore of course distinct from James the son of Alpheus, enumerated (Matt. x. 3 and parallels) among the twelve. The reasons for this belief I reserve for the Introduction to the Epistle of James. into another place] I see in these words a minute mark of truth in our narrative. Under the circumstances, the place of Peter’s retreat would very naturally at the time be kept secret. It probably was unknown to the person from whom the narrative came, or designedly left indefinite. And so it has remained, the narrative not following Peter’s history any longer. We find him again at Jerusalem in ch. xv. Whether he left it or not on this occasion is uncertain. It is not asserted in the word departed,—which only implies that he left the house.

18. as soon as it was day] Wieseler argues from this, and I think rightly, that the deliverance of Peter must have taken place in the last watch of the night (3–6 A.M. in April), for otherwise his escape would have been perceived before the break of day, viz. at the next change of the watch.

20.] It is impossible that Herod should have been at war with the Tyrians and Sidonians, belonging as they did to a Roman province, and he himself being in high favour at Rome:—nor is this implied in our text. The quarrel, however it originated, appears to have been carried out on Herod’s part by some commercial regulation opposed to their interest, dependent as they were on supplies from his territory.

came with one accord, viz. by a deputation.—Blastus is a Roman name, and, from Herod’s frequent visits to Rome, it is likely that he would have Romans as his confidential servants.

because their country was nourished by the king’s country] We learn from 1 Kings v. 11, that Solomon made presents of wheat and oil to Hiram in return for the cedar and fir-trees for the Lord’s house: and from Ezek. xxvii. 17, that Judah and Israel exported wheat, honey, oil, and balm (or resin) to Tyre. In Ezra iii. 7 also, we find Zerubbabel giving meat, drink, and oil to them of Sidon and Tyre, to bring cedar-trees to Joppa. Mr. Humphry quotes from Bede, ‘The Tyrians found the king’s friendship necessary to them, because their country was a very narrow strip, and close on the borders of Galilee and Damascus.’—An additional reason for their request at this particular time may have been, the prevalence of famine.

21.] The account in Josephus is remarkably illustrative of the sacred text: “The third year of his reign over all Judæa was now fulfilled, and he came to the city of Cæsarea.... and gave spectacles in honour of Cæsar.... and all the rank and wealth of the province was assembled at them. And on the second day of the spectacles, he put on a vesture all wrought of silver, so that the texture was wondrous to behold, and came into the theatre at the rising of the sun. Then the silver, struck with the first glitter of the solar rays, cast a splendid reflection, dazzling the eyes of the beholders, and struck fear into them. And immediately his flatterers called out, in words unpropitious to him or any one, from all parts of the assembly hailing him as God, Be gracious to us; if we have hitherto feared thee as a man, henceforth we confess thee more than mortal. The king did not rebuke them, nor even reject this impious flattery. Looking up however shortly after, he saw an owl over his head, sitting on a rope, and straightway felt that it was a presage of mischief.” Josephus goes on to relate that he was immediately seized with a violent pain in his bowels, of which he died after five days’ agony. On the fraud committed by Eusebius in citing this account of Josephus’s, see my Greek Test.—The circumstance related in our text, of the answer to the Sidonian embassy, of which Josephus seems not to have been aware, having been one object of Herod on the occasion, shews an accuracy of detail which well accords with the view of the material of this part of the Acts having been collected at Cæsarea, where the event happened

23.] The fact may be correctly related by Josephus (see above): but our narrative alleges the cause of what happened to have been the displeasure of God, and the stroke to have been inflicted by His angel. Compare 2 Kings xix. 35; 1 Chron. xxi. 15, 16. But no appearance of an angel is implied.

he was eaten of worms] Another additional particular; and one to be expected from a physician. In several cases of deaths by divine judgment we have accounts of this loathsome termination of the disease. See examples in my Greek Test.

24.] Similarly, ch. v. 12 ff.; vi. 7; ix. 31, a general statement of the progress and prosperity of the church of God forms the transition from one portion of the history to another.

25.] The journey (ch. xi. 30) took place after the death, or about the time of the death, of Herod; see on ver. 1. The purpose of the mission would be very soon accomplished: Saul would naturally not remain longer in Jerusalem than was unavoidable, and would court no publicity: and hence there seems an additional reason for placing the visit after Herod's death: for, of all the persons whose execution would be pleasing to the Jews, Saul would hold the foremost place. Our verse is probably inserted as a note of passage from the last recorded fact of Barnabas and Saul (xi. 30), to their being found at Antioch (xiii. 1).

CHAP. XIII. 1–XIV. 28.] FIRST MISSIONARY JOURNEY OF PAUL AND BARNABAS. Henceforward the history follows Saul (or Paul, as he is now [ver. 9] and from this time denominated) his ministry, and the events of his life, to the exclusion (with the sole exception of the council in ch. xv.) of all the other Apostles.

XIII. 1.] The word “certain” has been interpolated, to make it appear that the persons mentioned were not the only prophets and teachers at Antioch. It is omitted by all our most ancient authorities. The enumeration is probably inserted on account of the solemnity of the incident about to be related, that it might be known who they were, to whom the Holy Spirit entrusted so weighty a commission.

prophets] See on ch. xi. 27.

teachers] Those who had the gift of teaching, see 1 Cor. xii. 28; Eph. iv. 11. They were probably less immediately the organs of the Holy Spirit than the prophets, but under His continual guidance in the gradual and progressive work of teaching the Word.

Symeon that was called Niger] Nothing is known of him. From his appellation of Niger, he may have been an African proselyte.

Lucius] A Lucius, probably the same person, is mentioned Rom. xvi. 21 as a “kinsman” of Paul. There is no reason to suppose him the same with Luke (Lucas, or Lucanus)—but the contrary; for why should Paul in this case use two different names? See Col. iv. 14; 2 Tim. iv. 11; Philem. 24.

Manaen] The same name with Menahem the king of Israel, 2 Kings xv. 14. A certain Essene, of this name, foretold to Herod the Great, when a boy going to school, that he should be king of the Jews. And in consequence, when he came to the throne, he honoured Manaen, and, on his account, all the Essenes. It is then not improbable, that this Manaen may have been a son of that one: but see below. The Herod here meant was Antipas, who with his brother Archelaus (both sons of Herod the Great by Malthace a Samaritan woman, see Matt. xiv. 1, note) were brought up in a private family at Rome. Both were at this time exiles, Antipas at Lyons, Archelaus at Vienne. This Manaen had probably been Herod's foster-brother; not, ‘brought up with him,’ for, if he had been brought up with Antipas, he would also have been with Archelaus: see above.—In this case, his mother may have called her infant by the name of the person who had brought the Essenes into favour with Herod, and no relationship with that person need have existed.

Saul] mentioned last, perhaps because the prophets are placed first, and he was not one, but a teacher: or it may be, that he himself furnished the account. This circumstance, which has been objected to by some as invalidating the accuracy of the account, is in fact an interesting confirmation of it, as being eminently characteristic of him who spoke as in 1 Cor. xv. 9; 2 Cor. xii. 6; Eph. iii. 8.

2. As they ministered] The word in the original is that generally used to express the priestly service among the Jews, to which now had succeeded that of the prophets and teachers in the Christian church: ministering is therefore the only word adequate to render it, as A.V. More closely to define it is not only impracticable, but is narrowing an expression purposely left general.

the Holy Ghost said] viz. by one of the prophets present, probably Symeon or Lucius: see above. The announcement being to the church, and several persons being mentioned, we can hardly suppose it to have been an inner command merely to some one person, as in the case of Philip, ch. viii. 29. There is in the original words of the injunction of the Spirit, a precision and force implying that it was for a special purpose, and to be obeyed at the time.

the work] Certainly, by ver. 4, we may infer that there had been, or was simultaneously with this command, a divine intimation made to Barnabas and Saul of the nature and direction of this work. In general, it had already been pointed out in the case of Saul, ch. ix. 15; xxii. 21; xxvi. 17. It consisted in preaching to the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ, Eph. iii. 8. In virtue of the foundation of the Gentile churches being entrusted to them, Saul and Barnabas become after this Apostles, not vice versa; nor is there the least ground for the inference that this was a formal extension of the apostolic office, the pledge of its continuance through the episcopacy to the end of time. The apostolic office terminated with the apostolic times, and by its very nature, admitted not of continuance: the episcopal office, in its ordinary sense, sprung up after the apostolic times: and the two are entirely distinct. The confusion of the two belongs to that unsafe and slippery ground in church matters, the only logical refuge from which is in the traditional system of Rome. Jerome says, “Let bishops remember that they are greater than presbyters not so much by the strictness of divine appointment, as by custom, and that the two orders ought together to rule the church.”

3. when they had fasted and prayed] not, “when they had done fasting and praying,” this was a new fasting and special prayer for Barnabas and Saul. Fasting and prayer have ever been connected with the solemn times of ordination by the Christian church; but the fasts four times a year, or ‘ember days at the four seasons,’ for the special purpose of ordinations, were probably not introduced till the fourth or even fifth century.

4. being sent forth] Under the guidance of the Spirit, who directed their course.

Seleucia] A very strong fortified city (supposed impregnable) fifteen miles from Antioch,—on the Orontes, and five miles from its mouth. It was founded and fortified by Seleucus Nicator, who was buried there. It was called Seleucia ad Mare,—and Pieria, from Mount Pierius, on which it was built, to distinguish it from other Syrian towns of the same name. Polybius mentions, that it has but one approach from the sea, steep, and excavated by hand, with frequent flights of stairs. This excavated way is to this day conspicuous amongst the ruins of the city. It was under the Seleucid kings the capital of a district Seleucis,—and, since Pompey’s time, a free city.

they sailed to Cyprus] The lofty outline of Cyprus is visible from the mouth of the Orontes. See below, ver. 7. It was the native country of Barnabas,—and, as John Mark was his kinsman, they were likely to find more acceptance there than in other parts.

5.] Salamis was the nearest port to Seleucia on the eastern side of the island. It had a good harbour. It was the residence of a king anciently, and always one of the chief cities of the island. There were very many Jews there, as appears by there being more than one synagogue. Their numbers may have been increased by the farming of the copper-mines by Augustus to Herod. On the insurrection of the Jews in the reign of Trajan, Salamis was nearly destroyed, and they were expelled from the island. Its demolition was completed by an earthquake in the reign of Constantine, who (or his immediate successors) rebuilt it and gave it the name of Constantia. The ruins of this latter place are visible near the modern Famagusta, the Venetian capital of the island. their minister] Probably for the administration of baptism: see also 1 Cor. i. 14–17.

6.] Paphos is on the western shore, with the length of the island between it and Salamis. It is Nea Paphos which is meant, about eight miles north of the Paphos more celebrated in classic poets for the temple and worship of Venus. It was destroyed by an earthquake in Augustus’s reign, but rebuilt by him. It is now called Baffa, and contains some important ruins.

a certain sorcerer] On the prevalence of such persons at this time, see ch. viii. 9, note. The Roman aristocracy were peculiarly under the influence of astrologers and magicians, some of whom were Jews. We read of such in connexion with Marius, Pompey, Crassus, Cæsar,—and later with Tiberius: and the complaints of Horace and Juvenal shew how completely, and for how long a time, Rome was inundated with Oriental impostors of every description.

Bar-Jesus] He had given himself the Arabic title of Elymas, ‘the wise man’ (from the same root as the Turkish ‘Ulema’), interpreted a magician or sorcerer in our text.

7. the deputy] The office was that called in Latin 'proconsul,' the title of the governor of those provinces which were (semblably) left by the emperors to the government of the senate and people. The proconsul was appointed by lot, as in the times of the republic; carried with him the lictors and fasces as a consul: but had no military power, and held office only for a year. This last restriction was soon relaxed under the emperors, and they were retained five or even more years. The imperial provinces, on the other hand, were governed by a military officer, a Proprætor or Legatus of the Emperor, who was girded with the sword, and not revocable unless by the pleasure of the Emperor. The minor districts of the imperial provinces were governed by Procurators. Nothing more is known of this Sergius Paulus. Another person of the same name is mentioned by Galen, more than a century after this, as a great proficient in philosophy. He was of consular rank, and is probably the Sergius Paulus who was consul with L. Venuclius Apronianus, A.D. 168, in the reign of Marcus Aurelius.

8. Elymas] See above on ver. 6.

9. who also is called Paul] This notice marks the transition from the former part of his history, where he is uniformly called Saul, to the latter and larger portion, where he is without exception known as Paul. I do not regard it as indicative of any change of name at the time of this incident, or from that time: the evidence which I deduce from it is of a different kind, and not without interest to enquirers into the character and authorship of our history. Hitherto, our Evangelist has been describing events, the truth of which he had ascertained by research and from the narratives of others. But henceforward there is reason to think that the joint memoirs of himself and the great Apostle furnish the material of the book. In those memoirs the Apostle is universally known by the name PAUL, which superseded the other. If this was the first incident at which Luke was present, or the first memoir derived from Paul himself, or, which is plain, however doubtful may be the other alternatives, the commencement of that part of the history which is to narrate the teaching and travels of the Apostle Paul,—it would be natural that a note should be made, identifying the two names as belonging to the same person.—The also must not be understood as having any reference to Sergius Paulus, or as meaning that the Apostle 'also (as well as Sergius) was called Paul.' It signifies that Paulus was a second name borne by Saul, in conformity with a Jewish practice as old as the captivity (or even as Joseph, see Gen. xli. 45), of adopting a Gentile name. Mr. Howson traces it through the Persian period (see Dan. i. 7; Esth. ii. 7), the Greek (1 Macc. xii. 16; xvi. 11; 2 Macc. iv. 29), and the Roman (ch. i. 23; xiii. 1; xviii. 8, &c.), and the middle ages, down to modern times. Jerome has conjectured that the name was adopted by Saul in memory of this event; the subjugation of Sergius Paulus to Christ, as the first fruits of his preaching—in the same way as Scipio after the conquest of Africa was called Africanus, and Metellus was called Creticus after the conquest of Crete. It is strange that any one could be found capable of so utterly mistaking the character of St. Paul, or of producing so unfortunate an analogy to justify the mistake. It is yet stranger that Augustine should, in his Confessions, adopt the same view: "He who was the least of Thine Apostles,... loved to be called Paul, instead of Saul, as before, to commemorate so great a victory." So also Olshausen. A more probable way of accounting for the additional name is pointed out by observing that such new names were often alliterative or allusive to the original Jewish name:—he who was Jesus as a Jew, was called Jason or Justus, Col. iv. 11: see other examples in my Greek Test.

set his eyes on him] It seems probable that Paul never entirely recovered his sight as before, after the "glory of that light" (see ch. xxii. 11). We have several apparent allusions to weakness in his sight, or to something which rendered his bodily presence contemptible. In ch. xxiii. 1, the same expression, "fixing his eyes on," "earnestly beholding," A.V., "the council" occurs, and may have some bearing (see note there) on his not recognizing the high priest. See also Gal. iv. 13, 15; vi. 11, and 2 Cor. xii. 7, 9, and notes. The traditional notices of his personal appearance represent him as having contracted and overhanging eyebrows.—Whatever the word may imply, it appears like the graphic description of an eye-witness, who was not Paul himself.

10. son of the devil] Meyer supposes an indignant allusion to the name Bar-jesus (son of Jesus, or Joshua). This is possible, though hardly probable.

wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord?] This evidently applies, not to Elymas's conduct on this occasion merely, but to his whole life of imposture and perversion of others. The especial sin was, that of laying hold of the nascent enquiry after God in the minds of men, and wresting it to a wrong direction.

The Lord here and in ver. 11, is Jehovah.

11. for a season] The punishment was only temporary, being accompanied with a gracious purpose to the man himself, to awaken repentance in him.

a mist and a darkness] In the same precise and gradual manner is the healing of the lame man, ch. iii. 8, described: he stood (first), and walked. So here, first a dimness came on him,—then total darkness. And we may conceive this to have been shewn by his gestures and manner under the infliction.

12. at the doctrine of the Lord] Hesitating as he had been before between the teaching of the sorcerer and that of the Apostle, he is amazed at the divine power accompanying the latter, and gives himself up to it. It is not said that he was baptized: but the supposition is not thereby excluded: see ver. 48; ch. xvii. 12, 34; xviii. 8, first part.

13. Paul and his company] Is there not a trace of the narrator being among them, in this expression?—Henceforward Paul is the principal person, and Barnabas is thrown into the background.

Perga in Pamphylia] Perga lies on the Cestrus, which flows into the bay of Attaleia. It is sixty stadia (74 miles) from the mouth, “between and upon the sides of two hills, with an extensive valley in front, watered by the river Cestrus, and backed by the mountains of the Taurus.” (Conybeare and Howson, vol. i.p. 195, from Sir C. Fellows’s Asia Minor.) The remains are almost entirely Greek, with few traces of later inhabitants. The inhabitants of Pamphylia were nearly allied in character to those of Cilicia: and it may have been Paul’s design, having already preached in his own province, to extend the Gospel of Christ to this neighbouring people.

John probably took the opportunity of some ship sailing from Perga. His reason for returning does not appear, but may be presumed, from ch. xv. 38, to have been, unsteadiness of character, and unwillingness to face the dangers abounding in this rough district (see below). He afterwards, having been the subject of dissension between Paul and Barnabas, ch. xv. 37–40, accompanied the latter again to Cyprus; and we find him at a much later period spoken of by Paul, together with Aristarchus, and Jesus called Justus, as having been a comfort to him (Col. iv. 10, 11): and again in 2 Tim. iv. 11, as profitable to him for the ministry.

14.] It is not improbable that during this journey Paul may have encountered some of the ‘perils by robbers’ of which he speaks, 2 Cor. xi. 26. The tribes inhabiting the mountains which separate the table-land of Asia Minor from the coast, were notorious for their lawless and marauding habits. Strabo says of Isauria, that its inhabitants were all robbers, and of the Pisidians, that, like the Cilicians, they have great practice in plundering. He gives a similar character of the Pamphylians. ANTIOCH IN PISIDIA was founded originally by the Magnetes on the Meander, and subsequently by Seleucus Nicator; and became, under Augustus, a Roman colony. Its position is described by Strabo as being on a hill, and was unknown or wrongly placed till Mr. Arundell found its ruins at a place now called Yalobatch, answering to Strabo’s description; where since an inscription has been found with the letters ANTIOCHEAE CAESARE.

15.] The divisions of the law and prophets at present in use among the Jews were probably not yet arranged. Before the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, the Law only was read in the synagogues: but, this having been forbidden by him, the Prophets were substituted:—and, when the Maccabees restored the reading of the Law, that of the Prophets continued as well.

sent unto them] Then they were not sitting in the foremost seats, Matt. xxiii. 6, but somewhere among the congregation. The message was probably sent to them as having previously to this taught in the city, and thus being known to have come for that purpose. See, as illustrating our narrative, Luke iv. 17 ff. and notes.

16. beckoning with his hand] As was his practice: so he stretched forth the hand, ch. xxvi. 1. See also ch. xxi. 40. The contents of this speech (vv. 16–41) may be thus arranged: I. Recapitulation of God’s ancient deliverances of His people and mercies towards them, ending with His crowning mercy, the sending of the Deliverer and promised Son of David (vv. 16–25). II. The history of the rejection of Jesus by the Jews, and of God’s fulfilment of His promise by raising Him from the dead (vv. 26–37). III. The personal application of this to all present,—the announcement to them of justification by faith in Jesus, and solemn warning against the rejection of Him. It is in the last degree unsafe to argue, as Dr. Wordsworth has done, that because Strabo asserts the language of the Pisidians to have been neither Greek nor Lydian, St. Paul must have spoken to them by virtue of his miraculous gift of tongues. To the question put by Dr. W., “In what language did St. Paul preach in Pisidia?” we may reply, seeing that he preached in the synagogue, after the reading of the law and prophets, “In the same language as that in which the law and prophets had just been read.”

ye that fear God] The persons thus addressed here, and in ver. 26, formed a distinct class, viz. the (uncircumcised) proselytes of the gate; not excluding even such pious Gentiles, not proselytes in any sense, who might be present. The speech, from the beginning and throughout, is universal in its application, embracing Jews and Gentiles.

17. of this people of Israel] Grotius thinks that as the Apostle said these words, he pointed with his hand to the Jews. Or rather, perhaps by the word this he indicated, without gesture, the people in whose synagogue they were assembled.

our fathers] It is evident that the doctrine so much insisted on afterwards by St. Paul, that all believers in Christ were the true children of Abraham, was fully matured already: by the words this people he alludes to the time when God was the God of the Jews only: by this us he unites all present in the now extended inheritance of the promises made to the fathers.

exalted the people] Evidently an allusion to Isa. i. 2, where the word is also used in the sense of ‘bringing up,’ nourishing to manhood. This was done by increasing them in Egypt so that they became a great nation: see Gen. xlvi. 19. There is no reference to any exaltation of the people during their stay in Egypt: whether by their deliverance, or by the miracles of Moses, or by Joseph's preferment to honour.

18. he bore them as a nurse beareth a child] The adoption of this rendering, instead of that of the A.V., depends on the change of one letter in the Greek. ‘The word is “etrop (or, ph) ophoresen:” the former being the reading rendered in the A.V. But the other is the more probable, both from the MSS. here, and from the Heb. of Deut. i. 31, and the expansion of the same image in Num. xi. 12.

19. seven nations] See Deut. vii. 1; Josh. iii. 10; xxiv. 11.—From the occurrence of manifest references, in these opening verses of the speech, to Deut. i. and Isa. i., combined with the fact that these two chapters form the present lessons in the synagogues on one and the same sabbath, Bengel and Stier conclude that they had been then read. It may have been so: but see on ver. 15.

20.] Taking the words as they stand, no other sense can be given to them, than that the time of the judges lasted 450 years. And we have exactly the same chronological arrangement in Josephus; who reckons 592 years from the Exodus to the building of Solomon's temple,—arranging the period thus: (1) forty years in the wilderness: (2) twenty-five years under Joshua: (3) Judges (below): (4) forty years under Saul, see on ver. 21: (5) forty years under David, 1 Kings ii. 11: (6) four years of Solomon's own reign. This gives 592 minus 149, i.e. 443 years (about 450) for the judges, including Samuel. That this chronology differs widely from 1 Kings vi. 1, is most evident,—where we read that Solomon began his temple in the four hundred and eightieth (LXX, four hundred and fortieth) after the Exodus. All attempts to reconcile the two are arbitrary and forced. See some such recounted in my Greek Test. It seems then that St. Paul followed a chronology current among the Jews, and agreeing with the book of Judges itself (the spaces of time in which, added together, come exactly to 450), and that adopted by Josephus, but not with that of our present Hebrew text of 1 Kings vi. 1.

Samuel] mentioned as the terminus of the period of the Judges, also as having been so nearly concerned in the setting up over them of Saul and David.

21. Saul.... a man of the tribe of Benjamin] It may be not altogether irrelevant to notice that a Saul, a man of the tribe of Benjamin, was speaking; and to trace in this minute specification something characteristic and natural.

by the space of forty years] So also Josephus. In the Old Testament the length of Saul's reign is not specified; 1 Sam. vii. 2 gives no reason, as Bengel thinks, why Saul's reign should have been less than twenty years, as the twenty years there mentioned do not extend to the bringing up of the ark by David, but only to the circumstances mentioned in the following verses. Biscoe has well shewn, that as Saul was a young man when anointed king, and Ishboseth his youngest son (1 Chron. viii. 33) was forty years old at his death (2 Sam. ii. 10), his reign cannot have been much short of that period. It is clearly against the construction to suppose Samuel's time as well as Saul's included in the forty years, following as they do upon the verb “gave them.” Yet this has been done by the majority of Commentators.

22. he removed him] i.e. deposed him: in this case, by his death, for David was not made king till then. Or perhaps the word may refer to the sentence pronounced against Saul, 1 Sam. xiii. 14, or xv. 23, 28, and the following verb, raised up, to the whole process of the exaltation of David to be king. But I prefer the former.

to whom he gave testimony, and said] The two passages, Ps. lxxxix. 20, and 1 Sam. xiii. 14, are interwoven together: both were spoken of David, and both by prophetic inspiration. They are cited from memory, neither the words “the son of Jesse,” nor “which shall fulfil all my will,” being found in them. These latter words are spoken of Cyrus, see Isa. xliv. 28. That such citations are left in their present shape in our text, forms a strong presumption that we have the speeches of St. Paul word for word as delivered by him, and no subsequent general statement of what he said, in which case the citation would have been corrected by the sacred text.

23. hath God according to promise brought...] viz. the promise in Zech. iii. 8, where the very word “bring forth” is used; not however excluding the many other promises to the same effect.

24. before the presence of his coming] referring to “brought” above, when his coming forward publicly was about to take place.

25.] ‘Ihe expression “to fulfil (or finish) a course” is peculiar to St. Paul: see ch. xx. 24; 2 Tim. iv. 7. On this course see Luke iii. 15 ff.

26.] The same two classes, (see on ver. 16,) Jews, and God-fearing Gentiles, are here again addressed: and this should be more distinctly marked in the version, than is done in the A.V. this salvation] viz. the salvation implied in Jesus being a Saviour—salvation by Him.

27.] On the peculiar construction of this verse, almost unintelligible in any English representation, consult my Greek Test.

28. when they found] Not, ‘though,’ but rather because they found no cause: when they found no cause of death in him, they besought, &c.: see Luke xxiii. 22, 23.

29.] De Wette rightly remarks, that St. Paul, in this compendious narrative, makes no distinction between friend and foe in what was done to our Lord, but regards both as fulfilling God’s purpose regarding Him. I may add that there is also a contrast between what men did to Him, and God’s raising Him, ver. 30.—Joseph and Nicodemus, be it observed, were both rulers. Paul touches but lightly on the cross of Christ, and hastens on to the great point, the Resurrection, as the fulfilment of prophecy and seal of the Messiahship of Jesus.

31.] The now gives peculiar force to the sentence. Who are at this moment witnesses,—living witnesses; i.e. ‘I am not telling you a matter of the past merely, but one made present to the people of the Jews by living and eye-witnessing testimony.’

32. we declare unto you] He and Barnabas were not of the number of those who came up with Him from Galilee unto Jerusalem, ver. 31, nor was their mission to the Jewish people. ‘They are at this moment witnessing to the people, we, preaching to you.’ The we is emphatic. Stier observes how entirely Paul sinks himself, his history and commission from Christ, in the great Object of his preaching.

33. in that he hath raised up Jesus] The term raised up is ambiguous: but here the meaning, from the dead, is absolutely required by the context; both because the word is repeated with that addition (ver. 34), and because the Apostle’s emphasis throughout the passage is on the Resurrection (ver. 30) as the final fulfilment of God’s promises regarding Jesus. The other meaning, ‘having raised up,’ as in ch. vii. 37, is however maintained by several Commentators. Meyer well remarks, that this meaning would hardly in our passage have been thought of or defended, had it not been that the subjoined citation from Ps. ii. has been thought necessarily to apply to our Lord’s mission upon earth.

The reading of some of our ancient authorities here, in the first psalm, is to be accounted for by the fact that anciently our second Psalm was the first, our first being reckoned as prefatory. St. Paul refers the prophecy in its full completion to the Resurrection of our Lord: similarly in Rom. i. 4, “declared to be the Son of God with power.... by the resurrection from the dead.”

34. now no more to return...] Compare Rom. vi. 9, “Christ being raised from the dead, dieth no more: death hath no more dominion over him.” It is interesting to trace the same shades of thought in the speeches and epistles of Paul; and abundant opportunity of doing so will occur as we proceed.—But here the returning to corruption does not merely imply death, so that Jesus should have once undergone it, and no more hereafter, as the A.V. seems to imply: but we must supply ‘to die, and in consequence to’ before the words, understanding them as the result of death, if it had dominion over Him: thus the clause answers even more remarkably to Rom. vi. 9.

the holy things is the LXX rendering of the Hebrew word, Isa. lv. 3, which in 2 Chron. vi. 42, they have translated “the mercies.” The word ‘holy’ should have been preserved in the A.V., as answering to “thine Holy One” below; the mercies of David, holy and sure: or my holy promises which I made sure unto David.

35.] Wherefore also,—correspondent to which purpose, of His Christ not seeing corruption. he saith] viz. God, not David: the subject is continued from vv. 32 and 34, and fixed by “he said” and “I will give” just preceding,—thou shalt not suffer (literally give) and thine Holy One accurately correspond to “I will give” and “holy things” before. See on ch. ii. 27.

36.] The psalm, though spoken by David, cannot have its fulfilment in David.

his own generation] David ministered only to the generation in which he lived: but through this Man, remission of sins is preached to you and to all who believe on Him.

after he had served his own generation by the will (i. e. according to the appointment) of God] His whole course was marked out and fixed by God—he fulfilled it, and fell asleep. (See, on the whole, 2 Sam. vii. 12; 1 Kings ii. 10.)

was laid unto his fathers] An expression arising from the practice of burying families together: the expression occurs very frequently in the Old. Test.

38.] Paul speaks here of justification only in its lowest sense, as negative, and synonymous with remission of sins; he does not unfold here that higher sense of justifying, the accounting righteous, which those who have from God are just by faith. It is the first office of the Spirit by which he spoke, to convict concerning sin, before He convicts concerning righteousness: therefore he dwells on the remission of sins, merely just giving a glimpse of the great doctrine of justification, of which he had such wonderful things to write and to say.

39.] And from all things (sin), from which ye could not in (under) the law of Moses be justified in Him (as in the expression, in Christ, in the Lord, frequently), every believer is (habitual present tense) justified.... but not implying that in the law of Moses there might be justification from some sins;—under the law there is no justification (Gal. iii. 11):—but it means Christ shall do for you all that the law could not do: leaving it for inference, or for further teaching, that this was absolutely ALL: that the law could do nothing. The same thought is expanded Rom. viii. 3. This interpretation will be the more clearly established, when we remember that to justify from sin was not in any sense, and could not be the office of the law, by which came the knowledge of sin. The expression “to justify from” is only once used again by St. Paul (Rom. vi. 7, marginal rendering: the A.V. has “freed from sin,” but wrongly), and that where he is arguing against the continuing in sin. every one that believeth is not to be joined with in him, which (see above) is contrasted with in the law of Moses.—It is quite in St. Paul’s manner to use every one that believeth thus absolutely: see Rom. i. 16; iii. 22; x. 4 (Gal. iii. 22).

40.] The object of preaching the Gospel to the Jews first was for a testimony to them: its reception was almost uniformly unfavourable: and against such anticipated rejection he now warns them.

41. ye despisers] So the LXX render the Hebrew word, signifying ‘among the heathen,’ so in A.V., for which they seem to have read some other word resembling it.—The prophecy was spoken of the judgment to be inflicted by means of the Chaldaeans: but neither this nor any other prophecy is confined in its application to the occasion of which it was once spoken, but gathers up under it all analogous procedures of God’s providence: such repeated fulfilments increasing in weight, and approaching nearer and nearer to that last and great fulfilment of all the promises of grace and all the threats of wrath, by which every prophetic word shall be exhausted.

42.] The insertions in the text followed by the A.V. have been made partly perhaps to remove the ambiguity in the “they” and “them,” and to shew who they were that besought, &c. But they confuse the sense. As they (the congregation) were going out, they (the same) besought.

43.) See a similar expression ch. xi. 23. There too, we have the grace of God similarly used of the work of the Gospel begun in the hearts of the converts.

44. came... together] ‘In the synagogue;’ it was the sight of the Gentile crowds in their house of prayer which stirred up the jealousy of the Jews.

45. contradicting and blaspheming] These words form a graphic repetition, passing from the particular thing which they did, viz. contradict the words spoken by Paul, to the spirit in which they did it, viz. a contradictory and blaspheming one.

46. should first have been spoken to you] See ch. iii. 26; Rom. i. 16.

47.] They refer the word thee in the prophecy not to themselves as teachers, but to Christ.

48. as many as were disposed to eternal life] ‘The meaning of this word disposed must be determined by the context. The Jews had judged themselves unworthy of eternal life: the Gentiles, as many as were disposed to eternal life, believed. By whom so disposed, is not here declared: nor need the word be in this place further particularized. We know, that it is GOD who worketh in us the will to believe, and that the preparation of the heart is of Him: but to find in this text pre-ordination to life asserted, is to force both the word and the context to a meaning which they do not contain. The word in the original is the same as in 1 Cor. xvi. 15, where it is said that the house of Stephanas “have addicted themselves to the ministry of the saints,” and in Rom. xvii. 1, where it is said that “the powers that be are ordained of God:” in both of which places the agents are expressed, whereas here the word is used absolutely, without an agent expressed. Calvin, &c., find here predestination in the strongest sense: “This ordaining can be referred only to the eternal decree of God... It is a ridiculous cavil to refer it to the mind of those who believed, as if they received the Gospel who were properly disposed in their minds.” So the Vulgate translates the word “pre-ordained,” and Augustine, “destined.” here are several other renderings, which see in my Greek Test. Dr. Wordsworth well observes, that it would be interesting to enquire what influence such renderings as this of “pre-ordained” in the Vulgate version had on the minds of men like St. Augustine and his followers in the Western Church, in treating the great questions of free will, election, reprobation, and final perseverance; and on some writers in the reformed churches who, though rejecting the authority of that version, were yet swayed by it away from the sense of the original, here and in ch. ii. 47. The tendency of the Eastern Fathers, who read the original Greek, was, he remarks, in a different direction from that of the Western School.

50. devout... women] Women had a strong religious influence both for and against Christianity: see for the former ch. xvi. 14;

xvii. 4; Phil. iv. 3; 1 Cor. vii. 16: for the latter, we have Josephus's statement, that the majority of the wives of the Damascenes were proselytes: which may be compared with ch. ix. 22–25. These were proselytes of the gate, or at least inclined to Judaism.

expelled them] Though the chief men of the city, at the instigation, probably, of their wives, were concerned, this seems to have been no legal expulsion: for we find them revisiting Antioch on their return, ch. xiv. 21;—but only a compulsory retirement for peace, and their own safety's sake. 51.] As commanded by our Lord, Matt. x. 14, where see note.

Iconium] A populous city, east of Antioch in Pisidia, lying in a fertile plain at the foot of, and almost surrounded by, Mount Taurus. At this time, it was the capital of Lycaonia, and had around it a distinct territory, ruled by a tetrarch, and probably on that account is not reckoned to any of the above-mentioned districts. It became famous in the middle ages as the capital of the Seljukian Sultans, and had a great part in the growth of the Ottoman empire. It is now Konía, a town of 30, 000 inhabitants.

52.] See, for similar “joyful perorations,” as Dr. Wordsworth well designates them, Luke xxiv. 52; ch. v. 41; xii. 24.

Acts: Chapter 14

CHAP. XIV. 1. Greeks] Probably these were of the number of the devout persons, or worshippers of God, mentioned ch. xiii. 43, 50; xvi. 14; xvii. 4, 17; xviii. 7, i.e. those of the uncircumcised who were more or less attached to the Jewish religion.

2.] which believed not, viz. when Paul preached.

Ver. 3 gives the sequel of ver. 1,—ver. 4, of ver. 2.

3. speaking boldly in the Lord] i.e. ‘speaking with boldness, which boldness was grounded on confidence in the Lord.’ By the Lord here is meant GOD: see ch. iv. 29, 30, and ch. xx. 32, where we have joined together “God, and the word of His grace.” and granted] or, by granting, &c.

4.] This was the way in which God bore His testimony. Such a split into two factions was a common occurrence, on far less important occasions, in these cities of Oriental Greeks.

5.] Dr. Howson remarks, that there was no “assault” made on them, as the A.V. has it; for if there had been, they could not but have been ware of it: but a stir, or movement, was going on which would have led to an assault, had they not been ware of it.

6. Lystra] This, as well as Derbe (of both which very little further is known), was probably a small town at the foot of the singular mountain-mass known as the Kara-dagh, or black mountain, Lystra being S., and Derbe S.E. from Iconium. The sites are very uncertain. There are the ruins of about forty Christian churches on the north side of the Kara-dagh, at a place called by the Turks Binbir-Kilisseh (the 1001 churches), which the most recent travellers believe may be Lystra. In one of these places (probably at Lystra, see note, ch. xvi. 1) Paul found and took up Timothy on his second journey; and from the expression “my beloved child” in 1 Cor. iv. 17, compared with the use of “father” in the same chapter, as defined ver. 15, we are justified in concluding that he had been converted by the Apostle; and, if so, during this visit.—There appear to have been few Jews in the district: we hear of no synagogue. Lycaonia] Strabo describes Lycaonia as a hilly plain among the mountain-spurs of Taurus, very ill watered, cold and bare, but exceedingly adapted for sheep-pasture and the growth of wool.

9.] The imperfect tense here in the original is important. He was listening to Paul's preaching, and, while listening, his countenance, read by the Apostle's gift of spiritual discernment, gave token of faith to be healed.

stedfastly beholding him] See note on ch. xiii. 9.

10. with a loud voice] The original implies that he suddenly raised his voice above the tone in which he was before speaking.

11. in the speech (dialect) of Lycaonia] The nature of this dialect is uncertain. The notice is inserted to shew that the Apostles had no knowledge of the inference drawn by the crowd, till they saw the bulls being brought to their doors, ver. 13. So Chrysostom: “This was not yet known to the Apostles: for the men spake in their own tongue, and thus conveyed no meaning to them.” See, on the real nature of the gift of tongues, and the bearing of notices of this kind on its consideration, the note on ch. ii. 4.—These appearances of the gods are frequent subjects of heathen poetry and mythology. It was in the neighbouring country of Phrygia that Jupiter and Mercury were said to have wandered, and to have been entertained by Baucis and Philemon.

12.] This distinction is (besides the reason given) in accordance with what Paul himself cites (as the saying of his adversaries, it is true, but not therefore without some physical foundation), “his bodily presence is weak.” So Chrysostom, adding, “Barnabas seems to me to have been a person of noble appearance and bearing.”

leader of the discourse] Titles like this were commonly given to Hermes, the god of eloquence.

13. which was before their city] i.e. which was the defender, or tutelar god, of their city.

bulls and garlands] The meaning is not that the bulls were wreathed with the garlands: these last may have been to hang on the doors of the house where the Apostles were: or for manifold purposes connected with the sacrifice. They brought them, not to the gates of the city, but to the doors of the outer court of the house: see ch. xii. 13.

14. the apostles] This is the first place where Paul and Barnabas are so called. St. Paul constantly claims for himself the title in his Epistles: see Rom. i. 1; 1 Cor. i. 1; ix. 1; xv. 9; 2 Cor. i. 1; Gal. i. 1; Col. i. 1; 1 Tim. i. 1; 2 Tim. i. 1; Tit. i. 1. It seems to have been borne in this higher sense also by James the Lord’s brother: see Gal. i. 19, and note, and the Introduction to the Epistle of James: and by Barnabas, here and in 1 Cor. ix. 5, 6: see also Gal. ii. 9. So that there were, widening the word beyond the Twelve, fifteen Apostles, usually so called. The word was also used in a still wider sense: see Rom. xvi. 7; 2 Cor. viii. 23 (marginal rendering); 1 Thess. ii. 6: in which latter place Silvanus and Timotheus seem to be included in it. The Apostles were within: on being told, they rushed forth into the crowd.

15.] The original, these vain... may be filled up by things or gods: more probably the latter, as contrasted with the One living God.

16.] Compare Rom. iii. 25, 26, and ch. xvii. 30.

17.] Compare Rom. i. 19, 20. The words gave us rain from heaven had a remarkable applicability in a country where we have seen from Strabo (on ver. 6) that there was great scarcity of water. He relates that in one city of Lycaonia, where water was reached by digging the wells very deep, it was sold for money.

19. who persuaded the multitude] We are told that the Lycaonians were fickle and untrustworthy. They stoned him, not in the Jewish method, but tumultuously and in the streets, dragging him out of the city afterwards.—He refers to this stoning, 2 Cor. xi. 25, “once was I stoned.”

20. the disciples stood round about him] not to bury him, but, as would naturally be the case, in mournful anxiety and regret.

he rose up] The first, and I think the right impression is, that this recovery was supernatural. It is not indeed so strongly implied, as to leave no doubt: especially as a blow from a stone would be likely to stun, and occasion the appearance of death.

Derbe] See above, on ver. 6. It is probably now Divlé. From Derbe not being enumerated, 2 Tim. iii. 11, with Antioch, Iconium, and Lystra, as the scene of any of Paul’s sufferings, we may perhaps infer that none befell him there.—They may have fled to Derbe, as being in a different jurisdiction from Lystra; the latter being comprised in the Roman province of Galatia, whereas Derbe seem to have belonged at this time to Antiochus, king of Commagéné.

21. they returned again] They were not far from the famous pass, called the ‘Cilician gates,’ which leads direct into that province: but, notwithstanding all that had befallen him, St. Paul prefers returning by the churches which he had founded, to a short and easy journey to the coast by his own home.

22. that we must...] Is not this use of the first person a token of the presence of the narrator again? My own conjecture would be, that he remained in Antioch during the journey to Iconium, &c., and back. The events between those two limits are much more summarily related than those before or after.

23. when they had elected them elders] The verb means, appointed by suffrage: and probably, by the analogy of ch. vi. 2–6 (see 2 Cor. viii. 19), the strict meaning is here to be retained. The word will not bear Jerome’s and Chrysostom’s sense of ‘laying on of hands,’ adopted by Roman Catholic expositors. Nor is there any reason here for departing from the usual meaning of electing by shew of hands. The Apostles may have admitted by ordination those presbyters whom the churches elected.

25. Attalia] A maritime town at the mouth of the river Catarrhactes, in Pamphylia, not far from the border of Lycia, built by Attalus Philadelphus, king of Pergamus, in a convenient position to command the trade of Syria or Egypt. It is still an important place, called Satalia. To reach it they had to cross the plain from Perga.

26.] from whence, as being the centre whence their apostolic commission had spread.

27. the door of faith] The same metaphor is used in 1 Cor. xvi. 9; 2 Cor. ii. 12; Col. iv. 3, by St. Paul, and shews, perhaps, his hand in the narrative.—On the explanation of long time here, see chronological table in Introduction.

CHAP. XV. 1–35.] DIFFERENCE RESPECTING THE NECESSITY OF CIRCUMCISION FOR THE GENTILE CONVERTS. COUNCIL OF THE APOSTLES AND ELDERS AT JERUSALEM.

1. certain men] Called in Gal. ii. 4 “false brethren unawares brought in, who came in privily to spy out our liberty which we have in Christ Jesus.” Some of our later MSS. read, “certain men of the sect of the Pharisees which believed,” as in ver. 5. Doubtless it was so. In spite of the special revelations which had accompanied the reception of the first Gentiles into the church, the strong Judaizing party adhered to their old prejudices respecting the necessity of conformity to the law of Moses. With this party Paul was in conflict all his life; and even long after, we find it raising its head again in the sects of the Ebionites and the Nazarenes.—Neander notices the account in Josephus, where Izates, K. of Adiabene, is converted to Judaism by a certain Ananias, who, for fear of a commotion among his people allows him to remain uncircumcised—when a certain Eleazar, who had the reputation of being very strict about his national observances, prevails on him to perform the rite, for that without it he could not be a Jew.

2.] Compare Gal. ii. 5.

should go up to Jerusalem] I assume here what seems to me to be almost beyond the possibility of question, that this journey was the same as that mentioned Gal. ii, 1–10. In that case, Paul there (ver. 2) says that he went up “by revelation.” In this expression I cannot see it necessarily implied that the revelation was made to himself, but that there was some intimation of the Holy Ghost, similar perhaps to that in ch. xiii. 2, in accordance with which the church at Antioch sent him and Barnabas; —there being prophets there, by whom the Spirit spoke His will.

certain other of them] Titus was one, Gal. ii. 1, 3, and that, in all probability, in order to give an example of a Gentile convert of the uncircumcision endowed with gifts of the Holy Spirit. Titus is not mentioned in the Acts, but only in 2 Cor., Gal., 2 Tim., and the epistle addressed to him.

3. being brought on their way by the church] This seems to have been something of an official escorting of them on the way, and perhaps parting from them with solemn commendation to God: causing great joy to them. It shews that the mind of the church was with them, not with the Judaizers. This was also the case in Phœnicia and Samaria, as is shewn by “all the brethren.”

4.] On their arrival at Jerusalem, there seems to have taken place an official reception of them and their message, in public. There they related—as a most important element for the determination of the question—God's dealings with them (see on ch. xiv. 27), and recounted the places where churches of believing Gentiles had been founded. This having taken place, a protest was entered on the part of the Pharisee believers—in no way doubting the truth of these conversions, nor in any way disparaging the ministry of Paul and Barnabas,—that it was necessary to circumcise them, i.e. those of whom they had spoken, and to command them to keep the law of Moses.—It may be objected, that this view would not be consistent with Paul’s statement, Gal. ii. 2, I communicated unto them that Gospel which I preach among the Gentiles, but privately to them which were of reputation. But I cannot see any inconsistency, if the words used in both cases be accurately weighed. To the church and apostles and elders, Paul and Barnabas gave a simple recital of how God had dealt with them among the Gentiles: but Paul did not lay before the whole assembly the Gospel which he preached among the Gentiles, viz. the indifference of the Mosaic law to their salvation (Gal. i. 7–9), for fear of its being hastily disparaged or repudiated, and so his work being hindered: “lest by any means I should run, or had run, in vain,” Gal. ii. 2. But, in private interviews with the chief Apostles, James, Peter, and John (Gal. ii. 9), he did unfold the whole freeness of this Gospel, and so effectually, us to prepare the way for their full and public accordance with him at the council.

6.] The Apostles and elders only are mentioned as having assembled: in which case “all the multitude” (ver. 12) must mean that of the elders, and the decision of ver. 22 must have been arrived at in a larger assembly. But most probably the deliberation of the Apostles and elders implied the presence of the brethren also, who are intended by “all the multitude”—and there was but one assembly. The objection, that no one place could have held them, is nugatory: the official presence of all is assumed continually in such cases, where the assembly is open to all.

7.] A promiscuous debate, not perhaps without some angry feeling, ensued on their first coming together,—and among the multitude, as is implied in ver. 12,—man disputing with man.

Peter] Partly on account of the universal deference paid to him, but principally because of his peculiar fitness to open the apostolic decisions on the subject, from having been made the instrument of the first public and approved reception of the Gentiles.

ye (emphatic) know] In Peter's speeches in ch. x., this phrase occurs at the beginning of a sentence, ver. 28, and ver. 37: and we have traces of the same way of expressing the personal pronoun in his speeches, ch. ii. 15; iii. 14, 25. Such notices are important, as shewing that these reports are not only according to the sense of what was said, but the words spoken, verbatim.

a good while ago] literally, “from ancient days.” In regard to the whole time of the Gospel up to that day (about 20 years), the date of the conversion of Cornelius, at least fifteen years before this (compare Gal. ii. 1), would very properly be so specified. The length of time elapsed is placed by Peter in the strongest light, to shew that the question had in fact been settled by divine interference long since.

8, 9.] The allusion is throughout to spiritual circumcision, as the purification of the heart. God, who saw deeper than the mere fleshly distinction between Jew and Gentile, who knows that the hearts of all are unclean, and that the same all-sufficient sacrifice can cleanse them all, if applied by faith (compare the remarkable parallel, 1 Pet. i. 18–22 incl.), put no difference between us and them, but has been pleased to render them spiritually clean.

purifying their hearts, not simply ‘by faith,’ but by their faith, or by the faith in Christ.

a yoke] See Gal. v. 1. Peter could not be so much referring to the mere outward observance of ceremonies, which he himself and the Jewish converts thought it expedient to retain,—but to the imposition of the law, as a condition of salvation, on the consciences of the disciples. This being so, the words, “which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear,” will refer, not to the burdensomeness of ceremonies, but to the far more grievous burden of legal death, of which Paul cries out so bitterly in Rom. vii. 24,—and says, Gal. v. 3, “I testify to every man that is circumcised, that he is a debtor to do the whole law.”

11.] Seeing that we all in common believe that the grace of Christ is the sufficient, and only cause of our salvation, it can neither be reasonable nor according to God's will, to fetter that grace with superfluous and vexatious conditions. See nearly the same argument retorted on Peter himself, Gal. ii. 14 ff.

even as also they] they are the Gentile Christians, not our fathers:—their ground of trust is the same as ours: ours, no more than theirs.

12.] The multitude (see above) then,—and not before, on account of their mutual disputes,—being tranquillized by Peter's speech, quietly received from Paul and Barnabas an account of the seals of signs and wonders by which God had stamped the approval of their ministry among the Gentiles. The miracles at Paphos and Lystra would be among the principal of these.

13.] after they had held their peace, viz. Paul and Barnabas. Both had spoken; doubtless wonders, unrecorded, had been wrought by the hand of Barnabas, which he had recounted.

James] See note, ch. xii. 17, and the Introduction to the Epistle of James. I assume here, that this is James the Just, the brother of the Lord, the author of the Epistle: and though au Apostle (Gal. i. 19: see also note on ch. xiv. 14), not one of the Twelve. If we may presume to judge from the character of his Epistle, to say nothing of the particulars which tradition has handed down concerning him, his decision would come with remarkable weight on this occasion. For he is, among all the sacred writers of the New Test., the representative of the strictest adherence to and loftiest appreciation of the pure standard of legal morality. All that the law was, from its intrinsic holiness, justice, and goodness (Rom. vii. 12), capable of being to Christians, he would be sure to attribute to it. And therefore when his judgment, as well as that of Peter, is given in favour of the freedom of the Gentiles, the disputers, even of the Pharisaic party, are silenced. There does not seem to be in the following speech any decision ex cathedra, either in the words, “hearken unto me,” or in “my sentence is” (ver. 19): the decision lay in the weightiness, partly no doubt of the person speaking, but principally of the matter spoken by him.

14. Symeon] James characteristically uses this Jewish form of the name: so also Peter himself, 2 Pet. i. 1 (original; and margin, A.V.). The name occurs Gen. xxix. 33, LXX; Luke ii. 25; iii. 30; ch. xiii. 1; Rev. vii. 7: the name Simon, elsewhere used in the N.T. for Peter, is found (Shimon) in 1 Chron. iv. 20.

for his name] for the service, or the making known, of His Name.

a people, answering to the people, so well known as His by covenant before.

16–18.] The citation from Amos is made freely from the LXX: differing widely in the latter part from our present Hebrew text, which see in the A.V. at the place. Of this we may at least be sure, that James, even if (as I believe) he spoke in Greek, and quoted as here given, would not himself (nor would the Pharisees present have allowed it) have quoted any rendering, especially where the stress of his argument lay in it, at variance with the original Hebrew.—The prophecy regards that glorious restitution of the kingdom to (the Son of) David, which should be begun by the incarnation of the Lord, and perfected by His reign over all nations. During the process of this restitution those nations, as the effect of the rebuilding, should seek the Lord,—to whomsoever the gospel should be preached. There is here neither assertion nor negation of the national restoration of the Jews. Be this as it may (and I firmly believe in the literal accomplishment of all the prophecies respecting them as a nation), it is obvious, on any deep view of prophetic interpretation, that the glorious things which shall have a fulfilment in the literal Israel, must have their complete and more worthy fulfilment in the spiritual theocracy, of which the Son of David is the head.

17. upon whom my name is called] Notice the same expression in the Epistle of James, ch. ii. 7.

18.] The variation of reading here is remarkable. The text which I have given is in all probability the original, and the words inserted in the common text have been intended as a help out of the difficulty. Not only are they wanting in several ancient MSS., but they bear the sure mark of spuriousness,—manifold variations in the MSS. where they do occur. The sense, and account of the text seem to be this: the Apostle paraphrases the words who maketh [all] these things of the LXX, adding known from the beginning of the world, and intending to express ‘saith the Lord, who from the beginning revealed these things,’ viz. by the prophet just cited. The addition has been made to fill up the apparently elliptical “known from the beginning of the world,” which not being found in the passage of Amos, was regarded as a sentence by itself. These last words may perhaps be an allusion to the mystery of the admission of the Gentiles into the church, which was now being revealed practically, and had been from of old announced by the prophets: compare Rom. xvi. 25, 26; Eph. iii. 5, 6, &c.

19.] not, as A.V. ‘are turned,’ but are turning:—the converts daily gathered into the church.

20.] The pollutions of idols are the things polluted by being offered to idols, about which there was much doubt and contention in the early church:—see Exod. xxxiv. 15, and 1 Cor. viii. and x. 19.

fornication] It may seem strange that a positive sin should be made the subject of these enactments which mostly regard things in themselves indifferent, but rendered otherwise by expediency and charity to others. In consequence we have the following attempts to evade the simple rendering of the word: (1) Some explain it of spiritual fornication in eating things offered to idols: (2) others, of the committal of actual fornication at the rites in idol temples, &c. See further in my Greek Test. But the solution will best be found in the fact, that fornication was universally in the Gentile world regarded on the same footing with the other things mentioned, as indifferent, and is classed here as Gentiles would be accustomed to hear of it, among those things which they allowed themselves, but which the Jews regarded as forbidden. The moral abomination of the practice is not here in question, but is abundantly set forth by our Lord and his Apostles in other places.

things strangled] as containing the blood,—see Levit. xvii. 13, 14.

blood] in any shape: see Gen. ix. 4; Levit. xvii. 13, 14; Deut. xii. 23, 24. Some of the fathers, and others, interpret the word of homicide, which is refuted by the context.

21.] Living as the Gentile converts would be in the presence of Jewish Christians, who heard these Mosaic prohibitions read, as had been from generations past, in their synagogues, it would be well for them to avoid all such conduct and habits as would give unnecessary offence. On the reading of the law, &c., in the synagogues, see ch. xiii. 15, note.

22. Barsabas] In most of our old authorities, Barsabbas. Of this Judas nothing further is known than that (ver. 32) he was a ‘prophet’ (see ch. xiii. 1). Wolf and Grotius hold him to have been the brother of Joseph Barsabas, ch. i. 23.

Silas] otherwise Silvanus: the former name is found in the Acts, the latter in the Epp. of Paul. He also was a ‘prophet’ (ver. 32). He accompanied Paul on his second missionary journey through Asia Minor and Macedonia (ver. 40—ch. xvii. 10),—remained behind in Berea (xvii. 14), and joined Paul again in Corinth (xviii. 5; 1 Thess. i. 1; 2 Thess. i. 1), where he preached with Paul and Timotheus (2 Cor. i. 19). Whether the Silvanus (1 Pet. v. 12), by whom the first Epistle of Peter was carried to the churches of Asia Minor, was the same person, is altogether uncertain. Tradition distinguishes Silas from Silvanus, making the former bishop of Corinth, the latter of Thessalonica. On the hypothesis which identifies Silas with Luke, and makes him the author of the Acts, see Introduction to Acts, §1. 11. b, c. I may repeat here, that in my mind the description of Silas here as one of the “chief men among the brethren,” of itself, especially when contrasted with the preface to Luke’s gospel, would suffice to refute the notion. It has been also supposed that Silas (because it may signify third in Hebrew) is the same name with Tertius who wrote the Ep. to the Romans, Rom. xvi. 22: but without reason.

23.] In this, the first official mention of elders, it is very natural that the import of the term should be thus given by attaching brethren to it.

send greeting] The word used is the Greek form of salutation: and the only other place where it occurs in an apostolic document (we have it in the letter of the chief captain Lysias, ch. xxiii. 26) is in James i. 1, which has been remarked as a coincidence serving to shew his hand in the drawing up of this Epistle.

Cilicia] This mention of churches in Cilicia, coupled with the fact of Paul’s stay at Tarsus (ch. ix. 30–xi. 25: see also Gal. i. 21), makes it probable that Paul preached the gospel there, and to Gentiles, in accordance with the vision which he had in the temple (ch. xxii. 21).

24. subverting] The word implies turning up the foundations. The words “saying ye must be circumcised and keep the law,” inserted in the common text, are manifestly, in my view, an interpolation, from the desire to specify in what particulars these persons had sought to unsettle the souls of the Gentile brethren. The persons to whom the epistle was addressed would very well know what it was that had disturbed their minds, and the omission of formal mention of it would be natural, to avoid prominent cause of offence to the Jewish converts by an apparent depreciation of circumcision and the observance of the law.

25. Barnabas and Paul] Paul has generally been mentioned first, since ch. xiii. 43. (The exception, ch. xiv. 14, appears to arise from the people calling Barnabas Jupiter, and thus giving him the precedence in ver. 12, after which the next mention of them follows the same order.) But here, as at ver. 12, we have naturally the old order of precedence in the Jerusalem congregation preserved.

26. men that have delivered up their lives] The sacrifice of their lives was made by them: they were martyrs in will, though their lives had not as yet been laid down in point of fact.—This is mentioned to shew that Paul and Barnabas could have no other motive than that of serving the Lord Jesus Christ, and to awaken trust in the minds of the churches. But, although this was so, the Apostles and Elders did not think proper to send only Paul and Barnabas, who were already so deeply committed by their acts to the same side of the question as the letter which they bore,—but as direct authorities from themselves, Judas and Silas also, who might by word confirm the contents of the Epistle.

27.] the same things as above, the contents of the Epistle (and any explanation required): not, as Neander, ‘the same things as Paul and Barnabas have preached:’ by mouth, as opposed to ‘by letter,’ decides against this interpretation.

28. it seemed good to the Holy Ghost, and to us] Not to the Holy Ghost in us,—but as, in ch. v. 32, the Holy Spirit, given to the Apostles and testifying by His divine power, is coupled with their own human testimony,—so here the decision of the Holy Spirit, given then as leaders of the church, is laid down as the primary and decisive determination on the matter,—and their own formal ecclesiastical decision follows, as giving utterance and scope to His will and command. The other interpretation weakens this accuracy of expression, and destroys the propriety of the sentence.

32.] The statement, that they were prophets also themselves, gives the reason for their superadding to the appointed business of their mission the work of exhorting and edifying.—On the prophets see ch. xi. 27; xiii. 1: Eph. ii. 20, and notes.

34. omitted] On every account it is probable that the words forming this verse in the common text are an interpolation, to account for Silas being found again at Antioch in ver. 40. On this his subsequent presence at Antioch, see note, ver. 40.—We learn from Gal. ii. 10, that a condition was attached to the cordiality with which the Gentile mission of Paul and Barnabas was recognized by the chief Apostles;—that they should remember the poor, i.e. the poor at Jerusalem:—that the wants of the mother church should not be forgotten by those converts, whose Judaical bond to her was thus cast loose. This was an object which Paul was ever most anxious to subserve. See Gal. 1. c. and note.

35.] teaching, to those who had received it,—preaching to those who had not.

36—CH. XVIII. 22.] PAUL’S SECOND MISSIONARY JOURNEY (unaccompanied by Barnabas, on account of a difference between them) THROUGH ASIA MINOR TO MACEDONIA AND GREECE, AND THENCE BY SEA, TOUCHING AT EPHESUS, TO JERUSALEM AND BACK TO ANTIOCH.

36. some days after] How long, we are not informed but perhaps (?) during this time took place that visit of Peter to Antioch mentioned Gal. ii. 11 ff., when he sacrificed his Christian consistency and better persuasions to please some Judaizers, and even Barnabas was led away with the dissimulation. On this occasion Paul boldly rebuked him. See, on the whole occurrence,

38.] The form of this verse, as literally rendered from the Greek, is: But Paul thought proper, (as to) one who had fallen off from them from Pamphylia, and had not gone with them to the work, not to take with them that man. We may well believe that St. Paul's own mouth gave originally the character to the sentence.

who departed from them] See ch. xiii. 13. It hence is evident that his departure was not by the authority of the Apostles.

39.] "Paul sought justice, Barnabas courtesy," Chrysostom: who also remarks on their separate journeys,— "It seems to me that their parting was by agreement, and that they said to one another, 'Since you will it, and I do not, that we be not at strife, let us divide our courses.' So that they did this out of a yielding spirit to one another." Yet it seems as if there were a considerable difference in the character of their setting out. Barnabas appears to have gone with his nephew without any special sympathy or approval; whereas Paul was commended to the grace of God by the assembled church.—We find Mark afterwards received into favour by Paul, see Col. iv. 10; 2 Tim. iv. 11; and in the former of those places it would seem as if he was dependent for his reception on Paul's special commendation.

40. Silas] He may perhaps have come down again to Antioch (see ver. 33) in Peter's company. We find (see above on ver. 22) a Silvanus (which is the same name) in 1 Pet. v. 12, the bearer of that epistle to the congregations of Asia Minor.

41. Syria and Cilicia] See note, ver. 23. Here we finally lose sight of Barnabas in the sacred record.

CHAP. XVI. 1.] We have Derbe first, as lying nearest to the pass from Cilicia into Lycaonia and Cappadocia. Paul probably travelled by the ordinary road through the 'Cilician gates,' a rent or fissure in the mountain-chain of Taurus, extending from north to south through a distance of eighty miles. See various interesting particulars in Conybeare and Howson, i.p. 301 ff. and notes.

was there] At Lysstra: which, and not Derbe, was in all probability the birth-place of Timotheus, see on ch. xx. 4. This view is confirmed by ver. 2.—He had probably been converted by Paul during his former visit, as he calls him his son in the Lord, 1 Cor. iv. 17; 1 Tim. i. 2; 2 Tim. i. 2; perhaps at Antioch in Pisidia, see 2 Tim. iii. 10, 11. His mother was Eunice, his grandmother, Lois,—both women of well-known piety, 2 Tim. i. 5. Whether his father was a proselyte of the gate or not, is uncertain: he certainly was uncircumcised. He would be, besides his personal aptness for the work, singularly fitted to be the coadjutor to Paul, by his mixed extraction forming a link between Jews and Greeks.

2.] Some of these testimonies were probably intimations of the Spirit respecting his fitness for the work: for Paul speaks, 1 Tim. i. 18, of "the prophecies which went before on thee" (see ch. xiii. 1, 3). He was set apart for the work by the laying on of the hands of Paul and of the presbytery, 1 Tim. iv. 14; 2 Tim. i. 6, after he had made a good confession before many witnesses, 1 Tim. vi. 12.

3. took and circumcised him] Every Israelite might perform the rite.

because of the Jews] That he might not at once, wherever he preached, throw a stumbling-block before the Jews, by having with him one by birth a Jew, but uncircumcised. There was here no concession in doctrine at all, and no reference whatever to the duty of Timotheus himself in the matter. In the case of Titus, a Greek, he dealt otherwise, no such reason existing: Gal. ii. 3.

4. through the cities] Iconium, and perhaps Antioch in Pisidia. He might at Iconium see the elders of the church of Antioch, as he did afterwards those of Ephesus at Miletus. If he went to Antioch, he might regain his route into Phrygia and Galatia by crossing the hills east of that city.

5.] This general notice, like those at ch. ix. 31, xii. 24, marks the opening of a new section.

6–9.] This very cursory notice of a journey in which we have reason to think so much happened,—the founding of the Galatian and Phrygian churches (see ch. xviii. 23, where we find him, on his second visit, "confirming all the disciples"), the sickness of the Apostle, alluded to Gal. iv. 13; the working of miracles and imparting of the Spirit mentioned Gal. iii. 5; the warmth and kindness of feeling shewn to Paul in his weakness, Gal. iv. 14–16, seems to shew that the narrator was not with him during this part of the route; an inference which is remarkably confirmed by the sudden resumption of circumstantial detail with the use of the first person, at ver. 10.

6. Phrygia] There were two tracts of country called by this name: one near the Hellespont, the other called Phrygia major. It is with the latter that we are here concerned, which was the great central space of Asia Minor, yet retaining the name of its earliest inhabitants, and on account of its being politically subdivided among the contiguous provinces, impossible to define accurately.—The Apostle's route must remain very uncertain. It is probable that he may have followed the great road (according to his usual practice and the natural course of a missionary journey) from Iconium to Philomelium and perhaps as far as Synnada, and thence struck off to the N.E. towards Pessinus in Galatia. That he visited Colossæ, in the extreme S.W. of Phrygia, on this journey, as supposed by some, is very improbable.

the region of Galatia] The midland district, known as Galatia, or Gallo-græcia, was inhabited by the descendants of those Gauls who invaded Greece and Asia in the third century B.C., and after various incursions and wars, settled and became mixed with the Greeks in the centre of Asia Minor. They were known as a brave and freedom-loving people, fond of war, and either on their own or others' account, almost always in arms, and generally as cavalry. Jerome says that their speech was like that of the Germans in the neighbourhood of Treves: and perhaps the speech of Lycaonia ch. xiv. 11, spoken of the neighbouring district, may refer to this peculiar dialect. But Greek was extensively spoken. They were conquered by the consul Cn. Manlius Vulso, 189 B.C., but retained their own governors, called as before tetrarchs, and afterwards kings (for one of whom, Deiotarus, a protégé of Pompey's, Cicero pleaded before Cæsar); their last king, Amyntas, passed over from Antony to Augustus in the battle of Actium. Galatia, after his murder, A.D. 26, became a Roman province. The principal cities were Aneyra,—which was made the metropolis of the province by Augustus,—Tavium, and Pessinus: in all, or some of which, the Apostle certainly preached. He was detained here on account of sickness (Gal. iv. 13). See further in Introduction to the Epistle to the Galatians, §2.

Asia] This name, applied at first to the district near the river Caÿster in Lydia, came to have a meaning more and more widely extended, till at last it embraced as at present, the whole vast continent, forming one of the quarters of the globe. But we never find this meaning in Scripture. The Asia of the Acts is not even our Asia Minor,—which name is not used. till the fourth century A.D.—but only a portion of the western coast of that great peninsula. (A full account of the history of the territory and its changes of extent will be found in Conybeare and Howson, i. pp. 275 ff. I confine myself to its import in the Acts.) This, which was the Roman province of Asia,—Asia Proper,—as spoken of in the Acts, includes only Mysia, Lydia, and Caria, —excluding Phrygia (ch. ii. 9 and here: 1 Pet. i. 1 it must be included),—Galatia, Bithynia, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Lycia. See ch. xix. 26, &c.

7.] come to (i. e. to the borders of) Mysia.

Bithynia] At this time a Roman province (senatorial: Hadrian, whose favourite province it was, took it from the senate).

The expression the Spirit of Jesus is remarkable, as occurring in all the great MSS., and from its peculiarity bearing almost unquestionable trace of genuineness. If the report of this journey came from an unusual source, an unusual expression would be accountable.

8.] passing by Mysia, i.e. as regarded their work of preaching (cf. ch. xx. 16),—and not ‘having passed by’ as avoiding it; for they could not get to the coast without entering Mysia.

Troas (Alexandria Troas, in honour of Alexander the Great: now Eski Stamboul) was a colony enjoying the Italian right (see on ver. 12), and a free city, and was not reckoned as belonging to either of the provinces, Asia or Bithynia. Whether it was for this reason that Paul and his companions visited it, is uncertain. He may have had the design of crossing to Europe, if permitted, which the subsequent vision confirmed. See ch. xx. 5; 2 Cor. ii. 12; 2 Tim. iv. 13.

9.] The vision seems to have appeared in the same way as that sent to Peter in ch. x. It was an unreal apparition, designed to convey a practical meaning. The context precludes our understanding it as a dream.

a man of Macedonia] known probably by the affecting words spoken by him. There would hardly be any peculiarity of dress by which a Macedonian could be recognized.

10. we endeavoured to go into Macedonia] by immediate enquiry for a ship. This word is remarkable as the introduction of the first person in the narrative: which however is dropped at ch. xvii. 40, on Paul's leaving Philippi, and resumed again, ch. xx. 5, on occasion of sailing from Philippi. Thence it continues (in all places where we have reason to expect it: see below) to the end of the book. On the question, what is implied by this, we may remark, (1) That while we safely conclude from it that the writer was in company with Paul when he thus speaks, we cannot with like safety infer that he was not, where the third person is used. This latter must be determined by other features of the history. For it is conceivable that a narrative, even where it concerns all present, might be, in its earlier parts, written as of others in the third person, but might, when more intimacy had been established, or even by preference only, be at any point changed to the first. And again, the episodes where the chief person, alone, or with his principal companion or companions, is concerned, would be many, in which the narrator would use the third person, not because he was not present, but because he was not concerned. This has not been enough attended to. If it be thought fanciful, I may refer to an undoubted instance in the episode, ch. xxi. 17, “when we were come to Jerusalem,” to ch. xxvii. 1, “when it was determined that we should sail...” during the whole of which time the writer was with or in the neighbourhood of Paul, and drops the we merely because he is speaking of Paul alone. (2) One objection raised by De Wette to the common view, that, Luke accompanied Paul from this time (except as above), is, that several times St. Paul’s companions are mentioned, but Luke is never among them. On examining however one of the passages where this is done, we find that after the enumeration of Sopater, Aristarchus, Secundus, Gaius, Timotheus, Tychicus, and Trophimus, we are told, These going before tarried for us at Troas: so that the writer evidently regards himself as being closely associated with St. Paul, and does not think it requisite to enumerate himself among the companions of the Apostle. This may serve as a key to his practice on other occasions. On the whole, and after careful consideration of the subject, I see no reason to doubt the common view, that Luke here joined the Apostle (whether as a physician, on account of his broken health, must of course be matter of conjecture, but is not improbable), and from this time (except from ch. xvii. 1–xx. 5), accompanies him to the end of the history. See the question of the authorship of the Acts further discussed in the Introduction, §1. 12–14.

11.] They had a fair wind on this occasion: in ch. xx. 6, the voyage in the opposite direction took five days. This is also implied by we came with a straight course, viz. ran before the wind. The coincidence of their going to Samothrace also shews it: determining the wind to have been from the S. or S.S. E. It is only a strong southerly breeze which will overcome the current southwards which runs from the Dardanelles by Tenedos (Conybeare and Howson, i.p. 336): and this, combined with the short passage, is another mark of the veracity of our narrative. They seem to have anchored N. of the lofty island of Samothrace, under its lee.

to Neapolis] In an E. by N. direction, past the island of Thasos. It was not properly in Macedonia, but in Thrace, and twelve Roman miles from Philippi, which was the frontier town of Macedonia strictly speaking: see below. It was by Vespasian, together with the whole of Thrace, attached to the province of Macedonia. Some Roman ruins and inscriptions serve to point out the Turkish village of Cavallo as its site.

12. Philippi] Philippi was built as a military position on the site of the village Krenides, by Philip the Great of Macedon. The plain between the Gangites, on which the town is situate, and the Strymon, was the field of the celebrated battle of Antony and Octavius against Brutus and Cassius: see more below. There is now an insignificant place on its site retaining the name Filiba (or Philippi?).

the first Macedonian city of the district] It was the first Macedonian city to which Paul and his companions came in that district,—Neapolis properly belonging to Thrace. And this epithet of first would belong to it not only as regarded the journey of Paul and Silas, but as lying furthest eastward, for which reason also the district was called Macedonia prima, though furthest from Rome. The other explanations are, (1) ‘chief city,’ as A.V. But this it was not: Thessalonica being the chief city of the whole province, and Amphipolis of the division (if it then subsisted) of Macedonia prima:—(2) first is taken as a title of honour, as we find in the coins of Pergamus and Smyrna (but not in the case of any city out of Asia Minor): (3) ‘the first city which was a colony.’ But there could be no reason for stating this: whereas there would be every reason to particularize the fact that they tarried and preached in the very first city to which they came, in Macedonia, the territory to which they were sent.

a colony] Philippi was made a colonia by Augustus, as a memorial of his victory over Brutus and Cassius, and as a frontier garrison against Thrace. Its full name on the coins of the city was Colonia Augusta Julia Philippensis. A Roman colony was in fact a portion of Rome itself transplanted to the provinces (Aulus Gellius calls the colonies “little effigies and images of the Roman people”). The colonists consisted of veteran soldiers and freedmen, who went forth, and determined and marked out their situation, with all religious and military ceremonies. The inhabitants of the colonies were Roman citizens, and were still enrolled in one or other of the tribes, and possessed the privilege of voting at Rome. In them the Roman law was strictly observed, and the Latin language was used on their coins and inscriptions. They were governed by their own senate and magistrates (Duumviri, two in number, as the consuls at Rome: see below, ver. 20), and not by the governor of the province. The land on which they stood was tributary, as being provincial, unless liberated from tribute by the special favour of the Italian right, or ownership of the soil. This Philippi possessed, in common with many other coloniæ and favoured provincial towns. The population of such places came in process of time to be of a mixed character: but only the descendants of the original colonists by Roman wives, or women of a people possessing the citizenship, were Roman citizens. Hence new supplies of colonists were often necessary.

in that city,—as distinguished from the suburban place of prayer, to which they afterwards, on the Sabbath, went out of the gate.

13.] a (or, the) river side: viz. the small stream Gangit  s, or Gangas: not, as Meyer and De Wette, the Strymon, the nearest point of which was many miles distant. The name Krenidés, formerly borne by the city, was derived from the fountains of this stream.—From many sources we learn, that it was the practice of the Jews to hold their assemblies for prayer near water, whether of the sea, or of rivers: probably on account of the frequent washings customary among them. See the citations in my Greek Test.

where prayer was wont to be made] literally, where a meeting for prayer was accustomed to be. It is possible to understand the substantive here rendered prayer, of a building devoted to the purposes of prayer. But that will not suit the verb, was wont to be. It may be understood a meeting for prayer: and this will agree with the circumstances. There seem to have been few, if any, Jews in Philippi: this open air assembly consisting merely of women attached to the Jewish faith. We hear of no opposition arising from Jews. There appears (xvii. 1) to have been no synagogue.

14. a seller of purple] The guild of dyers at Thyatira have left inscriptions, still existing, shewing the accuracy of our narrative. The celebrity of the purple dyeing of the neighbourhood is as old as Homer. Thyatira was a city of the province of Asia. Thus although forbidden to preach the word in Asia, their first convert at Philippi is an Asiatic.

which worshipped God] A proselyte; see ch. xviii. 7, 13.

She was listening,—when, in opening her heart, the act of God took place. “The heart of man is of itself shut,” says Bengel, “but it is God’s work to open it.”

It appears rather to have been a conversation (notice above, we spoke—not “we spoke the word”) than a set discourse: the things which Paul was saying.

15. she was baptized, and her household] It may be that no inference for infant-baptism is hence deducible. The practice, however, does not rest on inference, but on the continuity and identity of the covenant of grace to Jew and Christian, the sign only of admission being altered. The Apostles, as Jews, would have proposed to administer baptism to the children, and Jewish or proselyte converts would, as matter of course, have acceded to the proposal; and that the practice thus by universal consent, tacitly (because at first unquestioned) pervaded the universal church, can hardly with any reason be doubted. The preposterous views of the modern Baptists would have been received with astonishment and reprobation in the apostolic Church. See note on 1 Cor. vii. 14.

If ye have judged me: modestly alluding to the decision respecting her faithfulness implied by their baptizing her, and assuming that such a judgment had been passed.

16.] This happened on other occasions; not on the same day. In ver. 15 is implied their taking up their abode with Lydia:—in this ver., that they habitually resorted to this place of prayer to teach, and that what follows happened on such occasions.—It may be remarked that the A.V. of this passage, ‘as we went to prayer,’ has given rise to a curious abuse of the expression ‘going to prayer,’ in the sense of ‘beginning to pray,’ among the lower classes in England.

possessed with a spirit of divination] On the whole subject of dæmoniacal possession, see note on Matt. viii. 32. This was a case in which the presence of the spirit was a patent fact, recognized by the heathen possessors and consulters of this female slave, and by them turned to account: and recognized also by the Christian teachers, as an instance of one of those works of the devil which their Lord came, and commissioned them to destroy. All attempt to explain away such a narrative as this by the subterfuges of rationalism, is more than ever futile. The fact of the spirit leaving the girl, and the masters finding the hope of their gains gone, is fatal: and we may see, notwithstanding all his attempts to account for it psychologically, that Meyer feels it to be so.

17. cried] or, used to cry out: several occasions are referred to.—The recognition of Paul and his company here by the spirit is strictly analogous to that of our Lord by the dæmons, Matt. viii. 29; Luke iv. 34: and the same account to be given of both: viz. that the evil spirit knew and confessed the power of God and His Christ, whether in His own Person or that of His servants.

18. being grieved] Not mere annoyance is expressed by this word, but rather holy indignation and sorrow at what he saw and heard; the Christian soldier was goaded to the attack, but the mere satisfaction of anger was not the object, any more than the result, of the stroke.

19.] Her masters (a partnership of persons).—They may have been the heirs of some one to whom she had belonged) perceived that the hope of their gain had gone out (with the demon).

caught... and drew give the idea of force having been used. Paul and Silas only are apprehended as having been the principal persons in the company.

unto the rulers is said generally: they dragged them to the forum to the authorities,—afterwards specified as magistrates (or generals, see below).

20. the magistrates] literally, generals: the two presiding officers (duumviri), or prætors of the colony. Wetstein, writing about 1750, says that at Messina the prefect of the city was even then called Stradigo, from Strategos, the Greek word used here.

being Jews... being Romans] Calvin remarks that this accusation was craftily adopted to injure the Christians; for on the one side they put forward the name of Romans, which was in high favour: whereas by the Jewish name which was then held in disrepute (especially if the decree of Claudius, expelling them from Rome, ch. xviii. 2, had at this time been enacted) they excite jealousy against them: for as far as religion was concerned, the Romans had affinity with any nation rather than the Jews.

21. teach customs] “Dio Cassius tells us that Mæcenas gave the following advice to Augustus: ‘By all means and in every way yourself reverence the Divinity after your country’s manner, and compel others to do so: and all who follow strange customs in this matter, both hate and punish:’ and the reason is alleged, viz. that such innovations lead to secret associations, conspiracies, and cabals, which are most inconvenient for a monarchy” (Conybeare and Howson, i.p. 356).

22.] The multitude probably cried out tumultuously, as on other occasions (see Luke xxiii. 18; ch. xix. 28, 34; xxi. 30; xxii. 22, 23),—and the magistrates, without giving the Christians a trial (ver. 37), rent off their clothes, viz. by the lictors.

24. the stocks] In the original only the wood. Eusebius mentions, speaking of the martyrs in Gaul, that their feet were stretched to the fifth hole in the wood.

25.] Not as A.V., ‘prayed and sang praises,’—but, as in margin, in their prayers, were singing praises, or, praying, sing praises. The distinction of modern times between prayer and praise, arising from our attention being directed to the shape rather than to the essence of devotion, was unknown in these days: see Col. iv. 2.—“Their legs in the stocks pained them not, whose souls were in heaven.” Tertullian. The prisoners (in the outer prison) were listening to their singing, when the earthquake happened.

26. every one’s bands were loosed] i.e. of all the prisoners in the prison: see below (ver. 28), “We are all here.” Doubtless there were gracious purposes in this for those prisoners, who before were listening to the praises of Paul and Silas; and the very form of the narrative, mentioning this listening, shews subsequent communication between some one of these and the narrator.—Their chains were loosed, not by the earthquake, but by miraculous interference over and above it. It is some satisfaction to find, that few, even among the rationalist Commentators, have attempted to rationalize this wonderful example of the triumph of prayer.

27. was about to kill himself] The law was, that if a prisoner escaped, the keeper was liable to the intended punishment of the fugitive. Mr. Howson notices, by the examples of Cassius, Brutus, Titinius, and many of the proscribed, after the battle,—that Philippi is famous in the annals of suicide.

29.] Not as A.V., ‘a light,’ but lights: the translators have mistaken a plural word for a singular.

30. brought them out] Into the outer prison: not perhaps yet outside the prison, which (from ver. 34, when he takes them up to his own house) seems to have been underground, or at all events on a lower level in the same building. In this same space they seem to have been joined by the jailor’s family,—to have converted and baptized them, and to have been taken (to the well?) and washed from their stripes; and afterwards to have been led up (by stairs?) to his house, and hospitably entertained. The circumstantiality of the account shews that some eyewitness related it.—His question connected with the words, “the way of salvation,” of the daemonic in ver. 17, makes it necessary to infer, as De Wette well observes, that he had previously become acquainted with the subject of their preaching. He wanted no means of escape from any danger but that which was spiritual: the earthquake was past, and his prisoners were all safe. Bengel admirably remarks: “He had not heard the hymns of Paul, for he had slept, but notwithstanding, either before or after, he had become informed, who Paul was.”

Sirs is literally Lords: they will not take this title to themselves, but tell him of One who was alone worthy of it.

31. Believe on the Lord...] Not without allusion to the name by which he had just addressed them.—Considering who the person was that asked the question,—a heathen in the depths of ignorance and sin,—and how indisputably therefore the answer embraces all sinners whatever,—there perhaps does not stand on record in the whole book a more important answer than this of Paul:—or, I may add, one more strikingly characteristic of the Apostle himself and his teaching. We may remark also, in the face of all attempts to establish a development of St. Paul's doctrine according to mere external circumstances,—that this reply was given before any one of his extant epistles was written.

and thy house does not mean that his faith would save his household,—but that the same way was open to them as to him: “Believe, and thou shalt be saved: and the same of thy household.”

33. washed them from their stripes] i.e. washed them, so that they were purified from the blood occasioned by their stripes.

34. when he had brought them up] See note on ver. 30.

believing in God] This participle gives the ground of his rejoicing: and the full meaning is, rejoiced that he with all his house had been led to believe [in] God.—The expression believing in God could only be used of a converted heathen, not of a Jew: in ch. xviii. 8, of a Jew, we have “believed [on] the Lord.”

35.] What had influenced the magistrates is not recorded. We can hardly suppose that the earthquake alone would have done so, as they would not have connected it with their prisoners; they may have heard what had taken place: but that, again, is hardly probable. I should rather set it down to calmer thought, repudiating the tumultuary proceeding of the evening before.

36.] Paul and Silas had returned to the prison: whither the jailor goes, accompanied by the lictors (for it was they that he addressed in ver. 37), to announce the order.

37.] openly and privily are opposed: the injury had been public: the reparation, not to Paul and Silas merely, but to the Gospel of which they were the heralds, must be public also.

men who are Romans] By the Valerian Law, passed in the year of Rome 254, and the Porcian Law, in the year of Rome 506, Roman citizens were exempted from stripes and tortures: by the former, till an appeal to the people was decided,—by the latter, absolutely. On the question, how Paul came to be born a Roman citizen, see note on ch. xxii. 28.—Another irregularity had been committed by the magistrates, in scourging them uncondemned.—Mr. Humphry”remarks, ‘St. Paul submitted to be scourged by his own countrymen (five times, 2 Cor. xi. 24): for, though he might have pleaded his privilege as a Roman, to the Jews he “became as a Jew,” observing their ceremonies, and submitting to their law.’

38. they feared] For the account which they might have to give at Rome, or even for their popularity with the very mob of Roman citizens who had demanded the punishment.

39. besought them] viz. not to make their treatment matter of legal complaint. In the request to depart from the city, the magistrates seem to shew fear of a change in the temper of the mob.

40.] They do not depart hastily, or as though forced, but wait to reassure the brethren.

exhorted is better than ‘comforted,’ A.V. The one in this ease would imply the other.

Acts: Chapter 17

CHAP. XVII. 1.] Here (or rather perhaps at “they exhorted them and departed,” in the preceding verse) we have the first person again dropped,—implying apparently that the narrator did not accompany Paul and Silas. I should be inclined to think that Timotheus went with them from Philippi,—not, as is usually supposed, joined them at Berea: see below on ver. 10.

when they had passed through] The road, on which they travelled from Philippi to Thessalonica, was the Via Egnatia, the Macedonian continuation of the Via Appia, and so named from Egnatia, in the neighbourhood of which the latter meets the Adriatic. It extended from Dyrrachium in Epirus to the Hebrus in Thrace, a distance of 500 miles. The stages here mentioned are thus particularized in the itineraries; Philippi to Amphipolis, 33 miles: Amphipolis to Apollonia, 30 miles: Apollonia to Thessalonica, 37 miles. See more particulars in Conybeare and Howson, i. pp. 368 ff.

Amphipolis] Anciently called Nine Ways, lying in a most important position, at the end of the lake Cercinitis, formed by the Strymon, commanding the only easy pass from the coast of the Strymonic gulf into Macedonia. In consequence of this, the Athenians colonized the place, calling it Amphipolis. It was the spot where Brasidas was killed, and for previously failing to succor which, Thucydides was exiled: see Grote’s Hist. of Greece, vol. vi. p. 625 ff., where there is a plan of Amphipolis.

After this it was a point of contention between the Athenians and Philip, and subsequently became the capital of Macedonia Prima.—It is now called Emboli.

Apollonia] Its situation is unknown, but was evidently (see the distances above given) inland, not quite half-way from Amphipolis to Thessalonica, where the road crosses from the Strymonic to the Thermaic gulf. Leake saw some ruins at about the right spot, but did not visit them: and Cousinéry mentions seeing, on an opposite hill, the village of Polina. It must not be confounded with a better known Apollonia near Dyrrachium, on the western coast, also on the Via Egnatia. See Conybeare and Howson, i. pp. 376 f.

Thessalonica] At this time the capital of the province Macedonia, and the residence of the proconsul (Macedonia had been an imperial, but was now a senatorial province). Its former names were Emathia, Halia, and Therma: it received its name of Thessalonica, from Cassander, on his rebuilding and embellishing it, in honour of his wife Thessalonicea, sister of Alexander the Great. It was made a free city after the battle of Philippi: and every thing in this narrative is consistent with its privileges and state as such. See in my Greek Test. It has ever been an important and populous city, and still continues such (the present population is 70, 000), being the second city in European Turkey, under the slightly corrupted name of Saloniki. For a notice of the church there, see Introduction to the first Ep. to the Thessalonians, §2.

the synagogue of the Jews] The article implies that there was no other synagogue for the towns lately traversed: and shews the same minute acquaintance with the peculiarities of this district as our narrative has shewn since the arrival at Neapolis.

2. as his manner was] See the marginal references. Paul was most probably suffering still from his ‘shameful treatment’ at Philippi, 1 Thess. ii. 2.

3.] The particularity of this suffering and rising again from the dead is reproduced in 1 Thess. iv. 14.

4. consorted with] Literally, were added (as if by lot, that being determined by God, who gave them the Holy Spirit of adoption: 1 Thess. ii. 13) to the great family of which Paul and Silas were members.

devout Greeks] See ch. xiii. 43 al.—The aptitude of women for the reception of the Gospel several times appears in this book,—see above, ch. xvi. 13 ff, and below, vv. 12, 34.

5. took unto them] as their accomplices, to assist them in the making a riot, which follows.

of the baser sort] Literally, of men out of the markets, or loungers in the forum: such persons as are every where known to be the scum of the population. These may be alluded to in 1 Thess. ii. 14. (See note on ch. xix. 38.)

Jason] With whom (ver. 7) Paul and Silas lodged. He appears, perhaps (?) again with Paul at Corinth, Rom. xvi. 21, but did not accompany him into Asia, ch. xx. 4.

6.] These rulers are called in the original by the peculiar title of Politarchs, governors of the citizens. The exact accuracy of the title as existing at Thessalonica, has been proved by an inscription found on the spot, in which it occurs: and in the same inscription curiously enough we have three of the names which occur here, or in the Epistles, as companions of Paul: viz. Sosipater (of Beroea, Rom. xvi. 21, see also Acts xx. 4); Secundus (of Thessalonica, ch. xx. 4); and Gaius (the Macedonian, note, ch. xix. 29).

These that have turned the world upside down] The words presuppose some rumour of Christianity and its spread having before reached the inhabitants of Thessalonica.

7. these all] All these people, i.e. Christians, wherever found. A wider acquaintance is shewn, or at least assumed, with the belief of Christians, than extended merely to Jason and his friends.

saying that there is another king, one Jesus] This false charge seems to have been founded on Paul’s preaching much at Thessalonica concerning the triumphant coming and kingdom of Christ. This appears again and again in his two Epistles: see 1 Thess. i. 10; ii. 19; iii. 13; iv. 13–18; v. 1, 2; 2 Thess. i. 5, 7–10; ii. 1–12: and particularly 2 Thess. ii. 5, where he refers to his having often told them of these things, viz. the course, and destruction of Antichrist, by whom these Jews might perhaps misrepresent Paul as designating Cæsar.

9. when they had taken security] either by sureties, or by a sum of money, or both. They bound over Jason and the rest (certain brethren, ver. 6) to take care that no more trouble was given by these men: in accordance with which security they sent them away; and by night, to avoid the notice of the multitude.

10.] It does not follow, because Timotheus is not mentioned here, that therefore he did not accompany, or at all events follow, Paul and Silas to Berœa. He has never been mentioned since he joined Paul's company at Lystra. The very intermittent and occasional notices of Paul's companions in this journey should be a caution against rash hypotheses. The general character of the narrative seems to be, that where Paul, or Paul and Silas, are alone or principally concerned, all mention of the rest is suspended, and sometimes so completely as to make it appear as if they were absent: then, at some turn of events they appear again, having in some cases been really present all the time. I believe Timotheus to have been with them at Thessalonica the first time, because it does not seem probable that Paul would have sent to them one to confirm and exhort them concerning their faith (1 Thess. iii. 2) who had not known them before, especially as he then had Silas with him.—And this is confirmed by both the Epistles to the Thessalonians, which are from Paul, Silvanus, and Timotheus. From these Epistles we learn that, during his residence among them, Paul worked with his own hands (1 Thess. ii. 9; 2 Thess. iii. 8) to maintain himself: and from Phil. iv. 15, 16, that the Philippians sent supplies more than once towards his maintenance. Both these facts, especially the last, seeing that the distance from Philippi was 100 Roman miles, make it very improbable that his stay was so short as from three to four weeks: nor is this implied in the text: much time may have elapsed while the “great multitude” of ver. 4 were joining Paul and Silas. See further in Introd. to 1 Thess. §2. 2 ff.

Berœa] 61, or according to another authority 57 Roman miles (S. W.) from Thessalonica.—Berœa was not far from Pella, in Macedonia Tertia, at the foot of Mt. Bermius. It was afterwards called Irenopolis, and now Kara Feria, or Verria, and is a city of the second rank in European Turkey, containing from 15, 000 to 20, 000 souls.

11. more noble]—of nobler disposition;—stirred up, not to envy, but to enquiry.

these things] viz. the doctrine of ver. 3, which Pan] and Silas preached here also.

13. they came stirring up, &c.] From the distance, some time must have elapsed before this could take place: and that some time did elapse, we may gather from 1 Thess. ii. 18, where Paul relates that he made several attempts to revisit the Thessalonians (which could be only during his stay at Berœa, as he left the neighbourhood altogether when he left that town), but was hindered. 14. to go as it were to the sea] This expression I believe to be used simply to indicate the direction in which the Beroean brethren sent him forth: implying probably, that all that was known at Berœa of his intended route was, that it was in the direction of the sea. Where he embarked for Athens, is not said: probably at Dium, near the base of Mount Olympus, to which two roads from Berœa are marked in the ancient tables.

15.] Who they that conducted Paul were is not said.—The course of Timotheus appears to have been, as far as we can follow it from the slight notices given, as follows:—when Paul departed from Berœa, not having been able to revisit Thessalonica as he wished (1 Thess. ii. 18), he sent Timotheus (from Berœa, not from Athens) to exhort and confirm the Thessalonians, and determined to be left at Athens alone (1 Thess. iii. 1), Silas meanwhile remaining to carry on the work at Berœa. Paul, on his arrival at Athens, sends (by his conductors, who returned) this message to both, to come to him as soon as possible. They did so, and found him (ch. xviii. 5) at Corinth. See Introduction to 1 Thess., Vol. ii.

Athens] See a long and interesting description of the then state of Athens, its buildings, &c., in Conybeare and Howson, chap. x. vol. i. pp. 407 ff. It was a free city.

16. wholly given to idolatry] The multitude of statues and temples to the gods in Athens is celebrated with honour by classic writers of other nations, and with pride by their own. Xenophon says of Athens, that “the whole city is an altar, the whole city a sacrifice and an offering to the gods.”

17. in the market] It was the space before the famous Stoa or porch, where the Stoicks held their disputations.

18. Epicurean] The Epicurean philosophy was antagonistic to the gospel, as holding the atomic theory in opposition to the creation of matter,—the disconnection of the Divinity from the world and its affairs, in opposition to the idea of a ruling Providence,—and the indissoluble union, and annihilation together, of soul and body, as opposed to the hope of eternal life, and indeed to all spiritual religion whatever. The Epicureans were the materialists of the ancient world.—The common idea attached to Epicureanism must be discarded in our estimate of the persons mentioned in our text. The “chief good” of the real Epicureans, far from being a degraded and sensual pleasure, was imperturbability of mind, based upon wisdom—perhaps the best estimate of the highest good formed in the heathen world;—and their ethics were exceedingly strict. But the abuse to which such a doctrine was evidently liable, gave rise to a pseudo-Epicureanism, which has generally passed current for the real, and which amply illustrated the truth, that corruption of that which is best, is itself worst. For their chimerical imperturbability, Paul offered them the peace which passeth all understanding, Phil. iv. 7.

Stoicks] So named from the Stoa, or porch (see above),—founded by Zeno of Cittium in the fourth century B.C., but perhaps more properly by Cleanthes and Chrysippus in the third century B.C. Their philosophy, while it approached the truth in holding one supreme Governor of all, compromised it, in allowing of any and all ways of conceiving and worshipping Him some said... other some] These are not to be taken as belonging the one to the Epicureans, the other to the Stoics,—but rather as describing two classes, common perhaps to both schools,—the one of which despised him and his sayings, and the other were disposed to take a more serious view of the matter, and charge him with bringing in new deities.

(see below, vv. 24, 25),—and contravened it, in its pantheistic belief that all souls were emanations of Him. In spirit it was directly opposed to the gospel,—holding the independence of man on any being but himself, together with the subjection of God and man alike to the stern laws of an inevitable fate. On the existence of the soul after death their ideas were various: some holding that all souls endure to the conflagration of all things,—others confining this to the souls of good men,—and others believing all souls to be reabsorbed into the Divinity. By these tenets they would obviously be placed in antagonism to the doctrines of a Saviour of the world and the resurrection,—and to placing the summum bonum of man in abundance of that grace which is made perfect in weakness, 2 Cor. xii. 9.

this babbler] The word in the original signifies a kind of bird which picks up and devours seeds: whence the Athenians called by this name those who went about picking up trifles in converse and making it their business to retail them: in fact, the name imports one who talks fluently to no purpose, and hints also that his talk is not his own.

a setter forth of strange gods] “Socrates is guilty of bringing in new gods,” was one of the charges on which Athens put to death her wisest son. The strange gods which they charged Paul with setting forth were, the true God, the God of the Jews, and Jesus Christ His Son: the Creator of the world (ver. 24), and the Man whom He hath appointed to judge it, ver. 31. Compare ver. 23, end: which is an express answer to this charge.

19. they took him] No violence is implied.

to the hill of Mars] There is no allusion here to the court of Areopagus, nor should the words have been so rendered in A.V.,—especially as the same expression below (ver. 22) is translated ‘Mars’ hill.’ We have in the narrative no trace of any judicial proceeding, but every thing to contradict such a supposition. Paul merely makes his speech, and, having satisfied the curiosity of the multitude who came together on Mars’ Hill, departs unhindered:—they brought him up to the hill of Mars. The following note is borrowed from Mr Humphry’s Commentary:—‘It might be expected that on the hill of Mars the mind of the stranger would be impressed with the magnificence of the religion which he sought to overthrow. The temple of the Eumenides was immediately below him: opposite, at the distance of 200 yards, was the Acropolis, which, being entirely occupied with statues and temples, was, to use the phrase of an ancient writer, as one great offering to the gods. The Persians encamped on the Areopagus when they besieged the Acropolis (Herod. viii. 52): from the same place the Apostle makes his first public attack on Paganism, of which the Acropolis was the stronghold. Xerxes in his fanaticism burnt the temples of Greece. Christianity advanced more meekly and surely: and though the immediate effect of the Apostle’s sermon was not great, the Parthenon in time became a Christian church. Athens ceased to be a city wholly given to idolatry,—and the repugnance of the Greeks to images became so great, as to be a principal cause of the schism between the churches of the east and west in the eighth century.’—The hill of Mars was on the west of the Acropolis. The Areopagus, the highest criminal court of Athens, held its sittings there. To give any account of it is beside the purpose, there being no allusion to it in the text. Full particulars may be found under the word Areopagus in Smith’s Dictionary of Gr. and Rom. Antiquities.

May we know] A courteous method of address (not ironical).

21.] A remark of the narrator (as I believe, Paul himself), as a comment on the words new and strange of the verses before. The character here given of the Athenians is also that which we find in their own historians and orators. See proofs in my Greek Test. One remarkable one is found in Demosthenes, where in stirring them up against Philip, he says, “Are ye content to be always going about the marketplace asking one another, What new thing is reported? Can any thing be stranger than that a Macedonian man should&c. &c.”

22.] The commentators vie with each other in admiration of this truly wonderful speech of the great Apostle. Chrysostom says: “This is what the Apostle elsewhere says, that he became to those not under the law as not under the law, that he might win those not under the law. For when addressing the Athenians, he grounds his argument not on the law or the prophets, but begins his persuasion from one of their altars, conquering them by their own maxims.” ‘The oration of Paul before this assembly is a living proof of his apostolic wisdom and eloquence: we see here how he, according to his own words, could become a Gentile to the Gentiles, to win the Gentiles to the Gospel.’ Neander. And Stier very properly remarks, ‘It was given to the Apostle in this hour, what he should speak; this is plainly to be seen in the following discourse, which we might weary ourselves with praising and admiring in various ways; but far better than all so-called praise from our poor tongues is the humble recognition, that the Holy Ghost, the spirit of Jesus, has here spoken by the Apostle, and therefore it is that we have in his discourse a masterpiece of apostolic wisdom.’ The same commentator gives the substance of the speech thus: ‘He who is (by your own involuntary confession) unknown to you Athenians (religious though you are),—and yet (again, by your own confession) able to be known,—the all-sufficing Creator of the world, Preserver of all creatures, and Governor of mankind,—now commandeth all men (by me His minister) to repent, that they may know Him, and to believe in the Man whom He hath raised from the dead, that they may stand in the judgment, which He hath committed to Him.'

Ye men of Athens] The regular and dignified appellation familiar to them as used by all their orators,—of whose works Paul could hardly be altogether ignorant.

very religious] Carrying your religious reverence very far: an instance of which follows, in that they, not content with worshipping named and known gods, worshipped even an unknown one. Blame is neither expressed, nor even implied: but their exceeding veneration for religion laid hold of as a fact, on which Paul, with exquisite skill, engraves his proof that he is introducing no new gods, but enlightening them with regard to an object of worship on which they were confessedly in the dark. So Chrysostom, "That is, very pious:... he says it as praising them, and not with any spirit of blame." To understand this word as A.V., 'too superstitious,' is to miss the fine and delicate tact of the speech, by which he at once parries the charge against him, and in doing so introduces the great Truth which he came to preach.—The character thus given of the Athenians is confirmed by Greek writers. Pausanias says, "The Athenians are conspicuous above other people in their zeal in divine matters." Josephus calls them "the most devout of the Greeks."

23. your objects of worship] Not, as A.V., 'your devotions:' but even temples, altars, statues, &c.

also an altar] Over and above the many altars to your own and foreign deities.

To an (not, the) unknown God] That this was the veritable inscription on the altars, the words with this inscription (literally, on which had been inscribed) are decisive. Meyer well remarks, that the historical fact would be abundantly established from this passage, being Paul's testimony of what he himself had seen,—and spoken to the Athenian people. But we have our narrative confirmed by other testimonies which I have cited in my Greek Test., shewing that there really were altars with this inscription at Athens.

What ye ignorantly worship, that declare I unto you] The change to "Whom" and "Him" has probably been made from reverential motives. The neuters give surely the deeper, and the more appropriate sense. For Paul does not identify the true God with the dedication of, or worship at, the altar mentioned: but speaks of the Divinity of whom they, by this inscription, confessed themselves ignorant. But even a more serious objection lies against the masculines. The sentiment would thus be in direct contradiction to the assertion of Paul himself, 1 Cor. x. 20, "The things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to devils and not to God." Compare also our Lord's words, John iv. 22, "Ye worship that which ye know not."—In the word worship (shew piety towards) we have another confirmation of the sense above insisted on in ver. 22. He wishes to commend their reverential spirit, while he shews its misdirection. An important lesson for all who have controversies with Paganism and Romanism.

24.] 'No wonder, that the devil, in order to diffuse idolatry, has blotted out among all heathen nations the recognition of Creation. The true doctrine of Creation is the proper refutation of all idolatry.' Roos, cited by Stier, who remarks, 'Only on the firm foundation of the Old Testament doctrine of Creation can we rightly build the New Testament doctrine of Redemption, and only he, who scripturally believes and apprehends by faith the earliest words of Revelation, concerning a Creator of all things, can also apprehend, know, and scripturally worship, THE MAN, in whom God's word, down to its latest canonical Revelation, gathers together all things.'

God... dwelleth not in temples made with hands] A remarkable reminiscence of the dying speech of Stephen: see ch. vii, 48.—Mr. Humphry notices the similarity, but difference in its conclusion, of the argument attributed to Xerxes in Cicero: "Xerxes is said to have burnt the temples of Greece, because they attempted to shut up within walls the gods, to whom all things ought to be open and free, and of whom all this world is the temple and house."—Where Paul stood, he might see the celebrated colossal statue of Athena Polias, known by the Athenians as "the Goddess," standing and keeping guard with spear and shield in the enclosure of the Acropolis.

25.] is served: i.e. is really and truly served. So "God is not mocked," Gal. vi. 7. As the assertion of Creation contradicted the Epicurean error, so this laid hold of that portion of truth, which, however disguised, that school had apprehended: viz. that the Deity does not stand in need of us, nor can gain aught from us. There is a verse in 2 Macc. xiv. 35, remarkable, as compared with the thoughts and words of Paul here: "Thou, O Lord of all things, who hast need of nothing, wast pleased that the temple of thine habitation should be among us.' life, and breath, and all things] He is the Preserver, as well as the Creator, of all; and all things come to us from Him. Compare, on all things, David's words, 1 Chron. xxix. 14, "Thine are all things, and of Thine own have we given Thee."

26.] These words were said, be it remembered, to a people who gave themselves out for aboriginal, sprung from the earth: but we must not imagine that to refute this was the object of the words: they aim far higher than this, and controvert the whole genius of polytheism, which attributed to the various nations differing mythical origins, and separate guardian gods. It is remarkable, that though of all people the Jews were the most distinguished in their covenant state from other nations of the earth, yet to them only was given the revelation of the true history of mankind, as all created of one blood: a doctrine kept as it were in store for the gospel to proclaim.—Not, ‘hath made of one blood,’ &c., as A.V., but as in margin. See Matt. v. 32; Mark vii. 37.

determined the times....] He who was before (ver. 24) the Creator, then (ver. 25) the Preserver, is now the Governor of all men: prescribing to each nation its space to dwell in, and its time of endurance.

27. if haply] if by any chance, denoting a contingency apparently not very likely to happen.

though he be not far...] ‘Not that HE is distant from us, but that we are ignorant of Him.’ See Rom. x. 6, 8; Jer. xxiii. 23, 24.

28.] There is no justification for the pantheist in this.—It is properly said only of the race of men, as being His offspring, bound to Him: proceeding from, and upheld by, and therefore living, moving, and being in Him:—but even in a wider sense His Being, though a separate objective Personality, involves and contains that of His creatures. See Eph. i. 10, where the same is said of Christ.

we live, and move, and have our being] ‘A climax rising higher with each term, out of God we should have no Life, nor even movement (which some things without life have, plants, water, &c.), nay, not any existence at all (we should not have been),’ the intent being to shew the absolute dependence for every thing of man on God,—and thence the absurdity of supposing the Godhead like to the works of his (man's) hands.

certain of your own poets] viz. Aratus, in the opening lines of the poem called “the Phenomena:”... Cleanthes also in his hymn to Zeus (Jupiter), has the same words. Aratus was a native of Tarsus, about 270 B.C., and wrote astronomical poems, of which two remain. Cleanthes was born at Assos, in Troas, about 300 B.C. The Apostle, by the plural, seems to have both poets in his mind.—The his refers to Zeus (Jupiter) in both cases, the admission being taken as a portion of truth regarding the Supreme God, which even heathen poets confessed.

30. God overlooked] The rendering of the A.V. hears the same meaning, but is to our ears in these days objectionable. In this assurance lie treasures of mercy for those who lived in the times of ignorance. God overlooked them: i.e. corrected not this ignorance itself as a sin, but the abuses even of this, by which the heathen sunk into deeper degradation. The same argument is treated more at length in Rom. i. ii.

31. in righteousness] Righteousness is the character of the judgment,—the element of which it shall consist.

whereof he hath given assurance] “As the thing asserted was hardly credible, he gives a distinguished proof of it.” Grotius.

32. some mocked: and others said...] We must not allot these two parties, as some have done, the former to the Epicureans, the latter to the Stoicks: the description is general.—The words, we will hear thee again of this matter, need not be taken as ironical. The hearing not having taken place is no proof that it was not intended at the time: and the distinction between these and the mockers seems to imply that these were in earnest.

33. thus] i.e. ‘in this state of the popular mind:’ (with an expectation of being heard again?) The “so” of the A.V. does not give this forcibly enough, but looks like a mere particle of transition.

34. Dionysius the Areopagite] Nothing more is known of him. Eusebius relates that he was bishop of Athens, and Nicephorus, that he died a martyr. The writings which go by his name are undoubtedly spurious.

Acts: Chapter 18

CHAP. XVIII. 1.] Corinth was at this time a colony (see note, ch. xvi. 12), the capital of the Roman province of Achaia, and the residence of the proconsul. For further particulars, see Introduction to 1 Cor. §2.

2. a certain Jew] It appears that Aquila and Priscilla were not Christians at this time: it is the similarity of employment only which draws them to St. Paul, and their conversion is left to be inferred as taking place in consequence: see ver. 26.

born in Pontus] literally, a Pontian by race. It is remarkable, that Pontius Aquila is a name found in the Pontian gens at Rome more than once in the days of the Republic, whence some have supposed that this may have been a freedman of a Pontius Aquila, and that the words “a Pontian by race” may have been an inference from his name. But besides that St. Luke’s acquaintance with the real origin of Aquila could hardly but have been accurate,—Aquila, the translator of the Old Test. into Greek, was also a native of Pontius. From the notices of Aquila and Priscilla in the Epistles, they appear to have travelled, fixing their abode by turns in different principal cities for the sake of their business. In ver. 19, we have them left at Ephesus (see also ver. 26): in 1 Cor. xvi. 19, still there; in Rom. xvi. 3 ff, again at Rome; in 2 Tim. iv. 19, again at Ephesus.

because that Claudius had commanded all Jews to depart from Rome...] Suetonius says, "The Jews, who at the instigation of Chrestus were continually exciting tumults, he expelled from Rome," but as he gives this without any fixed note of time, as the words "at the instigation of Chrestus" may be taken in three ways (as indicative either (1) of an actual leader of that name, or (2) of some tumult connected with the expectations of a Messiah, or (3) of some dispute about Christianity), Neander well observes that after all which has been said on it, no secure historical inference respecting the date of the event, or its connexion with any Christian church at Rome, can be drawn. It was as a Jew that Aquila was driven from Rome: and there is not a word of Christians here. See more in my Greek Test. 'The edicts soon became invalid, or the prohibition was taken off: we find Aquila at Rome, Rom. xvi. 3, and many Jews resident there, ch. xxviii. 17 ff.

3. wrought] "The Jewish Rabbis having no state pay, it was their practice to teach their children a trade. 'What is commanded of a father towards his son?' asks a Talmudic writer, 'To circumcise him, to teach him the law, to teach him a trade.' Rabbi Judah saith, 'He that teacheth not his son a trade, doth the same as if he taught him to be a thief:' and Rabban Gamaliel saith, 'He that hath a trade in his hand, to what is he like? He is like a vineyard that is fenced.'" Conybeare and Howson, i.p. 58.—The places where St. Paul refers to his supporting himself by his own manual labour are,—ch. xx. 34 (Ephesus):—1 Cor. ix. 12 ff.; 2 Cor. vii. 2 (Corinth):—1 Thess. ii. 9; 2 Thess. iii. 8 (Thessalonica).—In 2 Cor. xi. 9, we learn that supplies were also brought to him at Corinth from Macedonia, i.e. Philippi: see Phil. iv. 15.

tent-makers] The general opinion now is, that St. Paul was a maker of tents from the 'cilicium,' or hair-cloth of Cilician goats. If it be objected, that he would hardly find the raw material for this work in cities far from Cilicia, it may be answered, that this would not be required in the fabrication of tents from the hair-cloth, which doubtless itself would be an article of commerce in the markets of Greece.—Chrysostom calls Paul sometimes a leather-cutter, imagining that the tents were made of leather.

5.] See ch. xvii. 15; 1 Thess. iii. 6. The meaning is, that 'when Silas and Timotheus returned from Macedonia, they found Paul anxiously occupied in discoursing to the Jews.' It seems to be implied, that they found him in a state of more than ordinary anxiety, more than usually absorbed in the work of testifying to the Jews:—a crisis in the work being imminent, which resulted in their rejection of the word of life. (On the whole character of his early preaching at Corinth, see notes, 1 Cor. ii. 1–5.) Thus only, the but in ver. 5 and that in ver. 6 will both be satisfied: he discoursed in the synagogue, &c.... but when Silas and Timotheus returned, he was earnestly occupied in discoursing, &c. But, as they opposed themselves and blasphemed, &c.

6.] The term blood is used as in ch. xx. 26. The image and nearly the words, are from Ezek. xxxiii. 4. from henceforth] Not absolutely, only at Corinth: for ver. 19 we find him arguing with the Jews again in the synagogue at Ephesus. The difference in the readings of the last clause in the verse is matter of punctuation. Probably there should be no stop at clean, and then it will read as in the margin, I shall henceforth with a clear conscience go to the Gentiles.

7.] In order to shew that he henceforth separated himself from the Jews, he, on leaving the synagogue, went no longer to the house of the Jew Aquila (who appears afterwards to have been converted), but to the house of a Gentile proselyte of the gate, close to the synagogue: in the sight of all the congregation in the synagogue: for this seems to be the object in mentioning the circumstance.

8.] On this, a schism took place among the Jews. The ruler of the synagogue attached himself to Paul, and was, together with Gaius, baptized by the Apostle himself (1 Cor. i. 14): and with him many of the Corinthians (Jews and Gentiles, it being the house of a proselyte), probably Aquila and Priscilla also, believed and were baptized.

9. speak, and hold not thy peace] So, for solemnity's sake, we have an affirmation and negation combined, John i. 3. See also Isa. lviii. 1.

10. I have much people] See John x. 16. As our Lord forewarned Paul in Jerusalem that they would not receive his testimony concerning Him, so here He encourages him, by a promise of much success in Corinth. The word people, the express title beforetime of the Jews, is still used now, notwithstanding their secession.

11.] The year and a half may extend either to his departure, or to the incident in ver. 12 ff. Meyer would confine it to the latter, taking the verb in the sense of 'remained in quiet': but it will hardly bear such emphasis: and seeing that the incident in vv. 12 ff. was a notable fulfilment of the promise,—for though they set on him, they could not hurt him,—I should be disposed to take the other view, and regard that which is related ver. 12 to ver. 18, as having happened during this time.

12. Gallio] His original name was Marcus Annæus Novatus: but, having been adopted into the family of the rhetorician Lucius Junius Gallio, he took the name of Junius Annæus Gallio. He was brother of Lucius Annæus Seneca, the philosopher, whose character of him is in exact accordance with that which we may infer from this narrative: "No man on earth is so pleasant to me, as this man is to all." "Gallio, my brother, whom there is none that does not love a little, even those who have not the power of loving more." He is called "the pleasant Gallio" by Statius. He appears to have given up the province of Achaia from ill health. He was spared after the execution of his brother: but Dio Cassius adds, that Seneca's brothers were put to death afterwards, and Eusebius in his Chronicle, on A.D. 66, says that he put an end to himself after his brother's death.

the deputy] See note on ch. xiii. 7. Achaia was originally a senatorial province, but was temporarily made an imperial one by Tiberius.

of Achaia] The Roman province of Achaia contained Hellas and the Peloponnesus, and, with Macedonia, embraced all their Grecian dominions.—"The judgment seat" is mentioned three times in the course of this narrative (see vv. 16, 17). It was of two kinds: (1) fixed in some public and open place: (2) moveable, and taken by the Roman magistrates to be placed wherever they might sit in a judicial character. Probably here and in the case of Pilate (John xix. 13), the former kind of seat is intended. See Smith's Dict. of Antiquities, under 'Sella.' See also some remarks on 'the tribunal,—the indispensable symbol of the Roman judgment seat,' in the Edinburgh Review for Jan. 1847, p. 151." Conybeare and Howson, vol. i. 494.

13. contrary to the law] Against the Mosaic law:—the exercise of which, as a 'lawful religion,' was allowed to the Jews.

15. questions] The plural expresses contempt: If it is questions, &c.: as we should say, 'a parcel of questions.' See ch. xxiii. 29.

names] Paul asserted Jesus to be the Christ, which the Jews denied. This, to a Roman, would be a question of names.

So Lysias (ch. xxiii. 29) declined to decide Paul's case, and Festus (ch. xxv. 20) though he did not altogether put the enquiry by, wished to judge it at Jerusalem, where he might have the counsel of those learned in the Jewish law.

17. all (the people)] Apparently, all the mob, i.e. the Gentile population present. Sosthenes, as the ruler of the synagogue (either the ruler, or one of the rulers; perhaps he had succeeded Crispus), had been the chief of the complainant Jews, and therefore, on their cause being rejected, and themselves ignominiously dismissed, was roughly treated by the mob. From this, certainly the right explanation, has arisen the explanatory gloss, "the Greeks." Another explanatory gloss, "the Jews," is given: and has sprung from the notion that this Sosthenes was the same person with the Sosthenes of 1 Cor. i. 1, a Christian and a companion of Paul. But, not to insist on the improbability of the party driven from the tribunal having beaten one of their antagonists in front of the tribunal,—why did they not beat Paul himself?—there is no ground for supposing the two persons to be the same, Sosthenes being no uncommon name. If they were, this man must have been converted afterwards; but he is not among those who accompanied Paul into Asia, either in ver. 18, or ch. xx. 4.—The carelessness of Gallio about the matter clearly seems to be a further instance of his contempt for the Jews, and indisposition to favour them or their persecution of Paul. Had this been otherwise meant, certainly and would not have been the copula. 'So little did the information against Paul prosper that the informers themselves were beaten without interference of the judge.' Meyer.

18.] It has been considered doubtful whether the words having shorn his head in Cenchræa apply to Paul, the subject of the sentence, or to Aquila, the last subject. I agree with Neander that if we consider the matter carefully, there can be no doubt that they can only apply to Paul. For, although this vow differed from that of the Nazarite, who shaved his hair at the end of his votive period in the temple at Jerusalem, and burnt it with his peace-offering (Num. vi. 1–21), Josephus gives us a description of a somewhat similar one, where it appears that the hair was shaved thirty days before the sacrifice. At all events, no sacrifice could be offered any where but at Jerusalem: and every such vow would conclude with a sacrifice. Now we find, on comparing the subsequent course of Aquila with that of Paul,—that the former did not go up to Jerusalem, but remained at Ephesus (ver. 26): but that Paul hastened by Ephesus, and did go up to Jerusalem: see ver. 22. Again, it would be quite irrelevant to the purpose of St. Luke, to relate such a fact of one of Paul's companions. That he should do so apologetically, to shew that the Apostle still countenanced conformity with the law, is a view which I cannot find justified by any features of this book: and it surely would be a very far-fetched apology, and one likely to escape the notice of many readers, seeing that Aquila would not appear as being under Paul's influence, and even his conversion to the Gospel has not been related, but is left to be implied from ver. 26. Again, Meyer's ground for referring the action to Aquila,—that his name is here placed after that of his wife,—is untenable, seeing that, for some reason, probably the superior character or office in the church, of Priscilla, the same arrangement is found (in the best MSS. at ver. 26, and) at Rom. xvi. 3; 2 Tim. iv. 19. There need be no enquiry what danger can have prompted such a vow on his part, when we recollect the catalogue given by him in 2 Cor. xi. Besides, he had, since his last visit to Jerusalem, been suffering from sickness (see note on ch. xvi. 6, and Introd. to Gal. §1. 3): it is true, a considerable time ago, but this need not prevent our supposing that the vow may have been then made, to be paid on his next visit to Jerusalem. That he had not sooner paid it is accounted for by his having been since that time under continual pressure of preaching and founding churches, and having finally been detained by special command at Corinth. That he was now so in Cenchrēa] Cenchrēa (pronounced Kenchrēa) was a village with a port, about eight miles from Corinth, forming its naval station on the Asiatic side, as Lechæum did on the Italian. There was soon after a Christian church there: see Rom. xvi. 1.

19. Ephesus] Ephesus was the ancient capital of Ionia, and at this time, of the Roman proconsular province of Asia,—on the Caÿster, near the coast, between Smyrna and Miletus. It was famed for its commerce, but even more for its magnificent temple of Artemis (Diana: see ch. xix. 24, 27, and notes). See a full account of its situation and history, secular and Christian, in the Introduction to Eph. §2. 2–6; and an interesting description, with plan, in Mr. Lewin's Life and Epistles of St. Paul, i. 344 ff.

and left them there: but] I should understand this to mean, that the Jewish synagogue was outside the town, and that Priscilla and Aquila were left in the town.

21.] The omission of the words here inserted in the common text, “I must by all means keep this feast that cometh in Jerusalem,” seems necessitated on the principle of being guided in doubtful cases by the testimony of our most ancient MSS. The text thus produced is the shortest and simplest, and the facts, of other glosses having been attempted on this verse, and of one MS. inserting the words without altering the construction to suit them, and of other variations, tend perhaps to throw discredit on the insertion. The gloss, if such it be, has probably been owing to an endeavour to conform the circumstances to those related in ch. xx. 16. If the words are to stand, and for those who read them, it may still be interesting to enquire at what feast they may be supposed to point. (1) Not at the Passover: for the ordinary duration of the winter shutting up of the sea was till the vernal equinox. And we are not at liberty to assume an exceptional case, such as sometimes occurred. Hence, if the voyage from Corinth at all approached the length of that from Philippi to Jerusalem in ch. xx., xxi., he would have set sail at a time when it would have been hardly possible. (2) Not at the Feast of Tabernacles. For if it were, he must have sailed from Corinth in August or September. Now, as he stayed there something more than a year and a half, his sea-voyage from Berea to Athens would in this case have been made in the depth of winter; which (especially as a choice of land or water was open to him) is impossible. (3) It remains, then, that the feast should have been Pentecost; at which Paul also visited Jerusalem, ch. xx. 16. The Apostle's promise of return was fulfilled ch. xix. 1 ff.

22. and gone up] to Jerusalem: for (1) it would be out of the question to suppose that Paul made the long detour by Cæsarea only to go up into the town from the beach, as supposed by most of those who omit the disputed words in ver. 21, and salute the disciples,—and (2) the expression he went down to Antioch, which suits a journey from Jerusalem (ch. xi. 27), would not apply to one from Cæsarea.

and saluted the church] The payment of his vow is not mentioned, partly because it is understood from the mere mention of the vow itself, ver. 18,—partly, perhaps, because it was privately done, and with no view to attract notice as in ch. xxi.

23.] PAUL'S VISIT TO THE CHURCHES IN GALATIA AND PHRYGIA.—Either (1) Galatia is here a general term including Lycaonia, and St. Paul went by Derbe, Lystra, Iconium, &c. as before in ch. xvi., or (2) he did not visit Lycaonia this time, but went through Cappadocia: to which also the words “having passed through the upper tracts” (ch. xix. 1) seem to point, “upper Asia” being the country east of the Halys. We find Christian churches in Cappadocia, 1 Pet. i. 1. On this journey, as connected with the state of the Galatian churches, see Introduction to Gal. §3. 1.

in order implies that he regularly visited the churches, each as they lay in his route.—One work accomplished by him in this journey was the ordaining (but apparently not collecting) a contribution for the poor saints at Jerusalem: see 1 Cor. xvi. 1,—Timotheus and Erastus probably accompanied him, see ch. xix. 22; 2 Cor. i. 1; and Gaius and Aristarchus, ch. xix. 29; and perhaps Titus, 2 Cor. xii. 18 al. (and Sosthenes? 1 Cor. i. 1, but see on ver. 17).

24–28.] APOLLOS AT EPHESUS, AND IN ACHAIA.

The name Apollos is abbreviated from Apollonius, as Lucas from Lucanus, &c.

born at Alexandria] literally, an Alexandrian by race. Alexandria was the great seat of the Hellenistic or later Greek language, learning, and philosophy (see ch. vi. 9). A large number of Jews had been planted there by its founder, Alexander the Great. The celebrated LXX version of the Old Test. was made there under the Ptolemies. There took place that remarkable fusion of Greek, Oriental, and Judaic elements of thought and belief, which was destined to enter so widely, for good and for evil, into the minds and writings of Christians. We see in the providential calling of Apollos to the ministry, an instance of adaptation of the workman to the work. A masterly exposition of the Scriptures by a learned Hellenist of Alexandria formed the most appropriate watering (1 Cor. iii. 6) for those who had been planted by the pupil of Gamaliel. The word rendered eloquent may mean learned. But the former meaning is most appropriate here, both because the peculiar kind of learning implied by it, acquaintance with stories and legends, would not be likely to be predicated of Apollos,—and because the subsequent words, mighty in the Scriptures, sufficiently indicate his learning, and in what it lay.

25.] Apollos had received (from his youth?) the true doctrine of the Messiahship of Jesus, as pointed out by John the Baptist: doubtless from some disciple of John; but more than this he knew not. The doctrines of the Cross,—the Resurrection,—the outpouring of the Spirit,—these were unknown to him: but more particularly (from the words “knowing only the baptism of John”) the latter, as connected with Christian baptism: see further on ch. xix. 2, 3.—The mistake of supposing that he did not know Jesus to be the Messiah, has arisen from the description of his subsequent work at Corinth, ver. 28, but by no means follows from it: this he did before, but not so completely. The same mistake has led to the alteration of Jesus into “the Lord” in the ordinary text, it having been well imagined that he could not teach accurately the things concerning Jesus, if he did not know him to be the Messiah: whereas by these words is imported that he knew and taught accurately the facts respecting Jesus, but of the consequences of that which he taught, of all which may be summed up in the doctrine of Christian baptism, he had no idea.

knowing only...] Meyer well remarks, that it is not meant that he was absolutely ignorant of the fact of there being such a thing as Christian baptism, but ignorant of its being any thing different from that of John: he knew, or recognized in baptism only that which the baptism of John was: a sign of repentance.

26. more accurately] The former accuracy was only in facts: this is the still more expanded accuracy of doctrine. That was merely “the things concerning Jesus,” as He lived and ministered on earth: this included also the promise of the Spirit, and its performance.

27. exhorting the disciples to receive him] Probably this exhortation was given by Priscilla and Aquila principally. It may have been from their account of the Corinthian church, that he was desirous to go to Achaia.

through grace] These words may be joined with the verb helped, implying that the grace was in him. But the rendering in the text is much more probable,—those who had believed through grace. “The for, which follows, should be noticed. His coming was a valuable assistance to the Christians against the Jews, in the controversies which had doubtless been going on since Paul’s departure.” Conybeare and Howson, edn. 2, ii. p. 10.

28. mightily convinced] The original word is a very forcible one,—he argued down, as we say,—‘proved in their teeth:’ and then it has also the sense of continuity,—that this was not done once or twice, but continuously.

Acts: Chapter 19

CHAP. XIX. 1–40.] ARRIVAL, RESIDENCE, AND ACTS OF PAUL AT EPHESUS.

1. the upper tracts] By this name were known, the eastern parts of Asia Minor, beyond the river Halys, or in comparison with Ephesus, in the direction of that river.

certain disciples] These seem to have been in the same situation as Apollos, see on ch. xviii. 25. They cannot have been mere disciples of John, on account of when ye believed, which can bear no meaning but that of believing on the Lord Jesus: but they had received only John’s baptism, and had had no proof of the descent of the Holy Spirit, nor knowledge of His gifts.

2.] The indefinite past tense in the original should be faithfully rendered: not as A.V. ‘Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed?’ but Did ye receive the Holy Ghost when ye became believers? i.e. ‘on your becoming believers, had ye the gifts of the Spirit conferred on you?’—as in ch. viii. 16, 17. This is both grammatically necessary, and absolutely demanded by the sense; the enquiry being, not as to any reception of the Holy Ghost during the period since their baptism, but as to one simultaneous with their first reception into the church: and their not having then received Him is accounted for by the deficiency of their baptism.

We did not so much as hear] Literally, on the contrary, not even... Here again, not, ‘we have not heard,’ which would involve an absurdity: “for they could not be followers of Moses or of John the Baptist, without hearing of the Holy Ghost” (Bengel);—but we did not hear, at the time of our conversion:—Our reception into the faith was unaccompanied by any preaching of the office or the gifts of the Spirit,—our baptism was not followed by any imparting of His gifts: we did not so much as hear Him mentioned. The stress of the sentence is on hearing: so far from receiving the Holy Ghost, they did not even hear of His existence.

3.] St. Paul’s question establishes the above rendering:—To what then (if ye did not so much as hear of the Holy Ghost at your first believing) were ye baptized? If the question and answer in ver. 2 regarded, as in A.V., the whole interval since their conversion, this enquiry would have been more naturally expressed in the perfect tense.

Unto what] unto (with a view to, as introductory to) what profession? They answer, Unto (that indicated by) the baptism of John, viz.: repentance, and the believing on Jesus, then to come, but now (see ch. xviii. 25, note) the object of our faith.

5.] Two singular perversions of this verse have occurred: (1) the Anabaptists use it to authorize the repetition of Christian baptism, whereas it is not Christian baptism which was repeated, seeing that John's baptism was not such, but only the baptism which they now for the first time received; and (2) some of the orthodox, wishing to wrest this weapon out of the hands of the Anabaptists, oddly enough suppose this verse to belong still to Paul's discourse, and to mean, 'and the people when they heard him (John), were baptized into the name of the Lord Jesus.' This obviously is contrary to fact, historically: and would leave our present narrative in a singular state: for Paul, having treated their baptism as insufficient, would thus proceed on it to impose his hands, as if it were sufficient.

in (into) the name of the Lord Jesus] Two questions arise here: (1) Was it the ordinary practice to rebaptize those who had been baptized either by John or by the disciples (John iv. 1 f.) before baptism became, by the effusion of the Holy Spirit, "the bath of regeneration?" This we cannot definitely answer. That it was sometimes done, this incident shews: but in all probability, in the cases of the majority of the original disciples, the greater baptism by the Holy Ghost and fire on the day of Pentecost superseded the outward form or sign. The Apostles themselves received only this baptism (besides probably that of John): and most likely the same was the case with the original believers. But of the three thousand who were added on the day of Pentecost, very many must have been already baptized by John; and all were rebaptized without enquiry. (2) What conclusion can we deduce from this verse respecting the use or otherwise of baptism in the name of the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost, in the apostolic period? The only answer must be, that at that early time we have no indication of set formulae in the administration of either sacrament. Such formulae arise of necessity, when precision in formal statement of doctrine became an absolute necessity in the church: and the materials for them were found ready in the word of God, who has graciously provided for all necessities of His church in all time. But, in matter of fact, such a baptism as this was a baptism into the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. As Jews, these men were already servants of the living God—and by putting on the Son, they received in a new and more gracious sense the Father also. And in the sequel of their baptism, the imposition of hands, they sensibly became recipients of God the Holy Ghost. Where such manifestations were present, the form of words might be wanting; but with us, who have them not, it is necessary and imperative. Mr. Howson regards (i. 517; ii. 13) St. Paul's question in our ver. 3 as indicative that the name of the Holy Ghost was used in the baptismal formula. But the inference seems to me insecure.

9.] Probably the school of Tyrannus was a private synagogue (called Beth Midrasch by the Jews), where he might assemble the believing Jews quietly, and also invite the attendance of Gentiles to hear the word. But it is also possible that, as commonly supposed, Tyrannus may have been a Gentile sophist. The name occurs as a proper name, 2 Macc. iv. 40.

10. two years] We cannot derive any certain estimate of the length of St. Paul's stay in Ephesus from these words,—even if we add the three months of ver. 8,—for vv. 21, 22 admit of an interval after the expiration of the two years and three months. And his own expression, ch. xx. 31, "three whole years," implies that it was longer than from this chapter would at first sight appear. He probably (compare his announced intention, 1 Cor. xvi. 8, with his expectation of meeting Titus at Troas, 2 Cor. ii. 12, 13, which shews that he was not far off the time previously arranged) left Ephesus about or soon after the third Pentecost after that which he kept in Jerusalem. See Introd. to 1 Cor. §6.

all they which dwelt in Asia] Hyperbolical:—all had the opportunity, and probably some of every considerable town availed themselves of it. To this long teaching of St. Paul the seven churches of Asia owe their establishment.

11. no common miracles] miracles of no ordinary kind. In what they differed from the usual displays of power by the Apostles, is presently related: viz. that even garments taken from him were endued with miraculous power.

12.] Diseases, and possession by evil spirits, are here plainly distinguished from each other. 'The rationalists, and semi-rationalists, are much troubled to clear the fact related, that such handkerchiefs and aprons were instrumental in working the cures, from participation in what they are pleased to call a popular notion founded in superstition and error. But in this and similar narratives (see ch. vv. 15, note) Christian faith finds no difficulty whatever. All miraculous working is an exertion of the direct power of the All-powerful; a suspension by Him of His ordinary laws: and whether He will use any instrument in doing this, or what instrument, must depend altogether on His own purpose in the miracle—the effect to be produced on the recipients, beholders, or hearers. Without His special selection and enabling, all instruments were vain; with these, all are capable. In the present case, as before in ch. v. 15, it was His purpose to exalt His Apostle as the Herald of His gospel, and to lay in Ephesus the strong foundation of His church. And He therefore endues him with this extraordinary power. But to argue by analogy from such a case,—to suppose that because our Lord was able, and Peter, and Paul, and in Old Test. times Elisha, were enabled, to exert this peculiar power, therefore the same will be possessed by the body or relics of every real or supposed saint, is the height of folly and fanaticism. The true analogy tends directly the other way. In no cases but these do we find the power, even in the apostolic days: and the general cessation of all extraordinary gifts of the Spirit would lead us to the inference that à fortiori these, which were even then the rarest, have ceased also.

13.] See note on Matt. xii. 27, respecting the Jewish exorcists. These men, seeing the success of Paul's agency in casting out devils, adopt the name of Jesus in their own exorcisms.

14. chief of the priests] The word must be used in a wide sense. He may have been chief of the priests resident at Ephesus: or perhaps chief of one of the twenty-four courses.

15.] The narrative, from describing the nature of the attempt, passes to a single case in which it was tried, and in which (see below) two only of the brothers were apparently concerned.

16. them both] The weight of MSS. evidence for this reading is even surpassed by its internal probability. There would be every reason, as seven have been before mentioned, for altering it: but no imaginable one for substituting it for that of the common text. Two only, it would seem, were thus employed on this particular occasion: and St. Luke has retained the word as it stood in the record furnished to him. Whether any similar occurrence happened to the rest, we are not informed: this one is selected as most notorious.

18.] The natural effect of such an occurrence was to induce a horror of magical arts, &c., which some were still continuing to countenance or practise secretly, together with a profession of Christianity. Such persons now came forward and confessed their error. The deeds mentioned in this verse were probably the association with such practices: the next verse treats of the magicians themselves.

19. their books] These books consisted of magical formulae, or receipt-books, or written amulets. These last were celebrated by the name of Ephesian scrolls. They were copies of the mystic words engraved on the image of the Ephesian Artemis (Diana).

fifty thousand pieces of silver] 50,000 drachmæ, i.e. denarii: for the drachma of the Augustan and following ages was the Roman denarius—about 8½ d. of our money: which makes the entire value about £1770.

21. these things] The occurrences of vv. 19, 20.

in the spirit] An expression mostly used by St. Paul, see Rom. i. 9; viii. 16; xii. 11: 1 Cor. ii. 4; v. 3, 4; xiv. 14, and other places.

I must also see Rome] As he was sent to the Gentiles, he saw that the great metropolis of the Gentile world was the legitimate centre of his apostolic working. Or perhaps he speaks under some divine intimation that ultimately he should be brought to Rome. If so, his words were literally fulfilled. He did see Rome, when he had been at Jerusalem this next time: but after considerable delay, and as a prisoner. Compare the same design as expressed by him, Rom. i. 15: xv. 23–28; and Paley's remarks in the Hora Paulina.

22.] He intended himself to follow, after Pentecost, 1 Cor. xvi. 8. This mission of Timothy is alluded to 1 Cor. iv. 17 (see also 1 Cor. i. 1); xvi. 10. The object of it was to bring these churches in Macedonia and Achaia into remembrance of the ways and teaching of Paul. It occurred shortly-before the writing of 1 Cor. He was (1 Cor. xvi. 11) soon to return:—but considerable uncertainty hangs over this journey. We find him again with Paul in Macedonia, 2 Cor. i. 1: but apparently he had not reached Corinth. See 1 Cor. xvi. as above: and 2 Cor. xii. 18, where he would probably have been mentioned, had he done so.—On the difficult question respecting a journey of Paul himself to Corinth during this period, see notes, 2 Cor. xii. 14; xiii. 1,—and Introduction to 1 Cor. §5.

Erastus] This Erastus can hardly be identical with the Erastus of Rom. xvi. 23, who must have been resident at Corinth: see there: and therefore hardly either with the Erastus of 2 Tim. iv. 20: see note there.

24. silver shrines] These were small models of the celebrated temple of the Ephesian Artemis (Diana), with her statue, which it was the custom to carry on journeys, and place in houses, as a charm. We may find an exact parallel in the usages of that corrupt form of Christianity, which, whatever it may pretend to teach, in practice honours similarly the “great goddess” of its imagination.

25. of like occupation] i.e. manufacturers of all sorts of memorials or amulets connected with the worship of Artemis (Diana),—Mr. Howson (ii. p. 98) suggests that possibly Alexander the coppersmith may have been one of these craftsmen:

see 2 Tim. iv. 14.

26.] The people believed that the images themselves were gods: see ch. xvii the citation from Plutarch in my Greek Test.—And so it is invariably, wherever images are employed professedly as media of worship.

27.] but that eventually even the temple itself of the great goddess Artemis will be counted for nothing. “Great” was the usual epithet of the Ephesian Artemis.—The temple of Artemis at Ephesus, having been burnt to the ground by Herostratus on the night of the birth of Alexander the Great (B. C. 355), was restored with increased magnificence, and accounted one of the wonders of the ancient world. Its dimensions were 425 by 220 feet, and it was surrounded by 127 columns, 60 feet high. It was standing in all its grandeur at this time. See Conybeare and Howson, ch. xvi. vol. ii. pp. 84 ff.

29. having caught] It is not implied that they seized Gaius and Aristarchus before they rushed into the theatre: but rather that the two acts were simultaneous.

Gaius] A different person from the Gaius of ch. xx. 4, who was of Derbe, and from the Gaius of Rom. xvi. 23, and 1 Cor. i. 15, who was evidently a Corinthian. Aristarchus is mentioned ch. xx. 4; xxvii. 2; Col. iv. 10; Philem. 24. He was a native of Thessalonica.

into the theatre] The resort of the populace on occasions of excitement. ‘Of the site of the theatre, the scene of the tumult raised by Demetrius, there can be no doubt, its ruins being a wreck of immense grandeur. I think it must have been larger than the one at Miletus; and that exceeds any I have elsewhere seen..... Its form alone can now be spoken of, for every seat is removed, and the proscenium is a heap of ruins.’ Fellows, Asia Minor, p. 274. ‘The theatre of Ephesus is said to be the largest known of any that have remained to us from antiquity.’ Conybeare and Howson, ii. p. 83, note 3.

31. certain of the chief of Asia] Literally, of the Asiarchs. These Asiarchs were officers elected by the cities of the province of Asia to preside over their games and religious festivals. Of these it would be natural that the one who for the time presided would bear the title of “the Asiarch,” but no more is known of such presidency. The Asiarch Philip at Smyrna is mentioned by Eusebius as presiding in the amphitheatre at the martyrdom of Polycarp. These Ephesian games in honour of Artemis took place in May, which whole month (another singular coincidence with the practices of idolatrous Christendom) was sacred to, and named Artemisian after, the goddess.

33. drew forth] i.e. urged forward, through the crowd; the Jews pushing him on from behind.—Alexander does not seem to be mentioned elsewhere (but see on 2 Tim. iv. 14). He appears to have been a Christian convert from Judaism, whom the Jews were willing to expose as a victim to the fury of the mob: or perhaps one of themselves, put forward to clear them of blame on the occasion.

34. when they knew that he was a Jew] They would hear nothing from a Jew, as being an enemy of image-worship.

35.] The townclerk is the nearest English office corresponding to that here mentioned in the original. He was the keeper of the archives, and public reader of decrees, &c., in the assemblies. The word here rendered worshipper probably means a virger, or adorner of the temple: here used as implying that Ephesus had the charge and keeping of the temple. The title is found on inscriptions as belonging to Ephesus; and seems to have been specially granted by the emperors to particular cities.

of the image which fell down from Jupiter] To give peculiar sanctity to various images, it was given out that they had fallen from heaven. See examples in my Greek Test. This artifice also has been imitated by the paganized Christianity of the wretched Church of Rome.

37.] From this verse it appears that Paul had proceeded at Ephesus with the same caution as at Athens, and had not held up to contempt the worship of Artemis, any further than unavoidably the truths which he preached would render it contemptible. This is also manifest from his having friends among the Asiarchs, ver. 31. Chrysostom, however, treats this assertion of the town-clerk merely as a device to appease the people: “this,” he says, “was a lie, and was said only for the populace.” 38. court-days are held] The sentence implies that they were then actually going on. They were the periodical assizes of the district, held by the proconsul and his assessors (see below).

deputies] i.e.—see on ch. xiii. 7,—proconsuls: the fit officers before whom to bring these causes. So the Commentators generally. But perhaps the assessors of the proconsul may have themselves popularly borne the name.

let them implead one another] i.e. let them (the plaintiffs and defendants) plead against one another.

39.] The definite article points out the regularly recurring assembly, of which they all knew.

40.] He here assumes that this assembly was an unlawful one.

The meaning is, There being no ground why (i. e. in consequence of which) we shall be able to give an account, i.e. ‘no ground whereon to build the possibility of our giving an account.’

Acts: Chapter 20

CHAP. XX. 1–XXI. 16.] JOURNEY OF PAUL TO MACEDONIA AND GREECE, AND THENCE TO JERUSALEM.

2.] Notices of this journey may be found 2 Cor. ii. 12, 13; viii. 5, 6. He delayed on the way some time at Troas, waiting for Titus,—broke off his preaching there, though prosperous, in distress of mind at his non-arrival, 2 Cor. ii. 12, 18,—and sailed for Macedonia, where Titus met him, 2 Cor. vii. 6. That Epistle was written during it, from Macedonia (see 2 Cor. ix. 2, ‘I am boasting’). He seems to have gone to the confines at least of Illyria, Rom. xv. 19.

Greece] Achaia: see ch. xix. 21.

3. there abode] This stay was made at Corinth, most probably: see 1 Cor. xvi. 6, 7: and was during the winter; see below on ver. 6. During it the Epistle to the Romans was written: see Introduction to Rom. §4.

as he was about to sail] This purpose, of going from Corinth to Palestine by sea, is implied ch. xix. 21, and 1 Cor. xvi. 3–7.

4. into (as far as) Asia] It is not hereby implied that they went no further than to Asia: Trophimus (ch. xxi. 29) and Aristarchus (ch. xxvii. 2), and probably others, as the bearers of the alms from Macedonia and Corinth (1 Cor. xvi. 3, 4), accompanied him to Jerusalem.

Sopater [the son] of Pyrrhus, a Berean] This mention of his father is perhaps made to distinguish him (?) from Sosipater, who was with Paul at Corinth (Rom. xvi. 21). The name Pyrrhus has in our copies been erased as that of an unknown person, and because the mention of the father is unusual in the N.T.:—no possible reason can be given for its insertion by copyists.

Aristarchus] See ch. xix. 29; xxvii. 2; Col. iv. 10; Philem. 24.—Secundus is altogether unknown.—The Gaius here is not the Gaius of ch. xix. 29, who was a Macedonian. The epithet of Derbe is inserted for distinction’s sake. Timotheus was from Lystra, which probably gives occasion to his being mentioned here in close company with Gaius of Derbe. The name Caius (Gaius) was far too common to create any difficulty in there being two, or three (see note, ch. xix. 29) companions of Paul so called.

of Asia, Tychicus and Trophimus] Tychicus is mentioned Eph. vi. 21, as sent (to Ephesus from Rome) with that Epistle. He bore also that to the Colossians, Col. iv. 7, at the same time. See also 2 Tim. iv. 12; Tit. iii. 12.—Trophimus, an Ephesian, was in Jerusalem with Paul, ch. xxi. 29: and had been, shortly before 2 Tim. was written, left sick at Miletus. (See Introduction to 2 Tim. §1. 5.)

5. These] The persons mentioned in ver. 4: not only Tychicus and Trophimus. The mention of Timotheus in this list, distinguished from those included under the word us, has created an insuperable difficulty to those who suppose Timotheus himself to be the narrator of what follows: which certainly cannot be got over (as De Wette) by supposing that Timotheus might have inserted himself in the list, and then tacitly excepted himself by the us afterwards. The truth is apparent here, as well as before, ch. xvi. 10 (where see note), that the anonymous narrator was in very intimate connexion with Paul; and on this occasion we find him remaining with him when the rest went forward.

going before&c...] For what reason, is not said: but we may well conceive, that if they bore the contributions of the churches, a better opportunity, or safer ship, may have determined Paul to send them on, he himself having work to do at Philippi; or perhaps, again, as Meyer suggests, Paul may have remained behind to keep the days of unleavened bread. But then why should not they have remained too? The same motive may not have operated with them: but in that case no reason can be given why they should have been sent on except as above. It is not impossible that both may have been combined: before the end of the days of unleavened bread, a favourable opportunity occurs of sailing to Troas, of which they, with their charge, avail themselves: Paul and Luke waiting till the end of the feast, and taking the risk of a less desirable conveyance. That the feast had something to do with it, the mention of after the days of unleavened bread seems to imply: such notices being not inserted ordinarily by Luke for the sake of dates. The assumption made by some that the rest of the company sailed at once for Troas from Corinth, while Paul and Luke went by land to Philippi, is inconsistent with the words used in the opening of ver. 4.—From the notice here, we learn that Paul’s stay in Europe on this occasion was about three-quarters of a year: from shortly after Pentecost, when he left Ephesus (see on ch. xix. 10), to the next Easter.

6. in five days] The wind must have been adverse: for the voyage from Troas to Philippi (Neapolis) in ch. xvi. 11, seems to have been made in two days. It appears that they arrived on a Monday.—Compare notes, 2 Cor. ii. 12 ff.

7. upon the first day of the week] We have here an intimation of the continuance of the practice, which seems to have begun immediately after the Resurrection (see John xx. 26), of assembling on the first day of the week for religious purposes. Perhaps the greatest proof of all, that this day was thus observed, may be found in the early (see 1 Cor. xvi. 2) and at length general prevalence, in the Gentile world, of the Jewish seven-day period as a division of time,—which was entirely foreign to Gentile habits. It can only have been introduced as following on the practice of especial honour paid to this day. But we find in the Christian Scriptures no trace of any sabbatical observance of this or any day: nay, in Rom. xiv. 5 (where see note), St Paul shews the untenableness of any such view under the Christian dispensation. The idea of the transference of the Jewish sabbath from the seventh day to the first was an invention of later times.

to break bread] See note on ch. ii. 42. The breaking of bread in the Holy Communion was at this time inseparable from the agapæ or love-feasts. It took place apparently in the evening (after the day's work was ended), and at the end of the assembly, after the preaching of the word (ver. 11).

unto them, in the third person, the discourse being addressed to the disciples at Troas: but the first person is used before and after, because all were assembled, and partook of the breaking of bread together. Not observing this, the copyists have altered we above into “the disciples,” and again into they below to suit this to them.

8. there were many lights] This may be noticed, as Meyer observes, to shew that the fall of the young man could be well observed: or, perhaps, because many lights are apt to increase drowsiness at such times. Calvin and Bengel suppose it to have been done,—in order that all suspicion might be removed from the assembly, others that the lights were used for solemnity's sake,—for that both Jews and Gentiles celebrated their festal days by abundance of lights. But surely the adoption of either Jewish or Gentile practices of this kind in the Christian assemblies was very improbable.

9.] Who Eutychus was is quite uncertain. The occurrence of the name as belonging to slaves and freedmen (as it appears from inscriptions) determines nothing.

on the window-seat] The windows in the East were (and are) without glass, and with or without shutters.

being fallen into a deep sleep] Literally, borne down by a deep sleep. I believe the word is used here and below in the same sense, not, as usually interpreted, here of the effect of sleep, and below of the fall caused by the sleep. It implies that relaxation of the system, and collapse of the muscular power, which is more or less indicated by our expressions ‘falling asleep,’ ‘dropping asleep.’ This effect is being produced, in this clause, but as Paul was going on long discoursing, took complete possession of him, and having been overpowered,—entirely relaxed in consequence of the sleep, he fell. In the words, was taken up dead, here there is a direct assertion, which can hardly be evaded by explaining it, ‘was taken up for dead,’ or by saying that it expresses the judgment of those who took him up, as Meyer. It seems to me, that the supposition of a mere suspended animation is as absurd here as in the miracle of Jairus's daughter, Luke viii, 41–56. Let us take the narrative as it stands. The youth falls, and is taken up dead: so much is plainly asserted. Paul, not a physician, but an Apostle,—gifted, not with medical discernment, but with miraculous power, goes down to him, falls on him and embraces him,—a strange proceeding for one bent on discovering suspended animation, but not so for one who bore in mind the action of Elijah (1 Kings xvii. 21) and Elisha (2 Kings iv. 34), each time over a dead body,—and having done this, not before, bids them not to be troubled, for his life was in him. I would ask any unbiassed reader, taking these details into consideration, which of the two is the natural interpretation,—and whether there can be any reasonable doubt that the intent of St. Luke is to relate a miracle of raising the dead, and that he mentions the falling on and embracing him as the outward significant means taken by the Apostle to that end?

11.] The intended breaking of bread had been put off by the accident. The article here may import, ‘the bread which it was intended to break,’ alluding to ver. 7 above.

and eaten] The agapé was a veritable meal. Not ‘having tasted it,’ viz. the bread which he had broken;—though that is implied, usage decides for the other meaning.

so] i.e. ‘after so doing.’

12.] As in the raising of Jairus's daughter, our Lord commanded that something should be given her to eat, that nature might be recruited, so doubtless here rest and treatment were necessary, in order that the restored life might be confirmed, and the shock recovered. The time indicated by break of day must have been before or about 5 A.M.: which would allow about four hours since the miracle. We have here a minute but interesting touch of truth in the narrative. Paul, we learn afterwards, ver. 13, intended to go afoot. And accordingly here we have it simply related that he started away from Troas before his companions, not remaining for the reintroduction of the now recovered Eutychus in ver. 12.

13. Assos] A sea-port (also called Apollonia, Plin. v. 32) in Mysia or Troas, opposite to Lesbos, twenty-four Roman miles from Troas, built on a high cliff above sea, with a precipitous descent. Paul's reason is not given for wishing to be alone: probably he had some apostolic visit to make.

14. Mitylene] The capital of Lesbos, on the E. coast of the island, famed for its beautiful situation. It had two harbours: the northern, into which their ship would sail, was large and deep, and defended by a breakwater.

15. we put in to Samos] Then they made a short run in the evening to Trogylgium, a cape and town on the Ionian coast, only five miles distant, where they spent the night. He had passed in front of the bay of Ephesus, and was now but a short distance from it.

Miletus] The ancient capital of Ionia. See 2 Tim. iv. 20, and note.

16. Paul had determined] We see here that the ship was at Paul's disposal, and probably hired at Philippi, or rather at Neapolis, for the voyage to Patara (ch. xxi. 1), where he and his company embark in a merchant vessel, going to Tyre. The separation of Paul and Luke from the rest at the beginning of the voyage may have been in some way connected with the hiring or outfit of this vessel. The expression he had determined is too subjectively strong to allow of our supposing that the Apostle merely followed the previously determined course of a ship in which he took a passage.

to sail by (i. e. to omit visiting)] He may have been afraid of detention there, owing to the machinations of those who had caused the uproar in ch. xix. Another reason has been given: "He seems to have feared that, had he run up the long gulf to Ephesus, he might be detained in it by the westerly winds, which blow long, especially in the spring." But these would affect him nearly as much at. Miletus.

17.] The distance from Miletus to Ephesus is about thirty miles. He probably, therefore, stayed three or four days altogether at Miletus.

the elders] called, ver. 28, bishops. This circumstance began very early to contradict the growing views of the apostolic institution and necessity of prelatical episcopacy. Thus Irenaeus (Cent. 2), "He called together at Miletus the bishops and presbyters (elders), who came from Ephesus and the rest of the churches near." Here we see (1) the two, bishops and presbyters, distinguished, as if both were sent for, in order that the titles might not seem to belong to the same persons,—and (2) other neighbouring churches also brought in, in order that there might not seem to be bishops in one church only. That neither of these was the case, is clearly shewn by the plain words of this verse: "he sent to Ephesus, and summoned the elders of the church." So early did interested and disingenuous interpretations begin to cloud the light which Scripture might have thrown on ecclesiastical questions. The A.V. has hardly dealt fairly in this case with the sacred text, in rendering the designation episcopous, ver. 28, 'overseers:' whereas it ought there, as in all other places, to have been bishops, that the fact of elders and bishops having been originally and apostolically synonymous might be apparent to the ordinary English reader, which now it is not.

18.] The evidence furnished by this speech as to the literal report in the Acts of the words spoken by St. Paul, is most important. It is a treasure-house of words, idioms, and sentiments, peculiarly belonging to the Apostle himself. See this shewn in my Greek Test. The contents of the speech may be thus given: He reminds the elders of his conduct among them (vv. 18–21): announces to them his final separation from them (vv. 22–25): and commends earnestly to them the flock committed to their charge, for which he himself had by word and work disinterestedly laboured (vv. 26–35).

from the first day] These words hold a middle place, partly with "ye know," partly with "after what man-ner I was with you." The knowledge on their part was coextensive with his whole stay among them: so that we may take the words with ye know, at the same time carrying on their sense to what follows.

I was with you] So 1 Thess. i. 5, ii. 10. See 1 Cor. ix. 20, 22.

19. serving the Lord] With the sole exception of the assertion of our Lord, 'Ye cannot serve God and mammon,' Matt. vi. 24; Luke xvi. 13, this peculiar verb ('to be a bond-servant to'), for 'serving God,' is used by Paul only, and by him seven times, viz. Rom. vii. 6, 25; xii. 11; xiv. 18; xvi. 18; Phil. ii. 22; Col. iii. 24; 1 Thess. i. 9.

with all humility of mind] Also a Pauline expression, 2 Cor. viii. 7; xii. 12.

temptations] See especially Gal. iv. 14.

20. I kept back nothing] So again ver. 27. The sense in Gal. ii. 12 is similar, though not exactly identical—‘reserved himself,’ withdrew himself from any open declaration of sentiments. In Heb. x. 38 it is different.

22. bound in my spirit] This interpretation is most probable, both from the construction, and from the usage of the expression repeatedly by and of St. Paul in the sense of his own spirit. See ch. xvii. 16, where the principal instances are given. Compare Rom. xii. 11; 1 Cor. v. 3; 2 Cor. ii. 13, and ch. xix. 21. How he was bound in the spirit, is manifest, by comparing other passages, where the Holy Spirit of God is related to have shaped his apostolic course. He was bound, by the Spirit of God leading captive, constraining, his own spirit.—As he went up to Jerusalem, bound in his spirit, so he left Judæa again bound in the flesh,—a prisoner according to the flesh.—He had no detailed knowledge of futurity—nothing but what the Holy Spirit, in general forewarnings, repeated at every point of his journey (city by city; see ch. xxi. 4, 11, for two such instances), announced, viz. imprisonment and tribulations. That here no inner voice of the Spirit is meant, is evident from the words.

23. the Holy Ghost witnesseth] Compare Rom. viii. 16.

24.] The reading in the margin, amidst all the varieties, seems to be that out of which the others have all arisen, and whose difficulties they more or less explain. And the meaning will be, ‘I do not value my life, in comparison with the finishing my course.’ the finishing of my course] See the same image, with the same word remarkably expanded, Phil. iii, 12–14.

my course] A similitude peculiar to Paul: occurring, remarkably enough, in his speech at ch. xiii. 25. He uses it without this word, at 1 Cor. ix. 24–27, and Phil. iii. 14.

which I have received] Compare Rom. i. 5, “by whom we [have] received grace and apostleship.”

25.] It has been argued from the words among whom I have gone, that the elders of other churches besides that of Ephesus must have been present. But it might just as well have been argued, that every one to whom St. Paul had there preached must have been present, on account of the words ye all. If he could regard the elders as the representatives of the various churches, of which there can be no doubt, why may not he similarly have regarded the Ephesian elders as representatives of the churches of proconsular Asia, and have addressed all in addressing them? Or may not these words have even a wider application, viz. to all who had been the subjects of his former personal ministry, in Asia and Europe, now addressed through the Ephesian elders?—See the question, whether Paul ever did see the Asiatic churches again, discussed in the Introduction to the Pastoral Epistles, §2. 18 ff. I may remark here, that such an expression in the mouth of St. Paul, does not necessarily imply that he spoke from divine and unerring knowledge, but expresses his own conviction of the certainty of what he is saying: see ch. xxvi. 27, which is much to our point, as expressing his firm persuasion that king Agrippa was a believer in the prophets: but certainly no infallible knowledge of his heart:—Rom. xv. 29, where also a firm persuasion is expressed:—Phil. i. 19, 20, where his knowledge, ver. 19, is explained to rest on his expectation and hope, in ver. 20. So that he may here ground his expectation of never seeing them again, on the plan of making a journey into the west after seeing Rome, which he mentions Rom. xv. 24, 28, and from which, with bonds and imprisonment and other dangers awaiting him, he might well expect never to return, Consequently, what he here says need not fetter our judgment on the above question.

28. the flock] This similitude does not elsewhere occur in Paul’s writings. We find it, where we should naturally expect it, used by him, to whom it was said, ‘Feed my sheep,’ 1 Pet. v. 2, 3. But it is common in the O.T. and sanctioned by the example of our Lord Himself: Luke xii. 32.

over the which the Holy Ghost hath made you...] See ch. xiii. 2.

bishops] See on ver. 17, and Theodoret on Phil. i. 1, “The Apostle calls the elders (presbyters) bishops: for at that time they had both names.”

the church of God] On the variety of reading here, and the reasons which have led me to adhere to that in the text, see in my Greek Test.

29. grievous wolves] Not persecutors, but false teachers, from the words “enter in among you,” by which it appears that they were to come in among the flock, i.e. to be baptized Christians. In fact ver. 30 is explanatory of the metaphoric meaning of ver. 29.

30.] your own selves does not necessarily signify the presbyters: he speaks to them as being the whole flock.

31.] On the three years spoken of in this verse, see note, ch. xix. 10. We may just remark here (1) that this passage being precise and definite, must be the master-key to those others (as in ch. xix.) which give wide and indefinite notes of time: and (2) that it seems at first sight to preclude the idea of a journey (as some think) to Crete and Corinth having taken place during this period. But this apparent inference may require modifying by other circumstances: compare Introduction to 1 Cor. §v. 4.

32. which is able] Clearly spoken of God, not of the word of His grace, which cannot be said to give an inheritance, however it might build up.—The expression “an in-heritance among all them that are sanctified” is strikingly similar to “his inheritance in the saints” Eph. i. 18, addressed to this same church. See also ch. xxvi. 18.

33.] See 1 Sam. xii. 3; and for similar avowals by Paul himself, 1 Cor. ix. 11, 12; 2 Cor. xi. 8, 9; xii. 13.

34. these hands] Also strikingly in Paul’s manner: compare “these bonds,” ch. xxvi. 29,—and ch. xxviii. 20. See 1 Cor. iv. 12, which he wrote when at Ephesus.—Observe, ministered unto my necessities, and to them that were with me. This is not without meaning—his friends were among his necessities—he supplied by his labour, not his and their wants, but his wants and them.

35. the weak] Not here the weak in faith (Rom. xiv. 1; 1 Cor. viii. 9), as many think,—which the context both before and after will not allow:—but the poor.

It is more blessed to give than to re-ceive] This saying of our Lord is one of the very few not recorded in the Gospels, which have come down to us. Many such must have been current in the apostolic times, and are possibly preserved unknown to us, in such epistles as those of James, Peter, and John. Bengel remarks, “The world’s opinion is different:” and cites from an old poet in Athenæus, “A fool the giver,—the receiver blest.” But we have some sayings the other way: not to quote authors who wrote after this date, and might have imbibed some of the spirit of Christianity, we find in Aristotle, “It is more becoming the liberal man to give just gifts, than to receive just receipts, or to abstain from receiving unjust ones. For it is more the part of ‘virtue to do, than to receive, good.’”

XXI. 1.] The A.V., ‘After we had gotten from them,’ does not come up to the original: which is as in the margin: and Chrysostom says, “The expression shews the violence of the parting.”

we came with a straight course] See ch. xvi. 11, having run before the wind. Cos, opposite Cnidus and Halicarnassus, celebrated for its wines and ointments. The chief town was of the same name, and had a famous temple of Æsculapius. It was the birth-place of Hippocrates, the great physician. The modern name, Stanchio, is a corruption of “es tan Co” (towards Cos), as Stamboul, for Constantinople, is of “es tan polin” (towards the city). Rhodes was at this time free. It was reduced to a Roman province under Vespasian. The situation of its chief town is praised by Strabo.—The celebrated Colossus at this time broken and lying in ruins.—Patara, in Lycia, the capital of the race, a large maritime town, a short distance E. of the mouth of the Xanthus. It had a temple and oracle of Apollo. There are considerable ruins remaining.—Here they leave their ship hired at Troas, or perhaps at Neapolis (see note on xx. 16), and avail themselves of a merchant ship bound for Tyre.

3. when we had discovered Cyprus] Lite-rally, having been shewn Cyprus.

we left it on the left hand] i.e. to the E. ‘This would be the straight course from Patara to Tyre.

Tyre] This city, so well known for its commercial importance and pride, and so often mentioned in the Old Testament prophets, was now a free town of the province of Syria.

4. But...] Implying, ‘the crew indeed were busied with unloading the ship: but we, having sought out (by enquiry) the disciples.’..... ‘Finding disciples’ (A. V.) is quite wrong. It is not improbable that Paul may have preached at Tyre before, when he visited Syria and Cilicia (Gal. i. 21) after his conversion,—and again when he confirmed the churches (ch. xv. 41): “the disciples” seems to imply this.

seven days] The time taken in unloading:—they apparently proceeded in the same ship, see ver. 6.—The notice here is very important, that these Tyrian disciples said to St. Paul by the Spirit, that he should not go to Jerusalem,—and yet he went thither, and, as he himself declares, bound in spirit by the leading of God. We thus have an instance of that which Paul asserts 1 Cor. xiv. 32, that the spirits of prophets are subject to prophets, i.e. that the revelation made by the Holy Spirit to each man’s spirit was under the influence of that man’s will and temperament, moulded by and taking the form of his own capacities and resolves. So here: these Tyrian prophets knew by the Spirit, which testified this in every city (ch. xx. 23), that bonds and imprisonment awaited Paul. This appears to have been announced by them, shaped and intensified by their own intense love and anxiety for him who was probably their Father in the faith (see on ver. 5). But he paid no regard to the prohibition, being himself under a leading of the same Spirit too plain for him to mistake it. See below on vv. 10 ff.

5. departed] Literally, went forth: viz. from the house where they were lodged.

till we were out of the city] “We passed through the city to the western shore of the ancient island, now the peninsula, hoping to find there a fitting spot for the tent, in the open space between the houses and the sea.” Robinson, iii. 392.

on the shore] “Yet had we looked a few rods further, we should have found a very tolerable spot by a threshing-floor, where we might have pitched close upon the bank, and enjoyed, in all its luxury, the cool sea-breeze, and the dashing the surge upon the rocky shore.” id. ibid.

7. finishing our voyage] viz. the whole voyage, from Neapolis to Syria. The A.V., ‘when we had finished our course from Tyre, is not so probable a rendering of the original. ‘With their landing at Ptolemais their voyage ended: the rest of the journey was made by land.’ (De Wette.)

Ptolemais] Anciently Accho (Judg. i. 31,—in Greek and Roman writers Acé), called Ptolemáïs from (probably) Ptolemy Lathurus. It was a large town with a harbour. It was never (Judg. i. 31) fully possessed by the Jews, but belonged to the Phoenicians, who in after times were mixed with Greeks. But after the captivity a colony of Jews is found there. The emperor Claudius gave it the freedom of the city, whence it is called by Pliny ‘a colony of Claudius Cæsar,’ “Colonia Claudi Cæsar.” It is now called St. Jean d’ Acre, and is the best harbour on the Syrian coast, though small. It lies at the end of the great road from Damascus to the sea. Population now about 10, 000.—The distance from Ptolemäïs to Cæsarea is forty-four miles. For Cmsarea, see on ch. x. 1.

8. Philip the evangelist] It is possible that he may have had this appellation from his having been the first to travel about preaching the gospel: see ch. viii. 5 ff. The office of Evangelist, see Eph. iv. 11, 2 Tim. iv. 5, seems to have answered very much to our missionary: Theodoret, on the former of these texts, says, “These went about preaching;” and Eusebius,—“They fulfilled the work of Evangelists, making it their business to preach Christ to those who had never yet heard the word of the faith, and to deliver to them the record of the Holy Gospels.” The latter could hardly have been part of their employment so early as this; nor had the word Gospel in these times the peculiar meaning of a narrative of the life of Christ, but rather embraced the whole good tidings of salvation by Him, as preached to the Jews and Heathens.—Eusebius apparently mistook this Philip for the Apostle: as did also Clement of Alexandria and Papias.

which was one of the seven] See ch. vi. 5, and note. The sentence in the original implies, that the reason why they abode with him was, that he was one of the seven: and in English the words ought not to be “which was,” but being (one) of the seven. The fact of Philip being settled at Cæsarea, and known as the Evangelist, seems decisive against regarding the occurrence of ch. vi. 8 ff. as the establishment of any permanent order in the church.

9.] This notice is inserted apparently without any immediate reference to the history, but to bring so remarkable a circumstance to the knowledge of the readers. The four daughters had the gift of “prophecy”: see on ch. xi. 27. Eusebius (see, however, his mistake above) gives from Polycrates traditional accounts of them,—that two were buried at Hierapolis, and one at Ephesus. From that passage, and one cited from Clement of Alexandria it would appear that two were afterwards married, according to tradition.—To find an argument for the so-called ‘honour of virginity’ in this verse, only shews to what resources those will stoop, who have failed to apprehend the whole spirit and rule of the gospel in the matter. They are met however on their own ground by an argument built on another misapprehension (that of Philip being a deacon in the ecclesiastical sense): for if so, this would prove that it was lawful for deacons to marry.

10.] This Agabus in all probability is identical with the Agabus of ch. xi. 28. That there is no reference to that former mention of him, might be occasioned by different sources of information having furnished the two narratives.

11.] Similar symbolical actions accompanying prophecy are found 1 Kings xxii. 11; Isa. xx. 2; Jer. xiii. 1 ff; Ezek. iv. 1 ff; 9 ff; v. 1, &c. De Wette remarks that “Thus saith the Holy Ghost” is the New Test. prophetic formula, instead of “Thus saith the Lord” of the Old Test.

14. The will of the Lord be done] One of the passages from which we may not unfairly infer, that the Lord’s prayer was used by the Christians of the Apostolic age. See note on 2 Tim. iv. 18.

15.] The word ‘carriages’ in the A.V. is used, as in Judg. xviii. 21, for baggage, things carried.

16.] The word rendered old signifies from the beginning, and probably implies that he had been a disciple all through, and had accompanied our Lord during His ministry. See ch. xi. 15, where the term is applied to the time of the Pentecostal effusion of the Spirit.

17—XXIII. 35.] PAUL AT JERUSALEM: MADE PRISONER AND SENT TO CÆSAREA

17. the brethren] The Christians generally: not the Apostles and elders; James and the elders are not mentioned till ver. 18.

18. James] ‘the brother of the Lord:’ the president of the church at Jerusalem: see ch. xii. 17; xv. 13; Gal. ii. 12, and notes,—and Introduction to the Epistle of James,§i. 24–37

20.] While they praised God for, and fully recognized, the work wrought by him among the Gentiles, they found it requisite to advise him respecting the suspicion under which he laboured among the believing Jews. They, led, naturally perhaps, but incorrectly (see 1 Cor. vii. 18), by some passages of Paul’s life [and of his already-written Epistles?], in which he had depreciated legal observances in comparison with faith in Christ, and spoken strongly against their adoption by Gentile converts,—apprehended that he advised, on the part of the Hellenistic believers, an entire apostasy from Moses and the ordinances of the law.

Thou seest...] This can hardly be a reference to the elders present, as representatives of the “myriads” of believing Jews: for only those of Jerusalem were there:—but refers to Paul’s own experience, and knowledge of the vast numbers of the Jews who believed at Jerusalem, and elsewhere in Judæa.

how many thousands (literally, ten thou-sands, myriads) is perhaps not to be strictly taken. Origen says, that probably the whole number of believing Jews at no time had amounted to 144, 000.

21.] they were informed (at some time in the mind of the speaker. The indefinite past tense must be preserved. Below, ver. 24, it is the perfect). The informants were the anti-Pauline Judaizers.

22.] Not as A.V., ‘the multitude must needs come together, i.e. there must be a meeting of the whole church: but a multitude (of these Judaizers) will certainly come together: ‘they will meet and discuss your proceeding in a hostile manner.’

23. a vow] A vow of Nazarites. This vow must not be confounded, historically or analogically, with that of ch. xviii. 18: see note there, and Num. vi. 2–21.

24. them take] to thyself, as comrades.

purify thyself with them] i.e. become a Nazarite with them. The same expression occurs in the LXX, Num. vi. 3, in describing the Nazarite’s duties.

be at charges for them] It was a custom of the Jews, and was considered a proof of great piety, that the richer Nazarites should pay the expenses of the sacrifices of the poorer. See Num. vi. 14 ff. Josephus, relating Agrippa’s thank-offerings at Jerusalem, says that he ordered very many Nazarites to be shaven.—On the shaving the head, see Num. vi. 18.—De Wette remarks: ‘James and the elders made this proposal, assuming that Paul could comply with it with a safe conscience, perhaps also as a proof, to assure themselves and others of his sentiments: and Paul accepted it with a safe conscience. But this he could only have done on one condition, that he was sure by it not to contribute in these four Nazarites to the error of justification by the works of the law. He might keep, and encourage the keeping of, the law,—but not with the purpose of thereby deserving the approbation of God.’

25.] See ch. xv. 28, 29.

26.] Paul himself entered into the vow with them, and the time settled (perhaps the least that could be assigned: the Mischna requires thirty days) for the completion of the vow, i.e. the offering and shaving of their heads, was seven days. No definite time is prescribed in Num. vi., but there, seven days is the time of purification in case of uncleanness during the period of the vow.

to signify] i.e. to make known to the ministers of the temple.

the ac-complishment, i.e. that he and the men had come to accomplish: announcing their intention of accomplishing.

the offering] See Num. vi. 13–17.

27. seven days] Of the votive period: not (as some think) since Paul's arrival in Jerusalem. Five days of the seven had passed: see on ch. xxiv. 11.

which were from Asia] From Ephesus and the neighbourhood, where Paul had so long taught. "Paul, while intent on appeasing the believing Jews, incurs the furious hostility of his unbelieving enemies." Calvin, who adds, 'In how many ways had those who were at Jerusalem this Pentecost, already persecuted Paul in Asia?'—Notice the similarity of the charge against him to that against Stephen, ch. vi. 13.

28. Greeks into the Temple] The generic plural: only one is intended; see next verse. They meant, into the inner court, which was forbidden to Gentiles.

29. Trophimus] See ch. xx. 4, note. We here learn that he was an Ephesian.

30.] The Levites shut the doors to prevent profanation by a riot, and possibly bloodshed, in the temple: hardly, as Bengel, lest Paul should use the temple as an asylum:—the right of asylum was only (Exod. xxi. 13, 14) for murder unawares. But by ver. 14 there, and by Joab's fleeing to the altar, 1 Kings ii. 28 ff., we see that it was resorted to on other occasions.

31. seeking to kill him] By beating him: see ver. 32.

tidings came] literally, went (were carried) up; up, either because of his high station, as commanding officer, or because he was locally stationed in the tower Antonia, overlooking (from the N.W.) the temple, where the riot was.

the chief captain of the band] Claudius Lysias (ch. xxiii. 26), the tribune of the cohort (whose proper complement was 1000 men).

33. with two chains] See ch. xii. 6. He would thus be in the custody of two soldiers.

The literally accurate rendering of the chief captain's demand would be, who he might be (subjective possibility): and what he had done (assuming that he must have done something).

34. the castle] The camp or barracks attached to the tower Antonia;—or perhaps 'into the tower' itself: but the other is the more usual meaning of the word. For a full history and description of the fortress of Antonia, see Robinson i. pp. 431, 435; Williams, Holy City, i. 99; ii. 403–411; Howson ii. 311.

35. upon the stairs] The steps leading up into the tower. The description of the tower or fort Antonia in Josephus, sets the scene vividly before us:—"It was, upon the whole, the resemblance of a tower, and encompassed with four other towers at equal distances one from another, and one from every corner: three of them fifty cubits in height, and the fourth, that looked to the S. and E., of seventy cubits: and from thence they had the view of the whole temple. From the place where the galleries joined, there were upon the right and left two pair of stairs, which served for a passage to the soldiers into the temple: for when the Romans were masters of Jerusalem, there were guards posted still upon that quarter to prevent seditions upon their public festivals and meetings. For as the temple commanded the city, so Antonia the temple." (L' Estrange.)

38. that Egyptian] The inference of the tribune was not, as in Bengel, "He speaks Greek, therefore he is an Egyptian," but the very contrary to this. His being able to speak Greek is a proof to Lysias that he is not that Egyptian.—This Egyptian is mentioned by Josephus, who says that he persuaded the people to follow him to the Mount of Olives, whence he would by a word throw down the walls of Jerusalem. This Felix heard of, and sent soldiers to stop his folly, who slew four hundred of his followers, and took two hundred alive. He himself, however, escaped. In another place, he says of the same person, that he collected about 30, 000 deluded persons, and brought them out of the wilderness to the Mount of Olives, and that a battle took place, in which most of his followers were killed or taken prisoners. It is obvious that the numerical accounts in Josephus are inconsistent with our text, and with one another. This latter being the case, we may well leave them out of the question. At different times of his rebellion, his number of followers would be variously estimated; and the tribune would naturally take it as he himself or his informant had known it, at some one period. That this is so, we may see, by noticing that our narrative speaks of his leading out,—whereas Josephus's numbers are those whom he brought back from the wilderness against Jerusalem, by which time his band would have augmented considerably.

murderers] "Sicarii," so called from sica, a dagger. They are thus described by Josephus: "Another kind of brigands abounded in Jerusalem, those named Sicarii, who slew men in open day in the midst of the city: mixing with the crowds principally in the feasts, and having short swords hidden under their garments, with which they stabbed people."

39. indeed] implying ‘not the Egyptian, but.’

of no mean city] There was distinction in his being a citizen of a free city. “Many of the coins of Tarsus bear the epigraphs ‘metropolis’ and ‘free.’” Dr. Wordsworth.

40. in the Hebrew tongue] The Syro-Chaldaic, the mother-tongue of the Jews in Judæa at this time: his motive is implied (ch. xxii. 2) to be, that they might be the more disposed to listen to him.

Acts: Chapter 22

CHAP. XXII. 1.] This speech of Paul repeats the narrative of his conversion to Christianity, but this time most skilfully arranged and adapted (within legitimate limits) to avoid offence and conciliate his hearers. Proofs of this will appear as we go on.

3.] On Gamaliel see note, ch. v. 34.—The expression “at the feet of Gamaliel” (see ch. iv. 35, note) indicates that the rabbi sat on an elevated seat and the scholars on the ground or on benches, literally at his feet.

according to the perfect manner (the art. omitted aft. a prep.), the strict acceptance, of the law of the fathers; so in ch. xxvi. 5, i.e. “the straitest sect of our religion;”—i. e. as a Pharisee.

as ye all are this day] Not meaning ‘in the same way as YE all are this day’ (but now in another way): but as ye all are this day: ‘I had the same zealous character (not excluding his still retaining it) which you all shew to-day.’ A conciliatory comparison.

5. the high priest] ‘of that day, who is still living:’ i.e. Theophilus, see on ch. ix. 1. Similarly, the whole Sanhedrim are ‘those who were then members, and now survive.’ unto the (Jewish: or, their) brethren] The rendering, ‘against the (Christian) brethren,’ is altogether inadmissible. If ever Paul spoke to the Jews as a Jew, it was on this occasion.

6.] On Paul’s conversion, and the comparison of the accounts in chapp. ix., xxii., and xxvi., see notes on ch. ix. I have there treated of the discrepancies, real or apparent.

11.] See notes, ch. ix. 8, 18.

12.] That Ananias was a Christian is not here mentioned,—and “having a good report of all the Jews which dwelt there” is added: both, as addressed to a Jewish audience. Before the Roman governor in ch. xxvi., he does not mention him at all, but compresses the whole substance of the command given to Ananias into the words spoken by the Lord to himself. A heathen moralist (Horace) could teach, “Of whom, and what, thou speakest, and to whom, Take frequent heed:” and a Christian Apostle was not unmindful of the necessary caution. Such features in his speeches are highly instructive and valuable to those who would gather from Scripture itself its own real character: and be, not slaves to its letter, but disciples of its spirit.

14—16 is not related, but included, in ch. ix. 18, 19.

14. The God of our fathers] So Peter, ch. iii. 13; v. 30. In ch. ix. 17, “the Lord” is the word: this title is given for the Jews.

that Just One] So Stephen, ch. vii. 52. How forcibly must the whole scene have recalled him, whom presently (ver. 20) he mentions by name.

16. wash away thy sins] This was the Jewish as well as the Christian doctrine of baptism.—See 1 Cor. vi. 11, and note.

calling on his name] i.e. the name of Jesus, “that Just One.” Paul carefully avoids mentioning to the Jews this Name, except where it is unavoidable, as in ver. 8: so again he says, I saw him, ver. 18.

17.] viz. as related ch. ix. 26–31, where nothing of this vision, or its having been the cause of his leaving Jerusalem, is hinted.

19.] The probable account of this answer is, that Paul thought his former great zeal against Christ, contrasted with his present zeal for Him, would make a deep impression on the Jews in Jerusalem: or, perhaps, he wishes by his earnest preaching of Jesus as the Christ among them, to undo the mischief of which he before was the agent, and therefore alleges his former zeal and his consenting to Stephen’s death as reasons why he should remain in Jerusalem.

20. thy martyr] So A.V., following Beza: the Vulgate, and Erasmus, ‘thy witness,’ which is the primary meaning of the word martyr in Greek. “The Apostle may have here used the word (speaking in Hebrew) in its strict primary sense; for a view of Christ in His glory was vouchsafed to Stephen, and it was by bearing witness of that manifestation that he hastened his death (ch. vii. 55 ff). The present meaning of the word martyr did, however, become attached to it at a very early period, and is apparently of apostolic authority: e.g. Rev. xvii. 6, and Clement of Rome, 1 Cor. v. (cited in note on ch. i. 25).... The transition from the first to the secondary sense may be easily accounted for. Many who had only seen with the eye of faith, suffered persecution and death as a proof of their sincerity. For such constancy the Greek had no adequate term. It was necessary for the Christians to provide one. None was more appropriate than ‘witness’ (martyr), seeing what had been the fate of those whom Christ had appointed to be His witnesses (ch. i. 8). They almost all suffered: hence to witness became a synonym for to suffer: while the suffering was in itself a kind of testimony.” (Mr. Humphry.) Dr. Wordsworth well designates this introduction of the name of Stephen “a noble endeavour to make public reparation for a public sin, by public confession in the same place where the sin was committed.”

21.] The object of Paul in relating this vision appears to have been to shew that his own inclination and prayer had been, that he might preach the Gospel to his own people: but that it was by the imperative command of the Lord Himself that he went to the Gentiles.

22. unto this saying] viz. the announcement that he was to be sent to the Gentiles. “The nations of the earth have no living existence,” was the maxim of the children of Abraham, as set down in their Rabbinical books.

it was not fit] implying, he ought to have been put to death long ago (when we endeavoured to do it, but he escaped).

23.] They were not ‘casting off their garments,’ as preparing to stone him, or even as representing the action of such preparation: the former would be futile, as he was in the custody of the tribune,—the latter absurd, and not borne out by any known habit of the Jews: but shaking their garments, as shaking off the dust, abominating such an expression and him who uttered it. The casting dust into the air was part of the same gesture. Chrysostom explains it in this way.

24.] The tribune, not understanding the language in which Paul spoke, wished to extract from him by the scourge the reason which so exasperated the Jews against him. In this he was acting illegally: for Augustus had expressly provided that legal examinations were not to begin with torture.

25.] Literally, while they were binding him down with the thongs. The position of the prisoner was, bent forward, and tied with a sort of gear made of leather to an inclined post.

the centurion] This was the ordinary officer—standing by to superintend the punishment.

On St. Paul’s question to him, see ch. xvi. 37, note.

28.] Dio Cassius mentions that, in the reign of Claudius, Messalina used to sell the freedom of the city, and at very various prices at different times.

I was free born] literally, But I (besides having the privilege like thee of being a Roman citizen) was also born one. How was Paul a Roman citizen by birth? Certainly not because he was of Tarsus: for (1) that city had no such privilege, but was only a free city, not a colony nor a municipal town: and (2) if this had been so, the mention of his being a man of Tarsus (ch. xxi. 39) would have of itself prevented his being scourged. It remains, therefore, that his father, or some ancestor, must have obtained the freedom of the city, either as a reward for service or by purchase. It has been suggested that the father of Saul may have been sold into slavery at Rome, when Cassius laid a heavy fine on the city of Tarsus for having espoused the cause of Octavius and Antony, and very many of the Tarsians were sold to pay it. He may have acquired his freedom and the citizenship afterwards. See Mr. Lewin, i.p. 4. But this is mere conjecture.

29. was afraid] There is no inconsistency (as De Wette thinks) in the tribune’s being afraid because he had bound him, and then letting him remain thus bound. Meyer rightly explains it, that the tribune, having committed this error, is afraid of the possible consequences of it (for as Cicero says, it was an offence to bind a Roman citizen, and a crime to scourge him), and shews this by taking the first opportunity of either undoing it, or justifying his further detention, by loosing him, and bringing him before the Sanhedrim. His fear was on account of his first false step; but it was now too late to reverse it: and the same reason which leads him to continue it now, operates afterwards when the hearing was delayed. ‘The centurion believed Paul’s word, because a false claim of this nature, being easily exposed, and punishable with death, was almost an unprecedented thing.’ Hackett.

30.] It seems remarkable that the tribune in command should have had the power to summon the Sanhedrim: and I have not brought Paul down] From Antonia to the council-room. According to tradition the Sanhedrim ceased to hold their sessions in the temple, about twenty-six years before this period. Had they done so now, Lysias and his soldiers could not have been present, as no heathen was permitted to pass the sacred limits. Their present council-room was in the upper city, near the foot of the bridge leading across the ravine from the western cloister of the temple.

XXIII. 1.] earnestly beholding seems to describe that peculiar look, connected probably with infirmity of sight, with which Paul is described before as regarding those before him: and may perhaps account for his not knowing that the person who spoke to him was the high priest, ver. 5. See ch. xiii. 9, note.—The purport of Paul's assertion seems to be this: being charged with neglecting, and teaching others to neglect the law of Moses, he at once endeavours to disarm those who thus accused him, by asserting that up to that, he had lived a true and loyal Jew,—obeying, according to his conscience, the law of that divine polity of which he was a covenant member. Thus I have lived before God (literally, have been a citizen before God) will have its full and proper meaning: and the words are no vain-glorious ones, but an important assertion of his innocence.

2. Ananias] He was at this time the actual high priest (ver. 4). He was the son of Nebedæus—succeeded Joseph son of Camydis—and preceded Ismael, son of Phabi. He was nominated to the office by Herod, king of Chaleis, in A.D. 48; and sent to Rome by Quadratus, the prefect of Syria, to give an account to the emperor Claudius; he appears, however, not to have lost his office, but to have resumed it on his return. This has been regarded as not certain,—and the uncertainty has produced much confusion in the Pauline chronology. But as Wieseler has shewn, there can be no reasonable doubt that it was so, especially as Ananias came off victorious in the cause for which he went to Rome, viz. a quarrel with the Jewish procurator Cumanus,—who went with him, and was condemned to banishment. He was deposed from his office not long before the departure of Felix, but still had great power, which he used violently and lawlessly: he was assassinated by the sicarii (see ch. xxi. 38, note) at last.

3.] It is perfectly allowable (even if the fervid rebuke of Paul be considered exempt from blame) to contrast with his conduct and reply that of Him Who, when similarly smitten, answered with perfect and superhuman meekness, 22, 23. Our blessed Saviour is to us, in all His words and acts, the perfect pattern for all under all circumstances: by aiming at whatever He did in each case, we shall do best: but even the greatest of his Apostles are so far our patterns only as they followed Him, which certainly in this case Paul did not. That Paul thus answered, might go far to excuse a like fervent reply in a Christian or a minister of the gospel,—but must never be used to justify it: it may serve for an apology, but never for an example.

God shall (is about to, literally) smite thee] Some have seen a prophetic import in these words;—see above on the death of Ananias. But I would rather take them as an expression founded on a conviction that God's just retribution would come on unjust and brutal acts.

thou whited wall] Lightfoot's interpretation, that St. Paul used this term because Ananias had only the semblance of the high priesthood and had lost the thing itself, is founded on the hypothesis (for it is none other) that the high priesthood was vacant at this time, and Ananias had thrust himself into it. The meaning is as in Matt. xxiii. 27; and in all probability Paul referred in thought to our Lord's saying.

sittest thou to judge me] This must not be taken as favouring the common interpretation of ver. 5 (see below): for the whole Sanhedrim were the judges, and sitting to judge him according to the law.

4.] Hence we see, that not only by the Jews, but by the tribune, who was present, Ananias was regarded as the veritable high priest.

5.] (1) The ordinary interpretation of these words since Lightfoot, is, that Ananias had usurped the office during a vacancy, and therefore was not recognized by Paul. They regard his being sent to Rome as a virtual setting aside from being high priest, and suppose that Jonathan, who was murdered by order of Felix, was appointed high priest in his absence. But (a) there is no ground whatever for believing that his office vacated. He won the cause for which he went to Rome, and returned to Jerusalem: it was only when a high priest was detained as hostage in Rome, that we read of another being appointed in his room: and (b) which is fatal to the hypothesis, Jonathan himself the high priest was sent to Rome with Ananias. Jonathan was called by the title merely as having been previously high priest. He succeeded Caiaphas, and he was not high priest again afterwards, having expressly declined to resume the office. Nor can any other Jonathan have been elevated to it,—for Josephus gives, in every case, the elevation of a new high priest, and his whole number of twenty-eight from Herod the Great to the destruction of Jerusalem agrees with the notices thus given. So that this interpretation is untenable. (2) Chrysostom and most of the ancient commentators supposed that Paul, having been long absent, was really unacquainted with the person of the high priest. But this can hardly have been; and even if it were, the position and official seat would have pointed out, to one who had been himself a member of the Sanhedrim, the president of the council. (3) Calvin and others take the words ironically: 'I could not be supposed to know that one who conducted himself so cruelly and illegally, could be the high priest' This surely needs no refutation, as being altogether out of place and character. (4) Bengel and others understand the words as an acknowledgment of rash and insubordinate language, and render, 'I did not give it a thought,' 'I forgot.' and so Dr. Wordsworth. But this is never the meaning of the word here used in the original; and were any pregnant or unusual sense intended, the context (as at 1 Thess. v. 12) would suggest it. (5) On the whole then, I believe that the only rendering open to us, consistently with the simple meaning of the words, and the facts of history is, I did not know that it (or he) was the high priest: and that it is probable that the solution of his ignorance lies in the fact of his imperfect sight—he heard the insolent order given, but knew not from whom it proceeded. I own that I am not entirely satisfied with this, as being founded perhaps on too slight premises: but as far as I can see there is no positive objection to it, which there is to every other. The objection stated by Dr. Wordsworth, “If St. Paul could not discern that Ananias was high priest, how could he see that he sat there as his judge?” would of course be easily answered by supposing that Paul, who had himself been a member of the Sanhedrim, may have known Ananias by his voice: or indeed may not (as above) have known him at all personally. It is hardly worth while to notice the rendering given by some, ‘I knew not that there was a high priest.’ Had any such meaning been intended, it would have been further specified by the construction. Besides which, it renders Paul’s apology irrelevant, by eliminating from it the person who is necessarily its subject.

for it is written] Implying in this, ‘and the law is the rule of my life.’ Even in this we see the consummate skill of St. Paul.

6.] Surely no defence of Paul for adopting this course is required, but all admiration is due to his skill and presence of mind. Nor need we hesitate to regard such skill as the fulfilment of the promise, that in such an hour, the Spirit of wisdom should suggest words to the accused, which the accuser should not be able to gainsay. All prospect of a fair trial was hopeless: he well knew from fact, and present experience, that personal odium would bias his judges, and violence prevail over justice: he therefore uses, in the cause of Truth, the maxim so often perverted to the cause of falsehood, “divide, and govern.” In one tenet above all others, did the religion of Jesus Christ and the belief of the Pharisees coincide: that of the resurrection of the dead. That they looked for this resurrection by right of being the seed of Abraham, and denied it to all others,—whereas he looked for it through Jesus whom they hated, in whom all should be made alive who had died in Adam,—this was nothing to the present point: the belief was common—in the truest sense it was the hope of Israel—in the truest sense does Paul use and bring it forward to confound the adversaries of Christ. At the same time by this strong assertion of his Pharisaic standing and extraction, he was further still vindicating himself from the charge against him. So also ch. xxvi. 7.

the son of Pharisees] i.e. ‘a Pharisee of Pharisees,’— ‘by descent from father, grandfather, and upwards, a pure Pharisee.’ This meaning not having been apprehended, the plural was by the copyists altered into the singular.

8.] See note, Matt. iii. 7, for both Pharisees and Sadducees: Josephus says that the latter denied the future existence of the soul, and rewards and punishments hereafter.

9. but what if a spirit or an angel have spoken to him?] Perhaps in this they referred to the history of his conversion, as told to the people, ch. xxii.

10. should have been pulled in pieces] to be taken literally, not as merely meaning, ‘should be killed.’ The Pharisees would strive to lay hold of him to rescue him: the Sadducees, to destroy him, or at all events, to secure him. Between them both, there was danger of his being pulled asunder by them.

11.] By these few words, the Lord assured him (1) of a safe issue from his present troubles; (2) of an accomplishment of his intention of visiting Rome; (3) of the certainty that however he might be sent thither, he should preach the gospel and bear testimony there. So that they upheld and comforted him (1) in the uncertainty of his life from the Jews; (2) in the uncertainty of his liberation from prison at Cesarea; (3) in the uncertainty of his surviving the storm in the Mediterranean; (4) in the uncertainty of his fate on arriving at Rome. So may one crumb of divine grace and help be multiplied to feed five thousand wants and anxieties.

12.] Wetstein and Lightfoot adduce instances of similar conspiracies,—not to eat or drink till some object be gained. See 1 Sam. xiv. 24 ff.

14.] It is understood from the narrative that it was to the Sadducees, among the chief priests and elders, that the murderers went. That the high priest belonged to this sect, cannot be inferred with any accuracy. 15. determine with greater accuracy] or perhaps, neglecting the comparative sense, to determine accurately (not as A.V. ‘enquire something more perfectly’).

16.] It is quite uncertain whether Paul’s sister’s son lived in Jerusalem, or had accompanied him thither. The us of ch. xx. 5, will include more than merely Luke. But from his knowledge of the plot, which presupposes other acquaintances than he would have been likely to make if he had come with St. Paul, I should suppose him to have been domiciled at Jerusalem, possibly under instruction, as was formerly Paul himself, and thus likely, in the schools, to have heard the scheme spoken of.

21.] They waited for, not “a promise,” as A.V., but the promise (to that effect).

23. two centurions] literally, some two centurions. The soldiers here spoken of were the ordinary heavy-armed legionary soldiers: distinguished below from the horsemen and spearmen.

spearmen] The word thus rendered has never been satisfactorily explained: but spearmen seems to represent it more nearly than any other term. See in my Greek Test.

24. bring him safe] The full meaning of the word is, escort him safe the whole way.

Felix] FELIX was a freedman of the Emperor Claudius: Suidas and Zonaras gave him the prænomen of Claudius, but Tacitus calls him Antonius Felix, perhaps from Antonia, the mother of Claudius, as he was brother of Pallas, who was a freedman of Antonia. He was made sole procurator of Judæa after the deposition of Cumanus (having before been three years joint procurator with him) principally by the influence of the high priest Jonathan, whom he afterwards procured to be murdered. Of his character Tacitus says, “Antonius Felix wielded kingly power with the disposition of a slave, disgracing it by every kind of cruelty and lust.” His procuratorship was one series of disturbances, false messiahs, assassins, and robbers, and civil contests. He was eventually (A. D. 60) recalled, and accused by the Cæsarean Jews, but acquitted at the instance of his brother Pallas. On his wife Drusilla, see note ch. xxiv. 24, 26.

most excellent] See Luke i. 3.—This letter seems to be given (translated from the Latin) as written, not merely according to its general import (see the false statement in ver. 27): from what source, is impossible to say, but it may be imagined that the contents transpired through some officers at Jerusalem or at Cæsarea friendly to Paul.

27. with the troop] See above ver. 10, and note, ch. xxi. 32.

rescued him, having understood that he was a Roman] The fact was not as he here states it. This was an attempt to conceal the fault that he had committed, see ch. xxii. 29. For this assertion cannot refer to the second rescue: see next verse.

31.] ANTIPATRIS, forty-two Roman miles from Jerusalem, and twenty-six from Cæsarea, was built by Herod the Great, and called in honour of his father. It was before called Kapharsaba. In Jerome’s time it was a half-ruined town. They might have well made so much way during the night and the next day,—for the text will admit of that interpretation,—the morrow being not necessarily the morrow after they left Jerusalem, but after they arrived at Antipatris.

32. the horsemen] As they had now the lesser half of their journey before them, and that furthest removed from Jerusalem. The spearmen appear to have gone back with the soldiers.

35. in Herod’s palace] The procurator resided in the former palace of Herod the Great. Here Paul was committed to the custody of a soldier, not in a prison, but in the buildings attached to the palace.

Acts: Chapter 24

CHAP. XXIV. 1–XXVI. 32.] PAUL’S IMPRISONMENT AT CÆSAREA.

1. after five days] or, on the fifth day—from Paul’s departure for Cæsarea. This would be the natural point from which to date the proceedings of the High Priest, &c., who were left in Jerusalem. That it is so, appears from ver. 11. See note there. a certain orator] This was an “orator forensis,” or pleader, persons who abounded in Rome and the provinces.

Tertullus] The name is a diminutive from Tertius, as Lucullus from Lucius,—Catullus from Catius. We are told that many Roman youths, who were studying for the bar, were in the habit of accompanying the magistrates into the provinces, to practise themselves in pleading the causes of the provincials, and thus be preparing for more important actions in the metropolis.

informed] laid information; and, as it seems, not by writing, but by word of mouth, since they appeared in person, and Paul was called to confront them.

2.] Grotius tells us that it is among the precepts of the rhetoricians, to win the favour of a judge by praising him. Certainly Tertullus fulfils and overacts the precept, for his exordium is full of the basest flattery. Contrast with his “great quietness” and by thy providence] This was with the Latins, as with us, more properly an attribute of divinity than of men; but with other divine characteristics, had come to be attributed to the Emperors. “The providence of Cæsar” is a common phrase on their coins.

“worthy deeds,” the description of Tacitus, where he says that Felix, and Ventidius Cumanus, who ruled in Galilee, emulated one another in crimes and enormities. They carried out their mutual enmity by employing bands of robbers to slay and plunder, who sometimes met in open battle, and brought back their spoils to the procurator. Contrast also Josephus’s account of the inhabitants of Cæsarea sending a deputation to Rome to complain of the oppressions and enormities of Felix. There was just enough foundation for the flattery, to make the falsehood of its general application to Felix more glaring. He had put down some rebels (see ch. xxi. 38, note) and assassins, but, as Wetstein remarks, was himself worse than them all.

3.] We receive it, i.e. not only here in thy presence, but also at all times and in all places. A refinement of flattery.

5. the world would here mean the Roman empire.

Nazarenes] This is the only place in the New Testament where the Christians are so called. The Jews could not call them by any name answering to Christians, as the hope of a Messiah or Christ was professed by themselves.

6.] Considerable difficulty rests on the omission of the words here put in brackets. Their absence from the principal MSS., their many variations in those which contain them, are strongly against their genuineness; as also is the consideration that no probable reason for their omission can be suggested. On the other hand, as De Wette observes, it is hardly imaginable that so little should have been assigned to the speaker, as would be if these words were omitted. Besides this, the words whom we took seem to require some sequel, some reason, after his seizure, why he was there present and freed from Jewish durance. The phenomena are common enough in the Acts, of unaccountable insertions; but in this place it is the omission which is unaccountable, for no similarity of ending, no doctrinal consideration can have led to it.

8.] by examining of whom, if the disputed words be inserted, refers naturally enough to Lysias; but if they be omitted, to Paul, which would be very unlikely,—that the judge should be referred to the prisoner (for examination by torture on one who had already claimed his rights as a Roman citizen, can hardly be intended) for the particulars laid to his charge. Certainly it might, on the other hand, be said that Tertullus would hardly refer the governor to Lysias, whose interference he had just characterized in such terms of blame; but (which is a strong argument for the genuineness of the doubtful words) remarkably enough, we find Felix, ver. 22, putting off the trial till the arrival of Lysias. The English reader should be cautioned against one mistake which the form of the words in the A.V. rather encourages: the referring whom to the accusers. This cannot be, as the relative “whom” is, in the original, in the singular.

9. assented] joined in setting upon him, bore out Tertullus in his charges.

10. of many years] Felix was now in the seventh year of his procuratorship, which began in the twelfth year of Claudius, D.D. 52.—‘The contrast between Tertullus’s and Paul’s winning favour with the judge is remarkable. The former I have characterized above. But the Apostle, using no flattery, yet alleges the one point which could really win attention to him from Felix, viz. his confidence arising from speaking before one well skilled by experience in the manners and customs of the Jews.

II. twelve days] The point of this seems to be, that Felix having been so long time a judge among the Jews, must be well able to search into and adjudicate on an offence whose whole course was comprised within so short a period.—The twelve days may be thus made out: 1. his arrival in Jerusalem, ch. xxi. 15–17; 2. his interview with James, ib. 18 ff; 3. his taking on him the vow, ib. 26; 3–7. the time of the vow, interrupted by—7. his apprehension, ch. xxi. 27; 8. his appearance before the Sanhedrim, ch. xxii. 30 ff; 9. his departure from Jerusalem (at night); and so to the 13th, the day now current, which was the 5th inclusive from his leaving Jerusalem. This is far more natural than to suppose that the days which he had already spent at Cæsarea are not to be counted, because his raising disturbances while in custody was out of the question.

12. in the city] literally, throughout the city, ‘any where in the city;’ as we say, ‘up and down the streets.’

14.] The But here has its peculiar force, of taking off the attention from what has immediately preceded, and raising a new point as more worthy of notice. But, (‘if thou wouldst truly know the reason why they accuse me’), this is the whole grievance.

heresy, in allusion to the same word used by Tertullus, ver. 5. The word is capable of an indifferent or of a bad sense. Tertullus had used it in the latter. Paul explains what it really was.

the god of my fathers] literally, my paternal God (see below). Notice in the words the skill of Paul. The term was one well known to the Greeks and Romans, and which would carry with it its own justification. The abandonment of a man’s national worship and attaching himself to strange gods and modes of worship was regarded unfavourably by the Romans: and the Jews had had their worship of their fathers' God with their ancient national rites, again and again secured to them by decrees of magistrates and of the senate. In his address to the Jews (ch. xxii. 14) the similar expression, "the God of our fathers," brings out more clearly those individual fathers, in whom Felix had no interest further than the identification of Paul's religion with that of his ancestors required.

15. they themselves] literally, these very men. It would appear from this, that the High Priest and the deputation were not of the Sadducees. But perhaps this inference is too hasty; Paul might regard them as representing the whole Jewish people, and speak generally, as he does of the same hope ch. xxvi. 7, where he assigns it to "our twelve tribes." The words "of the dead," inserted here in some MSS. to fill up the meaning, are not likely to have been spoken by the Apostle. The juxtaposition of those words, which excited mockery even when the Gospel was being directly preached, would hardly have been hazarded in this defence, where every expression is so carefully weighed.

16. herein] accordingly, i.e. 'having and cherishing this hope.'

I also, i.e. 'as well as they'

17.] But refers back to the former "but," ver. 14. 'But the matter of which they complain is this, that after an absence of many years,' &c.—See 1 Cor. xvi. 3, 4; 2 Cor. viii. ix. notes, ch. xx. 4.

18.] The construction in the original is peculiar, and can hardly be represented in a faithful English version, The nominative case to the verb found has to be supplied, somehow thus: amidst which they found me purified in the temple, none who detected me in the act of raising a tumult.... but certain Asiatic Jews.... This would leave it to be inferred that no legal officers had apprehended him, but certain private individuals, illegally; who besides had not come forward to substantiate any charge him.

19.] This also is a skilful argument on the part of the Apostle:—it being the custom of the Romans not to judge a prisoner without the accusers face to face, he deposes that his real accusers were the Asiatic Jews, who first raised the cry against him in the temple,—not the Sanhedrim, who merely received him at the hands of others,—and that these were not present.

20.] Otherwise: Or let these persons themselves say, what fault they found in me while I stood before the Sanhedrim, other than in the matter of this one saying.

22. having more perfect knowledge about the way] not, 'till he should obtain more accurate knowledge' (ungrammatical): nor, 'since he had now obtained' (viz. by Paul's speech, which the words will not bear). But this, the only right rendering, is variously understood. Chrysostom says: "He adjourned the case purposely, not because he wanted information, but because he wished to put off the Jews. He was not willing to acquit the prisoner, for fear of them." And nearly so Luther and others. But these interpretations, as De Wette observes, overlook the circumstance, that such a reason for adjournment would be as unfavourable to Paul as to the Jews. Meyer explains it, that he adjourned the case, 'because,' &c. But this would imply that he was favourably disposed to Paul. The simplest explanation is that given by De Wette: He put them off to another time, not as requiring any more information about 'the way,' for that matter he knew before,—but waiting for the arrival of Lysias.—Whether Lysias was expected, or summoned, or ever came to be heard, is very doubtful. The real motive of the deferring appears in ver. 26. The comparative "more perfect" implies, "more accurate than to need additional information."

he deferred them] them, viz. both parties: not, "these things." 28. liberty] Not literally and absolutely, for he was in military custody, but it was relaxed as much as was consistent with safe custody. Remission, or relaxation, would perhaps be a better rendering than 'liberty.'

24. when Felix came] Into the hall or chamber where Paul was to speak.

Drusilla] She was daughter of Herod Agrippa I. (see ch. xii.) and of Cypros,—and sister of Agrippa II. She was betrothed at six years old to Epiphanes son of Antiochus, king of Commagéné; but he declining the marriage, not wishing to be circumcised and become a Jew, she was married to the more obsequious Azizus, king of Emesa. Not long after, Felix, being enamoured of her beauty, persuaded her, by means of a certain Simon, a Cyprian magician (see note on ch. viii. 9), to leave her husband and live with him. She bore him a son, Agrippa: and both mother and son perished in an eruption of Vesuvius, in the reign of Titus.—The Drusilla mentioned by Tacitus, a granddaughter of Antony and Cleopatra, must have been another wife of Felix, who was thrice married, and each time to persons of royal birth; Suetonius calls him "the husband of three queens."

25.] It is remarkable that Tacitus uses of Felix the expression, "he thought himself licensed to commit all crimes with impunity." The fear of Felix appears to have operated merely in his sending away Paul: no impression for good was made on him.

26.] The Julian law enacted that no one should receive any consideration for throwing a man into prison, for putting him into bonds, or releasing him, or for a condemnation or an acquittal. Mr. Humphry observes, that Albinus, who succeeded Festus, so much encouraged this kind of bribery, that no malefactors remained in prison, except those who did not offer money for their liberation. St. Paul did not resort to this mode of shortening his tedious and unjust imprisonment, and Tertullian quotes his conduct in this respect against those who were disposed to purchase escape from persecution: a practice which prevailed and became great evil in the time of Cyprian.

27. two years] viz. of Paul's imprisonment.

Porcius Festus] Festus appears to have succeeded Felix in the summer or autumn of the year 60 A.D.: but the question is one of much chronological difficulty. He found the province wasted and harassed by bands of robbers and sicarii (assassins), and the people the prey of false prophets. He died, after being procurator a very short time,—from one to two years. Josephus contrasts him, as a putter down of robbers, favourably with his successor Albinus. It was a natural wish of Felix at this time to confer obligations on the Jews, who were sending to complain of him at Rome.

left Paul bound] There was no change in the method of custody, see note on ver. 23. He left him in the 'military custody' in which he was.

XXV. 1. the province] The term is properly used of a province, whether imperial or senatorial (see note on ch. xiii. 7),—but is here loosely applied to Judaea, which was only a procuratorship, attached to the province of Syria.

2. the high priest] The High Priest now was Ishmael the son of Phabi. See chronological table in the Introduction.

The term chief of the Jews is more general than "elders," though most of the chief men must have been members of the Sanhedrim. Festus, relating this application, ver. 15, calls them "elders."

3.] favour is explained to mean condemnation, ver. 15.

laying wait] They were making, contriving, tho' ambush already. The country was at this time, as may be seen abundantly in Josephus, full of sicarii (assassins): who were hired by the various parties to take off their adversaries.

5. are powerful] not, as in A.V., "those among you that are able" [to go down?]: but, are powerful among you: those who from their position and influence are best calculated to represent the public interests.

6.] The number of days is variously read. It is possible that a perverted notion of the necessity of an absolute precision in details in the inspired text, may have occasioned the erasure of one of the numbers.

8.] These were the three principal charges to which the "many and grievous complaints" of the Jews referred.

9.] The question is asked of Paulas a Roman citizen, having a right to be tried by Roman law: and more is contained in it, than at first meets the eye. It seems to propose only a change of place; but doubtless in it was contained by implication a sentence pronounced by the Sanhedrim. The words before me may mean no more than that the procurator would be present and sanction the trial: Grotius interprets it "wilt thou be judged by the Sanhedrim in my presence?" Otherwise, a journey to Jerusalem would be superfluous. Festus may very probably have anticipated the rejection, of this proposal by Paul, and have wished to make it appear that the obstacle in the way of Paul being tried by the Sanhedrim arose not from him, but from the prisoner himself.

10.] Paul's refusal has a positive and a negative ground—1. 'Cæsar's tribunal is my proper place of judgment: 2. To the Jews I have done no harm, and they have therefore no claim to judge me.'

I stand at Cæsar's judgment seat] Meyer quotes from Ulpian, "What is done by a procurator of Cæsar, is approved as if it were done by Cæsar himself."

as thou very well knowest] literally, knowest better than thou choosest to confess. We have an ellipsis of the same kind in our phrase 'to know better.' Or it may be in this case as in 2 Tim. i. 18, 'better, than that I need say more on it:' but I prefer the other interpretation.

11. no man may (literally, can) deliver me] Said of legal possibility: “it is not lawful for any man....” The dilemma here put by St. Paul is, “If I am guilty, it is not by them, but by Cæsar, that I must be (and am willing to be) tried, sentenced, and punished. If I am innocent, and Cæsar acquits me, then clearly none will be empowered to give me up to them: therefore, at all events, guilty or innocent, I am not to be made their victim.”

I appeal unto Cæsar] literally, I call upon, i.e. appeal to Cæsar. This power (of appeal to the people) having existed in very early times was ensured to Roman citizens by the Lex Valeria in the year of Rome 245, suspended by the Decemviri, but solemnly re-established after their deposition A.U. C. 305, when it was decreed that it should be unlawful to make any magistrate from whom there did not lie an appeal. When the emperors absorbed the power of the people and the tribunitial veto in themselves, the appeals to the people and to the tribunes were both made to the emperor. In Pliny’s celebrated Epistle to the Emperor Trajan respecting the Bithynian Christians, we read, “Others shared in the like madness, whom, as they were Roman citizens, I noted to be sent to the metropolis.” 12. the council] The convention, or assembly of citizens in the provinces, assembled to try causes on the court-days, see ch. xix. 38. A certain number of these were chosen as jurymen, for the particular causes, by the proconsul, and these were called his ‘councillors,’ or ‘assessors.’ So in Josephus, Cestius, on receiving an application from Jerusalem respecting the conduct of Florus, took counsel with his assessors, or council. He consulted them, to decide whether the appeal was to be conceded, or if conceded, to be at once acted on. The law provided that if the matter did not admit of delay, the appeal was not allowed.

The sense is stronger and better without a question after the first clause of Festus’s answer.—Thus were the two—the design of Paul (ch. xix. 21), and the promise of our Lord to him (ch. xxiii. 11)—brought to their fulfilment, by a combination of providential circumstances. We can hardly say that these must have influenced Paul in making his appeal: that step is naturally accounted for, and was rendered necessary by the difficulties which now beset him: but we may be sure that the prospect at length, after his long and tedious imprisonment, of seeing Rome, must at this time have cheered him, and caused him to hear the decision of Festus, “To Cæsar shalt thou go,” with no small emotion.

13.] HEROD AGRIPPA II., son of the Herod of ch. xii. (see note on ver. 1 there), was at Rome, and seventeen only, when his father died. Claudius was about to send him to succeed to the kingdom, but was dissuaded by his freedmen and favourites, and sent Cuspius Fadus as procurator instead. Soon after, Claudius gave him the principality of Chaleis, which had been held by his uncle Herod,—the presidency of the temple at Jerusalem and of its treasures,—and the appointment of the High Priest. Some years after the same emperor added to his jurisdiction the former tetrarchy of Philip, and Batanaea, Trachonitis, and Abiléné, with the title of King. Nero afterwards annexed Tiberias, Tarichéa, Julias, and fourteen neighbouring villages to his kingdom. He built a large palace at Jerusalem; but offended the Jews by constructing it so as to overlook the temple, and by his capricious changes in the high priesthood,—and was not much esteemed by them. When the last war broke out, he attached himself throughout to the Romans. He died in the third year of Trajan, and fifty-first of his reign, aged about seventy.

Bernicé] ‘The Macedonian form (Berenicé or Beronicé) for Pherenicé. She was the eldest daughter of Herod Agrippa I., and first married to her uncle Herod, prince of Chalcis. After his death she lived with Agrippa her brother, but not without suspicion; in consequence of which she married Polemo, king of Cilicia. The marriage was, however, soon dissolved, and she returned to her brother. She was afterwards the mistress of Vespasian, and of Titus.

to salute Festus] on his accession to the procuratorship, to gain his favour.

14. declared Paul’s cause] He did this, not only because Agrippa was a Jew, but because he was (see above) governor of the temple.

16. to give up] i.e. to his enemies, and for destruction. On the practice of the Romans, here nobly and truly alleged, several citations occur in Grotius and Wetstein.

18. Round about whom] See ver. 7: the A.V., ‘against whom,’ is wrong.

19.] The word rendered religion is used by Festus in a middle sense, certainly not as equivalent to ‘superstition,’ A.V., speaking as he was to Agrippa, a Jew.

20.] See the real reason why he proposed this, ver. 9. This he now conceals, and alleges his modesty in referring such matters to the judgment of the Jews themselves. This would be pleasing to his guest Agrippa.

21. Augustus (in the Greek, Sebastos)] This title was first conferred by the senate on Octavianus, and borne by all succeeding emperors. Dio Cassius says: “Augustus implies that he was something more than man: for all most revered and sacred things are called august. Whence also they called him Sebastos, after the Greek manner, as one to be adored, from sebazomai, to adore.”

22. I would hear the man myself] literally, I was wishing to... It is a modest way of expressing a wish, formed in this case while the procurator was speaking, but spoken of by Agrippa as if now passed by, and therefore not pressed. See Rom. ix. 3, and note there. Agrippa, as a Jew, is anxious to hear Paul's defence, as a matter of national interest. The procurator's curator's ready consent is explained, ver. 26.

23. with great pomp] Wetstein finely remarks on the words, "This was in the same city where the father of Agrippa and Bernice had been eaten of worms for his blasphemous pride."

the place of hearing] The original is a Greek word, formed after the Latin 'auditorium:' perhaps no fixed-hall of audience, but the chamber or saloon set apart for this occasion.

the chief captains] These were the tribunes of the cohorts stationed at Cæsarea. Stier remarks, "Yet more and more complete must the giving of the testimony in these parts be, before the witness departs for Rome. In Jerusalem, the long-suffering of the Lord towards the rejecters of the Gospel was now exhausted. In Antioch, the residence of the Præses (or governor) of Syria, the new mother church of Jewish and Gentile Christians was flourishing; here, in Cæsarea, the residence of the procurator, the testimony which had begun in the house of Cornelius the centurion, had now risen upward, till it comes before this brilliant assembly of all the local authorities, in the presence of the last king of the Jews."

24. all the multitude of the Jews] At Jerusalem (ver. 1) literally, by the popular voice (probably) of some tumultuous outcry: —here, by their deputation.

25. that he had committed nothing worthy of death, and seeing that he himself....] These reasons did really coexist as influencing Festus's determination.

26. no certain thing] i.e. nothing fixed, definite. The whole matter had been hitherto obscured by the exaggerations and fictions of the Jews.

unto my lord] viz. Nero. Augustus and Tiberius refused this title; Caligula and (apparently) all following bore it: but it was not a recognized title of any emperor before Domitian. Olshausen remarks, that now first was our Lord's prophecy, Matt. x. 18, Mark xiii. 9, fulfilled. But Meyer answers well, that we do not know enough of the history of the other Apostles to be able to say this with any certainty. James the greater, and Peter, had in all probability stood before Agrippa I. See ch. xii. 2, 3.

XXVI. 1.] The stretching out of the hand by a speaker was not, as Hammond supposes, the same as the "beckoning with the hand" of ch. xii. 17; xiii. 16. The latter was to ensure silence; but this, a formal attitude usual with orators. Apuleius describes it very precisely. The hand was stretched out with the two lower fingers shut, and the rest straightened. St. Paul's hand was chained—compare "these bonds," ver. 29.

5. the strictest sect] See ch. xxii. 3. Josephus calls the Pharisees "a sect of the Jews professing to be more devout than other men, and to observe the laws more strictly." The use of the term finds another example in Eph. v. 15, which is literally, "See ye walk strictly." The word rendered sect is the same as that rendered in ch. xxiv. 5, 14 "heresy," here used in an indifferent sense.

6.] The promise spoken of is not that of the resurrection merely, but that of a Messiah and His Kingdom, involving (ver. 8) the resurrection. This is evident from the way in which he brings in the mention of Jesus of Nazareth, and connects His exaltation (ver. 18) with the universal preaching of repentance and remission of sins. But he hints merely at this hope, and does not explain it fully: for Agrippa knew well what was intended, and the mention of any king but Cæsar would have misled and prejudiced the Roman procurator. There is great skill in binding on his former Pharisaic life of orthodoxy (in externals), to his now real and living defence of the hope of Israel. But though he thus far identifies them, he makes no concealment of the difference between them, ver. 9 ff.

7. our twelve tribes] The Jews in Judæa, and those of the dispersion also. See James i. 1. There was a difference between Paul and the Jews, which lies beneath the surface of this verse, but is yet not brought out: he had already arrived at the accomplishment of this hope, to which they, with all their sacrifices and zeal, were as yet only earnestly tending, having it yet in the future only (see Rom. x. 2). It was concerning this hope (in what sense appears not yet) that he was accused by the Jews.

8.] Having impressed on his hearers the injustice of this charge from the Jews, with reference to his holding that hope which they themselves held, he now leaves much to be filled up, not giving a confession of his own faith, but proceeding as if it were well understood. ‘You assume rightly, that I mean by this hope, in my own case, my believing it accomplished in the crucified and risen Jesus of Nazareth.’ Then, this being acknowledged, he goes on to show how his own view became so changed with regard to Jesus; drawing a contrast in some respects between himself, who was supernaturally brought to the faith, and them, who yet could not refuse to believe that God could and might raise the dead. All this he mainly addresses to Agrippa (ver. 26), as being the best acquainted with the circumstances, and, from his position, best qualified to judge of them. It may be, as Stier suggests, that if not open, yet practical Sadduceism had tainted the Herodian family. Paul knew, at all events, how generally the highly cultivated, and those in power and wealth, despised and thought incredible the doctrine of the resurrection.

It is not, as commonly rendered, ‘that God should raise the dead’ (E. V.); but the question is far stronger than this: why is it judged by you a thing past belief, if God raises the dead? i.e. ‘if God, in His exercise of power, sees fit to raise the dead (the word implying that such a fact has veritably taken place), is it for you to refuse to believe it?’

9.] Henceforward he passes to his own history,—how he once refused, like them, to believe in Jesus: and shews them both the process of his conversion, and the ministry with which he was entrusted to others.

10, 11.] This is the “great persecution” of ch. viii. 1. We are surprised here by the unexpected word saints (holy ones), which it might have been thought he would have rather in this presence avoided. But, as Stier remarks, it belongs to the more confident tone of this speech, which he delivers, not as a prisoner defending himself, but as one being heard before those who were his audience, not his judges.

I gave my vote against them can hardly be taken figuratively, as many Commentators, trying to escape from the inference that the “young man” Saul was a member of the Sanhedrim; but must be understood as testifying to this very fact, however strange it may seem. He can hardly have been less than thirty, when sent on his errand of persecution to Damascus. On the fact, compare the words “Saul was consenting unto his death,” ch. viii. 1.

11. punished them] viz. by scourging; comp. Matt. x. 17. I compelled them to blaspheme does not imply that any did blaspheme (Christ: so Pliny, in his celebrated Epistle, speaks of ordering the Bithynian Christians to curse Christ, and adds, that he hears none can be compelled to do this who are really Christians): the verb only relates the attempt. The persecuting the Christians even to foreign cities, forms the transition to the narrative following.

12. Whereupon] literally, In which things (being engaged).

13.] See notes on ch. ix. 3–8, where I have treated of the discrepancies, real or only apparent, between the three accounts of Saul’s conversion. See also ch. xxii. 6–10.

14. in the Hebrew tongue] These words are expressed here only. In ch. ix. we have the fact remarkably preserved by the Hebrew form in the original; in ch. xxii. he was speaking in Hebrew, and the notice was not required.

it is hard for thee to kick against the pricks] This is found here only; in ch. ix. the words are spurious, having been inserted from this place. The metaphor is derived from oxen at plough or drawing a burden, who, on being pricked with the goad, kick against it, and so cause it to pierce deeper. See instances, in my Greek Test., of the use of the proverb.

16–19.] There can be no question that St. Paul here condenses into one, various sayings of our Lord to him at different times, in visions, see ch. xxii. 18–21; and by Ananias, ch. ix. 15; see also ch. xxii. 15, 16. Nor can this, on the strictest view, be considered any deviation from truth. It is what all must more or less do who are abridging a narrative, or giving the general sense of things said at various times. There were reasons for its being minute and particular in the details of his conversion; that once related, the commission which he thereupon received is not followed into its details, but summed up as committed to him by the Lord himself. It would be not only irreverent, but false, to imagine that he put his own thoughts into the mouth of our Lord; but I do not see, with Stier, the necessity of maintaining that all these words were actually spoken to him at some time by the Lord. The message delivered by Ananias certainly furnished some of them; and the unmistakable utterings of God’s Spirit which supernaturally led him, may have furnished more, all within the limits of truth.

16.] for this purpose refers to what follows, to make thee, &c.; for gives the reason for rise, and stand upon thy feet. See reff.

of these things which thou hast seen] Stier remarks, that Paul was the witness of the glory of Christ: whereas Peter, the first of the former twelve, describes himself (1 Pet. v. 1) as ‘a witness of the sufferings of Christ, and a partaker of the glory that shall be revealed.’ So true it was that this latest born among the Apostles, became, by divine grace, more than they all (1 Cor. xv. 8–10).—The expression a minister of those things which thou hast seen may be compared with “ministers of the word,” which St. Luke calls the eye-witnesses, Luke i. 2.

and of those things in the which (or, on account of which) I will appear unto thee] That such visions did take place, we know, from ch. xviii. 9; xxii. 18; xxiii. 11; 2 Cor. xii. 1; Gal. i. 12.

17. delivering thee from] This, and not ‘choosing thee out of,’ is the right meaning.

the people] as elsewhere, the Jewish people. “Thus,” says Calvin, “the Lord armed him against all fears which awaited him, and at the same time prepared him to bear the cross.”

unto whom] to both, the people, and the Gentiles; not the Gentiles only.

18.] not, as Beza, and A.V., ‘to turn them.’ but, that they may turn; see ver. 20.—The general reference of whom becomes tacitly modified (not expressly, speaking as he was to the Jew Agrippa) by the expressions above, darkness and the power of Satan, both, in the common language of the Jews, applicable only to the Gentiles. But in reality, and in Paul’s mind, they had their sense as applied to Jews,—who were in spiritual darkness and under Satan’s power, however little they thought it. See Col. i. 13.

that they may receive] A third step: first the opening of the eyes—next, the turning to God—next, the receiving remission of sins and a place among the sanctified; see ch. xx. 32.—This last reference determines the words by faith that is in me to belong, not to sanctified, but to receive.—Thus the great object of Paul’s preaching was to awaken and shew the necessity and efficacy of faith that is in Christ. And fully, long ere this, had he recognized and acted on this his great mission. The epistles to the Galatians and Romans are two noble monuments of the APOSTLE OF FAITH.

19. I was not disobedient] See Isa. 1. 5.

22.) The therefore refers to the whole course of deliverances which he had had from God, not merely to the last. It serves to close the narrative, by shewing how it was that he was there that day,—after such repeated persecutions, crowned by this last attempt to destroy him.

23. If (not, “that,” as A.V.)] meaning, that the things following were patent facts to those who knew the prophets. See Heb. vii. 15 (marginal rendering), where if has the same sense.

The first thing which was thus patent was not, as Beza, and A.V., “that Christ should suffer:” but that Christ was liable to suffering. St. Paul does not refer to the prophetic announcement, or the historical reality, of the fact of Christ’s suffering, but to the idea of the Messiah, as possible and suffering, being in accordance with the testimony of the prophets. That the fact of His having suffered on the cross was in the Apostle’s mind, can hardly be doubted: but that the words do not assert it, is evident from the change of construction in the next clause, where the fact of the bringing life and immortality to light by the resurrection is spoken of.

first rising from the dead] literally, first from the resurrection of the dead: implying that this light, to be preached to the Jews (the people) and Gentiles, must spring from the resurrection of the dead, and that Christ the first from the resurrection, was to announce it. See Isa. xlii. 6; xlix. 6; lx. 1, 2, 3; Luke ii. 32; ch. xiii. 47.

24.] The words as he thus spake for himself must refer to the last words spoken by Paul: but it is not necessary to suppose that these only produced the effect described on Festus. Mr. Humphry remarks, “Festus was probably not so well acquainted as his predecessor (ch. xxiv. 10) with the character of the nation over which he had recently been called to preside. Hence he avails himself of Agrippa’s assistance (xxv. 26). Hence also he is unable to comprehend the earnestness of St. Paul, so unlike the indifference with which religious and moral subjects were regarded by the upper classes at Rome. His self-love suggests to him, that one who presents such a contrast to his own apathy, must be mad: the convenient hypothesis that much learning had produced this result, may have occurred to him on hearing Paul quote prophecies in proof of his assertions.”

thou art beside thyself (mad)] not merely, ‘thou ravest,’ nor ‘thou art an enthusiast:’ nor are the words spoken in jest, as Olshausen supposes,—but in earnest, as Chrysostom says: “They are the words of angry passion.” Festus finds himself by this speech of Paul yet more bewildered than before.

thy much learning] or, as it may be rendered, those many writings. Meyer understands Festus to allude to the many rolls which Paul had with him in his imprisonment (we might compare “the books, especially the parchments” of 2 Tim. iv. 13) and studied: but the ordinary interpretation, thy much learning, seems more natural, and so De Wette.

25.] truth may be spoken warmly and enthusiastically, but cannot be predicated of a madman’s words: soberness is directly opposed to madness.

26.] Agrippa is doubly his witness, (1) as cognizant of the facts respecting Jesus, (2) as believing the prophets. This latter he does not only assert, but appeals to the faith of the king as a Jew for its establishment.

was not done in a corner] This, the act done to Jesus by the Jews, and its sequel, was not done in an obscure corner of Judæa, but in the metropolis, at a time of more than common publicity.

28.] These words of Agrippa have been very variously explained. I have discussed the proposed renderings in the note in my Greek Test. From that it appears that the rendering of the A.V. is inadmissible, for want of any example of the original expression bearing this meaning: and that the rendering in the margin seems to suit best both the words and the context. It appears also that Agrippa is characterizing no effect on himself, but what Paul was fancying in his mind, reckoning on the persuasion which he had expressed above (ver. 26): and that he speaks of something not that he is likely to become, but that contrasts strangely with his present worldly position and intentions. I would therefore render the words thus: Lightly (with small trouble) art thou persuading thyself that thou canst make me a Christian: and understand them, in connexion with Paul's having attempted to make Agrippa a witness on his side,— ‘I am not so easily to be made a Christian of, as thou supposest.’

29.] I could wish to God, that whether with ease or with difficulty (on my part), not only thou, but all who hear me today, might become such as I am, except only these bonds. He understands the saying just as Agrippa had uttered it, viz. that he was calculating on making him a Christian, easily, ‘with little trouble,’ ‘with slight exertion or persuasion:’ and contrasts with it, with difficulty, ‘with great trouble,’ ‘with much labour.’ See further in my Greek Test.

except these bonds] He shews the chain, which being in military custody, he bore on his arm, to connect him with the soldier who had charge of him. This exception may be regarded as a proof of the perfect courtesy of the great Apostle.

31. doeth nothing] said generally, of his life and habits. No definite act was alleged against him: and his apologetic speech was in fact a sample of the acts of which he was accused.

32.] Agrippa in these words delivers his judgment as a Jew: ‘For aught I see, as regards our belief and practices, he might have been set at liberty.’—But now he could not: for “by an appeal the power of the judge, from whom the appeal lies, is taken away, for acquittal as for condemnation. The whole cause in its integrity must be reserved for the superior court.” Grotius.

CHAP. XXVII. 1–XXVIII. 31] PAUL'S VOYAGE TO ROME AND SOJOURN THERE. I cannot but express the benefit I have derived in my commentary on this section, from Mr. Smith's now well-known treatise on the voyage and shipwreck of St. Paul: as also from various letters which he has from time to time put into my hands, tending further to elucidate the subject. The substance of these will be found embodied in an Appendix following the chronological table in the Introduction to the Acts.

1. that we should sail] Here we have again the first person, the narrator having, in all probability, remained in Palestine, and in the neighbourhood of Paul, during the interval since ch. xxi. 18.

they delivered Paul] Who? perhaps the assessors with whom Festus took counsel on the appeal, ch. xxv. 12: but more likely the plural is used indefinitely, the subject being ‘they,’ as ‘on’ in French, or ‘man’ in German.

of Augustus' band] There is some difficulty in determining what this cohort was. More than one of the legions at different times bore the honorary title ‘Augusta:’ but of a ‘cohort Augusta,’ or ‘Augustana,’ we never hear. It appears likely (see my Greek Test.) that there was a band of picked men called by this name and stationed at Rome for the special body-guard of the emperor. To this Julius seems to have belonged,—to have been sent on some service into Asia, and now to have been returning to Rome.

2. of Adramyttium] Adramyttium was a seaport with a harbour in Mysia, an Athenian colony. It is now a village called Endramit. Grotius, Drusius, and others erroneously suppose Adrumetum to be meant, on the north coast of Africa.

Aristarchus] See ch. xix. 29; xx. 4; Col. iv. 10; Philem. 24. In Col. iv. 10, Paul calls him hisfellow-prisoner, but perhaps only figuratively: the same term is applied to Epaphras, Philem. 23, where follows “Aristarchus, Demas, Lucas, my fellow-labourers.”

8. Sidon] This celebrated city is generally joined in the New Test. with Tyre, from which it was distant twenty-five miles, and of which it was probably the mother city. It was within the lot of the tribe of Asher (Josh. xix. 28), but never conquered by the Israelites (Judg. i. 31; iii. 3). From the earliest times the Sidonians were renowned for their manufactures of glass, linen, silversmith's work, and for the hewing of timber (1 Kings v. 6; Ezra iii. 7). In ancient times, Sidon seems to have been under Tyre, and to have furnished her with mariners (see Ezek. xxvii. 8). It went over to Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, but seems under him, and afterwards under the Chaldeans and Persians, to have had tributary kings of its own (Jer. xxv. 22; xxvii. 3). The Sidonians furnished the best ships in Xerxes' navy. Under Artaxerxes Ochus Sidon freed itself, but was by him, after a severe siege, taken and destroyed. It was rebuilt, and soon after went over to Alexander, keeping its own vassal kings. After his death it was alternately under Syrian and Egyptian rule, till it fell under the Romans. The present Saida is west of ancient Sidon, and is a port of some commerce, but insecure, from the sapping up of the harbour.

The friends here mentioned were probably Christian brethren (see ch. xi. 12, where the Gospel is said to have been preached in Phoenicia; and ch. xxi. 3, where we find brethren at Tyre); but it is usual in that case for brethren or disciples to be specified: compare ch. xxi. 4, 7. The refreshing himself (literally, getting attention paid him) was perhaps to obtain from them that outfit for the voyage which, on account of the official precision of his custody at Cæsarea, he could not there be provided with.

4. we sailed under] i.e. ‘in the lee of’ Cyprus. “When a ship is forced out of her course by a contrary wind, so that an island is interposed between the wind and the ship, she is said to sail under the island.” Wetstein; who also says, “If the wind had been favourable, they would have put out to sea, and left Cyprus on the right, as in Acts xxi. 3, but now they are forced to coast along Cilicia, between Cyprus and Asia.” They kept under shelter of Cyprus, i.e. between Cyprus and Cilicia, so having sailed the whole length of the sea off Cilicia and Pamphylia, they came to Myra. See the account of the reverse voyage, ch. xxi. 3, where, the wind being nearly in the same quarter, the direct course was taken, and they left Cyprus at a distance on their left, in going to Tyre. On this it may be well to quote (from Smith) the testimony of M. de Pagés, a French navigator, who, on his voyage from Syria to Marseilles, informs us that after making Cyprus, “the winds from the west, and consequently contrary, which prevail in these places during the summer, forced us to run to the north. We made for the coast of Caramania (Cilicia), in order to meet the northerly winds, which we found accordingly.”

5. Myra] It was, says Strabo, on a high hill, about three miles from the sea. The neighbourhood is full of magnificent ruins; see Sir C. Fellows's Lycia, ch. ix. The name still remains. The various readings merely shew that the copyists were unacquainted with the place.

6.] The Alexandrian ship may have been laden with corn for Rome; but this cannot be inferred from ver. 38, for the ship had been lightened before, ver. 18.—On her size, see below, ver. 37.—Most probably this ship had been prevented taking the direct course to Italy, which was by the south of Crete, by the prevailing westerly winds. Under such circumstances, says Mr. Smith (p. 32), “ships, particularly those of the ancients, unprovided with a compass, and ill calculated to work to windward, would naturally stand to the N. till they made the land of Asia Minor, which is peculiarly favourable for such a mode of navigation, because the coast is bold and safe, and the elevation of the mountains makes it visible at a great distance; it abounds in harbours, while the sinuosities of its shores and the westerly current would enable them, if the wind was at all off the land, to work to windward, at least as far as Cnidus, where these advantages ceased. Myra lies due N. from Alexandria, and its bay is well calculated to shelter a wind-bound ship. The Alexandrian ship was not, therefore, out of her course at Myra, even if she had no call to touch there for the purposes of commerce.

7. when we had sailed slowly] It is evident that the ship was encountering an adverse wind. The distance from Myra to Cnidus is only 130 geogr. miles, which, with a fair wind, would not take more than one day. Mr. Smith shews that the wind was N.W., or within a few points of it. “We learn from the sailing directions for the Mediterranean, that, throughout the whole of that sea, but mostly in the eastern half, including the Adriatic and Archipelago, N.W. winds prevail in the summer months;... the summer trade winds come from the N.W. (p. 197); which agrees with Aristotle's account of these winds. According to Pliny (ii. 47), they begin in August, and blow for forty days.”

with difficulty] not as E.V., ‘scarce,’ which being also an adverb of time, gives the erroneous idea to the English reader that the ship had scarcely reached Cnidus when the wind became unfavourable.

Cnidus] Cnidus is a peninsula at the entrance of the Ægean Sea, between the islands of Cos and Rhodes, having a lofty promontory and two harbours. “With N.W. winds the ship could work up from Myra to Cnidus; because, until she reached that point, she had the advantage of a weather shore, under the lee of which she would have smooth water, and as formerly mentioned, a westerly current; but it would be slowly and with difficulty. At Cnidus that advantage ceased.” Smith, p. 37.

we sailed under (see above on ver. 4) Crete...] “Unless she had put into that harbour (Cnidus), and waited for a fair wind, her only course was to run under the lee of Crete, in the direction of Salmone, which is the eastern extremity of that island.”—

Salmone (Capo Salomon) is described by Strabo as a sharp headland looking toward Egypt and the Rhodian Archipelago. Pliny calls it Sammonium.

8. hardly passing it] “After passing this point (Salmone), the difficulty they experienced in navigating to the westward along the coasts of Asia, would recur; but as the south side of Crete is also a weather shore with N.W. winds, they would be able to work up as far as Cape Matala. Here the land trends suddenly to the N., and the advantages of a weather shore cease, and their only resource was to make for a harbour. Now Fair Havens is the harbour nearest to Cape Matala, the farthest point to which an ancient ship could have attained with N. W-ly winds.” Smith, as above.

fair havens] The situation of this anchorage was ascertained by Pococke, from the fact of the name still remaining. “In searching after Lebena farther to the west, I found out a place which I thought to be of greater consequence, because mentioned in Holy Scripture, and also honoured by the presence of St. Paul, that is, ‘the Fair Havens, near unto the city of Lasea;’ for there is another small bay about two leagues to the E. of Matala, which is now called by the Greeks good or fair havens.” Cited by Mr. Smith, who adds: “The most conclusive evidence that this is the Fair Havens of Scripture, is, that its position is precisely that where a ship circumstanced as St. Paul’s was must have put in. I have already shewn that the wind must have been about N.W.;—but with such a wind she could not pass Cape Matala: we must therefore look near, but to the E. of this promontory, for an anchorage well calculated to shelter a vessel in N.W. winds, but not from all winds, otherwise it would not have been, in the opinion of seamen (ver. 12), an unsafe winter harbour. Now here we have a harbour which not only fulfils every one of the conditions, but still retains the name given to it by St. Luke.” Smith, p. 45.

Laséa] This place was, until recently, altogether unknown; and from the variety of readings, the very name was uncertain. Pliny mentions Lasos among the cities of Crete, but does not indicate its situation. There is a Lisia named in Crete in the Peutinger Table, which may be the same. [On the very interesting discovery of Lasea by the Rev. G. Brown in the beginning of the year 1856, see the Appendix at the end of the Introduction to Acts. The ruins are on the beach, about two hours eastward of Fair Havens.]

9. much time] Not ‘since the beginning of our voyage,’ as Meyer:—the time was spent at the anchorage.

the voyage] viz. to Rome,—which henceforth was given up as hopeless for this autumn and winter. And by observing this, we avoid a difficulty which has been supposed to attend the words. Sailing was not unsafe so early as this (see below); but to undertake so long a voyage, was.

the fast, especially so called, is the solemn fast of the day of expiation, the 10th of Tisri, the seventh month of the Jewish ecclesiastical year, and the first of the civil year. See Levit. xvi. 29 ff.; xxiii. 26 ff. This would be about the time of the autumnal equinox. The sailing season did not close so early; not indeed till nearly the middle of November.

10.] From the use of I perceive here, and from the saying itself, it seems clear to me that Paul was not uttering at present any prophetic intimation, but simply his own sound judgment on the difficult question at issue. It is otherwise at vv. 22–24. As Smith remarks, “The event justified St. Paul’s advice. At the same time it may be observed, that a bay, open to nearly one-half the compass, could not have been a good winter harbour” (p. 47).

12.] See above on ver. 8. The anchorage was sheltered from the N.W., but not from nearly half the compass.

Phenicé] or more properly Phœnix. Ptolemy calls the haven Phœnicus, and the city (lying some way inland) Phœnix. Strabo describes an isthmus about twelve miles wide, having on the north side a port called Amphimallia, and on the south, Phœnicé. This description, and the other data belonging to Phœnix, Smith (p. 48) has shewn to fit the modern Lutro, which, though not known now as an anchorage, probably from the silting up of the harbour, is so marked in the French admiralty chart of 1738, and “if then able to shelter the smallest craft, must have been capable of receiving the largest ships seventeen centuries before.” Mr. Smith gives an inscription, making it highly probable that Alexandrian ships did winter at Lutro.

looking to the north east and the south east] looking (literally) down the S.W. and N.W. winds; i.e. in the direction of these winds, viz. N.E. and S.E. For the S.W. and N.W. here mentioned in the original are not quarters of the compass, but winds; and down, used with a wind, denotes the direction of its blowing,—down the wind. This interpretation, which I was long ago persuaded was the, right one, I find now confirmed by the opinion of Mr. Smith. The harbour of Lutro satisfies these conditions: and is otherwise even more decisively pointed out as being the spot, by the mention in the Geographers of the island Clauda as connected with it. From these data and others mentioned in my Greek Test., it is almost demonstrated that the port of Phœnix is the present port of Lutro. Mr. Smith has kindly sent me the following extract from a letter containing additional confirmation of the view: ‘Loutro is an excellent harbour; you open it unexpectedly, the rocks stand apart and the town appears within. During the Greek war, when cruising with Lord Cochrane,..... chased a pirate schooner, as they thought, right upon the rocks; suddenly he disappeared, and when rounding in after him,—like a change of scenery, the little basin, its shipping, and the town of Loutro, revealed themselves.’

13. blew softly] The S. wind was favourable for them in sailing from Fair Havens to Phœnix.

supposing that they had (as good as) obtained their purpose; i.e. that it would now be a very easy matter to reach Phœnix.

loosing thence] The word may be understood either of weighing anchor, or of setting sail. They crept close along the land till they passed Cape Matala. “A ship which could not lie nearer to the wind than seven points, would just weather that point which bears W. by S. from the entrance of Fair Havens. We see therefore the propriety of the expression ‘they sailed close by Crete,’ which the author uses to describe the first part of their passage.” Smith, p. 56. 14. there blew down from it] The words in the Greek, of which this appears to be the right rendering, are not easy. I have discussed them in my Greek Test.: and there first proposed the sense thus given, viz. that the wind blew down (from) Crete, ‘down the high lands forming the coast.’ It is a common expression in lake and coasting navigation, that ‘a gust came down the valleys.’ And this would be exactly the direction of the wind in question, When they had doubled, or perhaps were now doubling, Cape Matala, the wind suddenly changed, and the typhoon came down upon them from the high lands;—at first, as long as they were sheltered, only by fits down the gullies, but as soon as they were in the open bay past the cape, with its full violence. This, the hurricane rushing down the high lands when first observed, and afterwards catching the ship, seems to me exactly to describe their changed circumstances in passing the cape. A confirmation of this interpretation may be found by St. Luke himself using the word “came down” to express the descending of a squall from the hills on the lake of Gennesareth, Luke viii. 23. The above is also Mr. Howson’s view, and has been adopted by Mr. Smith. See, in the Appendix appended to the Introduction to Acts, the confirmation of this view in what actually happened to the Rev. G. Brown’s party.

a tempestuous (literally, typhonic) wind] “The sudden change from a south wind to a violent northerly wind, is a common occurrence in these seas. (Captain J. Stewart, R.N., in his remarks on the Archipelago, observes, ‘It is always safe to anchor under the lee of an island with a northerly wind, as it dies gradually away; but it would be extremely dangerous with southerly winds, as they almost invariably shift to a violent northerly wind.’) The term ‘typhonic’ indicates that it was accompanied by some of the phænomena which might be expected in such a case, viz. the agitation and whirling motion of the clouds caused by the meeting of the opposite currents of air when the change took place, and probably also of the sea, raising it in columns of spray. Pliny, speaking of sudden gusts, says, they make an eddy which is called Typhon.” Smith, p. 60.

Euracylon] pronounced Earakylon. This is the reading of the Alexandrian, Vatican, and Sinaitic MSS. It is a compound word, signifying North-Easterly. The direction of the wind is established by Mr. S., from what follows, to have been about half a point N. of E.N. E.; and the subsequent narrative shews that the wind continued to blow from this point till they reached Malta.

15. caught] hurried away, ‘borne along.’ by it.

we let her drive] literally, we gave up, and were driven.

16. running under] i.e. running under the lee of. “St. Luke exhibits here, as on every other occasion, the most perfect command of terms, and gives the utmost precision his language by selecting the most appropriate:—they ran before the wind to leeward of Clauda, hence it is ‘running under.’ they sailed with a side wind to leeward of Cyprus and Crete: hence it is ‘sailed under’” (Smith, p. 61, note).

Clauda] Here again, there can be little doubt that the name of the island was Cauda or Gauda, as we have in some MSS., or, as in Pliny and Mela, Gaudos: but Ptolemy Claudos, and the corruption was very obvious.—The island is the a modern Gozzo.

we had much work to come by the boat] “Upon reaching Clauda, they availed themselves of the smooth water under its lee, to prepare the ship to resist the fury of the storm. Their first care was to secure the boat by hoisting it on board. This had not been done at first, because the weather was moderate, and the distance they had to go, short. Under such circumstances, it is not usual to hoist boats on board, but it had now become necessary. In running down upon Clauda, it could not be done, on account of the ship’s way through the water. To enable them to do it, the ship must have been rounded to, with her head to the wind, and her sails, if she had any set at the time, trimmed, so that she had no head-way, or progressive movement. In this position she would drift, broadside to leeward. I conclude they passed round the east end of the island: not only because it was nearest, but because ‘an extensive reef with numerous rocks extends from Gozzo to the N.W., which renders the passage between the two isles very dangerous’ (Sailing Directions, p. 207). In this case the ship would be brought to on the starboard tack, i.e. with the right side to windward.”.... St. Luke tells us they had much difficulty in securing the boat. He does not say why: but independently of the gale which was raging at the time, the boat had been towed between twenty and thirty miles after the gale had sprung up, and could scarcely fail to be filled with water.” Smith, pp. 64, 65.

helps, i.e. measures to strengthen the ship, strained and weakened by labouring in the gale. Pliny calls the typhoon “the chief pest of sailors, breaking not only the yards, but even the ribs of the vessels themselves.’ Grotius, Heinsius, &c., are clearly wrong in interpreting helps to mean ‘the help of the passengers.’

undergirding] or frapping the ship. “To frap a ship (ceintrer un vaisseau) is to pass four or five turns of a large cable-laid rope round the hull or frame of a ship, to support her in a great storm, or otherwise, when it is apprehended that she is not strong enough to resist the violent efforts of the sea: this expedient, however, is rarely put in practice.” Falconer’s Marine Dict.:—Smith, p. 60, who brings several instances of the practice, in our own times. [See additional ones in Conybeare and Howson, ii. 404 f.]

the quicksand] The Syrtis, on the African coast; there were two, the greater and the lesser, of which the former was the nearer to them.

lowered the gear] “It is not easy to imagine a more erroneous translation than that of our authorized version: ‘Fearing lest they should fall into the quicksands, they strake sail, and were so driven.’ It is, in fact, equivalent to saying that, fearing a certain danger, they deprived themselves of the only possible means of avoiding it.” Smith, p. 67. He goes on to explain, that if they had struck sail, they must have been driven directly towards the Syrtis. They therefore set what sail the violence of the gale would permit them to carry, turning the ship’s head off shore, she having already been brought to on the starboard tack (right side to the wind). The adoption of this course would enable them to run before the gale, and yet keep wide of the African coast, which we know they did. They lowered the gear, i.e. they sent down upon deck the gear connected with the fair-weather sails, such as the topsails. A modern ship sends down top-gallant, masts and yards, a cutter strikes her top-mast, when preparing for a gale. In this case it was perhaps the heavy yard which the ancient ships carried, with the sail attached to it, and the heavy ropes, which would by their top-weight produce uneasiness of motion as well as resistance to the wind. See a letter addressed to Mr. Smith by Capt. Spratt, R.N., quoted in Conybeare and Howson, ii. p. 405, note 5.

so] i.e. “not only with the ship undergirded, and made snug, but with storm-sails set, and on the starboard tack, which was the only course by which she could avoid falling into the Syrtis.” Smith.

18. they lightened the ship] Of what the freight consisted, we have no intimation. Perhaps not of wheat, on account of the separate statement of ver. 38.

19. the furniture of the ship] Beds, moveables of all kinds, cooking utensils, and the spare rigging.

with our own hands is used as shewing the urgency of the danger—when the seamen would with their own hands, cast away what otherwise was needful to the ship and themselves.

20.] The sun and stars were the only guides of the ancients when out of sight of land. The expression, all hope was taken away, seems, as Mr. Smith has noticed, to betoken that a greater evil than the mere force of the storm (which perhaps had some little abated:—no small tempest seems to imply that it still indeed raged, but not as before) was afflicting them, viz. the leaky state of the ship, which increased upon them, as is shewn by their successive lightenings of her.

21. after long abstinence] “What caused the abstinence? A ship with nearly 300 people on board, on a voyage of some length, must have more than a fortnight’s provisions (and see ver. 38): and it is not enough to say with Kuinoel, that ‘their continual labour and fear of danger had caused them not to think of their food.’ ‘Much abstinence’ is one of the most frequent concomitants of heavy gales. The impossibility of cooking, or the destruction of provisions from leakage, are the principal causes which produce it.” Smith, p. 75: who quotes instances. But doubtless anxiety and mental distress had a considerable share in it.

should have been spared this harm and loss] literally, should have turned to your own account this harm and loss. This may perhaps be what our translators meant by gained: but it is by no means clear.

23.] Paul characterizes himself as dedicated to and the servant of God, to give solemnity and bespeak credit for his announcement. At such a time, the servants of God are highly esteemed.

24. all them that sail with thee] Bengel remarks, that “Paul is in the sight of God the chief man in the ship and the director of its course.”

26. we must be cast...] Spoken prophetically, as also ver. 31: not perhaps from actual revelation imparted in the vision, but by a power imparted to Paul himself of penetrating the future at this crisis, and announcing the Divine counsel.

27. the fourteenth night] The reckoning of days counts from their leaving Fair Haven: see vv. 18, 19.

in Adria] Adria, in the wider sense, embraces not only the Venetian Gulf, but the sea to the south of Greece:—so Ptolemy, “The Peloponnesus is bounded on the W. and S. by the Adriatic Sea: and again, Sicily is bounded on the N. by the Sea of Adria.” In fact, he bounds Italy on the S., Sicily on the E., Greece on the S. and W., and Crete on the W. by this Sea, which notices sufficiently indicate its dimensions. So also Pausanias, speaking of the straits of Messina, accounts for their tempestuous character by the meeting of the Tyrrhenian and the Adriatic seas.

the shipmen deemed] What gave rise to this suspicion? Probably the sound (or even the apparent sight) of breakers. “If we assume that St. Paul’s Bay, in Malta, is the actual scene of the shipwreck, we can have no difficulty in explaining what these indications must have been. No ship can enter it from the east without passing within a quarter of a mile of the point of Koura: but before reaching it, the land is too low and too far from the track of a ship driven from the eastward, to be seen in a dark night. When she does come within this distance, it is impossible to avoid observing the breakers: for with north-easterly gales, the sea breaks upon it with such violence, that Capt. Smyth, in his view of the headland, has made the breakers its distinctive character.” Smith, p. 79.—I recommend the reader to study the reasonings and calculations by which Mr. Smith (pp. 79–86) has established, I think satisfactorily, that this land could be no other than the point of Koura, east of St. Paul’s Bay, in Malta.

28. fathoms] The measure here rendered fathom is described as being the length of the outstretched arms, from finger to finger. It is therefore very nearly our fathom, which is six feet.—Every particular here corresponds with the actual state of things. At twenty-five fathoms’ depth (as given in evidence at the court-martial on the officers of the Lively, wrecked on this point in 1810), the curl of the sea was seen on the rocks in the night, but no land. The twenty fathoms would occur somewhat past this: the fifteen fathoms, in a direction W. by N. from the former, after a time sufficient to prepare for the unusual measure of anchoring by the stern, And just so are the soundings (see Capt. Smyth’s chart, Smith, p. 88), and the shore is here full of rough places, mural precipices, upon which the sea must have been breaking with great violence.

29. out of the stern] The usual way of anchoring in ancient as well as in modern navigation, was by the bow. But under certain circumstances, they anchored by the stern; and Mr. Smith has shewn from the figure of a ship which he has copied from the “Antichità de Ercolano,” that their ships had hawseholes aft, to fit them for anchoring by the stern. “That a vessel can anchor by the stern is sufficiently proved (if proof were needed) by the history of some of our own naval engagements. So it was at the battle of the Nile. And when ships are about to attack batteries, it is customary for them to go into action prepared to anchor in this way. This was the case at Algiers. There is still greater interest in quoting the instance of the battle of Copenhagen, not only from the accounts we have of the precision with which each ship let go her anchors astern as she arrived nearly opposite her appointed station, but because it is said that Nelson stated after the battle that he had that morning been reading Acts xxvii.” Conybeare and Howson, ii. p. 414. We have an instance in Cæsar’s commentaries where his ships were anchored by four anchors each, to provide against the violence of a storm. “The anchorage in St. Paul’s Bay is thus described in the Sailing Directions: ‘The harbour of St. Paul is open to E. and N.E. winds. It is, notwithstanding, safe for small ships; the ground, generally, being very good: and while the cables hold, there is no danger, as the anchors will never start.’” Smith, p. 92.

wished for the day] Uncertain, whether their ship might not go down at her anchors: and, even supposing her to ride out the night safely, uncertain whether the coast to leeward might not be iron-bound, affording no beach where they might land in safety. Hence also the ungenerous but natural attempt of the seamen to save their lives by taking to the boat. See Smith, p. 97.

30.] “We hear, in a case mentioned by Appian, of anchors being laid out from both ends of a ship.” ib.

carried anchors out of the foreship] Because in this case they would carry out the anchors to the extent of the cable which was loosened.

31.] “It is surprising to find him saying that the others cannot be saved except the sailors abode in the ship: as if it had been in their power to frustrate God’s promise. I answer, that Paul is not here treating accurately of God’s power, distinct from human will and means. And of a surety God does not offer His help to the faithful that they may despise means of safety, and indulge torpor and sloth, where there is a plain way of caution..... But it does not therefore follow, that the hand of God is tied to means or assistances; but when God ordains this or that way of acting, He curbs the inclinations of men that they transgress not His appointed bounds.” Calvin.

33.] This precaution on the part of Paul was another means taken of providing for their safety. All would, on the approaching day, have their strength fully taxed: which therefore needed recruiting by food..... until it began to be day: i.e. in the interval between the last-mentioned occurrence and daybreak, Paul employed the time, &c.

The words having taken nothing are spoken hyperbolically, and cannot mean literally that they had abstained entirely from food during the whole fortnight.

35.] “Paul neither celebrates the agapé (Olshausen), nor acts as the father of a family (Meyer), but simply as a pious Jew, who asks a blessing before he eats.” De Wette.

36.] When we reflect who were included in these all—the soldiers and their centurion, the sailors and passengers of various nations and dispositions, it shews remarkably the influence acquired by Paul over all who sailed with him.

37.] Explanatory of all: i.e. ‘and this was no small number; for we were,’ &c.

38. they lightened the ship] See above on ver. 18.—This wheat was either the remainder of the cargo, part of which had been disposed of in ver. 18—or was the store for their sustenance, the cargo having consisted of some other merchandise. And this latter is much the more likely, for two reasons: (1) that wheat is mentioned here and not in ver. 18, which it would have been in all probability, had the material cast out there been the same as here; and (2) that the fact is related immediately after we are assured that they were satisfied with food: from whence we may infer almost with certainty that the wheat is the ship's provision, of part of which they had been partaking. It is a sufficient answer to Mr. Smith’s objection to this (“to suppose they had remaining such a quantity as would lighten the ship is quite inconsistent with the previous abstinence,” p. 99), that the ship was provisioned for the voyage to Italy for 276 persons, and that for the last fourteen days hardly any food had been touched. This would leave surely enough to be of consequence in a ship ready to sink from hour to hour.

39.] It may be and has been suggested, that some of the Alexandrian seamen must have known Malta;—but we may answer with Mr. Smith that “St. Paul’s Bay is remote from the great harbour, and possesses no marked features by which it might be recognized” (p. 100).

a creek with a shore] properly, a creek having a sandy beach. What is meant is a creek with a smooth, sandy beach, as distinguished from a rocky inlet.

They were minded, not ‘to thrust in, as A.V., but to strand, to run aground, their ship.

40.] (1) They cut away (or, cut round) all four anchors (the round may allude to the cutting round each cable in order to sever it, or to the going round and cutting all four), and left them in the sea (literally “into the sea,” i.e. ‘in the sea, into which they had been cast’). This they did to save time, and not to encumber the water-logged ship with their additional weight. (2) They let loose the ropes which tied up the rudders. “Ancient ships were steered by two large paddles, one on each quarter. When anchored by the stern in a gale, it would be necessary to lift them out of the water, and secure them by lashings or rudder bands, and to loose these bands when the ship was again got under way.” Smith, p. 101. (3) They raised their “artēmon” to the wind. It would be impossible in the limits of a note to give any abstract of the long and careful reasoning by which Mr. Smith has made it appear that the ‘artēmon’ was the foresail of the ancient ships. I will only notice from him, that the rendering ‘mainsail’ in our A.V. was probably a mistaken translation from Bayfius or De Baif, the earliest of the modern writers on naval matters, and perhaps the only one extant when the translation was made: he says, “The artemon is the largest sail in the ship, as see Acts xxvii.... even now the Venetians retain the name.” These words, “the largest sail,” they rendered by mainsail; whereas the largest sail of the Venetian ships at the time was the foresail.—The French ‘artimon,’ even now in use, means the sail at the stern (mizen). But this is no clue to the ancient meaning, any more than is our word mizen to the meaning of the French misaine, which is the foresail.

41. a place where two seas met] At the west end of St. Paul’s Bay is an island, Selmoon or Salmonetta, which they could not have known to be such from their place of anchorage. This island is separated from the mainland by a channel of about 100 yards wide, communicating with the outer sea. Just within this island, in all probability, was the place where the ship struck, in a place where two seas met.

they ran the ship aground] “The circumstance which follows, would, but for the peculiar nature of the bottom of St. Paul’s Bay, be difficult to account for. The rocks of Malta disintegrate into very minute particles of sand and clay, which when acted on by the currents, or by surface agitation, form a deposit of tenacious clay: but in still water, where these causes do not act, mud is found: but it is only in the creeks where there are no currents, and at such a depth as to be undisturbed by the waves, that mud occurs.... A ship therefore, impelled by the force of the gale into a creek with a bottom such as that laid down in the chart, would strike a bottom of mud, graduating into tenacious clay, into which the fore part would fix itself and be held fast, while the stern was exposed to the force of the waves.” Smith, p. 103. 44. some of the things from the ship] probably, as A.V., broken pieces of the ship:—some of the parts of the ship: the others mentioned being whole planks, perhaps of the decks.

XXVIII. 1. Melita] The whole course of the narrative has gone to shew that this can be no other than MALTA. The idea that it is not MALTA, but Meleda, an island off the Illyrian coast in the Gulf of Venice, seems to be first found in Constantine Porphyrogenitus. It has been adopted by our own countrymen, Bryant and Dr. Falconer, and abroad by some commentators. It rests principally on three mistakes:—1. the meaning of the name Adria (see above on ch. xxvii. 27),—2. the fancy that there are no poisonous serpents in Malta (ver. 3),—3. the notion that the Maltese would not have been called Barbarians.—The idea itself, when compared with the facts, is preposterous enough. Its supporters are obliged to place Fair Havens on the north side of Crete,—and to suppose the wind to have been the hot Sirocco (comp. ver. 2).—Further notices of this question, and of the state of Malta at the time, will be found in the notes on the following verses.

2. the barbarians] A term implying very much what our word natives does, when speaking of any little-known or new place. They were not Greek colonists, therefore they were barbarians (Rom. i. 14). If it be necessary strictly to vindicate the term, see the two citations given in my Greek Test. where the Phoenicians are called barbarians, and Malta is said to be a colony of the Phoenicians.

received us] not to their fire, but to hospitality.

the present rain] which commonly follows on great tempests.

the cold] This is decisive against the Sirocco, which is a hot and sultry wind, even so late as the month of November, and moreover seldom lasts more than three days.

3. when Paul had gathered a bundle of sticks] “We find the Apostle doing the office of a prisoner, serving the wants of others.” Bengel. From the circumstance of the concealed viper, these sticks were probably heaps of neglected wood gathered in the forest. The difficulty here is, that there are now no venomous serpents in Malta. But as Mr. Smith observes, “no person who has studied the changes which the operations of man have produced on the animals of any country, will be surprised that a particular species of reptiles should have disappeared from Malta. My friend the Rev. Mr. Landsborough, in his interesting excursions in Arran, has repeatedly noticed the gradual disappearance of the viper from the island since it has become more frequented. Perhaps there is nowhere a surface of equal extent in so artificial a state as that of Malta at the present day,—and nowhere has the aboriginal forest been more completely cleared. We need not therefore be surprised that, with the disappearance of the woods, the noxious reptiles which infested them should also have disappeared” (pp. 111, 112). St. Paul had placed the faggot on the fire, and was settling or arranging it in its place, when the viper glided out of the heat and fixed on his hand. The verb in the original implies that the serpent glided out through the sticks.

fastened on his hand] The narrative leaves no doubt that the bite did veritably take place.

4.] The natives, who were sure to know, here positively declared it to have been a venomous serpent. I make these remarks to guard against the disingenuous shifts of rationalists and semirationalists, who will have us believe either that the viper did not bite, or that if it did, it was not venomous.

No doubt this man is a murderer] “They saw his fetters.” Bengel.—The idea of his being a murderer is not to be accounted for by the member which was bitten (for this would fit any crime which the hand could commit),—nor by supposing the bite of a serpent to have been the Maltese punishment for murder; it is accounted for by the obviousness of the crime as belonging to the most notorious delinquents, and the aptness of the assumed punishment,—death for death.

Vengeance] or Nemesis. What the Phoenician islanders called her, does not appear; but the idea is common to all religions.

5.] “Luke does not so much as hint, that any divine intervention took place.” De Wette.—True enough: but why? Because St. Luke believed that the very dullest of his readers would understand it without any such hint. According to these rationalists, a fortunate concurrence of accidents must have happened to the Apostles, totally unprecedented in history or probability. Besides, did not the natives themselves in this case testify to the fact? None were so well qualified to judge of the virulence of the serpent,—none so capable of knowing that the hanging on Paul’s hand implied the communication of the venom:—yet they change him from a murderer into a god, on seeing what took place. Need we further evidence, that the divine power which they mistakenly attributed to Paul himself, was really exerted on his behalf, by Him who had said “they shall take up serpents?” See below on ver. 8. The fact that St. Luke understood what the natives said, is adduced by Dr. Wordsworth as another proof (see his and my note on ch. xiv. 11) that the Apostles and Evangelists commonly understood unknown tongues. But such an inference here has absolutely nothing to rest on. Are we to suppose that these “barbarians” had no means of intercourse with Greek sailors?

6.] Both these, the inflammation of the body, and the falling down dead suddenly, are recorded as results of the bite of the African serpents.

7.] The chief, or first man of the Melitæans, was probably an official title: the more so, as Publius can hardly have borne the appellation from his estates, during his father's lifetime. Two inscriptions have been found in Malta, at Citta Vecchia, which seem to establish this view. If so (and his Roman name further confirms it), Publius was legate of the Praetor of Sicily, to whose province Malta belonged.

us] Hardly perhaps more than Paul and his companions, and, it may be, Julius. At ver. 10, a special reason had occurred for his honouring Paul and his company: at present, Publius's hospitality must have been prompted by the courtesy of Julius, who could hardly fail himself to be included in it. The three days were probably till they could find a suitable lodging.

8. fevers] Hippocrates also uses the plural. It probably indicates the recurrence of fever fits.

a bloody flux] dysentery. Dr. Falconer makes this an argument against Malta being meant. "Such a place, dry and rocky, and remarkably healthy, was not likely to produce a disease which is almost peculiar to moist situations." But Mr. Smith answers, that the changed circumstances of the island might produce this change also: and besides, that he is informed by a physician of Valetta, that the disease is by no means uncommon in Malta.

laid his hands on him] It is remarkable, that so soon after the 'taking up of serpents,' we should read of Paul having 'laid his hands on the sick and they recovered.' See the two in close connexion, Mark xvi. 18.

10. with many honours] The ordinary interpretation of this as rewards, gifts, may be right, but is not necessary. The other meaning, that these were really honours, is rendered probable by the form of the sentence, which opposes to these "honours," bestowed on them during their whole stay, such things as were necessary, with which they were loaded at their departure. Render it therefore honoured us with many honours (or 'distinctions,' or 'attentions').

11.] They probably set sail (see on ch. xxvii. 9) not earlier than the sixth of the ides of March (i. e. March 10).

whose sign was [literally, with the sign (of)] the Dioscuri] The ancient ships carried at their prow a painted or carved representation of the sign which furnished their name, and at the stern a similar one of their tutelar deity. Sometimes these were one and the same, as appears to have been the case with this ship. Castor and Pollux (the Dioscuri,—sons of Zeus), sons of Jupiter and Leda, were considered the tutelar deities of sailors.

12.] Syracuse is about eighty miles, a day's sail, from Malta.

13.] This fetching a compass apparently denotes the roundabout course of a vessel tacking with an adverse wind. That the wind was not favourable, follows from what is said below. Mr. Lewin's account is, "As the wind was westerly, and they were under shelter of the high mountainous range of Etna on their left, they were obliged to stand out to sea in order to fill their sails, and so came to Rhegium by a circuitous sweep." And he cites a case of a passage from Syracuse to Rhegium, in which a similar circuit was taken for a sim reason, p. 736. The at Rhegium, as perhaps the three at Syracuse before, was spent probably in waiting for the wind.

the south wind having sprung up.—succeeded the one which blew before.

the second day] viz. after leaving Rhegium: a distance of about 180 nautical miles.

Puteoli] (anciently Dicearchia, now Puzzuoli) was the most sheltered part of the bay of Naples. It was the principal port of Southern Italy, and, in particular, formed the great emporium for the Alexandrian wheat ships.

14.] These Christians were perhaps Alexandrines, as the commerce was so considerable between the two places.

so] i.e. after this stay with them: implying that the request was complied with.—The brethren at Rome had heard probably by special message sent by some of their fellow-voyagers. [See a detailed account of the stages of the journey not here mentioned, in Conybeare and Howson, ii. pp. 438 ff.]

15. Appii forum, and The three taverns] Luke writes as one of the travellers to Rome, who would come on Appii Forum (forty-three miles from Rome) first. It was on the Via Appia, which leaving Rome by the Porta Capena, passed through the Pontine marshes, as far as Capua. Being not far from the coast (Strabo, v. 233), it was the resort of sailors, as Horace describes it. It has been suggested to me, that these may have been sailors belonging to the canal boats, as Appii Forum is too far inland to have been resorted to by sailors from the coast. He further says that it was an unpleasant halting-place for travellers, having, besides, very bad water.—The Three taverns was a way-side inn, ten miles nearer Rome. Cicero mentions both in the letters to Atticus. The brethren were in two parties: some had come the longer, others the shorter distance, to meet the Apostle.—I have given several instances in my Greek Test. of the practice of going forth to meet approaching travellers of eminence.

took courage] Both encouragement as to his own arrival, as a prisoner, in the vast metropolis,—in seeing such affection, to which he was of all men most sensible; and encouragement as to his great work so long contemplated, and now about to commence in Rome,—in seeing so promising a beginning for him to build on.

16.] The omission of the disputed words here is too strongly attested to allow us to retain them in the text. As regards the fact indicated in them, the captain of the guard (prefect of the praetorian guard) was the person officially put in charge with the prisoners sent from the provinces. The praetorian camp was outside the Viminal gate, where it had been fixed and fortified by Sejanus. It was incorporated in Aurelian's walls, and now forms a square projection from their line.

Paul was suffered] This permission probably resulted from the letters of Festus, expressing that no crime was laid to the charge of Paul: perhaps also partly from the favour of Julius, and his report of the character and bearing of Paul on the journey.

the soldier] a Praetorian, to whom he was chained; see below, ver. 20; and note on ch. xxiv. 23.

17.] The banishment of Jews from Rome (ch. xviii. 2) had either tacitly or openly been abrogated some time before this. Priscilla and Aquila had returned when the Epistle to the Romans was written, Rom. xvi. 3.—St. Paul was naturally anxious to set himself right with the Jews at Rome—to explain the cause of his being sent there, in case no message had been received by them concerning him from Judæa,—and to do away if possible with the unfavourable prejudice which such letters, if received, would have created respecting his character.—The fact of his sending for them, and their coming to him, seems to shew that he was not imprisoned in the Praetorian camp, but was already in a private lodging.

18. would have (wished to) let me go] This may have been at ch. xxv. 8. The possibility of such a release is asserted by Agrippa, ch. xxvi. 32.

19.] ‘My appeal was a defensive and necessary step—not an offensive one, to complain of my nation.’

20. For this cause] For the reason just stated: because I have no hostile feeling to my nation. Then what follows adds another motive; for not only so, but I may well wish to see and speak with you, being a prisoner for the hope of Israel (see ch. xxvi. 6, and notes).

21.] It may seem strange that they had received no tidings concerning him. But, as Meyer well remarks, (1) before his appeal, the Jews in Judæa had no definite reason to communicate with the Jews in Rome respecting him, having no expectation that Paul, then a prisoner in Judæa, and the object of their conspiracies there, would ever go to Rome, or come into connexion with their brethren there. And (2) since his appeal, it would have been hardly possible for them to have sent messengers who should have arrived before him. For his voyage followed soon after his appeal (ch. xxv. 13; xxvii. 1), and was so late in the year, that for the former reason it is as unlikely that any deputation from them should have left before him, as for the latter, after him. Had any left within a few days, the same storm would have in all probability detained them over the winter, and they could not certainly have made a much quicker voyage than Paul's ship to Puteoli. Still, as casual, non-official tidings might have reached them, Paul shewed this anxiety. It appears, however, that none had come. Olshausen's view, that the banishment of the Jews from Rome under Claudius had interrupted the relations between the Roman and Judæan Jews, is hardly probable: see on ver. 17.

22. this heresy] To which they perhaps inferred that Paul belonged, from ver. 20: or they might have heard thus much generally respecting him by rumour, though they had received no special message.—Their short notice of Christianity is perhaps the result of caution, seeing as they did the favour shewn by the authorities towards Paul: or perhaps of dissimulation.—Many Commentators have noticed the omission of all mention of the Christian church at Rome, and of Paul's connexion with or work among them. And some recently in Germany have called in question the credibility of the Acts on this account. But without any reason: for the work of the Apostle among churches already founded is not the subject of our history, and is seldom related by Luke, without a special reason. Of the three years at Ephesus (ch. xx. 31),—the year and a half (ch. xviii. 11), and three months (ch. xx. 3) at Corinth, we know from the narrative nothing that took place among the Christians themselves. Besides, one great object of this history is to shew forth Paul as working out the Lord's implied command to preach the Gospel ‘to the Jew first, and also to the Gentile’ (ch. i. 8), and, having every where done this, it is but natural that he should open his commission in Rome by assembling and speaking to the Jews.

23. his lodging] Probably the “hired house” of ver. 30: hardly, as Olshausen thinks, the house of Aquila.

25.] they departed, but not before Paul had said one saying. It is very remarkable, that the same prophetic quotation with which our Lord opened his teaching by parables (Matt. xiii. 14, 15), should form the solemn close of the historic Scriptures.

26.] The Go, and say, is referred to himself, in his application of the prophecy. These words are not cited by our Lord (Matt. xiii. as above).

28.] this was probably omitted as superfluous, and perhaps to suit Luke iii. 6. It adds greatly to the force: this the message of God's salvation, i.e. ‘there is no other for those who reject this.’

they will also (besides having it sent to them) hear it] “What Paul had learned by experience in many cities of Asia and Europe, viz. that the sowing of the word among the Gentiles was attended with more success, this he now anticipates also for the future.” Grotius.

29.] This verse has not the usual characteristic of spurious passages,—the variety of readings in those MSS. which contain it. It may perhaps, after all, have been omitted as appearing superfluous after ver. 25, 30, 31.] It is evident that Paul was not released from custody, but continued with the soldier who kept him,— (1) from the expressions here; he received all who came in to him, but we do not hear of his preaching in the synagogues or elsewhere: he preached and taught with all boldness, and unhindered, both being mentioned as remarkable circumstances, and implying that there were reasons why this could hardly have been expected: and (2) from his constantly speaking of himself in the Epistles written during it, as a prisoner, see Eph. vi. 19, 20; Col. iv. 3, 4; Philem. 9; Philipp. frequently. On the whole question regarding the chronology of his imprisonment,—and the reason of this abrupt ending of the history, see Introduction to Acts,§iv. 3–7:—and on its probable termination and the close of St. Paul’s life, see the Introduction to the Pastoral Epistles,§ii. 17 ff.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE ROMANS

CHAP. I. 1-7.] ADDRESS THE EPISTLE, WITH AN ANNOUNCEMENT OF PAUL's CALLING TO BE AN APOSTLE OF THE GOSPEL OF THE SON OF GOD. It has been remarked by Calvin, that this whole Epistle is exquisitely and skilfully arranged, so that its great argument seems to flow out of the natural and rational progress of its ordinary thought. Beginning with the proof of his Apostleship, St. Paul thence comes to the Commendation of the Gospel: this in its turn brings on a disputation concerning faith; to which then, as if led to it by the context, he gives himself. And thus he enters on the grand subject of the whole Epistle, justification by faith, which employs him as far as the end of the fifth chapter. St. Paul in the addresses of his Epistles never uses the common Greek formula "greeting" (James i. 1), but always a prayer for blessing on those to whom he is writing. In all his Epistles (and in both those of Peter, and in the Apocalypse) this prayer is for "grace and peace," except in 1 and 2 Tim., where it is for "grace, mercy, and peace," as in 2 John. In Jude only we find "mercy, peace, and love."—The address here differs from those of most of Paul's Epistles, in having doctrinal clauses parenthetically inserted:—such are found also in the address of the Epistle to Titus, and (in much less degree) in that of the Epistle to the Galatians. These doctrinal clauses regard, 1. the fore-announcement of the Gospel through the prophets: 2. the description and dignity of Him who was the subject of that Gospel: 3. the nature and aim of the apostolic office to which Paul had been called,—including the persons addressed in the objects of its ministration.

1. A servant of Jesus Christ] So also Phil. i. 1, and Tit. i, 1 ("a servant of God, and an apostle of Jesus Christ"),—but usually "an apostle of Jesus Christ" (or, "of Christ Jesus") (2 Cor., Eph., Col., 1 Tim., 2 Tim.): "a [called] apostle of Jesus Christ" (1 Cor.),—simply "an apostle" (Gal.),—"a prisoner of Jesus Christ" (Philem.). The expression 'servant of God' is the especial Old Test. title of Israel, and of individuals, as Moses, Joshua, David, Daniel, Job, and others, who as prophets, kings, &c., were raised up for the express work of God. Servant must not be rendered "slave," nor merely "pious worshipper:" because the former excludes the element of freewill, while the latter does not express the entire dedication to Christ.

called to be an apostle] In naming himself a servant of Jesus Christ, he bespeaks their attention as a Christian speaking to Christians: he now further specifies the place which he held by the special calling of God; called, and that to the very highest office, of an apostle; and even more—among the Apostles, not one by original selection, but one specially called. "The rest of the apostles were educated by long intercourse with Jesus, and were called first to follow Him and obey Him, then put forth as Apostles. Paul, before time a persecutor, was suddenly made an Apostle by special calling. In like manner, the Jews were God's people by promise: the Greeks, by simple calling. Thus the called apostle had a similitude and relation to the called saints." Bengel.

apostle must not be taken here in the wider sense, of a missionary, as in ch. xvi. 7, but in its higher and peculiar meaning, in which the Twelve bore the title ("whom he also named apostles," Luke vi. 13), and Paul (and perhaps Barnabas), and James the Lord's brother. This title was not conferred on Paul by the separation ordered by the Holy Spirit, Acts xiii. 2, but in virtue of his special call by the Lord in person; compare the expression "a chosen vessel" ("a vessel of choice"), Acts ix. 15, with "Have not I chosen you twelve?" John vi. 70; also compare John xiii. 18; xv. 16 Acts i. 2. "I cannot agree," says Calvin, "with those who refer this word—called—to Paul's personal eternal election of God."

separated] not as in Acts xiii. 2 merely, though that was a particular application of the general truth:—but (as in Gal. i. 15) "God, who separated me from my mother's womb." "The same idea of separation is at the root of the word Pharisee: but here Paul signifies that he was separated by God, not only from among men, from among Jews, from among the disciples, but even from among teachers themselves." Bengel.

unto i.e. for the purpose of announcing. the gospel of God] i.e. the good tidings sent by (not concerning) God. The genitive is not, as in "the Gospel of the kingdom," Matt. iv. 23, Mark i. 14, one of apposition, but of possession or origin; God's Gospel. And so, whenever the expression 'the Gospel of Christ' occurs, it is not 'the Gospel about Christ,' but Christ's Gospel; that Gospel which flows out of His grace, and is His gift to men.—Thus in the very beginning of the Epistle, these two short words announce that the Gospel is of God,—in other words, that salvation is of grace only.

2.] This good tidings is no new invention, no after-thought,—but was long ago announced in what God's prophets wrote concerning His Son:—and announced by way of promise, so that God stood pledged to its realization. "Since the charge of bringing in novelties was brought against the Gospel, he shews that it was older than the Greeks, and long ago shadowed out in the prophets." Chrysostom.

3. concerning his Son] belongs to “which he had promised afore,” above,—which he promised beforehand, &c., concerning His Son, i.e. ‘which (good tidings) He promised beforehand, &c., and indicated that it should be concerning His Son.’ This is more natural than (as is done in the A.V.) to bind these words to “the Gospel of God,” which went before. Either meaning will suit ver. 9 equally well.—Christ, the Son of God, is the great subject of the good news.

which was born] or, became: not, as in A.V., “was made.” There is nothing in the word indicating creation, however true that may have been: see John i. 14.

according to the flesh] On the side of His humanity, our Lord became, was born; that nature of His begins only then, when He was “made (born) of a woman,” Gal. iv. 4.

flesh is here used exactly as in John i. 14, “the word became flesh,” to signify that whole nature, body, and soul, of which the outward visible tabernacle of the FLESH is the concrete representation to our senses.—The words of the seed of David cast a hint back at the promise just spoken of. At the same time, in so solemn an enunciation of the dignity of the Son of God, they serve to shew that even according to the human side, His descent had been fixed in the line of him who was Israel’s anointed and greatest king.

4.] The simple antithesis would have been, which was born... according to the flesh, but was the Son of God according to the Spirit, see 1 Tim. iii. 16. But (1) wonderful solemnity is given by dropping the particles, and taking up separately the human and divine nature of Christ, keeping His Son as the great subject of both clauses, and thus making them, not contrasts to one another, but correlative parts of the same great whole. And (2) the Apostle, dwelling here on patent facts,—the announcements of prophecy,—the history of the Lord’s Humanity, does not deal with the essential subsistent Godhead of Christ, but with that manifestation of it which the great fact of the Resurrection had made to men. Also (3) by amplifying the Spirit into the Spirit of holiness, he characterizes the Spirit of Christ as one of absolute holiness, i.e. as divine, and partaking of the God-head: see below.

with power] This qualifying clause belongs to declared,—not to the words “the Son of God,”—nor again is it a parallel clause to “according to the Spirit of holiness,” to “by the resurrection,” &c. (as St. Chrysostom, who interprets it “by means of the miracles which He did”), manifested with power (to be) the Son of God. The rendering then is, which was with power declared to be the Son of God.

declared] before men. It is not the objective appointment of Christ as the Son of God, that is spoken of, but the subjective manifestation in men’s minds that He is so: not of Christ’s being what He is, but of the proof of that fact by His Resurrection.

according to the Spirit of holiness] The Spirit of holiness is not equivalent to “the Holy Spirit:” this epithet would be inapplicable here, for it would point out the Third Person in the Blessed Trinity, whereas it is the Spirit of Christ Himself, in distinction from His Flesh, which is spoken of. And this Spirit is designated by the gen. of quality, of holiness, to shew that it is not a human, but a divine Spirit which is attributed here to Christ,—a Spirit to which holiness belongs as its essence. The other interpretations certainly miss the mark, by overlooking the terms, according to the flesh and according to the Spirit, the two sides of the Person of Christ here intended to be brought out. Such are that of Theodoret: “through the might wrought in Him by means of the Holy Spirit,”—Chrysostom: “from the Spirit, by whom He gave sanctification,” &c. Calvin and Olshausen also seem to wish to include the notion of sanctifying in the term holiness, which, how ever true, is more than strictly belongs to the words.

by] as indicating the source, out of which the demonstration proceeds.

the resurrection of the dead] not, “the resurrection from the dead,”—which, besides that it is not the rendering of the words of the original, would be a weakening of the strong expression of the Apostle, who takes here summarily and by anticipation the Resurrection of Jesus as being, including, involving (“I am the Resurrection,” John xi. 25) the (whole) Resurrection of the dead. So that we must not render as A.V. “the resurrection from the dead,” but the resurrection of the dead, regarded as accomplished in that of Christ. It was the full accomplishment of this, which more than any thing declared Him to be the Son of God: see John v. 25–29. Thus in these words lies wrapped up the argument of ch. vi. 4 ff.

even Jesus Christ our Lord] This is the place of these words in the original, and to this place they ought to be kept. For the Apostle having given this description of the Person and dignity of the Son of God, very Man and very God, now identifies this divine Person with JESUS CHRIST, the Lord and Master of Christians,—the historical object of their faith, and (see words following) the Appointer of himself to the apostolic office.

5. through whom] As in Gal. i. 1; 1 Cor. i. 9, designating the Lord Himself as the Agent in conferring the grace and Apostleship.

we received] not ‘all Christians,—but we, the Apostle himself as he not unfrequently speaks. No others need be here included in the word. Those to whom he is writing cannot be thus included, for they are specially contrasted with the subject of the verb received by the following verse. Nor can this verb received (not, as A.V., “have received”) refer to any general bestowal of this kind, indicating, as it must, a definite past event, viz. the reception of the Apostleship by himself.

grace] It is hardly to be understood, as Augustine explains, that “the Apostle has grace in common with all the faithful, but Apostleship not in common with all.” for he is surely speaking of that peculiar grace, by which he wrought in his apostleship more than they all.

apostleship] ‘the office of an Apostle:’ not any mission, or power of sending ministers, resident in the whole church, which would be contrary to the usage of the word. The existence of such a power is not hereby denied, but this place refers solely to the office of Paul as an Apostle. It was the general bestowal of grace, which was the condition of and introduced the special bestowal (and, as so often, coupling a specific portion to a whole) of apostleship: compare 1 Cor. xv. 10.

obedience of faith] Such is the literal rendering of the words; and this ought to be kept in the translation. They may mean either, obedience which is the result of faith, or, obedience, the object of which is the faith; obedience, in fact, to the faith, as in Acts vi. 7, “a great multitude of the priests were obedient unto the faith.” Understood either way, these words form an introduction to the great subject of the Epistle.

in order to bring about obedience of faith among all (the) nations (or, all the Gentiles): the word rendered Gentiles being always the same as that meaning nations). The Jews do not here come into account. There is no inclusion, and at the same time no express exclusion of them: but Paul was commissioned as the Apostle of the Gentiles, and he here magnifies the great office entrusted to him.

for his name's sake] i.e. on behalf of his name; ‘for His glory’ “In the name of Christ is summed up what He had done and was, what the Christian ever bore in mind, the zeal which marked him, the name wherewith he was named.” Jowett. The words are best taken as belonging to the whole verse: as declaring the purpose for which the grace and apostleship had been received.

6. among whom] The whole should be taken together: among whom ye also are called of Jesus Christ; otherwise, with a comma at also, the assertion, ‘among whom are ye also,’ is flat and unmeaning. Some would take of Jesus Christ as a genitive of possession, because the call of believers is generally referred to the FATHER; but sometimes the SON is said to call likewise, see John v. 25; 1 Tim. i. 12;—and with beloved of God following so close upon it, the expression can I think hardly be taken otherwise than as called by Jesus Christ.

beloved of God, called to be saints] Both these clauses refer to all the Christians addressed: not (as Bengel) the first to Jewish, the second to Gentile believers. No such distinction would be in place in an exordium which anticipates the result of the Epistle—that Jew and Gentile are one in guilt, and one in Christ.

from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ] God is the Giver of grace and peace,—Christ the Imparter.

8-17.] OPENING OF THE EPISTLE. His thankfulness for the faith of the Romans: remembrance of them in his prayers: wish to visit them: hindrances hitherto, but still earnest intention of doing so, that he may further ground them in that Gospel, of which he is not ashamed, inasmuch as it is THE POWER OF GOD TO ALL WHO BELIEVE. This leads to the announcement (in a citation from the Scripture) of one great subject of the Epistle,—viz.: JUSTIFICATION BY FAITH.

8.] This placing himself in intimate connexion with his readers by mention of and thankfulness for their faith or Christian graces, is the constant habit of St. Paul. The three Epistles, Gal., 1 Tim., and Titus, are the only exceptions: 2 Cor. may seem to be such, but in ch. i. 3–22 we have an equivalent: see especially, vv. 6, 7, 11, 14. It is literally, First indeed... and the sentence answering to this is found at ver. 13, ‘Ye indeed are prospering in the faith: but I still am anxious further to advance that fruitfulness.’

my God] “See with what skill in the arrangement of terms he gives thanks. For he does not say, ‘to God,’ but to my God: which also the prophets do, appropriating to themselves that which is common to all. And what wonder, if they do? For we see God continually Himself doing the same in speaking of His servants, calling Himself, with a like appropriation, the God of Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob.” Chrysostom.

through Jesus Christ] “He offers his sacrifice of thanksgiving as through the Great High Priest: for he who would offer a sacrifice must know that it must be offered through the hands of the High Priest.” Origen. So also Calvin, “We have here an example, how thanks are to be offered through Christ, according to the apostolic precept, Heb. xiii. 15.” Olshausen says, “This is no mere phrase, but a true expression of the deepest conviction. For only by the Spirit of Christ dwelling in men’s hearts are thanksgivings and prayer acceptable to God.” But perhaps here it is better to take the words as expressing an acknowledgment that the faith of the Romans, for which thanks were given, was due to and rested on the Lord Jesus Christ: see ch. vii. 25, and the rendering there.

your faith] “In congratulations of this kind Paul sometimes describes the whole Christian character, Col. i. 3 ff., or some portion of it, 1 Cor. i. 5. And thus here he celebrates their faith, agreeably to his design, verses 12, 17.” Bengel.

published] De Wette notices the other side of the report, as given by the Jews at Rome, Acts xxviii. 22, to Paul himself. This praise was in the Christian churches, and brought by Christian brethren.

throughout the whole world] A popular hyperbole, common every where, and especially when speaking of general diffusion through the Roman empire, the ‘orbis terrarum.’ The praise would be heard in every city where there was a Christian church,—intercourse with the metropolis of the world being common to all.

9.] “A pious asseveration, concerning a thing necessary to be stated, and unknown, to men, especially to those who were unknown to the writer, and remote from him.” Bengel. There could be no other witness to his practice in his secret prayers, but God: and as the assertion of a habit, of incessantly praying for the Roman Christians, whom he had never seen, might seem to savour of an exaggerated expression of affection, he solemnly appeals to this only possible testimony. To the Eph., Phil. (see however Phil. i. 8), Col., Thess., he gives the same assurance, but without the asseveration. The thus calling God to witness is no uncommon practice with St. Paul: see references.

whom I serve in my spirit] The serving God in his spirit was a guarantee that his pro-fession was sincere, and that the oath just taken was no mere form, but a solemn and earnest appeal of his spirit. See also Phil. iii, 3, and John iv. 24. “The Apostle means that he is an intelligent true priest, of his God, not in the temple, but in his spirit,—not at the altar, but in the gospel of His Son.” Umbreit.

in the gospel] “The addition of these words shews the kind of his service.” Chrysostom. His peculiar method of service was concerned with the gospel of the Son of God. “Some take this addition, as if Paul wished to commend his service of God on account of its agreement with the commands of the Gospel, seeing that a service of God in the spirit is prescribed to us in the Gospel. But the other interpretation is far more agreeable to the sense, viz. that he renders his service to God in the preaching of the Gospel.” Calvin. See the use of the word “Gospel,” Phil. iv. 15.

how unceasingly] The words thus rendered may also mean, “that without ceasing.” The rendering in the text seems the better of the two. The whole phrase is a favourite one with our Apostle: see references.

my prayers must be understood of his ordinary stated prayers, just in our sense of the expression: “as often as he professedly and stately prayed to God, he remembered them among others.” Calvin.

10. if by any means] It is not said what was the substance of his prayer; only what was its aim and contemplated result. So in Simon’s entreaty, Acts viii. 24, “Pray ye to the Lord for me, [in order] that none of these things which ye have spoken come upon me,” where the latter clause represents not the contents of the prayer, but the end aimed at by it.

now at length] i.e. before long:—literally, ‘at last, some day or other?

shall have a way opened] S hall be allowed, prospered. The rendering of the A.V., ‘I might have a prosperous journey, is incorrect, by, i.e. in the course of, the will of God.

11. that I may impart unto you some spiritual gift] That the gift here spoken of was no mere supernatural power of working in the Spirit, the whole context shews, as well as the meaning of the word itself in ch. v. 15, 16; vi. 23. And even if the word barely taken, could ever (1 Cor. xii. 4, 9 are no examples, see there) mean technically a supernatural endowment of the Spirit, yet the epithet spiritual, and the object of imparting this gift, confirmation in the faith, would here preclude that meaning. Besides, St. Paul did not value the mere bestowal of these ‘gifts’ so highly, as to make it the subject of his earnest prayers incessantly. The gift alluded to was the comfort (mutual confirmation in the faith) spoken of below.

to the end that ye may be established] Knowing the trials to which they were exposed, and being conscious of the fulness of spiritual power for edification (2 Cor. xiii. 10) given to him, he longed to impart some of it to them, that they might be confirmed. “The Apostle does not say ‘to the end that I may establish you,’ for this belongs to God; see ch. xvi. 25, He is only the instrument: hence the passive.” Philippi.

12.] “Then since this saying seemed to assume too much to himself, see how he tempers it by what he puts after it. ‘That, they might not say, What? are we unsteady and wavering, and want thy tongue in order that we may stand firmly? he anticipates this objection, and precludes such an answer by saying (as in ver. 12). It is as if he had said, Do not suppose that I said it, finding fault with you: it was not with this view that I spoke the words; but this is what I wished to say: Ye are undergoing many trials in being harassed by your persecutors: I therefore desired to see you that I may comfort you,—or rather not that I only may comfort you, but may myself also receive comfort from you.” Chrysostom. See the same wish expressed in different words ch. xv, 32, and the partial realization of it, Acts xxviii. 15. The A.V. has, by the mutual faith both of you and me. This is hardly the proper use of the word mutual, which should mean, faith which each has in the other; whereas the comfort here is to spring from the faith which each sees in the other. The rendering in the text is therefore to be preferred. Faith is used in the most general sense—faith as the necessary condition and working instrument of all Christian exhortation, comfort, and confirmation; producing these, and evidenced by them.

13. I would not have you ignorant] A Pauline formula: see references. The words but was hindered hitherto are best as a parenthesis, The reason of the hindrance is given in ch. xv. 20–22: it was, his scrupulous care to preach the gospel where it had not been preached before, rather than on the foundation of others.

some fruit] The meaning is not here ‘wages,’ or ‘result of my apostolic labour,’ for such is not the ordinary meaning of the word in the New Test., but fruit borne by you who have been planted to bring forth fruit to God. This fruit I should then gather and present to God; compare the figure in ch. xv. 16: see also Phil. i. 22 and note.

14.] The connexion seems to be this: He wishes to have some fruit, some produce of expended labour, among the Romans as among the rest of the Gentiles. Till this was the case, he himself was a debtor to every such people: which situation of debtor he wished to change, by paying the debt and conferring a benefit, into that of one having money out at interest there, and yielding a fruit. The debt which he owed to all nations was (ver. 15) the obligation laid on him to preach the gospel to them: see 1 Cor. ix. 16.

Greeks—Barbarians—wise—unwise] These words must not be pressed as applying to any particular churches, or as if any one of them designated the Romans themselves,—or even as if wise belonged to Greeks and unwise to Barbarians. They are used, apparently, merely as comprehending all Gentiles, whether considered in regard of race or of intellect; and are placed here certainly not without a prospective reference to the universality of guilt, and need of the gospel, which he is presently about to prove existed in the Gentile world.—Notice that he does not call himself a debtor to the Jews—for they can hardly be included under the designation Barbarians (see Col. iii. 11). Though he had earnest desires for them (ch. ix. 1–3; x. 1), and every where preached to them first, this was not his peculiar debt, or bounden duty: see Gal. ii. 7, where he describes himself as “entrusted, put in charge, with the gospel of the uncircumcision, as Peter with that of the circumcision.”

15. So...] Having spoken of the whole obligation resting upon him, he now infers, from that, his readiness to fulfil one principal part of it, ‘I am ready to preach the Gospel, as to all Gentiles, so to you, who hold no mean place among them.’

16.] The words, For I am not ashamed, &c., seem to be suggested by the position of the Romans in the world. ‘Yea, to you at Rome also: for, though your city is mistress of the world, though your emperors are worshipped as present deities, though you are elated by your pomps and luxuries and victories, yet I am not ashamed of the apparently mean origin of the gospel which I am to preach; for (and here is the transition to his great theme) it is, &c.

for it is the power of God] The gospel, which is the greatest example of the Power of God, he strikingly calls that Power itself. So in 1 Cor. i. 24 he calls Christ, the Power of God. But not only is the gospel the great example of divine Power; it is the field of agency of the power of God, working in it, and interpenetrating it throughout. In barely saying here that it is the power of God, the Apostle intends to convey (as also in 1 Cor. i. 24) a superlative sense; the highest and holiest vehicle of the divine Power, the power by excellence. “It is weighty for the difference between the Gospel and the Law, that the Law is never called God’s power, but light, or teaching, in which a man must walk, Ps. xxxvi. 10; cxix. 105; Prov. vi. 23; Isa. ii. 52.” Umbreit. And the direction in which this power acts in the gospel is unto or towards salvation—it is a healing, saving power: for as Chrysostom reminds us, there is a power of God unto punishment, and unto destruction, see Matt. x. 28.—But to whom is this gospel the power of God to save? To every one that believeth. The universality implied in every one, the condition necessitated in the qualification added, that believeth, and the power of God acting unto salvation, are the great subjects treated of in the former part of this Epistle. All are proved to be under sin, and so needing God’s righteousness (ch. i. 18–iii).

20), and the entrance into this righteousness is shewn to be by fait h (ch. iii. 21–v. 11). Then the power of God in freeing from the dominion of sin and death, and as issuing in salvation, is set forth (ch. v. 11–viii. 39). So that if the subject of the Epistle is to be stated in few words, these should be chosen: the Gospel, the power of God unto salvation unto every one that believeth. This expresses it better than merely 'justification by faith, which is in fact only a subordinate part of the great theme,—only the condition necessitated by man's sinfulness for his entering the state of salvation: whereas the argument extends beyond this, to the death unto sin and life unto God and carrying forward of the sanctifying work of the Spirit, from its first fruits even to its completion.

to the Jew first, and also to the Greek] This is the Jewish expression for all mankind, as "Greeks and Barbarians," ver. 14, is the Greek one. The term Greek here includes all Gentiles. The priority here mentioned is not in order of time, but is principally (comp. ch. ii. 9) spoken of national precedence, in the sense in which the Jews were to our Lord "his own," John i. 11. Salvation was "from the Jews," John iv. 22. See ch. ix. 5; xi. 24. Not that the Jew has any preference under the gospel; only he inherits and has a precedence.

17.] An explanation, how the gospel is the power of God to salvation, and how it is so to the believer:—because in it God's righteousness (not His attribute of righteousness,—‘the righteousness of God,’ but righteousness flowing from, and acceptable to Him) is unfolded, and the more, the more we believe. I subjoin De Wette's note on the words. “The Greek and Hebrew words rendered ‘righteousness,’ are taken sometimes for ‘virtue’ and ‘piety,’ which men possess or strive after,—sometimes imputatively, for ‘freedom from blame’ or ‘justification.’ The latter meaning is most usual with Paul: ‘righteousness’ is that which is so in the sight of God (ch. ii. 13), the result of His justifying forensic Judgment, or of ‘Imputation’ (ch. iv. 5). It may certainly be imagined, that a man might obtain justification by fulfilling the law: in that case his righteousness is ‘righteousness of his own’ (ch. x. 3), a righteousness springing from the law (Phil. iii. 9). But it is impossible for him to obtain a ‘righteousness of his own,’ which at the same time shall avail before God (ch. iii. 20; Gal. ii. 16). The Jews not only have not fulfilled the law (ch. iii. 9–19), but could not fulfil it (vii. 7 ff.); the Gentiles likewise have rendered themselves obnoxious to the divine wrath (i. 24–32). God has ordained that the whole race should be included in disobedience. Now if man is to become righteous from being unrighteous,—this can only happen by God’s grace,—because God declares him righteous, assumes him to be righteous, justifies him (iii. 24; Gal. iii. 8):—to justify is not only negative, ‘to acquit,’ but also positive, ‘to declare righteous;’ but never ‘to make righteous’ by transformation, or imparting of moral strength by which moral perfection may be attained. Justification must be taken as the old protestant dogmatists rightly took it, in a forensic or imputative sense. God justifies for Christ’s sake (ch. iii. 22 ff.) on condition of faith in Him as Mediator: the result of His justification is ‘righteousness by faith,’ and as He imparts it freely, it is ‘the righteousness of God,’ or from God (so it ought to be), Phil. iii. 9. ‘The righteousness of God’ is ordinarily taken for that which is righteousness with God in God's sight; compare ch. ii, 3, iii. 20; Gal. iii. 11; but that this is at least not necessary, see 2 Cor. v. 21. This justification is certainly an objective act of God: but it must also be subjectively apprehended (i. e. within him who is the subject of it), as its condition is subjective, i.e. dependent on such inner reception by its subject. It is the acquittal from guilt, and cheerfulness of conscience, attained through faith in God's grace in Christ,—the very frame of mind which would be proper to a perfectly righteous man—if such there were,—the harmony of the spirit with God,—peace with God. All interpretations which overlook the fact of imputation are erroneous.” To say, with Jowett, that all attempts to define the righteousness of God are “the afterthoughts of theology, which have no real place in the interpretation of Scripture,” is in fact to shut our eyes to the great doctrinal facts of Christianity, and float off at once into uncertainty about the very foundations of the Apostle’s argument and our own faith.

is revealed] The verb in the original is generally used of making known a thing hitherto concealed: but here of that gradually more complete realization of the state of justification before God by faith in Christ, which is the continuing and increasing gift of God to the believer in the gospel.

from faith] “from points to the condition, or the subjective ground. Faith is in the sense of trust, and that (1) a trustful assumption of a truth in reference to knowledge,—which is equivalent to conviction: (2) a trustful surrender of the soul, as regards the feeling. Here it is especially the latter of these: that trust reposed in God’s grace in Christ, which tranquillizes the soul and frees it from all guilt,—and especially trust in the atoning death of Jesus. Bound up with this (not by the meaning of the words, but by the idea of unconditional trust, which excludes all reserve) is humility, consisting in the abandonment of all merits of a man’s own, and recognition of his own unworthiness and need of redemption.” De Wette.

unto faith] i.e. to him that believes. This seems the most probable interpretation, making faith almost equivalent to the person possessing faith, see ch. iii. 22: but not entirely,—it is still the aspect, the phase, of the man, which is receptive of the righteousness of God, and to this it is revealed. The other principal interpretation—‘proceeding from faith, and leading to a higher degree of faith’—does not seem so suitable or forcible.

even as it is written] He shews that righteousness by faith is no new idea, but found in the prophets. The words are cited again in Gal. iii. 11; Heb. x. 38: in the former place with the same purpose as here. They are used in Habakkuk with reference to credence given to the prophetic word: but properly speaking, all faith is one, in whatever word or act of God reposed: so that the Apostle is free from any charge of forcing the words to the present purpose. There are two ways of arranging them: the righteous shall live by faith, and the righteous by faith, he who is righteous by faith, shall live. But in fact they amount to the same: if the former, which is more agreeable to the Heb., be taken, shall live must mean, ‘shall live on, endure in his righteousness, by means of faith,’ which would assert that it was a righteousness of faith, as strongly as does the latter. Delitzsch says, “The Apostle rests no more on our text than it will bear, He only places its assertion, that the life of the just springs from his faith, in the light of the New Test.”

CHAP. I. 18—XI. 36.] THE DOCTRINAL EXPOSITION OF THE ABOVE TRUTH: THAT THE GOSPEL IS THE POWER OF GOD UNTO SALVATION TO EVERY ONE THAT BELIEVETH. And herein,—inasmuch as this power of God consists in the revelation of God’s righteousness in man by faith, and in order to faith the first requisite is the recognition of man’s unworthiness, and incapability to work a righteousness for himself,—the Apostle begins by proving that all, Gentiles and Jews, are GUILTY before God, as holding back the truth in un-righteousness, ch. i. 18—iii. 20. And First, ch. i, 18–32, OF THE GENTILES.

18.] He first states the general fact, of all mankind; but immediately passes off to the consideration of the majority of mankind, the Gentiles; reserving the Jews for exceptional consideration afterwards.

the wrath of God is revealed] The statement of ver. 17 was, that the RIGHTEOUSNESS of GOD is revealed. The necessary condition of this revelation is, the DESTRUCTION of the righteousness of MAN by the revelation of God’s anger against sin.

is revealed, not in the Gospel: not in men’s consciences: not in the miserable state of the then world: but (as implied indeed by the adjunct from heaven,—that it is a providential, universally-to-be-seen revelation) in the PUNISHMENTS which, ver. 24, God, has made to follow upon sin, see also ch. ii. 2. So that revealed is said of an objective reality here, not of an evangelic internal and subjective unfolding.

the wrath of God is put, but with the deepest truth, for the righteousness of God in punishment (see ch. ii. 8; v. 9; Eph. ii. 3; Matt. iii. 7; John iii. 36). It is the opposite, in the divine attributes, of Love.

ungodliness] (i. e. godlessness, living without God),—and unrighteousness (i. e. iniquity, injustice of thought and conduct). Neither term is exclusive of the other, nor to be formally pressed to its limits. They overlap and include each other by a large margin: the specific difference being, that ungodliness is more the fountain (but at the same time partially the result) of unrighteousness,—which unrighteousness is more the result (but at the same time partially the fountain) of ungodliness. Unrighteousness is the state of the thoughts and feelings and habits, induced originally by forgetfulness of God, and in its turn inducing impieties of all kinds. We may notice by the way, that the word ungodliness forms an interesting link to the Pastoral Epistles, where it, and its opposite, godliness, are the ordinary terms for an unholy and a holy life.

of men, who hold down (or hold back) the truth in unrighteousness] who, possessing enough of the germs of religious and moral verity to preserve them from abandonment, have checked the development of this truth in their lives, in the love and practice of sin. That this is the meaning here is plain: see the discussion in my Greek Testament.

This meaning, ‘keeping back,’ ‘hindering the development of, admirably suits the sense, that men had (see vv. 19 ff.) knowledge of God sufficient, if its legitimate work had been allowed, to have kept them from such excesses of enormity as they have committed, but that this truth they held down, or back, in unrighteousness, i.e. crushed, quenched, in (as the element, conditional medium) their state and practice of unrighteousness. It is plain that to take in unrighteousness for unrighteously, is to miss the force of the expression altogether—the pregnant ‘in and by’ implying that it is their unrighteousness,—the very absence of righteousness for which the argument contends,—which is the state wherein, and the instrument whereby they hold back the truth lit up in their consciences.

19.] because may either give the reason why the anger of God is revealed, and thus apply to all that follows as far as ver. 32, being taken up again at vv. 21, 24, 26, 28: or may explain the phenomena of these men holding back the truth in unrighteousness: which latter seems most probable: the words understood being, ‘(this charge I bring against them,) because.’ For he proves, first (ver. 20) that they had the truth; then (vv. 21 ff.) that they held it back.

that which is known, the objective knowledge patent and recognized in Creation:—not, as A.V., inconsistently with the meaning of the word in the original, ‘that which may be known,’ which would assert what, as simple matter of fact, was not the case, that all which could be known of God was manifest in them. He speaks now not of what they might have known of God, but of what they did know. Thus the expression will mean, that universal objective knowledge of God as the Creator, which we find more or less in every nation under heaven, and which, as matter of historical fact, was proved to be in possession of the great Gentile nations of antiquity. is manifest in them, i.e. in their hearts: not, to them,—nor, among them, for if it had been a thing acknowledged among them, it would not have been held back. Every man has in him this know-for God manifested it unto them] gives the reason why that which is known of God is manifest in them, viz. because God Himself so created the world, as to leave impressed on it this testimony to Himself.—Notice, and keep to, the historic tense: not, as A.V., ‘hath manifested it,’ but manifested it, viz. at the Creation. This is important for the right understanding of the words “from the creation of the world,” ver. 20.

20.] For (justifying the clause preceding) his invisible attributes from the time of the creation, when the manifestation was made by God, are perceived.

being understood (apprehended by the mind) by means of His works (of creation and sustenance,—not here of moral government). The rendering of the A.V., ‘being understood by the things that are made,’ is ambiguous, being capable of conveying the sense that the things which are made, understand them.

his eternal power] To this the evidence of Creation is plainest of all: Eternal, and Almighty, have always been recognized epithets of the Creator.

and divinity] not Godhead: the fact that the Creator is divine;—is of a different nature from ourselves, and accompanied by distinct attributes, and those of the highest order,—which we call divine.

so that they are without excuse] The words may be also, and more literally, rendered, that they may be without excuse. But, however true it is, that in the doings of the Allwise, all results are purposed,—the sense ‘in order that they might be inexcusable,’ would be manifestly contrary to the whole spirit of the argument, which is bringing out, not at present God’s sovereignty in dealing with man, but man’s inexcusableness in holding back the truth by unrighteousness. Chrysostom says, “God has not done this for this express purpose, even though it has so turned out. For He did not put this knowledge of Himself forth in order to deprive them of all excuse, but in order that they might know Him: they, by forgetting Him, deprived themselves of all excuse.”

21. because] This assigns the reason why they were without excuse.

though they knew God] ie. ‘with the knowledge of Him above stated? This testifies plainly that matter of fact, and not of possibility, has been the subject of the foregoing verses. From this point, we take up what they MIGHT HAVE DONE, but DID NOT. They glorified Him not as GOD, i.e. they did not by worship recognize Him as the great Creator of all, distinct from and infinitely superior to all His works. Bengel well divides glorifying and giving of thanks. “We are bound to give God thanks for benefits, but to glorify Him for His own divine attributes.” They did neither: in their religion, they deposed God from His place as Creator,—in their lives, they were ungrateful by the abuse of His gifts.

their reasonings] not, as A.V., ‘imaginings, which the word never signifies. It is used generally in N.T. in a bad sense: they became vain (idle, foolish) in their speculations.

their heart] the whole inner man,—the seat of knowledge and feeling,—being without understanding (especially in not retaining God in its knowledge) became dark (lost the little light it had, and wandered blindly into the mazes of folly).

22, while they professed themselves wise—professing themselves to be wise] The words relate perhaps not. so much to the schools of philosophy, as to the assumption of wisdom by the Greeks in general, see 1 Cor. i. 22, of which assumption their philosophers were indeed eminent, but not the only examples.

23. changed, &c.] Quoted from Ps. cvi. 20,—only ‘their glory,’ of the Psalm, is changed to ‘God’s glory,’—viz. His Power and Majesty visible in the Creation, for is literally in, and represents the conditional element in which the change subsisted.

uncorruptible and corruptible shew by contrast the folly of such a substitution: He who made and upholds all things must be uncorruptible, and no corruptible thing can express His likeness.

an image of] literally, the similitude of the form,—not of any one particular man, but of man (examples being abundant), to which they degraded God,—and so of the other creatures. Deities of the human form prevailed in Greece—those of the bestial in Egypt. Both methods of worship were practised in Rome.

24–32.] Immorality, and indeed bestiality, were the sequel of idolatry.

24.] The also may import, A s they advanced in departure from God, so God also on His part gave them up, &c.;—His dealings with them had a progression likewise.

gave them up] not merely permissive, but judicial: God delivered them over. As sin begets sin, and darkness of mind deeper darkness, grace gives place to judgment, and the divine wrath hardens men, and hurries them on to more fearful degrees of depravity.

in the desires, or lusts] not by nor through the lusts (as Erasmus and A.V.);—the lusts of the heart were the field of action, the department of their being, in which this dishonour took place.

uncleanness] more than mere profligacy in the satisfaction of natural lust; and see ver. 26, where a similar term, to dishonour, is used in the original:—bestiality, impurity in the physical, not only in the social and religious sense.

to dishonour] The infinitive mood may imply either (1) the purpose of God's delivering them over to impurity, 'that their bodies should be dishonoured', or (2) the result of that delivering over, 'so that their bodies were dishonoured', or (3) the nature of the impurity, as below, in ver. 26,—'impurity, which consisted in their bodies being dishonoured.' The second of these seems most accordant with the usage of the Apostle and with the argument. The clause may be, and with more probability, rendered, so that their bodies were dishonoured among them.

25.] This verse casts light on the holding back (or down) the truth in unrighteousness of ver. 18. The truth of God (the true notion of Him as the Creator) which they professed, they changed into a lie (the word 'lie' is used of idols, Jer. xvi. 19), thus counteracting its legitimate agency, and depriving it of all power for good. The word rendered worshipped is used of the honour of respect and observance and reverence,—that rendered served, of formal worship with sacrifice and offering.

the creature] the thing made, a general term for all objects of idolatrous worship.

rather than] or beyond, which would amount to the exclusion of the Creator; not, as A.V., more than, which would only imply that they gave to the one a greater amount of service than to the other.—The doxology expresses the horror of the Apostle at this dishonour, and puts their sin in a more striking light.

26.] literally, passions of dishonour: see above, ver. 24, stronger than shameful passions, as setting forth the condition to which the passions belonged. Contrast 1 Thess. iv. 4, "to possess himself of his own vessel in honour." the recompence] The Apostle treats this degradation into which they fell, as a consequence of a retribution for, their departure from God into idolatry,—with which in fact it was closely connected. This shame, and not its consequences, which are not here treated of, is the recompence of their error, their aberration from the knowledge of God, which they received. This is further shewn by the verb which was meet, in the past tense. If there had been no hell, nor any punishment threatened, this alone was worse than any punishment. And if even in this they found pleasure, why this very pleasure was an accession of punishment.

28.] There is, in the original, a play on words in this place, which can hardly be expressed in any other language. Because they reprobated the knowledge of God, God gave them over to a reprobate mind, is indeed a very inadequate, but as far as the form of the two words is concerned, an accurate representation of it. Mr. Conybeare gives it—“As they thought fit to cast out the acknowledgment of God, God gave them over to an outcast mind.”

reprobate means rejected by God. God withdrew from them His preventing grace, and left them to the evil which they had chosen. God did not give them up to a mind which had, but to a mind judicially abandoned to that depravity which, being well able to exercise the faculty of discernment required, not only does not do so, but in the headlong current of its abandonment to evil, sympathizes with and encourages (ver. 32) its practice in others. It is the seeing and approving better things, which makes the following worse things so peculiarly criminal.

they did not choose to retain] equivalent to they chose not to retain: the latter would express more a deliberate act of the judgment ending in rejection of God, whereas the text charges them with not having exercised that judgment which would, if exercised, have led to the retention of God in their knowledge.

to retain God in their knowledge] So Job xxi. 14,—“they say to God, Depart from us: for we desire not the knowledge of thy ways,” and xxii. 15–17. 29–31.] The word “fornication,” found in some authorities here, and in others elsewhere in the list, is omitted in our earliest and best MSS. The Apostle can hardly have written it here, treating as he does all these immoralities of the heart and conscience as results of, and flowing from, the licentious practices of idolatry above specified.— Accurate distinctions of ethical meaning can hardly be found for all these words. Without requiring such, or insisting on each excluding the rest, I have collected the most interesting notices respecting them.

unrighteousness] Perhaps a general term, comprehending all that follow: such would be according to the usage of the Epistle: but perhaps to be confined to the stricter import of injustice: of which on the part of the Romans, history gives abundant testimonies.

wickedness] This term is interpreted to mean the disposition to work evil: and is used therefore more of the tempter and seducer to evil.

covetousness (not as 1 Thess. iv. 6, see there), of which the whole provincial government and civil life of the Romans at the time was full. “When was the lap of avarice more widely spread?” exclaims Juvenal, soon after this.

maliciousness] The word thus rendered really means more the passive side of evil—the capability of and proclivity to evil,— the opposite to virtue.

whisperer s] i.e. secret maligners; “backbiters” indicates open slanderers. The word rendered “haters of God,” is never found in this active sense, but always in a passive, hated by God; and such is apparently the sense here. The order of crimes enumerated would be broken, and one of a totally different kind inserted between slanderers and insolent, if this word is to signify ‘haters of God.’ But on the other supposition,—if any crime was known more than another as ‘hated by the gods,’ it was that of informers, abandoned persons who circumvented and ruined others by a system of malignant espionage and false information. And the crime was one which the readers of this part of Roman history know to have been the pest of the state; Tacitus, for example, calls the informers, “persons favoured by the Prince, but hateful to God.” It does not follow that the informers only are intended, but the expression may be used to include all those abandoned persons who were known as hated by the gods, who were employed in pursuits hateful and injurious to their kind.

insolent] The word so rendered is opposed by the Greek writers to that indicating ‘a discreet and modest man: but here perhaps, and also as said by St. Paul of himself, 1 Tim. i. 13, it designates one who is insolent, ‘an insulting person.’

proud] The word so rendered is said to point out one who despises others in comparison with himself. Aristotle mentions insolence and pride as examples of qualities consequent on wealth.

boasters] “One who is rash, and claims a high character for bravery,” says Aristotle of the meaning of this word; and in another place, “the boaster seems to be one who appropriates credit to himself, when it does not belong to him, and greater than belongs to him. All exaggeration, and excessive depreciation, belong to the character of the boaster.”

without (moral) understanding] See Col. i. 9.

without natural affection] Petronius says of Rome, “In this city no one brings up children, because a man who has heirs of his own is not invited as a guest at feasts or at spectacles.”

32.] The Apostle advances to the h ighest grade of moral abandonment,—the knowledge of God’s sentence against such crimes, united with the contented practice of them, and encouragement of them in others.

the righteous judgment of God] the sentence of God, unmistakeably pronounced in the conscience; viz. that they who do such things are worthy of death: this is the sentence, and must not be enclosed in a parenthesis.

worthy of death: of what sort of death? Probably “death” is a general term for the fatal consequence of sin: that such courses lead to ruin. The word can hardly be pressed to its exact meaning: for many of the crimes mentioned could never be visited with judicial capital punishment in this world: nor could the heathen have any definite idea of eternal spiritual death, as the penalty attached to sin; nor again, any idea of the connexion between sin and natural death. “Life and Death,” remarks Umbreit, “are ever set over against one another in the Old as well as in the New Testament, the one as including all good that can befall us, the other, all evil.” The description here given by the Apostle of the moral state of the heathen world should by all means be compared with that in Thucydides, at the end of his third book, of the moral state of Greece at the end of the fourth year of the Peloponnesian war. ‘The English reader will find it in Hobbes’s Translation; and a summary of it in Grote’s History of Greece, vol. vi. ch. 50, pp. 375–384. The English historian gives only the political side of the description. There is also a remarkable passage in the Apocryphal Wisdom of Solomon, ch. xiv. 22–31, the opening of which is strikingly similar to our text.

CHAP II. 1–29.] Secondly, THE SAME, that all are guilty before God, IS PROVED OF THE JEWS ALSO. And first, verses 1–11, no man (the practice of the Jews being hinted at) must condemn another, for all alike are guilty.

1.] The address passes gradually to the Jews. They were the people who judged—who pronounced all Gentiles to be born in sin and under condemnation:—doubtless there were also proud and censorious men among the Gentiles, to whom the rebuke might apply, but these are hardly in the Apostle's mind. This is evident by comparing the charge, “thou that judgest does the same things,” with verses 21–23, where the same charge is implied in a direct address to the Jew.

Wherfore] On account of this “righteous judgment of God,” decreeing death against the doers of these things—FOR thou doest them thyself. Therefore thy setting thyself up as a judge is unjustifiable.

whosoever thou art that judgest] The Jew is not yet named, but hinted at. (see above): not in order to conciliate the Jews, but on account of the as yet purposely general form of the argument. This verse is in fact the major of a syllogism, the minor of which follows, verses 17–20, where the position here declared to be unjustifiable, is asserted to be assumed by the Jew.

for wherein] i.e. ‘in the matter in which.’

2. according to truth] i.e. proceeds according to justice (John viii. 16).

3.] Here he approximates nearer to the Jews. They considered that because they were the children of Abraham, they should be saved, see Matt. iii. 7, 9.

this] viz., that thou shalt escape, following. Thou, in the latter clause of the verse, has the emphasis on it, thou thyself,—‘thou above all others.’

4. or] (introducing a new error or objection, see ch. iii. 29; vi. 3; xi. 2), ‘inasmuch as God spares thee day by day (see Eccles. viii. 11), dost thou set light by His long-suffering, ignorant that His intent in it is to lead thee to repentance?’ the riches] A favourite word with the Apostle (see reff.)—the fulness, ‘abundance.’

goodness, as shewn by His forbearance and long-suffering.

not knowing—being blind to the truth, that... some would render it ‘not considering:’ but it is a wilful and guilty ignorance, not merely an inconsiderateness, which is blamed in the question.

is leading thee] This is its intent and legitimate course, which thy blindness will frustrate.

5.] I am inclined to regard the question as continued. But the enquiry loses itself in the digressive clauses following, and nowhere comes pointedly to an end. I have therefore not placed a mark of interrogation at the end of ver. 4 or of ver. 5, but have left the construction to explain itself.

after] ie. ‘i n consonance with,’—describing the state out of which the action springs.

impenitent] i.e. not admitting that repentance, that change of mind (for this is the meaning of the word) to which God is leading thee.

wrath in the day of wrath] ‘wrath which shall come upon thee in that day.’ The day of wrath is the day of judgment, viewed in its relation to sinners.

the revelation, or manifestation (public enforcement, it having been before latent though determined) of God's righteous judgment (see ch. i. 32).

6, 7.] This retribution must be carefully kept in its place in the argument. The Apostle is here speaking generally, of the general system of God in governing the world,—the judging according to each man's works—punishing the evil, and rewarding the righteous. No question at present arises, how this righteousness in God's sight is to be obtained—but the truth is only stated broadly at present, to be further specified by and by, when it is clearly shewn that by works of the law no flesh can be justified before God. The neglect to observe this has occasioned two mistakes: (1) an idea that by this passage it is proved that not faith only, but works also in some measure, justify before God; and (2) an idea that by “well-doing” here is meant faith in Christ. However true it be, so much is certainly not meant here, but merely the fact, that every where, and in all, God punishes evil, and rewards good.

7, 8.] The more literal rendering of these verses is, To those who by endurance in good works seek for glory and honour and immortality (will He render) eternal life: but to those who are (men) of self-seeking, and disobey the truth, but obey iniquity (shall accrue) anger and wrath, &c. The term rendered well-doing is singular, good work: indicating moral habitude in the whole, the general course of life and action.

glory, absolute imparted glory like His own, see Matt. xiii. 43; John xvii. 22:—honour, recognition, relative precedence, see Matt. x. 32; xxv. 34:—immortality, literally, in corruptibility: so the aim of the Christian athlete is described, 1 Cor. ix. 25, as being to obtain an in corruptible crown.

8.] (literally) to those who are of self-seeking: those who live in, act from, are situated in, and do their deeds from a spirit of ambitious seeking of their own interests,—for such is the meaning of the original word.

do not obey the truth] Hinder (see ch. i. 18) the truth which they possess from working, by self-abandonment to iniquity.

indignation (or anger) and wrath] The former word denotes the abiding, settled mind of God towards them (the anger of God abideth upon him, John iii. 36),—and the latter, the outbreak of that anger at the great day of retribution.

9.] tribulation and anguish (or distress): the former signifies more the outward weight of objective infliction,—the latter the subjective feeling of the pressure. It is possible, in the case of the suffering Christian, for the former to exist without the latter: so 2 Cor. iv. 8, troubled on every side, yet not distressed,—where the Greek words are the same. But here the objective weight of infliction and the subjective weight of anguish, are co-existent.

upon every soul of man] Probably a circumlocution for the sake of emphasis and solemnity. Had it been to indicate that the soul is the suffering part of the man, it should have been upon the soul of every man, or, upon every soul of men.

the Jew first] Because the Jew has so much greater advantages, and better opportunities of knowing the divine will: and, therefore, pre-eminent responsibility.

10. peace] Here in its highest and most glorious sense: see ch. 6, x. 15; John xiv. 27.

11.] This remark serves as the transition to what follows, not merely as the confirmation of what went before. As to what preceded, it asserts that though the Jew has had great advantages, he shall be justly judged for his use of them, not treated as a favourite of Heaven: as to what follows, it introduces a comparison, between him and the Gentile to shew how fairly he will be, for those greater advantages, regarded as first in responsibility. And thus we gradually (see note on ver. 1) pass to the direct comparison between him and the Gentile, and consideration of his state.

12–16.] The justice of a GENERAL judgment of ALL, but according to the advantages of each.

12. For as many as have sinned without (the) law (of Moses) shall also perish without (the) law (of Moses)] i.e. it shall not appear against them in judgment. Whether that will ameliorate their case, is not even hinted,—but only the fact, as consonant with God's justice, stated. That this is the meaning of without law is clear from 1 Cor. ix. 21. That even these have sinned against a law is presently (ver. 14) shewn. Chrysostom says, “The Greek is judged without law: this implies not a more severe, but a milder judgment (this is perhaps saying too much, see above), that is, he has not the law to accuse him. This is the meaning of without law, that he is convicted without its condemnation, by the arguments of nature only. But the Jew is judged by the law, ie. the law also, together with nature, accusing him: for the greater care he had bestowed on him, the greater will be his penalty.” It is said, shall perish, the result of the judgment on them, rather than “shall be judged,” its process, because the absence of the law would thus seem as if it were the rule by which they are to be judged,—whereas it is only an accident of that judgment, which depends on other considerations.

under (or in, as a condition of being) the (Mosaic) law; not ‘a law,’ which would make the sentence a truism: it is on that very undeniable assumption, ‘that all who have had a law given shall be judged by that law,’ that the Apostle constructs his argument, asserting it with to the Mosaic law in the ease of the Jews, and proving that the Gentiles have had a law given to them in the testimony of their consciences. These verses are no general assertions concerning men who have, and men who have not, a law revealed (for all have one), but a statement of the case as concerning Jews and Gentiles. It may safely be assumed that whenever the word “law” is used, without any further definition, in this Epistle, the law of Moses is intended by it. These last shall be judged by the law: for that will furnish the measure and rule by which judgment will proceed.

13.] This is to explain to the Jew the fact, that not his mere hearing of the law read in the synagogue, (which is equivalent to his being by birth and privilege a Jew,) will justify him before God, but (still keeping to general principles, and not toning it down) as yet on the impossibility of being thus justified) the doing of the law.

14.] Now, the Apostle speaks of the Gentiles in general; see ch. iii. 29; xi. 13; xv. 10, 12.

the law] viz. of Moses. A law, they have; see below. by nature, i.e. in accordance with the promptings of their own minds.

the things of the law] i.e. the things about which the law is concerned: for example, abstain from stealing, or killing, or adultery. But it by no means follows that the Apostle means that the Gentiles could fulfil the law, do the things, i.e. all the things enjoined by the law: he argues that a conscientious Gentile, who knows not the law, does, when he acts in accordance with requirements of the law, so far set up the law to himself. The Apostle does not deny certain virtues to the Gentiles, but maintains the inefficiency of those, and all other virtues, towards man's salvation.

are the law unto themselves (so far), not 'a law', for a law may be just or unjust, God's law or man's law: there is but one law of God, partly written in men's consciences, more plainly manifested in the law of Moses, and fully revealed in Jesus Christ.

the work of the law is nearly equivalent to the things of the law above: but it is singular, as applying to each of the particular cases supposed in the words of the hypothesis above. If it had here been the works of the law, it might have been understood to mean the whole works of the law, which the inde-finite nature of the hypothesis prevents above.

written in their hearts] Alluding to the tables of stone on which the 'law was written: see a similar figure, 2 Cor. iii. 3.

their conscience bearing witness thereto] This is a new argument, not a mere continuation of 'the "shewing the work of the law" above. Besides their giving this example by actions consonant with the law, their own conscience, reflecting on the thing done, bears witness to it as good.

bearing witness thereto, i.e. confirming by its testimony, and signifying the agreement of the witness with the deed: perhaps also referring to the reflective process, in which a man confers, so to speak, with himself.

and their thoughts (judgments or reflections, the self-judging voices of the conscience, which being corrupted by sinful desires are often divided) among one another (i. e. thought against thought in inner strife) accusing or perhaps excusing (these two participles are absolute, describing the office of these judgments,—and nothing need be supplied, as 'them,' or 'their deeds'). Notice the similarity of this strife of conscience, and its testimony, as here described, to the higher and more detailed form of the same conflict in the Christian man, ch. vii. 16.

16.] To what has this verse reference? Hardly to that just preceding, which surely speaks of a process going on in this life (so however Chrysostom takes it. See also a fine passage in Bourdaloue's Sermons, vol. i. Serm. ii. p. 27, ed. Paris, 1854): nor, as commonly assumed, to the verb "shall be judged" (ver. 12), which only terminates one in a series of clauses connected by "for:"—but to the great affirmation of the passage, concluding with ver. 10. 'To this it is bound, it appears to me, by the words the secrets of men, answering to "every soul of man," ver. 9. This affirmation is the last sentence which has been in the dogmatic form:—after it we have a series of quasi-parenthetical clauses, carrying on the reasoning by for, vv. 11, 12, 13, 14. After it, the reasons, necessitated by the startling assertion, are one after another given, and, that having been done, the time is specified when the great retribution shall take place.

by Jesus Christ] viz. as the Judge—see John v. 22:—belongs to the verb shall judge. See also Acts xvii. 31.

according to (not belonging to the verb "shall judge," as the rule of judgment, but to the whole declaration, 'as taught in,' 'as forming part of') the Gospel entrusted to me to teach.

17–24.] The pride of the Jews in their law and their God contrasted with their disobedience to God and the law.

17. But if] The Greek for this, and for "behold," differ only by one letter. All our older MSS. have but if: and the other has been substituted for it in the later ones, possibly by mistake, possibly because the sentence with "if" seems at first sight not to be complete. But this incompleteness is more apparent than real. It is only produced by the resumption of the thread of the sentence with "therefore," ver. 21. Omit (in the sense) only that word, and all proceeds regularly—'But if thou art denominated a Jew, and &c..., thou that teachest thy neighbour, dost thou not teach thyself?' &c. The address in the second person carries on the apostrophe from ver. 5, since when it has been broken off by reference to the great day of retribution and its rule of judgment; the thou identifies the person addressed here as the same indicated there, and is here emphatic, as in ver. 1. Thus the Apostle by degrees sets in his place as a Jew the somewhat indefinite object of his remonstrances hitherto,—and reasons with him as such.

restest upon the law] The original word is one used of false trust; the Septuagint version uses it where we have “y et will they lean upon the Lord,” Micah iii. 11.

18. knowest his will] Literally, the will: God having been just mentioned, it is left to be inferred that the word will is to be referred to Him.

and approvest things that are more excellent; or, provest (in the sense of sifting and coming to a conclusion on) things which differ. The words may be rendered either way; but the translation in the text is preferable: the other being somewhat flat in meaning, and not so applicable.

being (habitually, not in youth only) instructed (not merely catechetically but didactically, in the synagogues, &c.) out of the law.

19. a guide of the blind] We can hardly say with Olshausen, that the Apostle undoubtedly refers to the saying of our Lord, Matt. xv. 14,—but rather that both that saying and this were allusive to a title “leaders of the blind” given to themselves by the Pharisees, with which St. Paul as a Pharisee would be familiar. Similarly, the following titles may have been well-known and formal expressions of Jewish pride with reference to those who were without the covenant.

20. the form] more properly, perhaps, the model: not the mere apparent likeness, but the real representation. The law, as far as it went, was a reflexion of the holiness and character of God. Hardly so much is here meant, as that the law contained a foreshadowing of Christ,—for the Apostle is speaking now more of moral truth and knowledge, by which a rule of judgment is set up, sufficient to condemn the Jew as well as the Gentile.—But after all, this clause is not to be pressed as declaring a fact, but taken subjectively with regard to the Jew, after the words “thou art confident,” and understood of his estimate of the law. 21.) “And even the righteous rebuke may no longer be restrained. Such advantages and such pretensions ought undoubtedly to be followed and justified by a corresponding course of holy conduct.” Ewbank.

22. thou that abhorrest idols, dost thou rob temples?] The contrast here must be maintained; which it will not be if we understand the question to apply to robbing the temple of God of offerings destined for Him (Jos. Ant. xviii. 3. 4). And the mention of abhorring idols leads into the kind of robbery which is meant. “Thou who abhorrest idols, dost thou rob their temples?” That it was necessary to vindicate the Jews from such a charge, appears from Acts xix. 37: and Josephus gives as a law, not to rob strange temples, nor take any offering dedicated by name to any god.

24.] ‘For what is written in the prophets Isaiah and Ezekiel (see reff.), is no less true now of you:’ ‘the fact is so, as it is written.’

25–29.] Inasmuch us CIRCUMCISION was the especial sign of the covenant, and as such, a distinction on which the Jewish mind dwelt with peculiar satisfaction: the Apostle sets forth, that circumcision without the keeping of the law is of no avail, and that true circumcision and true Judaism are matters of the heart, not of the flesh only. “But,” says the replier, ‘circumcision is a great fact.’ ‘I confess it,’ rejoins the Apostle, ‘but WHEN? When a man has that which is inward in the heart’ And see here the Apostle’s wisdom, how fittingly he has introduced his argument about it. He did not begin with it at once, since it was held in great estimation: but when he has shewn that they were offenders in a still greater matter, and were guilty of blasphemy towards God, then at length, having secured his readers’ condemnation of them, and having lowered them from their preeminence, he introduces his argument about circumcision, confident that no one ever will be found as its unlimited apologist.” Chrysostom.

25. is become uncircumcision] i.e. counts for nothing: the Jewish transgressor is no better off than the Gentile transgressor.

26. the uncircumcision] i.e. those who are in the state of uncircumcision.

the ordinances] Plainly the moral requirements, not the ceremonial: for one of the very first of the latter was, to be circumcised. The case is an impossible one: nor does the Apostle put it as possible, only as shewing manifestly, that circumcision, the sign of the covenant of the Law, was subordinate to the keeping of the Law itself.

shall not, &c.] i.e. “In such a case would not he be counted as a circumcised person?”

27.] I prefer to regard this verse not as a continuation of the question, but as a separate emphatic assertion, and as leading the way to the next verse.

the uncircumcision which is by nature] i.e. ‘he, who remains in his natural state of uncircumcision’ if it fulfil the law] Such is the supposition—that an uncircumcised man could fully act up to the (moral) requirements of the law.

judge, i.e. ‘rise up in judgment against,’ judge indirectly by his example. See Matt. xii. 41, 42, where the more definite word ‘condemn’ is used in a sense precisely similar.

through is here used of the state in which the man is when he does the act, regarded as the medium through which the act is done. The “by” of the A.V. gives too much the idea of the state being the instrument, by means of which.

29.] inwardly or in secret, as a qualification of the Jew, is parallel with of the heart as a qualification of circumcision: both designating the inner and spiritual reality, of which the name of Jew and the carnal circumcision are only the signs.—“Circumcision of the heart” is no new expression:—we have it virtually in Deut. x. 16; Jer. iv. 4: see also Acts vii. 51.

in the spirit, not in the letter] Not merely ‘spiritually, not externally?’ nor does the word “spirit” allude to the necessitating cause of circumcision (the uncleanness of the inner man):—nor signify the material; nor the rule; but the living power or element, wherewith that inner sphere of being is filled,—in being used as in Acts xvii. 28, of that in which any thing lives and moves,—comp. “j oy in the Holy Ghost,” ch. 17,—“love in the spirit,” Col. i. 8,—“to serve in newness of spirit,” ch. vii. 6,—“to be in the spirit,” ch. viii. 9. So that the spirit here is not man’s spirit, nor properly the Holy Spirit, but the spirit, as opposed to the letter, of the Jewish law and of all God’s revelation of Himself.

whose praise] viz. of the true Jew: the circumcision of the heart, as belonging to him, is subordinate.—The praise of such a character, (for praise it must be,) can only come from Him who sees in secret (Matt. vi. 4, 6), and can discern the heart.

III. 1–20.] TAKING INTO ALL FAIR ACCOUNT THE REAL ADVANTAGES OF THE JEWS, THESE CANNOT, BY THE TESTIMONY OF SCRIPTURE ITSELF CONCERNING THEM, EXEMPT THEM FROM THIS SENTENCE OF GUILTINESS BEFORE GOD, IN WHICH ALL FLESH ARE INVOLVED.

1–4.] The circumcised Jew did unquestionably possess great advantages, which were not annulled by the rebellion of some.

1.] then, i.e. seeing that things are so. If true Judaism and true circumcision be merely spiritual, what is the profit of external Judaism and ceremonial circumcision?

advantage] profit, pre-eminence. It is best to take the question, not as coming from an objector, which supposition has obscured several parts of this Epistle, but as asked by the Apostle himself, anticipating the thoughts of his reader.

2.] The words, much every way, answer the first question of ver. 1, but take no account of the second, as it is virtually included in the first. Nor can it be properly regarded as answered in ch. iv. 1 ff. (see there.)

every way] i.e. in all departments of the spiritual life.

first indeed] The Apostle begins as if intending to instance several of these advantages, but having mentioned the greatest, leaves it to his reader to fill in the rest, and turns to establish what he has just asserted. For the word here can only mean first;—‘secondly,’ &c., being to follow: not “chiefly” as A.V. and others. Compare a similar use of “first” without being followed by “second,” in ch. i. 8.

the oracles of God] These words look very like a reminiscence of Stephen’s apology, see Acts vii, 38. These oracles are not only the law of Moses, but all the revelations of God hitherto made of Himself directly, all of which had been entrusted to Jews only. By these they were received into a special covenant, which advantage is therefore included in their being entrusted with the divine oracles.

3.] And this advantage is not cancelled, nor the covenant annulled, by their disobedience. The word does not import ‘did not believe,’ which certainly would be out of place here, where the Apostle is not speaking of faith or want of faith as yet, but of unrighteousness (ver. 5), and moral guilt. The word seems to be used in the sense of were unfaithful to the covenant, the very condition of which was to walk in the ways of the Lord and observe his statutes.

shall their unfaithfulness make void (cancel, nullify) the faithfulness of God?] ‘Because they have broken faith on their part, shall God break faith also on His?’

4. God forbid] literally, let it not be: see reff. The Apostle uses this expression of pious horror, when he has supposed or mentioned any thing by which the honour, truth, or jus. ice of God would be compromised, as here by His covenant-word being broken.

nay, let God be true] i.e. ‘rather let us believe all men on earth to have broken their word and truth, than God His. Whatever becomes of men and their truth, His truth must stand fast.—The citation which follows goes to the depth of the matter. It is the penitent confession of a sinner, that he is sensible how entirely against God his sin has been, and how clearly his own unworthiness sets God’s judgment against sin vindicated before him. And to this meaning the objection in the next verse is addressed,—see below. That thou mightest be justified (shewn to be just) in thy words (sentences, words of judgment), and mightest overcome when thou art judged (the Psalm has, “in thy judging,” but here the verb is passive), i.e. ‘when Thy dealings are called in question by men.’

5.] In the citation, the penitent regarded his sin as having been the instrument of bringing out God’s justice into clearer light. On the abuse which might be made of such a view, the Apostle finds another question:—‘It would almost seem as if God would be unjust in inflicting His wrath (the consequences of His wrath) on men whose very impiety has been the means whereby His own righteousness has been shewn forth, and established.’

our unrighteousness] viz. that ‘of the Jews,’ not ‘of all men,’ for only to the Jews can ver. 7 apply.

the righteousness of God] viz. that established by the fact of His being justified, as in ver. 4.

I speak as a man] Said, as elsewhere by St. Paul, to excuse a supposition bearing with it an aspect of inconsistency or impiety:—not implying that he speaks in the person of another, but that he puts himself into the place of the generality of men, and uses arguments such as they would use.

6.] He does not enter into the objection and answer it in detail, but rejects at once the idea of God being unjust, alluding probably to Gen. xviii. 25, by recalling to mind, that the Judge of all the earth must do right.

for] i.e. ‘if it were so.’

By the world is not meant the Gentiles, nor is the respondent in ver. 7 a Gentile, but one of the us in ver. 5, only individualized to bring out one such case of pretended injustice more strikingly.

7.] This follows (connected by for) upon ver. 6, and shews that the supposition, if carried out, would overthrow all God’s judgment, and (ver. 8) the whole moral life of man.

how shall God judge the world? FOR, if the truth (faithfulness) of God abounded (was manifested, more clearly established) by means of my falsehood (unfaithfulness), to His glory (so that the result was the setting forth of His glory), why any longer (this being so,—assuming the premises) am I also (i. e. as well as others,—am I to be involved in a judgment from which I ought to be exempt) judged (to be judged,—the present tense expressing the rule or habit of God’s proceeding) as a sinner? And (why should we) not (in this case rather say), as we (I Paul, or we Christians) are slanderously reported, and as some give out that we (do) say, “Let us do evil that good may come?” whose condemnation (not that of our slanderers, but that of those who so say and act) is just (not only by the preceding argument, but by the common detestation of all men, for such a maxim as doing evil that good may come.)

9–20.] The Jew has no preference, but is guilty as well as the Gentile, as shewn by Scripture; so that no man can by the law be righteous before God.

9.] There is considerable difficulty in the verb rendered, do we excel them? I have fully discussed the various renderings in my Greek Test., and have decided for that in the text.

10–18.] Proof of this universal sinfulness from the Scripture, said directly (ver. 19) of the Jews, but a portion including, and taken for granted of, the Gentiles.

11.] In the Psalm,—Jehovah looked down from heaven on the children of men, to see whether there were any, &c. He found none. This result is put barely by the Apostle as the testimony of Scripture, giving the sense, but departing from the letter.

13.] The open sepulchre is an emblem of perdition, to which their throat, as the instrument of their speech, is compared.

19.] He proves the applicability of these texts to the Jews by their being found in the Jewish Scriptures: not in any Gentile representation, which might exclude Jews, but spoken universally, in those very books which were the cherished possession of the Jews themselves.

the law] Here used in the widest sense, as importing the whole O.T., the law, prophets, and Psalms: see John x. 34, where our Lord cites a Psalm as in ‘the law,’ it speaketh] Not merely “saih,” the verb is different the second time, and the sense is, that whatever the law says, its speech or address is to, or for, i.e. its language belongs to, is true of, when not otherwise specified, those who are under (literally, in) the law. So that the Jews cannot plead exemption from this description or its consequences.

in order that—not ‘so that.’ the bringing in all the world guilty before God is an especial and direct aim of the revelation of God’s justice in the law,—that His grace by faith in Christ may come on all who abandon self-righteousness and believe the gospel.

every mouth may be stopped] If the Jew’s mouth is shut, and his vaunting in the law taken away, then much more the Gentile’s, and the whole world (see above, ver. 6) becomes guilty before God.

20.] The solemn and important conclusion of all the foregoing argument. But not only the conclusion from it: it is also the great truth, which when arrived at, is seen to have necessitated the subordinate conclusion of ver. 19, the stopping of every mouth, &c. And therefore it is introduced, not with an illative conjunction, ‘wherefore’ (which the original word will not bear), but with ‘because.’ Because by the works of the law (GOD’S LAW: whether in the partial revelation of it written in the consciences of the Gentiles, or in the more complete one given by Moses to the Jews,—not, by works of law: no such general idea of law seems to have ever been before the mind of the Apostle, but always the law, emanating from God) shall no flesh be justified before Him (the future as implying impossibility,—perhaps also as referring to the great day when all flesh shall stand before God,—perhaps also as a citation from Ps. cxliii. 2, “In thy sight shall no man living be justified”).—The Apostle does not here say either (1) that justification by legal works would be impossible if the law could be wholly kept, or (2) that those were not justified who observed the prescribed sacrifices and offerings of the ceremonial law (of which he has never once spoken, but wholly of the moral): but he infers from his argument on matters of fact, a result in matter of fact: ‘Mankind, Jew and Gentile, have all broken God’s law, and are guilty before Him: Man keeps not God’s law. By that law then he cannot arrive at God’s righteousness.’ for through (by means of) the law (as before, whether partially known to the Gentile or more fully to the Jew) is the knowledge of sin (whatever knowledge each has,—whether the accusing and excusing of the Gentile’s conscience, or the clearer view of offence against Jehovah granted to the Jew).—The reasoning is:—the law has no such office, in the present state of human nature manifested both in history and Scripture, as to render righteous: its office is altogether different, viz., to defect and bring to light the sinfulness of man. Compare Gal. ii. 16.

21–26.] The Apostle resumes the declaration of ch. i. 17 (having proved that man has no righteousness of his own resulting from “the observance of God’s law): viz. that God’s righteousness is revealed by Christ, whose atoning Death is, consistently with God’s justice, sufficient for the pardon of sin to those who believe in Him.

21. now] Is this meant of time, ‘now,’ in contradistinction to ages past, as in ver. 26, ‘at this time,’—or is it merely equivalent to ‘as things are, ‘now we find? The former is true in sense, and applicable to the circumstances of the gospel: but the meaning is too strong, where no contrast of time is expressly in view. I therefore prefer the latter, especially as St. Paul’s usage elsewhere justifies it; see ch. vii. 17; 1 Cor. xv. 20.

apart from (i. e. without the help of) the law] ‘independently of the law;’ not ‘without the works of the law:’ for here it is not the way to the righteousness of God which is spoken of (which is faith), but that righteousness itself.

the righteousness of God: in what sense, see ch. i. 17, and note.

hath been manifested] viz. in the facts of the gospel. The perfect tense sets forth the manifestation of this righteousness in history as an accomplished and still enduring fact,—on the other hand, the present tense in ch. i. 17 denotes the continual unfolding of this righteousness in the hearts and lives of faithful believers.

being witnessed] being borne witness to (present tense, because the law and prophets remain on record as a revelation of God’s will) by the law and the prophets (not merely the types and prophecies, but the whole body of the Old Testament; see Matt. xxii. 40).

22. unto all and upon all] these prepositions depend on the verb hath been manifested (is revealed); unto (‘towards,’ ‘so as to penetrate to’) all and upon (‘over,’ ‘so as to be shed down on,’ but, in the theological meaning, no real difference of sense from ‘unto;’ this repetition of prepositions to give force is peculiar to St. Paul, see ver. 30, and Gal. i. 1) all who believe. Probably the repetition of all was suggested by the two kinds of believers, “Jew and Gentile, so as to prepare the way for the next clause, “there is no distinction” (but still no essential difference in the interpretations of unto and upon must be sought).

23. fall short] The reason for substituting this for come short of the A.V. is this, the latter may be mistaken for the past tense, after the auxiliary ‘have,’ whereas it is present.

the glory of God here appears to mean, the praise that cometh of God: not ‘praise in God’s sight;’ nor ‘glory with God,’ as ch. v. 2; for the Apostle is not speaking here of future reward, but of present worthiness; nor the glorious image of God which we have lost through sin, which is against both the usage of the word, and the context of the passage.

24.] being justified (present here, not past) agrees with all, without any ellipsis; nor need it be resolved into ‘and we justified:’ the participial sentence is subordinated to the great general statement of the insufficiency of all to attain to the glory of God. It is not necessary, in the interpretation, that the persons importred by all and being justified should be in matter of fact strictly commensurate:—‘all have sinned—all are (must be, if justified) justified freely, &c.’

freely] ‘without merit or desert as arising from earnings of our own;’ ‘gratis.’

by his grace] i.e. ‘His free undeserved Love,’ as the working cause,—by means of the propitiatory redemption which is in (has been brought about by, and is now in the Person of) Christ Jesus.

redemption] A buying off by means of a price paid, a propitiation, &c., as necessarily implied, redemption from some state of danger or misery: here,—redemption from the guilt of sin by the propitiatory sacrifice of Christ’s death, see Matt. xx. 28. In Eph. i. 7 this redemption is defined to be equivalent to the forgiveness (remission) of sins.

25. set forth] Manifested historically in His incarnation, sufferings, and exaltation.

as a propitiation] Literally, as a propitiatory offering. On the word used, see note in my Greek Testament.

through faith, as the subjective means of appropriation of this propitiation. These words are not to be joined (in the A.V.) with “in his blood,” as if the faith were exercised on the atoning blood of: Christ:—for such an expression as faith, or believing, in the blood of Christ, would be unexampled,—and (which is decisive) the clause ought to be by his blood, and requires a primary, not asubordinate place in the sentence, because the next clause, “to declare his righteousness,” directly refers to it. As “through faith” is the subjective means of appropriation, so “by his blood” is the objective means of manifestation, of Christ as a propitiatory sacrifice. Blood is not equivalent to death, but refers to propitiation by blood,—the well-known typical use of it is sacrifice.

for the shewing forth of His righteousness: this is the aim of the putting forth of Christ as an expiatory victim.

righteousness, not truth,—not goodness,—not both these combined with justice,—not justifying, or sin-forgiving righteousness,—not the righteousness which He gives,—which last would repeat the idea already contained in ver. 21, and rob the words next following of all meaning,—not holiness, which does not correspond to the term just and justifier used below,—but judicial righteousness, JUSTICE. This interpretation alone suits the requirements of the sense, and corresponds to the idea of the verb to justify, which is itself judicial. A sin-offering betokens on the one side the expiation of guilt, and on the other ensures pardon and reconciliation: and thus the Death of Christ is not only a proof of God’s grace and love, but also of His judicial righteousness which requires punishment and expiation.

because of (not “for,” as A.V., nor “by means of”) both these renderings are wrong) the passing over of the former sins...] i.e. because God had overlooked the sins that had passed in His forbearance; and the words contain the reason why God would manifest His judicial righteousness; on account of the overlooking of the sins which had passed, in the forbearance of God; i.e. to vindicate that character for justice, which might seem, owing to the suspension of God’s righteous sentence on sin in former ages in His forbearance, to be placed in question:—to shew, that though He did not then fully punish for sin, and though He did then set forth inadequate means of (subjective) justification,—yet He did both, not because His justice was slumbering, nor because the nature of His righteousness was altered,—but because He had provided a way whereby sin might be forgiven, and He might be just. Observe, the facet mentioned is not forgiveness, or remission, as the A.V. erroneously renders it, but passing over, or overlooking, which is the work of forbearance (see Acts xvii. 30), whereas forgiveness is the work of grace,—see ch. ii. 4:—nor do the former sins mean, ‘the sins of each man which precede his conversion,’ but. those of the whole world before the death of Christ. See the very similar words, Heb. ix. 15.

26.] This second shewing forth is distinguished from that in the last verse, as the fuller and ultimate object, of which that was a subordinate part:—with a view to the (or His) manifestation of His righteousness in this present time. The shewing forth that He was righteous throughout His dealings with the whole world, by means of setting forth an adequate and complete propitiation in the death of Christ, was towards, formed a subsidiary manifestation to, His great manifestation of His righteousness (same sense as before,—judicial righteousness, justice under the Gospel).

(in order) that he may be (shewn to be:—the whole present concern is with the exhibitions to men of the righteousness of God) just and (yet, on the other side) the justifier of him who is of (the) faith in Jesus (him who belongs to, stands in, works from, as his standing-point, faith in Jesus: see ch. ii. 8, note, and reff.).

27-IV. 25.] JEWISH BOASTING ALTOGETHER REMOVED by this truth, NOT however BY MAKING VOID THE LAW, nor BY DEGRADING ABRAHAM FROM HIS PRE-EMINENCE, but BY ESTABLISHING THE LAW, and shewing that Abraham was really JUSTIFIED BY FAITH, and is the FATHER OF THE FAITHFUL.

27.] our (or, the) boasting, viz. of the Jews, of which he had spoken before, ch. ti.:—not ‘boasting’ in general, which will not suit ver. 29.

By what manner of law (is it excluded)? (is it by that) of works? Nay, but by the law (the rule) of faith. The contrast is not here between the law and the Gospel as two dispensations, but between the law of works and the law of faith, whether found under the law, or the Gospel, or (if the ease admitted) any where else. This is evident by the Apostle proving below that Abraham was justified, not by works, so as to have whereof to boast, but by faith.

28.] The verb implies, not ‘we conclude,’ but we hold, we reckon: the former is against New Test. usage; and has probably caused the change in some of our MSS. of for into therefore, by some who imagined that this verse was a conclusion from the preceding argument. For we reckon (as explanatory of the verse preceding,—on the other supposition the two verses are disjointed, and the conclusion comes in most strangely) t hat a man is justified by faith apart from (without; but more than without—so distinctly without, as to be utterly and entirely separate from and independent of) the works of the law (not works of law); and therefore boasting is excluded.

29.] In showing how completely Jewish boasting is excluded, St. Paul purposes to take* the ground of their own law, and demonstrate it from that. He will shew that God is not (the God) of Jews alone, but of Gentiles, and that this very point was involved in the promise made to Abraham, by believing which he was justified (ch. iv.), and therefore that it lies in the very root and kernel of the law itself. But, as often elsewhere, he passes off from this idea again and again, recurring to it however continually,—and eventually when he brings forward his proof text (in chap. iv. 17), Abraham's faith, and not this fact, has become the leading subject.

30. seeing that] literally, if at least (if we are to hold to what is manifest as a result of our former argument) God is one, which shall justify the circumcision (literally, the Jews, after the analogy of chap. ii. 26) by (out of, as the preliminary condition,—the state out of which the justification arises) f aith, and the uncircumcision (the Gentiles) through (by means of their) faith. Too much stress must not be laid on the difference of the two prepositions (see ver. 22 and note). The former expresses the ground of justification, generally taken, by, or out of faith: the latter the means whereby the man lays hold on justification, by his faith: the former is the objective ground, the latter the subjective medium.

31.] But again the Jew may object, if this is the case, if Faith be the ground, and Faith the medium, of justification for all, circumcised or uncircumcised, surely the law is set aside and made void. That this is not so, the Apostle both here asserts, and is prepared to shew by working out the proposition of ver. 29, that the law itself belonged to a covenant whose original recipient was justified by faith, and whose main promise was, the reception and blessing of the Gentiles.

the law] i.e. the law of Moses, as every where in the Epistle. We may safely say that the Apostle never argues of law, abstract, in the sense of a system of precepts,—its attributes or its effects,—but always of THE LAW, concrete,—the law of God given by Moses, when speaking of the Jews, as here: the law of God, in as far as written in their consciences, when speaking of the Gentiles: and when including both, the law of God generally, His written as well as His unwritten will.—Many Commentators have taken this verse (being misled in some cases by its place at the end of the chapter) as standing by itself, and have gone into the abstract grounds why faith, does not make void the law (or moral obedience); which, however true, have no place here: the design being to shew that the law itself contained this very doctrine, and was founded in the promise to Abraham on a covenant embracing Jews and Gentiles,—and therefore was not degraded from its dignity by the doctrine, but rather established as a part of God’s dealings,—consistent with, explaining, and explained by, the Gospel.

IV. 1–5.] Abraham himself was justified by faith.—The reading and punctuation of this verse present some difficulties. As to the former, I may remark that the verb hath found is omitted by our oldest MS. authority, and placed variously by others. Omitting it, the sentence will stand, “What shall we say then concerning Abraham, our father as pertaining to the flesh?” If the verb be retained, the punctuation may be, “What shall we say then? that Abraham, our father, as pertaining to the flesh, hath found” (righteousness, or some advantage over Gentiles)? This has been adopted by Grotius and others of some authority. Another mode, slightly differing, may be, “What then? shall we say, that,” &c. But as Tholuck well remarks, both these methods of punctuating would presuppose that St. Paul had appeared to give some reason in the preceding verses for imagining that Abraham had gained some advantage according to the flesh: which is not the case.

1. What then] The Apostle is here contending with those under the law from their own standing-point: and he follows up his assertion that his argument established the law, by what therefore (‘this being conceded,’ ‘seeing that you and I are both upholders of the law’) shall we say, &c. This verse, and the argument following, are not a proof, but a consequence, of we establish the law, and are therefore introduced, not with for, but with then or therefore.

hath found] viz. towards his justification, or more strictly, earned as his own, to boast of. The clause, as pertaining to the flesh, belongs to the verb hath found, not to the appellation “our father”? I have, in order to make this clear, transposed them. For the course and spirit of the argument is not to limit the paternity of Abraham to a mere fleshy one, but to shew that he was the spiritual father of all believers. And the question is not one which requires any such distinction between his fleshy and spiritual paternity (as in ch. ix. 3, 5). His being so, what do the words as pertaining to the flesh mean? They cannot allude to circumcision; for that is rendered improbable, not only by the parallel expression “by works” (ver. 2) in the plural, but also by the consideration, that circumcision was no work at all, but a seal of the righteousness which he had by faith being yet uncircumcised (ver. 11),—and by the whole course of the argument in the present place, which is not to disprove the exclusive privilege of the Jew (that having been already done, chapters ii. iii.), but to shew that the father and head of the race himself was justified not by works but by faith. Doubtless, in so far as circumcision was a mere work of obedience, it might be in a loose way considered as falling under that category: but it came after justification, and so is chronologically here excluded.

As pertaining to the flesh then is in contrast to as pertaining to the spirit,—and refers to that department of our being from which spring works, in contrast with that in which is the exercise of faith: see ch. viii. 4, 5.

2.] For if Abraham was justified (not, ‘were justified,’ as in A.V.: it is assumed, as a fact known to all, that he was justified by some means) by works, he hath ground of boasting (not expressed here whether in the sight of men, or of God, but taken generally: the proposition being assumed, ‘He that has earned justification by works, has whereof to boast’). Then in disproof of this,—that Abraham has matter of boasting,—whatever men might think of him, or attribute to him (for example, the perfect keeping of the law, as the Jews did), one thing at least is clear, that he has none before (in the presence of) God. This we can prove (ver. 3), for what saith the scripture? Abraham believed God (God’s promise), and it (his believing) was reckoned unto him for (ch. ii. 26) righteousness.—The whole question so much mooted between Protestants on the one hand, and Romanists, Arminians, and Sovinians on the other, as to whether this righteousness was reckoned (1) by means of faith, being God’s righteousness imputed to the sinner; or (2) on account of faith, so that God made Abraham righteous on account of the merit of his faith, lies in fact in a small compass, if what has gone before be properly taken into account. The Apostle has proved Jews and Gentiles to be all under sin: utterly unable by works of their own to attain to righteousness. Now faith, in the second sense mentioned above, is strictly and entirely a work, and as such would be the efficient cause of man’s justification,—which, by what has preceded, it cannot be. It will therefore follow, that it was not the act of believing which was reckoned to him as a righteous act, or on account of which perfect righteousness was laid to his charge, but that the fact of his trusting God to perform His promise introduced him into the blessing promised. God declared his purpose (Gen. xii. 3) of blessing all the families of the earth in Abraham, and again (Gen. xv. 5) that his seed should be as the stars heaven, when as yet he had no son, Abraham believed this promise, and became partaker of this blessing. But this blessing was, justification by faith in Christ. Now Abraham could not, in the strict ‘sense of the words, be justified by faith in Christ,—nor is it necessary to suppose that he directed his faith forward to the promised Redeemer in Person; but in so far as God’s gracious purpose was revealed to him, he grasped it by faith, and that righteousness which was implied, so far, in it, was imputed to him. Some have said (for example, Tholuck) that the parallel is incomplete—Abraham’s faith having been reckoned to him for righteousness, whereas, in our case, the righteousness of Christ reckoned to us as our righteousness, by faith. But the incompleteness lies in the nature of the respective cases. In his case, the righteousness itself was not yet manifested. He believed implicitly, taking the promise, with all it involved and implied, as true. This then was his way of entering into the promise, and by means of his faith was bestowed upon him that full justification which that faith never apprehended. Thus his faith itself, the mere fact of implicit trust in God, was counted to him for righteousness. But though the same righteousness is imputed to us who believe, and by means of faith also, it is no longer the mere fact of believing implicitly in God’s truth, but the reception of Christ Jesus the Lord by faith, which justifies us (see verses 23–25 and note). As it was then the realization of God’s words by faith, so now: but we have the Person of the Lord Jesus for the object of faith, explicitly revealed: he had not. In both cases justification is gratuitous, and is by faith: and so far, which is as far as the argument here requires, the parallel is strict and complete.

4. to him that worketh (him that works “for hire, that earns wages), his reward is not reckoned in the way of (as a matter of) grace (favour), but of (as a matter of) debt] The sentence is a general one, not with any peculiar reference to Abraham,—except that after the words in the way of grace we may supply “as it was to Abraham,” if we will; for this is evidently assumed.

5.] but to him that worketh not (for hire,—is not a workman looking for his wages), but believeth on (casts himself in simple trust and humility on) him who justifieth (accounts just, as in ver. 3) the ungodly (‘impious:’ stronger than ‘unrighteous’—no allusion to Abraham’s having formerly been in idolatry,—for the sentence following on ver. 4, which is general and of universal application, must also be general,—including of course Abraham: impiousness is the state of all men by nature),—his faith is reckoned for righteousness.—By way of grace is of course implied.

6-8.] The same is confirmed by a passage from David. This is not a fresh example, but a confirmation of the assertion involved in ver. 5, that a man may believe on Him who justifies the ungodly, and have his faith reckoned for righteousness. The applicability of the text depends on the persons alluded to being sinners, and having sin not reckoned to them. The Psalm, strictly speaking, says nothing of the imputation of righteousness,—but it is implied by St. Paul, that the remission of sin is equivalent to the imputation of righteousness—that there is no negative state of innocence—none intermediate between acceptance for righteousness, and rejection for sin.

6.] literally, pronounces the blessedness, ‘the congratulation’ in allusion perhaps to the Heb. form, ‘(O) the blessings of?...—It is very clear that this righteousness must be apart from works, because its imputation consists in the remission and hiding of offences, whereas none can be legally righteous in whom there is any, even the smallest offence.

8.] will not reckon is strictly future, and must be referred to the great final judgment. Or we may say, with Olshausen, that the expression is an Old Test. one, regarding sin as lying covered by the divine long-suffering till the completion of the work of Christ, at which time first real forgiveness of sins was imparted to the ancient believers; compare Matt. xxvii. 53; 1 Pet. iii. 18. In this last view the future will only refer to all such cases as should arise.

9-12.] This declaration of blessedness applies to circumcised and uncircumcised alike. For Abraham himself was thus justified when in UNCIRCUMCISION, and was then pronounced the father of the faithful, circumcised as well as uncircumcised.

this blessing, or blessedness, of course includes the fact, on account of which the congratulation is pronounced,—the justification itself.

9.] The form of the question, with or... also, presupposes an affirmative answer to the latter clause; which affirmative answer is then made the ground of the argumentation in vv. 10, 11, 12:—upon the uncircumcision (-cised) also? for we say, &c.—The stress is on the words to Abraham, not on faith: for we say that TO ABRAHAM faith was reckoned for righteousness.

10.] How, ie. under what circumstances?—The interval between the recognition of his faith (Gen. xv. 6) and his circumcision was perhaps as much as twenty-five, certainly not less (Gen. xvii. 25) than fourteen years.

11.] And he received (from God) the sign (token, or symbol) of circumcision, a seal (the Targum on Song of Solom. iii. 8, has the expression, ‘the seal of circumcision.’ So also Baptism is called sometimes the seal of the font, and often in the Fathers simply the seal) of the righteousness (to stamp, and certify the righteousness) of the faith. (i. e. ‘of the righteousness which consisted in his faith,’—not, ‘of his justification by faith;’ the present argument treats of faith accounted as righteousness) which he had while in his uncircumcision. In literal historical matter of fact, Abraham received circumcision as a seal of the covenant between God and him (Gen. xvii 1–14). But this covenant was only a renewal of that very one, on the promise of which Abraham’s faith was exercised, Gen. xv. 5, 6,—and each successive renewal of which was a fresh approval of that faith. The Apostle’s point is,—that the righteousness was reckoned, and the promise made, to Abraham, not in circumcision, but in uncircumcision.

in order that he might be the father of all in uncircumcision that believe] Abraham is the father of the faithful. But the triumph and recognition of that faith whereby he was constituted so, was not during his circumcision, but during his uncircumcision:—therefore the faithful, his descendants, must not be confined to the circumcised, but must take in the uncircumcised also.—On the appellation father in this sense, Tholuck compares the expression Gen. iv. 20; 1 Macc. ii. 54, “Phinees, our father in being zealous and fervent,” and a saying of Maimonides, “Moses is the father of all the prophets who succeeded him.” See also our Lord’s saying, John viii. 37, 39. One of the Rabbinical books has a sentiment remarkably coincident with that in our text: “Abraham is the father of all those who follow his faith.”

that the righteousness might be reckoned unto them also] This is in fact parenthetical, whether brackets are used or not; for otherwise the construction from the former to the latter word the father would not proceed. The righteousness, namely, that which Abraham's faith was reckoned as being,—the righteousness of God, then hidden though imputed, but now revealed in Jesus Christ.

12.] and [that he might be] father of the circumcision (the circumcised) to them ('for those,' 'in the case of those') who are not only (physically) of the circumcision, but to them also who walk in the steps of the faith of our father (speaking here as a Jew) Abraham (which he had) while in uncircumcision.

13–17.] Not through the LAW, but through THE RIGHTEOUSNESS OF FAITH, was THE INHERITANCE OF THE WORLD promised to Abraham: so that not only they who are of the law, but they who follow Abraham's faith are HEIRS OF THIS PROMISE.

13.] The argumentation is an expansion of the expression "father of all that believe" above. If these believers are Abraham's seed, then his promised inheritance is theirs.

through the law] not, 'under the law,'—nor, 'by works of the law'—nor, 'by the righteousness of the law:' but, through the law, so that the law should be the ground, or efficient cause, or medium, of the promise. None of these it was, as matter of historical fact.—For not through the law was the promise (made) to Abraham, or to his seed, viz. that he should be heir of the world, but by the righteousness of faith. This specification of the promise has perplexed most of the commentators. The actual promise, Gen. (xii, 2, 3) xiii, 14–17; xv. 18; xvii. 8, was the possession of the land of Canaan. But the Rabbis already had seen, and St. Paul, who had been brought up in their learning, held fast the truth,—that much more was intended in the words which accompany this promise, "In thee (or in thy seed) shall all families of the earth be blessed," than the mere possession of Canaan. They distinctly trace the gift of the world to Abraham to this promise, not to the foregoing. They say, "The garden is the world, which God delivered to Abraham, to whom it was said, 'And thou shalt be a blessing' The inheritance of the world then is not the possession of Canaan merely, either literally, or as a type of a better possession,—but that ultimate lordship over the whole world which Abraham, as the father of the faithful in all peoples, and Christ, as the of Promise, shall possess: the former figuratively indeed and only implicitly, latter personally and actually. See ch. viii. 17; Matt. v. 5; 2 Tim. ii. 12; 1 Cor. xy. 24.—Another difficulty, that this promise was made chronologically before the reckoning of his faith for righteousness, is easily removed by remembering that the (indefinite) making of the promise is here treated of as the whole process of its assertion, during which Abraham's faith was shewn, and the promise continually confirmed.

14.] The supposition is now made which ver. 13 denied,—and its consequences shewn. For if they which are of the law (who belong to the law, not 'who keep the law') be heirs (i. e. inherit by virtue of the law; they may be inheritors by the righteousness of faith, but not by force of their legal standing), faith is (thereby) made empty (robbed of its virtue and rendered useless), and the promise is annulled (has no longer place). How and why so? The Apostle himself immediately gives the reason.

15.] For the law worketh (brings about, gives occasion to) wrath (which from its very nature excludes promise, which is an of grace,—and faith, which is an attribute of confidence):—but where (the "for" in the A.V. has perhaps been introduced to suit the idea of the second clause rendering a reason for the first) there is no law (lit. 'where the law is not'), neither is there transgression. "We should rather expect (says De Wette) the affirmative clause,*'And where the law is, there is transgression:' but the negative refers to the time before the Mosaic law, when there was no transgression and therefore also no wrath." Yes; but not because there was no transgression then; the purpose of the Apostle here is not to deny the existence of the law of God written in the heart (which itself brings in the knowledge of sin) before Moses, but to shew that no promise of inheritance can be by the law, because the property of the law the more it is promulgated, to reveal transgression more,—not to unfold grace. So that comparatively (see notes on ch. vii.) there was no transgression before the law of Moses; and if we conceive a state in which the law should be altogether absent, whether written or unwritten (as in the brute creation), there would be no transgression whatever.—But observe (see ch. v. 12–14) that this reasoning does not touch the doctrine of the original taint of our nature in Adam,—only referring to the discrimination of acts, words, and thoughts by the conscience in the light of the law: for TRANSGRESSION is not natural corruption, but an act of transgression: nor does the Apostle here deny the former, even in the imaginable total absence of the law of God.

16.] For this (viz. the following) cause it (no word is supplied in the original; but we must understand the inheritance,—not the promise; the promise was not strictly speaking of faith; nor must we supply they were, meaning the heirs, who although they might fairly be said to be of faith, could hardly be without harshness described as being by grace) was of faith, that it might be (strictly the purpose,—not, 'so that it was') by (according to) grace (free unmerited favour. As the law, bringing the knowledge of guilt, works wrath,—so the promise, awakening faith, manifests God's free grace,—the end for which it was given); in order that the promise may be sure (not, 'so that the promise was sure?' this was the result, but the Apostle states this as the aim and end of the inheritance being by faith,—as regarded the seed of Abraham,—that they all might be inheritors, —as the manifestation of God's grace was the higher aim and end) to all the seed, not only to that (part of it) which is of the law (see ver. 14), but to that also which is of the faith (walks in the steps of the faith, ver. 12) of Abraham. The part of the seed which is of the law here is of course confined to believing Jews; the seed being believers only. This has been sometimes lost sight of, and the whole argument of vv. 13–16 treated as if it applied to the doctrine of justification by faith without the works of the law, a point already proved, and now presupposed,—the present argument being an historical and metaphysical one, proceeding on the facts of Abraham's history, and the natures respectively of the law and grace, to prove him to be the father of all believers, uncircumcised as well as circumcised.

who is the father of us all?] By the last declaration the paternity of Abraham, which is co-extensive with the inheritance, has been extended to all who are of his faith; here therefore it is reasserted: us meaning believers. 17. as it is written] The words (ref.) are spoken of the numerous progeny of Abraham according to the flesh: but not out a reference to that covenant, according to the terms of which all nations were to be blessed in him. The Apostle may here cite it as comparing his natural paternity of many nations with his spiritual one of all believers: but it seems more probable that he regards the prophecy as directly announcing a paternity far more extensive than mere physical fact substantiated.—‘These words are parenthetical, being merely a confirmation by Scripture testimony of the words foregoing, with which (see below) the following words are immediately connected.

before God in whose sight he believed] ‘he meaning appears to be, ‘Abraham was the father of us all,—though not physically, nor in actuality, seeing that we were not as yet,—yet in the sight and estimation of God,—in his relation with God, with whom no obstacles of nature or time have force.’

who quickeneth the dead] A general description of God's almighty creative power (see 1 Tim. vi. 13), applied particularly to the matter in hand—the deadness of generative physical power in Abraham himself, which was quickened by God. The peculiar excellence of Abraham's faith was, that it overleaped the obstacles of physical incapacity, and non-entity, and believed implicitly God's promise. Comp. 2 Cor. i. 9.

and calleth those things which be not as though they were] Much difficulty has been found here: and principally owing to an idea that this clause must minutely correspond with the former, and furnish another instance of God's creative Almightiness. Hence Commentators have given to call the sense which it has sometimes, ‘to summon into being, and have understood as though they were as if it were so as to be. I see however in this latter clause not a repetition or expansion of the former, but a new attribute of God's omnipotence and eternity, on which Abraham's faith was fixed. Who calleth (nameth, speaketh of) the things that are not as being (as if they were). This He did in the present case with regard to the seed of Abraham, which did not as yet exist:—the two key-texts to this word and clause being, In Isaac shall thy seed be called, ch. ix. 8 (see note there),—and Acts vii. 5, He promised that he would give it to him for a possession, and to his seed after him, when as yet he had no child. These children, which were at present in the category of things that were not, and the nations which should spring, physically or spiritually, from him, God called as though they were, spoke of as having an existence, which word Abraham believed. And here, as in the other clause, the calling the things which be not as though they were, is not confined to the case in point, but is a general attribute of all God's words concerning things of time: past, present, and future, being to His Omnipotence and Omniscience, all one. His purposes, when formed, are accomplished, save in so far as that evolution of secondary causes and effects intervenes, which is also His purpose. This also Abraham apprehended by his faith, which rested on God's absolute power to do what He had promised (see below).

18–22.] A more detailed description of this (Abraham's) faith, as reposed on God's Omnipotence.

18.] who against hope (where there was nothing to hope) believed in (the preposition rendered in, in its literal import signifying close adherence, is accordingly used to connect an act with that to which it is immediately attached as its ground or accompaniment. Thus here, the hope existed as the necessary concomitant and in some sense the condition of the faith) hope, in order to his becoming the father of many nations (i. e. as a step in the process of his becoming, and one necessary to that process going forward. He would never have become the father of many nations, had he not believed).

So] viz. as the stars of heaven: quoted,—and compare Ps. cxlvii. 4.

19.] The reading (with or without not?) must first be considered. Reading not, the sense will be, And not being weak in faith, he paid no attention to, &c. Omitting not, ‘And not being weak in (his) faith, he was well aware of, &c.—but did not,’ &c. Of these, the second agrees the better with ver. 20,—but the first very much better suits the context; the object being, to extol Abraham's faith, not to introduce the new and somewhat vapid notice of his being well aware of those facts of which it may be assumed as a matter of course that he could not be ignorant. The Apostle does not want to prove that Abraham was in his sound senses when he believed the promise, but that he was so strong in faith as to be able to overleap all difficulties in its way. Abraham did indeed feel and express the difficulty (Gen. xvii. 17), but his faith overcame it, and he ceased to regard it. But most probably St. Paul here refers only to Gen. xv. 5, 6, where his belief was implicit and unquestioning.

about an hundred] Abraham's own expression in the place quoted, where he also describes Sarah as being 90. His exact age was 99, Gen. xvii. 1, 24.

20.] Literally, but with regard to the promise of God, he doubted not through unbelief, but was strong (lit. 'was strengthened,' 'shewed himself strong') in faith ('with regard to faith'), giving glory to God, (viz. by recognizing His almighty power: see reff., especially Luke).

22.] Wherefore, on account of the nature of this faith, which the Apostle has now since ver. 18 been setting forth;—because it was a simple unconditional credence of God and His promise.

also] besides being thus great and admirable, it was reckoned to him for righteousness.

23–25.] Application of that which is said of Abraham, to all believers in Christ. 23.] was written, not the more usual 'is written:' so also in the parallel, 1 Cor. x. 11; and in our ch. xv. 4. The words assert the design of God's Spirit at the time of penning the words: the ordinary expression may imply that, but more directly asserts the intent of our Scriptures as we now find them. Now it was not written for his sake alone (merely to bear testimony to him and his faith), that it was reckoned unto him,—but for our sake also (for our benefit, to bear testimony to us of the efficacy of faith like his. Observe that "for the sake of" in the two clauses has not exactly the same sense:—(1) 'his sake, meaning, to celebrate his faith,—and (2) 'for our sake,' meaning, for our profit; see on ver. 25), to whom it (i. e. believing in God, as ver. 22) shall be reckoned (for righteousness), who believe on (this specifies the us: and the belief is not a mere historical, but a fiducial, trusting belief him, that raised Jesus our Lord from the dead (the central fact in our redemption, as the procreation of the seed of promise was in the performance of the promise to Abraham, see ch. i. 4; 1 Cor. xv. 14 ff; and resembling it in the quickenings of the dead).

25.] Here we have another example of the alliterative use of the same preposition (for) where the meanings are clearly different (see above, verses 23, 24). Our Lord was delivered up (to death) for or on account of our sins (i. e. because we had sinned):—He was also raised up (from the dead) for or on account of our justification (i. e. not because we had been, but that we might be justified). This separate statement of the great object of the death and resurrection of Christ must be rightly understood, and each member of it not unduly pressed to the exclusion of the other. The great complex event by which our justification (death unto sin and new birth unto righteousness) has been made possible, may be stated in one word as the GLORIFICATION of Christ. But this glorification consisted of two main parts,—His Death, and His Resurrection. In the former of these, He was made a sacrifice for sin; in the latter, He elevated our humanity into the participation of that Resurrection-life, which is also, by union with Him, the life of every justified believer. So that, when taking the two apart, the Death of Christ is more properly placed in close reference to forgiveness of sins,—His Resurrection, to justification unto life everlasting. And thus the Apostle treats these two great events, here and in the succeeding chapters. But he does not view them respectively as the causes, exclusively of one another, of forgiveness and justification: e.g. (1) ch. v. 9, we are said to be justified by His blood, and 2 Cor v. 21, God made Him sin for us, that we might become the righteousness of God in Him: and (2) 1 Cor. xv. 17, if Christ is not raised, we are yet in our sins. So that, though these great events have their separate propriety of reference to the negative and positive sides of our justification, the one of them cannot be treated separately and exclusively of the other, any more than can the negative side of our justification, the non-imputation of our sin, without the positive, the imputation of God's righteousness.—It will be seen from what I have said above that I cannot agree with Bp. Horsley's view, that as our transgressions were the cause of Jesus being delivered up, so our justification must be the cause of His being raised again. Such a pressing of the same sense on the preposition for is not necessary, when Paul's manifold usages of the same preposition are considered: and the regarding our justification (in the sense here) as a fact past, is inconsistent with the very next words, being justified by faith, which that not the objective fact, but subjective realization, here meant these words (of ver. 25) The Apostle introduces the great subject of chaps. viii,—DEATH, as connected with SIN,—and LIFE, as connected with RIGHTEOUSNESS. The various ramifications of this subject see in the headings below.

CHAP. V. 1–11.] THE BLESSED CONSEQUENCES OF JUSTIFICATION BY FAITH.

1.] Being therefore justified ('having been justified':—it is an act past on the Christian, not like sanctification, an abiding and increasing work) by (as the ground) faith, we (believers in Christ) have (almost all our most ancient authorities read for we have, let us have). The difference in Greek is only that of one letter, the long 'o,' or omega, for the short 'o,' or omicron. And these two letters are frequently confused in our old manuscripts: so that it may even be doubted whether we can call this a real variation in reading, after all. Certainly in judging between the two, as to which, in this uncertainty of evidence, was most likely to have been written by St. Paul, the indicative have, seems to be the preferable form. For the whole passage is declaratory of the consequences flowing from justification by faith, and does not exhort, but assert. Nor would it seem, does the place where these consequences have arrived, till these consequences have been in the fullest and freest manner set forth,—indeed so fully and freely, that the objection arising from their supposed abuse has first to be answered. Add to this that the verbs following are in the indicative, which makes it probable that this also would be) peace (‘reconciliation,’ the opposite of wrath, see ver. 9) with (‘in regard of’) God through (by means of) our Lord Jesus Christ. With regard to the nature of this peace,—‘s state of reconciliation,’ ‘no more condemnation,’ as ch. viii. 1,—we may remark, that it regards here the objective fact of God’s reconciliation to us, not as yet the subjective one of our reconciliation to Him: see this fully shewn below in ver. 10.

2.] through whom we have also (the also, as in ch. i. 24, iv. 22, serves to shew the coherence and likelihood of that which is asserted—answering almost to our ‘as might be expected’) had our access (the persons spoken of having come to the Father by Christ,—see Eph. ii. 18,—the access is treated of as a thing past. The words “by faith” appear to have been inserted as explanatory of the method of access. This access would normally take place in baptism) into this grace (namely, the grace of justification, apprehended and held fast subjectively, from what follows) wherein we stand (i. e. abide accepted and acquitted with God; see 1 Cor. xv. 1, 2 Cor. i. 24, also 1 Cor. x. 12, and ch. xi. 20); and (coupled to “we have peace,” not to “wherein we stand”) we glory in the hope (compare Heb. iii. 6, where we have “the glorying of our hope”) of the glory of God (of sharing God’s glory by being with Christ in His kingdom, John xvii. 22).

3.] And not only so (not only do we triumph in hope, which has regard to the future), but glorying (so it is literally, the present participle) in (not amidst; the tribulation is the ground of triumph) our tribulations: knowing (because we know) that tribulation worketh patience (or, endurance: supposing, i.e. we remain firm under it); and patience, approval (of our faith and trust, 2 Cor. ii. 9; ix. 13: not, ‘proof,’ as some; nor ‘experience,’ as A.V.); and approval, (fresh) hope; and hope shames (us) not (by disappointing us; ‘mocks us not’); because God’s love (not, in the ordinary sense, ‘the love of God,’ i.e. man’s love for God; compare the explicit words, “His love toward us,” which answer to this in ver. 8) is (has been) poured out (poured forth, not “shed abroad.”) The use of this latter term in the Vulgate Latin version perhaps misled Augustine, owing to whose mistake the true interpretation was lost for some centuries, although held by interpreters preceding and contemporary with him. See Trench on St. Augustine, ch. v.p. 89:—i. e. ‘richly imparted’) in our hearts (the heart is the locality where the outpouring takes place,—being the seat of our love, and of appreciation and sympathy with God’s love) by means of the Holy Spirit (who is the Outpourer, John xvi. 14; 1 Cor. ii. 9, 10) which was given unto us (not, is given to us. ‘The past participle refers to a past fact, viz., the Pentecostal effusion of the Holy Spirit). Bengel remarks, that this is the first mention of the Holy Spirit in our Epistle. For when a man has been brought to this point, the work of the Spirit begins to be notably felt within him.

6.] For (or, if, that is) when we were yet without strength (weak, ‘powerless for good;’—or even stronger than that:—there seems in this verse to be a tacit reference to Ezek. xvi.—See especially verses 4–8 of that chapter), in due season (i. e. at the appointed time: comp. Gal. iv. 4, and ver. 8 in the quotation above) Christ died for (‘on behalf of’) ungodly men (so literally not “for us,” because the Apostle wishes to bring out fully by this strong antithesis, which he enlarges on in the next verses, the greatness of the divine Love to man).

7.] The greatness of this Love, of Christ’s death on behalf of the impious, is brought out by shewing that there is none such among men, nay, that such a self-sacrifice,—not unexampled where a good man, one loving his fellow-men and loved by them, is to be rescued,—is hardly found to occur on behalf of the pious and just.—F or hardly will any one die on behalf of a just man—for (this second ‘for’ is exceptive, and answers to ‘but I do not press this without exception,’ understood) on behalf of a good man (the article, which is in the original, points him out generally, as in the expression, ‘the fool,’ ‘the wise man,’ ‘the righteous,’ ‘the wicked’) perhaps one doth even dare (i. e. is even found to venture: the present tense implies habituality—it may occur here and there) to die.

8.] But (as distinguished from human examples) God (or more probably, He, the Person intended being supplied from verse 5) giveth proof of (‘establishes;’—not ‘commands’) his own love (own, as distinguished from that of men, in ver. 7) toward us, in that, while we were yet (as opposed to “now” in the next verse) sinners (this term ranges with “without strength,”—“ungodly,” ver. 6, and is opposed to “just,” and “good,” ver. 7), Christ died for us.

9–11.] The Apostle further s hews the blessed fruits of justification, viz. salvation, both from wrath, and with life. The argument proceeds from the beginning of the chapter but the connexion, as so frequent with St. Paul, is immediately with the parenthetical sentences just preceding.—Much more then (if He died for us when sinners, à fortiori will He save us now that we are righteous by virtue of that His death), having been now justified by his blood (see remarks on ch. iv. 25), shall we be saved through him from the wrath [to come]. The original has only from the wrath: i.e. the wrath impending,—the wrath of which we all know.

10.] The same is substantiated in another form: ‘we were enemies (see below) when He died and reconciled us: much more now that we have been reconciled, and He lives, shall we by His life be saved.’—For if, being enemies (the meaning of enemies may either be active, as Eph. ii. 15; Col. i. 21, ‘haters of God’ so ‘enmity,’ ch. viii. 7: or passive, as ch. xi. 28,—hated by God.’ But here the latter meaning alone can apply, for the Apostle is speaking of the Death of Christ and its effects as applied to all time, not merely to those believers who then lived: and those unborn at the death of Christ could not have been enemies in the active sense), we were reconciled (this expression also may be taken in two ways. It may be said of giving up anger against any one,—see 1 Cor. vii. 11, or of being received into favour by any one, see 1 Sam. xxix. 4,—the latter off which meanings, were received into favour with God, must, for the reason above given, be here adopted to God through (by means of) the death of his Son (this great fact is further explained and insisted on, in the rest of the chapter), much more, having been reconciled (but here comes in the assumption that the corresponding subjective part of reconciliation has been accomplished, viz. justification by faith: comp. 2 Cor. v. 19, 20, “God was in Christ reconciling the world to Himself.... we pray you in Christ's behalf, be ye reconciled to God.” Both these, the objective reception into God’s favour by the death of Christ, and the subjective appropriation, by faith, of that reception, are included), shall we be saved through (by means of) his life (not here that which he now does on our behalf, but simply the fact of His Life, so much enlarged on in ch. vi.: and our sharing in it).

11.] A further step still. Not only has the reconciled man confidence that he shall escape God’s wrath, but triumphant confidence,—joyful hope in God.—And (literally, but) not only so, but also glorying in God (not only shall we be saved, but that in a triumphant manner and frame of mind) through our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom we have now (not in contrast with the future glory, ‘even now, but as in ver. 9) received (our) reconciliation (so God: not as in A.V. “the atonement,” at least in the common theological acceptation of that term: for that is not here treated of, but our reconciliation to God).

12–19.] The bringing in of RECONCILIATION and LIFE by CHRIST in its analogy to the bringing in of SIN and DEATH by ADAM.

12.] This verse is one of acknowledged difficulty. The two questions meeting us directly are (1) To what does for this cause refer? (2) As may introduce the first member of a comparison, the second being to be discovered; or may introduce the second, the first having to be discovered. I shall endeavour to answer both questions in connexion. (1) I conceive for this cause to refer to that blessed state of confidence and hope just described: ‘on this account,’ ‘seeing these things are so,’ ‘this state of things, thus brought about, will justify the following analogy.’ Thus we must take as either (a) as beginning the comparison, and then supply, ‘so Christ in His Resurrection came justification into the world, and by justification, life;’ or (b) as concluding the comparison, and supply before it, ‘it was,’ or ‘Christ wrought.’ This latter method seems to me far the best. For none of the endeavours of Commentators to supply the second limb of the comparison from the following verses have succeeded: and we can hardly suppose such an ellipsis, when the next following comparison (ver. 16) is rather a weakening than a strengthening the analogy. We have example for this use of “as” in Matt. xxv. 14 [see the passage in this work], and even as, Gal. iii. 6.—Consequently (the method of God’s procedure in introducing life by righteousness resembled the introduction of death by sin: ‘it was’), like as by one man (the Apostle regards the man as involving generic succession and transmitting the corrupt seed of sin, not the woman: but when he speaks of the personal share which each had in the transgression, 1 Tim. ii. 14, he says, ‘Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the transgression’), sin (as a POWER ruling over mankind, see ch. iii. 9, and ver. 21,—partly as a principle which exists in us all, and develops itself in our conduct, partly as a state in which we are involved; but the idea here must not be confined to original sin, as it reaches much wider, to sin both original and actual: nor to the habit of sinning: nor is it merely the propensity to sin: nor is sin personified merely, as in ch. vii. 8, 11) entered into the world (not begun to be, was first committed, as some Commentators: but literally,—‘entered into,’ ‘gained access into,’ the moral world,—for sin involves moral responsibility. So Gal. iii. 23, ‘before the faith came in’), and by means of sin (as the appointed penalty for sin, Gen. ii. 17; iii. 19), death (primarily, but not only, physical death: as sin, so death, is general, including the lesser in the greater, i. e: spiritual and eternal death. See ch. vi. 16, 21; vii. 10; viii. 6; 2 Cor. vii. 10); and thus (by this entering in of sin and death; i.e. in fact, by this connexion of sin and death, as’s by the clause following, “for that all sin sinned”) death spread through unto all men (see reff. De Wette well says that “all men” differs from “the world,” as the concrete part from the abstract whole, and “entered” from “spread through,” as the going from house to house differs from the entering a town), because (literally, ‘on ground of,’ ‘on condition that,’ which meaning, if rightly applied, suits the case in hand. Life depended on a certain condition, viz. obedience: Death on another, viz. disobedience. Mankind have disobeyed: the condition of Death’s entrance and diffusion has been fulfilled: Death extended to all men, as a consequence of the fact, that all have sinned) all sinned (see ch. iii. 23:—not ‘were sinful, or ‘were born in sin, as Calvin would restrict the meaning: sin, as above remarked, is here, throughout, both original and actual: in the seed, as planted in the nature by the sin of our forefather: and in the fruit, as developed by each conscious responsible individual in his own practice. So that Calvin’s argument, “that here there is no question of actual sin, because if each man is to be treated as guilty in himself, why should Paul compare Adam with Christ?” does not apply, and the objection is answered by St. Paul himself, where he says, distinguishing between the trespass and the free gift below, vv. 15, 16, the free gift came of many trespasses unto justification. The trespass was not only that of one, the original cause of the entry of sin, but the often repeated sins of individual men). Observe how entirely this assertion of the Apostle contradicts the Pelagian or individualistic view of men, that each is a separate creation from God, existing solely on his own exclusive responsibility,—and affirms the Augustinian or traducian view, that all are evolved by God’s appointment from an original stock, and, though individually responsible, are generically involved in the corruption and condemnation of their original.

13.] How, consistently wish ch. iv. 15 could all men sin, before the law? This is now explained.—For up to (the time of) the law (equivalent to “from Adam to Moses,” ver. 14), there was sin in the world (‘men sinned,’ see Gen. vi. 5–13; committed actual sin: not, men were accounted sinners because of Adam’s sin: the Apostle reminds us of the historical fact, that there was sin in the world during this period): but sin is not reckoned (as transgression) where the law is not. This word imputed has given rise to much dispute. Very many Commentators explain it of consciousness of sin by the sinner himself, as in ch. vii. 7: but (1) this is not the natural sense of the word, which implies TWO parties, one of whom sets down something to the account of the other: (2) this interpretation would bring in a new and irrelevant element,—for the Apostle is not speaking in this chapter at all of subjective human consciousness, but throughout of objective truths with regard to the divine dealings: and (3) it would be altogether inconsistent with the declarations of ch. ii. 15,—where the consciousness of sin on the part of those who had not the law is distinctly asserted.—I am persuaded that the right sense is imputed, ‘set down as transgression,’—‘put in formal account,’ by God. In the ease of those who had not the written law, sin is not formally reckoned as transgression, set over against the command: but in a certain sense, as distinctly proved ch. ii. 9–16, it is reckoned and they are condemned for it. Nor is there any inconsistency in this view. Other passages of Paul’s writings support and elucidate it. He states the object of the law to be, ch. vii. 13, that sin may by the commandment become exceeding sinful. The revelation of the law exaggerated, brought into prominent and formal manifestation, the sinfulness of sin, which was before culpable and punishable, but in a less degree. With this view also agree Acts xvii. 30; ch. ii. 12; and iii. 25, in so far as they state an analogous case. The objection to taking the words relatively, ‘is not fully reckoned,’ will hardly be urged by those who bear in mind the Apostle’s habit of constantly stating relative truths as positive, omitting the qualifying particles: see, for example, ch. vii. 7, where with the words “sin,” and “I had not known,” both, we must supply qualifications (see notes there).

14.] Nevertheless (notwithstanding the last assertion, that sin is not fully reckoned where the law is not) death reigned (was a power to which all succumbed) from Adam to Moses (the period included is the same as that marked out by the words until the law above: i.e. although the full imputation of sin did not take place between Adam and Moses, the universality of death is a proof that all sinned,—for death is the consequence of sin:—in confirmation of ver. 12), even (notwithstanding the different degrees of sin and guilt out of, and under, the law) over them that sinned not after the likeness of the TRANSGRESSION of Adam (the emphasis lies on transgression, as distinguished from sin. They all sinned: had not, like Adam, transgressed a positive revealed command. There is no reference here, as some Commentators have supposed, to the ease of children and idiots,—nor (as others) to those who lived pious lives. The aim is to prove, that the seed of sin planted in the race by the one man Adam, has sprung up and borne fruit in all, so as to bring them under death;—death temporal, and spiritual;—of these, some have sinned without the law, i.e. not as Adam did, and as those after Moses did: and though sin is not formally reckoned against them, death, the consequence of sin, reigned, as matter of historical fact, over them also. It is most important to the clear understanding of this weighty passage to bear in mind, that the first member of the comparison, as far as it extends, is this: ‘As by Adam’s transgression, of which we are by descent inheritors, we have become (not by imputation merely, but by propensity) sinners, and have thus incurred death, so&c.’..... see below), who is a type of him that is to come (or, and perhaps better, of the future Adam, the second Adam, viz. Christ). This clause is inserted on the first mention of the name Adam, the one man of whom he had been speaking, to recall the purpose for which he is treating of him,—as the figure of Christ. It is not of him that was to come, as in A.V., but is spoken from the Apostle’s present standing, ‘who is to come.’ The fulfilment of the type will then take place completely, when, as 1 Cor. xv. 22, in Christ all shall be made alive.

15–17.] Though Adam and Christ correspond as opposites, yet there is a remarkable difference, which makes the free gift of grace much more eminent than the transgression and its consequences, and enhances the certainty of its end being accomplished. Howbeit not (in all points) as the trespass (of Adam, as the cause inducing sin and death on his race), so also is the gift of grace (i. e. justification: not a direct contrast, as obedience in ver. 19: the Apostle has more in mind here the consequence of the trespass, and to that opposes the gift of grace).

15.] For if, &c. Distinction the first, in DEGREE:—and in the form of a hypothetical inference, from the less to the greater. For if by the trespass of the one [man] the many died, much more did the grace of God and his free gift abound unto the many by the grace of the one man Jesus Christ. (1) The first question regards the expression much more. Is it the à fortiori of logical inference, or is it to be joined with did abound as quantitative, describing the degree of abounding? Chrysostom and others adopt the former, and provided only the same thing is said here as in ver. 17, the usage there would decide it to be so: for there it cannot be quantitative. But I believe that not to be so. Here, the question is of abounding, a matter of degree, there, of reigning, a matter of fact. Here (ver. 16) the contrast is between the judgment, coming of one sinner, to condemnation, and the free gift, of (see note below) many offences, to justification. So that I think the quantitative sense the better, and join much more with did abound, in the sense of much more abundant (rich in diffusion) was the gift, &c. (2) grace, not the grace working in men, here, but the grace which is in, and flows from, God. (3) The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ (His self-offering love, see 2 Cor. viii. 9) is the medium by which the free gift is imparted to men. (4) The past tense, did abound, should here be kept to its indefinite historical sense, and not rendered, as in the A.V., by a perfect, however true the fact expressed. may be: both are treated of here as events, their time of happening and present reference not being regarded.

16.] Distinction the second, in KIND, The former difference was quantitative: this is modal.—And not as [it was] through one that sinned, so is the gift.—It is a question, the words [it was] not existing in the original, whether any thing, and what, is to be supplied before the clause, through one that sinned. Meyer and others would understand it as if nothing was to be supplied, ‘And not as through one that sinned, so is the gift.’ But this has against it, that since the for following gives the reason for this sentence, this must contain implicitly all that that next expands in detail; which is not merely the distinction between springing from one man and out of many offences, but much more. Others have supplied the condemnation, or the words death entered—but inasmuch as it is purposely left indefinite, to be explained in the next verse, it is better to supply in the thought an indefinite phrase which may be thus explained: as, ‘that which took place, through one;’ or, ‘as [it was] through one.’ for the judgment (pronounced by God upon Adam) came of (was by occasion of) one (man having sinned, —one trespass would be hardly allowable, and would not help the sense, inasmuch as many sinners, as well as many sins, are implied in many trespasses, below) unto condemnation (its result, in his own case and that of his posterity); but the gift of grace came of (was by occasion of) many trespasses (where sin abounded, ver. 20, there grace much more abounded: the existence of the law being implied in the word trespasses) unto justification.—The only difficulty here is the sense of the word rendered justification, respecting which I must refer to the note in my Greek Testament. The strict meaning is a sentence of acquittal, which, in fact, amounts to justification.

17.] Distinction the third, also in KIND; that which came in by the one sinner, was the reign of DEATH: that which shall come in by the One, Jesus Christ, will be a reigning in LIFE.—For (carrying on the argument from ver. 15, but not so as to make parenthetical ver. 16) if by the trespass of the one [man], death reigned through the one [man], much more (logical à fortiori) shall they which receive the abundance of the grace and of the free gift of righteousness reign in life (eternal) through (by means of) the one (Man), even Jesus Christ:—Abundance answers to “did abound,” ver. 15; grace here to “the grace of God” there; only here, as at ch. i. 5, the word signifies not only the grace flowing from God, but the same grace implanted and working in man;—the free gift here to the same word there, but qualified by the words of righteousness, answering to “justification” in ver. 16.

reign in life] “Antithesis to ‘death reigned.’ We should expect ‘life shall reign;’ but St. Paul designedly changes the form of expression, that he may bring more prominently forward the idea of free personality. Life is not only corporeal. (the resurrection), but also spiritual and moral,—as also in ‘death’ we must include through sin, as in ver. 12. The term shall reign is brought in by the antithesis: but it is elsewhere used (compare 1 Cor. iv. 8. Rev. v. 10; xx. 4, 6; xxii. 5) to signify the state of blessedness, partly in an objective theocratic import (of the reign of the saints with Christ), partly in a subjective moral one,—because reigning is the highest, development of freedom, and the highest satisfaction of all desires.” De Wette.

18.] Recapitulation and co-statement of the parallel and distinctions.—Therefore as through one trespass (not, ‘the offence of one,’ as A.V., which is contrary to usage, and to ver. 17, where that meaning is expressed in words. In this summing up, the Apostle puts the antithetical elements as strongly and nakedly as possible in contrast; and therefore abridges the ‘trespass’ and ‘the righteous act of one’ into ‘one transgression’ and ‘one righteous: act’) [the issue was] (in the original there is nothing expressed before unto all men in both clauses) unto all men to condemnation; even so through one righteous act (the Death of Christ viewed as the highest point of His Obedience, see Phil. ii. 8: equivalent to “the obedience of the one,” below; not as in ver. 16,—nor Righteousness, which would not contrast with trespass, a single act) [the issue was] unto all men (in extent of grace,—possible, not actual, as the other) to justification of (conferring, leading to) life.

19.] For (in explanation of ver. 18) as through the disobedience of the one man the many (equivalent to “all men” above, but not so expressed here, because in the other limb of the comparison, “all men” could not be put, and this is conformed to it: see there) were made (not ‘were accounted as:’ nor ‘became by imputation:’ nor ‘were proved to be:’ the kind of sin spoken of in this whole passage, is both original and actual) sinners (‘actual sinners by practice’ is meant, the disobedience of Adam having been the inlet to all this: compare ver. 12), even so (after the same manner or analogy likewise) through the obedience (unto death, see on last verse) of (the) one [man] shall (future, because, as in ch. iii. 30, justification, as regards the many, is not yet completed) the many (equivalent to “many”: compare Matt. xxvi. 28; Mark x. 45, but thus expressed because “many” would not have answered in the other limb of the comparison. In order to make the comparison more strict, the “all” who have been made sinners are weakened to the indefinite “the many,” the “many” who shall be made righteous are enlarged to the indefinite “the many.” Thus a common term of quantity is found for both, the one extending to its largest numerical interpretation, the other restricted to its smallest) be made (see above) righteous (not by imputation merely, any more than in the other case: but ‘shall be made really and actually righteous, as completely so as the others were made really and actually sinners.’ When we say that man has no righteousness of his own, we speak of him as out of Christ: but in Christ and united to Him, he is made righteous, not by a fiction, or imputation only of Christ’s righteousness, but by a real and living spiritual union with a righteous Head as a righteous member, righteous by means of, as an effect of, the righteousness of that Head, but not merely righteous by transference of the Righteousness of that Head; just as in his natural state he is united to a sinful head as a sinful member, sinful by means of, as an effect of, the sinfulness of that Head, but not merely by transference of the sinfulness of that Head).

20.] How the law (of Moses) came in, in the divine economy.—Now (or, But, i.e. the two things spoken of ver. 19 did not simply and immediately happen) the law (of Moses, not law in the abstract, nor ‘the law of nature,’—nor even the law of God in its general sense, as often in ch. i. ii.;—but here strictly THE LAW OF MOSES, as necessitated by vv. 13, 14 in this same argument) came in besides (besides the fact of the many being made sinners, and as a transition point to the other result: formed a third term, besides these two, in the summary of God's dealings with man), in order that (its design,—not merely its result. So in ver. 21) the trespass (created by the law; for where no law, no transgression, ch. iv. 15:—not merely the knowledge of sin, but actual transgression) might be multiplied (in actual fact: not ‘be abundantly exhibited,’ or any such evasive sense).—No possible objection can be taken to this statement by those who view the Law as a preparation for Christ. If it was so, then the effect of the Law, the creating and multiplying transgression, was an end in the divine purposes, to bring out the necessity of One who should deliver from sin, and bring in righteousness. But (this terrible end, the multiplying of transgression, was not, however, God's ultimate end: He had a further and gracious one) where sin (the generic of the specific word “trespass”) was multiplied, (God's) grace did beyond measure abound (not ‘did much more abound,’ as A.V. The A.V. has likewise destroyed the force of the comparison by rendering two different and distinct verbs in the original words both by one word, ‘abound’).

21.] The purpose of this abounding of grace:—its ultimate prevalence and reign, by means of righteousness, unto life eternal. —That as sin reigned (the historic indefinite past, because the standing-point of the sentence is, the restitution of all things hereafter) in death (death, in and by which the reign was exercised and shewn: death was the central act of sin's reign. He does not here say, as the A.V. renders it, ‘death reigned by sin,’ as in vv. 12–14, because sin and grace are the two points of comparison, and require to be the subjects), even so grace may reign through (not “in” here, though it might be so, if the term applied to our being made righteous; but as it applies to the Righteousness of Christ making us righteous, it is through) righteousness, unto (leading to) eternal life through (by means of) Jesus Christ our Lord.

CHAP. VI.—VIII.] THE MORAL EFFECTS OF JUSTIFICATION. VI. 1–14.] No encouragement given hereby (see ch. v. 20) to a life in sin: for the baptized are dead to sin, and walk in a new (vv. 1–7) life, and one (vv. 8–11) dedicated to God.

1.] What then shall we say?—the introduction of a difficulty or objection arising out of the preceding argument, and referring to ch. v. 20. See ch. iii. 5. Are we to continue (‘M ust we think that we may persist,’—in other words, ‘may we persist’) in (our natural state and commission of) sin, that (God's) grace may be multiplied (v. 20)?

2.] God forbid is the only adequate rendering of the expression in the original, let it not be: for it implies a reference to an averting Power: and the occasion is solemn enough to justify in our language the mention of that Power. The phrase is used of some inference in itself abhorrent from reverence or piety, or precluded by some acknowledged fact inconsistent therewith. The latter is here the ground of rejection. An acknowledged fact in the Christian life follows, which precludes our persisting in our sin.—We who (the original word describes quality, not merely matter of fact) died (not ‘are dead, as in A.V.; the true reference is thus most unfortunately lost, the time referred to being that of our baptism) unto sin (became as separate from and apathetic towards sin, as the dead corpse is separate from and apathetic towards the functions and stir of life), how shall we live any longer therein?

3.] Or (supposing you do not assent to the argument in the last verse) know ye not (the foregoing axiom is brought out into recognition by the further statement of a truth universally acknowledged), that all we who were (i. e. all of us, having been: not as A.V. again most unfortunately, “so many of us as were,” giving it to be understood that some of them had not been thus baptized) baptized into Jesus Christ (‘into participation of,’ ‘into union with,’ Christ, in his capacity of spiritual Mastership, Headship, and Pattern of conformity) were baptized into (introduced by our baptism into a state of conformity with and participation of) his death?—The Apostle refers (1) to an acknowledged fact, in the signification, and perhaps also in the manner (see below) of baptism,—that it put upon us (Gal. iii. 27) a state of conformity with and participation in Christ;—and (2) that this state involves a death to sin even as He died to sin (ver. 10);—the meaning being kept in the background, but all the while not lost sight of, that the benefits of His death were likewise made ours by our introduction into the covenant.

4.] A further explanation of the assertion in the last verse, proceeding on its concession by the reader.—We were buried therefore with him (Chrysostom says, commenting on John iii., “When we bow our heads under the water, our old man is buried as in a grave, and having been immersed below, is wholly and once for all put out of sight”) through our baptism into his death (our baptism into His death belongs together, not we were buried into His death, which would hardly bear any sense): that like as Christ was raised from the dead through the glory (the divine glory includes all that manifests the Creator to the creature: and hence also his Almightiness; compare the expression “the might of his glory,” Col. i, 11) of the Father, so we also should walk in newness of life (not ‘a new life;’—nor are such expressions ever to be diluted away thus: the abstract substantive is used to bring the quality of newness, which is the point insisted on, more into prominence; comp. 2 Thess. ii. 11, and note: and 1 Tim. vi. 17, and note.—The comparison is not only between our Lord's physical death and resurrection, and our spiritual; but reaches far deeper: see notes on vv. 10, 11).

5.] The Apostle confirms the last verse by a necessary sequence, that those who are united to Him in His Death, shall also be in His resurrection.—For (confirmatory) if we have become united to the likeness of his death (the rendering of A.V., ‘planted together,’ is inadmissible: see note in my Greek Test. Observe that, according to the more probable rendering, adopted in the text, Christians partake of the likeness only of Christ’s death, but of His actual Resurrection itself), surely we shall be also to the likeness of his resurrection (the future is used perhaps because of the inference, as a logical sequence,—‘If, &c.... A shall be equal to B:’—but more probably with a deeper meaning, because the participation in His Resurrection, however partially and in the inner spiritual life attained here, will only then be accomplished in our entire being, when we ‘shall wake up after his likeness’):

6.] knowing (recollecting) this, that our old man (former self, personality before our new birth,—opposed to the “new man” or “new creature.”—see Col. iii, 10; 2 Cor. v. 17; Eph. iv. 22–21,—not merely the guilt of sin, nor the power of sin, but the man) was (at our baptism) crucified with him (the great key to our text is Gal. ii, 20. As the death of the Lord Jesus was by crucifixion, the Apostle uses the same expression of our death to our former sinful self, which is not only by virtue of, but also in the likeness of, Christ’s death,—as signal, as entire, as much a death of cutting off and putting to shame and pain), that (the aim and end of the being crucified with Him) the body of sin might be destroyed (the body of sin, i.e. ‘the body, which belongs to or serves sin,’ in which sin rules or is manifested, expressed by the “members,” ver. 13; in which is “the body of death,” eh. vii. 23,—“the law of sin,” 24,—“the deeds of the body,” ch. viii. 13,—“the body of the flesh,” Col. ii. 11. But we must not understand that the body is the seat of sin, or at all events must not so understand those words as if the principle of sin lay in the body, which is not true, for it lies in the will. Might be destroyed, i.e. rendered powerless, annulled, as far as regards activity and energy), that we might no longer be in bondage to sin (i. e. that the body should no longer be under the dominion of sin. see below, ver. 12).

7.] The difficulty of this verse arises from the Apostle having in a short and pregnant sentence expressed a whole similitude, joining, as he elsewhere does in such cases, the subject: of the first limb of the comparison with the predicate of the second. Fully expressed, it would stand thus: ‘For, as a man that is dead is acquitted and released from guilt and bondage (among men: no reference to God’s judgment of him): so a man that has died to sin is acquitted from the guilt of sin, and released from its bondage.’ All this is implied in the word used, ‘is acquitted,’ ‘has his quittance,’ from sin, so that Sin (personified) has no more claims on him, either as a creditor or as a master: cannot detain him for debt, nor sue him for service. A larger reference is thus given to the assertion than the purposes of the present argument, which is treating of the power, not the guilt of sin, required: but that it is so, lies in the nature of sin, the service of which is guilt, and the deliverance from whose service necessarily brings with it acquittal.

8–11.] This new life must be one dedicated to God.

8.] Now (continuing the train of argument) if we died with Christ, we believe that we shall also (the future as in ver. 5,—because the life with Him, though here begun, is not here completed: and the term we believe used more of dogmatic belief, than of crus?, though the latter meaning is not altogether absent) live with him.

9.] This and the following verse explain what sort of a life with Christ is meant, by what we know of the Resurrection-life of Christ Himself.—The only difficulty here is in death hath dominion over him no more, as implying that Death had dominion over Christ, which we know it had not: see John x. 17, 18; ii. 19; Acts ii. 24. But this vanishes, when we remember that our Lord, by submitting to Death, virtually, and in the act of death, surrendered Himself to the power of Death. Death could not hold Him, and had no power over Him further than by his own sufferance: but power over Him it had, inasmuch as He died.

10.] For (the proof of the foregoing) the death that he died (not ‘in that He died,’ as A.V.), He died unto sin (De Wette well remarks that we must in expressing this verse abide by the indefinite reference to sin in which the death of Christ is placed; if we attempt to make it more definite, ‘for sin, or ‘to that state, in which He suffered the punishment of sin,’ we shall lose the point of comparison, which lies in ‘to sin’ and ‘to God.’ If we are to expand the words ‘died to sin,’ we must say that our Lord at death passed into a state in which He had ‘no more to do with sin’—either as tempting Him [though in vain], or as requiring to be atoned for [this having been now effected], or as met by Him in daily contradiction which He endured from sinners) once (i. e., once for all, so that it is not to be repeated): but the life that he liveth (see above), he liveth unto God (indefinite again, but easily filled up and explained: to God,—as being glorified by and with the Father, as entirely rid of conflict with sin and death, and having only God’s [properly so called] work to do,—as waiting till, in the purposes of the Father, all things are put under Him:—and to [for] God, as being the manifestation and brightness of the Father’s glory).

11.] An exhortation to realize this state of death unto sin and life unto God with Christ. Even so (after the same manner as Christ) reckon ye yourselves (better than ‘infer yourselves to be’) dead (indeed) unto sin (as ver. 2 and following), but alive unto God in Christ Jesus (i. e. ‘by virtue of your union with Him: not through Christ Jesus; in this chapter it is not Christ’s Mediatorship, but His Headship, which is prominent’).

12, 13.] Hortatory inferences from ver. 11: first negative, answering to our being dead to sin,—then positive, answering to our being alive unto God.

12.] Let not sin reign answers to the imagery throughout, in which Sin is a master or lord. It is hardly right to lay stress on it, and say, as Chrysostom, “He does not say, ‘Let not sin live’ or ‘work,’ but, ‘Let not sin reign.’” for He did not come to extinguish nature, but to rectify the will?” for it is no matter of comparison between reigning and indwelling merely, but between reigning and being deposed.—But why your mortal body? Origen and others explain it ‘dead to sin,’ which it clearly cannot be. Chrysostom and others suppose the word inserted to remind us of the other life, and the shortness of the conflict, or of the shortness of sinful pleasures: De Wette, Tholuck, and others, more probably, that the Apostle wishes to keep in view the connexion between sin and death on the one hand, and that life with Christ, which is freed from death on the other. See 2 Cor. iv. 11 and note.

13.] Neither yield ye (or render;—as a soldier renders his service to his sovereign, or a servant to his master) your members (more particular than ‘your bodies;’ the individual members being instruments of different lusts and sins) as instruments (or, ‘weapons,’ many versions and expositors defending this rendering by St. Paul’s fondness for military similitudes, and by the occurrence of the word “wages” below, ver. 23;—but the comparison here is to servitude, rather than soldiership) of unrighteousness unto sin (i. e. for the service of sin); but yield (in the construction of the original, the former imperative denotes habit,—the exhortation guards against the recurrence of a devotion of the members to sin: this second imperative, on the other hand, as in ch. xii. 1, denotes an act of self-devotion to God once for all, not a mere recurrence of the habit) yourselves (not merely your members, but your whole selves, body, soul, and spirit) up to God as those that were dead and are alive (as in verses 4–11, and Eph. ii. 1–5), and your members as instruments (see above) of righteousness unto God (i. e. for the service, or glory, of God).

14.] An assurance, confirming (by the for) the possibility of the surrender to God commanded in the last verse, that sin shall not be able to assert and maintain its rule in those who are not under the law but under grace.—The future, shall not have dominion, cannot be taken as a command or exhortation, which use of the future would if not always, yet certainly here, require the second person,—and would hardly suit a personification such as we find in this clause.—The second part of the verse refers back to ch. v. 20, 21, where the law is stated to be the multiplier of transgression,—and accords with 1 Cor. xv. 56, “the strength of sin is the law.” The stress is on the not having dominion: as if it had been said, ‘Your efforts to live a life of freedom from the tyranny of sin shall not be frustrated by its after all tyrannizing over you and asserting its dominion: for ye are not under that law which is the strength of sin, but under that grace (here in the widest sense, justifying and sanctifying,—grace in all its attributes and workings) in which is no condemnation, ch. viii, 1.—It will be seen from the above, that I interpret “having dominion” rather of the eventual triumph of sin by obtaining domination over us, than of its reducing us under its subjection as servants in this life. This is necessary, both to fit this verse into the context, and to smit the question which arises in the next. The discussions as to whether the law in this place is the moral or ceremonial law, and as to whether we are bound by the former, are irrelevant here: the assertion being merely that of the general matter of fact, about which there can be no question, that we (Christians) are not under the law, placed in a covenant of legal obedience, but under grace,—placed in a covenant of justification by faith and under the promise of the indwelling Spirit—subjects of a higher law—even the law of the Spirit of life in Jesus Christ, ch. viii. 2. Whether we are bound by the law, and how far, depends on how far the law itself spoke the immutable moral truth of God’s government of the world, or was adapted to temporary observances and symbolic rites now abolished,—the whole of which subject is not under consideration here. I make these remarks to justify myself for not entering into those long and irrelevant discussions with which many of our commentaries are interrupted, and the sense of the Apostle’s argument confounded.

15–23.] The being under grace (free from the condemnation of sin) and not under the law, is no encouragement to sin; for (vv. 16–19) we have renounced the service of sin, and have become the servants of righteousness: and (vv. 20–23) the consequences of the service of sin are terrible and fatal, whereas those of the service of righteousness are blesse and glorious.

15.] are we to sin? i.e. may we sin? Notice, that he is speaking of committing acts of sin; not of a habit of living in sin, although that would be involved by such acts. This question is not, any more than that of ver. 1, put into the mouth of an objector, but is part of the Apostle’s own discourse, arising out of what has preceded, and answered by him in the following verses.

16.] ‘You are the servants either of God or of sin,—there is no third course.’ The former part of the verse reminds them merely of an universal truth,—that the yielding ourselves servants for obedience to any one, implies the serving, being (in reality) the servants of such person. Then this is implied in the form of a dilemma, implying that there is no third service. ‘Now this must be true of you with regard either to sin or to God.’ K now ye not that to whomsoever ye yield yourselves servants to obey (i. e. with a view to obedience), his servants ye are whom ye obey, (and in this case) whether it be servants of sin unto death (‘with death as the result,’—not physical death merely, nor eternal death merely, but DEATH [by sin] in its most general sense, as the contrast to [life by] RIGHTEOUSNESS,—the state of misery induced by sin, in all its awful aspects and consequences:—and so throughout this passage and ch. vii.), or of obedience (viz. obedience to Him who alone ought to be obeyed) unto righteousness (with righteousness as its result; not imputed merely, nor implanted merely, but RIGHTEOUSNESS in its most general sense, as the contrast to death,—the state of blessedness induced by holiness, and involving in it, as a less in a greater, eternal life: and so throughout this passage)

17, 18.] The dilemma is solved for them by reference to the matter of fact: that they were once servants of sin, but on receiving the gospel, obeyed its teaching: and consequently were freed from the service of sin, and became the servants of righteousness:—and this in the form of a thanksgiving to God (1 Cor. i. 14), whose work in them it was.—There is a stress on were, as referring to a state past. So Eph. v. 8.

17.] ye obeyed from the heart the form of doctrine (the expression is most probably used of the practical rule of life accompanying the doctrine of the gospel. De Wette thinks it is the Pauline form of teaching, of justification by faith, distinguished from the Judaistic) to which ye were delivered (not, as A.V., which was delivered you. The inversion to the passive agrees admirably with the figure used. The form of doctrine is regarded as a mould, exemplar, or pattern after which they were to be fashioned: and the best commentators remark, that they, the disciples taught, are regarded as being as it were pressed into the mould and conformed to its shape: the words ye were delivered implying a superior Power, by whose agency this transformation was to be wrought).

18.] And (this verse is closely united with the foregoing; Meyer and others think that it might be stated as a syllogistic conclusion, of which the dilemma is the major, and the fact of ver. 17 the minor) being made free from sin, ye were made servants (see on the next verse) to righteousness.

19.] For the expression, made servants (brought under bondage) the Apostle apologizes: ‘it is not literally so; the servant of righteousness is no slave, under no yoke of bondage; but in order to set the contrast between the former and the new state before you, I have used this word:’ I speak after the manner of men (according to the requirements of rhetorical antithesis) on account of the (intellectual, not moral) weakness of your flesh (i. e. ‘because you are carnal and not spiritual, and want such figures to set the truth before you’): for (explanatory of brought under bondage) as ye (once) yielded your members (as) servants to uncleanness and to iniquity (lawlessness, two divisions of sin—impurity, against a man’s self,—lawlessness, against God) unto iniquity (lawlessness, both which, impurity and lawlessness, lead to lawlessness, result in it), so now yield your members as servants to righteousness (see ver. 16) unto (leading to, having as its result, perfect) sanctification— (contrast to lawlessness, and both embracing their respective consequences).

20–23.] As a further urging of the above exhortations, the Apostle contrasts the end of their former life with that of their present.

20.] For introduces a motive for the foregoing: but the verse properly belongs to the following: for ver. 22 is the contrast to it. For when ye were servants of sin, ye were free in regard of (i. e. in relation to) righteousness.—There is doubtless a latent irony in the use of the word free here: but it must not be brought out too strongly: it does not appear, till the end of that freedom is declared.

21.] ‘Well, then, ye were free: and what was the benefit?’

then concedes and assumes.—There are two ways of rendering and pointing: (1) that of A.V., carrying (on the question to the word ashamed, and supplying in those before things, adopted by Chrysostom and many others. But this though good as far as construction is concerned, is inconsistent with the New Test. meaning of fruit, which is ‘actions,’ the fruit of the man considered as the tree, not ‘wages,’ or ‘reward,’ the fruit of his actions: see below, ver. 22, and ch. i. 13, note. So even Phil. i. 22 (see note).—So that I much prefer (2) the punctuation of Theodoret and many others,—placing the interrogation at at that time, and making the rest the answer. What fruit then had ye at that time? (Things, deeds) whereof ye are now ashamed. And then follows the reason of their present shame. For the end (virtually the same as the wages, ver. 23, and would be a mere repetition of fruit on the first method of punctuation above) of those things (those fruits consisting of sinful acts) is death (death in the widest sense, see note on ver. 16,—physical, which has been the end of sin, in which we all are involved, —and spiritual and eternal, which will be the end of actual sin if followed out).

22.] Contrast of your present state to that former one: freedom from sin as a master,—servitude (compare ‘the speaking after the manner of men, ver. 19) to God (a higher description than merely righteousness, the actual antithesis to sin, ver. 18. The devil would be the corresponding antithetical power: and not unfrequently appears in the teaching of St. Paul: but usually in casual expressions, as Eph. iv. 27; vi. 11; 2 Tim. ii. 26, not as the principal figure in a course of argument), fruit (see above on ver. 21,—and remark your fruit, fruit actually brought forth, as much ‘as to say, “you have fruit, and your fruit is...”’) unto (leading unto perfect) sanctification,—and (ye have) the end everlasting life.

23.] The ends of the two courses placed, pointedly and antithetically, and the inherent difference, that whereas death (see above) is the wages (the word means the pay, or ration, of soldiers; compare the similitude in ver. 13, and remarks there) of sin, earned and paid down,—e ternal life is no such wages, nothing earned, but the free gift of God to His soldiers and servants;—and that in (not ‘through,’—true enough, but not implied in the preposition here: see above on ver. 11) Christ Jesus our Lord.

Romans: Chapter 7

VII. 1–6.] The explanation and proof of the assertion ch. vi. 14, “for ye are not under the law, but under grace:” the answer to the question of vi. 15 having occupied vi. 16–23.

1–4.] The Christian is dead to the law by being dead with Christ, and has become His.

1.] Connect with vi. 14, which is in fact the sentence immediately preceding. The steps of the proof are these: The law binds a man only so long as he lives (ver. 1): for example,—a married woman is only bound to her husband so long as he lives (vv. 2, 3):—so also the Christian being dead with Christ and alive to Him is freed from the law (ver. 4).

brethren] Not addressed particularly to Jewish Christians: see below: but generally to the Roman Church.

I am speaking (writing) to men acquainted with the law; i.e. the persons to whom I address this epistle are such as know the law: not, as the A.V. unfortunately, ‘I speak to them that know the law,’ as if he were now addressing a different class of persons. Nor does the knowledge of the law, here affirmed of the Romans, prove that the majority of them were Jewish Christians: they may have been Gentile proselytes.

that the (Mosaic: for of that, and not of any other law, is the whole argument) law hath power over a man for so long time as he (the man, see verses 4 and 6: not ‘it,’ i.e. the law, as some would render it, which would introduce the irrelevant question of the abrogation of the law, whereas the whole matter in argument is the relation of the Christian to the law) liveth?

2.] For (not merely an example, but the example is itself the proof) the woman which hath an husband (literally, the woman under a husband, in subjection to a husband) is bound by the law to her husband while he liveth (literally, to her living husband): but if her husband die, she is loosed from (literally, annulled from) the law of (‘regarding,’ compare “the law of the leper,” Levit. xiv. 2) the husband.

3.] Therefore (‘from the same consideration it follows that’), while her husband lives, she shall be called an adulteress, if she be joined to (i. e. attach herself to, become the wife of) another man: but if her husband die, she is free from the law (of her husband), so that she is not an adulteress, though she be joined to another man.—So far all is clear. But when we come to the application of the example, this must carefully be borne in mind, as tending to clear up all the confusion which has here been found by Commentators:—that the Apostle is insisting on the fact, that DEATH DISSOLVES LEGAL OBLIGATION: but he is not drawing an exact parallel between the persons in his example, and the persons in his application. The comparison might be thus made in terms common to both: (1) Death has dissolved the legal obligation between man and wife: therefore the wife is at liberty to be married to another:—(2) Death has dissolved the legal obligation between the law and us: therefore we are at liberty to be married to another. So far the comparison is strict. Further, it will not hold: for in the example, the liberated person is the survivor,—in the thing treated, the liberated person is the dead person. And so far from this being an oversight or an inaccuracy, it is no more than that to which, more or less, all comparisons are liable; and no more can be required of them than that they should fit, in the kernel and intent of the similitude. If it be required here to apply the example further, there is no difficulty nor inconsistency in saying (as Chrysostom does) that our first Husband was the Law, and our second is Christ; but then it must be carefully borne in mind, that we are freed, not by the law having died to us, (which matter here is not treated,) but by our having died to the law.

4.] So then (inference both from ver. 1, the general fact, and vv. 2, 3, the example), my brethren, ye also (as well as the woman in my example, who is dead to the law of her husband) were made dead (or, slain) to the law (crucified, see Gal. ii. 19, 20. The more violent word is used instead of “ye died,” to recall the violent death of Christ, in which, and after the manner of which, believers have been put to death to the law and sin,—and the past tense (not “are become,” as A.V.), to remind them of the great Event by which this was brought about) through (by means of) the (crucified) body (compare the expression “through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ,” Heb. x. 10) of Christ; that you might be joined to another, (even) to him who was raised from the dead (alluding both to the comparison in verses 2, 3, and to ch. vi. 4, 5), to the intent that we should bring forth fruit (alluding to ch. vi. 22, and at the same time [Luke i. 42] carrying on the similitude of marriage. Not that this latter must be pressed, for there is only an allusion to it: nor on the other hand need the least objection be raised to such an understanding of the words, as any one conversant with St. Paul’s way of speaking on this subject will at once feel):

comp. 2 Cor. xi. 2; Eph. v. 30–32) unto the honour of God.

5, 6.] In the fleshly state (before we died with Christ) sinful passions which were by the law worked in us and brought forth fruit to death: but now that we are dead to the law, we are no longer servants in the oldness of the letter, but in the newness of the spirit.—The Law (ch. v. 20, alluded to again vi. 14) was the multiplier of sin. To this thought, and the inferences from it, the Apostle now recurs, and contrasts the state under the law in this respect, with that of the believer in Christ. For when we were in the flesh (i. e., virtually “under the law:” see the antithesis in ver. 6; some take it to mean in the mere fleshly state, in which the Spirit is not yet energizing; i.e., the state of the unregenerate. But how does in the flesh denote “under the law?” Some say, on account of its carnality; some on account of the power of sin under the law. Best of all is it to understand it, as pointing to the period before death with Christ, in which we were sensual and sinful: so that to be in the flesh forms a contrast with to be put to death, made dead, the stirrings of sins which were through the law (the incitements,—not the sins, in this place, though ultimately it was so,—the incitements leading to the sin, are treated of. The full meaning must be kept, ‘which were by means of the law: i.e. the law occasioned them) were active (energized) in our members (the instruments of sin, ch. vi. 13) so as to bring forth fruit unto death (only a verbal antithesis to the words ‘unto God:’—‘whose end was death’).

6.] But now (opposed to the time spoken of in ver. 5) we have been loosed (annulled) from the law, having died unto that wherein we were held (the rendering of the A.V., “that being dead,” is without a shadow of authority; the reading on which it is founded having been a conjectural alteration of the sacred text by Beza, and not contained in any ancient copy whatever. It arose from an entire misunderstanding of the text; for it is not the law which is dead, but we who are dead to it, see ver. 4); so that we serve (not ‘that we should serve,’ as A.V. The present tense describes the actual state:—understand ‘God’ after serve) in the newness of the spirit (i. e. of the Holy Spirit of God, who originates and penetrates the Christian life:—the first mention of the Spirit, so much spoken of in ch. viii.), and not in the oldness of the letter (the law only a collection of precepts and prohibitions, but the Gospel a service of freedom, ruled by the Spirit, whose presence is liberty), Newness and oldness are not, as in ch. vi. 4, ‘newness of life,’ attributes of the genitives which follow them, but states in which those genitives are the ruling elements.

7-25.] An explanation of the part which the law has in bringing out sin, by example of the Apostle’s own case.—In this most important and difficult passage, it is of the first consequence to have a clear view of the form of illustration which the Apostle adopts, and of the reason why he adopts it. The former has been amply treated of by almost all Commentators: the latter too generally has escaped their enquiry. But it furnishes, if satisfactorily treated, a key to the other. I ask then first, why St. Paul suddenly changes here to the first person? And the answer is, because he is about to draw a conclusion negating the question, “Is the law sin?” upon purely subjective grounds, proceeding on that which passes within, when the work of the law is carried on in the heart. And he is about to depict this work of the Jaw by an example which shall set it forth in vivid colours, in detail, in its connexion with sin in a man. What example then so apposite, as his own? Introspective as his character was, and purified as his inner vision was by the Holy Spirit of God, what example would so forcibly bring out the inward struggles of the man which prove the holiness of the law, while they shew its inseparable connexion with the production of sin?—If this be the reason why the first person is here assumed (and I can find no other which does not introduce into St. Paul’s style an arbitrariness and caprice which it least of all styles exhibits), then we must dismiss from our minds all exposition which explains the passage of any other, in the first instance, than of Paul himself: himself indeed, as an exemplar, wherein others may see themselves: but not himself in the person of others, be they the Jews, nationally or individually, or all mankind, or individual men. This being done, there arises now a question equally important,—Of what self is it that he speaks throughout this passage? Is it always the same? If so, is it always the carnal, unregenerate self? or always the spiritual regenerate? Clearly not the latter always; for to that self the historical account of vv. 7–13 will not apply, and still less the assertion, in the present, of ver. 14. Clearly not the former always: for to that the assertion of ver. 22 will not apply, nor that of ver. 25. Is it always: the complex self, made up of the prevailing spiritual-regenerate, with the remains of the carnal-unregenerate? Not always this: although this seems nearer to satisfying the conditions: for in the description ver. 9, “I was alive without the law once,” and in “I am carnal, &c.” ver. 14, there is no complexity, but the “I” is clearly the carnal man. Therefore not always the same. If not always the same, where is the distinction? If we look carefully, the Apostle himself will guide us to it. Having carried on the “I” unqualified and unexplained till ver. 18, he there has occasion to say, “there dwelleth not in me any good.” But he is conscious that, as he had written to the Corinthians (1 Cor. iii. 16), “the Spirit of God dwelleth in you;” he therefore finds it necessary to correct himself by an explanation, what “I” he meant, and adds to “in me,” that is, in my flesh. So that “I” there is equivalent to “my flesh,” i.e. ‘myself in my state of life to the law and sin, and acting according to the motions of sin.’ Again, when the approval of the law of God is affirmed (not the mere designing to do His will, verses 15, 16, 19, 20, which I will treat by and by), it is not barely “I,” but, to avoid confusion, in ver. 22 the Apostle adds after the inward man, and in ver. 25 subjoins myself; in both cases shewing that (see notes below) he speaks of the complex man, himself made up of an inward, and an outward man, of the mind and the flesh. Are we then justified in assuming, that up to ver. 22 the carnal-unregenerate self is spoken of, but after that the complex self? Such a supposition would not be consistent with the assertion of the desire from ver. 15 onwards: no such will existing in the carnal unregenerate man. I believe the true account will be nearly as follows:—from ver. 7–13 incl. is historical, and the “I” there is the historical self, under the working of conviction of sin, and shewing the work of the law; in other words, the carnal self in the transition state, under the first motions towards God generated by the law, which the law could never have perfected. Then at ver. 14, St. Paul, according to a habit very common to him, keeps hold of the carnal self, and still having it in view, transfers himself into his present position,—altering the past tense into the present, still however meaning by “I” (in ver. 14), “my flesh. ” But, having passed into the present tense, he immediately minglest with this mere action of the law upon the natural conscience, the motions of the will towards God which are in conflict with the motions toward sin in the members. And hence arises an apparent verbal confusion, because the “I,” for example, in Ver. 17, of whom it is said, “it is no longer I that perform it,” being the entire personality, the complex self, is of far wider extent than the “I,” of whom it is said, “in me, that is, in my flesh, dwelleth not any good.” But the latter “I,” in this part of the chapter, is shewn to be (verses 17, 20) no longer properly “I,” but “sin that dwelleth in me,”—and so it passes altogether out of sight after ver. 20, and its place is taken by the actual then existing complex self of Paul compounded of the regenerate spiritual man, sympathizing with God’s law, serving God’s law, in conflict with the still remaining though decadent carnal man, whose essence it is to serve the law of sin, to bring captive to the law of sin. This state of conflict and division against one’s self would infallibly bring about utter ruin, and might well lead to despair (ver. 24), but for the rescue which God’s grace has provided by Jesus Christ our Lord. And this rescue has been such, that I, the “I myself” of ver. 25, the real self, the nobler and better part of the man, serve, with the mind (see there), the law of God: whereas it is only with the flesh, according to which (viii. 4) I do not walk, but overcome and mortify it, that I serve (am still subject to) the law of sin. Then this subjection of the flesh to the law of sin, to the bondage of corruption, is fully set out, in its nature,—consequences to the carnal,—and uses to the spiritual,—in ch. viii.—Any thing like a summary of the exposition of this passage would be quite beyond my limits. It may suffice here to say, that most of the ancients supposed “I” throughout the passage to represent mankind, or the Jews generally, and the whole to be taken chronologically, to ver. 9, as before the law, after ver. 9 as under the law. This was once Augustine’s view, but he afterwards changed it, and adopted in the main that advocated above.

7.] See note, ch. vi. 1.

Is the law (not ‘conscience,’ but in our case, the revealed law of God, which awoke the conscience to action) sin?—not ‘the cause of sin,’ which in one sense the Apostle would not have denied,—but sin, abstract for concrete, sinful, or, as Bengel expresses it, the sinful cause of sin. The question itself refers back to ver. 5, where the Apostle had spoken of “the stirrings of sins which were through the law.” It is asked, not by an objector, but by the Apostle himself, in anticipation of an objection.

Nevertheless] i.e. but what I mean is.....—I say not that, but....

I had not known] The literal rendering of the original sentence is, I was living in a state of ignorance of sin, were it not.... Then what is the sin here spoken of? Is it sin in act, or sin in principle,—the principle of sin? Not sin in act, so that I had not known sin should mean, ‘I had not entered into contact with sin,’ i.e. ‘had not sinned. ’ for then the law would have truly and actually been the cause of sin: nor, sin in act, so that the meaning were, ‘I had not known the nature of a sinful act? ’ for this would not agree with the subordination of the one particular sin specified below: the coveting itself being more general than the particular acts which it induced. But the reference must be to sin in principle, the principle of sin: I had not recognized such a thing as sin, but by means of the law. The law here is in the full sense of the Mosaic law as regarded himself,—not excluding the wider sense on which I have insisted in the former part of the Epistle when applied to others.

for I had not known (by experience: ‘known any thing of’) coveting (this rendering is better than “lust” of the A.V.: the substantive here being the one corresponding to the verb in the commandment. So also in ver. 8, coveting is better than “concupiscence. ” The word expresses the motions of the flesh towards sin,—whether acted on or not,—whether consented to or not:—this motion he would not have perceived, because he was simply moving with it), if the law had not said, Thou shalt not covet (Exod. xx. 17. Deut. v. 21). ‘Covet,’ in the above sense. The Apostle omits all the objects there specified, and merely lays hold of the idea contained in the prohibition. And it may well be said and strictly, that the ‘coveting’ there spoken of would lead to all kinds of sin—therefore murder, adultery, &c., if carried out: and that the prohibition of coveting there serves as an example of what the law actually forbids elsewhere.

8.] But (proceeding with the development of sin by means of the law) sin (the sinful principle or propensity, but without any conscious personification on the part of the Apostle), having found occasion (occasion means more than mere opportunity,—it indicates the furnishing the material and ground of attack, the wherewith and whence to attack. The words here are not to be joined with through the commandment following, which belongs to the verb wrought: see below), through (by means of) the commandment (meaning, not the law generally, but the tenth commandment, the prohibition in question) wrought in me (not ‘wrought out, ‘brought into action,’ but ‘originated,’—using this commandment as its instrument) all (manner of) coveting. For without the law sin is (not ‘was:’ the sentence is a general axiom,—compare ch. iv. 15) dead (powerless and inactive: comp. 1 Cor. xv. 56, “the strength of sin is the law”).—This deadness of sin without the law must not be understood as meaning that sin was committed but not recognized, the conscience being not informed nor awakened: such a statement would be true, but would not touch the matter argued here. Erasmus well explains this word dead: ‘Before the law was promulgated (but see below) I was ignorant of some sins, and only knew thus much of others, that I thought I might commit them because they were not forbidden: so that my mind was more lightly and languidly moved towards sin; for we ever have colder love towards those things which we can enjoy whenever we like. But when the law marked out so many different forms of sins, the whole band of lusts and desires, irritated by the prohibition, began more eagerly to solicit me towards sin.' Compare also Prov. ix. 17; and the citations from the classics in my Greek Test., to the effect that prohibition itself irritates and incites towards violation of the command.

9.] It is a great question with Interpreters, of what period St. Paul here speaks, Those who sink his own personality, and think that he speaks merely as one of mankind, or of the Jews, understand it of the period before the law was given: some, of Adam in Paradise before (?) the prohibition: those who see St. Paul himself throughout the whole think that he speaks,—some, of his state as a Pharisee: this however would necessitate the understanding the legal death which follows, of his conversion, which cannot well be: some, of his state as a child, before that freedom of the will is asserted which causes rebellion against the law as the will of another. Agreeing in some measure with the last view, I would extend the limits further, and say that he speaks of all that time, be it mere childhood or much more, before the law began its work within him,—before the deeper energies of his moral nature were aroused (see on "the commandment came" below).—And I was alive (not merely 'lived' 'went on', but emphatic, i.e. 'lived and flourished',—contrasted with "died" below) without the law (the law having no recognized place in my moral existence) once; but when the commandment (above, ver. 8) came (purely subjective; not 'was enacted', 'came in',—but 'came to me', as we say, 'came home to me', 'was brought home to me'), sin came to (sprung into) life (not 'revived'); however true it may be that sin was merely dormant, the idea insisted on here is, that it was dead and came to life, began to live and flourish), and I died (ceased to live-and-flourish as before,—fell into that state of unhappiness, which ever afterwards under the gospel he calls death, ver. 24; ch. viii. 2);

10.] and (not an additional particular, but equivalent to 'and so,'—merely changing the subject from 'I' to 'the commandment') the very commandment, which was for (tending to) life (comp. ch. x. 5, and references there: the life is one of prosperity primarily, but capable of, and indeed requiring [x. 5] a higher interpretation), this (very commandment) I found (literally, was found by me: this finding is purely subjective, said of the feeling in his own heart. As Chrysostom says, "he does not say the commandment became to me death, but was found, thus explaining the novelty and strangeness of the incongruous fact") to be for (tending to) death (explained on the word died above).

11.] For (explanatory how ver. 10 happened) sin (the sinful principle within me), having found an occasion (connect as in ver. 8, where see note),—through (by means of) the commandment deceived me (there is a plain reference to the Tempter deceiving Eve, which was accomplished by means of the commandment, exciting doubt of and objection to it, and lust after the forbidden thing: see 2 Cor. xi. 3; 1 Tim. ii. 14), and through (by means of) it slew me (i. e. brought me into the state of misery and death mentioned in ver. 10;—but there is an allusion again to the effect of the fall as the act of the Tempter).

12.] So that (seeing it was not the law in general, nor this particular commandment, that wrought coveting in me, but the sinful principle in me taking advantage of these, which themselves were given for life and not for death) the law is holy, and the commandment (viz. "Thou shalt not covet," ver. 8) holy, and righteous, and good ("he calls it holy, as teaching duty: righteous, as justly condemning t gressions; and good, as bringing life to them that keep it." See also 1 Tim. i. 8).

13.] Did then that which is good (i. e. the commandment, but made abstract for the sake of greater contrast) become death to me?—Was it, after all, the commandment itself that became to me this death of which I speak?—God forbid (far from it: let not such a thing be imagined): but sin [became death to me] that it might appear (be shewn to be) sin, (by) working death to me through that which is good (see above. The misuse and perversion of good is one of the tests whereby the energy of evil is detected; so that sin, by its perversion of the [good] commandment into a cause [evil] of death, was shewn in its real character as sin); that (explains and runs parallel with the former that) through the commandment sin might become exceeding (above measure) sinful: i.e. that sin, which was before unknown as such, might, being vivified and brought into energy by (its opposition to) the commandment, be brought out as being (not merely 'shewn to be') exceedingly sinful (sinful in an exaggerated degree—prominent in its true character as the opponent of God).

14.] On the change into the present tense here, see above in the remarks on the whole section. Hitherto, the passage has been historical: now the Apostle passes to the present time, keeping hold yet of the carnal self of former days, whose remnants are still energizing in the renewed man.—For (by way of explaining and setting in still clearer light the relative positions of sin and the law, and the state of inner conflict brought about by their working) we know (it is an acknowledged principle amongst us) that the law is spiritual (sprung from God, who is a Spirit, and requiring of men spiritual purity. These meanings, which have been separately held by different commentators may well be united): but I (see beginning of section) am carnal (subject to the law of the flesh, and in bondage to it, see below), sold (into slavery: but the similitude must not be exacted in all particulars, for it is only the fact of slavery, as far as its victim, the man, is concerned, which is here prominent) under (to, and so as to be under the power of) sin.—Tholuck (who differs from the view of this section advocated above, yet) adds here: "The 'I' appears here in its totality as sinful, while in vv. 16, 20 it is distinguished from sin. That St. Paul does not here bear in mind this distinction, may be justified by the maxim, that a thing takes its name from its principal component: the 'I' is a slave, and has not his own will: as ver. 23 shews, the 'I', which is hostile to sin, the law of the mind, is under coercion, and the man is a captive." The latter clause of the verse is the very strongest assertion of man's subjection to the slavery of sin in his carnal nature.

15.] For (a proof of this being sold under sin, viz. not being able to do what I would, verses 15–17) what I perform, that (am in the habit of carrying out in my practice: the verb is the same as that rendered in A.V. “perform” below, in verse 18) I know not (act blindly, at the dictates of another: which is proper to a slave. ‘I am in the dark, he says, I am hurried along, I suffer insolence, I am staggered and struck down I know not how.’ Chrysostom. The meaning, “I approve not” (allow not, A.V.), introduced by Augustine, and held by many commentators, is not sanctioned by usage, and would make the following clause almost a tautology): for (explanation of last assertion, shewing how such blind service comes to pass) not what I desire, that do I (this desire is not the full determination of the will, the standing with the bow drawn and the arrow aimed; but rather the inclination of the will,—the taking up the bow and pointing at the mark, but without power to draw it:—we have the same verb, in the sense of to wish (“I would”) 1 Cor. vii. 7, 32; xiv. 5; 2 Cor. xii. 20); but what I hate (the expression answers to “I desire not,” ver. 19: no distinction in intensity need be insisted on between the two), that I do. The commentators cite several parallel passages from profane writers: for example, Seneca: “I call you to witness, all ye gods, that this very thing which I wish, I desire not:”—Epictetus, “For if the sinner desires not to sin, but to do right, it is plain that what he desires, he does not, and what he desires not, he does:”—the well-known lines of Ovid—

“One thing my lust, my mind another prompts: I see the better, and approve it; but The worse my practice follows.”

16.] But if (‘now seeing that:’ takes up the foregoing, and draws an inference from it) I do that which I desire not, I consent unto (bear witness to) the law that it is good (viz. ‘in that the law prohibits what I also dislike,—the law and I are as one in proscribing the thing,—the law; and my wish, tend the same way’).

17.] So now (the now is not said of time, but is used logically, “seeing that things are so”) it is no longer (again, not a chronological, but a logical sequence, ‘it can no more be said, that’) I that perform (see above, on ver. 15) it, but sin that dwelleth in me.—Here the “I” is not the complex responsible self, by which the evil deed is wrought, and which incurs the guilt of working it: but the self of the WILL in its higher sense, the “inner man” of ver. 22. The not bearing this in mind has led to error in interpretation and doctrine: for example, when it is supposed that the Christian is not responsible for his sins committed against his spiritual will and higher judgment: whereas we are all responsible for the works of the sin that dwelleth in us, and it is in this very subjection to and entanglement with the law of sin in our members, that the misery consists, which leads to the cry in ver. 24.

18.] An explanation of the words sin that dwelleth in me, of the last verse.—For I know (by experience, detailed in the next ver.) that there dwelleth not in me, that is, in my flesh, any good (thing). I said, sin that dwelleth in me, because/feel sure, from experience, that in me (meaning by ‘me’ not that higher spiritual self in which the Spirit of God dwells, but the lower carnal self: see on this important limitation the remarks at the beginning of the section) dwells no good thing. And what is my proof of this? How has experience led me to this knowledge?—For (the proof from experience) to desire (to do good) is present with me; but to perform that which is good, is not (present with me). “I find” (A. V.) is omitted by our four oldest MSS.

19.] And this non-presence of the doing good is shewn by my acts, in that I do not the good that I desire (to do), but the evil which I do not desire, that I do.

20.] The inference of ver. 17 restated, with the premiss of ver. 16 in the place of “so now:”—but its meaning is now clearer and deeper than then; we know now that the “I” which does not the evil thing, is the better self of the inner man,—whereas the “me” in which sin dwells and rules, though included in the complex self, is the lower self, my flesh. And so the way is now prepared for at once setting forth the conflict within us between these two.

21.] I find therefore (i. e. as appears from what has been detailed) this law (presently to be defined as the law of sin in my members), that (consisting in this, that) when I desire (literally, to me desiring) to do good, evil is present with (see above, ver. 18) me.

22, 23.] Explanation of the conflict above alleged to exist. For I delight in the law of God after the inward man (the inward man is equivalent to the mind, ver. 25; compare St. Peter’s “hidden man of the heart,” 1 Pet. iii. 4. But not merely the mental and reasoning part of man:—for that surely does not delight in the law of God:—it is absolutely necessary to presuppose the influence of the Holy Spirit, and to place the man in a state of grace, before this assertion can be true. And it is surprising to find Commentators denying the gradual introduction of the spiritual man in the description of this conflict. TRUE, THE SPIRIT is not yet introduced, because purposely kept back until treated of as the great Deliverer from this state of death; the man is as yet described as compounded of the outer and inner man, of the flesh and the mind, and the operations of the two are detailed as if unassisted,—even the term spirit, for the human spirit, being as yet avoided,—but all this is done, because the object is to set the conflict and misery, as existing even in the spiritual man, in the strongest light, so that the question in ver. 24 may lead the way to the real uses and blessed results of this conflict in ch. viii.): but I see (equivalent to find:)—as if he were a spectator of that which is going on within) a different law (differing in kind and aim, not “another” merely) in my members (i. e. in my flesh, as in ver. 18) warring against (in continual dissension and conflict with) the law of my mind (the consent, viz. to the law of God, which my mind yields; not the law of God,—any more than the different law in my members is the law of sin,—but both meaning the standard or rule set up, which inclination follow:—the one in the mind, in harmony with the law of God,—the other in the members or flesh, subservient, and causing subservience, to the principle or law of sin, and bringing me (the whole complex self—the ‘me’ of personality and action) into captivity to the law of sin (the sinful principle, of resistance to God’s law: sin, as awakened and set energizing, ver. 9, by that law) which is in my members.—Commentators have much disputed whether this different law, and the law of sin, both being in my members, are different, or the same. It appears to me (see above) that the identity cannot be maintained without introducing great confusion into the sentence.

24.] The division of the man against himself,—his inward conflict, and miserable state of captivity to sin in the flesh, while with the mind he loves and serves the law of God. From this wretched condition, which is a very death in life, who shall deliver him? The expression body cannot, well be figurative, meaning, “the totality of sins,” or “the deadly mass of sin,” but must, on account of the part which the flesh and the members have hitherto borne, be literal.

The body of this death will mean, ‘the body whose subjection to the law of sin brings about this state of misery,’ compare “the body of sin,” ch. vi. 6. From this body, as the instrument whereby he is led captive to the law of sin and death, he cries out for deliverance: i.e. to be set free, as ch. viii. 2, from the law of sin and death.—The cry is uttered, as De Wette well observes, in full consciousness of the deliverance which Christ has effected, and as leading to the expression of thanks which follows. And so, and no otherwise, is it to be taken.

25.] The thanksgiving sentence is (not, of course, constructionally, but logically) an answer to the preceding question: Thanks be to God (who hath accomplished this) through Jesus Christ our Lord.—This exclamation and thanksgiving more than all convince me, that St. Paul speaks of none other than himself, and carries out as far as possible the misery of the conflict with sin in his members, on purpose to bring in the glorious deliverance which follows.—Compare 1 Cor. xv. 56, 57, where a very similar thanksgiving occurs.

So then, &c.] These words are most important to the understanding of the whole passage. We must bear in mind that it had begun with the question, IS THE LAW SIN? The Apostle has proved that it is NOT, but is HOLY. He has shewn the relation that it holds to sin, viz. that of vivifying it by means of man’s natural aversion to the commandment. He has further shewn that in himself, even as delivered by Christ Jesus, a conflict between the law and sin is ever going on: the misery of which would be death itself, were not a glorious deliverance effected. He now sums up his vindication of the law as holy; and at the same time, sums up the other side of the evidence adduced in the passage, from which it appears that the flesh is still, even in the spiritual man, subject (essentially, not practically and energetically) to the law of sin,—which subjection, in its nature and consequences, is so nobly treated in chap viii.

—So then (as appears from the foregoing), I myself (I, who have said all this against and in disparagement of the law; I, who write of justification by faith without the deeds of the law; I, Paul, who am writing to you, and as I write it to you) with the mind (the “mind” is “the inward man,” as in ver. 23) serve the law of God (which after the inward man he delights in, ver. 22), but with the flesh (the “I” of ver. 18; and the flesh, throughout, of ch. viii.) the law of sin. It remains to be seen, how this latter subjection, which in the natural man carries all with it, is neutralized, and issues only in the death of the body on account of sin, in those who do not walk after the flesh, but after the Spirit.

CHAP. VIII. 1–39.] In the case of those who are in Christ Jesus, this divided state ends in the glorious triumph of the Spirit over the flesh: and that (vv. 1–17), though incompletely, not inconsiderably, even here in this state—and (vv. 18–30) completely and gloriously hereafter. And (vv. 31–39) the Christian has no reason to fear, but all reason to hope; for nothing can sever him from God’s love in Christ. 1–17.] Although the flesh is still subject to the law of sin, the Christian, serving not the flesh, but walking according to the Spirit, shall not come into condemnation, but to glory with Christ.

1.] There is therefore (an inference from ch. vii. 25, because with their mind, and that mind dwelt in and led by the Spirit of Christ, they serve, delight in, the law of God) now (this now is emphatic, and follows upon the question and answer of vii. 24, 25, things being so,—now that a deliverance has been effected from the body of this death, by Christ. This is certain from the “for” which follows, setting forth the fact of the deliverance) no condemnation (that condemnation which is the penal consequence of sin original and actual) to them which are in Christ Jesus. (The expression in Christ Jesus refers particularly to the last place where God’s gift of life eternal in Christ Jesus our Lord was spoken of, ch. vi. 23,—and generally to all that was said in that chapter of our incorporation into and union with Him.)—The words “who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit," are probably an interpolation introduced from ver. 4, right enough in sense (see there), but out of place here, because this moral element of 'those who are in Christ' is not yet brought in: the present assertion is general, and is made good in detail by and by. The clause is wanting in almost all our earliest copies.

2.] For (a reason why there is no condemnation) the law (method, or influence, as in viii. 23,—used here perhaps for sharper contrast to the law of sin, below) of the Spirit of life (the Lord and Giver of life—life used in an incipient higher sense than "I was alive," in ch. vii. 9,—see below) in Christ Jesus (which prevails in those who are in Christ Jesus. Or, we may take in Christ Jesus with life,—the Spirit of that life which is in Christ Jesus. Or, again, we may, in the original, join these words with the verb: "set me free in Christ Jesus, from" &c.) set me free (not, as A.V., "hath made me free:" he is speaking of a definite time when this took place, and referring to the period of his conversion.—There is no stronger proof to my mind of the identity of the speaker in the first person throughout with the Apostle himself, than this extension of that form of speaking into this chapter: nothing more clearly shews, that there he was describing a really existing state within himself, but insulating, and as it were exaggerating it [as so often], to bring out more clearly the glorious deliverance to follow) from the law of sin (vii. 25) and death (death again here bears a higher meaning than in ch. vii. We are now on higher ground:—condemnation having been mentioned, which is the punishment of sin, death now involves that, and is not only temporal misery, but eternal ruin also).—This 'law of the Spirit of life' having freed him from the law of sin and death, so that he serves another master, all claim of sin on him is at an end—he is acquitted, and there is no condemnation for him.

3.] For (explanation of ver. 2, shewing the method of this liberation) what the law could not do (i. e. that which was not in the power of the law. The expression in the original may mean either, 'that part of the law which was impossible,'—'could not be obeyed,'—or, 'the inability of the law?—or, 'that which was unable to be done by the law.' Of these the first is out of the question; the second would give the first clause the meaning, 'that wherein the inability of the law shewed itself', viz. its powerlessness through the flesh. The third yields by far the best meaning: see below on the words "through the flesh"), in that (i. e. because: not 'wherein', as in ch. ii. 1, but 'in that.' this clause gives a reason and explanation of the inability) it was weak (the Apostle keeps in mind his defence of the holiness of the law undertaken in ch. vii., and as Chrysostom observes, "seems indeed to be depreciating the law, but if we pay accurate attention is really giving it the highest praise: for he does not say the iniquity of the law, but its inability: and again, 'in that it was weak,' not 'in that it wronged us,' or, 'in that it conspired against us'") through the flesh (i. e. in having to act through the flesh; not, 'on account of the flesh,' i.e. of the hostility, or weakness, of the flesh. The flesh was the medium through which the law,—being a law of carnal commandment, Heb. vii. 16, —wrought, and they that are in the flesh, the objects on which), God (did) sending his own Son (the stress is on His own, and the word is pregnant with meaning:—His own, and therefore like Himself, holy and sinless. This implication should be borne in mind, as the suppressed antithesis to the word sin, three times repeated afterwards. Another antithesis may be implied: His own, and therefore spiritual, not acting merely through the flesh, though in its likeness, but bringing a higher spiritual life into the manhood) in the likeness of the flesh of sin (the flesh, whose attribute and character was SIN. The expression is not equivalent to "sinful flesh," as in A.V., but implies far more:—not merely the contamination by, but the belonging to, and being possessed by, sin.—De Wette observes, 'The words "in the likeness of the flesh of sin," appear almost to border on Docetism (the heresy which held the Humanity of our Lord to be only apparent, not real); but in reality contain a perfectly true and consistent sentiment.' "The flesh of sin" is flesh (human nature, John i. 14; 1 John iv. 2; Heb. ii. 14) possessed with sin: the Apostle could not then have said, "sending His Son in the flesh of sin," without making Christ partaker of sin: nor could he have said merely "in the flesh," for then the bond between the Manhood of Jesus, and sin, would have been wanting: he says then, in the likeness of the flesh of sin,—meaning by that, He had a nature like sinful human nature, but had not Himself a sinful nature,—comp. Heb. iv. 15: "For we have not an High Priest which cannot sympathize with our infirmities, but one who was tempted in all things, like as we are, apart from sin." The likeness must be referred not only to the word "flesh," but also to the epithet "of sin":—it did not however consist in this, that He took our sins (literally) on Himself and became Himself sinful, which would not amount to likeness of nature,—but in this, that He was able to be tempted, i.e. subjected to sensuous incitements, e.g. of pain, which in other men break out into sin, but in Him did not. See Phil. ii. 7, and note.—"Flesh" is not equivalent to "body," but as in John i. 14, the material, of which man is in the body compounded),—and for (on account of) sin (to be joined with "sending," not "condemned:" least of all may we understand it as Luther, "and condemned sin in the flesh by means of sin." The 'for,' or 'on account of' sin, is at present indefinite, and not to be restricted to Christ's death as a sin-offering, which is not just now the subject. 'On account of sin' then, is equivalent to "to put away sin," as Heb. x. 6, 18), condemned sin in the flesh (not 'the sin which was in the flesh,' which is against the context, in which "sin" is throughout an absolute principle).

In condemned we have an allusion to "condemnation," ver. 1. Hence it has been taken to mean that God condemned, punished, sin in the flesh by the death of Christ. But that can hardly be the meaning here, for several reasons. 1. The Apostle is not speaking of the removal of the guilt, but of the practice of sin, and of the real fulfilment of the law in those who are in Christ. It is this which even in ver. 1 is before him, grounding as he does the fact of no condemnation on the serving the law of God, ch. vii. 25; on the new and sanctifying power of the Spirit by Christ, in spite of the continued subjection of the flesh to the law of sin. 2. The context shews that the weakness of the law was, its having no sanctifying power;—it could arouse sin, but it could not condemn and cast it out. This indeed is the burden of ch. vii. The absence of justifying power in the law has already been dealt with. 3. The following verse clearly makes the fulfilling the righteous demand of the law no matter of mere imputation, but of walking after the Spirit.—We must then look for the meaning of the word condemned in the effects and accompaniments of condemnation,—victory over, and casting out of sin. See, for example, John xii. 31, where “the judgment of this world” is explained by the ruler of this world shall be cast out, and also John xvi. 11. I have dwelt at length on this question, as being very important to the right apprehension of the whole chapter, in this part of which not the justification, but the sanctification, of Christians is the leading subject. It is a strong confirmation of the above view, that God’s condemnation of sin in the flesh by Christ is stated in ver. 3 as the ground of (ver. 2) my being freed from the law of sin and death: because, viz. Christ’s victory over sin is mine, by my union with Him and participation in His Spirit. in the flesh does not mean ‘in His flesh,’ or ‘by means of his flesh;’ but ‘in the flesh, which Christ and ourselves have in common):

4.] (in order) that (the purpose of God’s condemning sin in the flesh) the righteous demand (or, requirement) of the law (meaning, all its requirements [statutes], but here combined in one for the sake of more distinct objectivity) might be fulfilled in us (find its full accomplishment:—not merely ‘be performed by us,’—for the Apostle has a much deeper meaning, viz. that the aim of God in giving the Law might be accomplished in us, in our sanctification, which is the ultimate end of our redemption, Eph. ii. 10; Col. i. 22. The passive is used, to shew that the work is not ours, but that of God by His Grace), who walk (not ‘walking as we do,’—but a description of all those of whom the above is true) not after the flesh, but after the Spirit (who, notwithstanding that we are bound up with a flesh of sin, do not walk in our daily life according to, or led by, the law of sin which is in our members, but according to and led by the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus—members of Him, and participating in that victory over sin which He obtained, by which the power of sin in our flesh is broken),

5.] For (explanation of the last) they that are after (not quite the same as, walk after) the flesh (they that are after the flesh are equivalent to the carnal) do mind (‘think of, ‘care for, and strive after’) the things of (belonging to) the flesh (its objects of desire); but they that are after the Spirit (the spiritual: see above) (mind) the things of (belonging to) the Spirit (the higher aims and objects of desire of the spiritual life).

6.] For (the spiritual man cannot seek the things of the flesh, because) the mind (thoughts, cares, and aims, as above) of the flesh is (ends in,—amounts to, being worked out) death (not merely physical, nor mere unhappiness, as sometimes in ch. vii., but as in ver. 2, in the largest sense, extending to eternity); but the mind (thoughts, cares, and aims) of the Spirit is (see above) life and peace (in the largest sense, as above). In this argument there is a suppressed premiss, to be supplied from ver. 2; viz. ‘The Spirit is the Spirit of life’ Hence it follows that the spiritual man cannot mind the things of the flesh, because such mind is death. The addition and peace seems to be made to enhance the unlikelihood of such a minding,—the peace of the Spirit being a blessed contrast to the tumult of the fleshly lusts, even in this life.

7.] Because (reason why the mind of the flesh is death) the mind of the flesh is enmity (contrast to peace above) against God (it being assumed that God is the source of life, and that enmity against Him is the absence of all true peace): for it doth not submit itself (better than the mere passive of the A.V.) to the law of God,—for neither can it (this was proved in ch. vii.):

8.] and (as a further consequence, if the mind of the flesh cannot be subject to God’s law, then they who are in the flesh, and are led by that mind, cannot please God. So then, in the A.V., is erroneous) they that are in the flesh (as their element of life and thought: nearly the same as they that are after the flesh above, which however denotes the rule which they follow. In 2 Cor. x. 3, the two are distinguished: “though we walk in the flesh, we do not war according to the flesh”) cannot please God. Melanchthon remarks, “This passage is a complete refutation of Pelagius, and of all who imagine that men can obey God’s law without the Holy Spirit.”

9.] But (opposition to they that are in the flesh) ye are not in the flesh (see above), but in the Spirit, if (i. e. if so be that, ‘provided that;’ not ‘since.’) That this is the meaning here is evident by the exception which immediately follows) the Spirit of God dwelleth in you. But (this must be rightly understood: for) if any man hath not (not, have not, as A.V. The verb in the original is indicative, not subjunctive; because the case is put as an existent one) the Spirit of Christ (the same as the Spirit of God above. Observe here that the expressions “the Spirit of God,” “the Spirit of Christ,” and “Christ,” are all used of the Holy Spirit indwelling in the Christian), he is none of His (belongs not to Him, in the higher and blessed sense of being united to Him as a member of Him).

10.] Now (in slight contrast to the last verse, he brings out one point, which might seem to be an exception to the blessed consequences of the life-giving power of Christ indwelling in us) if Christ is in you (i. e. if the Spirit of God dwelleth in you, see 2 Cor. iii. 17), the (your) body indeed is dead by reason of sin (still remains dead, see 2 Cor. iv. 11–14, under the power of death physical [and eternal?], because of sin which it, of itself, stands in, and serves); but the (your) spirit (perhaps he now uses spirit, regarding our spirits as possessed and penetrated by God’s Spirit) is life (this would hardly be said if only our human spirits were meant, but the participle would be used, is revived or quickened) by reason of righteousness (not here the imputed righteousness of justification, which is not now under treatment, but the implanted righteousness of the sanctification of the Spirit. This appears not only from the context, but also from the words, by reason of sin, which answer to it).

11.] But (he takes up and continues the supposition in the former verse, with which in fact this is nearly identical, but with the important additional particular [whence the contrast] that Jesus was raised) if the Spirit of Him who raised up Jesus from the dead dwelleth in you (which Spirit is therefore powerful over death, and besides renders you partakers of Christ's Resurrection), He that raised up Christ from the dead (the personal name, JESUS, reminds us more of the historic fact of the resurrection of the one Person, Jesus: the official and mystical name, CHRIST, of the body of which he is the Head and we the members,—all raised with Him by the one Spirit dwelling in all) shall quicken (make alive: not merely shall raise up, because it is not merely the resurrection of the body which is in the Apostle's view,—see below) even your mortal bodies (the higher phase of the quickening takes place in the spirit of man: and even of that which takes place in the body, there are two branches—one, the quickening it from being a tool of unrighteousness unto death [eternal],—the other, the quickening it out of death [physical] to be a new and glorified body. And the even, joined with your mortal bodies here, signifies that the working of the quickening (life-giving) Spirit shall not stop at the purely spiritual resurrection, nor at that of the body from dead works to serve the living God, but shall extend even to the building up the spiritual body in the future new and glorious life) by reason of His Spirit which dwells in you.—Here the reading in the original is much disputed. One form of it can only mean, ‘by means of,’ ‘through,’ His Spirit, &c.: this the other may include, (it not being specified for what reason it is on the Spirit's account, and leaving it open to be His presence, or His agency,) but must be expressed ‘on account of,’ or ‘because of,’ His Spirit. Both expressions may imply that the Holy Spirit is the agent in the quickening; but the former, by means of, cannot bear the other meaning, that God will quicken, &c. because of His Spirit, &c. Hence in dispute with the Macedonian heretics, who denied the divinity of the Holy Spirit, this reading was important to the orthodox, as expressing agency, and that alone. But it seems pretty clear that the variation was older than the time of this heresy [Cent. IV.]; and, however it may then have been appealed to, its origin cannot be assigned to any falsification by either of the then disputant parties.—As to how far the Holy Spirit is the direct Agent in the resurrection of the body, see note on life-giving, or *quicken*ing Spirit, 1 Cor. xv. 45, and on 2 Cor. v. 5. Here, His direct agency cannot be in any way surprising, for it is the whole process of bringing from death to life, extending even to the mortal body, which is here spoken of—and unquestionably, ‘the Lord and Giver of Life’ is the agent throughout in this quickening. “He is not speaking,” says Calvin, “of the last resurrection, which shall take place in a moment, but of the continued operation of the Spirit, which, extinguishing by degrees the remainder of the fleshly mind, restores in us celestial life:”—but perhaps he had better have said “not only of the last resurrection:” for it certainly is one thing spoken of.

12, 13.] So then, brethren, we are (inference from the assurance in the last verse) debtors (we owe fealty: to what or whom, he leaves the reader to supply from ver. 11), not to the flesh, to live after the flesh (Chrysostom well explains the qualification, to live after the flesh: “For indeed we are debtors to it in many respects; in the duty of nourishing it, of cherishing it, of refreshing it, of healing it when sick, of clothing it, and paying it a hundred other services. That it may not be imagined that the Apostle is repudiating these obligations, when he has said ‘we are not debtors to the flesh,’ he explains what he means, by adding ‘to live after the flesh:’ i.e. we must not make it lord of our lives”). For if ye live after the flesh, ye must (or will,—are sure to,—it will be the certain end of your present course) die (both live and die here are in their full and pregnant sense, involving body and soul here and hereafter: but not to be understood as excluding the carnal from any resurrection—only from that which is truly life,—any more than the spiritual are exempted from all death, but only from that which is truly death): but if by the Spirit ye mortify (literally, slay, put to death: i.e. abolish, annul) the deeds (as Col. iii. 9, the whole course of habits and action which has the flesh for its prompter) of the body (this amounts to saying “of the flesh,” but is here put in the concrete, to give more vivid reality. The Apostle calls them the deeds of the flesh in Gal. v. 19), ye shall live (not “ye must, or will, live;” this Life being no natural consequence of a course of mortifying the deeds of the body, but the gift of God through Christ: and coming therefore in the form of an assurance, ‘ye shall live,’ from Christ’s Apostle.—On what is meant by living, see above).

14.] For (ground of the assurance contained in the announcement, “ye shall live”) as many as are led by (the slaying the deeds of the body by the Spirit, implies the being under the Spirit’s guidance) the Spirit of God, they (emphatic—‘these and no others’) are sons of God.—A son of God differs from a child of God, in implying the higher and more mature, and conscious member of God’s family, see Gal. iv. 1–6, and note on 6. Hence our Lord is never called the Child, but always the Son of God. This latter, applied to a Christian, signifies ‘one born of God’ in the deepest relation to Him,—and hence a partaker of His nature, 1 John iii. 9; 1 Pet. i. 23.

15, 16.] Appeal to the CONSCIOUSNESS of the Christian to confirm the assertion assumed for the moment that he is led by God's Spirit that he is a son of God.—For (confirming what preceded) ye did not receive (at your becoming Christians: not, as A.V., obscuring the sense, “have not received”) the spirit of bondage (i. e. ‘the Spirit which ye received was not a spirit of bondage.’ The spirit is not merely a spirit, a disposition, but evidently refers to the same Spirit which afterwards is “the Spirit of adoption,” and “the Spirit itself.” The Apostle seems however in this form of expression, both here and elsewhere, e.g. 2 Cor. iv. 13; Eph. i. 17; 2 Tim. i. 7, to have combined the (objective) Spirit given to us by God with our own (subjective) spirit. In the next verse they are separated) [leading] back (or, again). But the latter word is undesirable, as having led to its being imagined here that it must refer to a former bestowal of the spirit of bondage, and consequently that the reference is to the Old Test. dispensation. For there seems to me to be no occasion to go back for the reference to the Old Test. The state of the natural man is bondage: the Holy Spirit given to them, the agent of their birth into, and sustainer of, a new state, was not a spirit of bondage back again into fear, a spirit merely to retain them in, or take them back into their old state, viz. a state of slavery:—to whom, or whether to different masters, is not here in question, but the state merely—the object of the gift of the Holy Spirit was not to lead them back into this) unto fear (so as to bring about or result in fear, see ch. vi. 19); but ye received the Spirit of (the Spirit whose effect was, see above) adoption (this stricter meaning, and not that of mere sonship, is plainly that intended by the Apostle. Of course, the adoption to be a son involves sonship, but not the converse), wherein (compare “in the Spirit,” ch. ii. 29, and ver. 9. It is not merely “whereby,” as A.V. The Spirit is He in whom, not merely by whom we use the voice of a son, being not merely an external agent, but an indwelling and pervading power) we cry (the earnest expression of suppling prayer), Abba, Father (I have said, on Mark xiv. 36, that Father does not appear to be a mere explanation of Abba, but to have been joined to it in one phrase, as a form of address: expressing probably a corresponding ‘my Father’ in the Hebrew expression. Luther, to express the familiarity of Abba, renders this ‘dear Father’).—See on the whole, the strictly parallel place, Gal. iv. 6.

16.] And this confidence is grounded on the testimony of the Spirit itself. So Chrysostom: “I assert this, says the Apostle, not merely from the cry itself, but from the cause out of which the cry arises:... for it is not a cry belonging alone to the state of grace, but belonging to the Comforter who gave the gift: for it is He Himself who taught us, being in the state of grace, thus to cry.” This verse, being without any conjunction coupling it to what went before, is best understood to refer to the same as the preceding, and the assertion to concern the same fact as the last verb, “we cry,” grounding that fact on an act of the indwelling Spirit Himself. See again Gal. iv. 6.—The Spirit itself (the word itself expresses the independence, and at the same time, as coming from God, the preciousness and importance of the testimony) beareth witness to our spirit (see ch. ii. 15, and note: not, as in A.V., ‘beareth witness with our spirit,’ which is not the usage of the verb in the original. It is the same word as in Rev. xxii. 18, “I bear witness unto every one, &c.”), that we are children of God.—What is this witness of the Spirit itself? All have agreed, and indeed this verse is decisive for it, that it is something separate from, and higher than, all our own inferences and conclusions. But on the other hand it does not consist in mere indefinite feeling, but in a certitude of the Spirit's presence and work continually asserted within us. It is manifested, as Olshausen beautifully says, in His comforting us, His stirring us up to prayer, His reproof of our sins, His drawing us to works of love, to bear testimony before the world, &c. And he adds, with equal truth, “On this direct testimony of the Holy Ghost rests, ultimately, all the regenerate man's conviction respecting Christ and His work. For belief in Scripture itself (he means, in the highest sense of the term ‘belief,’ ‘conviction personally applied’) has its foundation in this experience of the divine nature of the (influencing) Principle which it promises, and which, while the believer is studying it, infuses itself into him.”—The same Commentator remarks, that this is one of the most decisive passages against the pantheistic view of the identity of the Spirit of God and the spirit of man. However the one may by renovating power be rendered like the other, there still is a specific difference. The spirit of man may sin (2 Cor. vii. 1), the Spirit of God cannot, but can only be grieved (Eph. iv. 30), or quenched (1 Thess. v. 19): and it is by the infusion of this highest Principle of Holiness, that man becomes ONE SPIRIT with the Lord Himself (1 Cor. vi. 17).

children of God] Here it is children, not sons, because the testimony respects the very ground and central point of sonship, likeness to and desire for God: the testimony of the Spirit shewing us by our yearnings after, our confidence in, our regard to God, that we are verily begotten of Him.

17.] CONSEQUENCES of our being children of God.—And if children, then (or, also) heirs (which is the universal rule of mankind: but the word here must not be carried to the extent of the idea of heir in all directions: it is merely the one side of inheriting by promise, which is here brought out: the word referring back probably to ch. iv. 13, 14, the promise to Abraham); heirs of God (as our Father, giving the inheritance to us), and joint-heirs with Christ (whom God has made heir of all things, Heb. i. 2).—Tholuck remarks: “It is by virtue of their substantial unity with the father, that the children come into participation of his possession. The Roman law regarded them as continuators of his personality. The dignity of the inheritance is shewn (1) by its being God's possession, (2) by its being the possession of the Firstborn of God. By the Roman law, the share of the firstborn was no greater than that of the other children,—and the New Test. sets forth this view, making the redeemed equal to Christ (ver. 29), and Christ's possessions, theirs; 1 Cor. iii. 21–23; John xvii. 22. In the joint heirship we must not bring out this point, that Christ is the rightful Heir, who shares His inheritance with the other children of God: it is as adoptive children that they get the inheritance, and Christ is so far only the means of it, as He gives them power to become sons of God, John i. 12”); if (at least) (on this if, see above on ver. 9) we are suffering with Him, that we may also be glorified with Him: i.e. ‘if (provided that) we are found in that course of participation in Christ's sufferings, whose aim and end, as that of His sufferings, is to be glorified as He was, and with Him.’ But the if does not regard the subjective aim, nor does it mean, ‘If at least our aim in suffering is, to be glorified,’—but the fact of our being partakers of that course of sufferings with Him, whose aim is, wherever it is found, to be glorified with Him.—The connexion of suffering with Christ, and being glorified with Him is elsewhere insisted on, see 2 Tim. ii. 11; 1 Pet. iv. 13; v. 1.—This last clause serves as a transition to vv. 18–30, in which the Apostle treats of the complete and glorious triumph of God's elect, through sufferings and by hope, and the blessed renovation of all things in and by their glorification.

18.] For (meaning, this suffering with Him in order to being glorified with Him is no casting away of toil and self-denial, seeing that) I reckon (implying, ‘I myself am one who have embraced this course, being convinced’) that the sufferings of this present time (of trial and sorrow, contrasted with the period of triumph following the coming of Christ) are of no account (literally, not worthy) in comparison with the glory which is to be revealed (viz. at the revelation, or manifestation, of Christ. On the sentiment, see 2 Cor. iv. 17) in us (not merely to us, as spectators; but, literally, toward, or with regard to, as the subjects of the revelation. “In us” must be thus understood, and not as meaning within us, in our hearts, which it does not. St. Bernard amplifies this: “The sufferings of this time are not worthy to be compared to the past sins which are remitted, the present grace of consolation which is imparted, the future glory which is promised”).

19 ff.] The greatness of this glory is shewn by the fact that ALL CREATION, now under the bondage of corruption, shall be set free from it by the glorification of the sons of God.—For (proof of this transcendent greatness of the glory, not of the certainty of its manifestation, though this secondary thought is perhaps in the background) the earnest expectation (or, patient expectation, perhaps better: the original word denotes that the expectation continues till the time is exhausted, and the event arrives) of the creation (i. e. of all this world except man, both animate and inanimate: see an account of the expositions below) is waiting for (see above) the revelation of the sons of God (“the glory is revealed,” says Bengel, “and simultaneously with it are revealed the sons of God.” It is the sons, not the children, because their sonship will be complete, and possessed of all its privileges and glories).

the creation has been very variously understood. “The expression has by many been erroneously taken in an arbitrarily limited sense; e.g. as applying only, I. to inanimate creation: but against this are the words which follow, not willingly, and also the groaning and travailing together in pain, implying life in the creation,—for to set these down to mere personification is surely arbitrary:—and one can imagine no reason why bestial creation should be excluded. II. to living creation: (1) to mankind. Augustine and others take it of men not yet believers: (2) Locke and others, of the yet unconverted Gentiles: (3) some, of the yet unconverted Jews: (4) others again, of the converted Gentiles: or, (5) of the converted Jews: or, (6) of all Christians.”—But against the whole of these lies this objection, that if the Apostle had wished to speak of the enslaving and freeing of mankind, he hardly would have omitted reference to sin as the ground of the one, and faith of the other, and the judgment on unbelievers. But on the other hand we must not extend the idea of the creation too wide, as Theodoret, who includes the angels; others, who understand the whole Creation, animate and inanimate, rational and irrational: and others, who include the unconverted Gentiles: nor make it too indefinite, so as to take in ‘the whole universe.’ The right explanation is, all animate and inanimate nature as distinguished from mankind. The idea of the renovation and glorification of all nature at the revelation of the glory of our returned Saviour, will need no apology, nor seem strange, to the readers of this commentary, nor to the students of the following, and many other passages of the prophetic Word: Isa. xi. 6 ff.; lxv. 17 ff; Rey. xxi.; 2 Pet. iii. 13; Acts iii. 21.

20.] Explanation of the REASON WHY all creation waits, &c.—For the creation was made subject to vanity (vanity, as in Ps. xxxix. 6. So also Eccles. i. 2, and throughout. It signifies the instability, liability to change and decay, of all created things), not willingly (because all things by nature shrink from corruption), but by reason of Him who made it subject (i. e. God, who is the occasion, and His glory the end, of creation’s corruptibility—Chrysostom and others suppose the person meant to be Adam, who was the occasion of its being subjected; and at first sight the expression by reason of seems to favour this. But I very much doubt whether this view can be borne out. For does not the expression him who made it subject imply a conscious act of intentional subjugation, and not merely an unconscious occasioning of the subjugation? Thus we have it said of God, 1 Cor. xv. 27, “He hath put all things in subjection under his feet” and, “Then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that made all things subject unto him.” And (2) he is speaking of the originating cause of this subjection, not of the efficient means of it. He says that creation was not subjected willingly, i.e. by reason of its own will, but by reason of him who made it subject. At the same time such a way of putting it, removing as it were the supreme will of God to a wider distance from corruption and vanity, and making it not so much the worker as the occasion of it, as well as this indefinite mention of Him, is quite intelligible on the ground of that reverential awe which so entirely characterizes the mind and writings of the Apostle. If the occasion pointed at by this making subject be required, I should hardly fix it at the Fall of man, but at his creation, in the eternal counsels,—when he was made capable of falling, liable to change.—The explanation of “he that made it subject,” as meaning ‘the devil’ [Locke and others], hardly needs refutation. See Matt. x. 28, and note) in (‘on condition of, ‘in a state of) hope (in hope must not be joined with the verb “made it subject,” because then the hope becomes the hope of Him,—but with the former verb, “was made subject,” being the hope of the thing subjected), because (the original word will also admit of being rendered “that,” but not so well, for then it is not likely that “the creation itself” would be so emphatically repeated: the clause now announces a new fact, and thus the emphasis is accounted for. If we adopt the rendering that, we must suppose the whole following clause subjective to the word hope, i.e. descriptive of that which is hoped for: and this would be to attribute to the yearnings of creation, intelligence and rationality,—consciousness of itself and of God) the creation itself also (not only we, the sons of God, but even creation itself) shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption (its subjection to the law of decay, see Heb. ii. 15) into (the construction is that which is called by grammarians a pregnant one: shall be delivered from, &c., and admitted into) the liberty of the glory (‘the liberty of the glory’ is not in any sense equivalent to ‘the glorious liberty;’ in the latter, ‘glorious’ is merely an epithet whereby the liberty is characterized, as in ‘His rest shall be glorious;’ in the former the liberty is described as consisting in, belonging to, being one component part of, the glorified state of the children of God: and thus the thought is carried up to the state to which the freedom belongs) of the children (children and not sons here, perhaps as embracing God’s universal family of creation, admitted, each in their share, to a place in incorruption and glory) of God.

22.] For we know (said of an acknowledged and patent fact, see ch. ii. 2; iii. 19; vii. 14) that the whole creation groaneth [together] and travaleth in pain together (not, groans and travails with us or with mankind, which would render the “not only so, but” of the next verse superfluous. On the figure in the verb travaleth, see John xvi. 21, note) until now (i. e. up to this time: from the beginning till now: no reference to time future, because the words “we know” express the results of experience):

23.] and (moreover) not only so (i. e. not only is this the case with the creation), but even we ourselves, having (not ‘which have,’ but ‘though we have’) the firstfruit of the Spirit (i. e. the indwelling and influences of the Holy Spirit here, as an earnest of the full harvest of His complete possession of us, spirit and flesh and soul hereafter. That this is the meaning, seems evident from the analogy of St. Paul’s imagery regarding the Holy Spirit: he treats of Him as an earnest and pledge given to us, Eph. i. 14; 2 Cor. i. 22; v. 5, and of His full work in us as the efficient means of our glorification hereafter, ver. 11; 2 Cor. iii. 18. Various other renderings are,— (1) ‘the first outpouring of the Spirit,’ in point of time, which would be irrelevant: (2) ‘the highest gifts of the Spirit’ The genitive, of the Spirit, may be partitive or subjective:—the firstfruit of the Spirit,—which Spirit is the harvest,—or the firstfruit of the Spirit, which the Spirit gives:—or even in apposition, the firstfruit of the Spirit, i.e. which consists in (the gift of) the Spirit. I prefer the first, from analogy—the Spirit being generally spoken of as given, not as giving,—and God as the Giver), even we ourselves (repeated for emphasis, and we inserted to involve himself and his fellow-workers in the general description of the last clause. Some have imagined the Apostles only to be spoken of: some, that the Apostles are meant in one place, and all Christians in the other) groan within ourselves, waiting for the end of the (or, our) adoption (the verb signifies, as above, ver. 19, but even more strongly here, ‘wait out,’ ‘wait for the end of,’ Our adoption is come already, ver. 15, so that we do not wait for it, but for the full manifestation of it, in our bodies being rescued from the bondage of corruption and sin), to wit [or namely], the redemption (‘expecting that full and perfect adoption which shall consist in the redemption’) of our body (not ‘rescue from our body,’ as some render it, which is inconsistent with the doctrine of the change of the vile and mortal into the glorious and immortal body,—Phil. iii. 21: 2 Cor. v. 2–4,—but the [entire] redemption,—rescue,—of the body from corruption and sin).

24, 25.] For (confirmation of the last assertion, proving hope to be our present state of salvation)—in hope were we (not ‘are we,’ nor ‘have we been,’) saved (i. e. our first apprehension of, and appropriation to ourselves of, salvation which is by faith in Christ, was effected in the condition of hope: which hope is in fact faith in its prospective attitude,—that faith which is “the substance of things hoped for,” Heb. xi. 1): but hope that is seen (the object or fulfilment of which is present and palpable) is not hope: for that which a man seeth, why doth he also (or, at all) hope for? The also conveys, after an interrogative word, a sense of the utter superfluity of the thing questioned about, as being irrelevant, and out of the question.

25.] Literally, But if that which we do not see, we hope for, with (literally, through) patience we wait for it. Patience (endurance) is the state, in which,—through which as a medium,—our waiting takes place.

26.] In like manner (another help to our endurance, co-ordinate with the last—our patience is one help to it, but not the only one) doth the Spirit also (the Holy Spirit of God) help our weakness (not, help us to bear our weakness, as if the weakness were the burden, which the Spirit lifts for and with us,—but, helps our weakness,—us who are weak, to bear the burden of ver. 23. And this weakness is not only inability to pray aright, which is merely an example of it, but (general weakness): for (example of the help above mentioned;—‘for this, viz. what to, &c.’) we know not what we should pray for as we ought (two things;—what we should pray,—the matter of our prayer;—and how we should pray for it,—the form and manner of our prayer): but the Spirit itself (Tholuck remarks,—“The addition of itself brings into more prominence the idea of the Spirit, so as to express of what dignity our Intercessor is,—an Intercessor who knows best what our wants are”) maketh intercession [for us] (these words are omitted in most of our ancient authorities) with groanings which cannot be uttered:—i. e. the Holy Spirit of God dwelling in us, knowing our wants better than we, Himself pleads in our prayers, raising us to higher and holier desires than we can express in words, which can only find utterance in sighings and aspirations: see next verse. Chrysostom interprets the words of the spiritual gift of prayer, and adds, “For the man who is granted this grace, standing praying in great earnestness, supplicating God with many mental groanings, asks what is good for all.” Calvin understands, that the Spirit suggests to us the proper words of acceptable prayer, which would otherwise have been unutterable by us. Macedonius gathered from this verse that the Holy Spirit is a creature, and inferior to God, because He prays to God for us. But as Augustine remarks, “The Holy Spirit groans not in Himself, with Himself, in the Holy Trinity, but in us, in that He makes us to groan.” No intercession in heaven is here spoken of, but a pleading in us by the indwelling Spirit, of a nature above our comprehension and utterance.

27.] but (opposed to the words “which cannot be uttered:” the groanings ‘are indeed unutterable by us, but...’) He that searcheth the hearts (God) knoweth what is the mind (intent, or bent, as hidden in those sighs) of the Spirit. A difficulty presents itself in the rendering of the next clause. The particle with which it opens may mean either because, or that. If it is to be causal, because He (the Spirit) pleads for the saints according to the will of God, it would seem that knows must bear the meaning ‘approves,’ otherwise the connexion will not be apparent; and so Calvin and others have rendered it. Hence many render it that,—‘knows what is the mind of the Spirit, that He pleads, &c. with (or, according to) God.’ But I must confess that the other rendering seems to me better to suit the context: and I do not see that the ordinary meaning of the word knoweth need be changed. The assurance which we have that God the Heart-Searcher interprets the inarticulate sighings of the Spirit in us,—is not, strictly speaking, His Omnipotence,—but the fact that the very Spirit who thus pleads, does it according to God,—in pursuance of the divine purposes and in conformity with God's good pleasure.—All these pleadings of the Spirit are heard and answered, even when inarticulately uttered: we may extend the same comforting assurance to the imperfect and mistaken verbal utterances of our prayers, which are not themselves answered to our hurt, but the answer is given to the voice of the Spirit which speaks through them, which we would express, but cannot. Compare 2 Cor. xii. 7–10, for an instance in the Apostle's own case.

28.] Having given an example in prayer, how the Spirit helps our weakness, and out of our ignorance and discouragement brings from God an answer of peace, he now extends this to all things—all circumstances by which the Christian finds himself surrounded. These may seem calculated to dash down hope, and surpass patience; but we know better concerning them. Moreover (or, but; and if so, it seems most naturally to apply to ver. 22, the groaning and travailing of all creation) we know (as a point of the assurance of faith) that, to those who love God (a stronger designation than any yet used for believers), all things (every event of life, but especially, as the context requires, those which are adverse. To include, with Augustine, the sins of believers in this all things, as making them “humbler and wiser,” is manifestly to introduce an element which did not enter into the Apostle's consideration; for he is here already viewing the believer as justified by faith, dwelt in by the Spirit, dead to sin) work together (in the sense of all things co-operating one with another) for (towards, to bring about) good (their eternal welfare;—the fulfilment of the purpose of the “love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord,” ver. 39),—to those who are called (not only invited, but effectually called—see below) according to [His] (the possessive pronoun is not expressed in the original) purpose.—In this further description the Apostle designates the believers as not merely loving God, but being beloved by God. The divine side of their security from harm is brought out, as combining with and ensuring the other. They are sure that all things work for their good, not only because they love Him who worketh all things, but also because He who worketh all things hath loved and chosen them, and carried them through the successive steps of their spiritual life. The calling here and elsewhere spoken of by the Apostle (comp. especially ch. ix. 11) is the working, in men, of “the everlasting purpose of God whereby before the foundations of the world were laid, He hath decreed by His counsel secret to us, to deliver from curse and damnation those whom He hath chosen in Christ out of mankind, and to bring them by Christ to everlasting salvation.” Art. X. of the Church of England. To specify the various ways in which this calling has been understood, would far exceed the limits of a general commentary. It may suffice to say, that on the one hand, Scripture bears constant testimony to the fact that all believers are chosen and called by God,—their whole spiritual life in its origin, progress, and completion, being from Him:—while on the other hand its testimony is no less precise that He willett all to be saved, and that none shall perish except by wilful rejection of the truth. So that, on the one side, GOD'S SOVEREIGNTY,—on the other, MAN'S FREE WILL,—is plainly declared to us. To receive, believe, and act on both these, is our duty, and our wisdom. They belong, as truths, no less to natural than to revealed religion: and every one who believes in a God must acknowledge both. But all attempts to bridge over the gulf between the two are futile, in the present imperfect condition of man. The very reasonings used for this purpose are clothed in language framed on the analogies of this lower world, and wholly inadequate to describe God regarded as He is in Himself. Hence arises confusion, misapprehension of God, and unbelief. I have therefore simply, in this commentary, endeavoured to enter into the full meaning of the sacred text, whenever one or other of these great truths is brought forward; not explaining either of them away on account of possible difficulties arising from the recognition of the other, but recognizing as fully the elective and predestinating decree of God, where it is treated of, as I have done, in other places, the free will of man. If there be an inconsistency in this course, it is at least one in which the nature of things, the conditions of human thought, and Scripture itself, participate, and from which no Commentator that I have seen, however anxious to avoid it by extreme views one way or the other, has been able to escape.

29, 30.] The Apostle now goes backward from the word called, to explain how this CALLING came about. It sprung from God's fore-knowledge, co-ordinate with His fore-determination of certain persons to be conformed to the image of His Son, that Christ might be exalted as the Head of the great Family of God. These persons, thus foreknown and pre-determined, He, in the course of His Providence actually, but in His eternal decree implicitly, called, bringing them through justification to glory;—and all this is spoken of as past, because to Him who sees the end from the beginning,—past, present, and future, ARE NOT, but ALL IS ACCOMPLISHED WHEN DETERMINED.—Because whom He foreknew (but in what sense? This has been much disputed: the Pelagian view,—“those who He foreknew would believe,” is taken by Origen, Chrysostom, Augustine, and others; the sense of fore-loved, by Grotius, and others: that of fore-decreed, by Stuart and others: that of elected, adopted as His sons, by Calvin, who says, “The foreknowledge of God, of which Paul here makes mention, is not bare prescience, as some ignorant persons foolishly pretend, but adoption, whereby God hath ever distinguished His sons from the wicked.” That this latter is implied, is certain: but I prefer taking the word in the ordinary sense of foreknew, especially as it is guarded from being a “bare prescience” by what follows: see below and Gal iv. 9). He also foreordained (His foreknowledge was not a mere being previously aware how a series of events would happen: but was co-ordinate with, and inseparable from, His having pre-ordained all things) to bear the likeness of the image of His Son (the image of Christ here spoken of is not His moral purity, nor His sufferings, but as in 1 Cor. xv. 49, that entire form, of glorification in body and sanctification in spirit, of which Christ is the perfect pattern, and all His people shall be partakers. To accomplish this transformation in us is the end, as regards us, of our election by God; not merely to rescue us from wrath. Compare 1 John iii.

2, 3; Phil. iii, 21: and on the comprehensive meaning, Phil. ii. 6, 7,—where “form” expresses both the ‘form of God’ in which Christ was, and ‘the form of a servant,’ in which He became incarnate), that He might (or, may, as Calvin, but the reference is to the past decree of God) be the firstborn among many brethren (i. e. that He might be shewn, acknowledged to be, and glorified as, THE Son OF GOD, pre-eminent among those who are by adoption through Him the sons of God. This is the further end of our election, as regards Christ: His glorification in us, as our elder Brother and Head):

30.] And whom He foreordained, those He also called (in making the decree, He left it not barren, but provided for those circumstances, all at His disposal, by which such decree should be made effectual in them.

called, supply “to His own kingdom and glory,” 1 Thess. ii. 12; other expressions are found in 1 Cor. i. 9; 2 Thess. ii, 14; 1 Tim. vi. 12; 1 Pet. v. 10): and whom He called, these He also justified (the Apostle, remember, is speaking entirely of God's acts on behalf of the believer: he says nothing now of that faith, through which this justification is, on his part, obtained): and whom He justified, them He also glorified (He did not merely, in His premundane decree, acquit them of sin, but also clothe them with glory: the past tense being used, as the other past tenses, to imply the completion in the divine counsel of all these, —which are to us, in the state of time, so many successive steps,—simultaneously and irrevocably).

31.] What then shall we say to these things (what answer can the hesitating or discouraged find to this array of the merciful acts of God’s love on behalf of the believer)? If God is for us (and this He has been proved to be, vv. 28–30,—in having foreknown, predestinated, called, justified, glorified us), who shall be (or, is: there is no verb expressed in the original) against us?

32.] He (in the original He at least) that (taking one act as a notable example out of all) spared not His own Son (HIS OWN, —His only-begotten, the only one of God’s sons who is One with Him in nature and essence, begotten of Him before all worlds. No other sense of own will suit its position here, in a clause already made emphatic by at least, in consequence of which whatever epithet is fixed to son must partake of the emphasis), but delivered Him up (not necessarily to death only, but generally, as “gave,” in John iii. 16: granted Him, when He might have withheld Him) on behalf of us all (so that every one of us believers, even the most afflicted, has an equal part in Him. Of others, nothing is said here), how shall He not (how can it be that He will not) also with Him (in consequence of and in analogy with this His greatest gift: it is a question arguing from the greater to the less) give freely to us all things (all that we need or hope for; or even more largely, all created things, for ours, to subserve our good, and work together for us: comp. 1 Cor. iii. 22)?

33.] The punctuation of these verses is disputed. Many follow, in verses 33, 34, the undoubted form of ver. 35, and place an interrogation after each clause, as in the text; while others make “God that justifieth,” and “Christ that dieth, &c.,” the reply to and rejection of the questions preceding them. The former method is preferable, as preserving the form of ver. 35, and involving no harshness of construction, which the other does: see my Greek Testament. Who shall lay any charge against the elect of God? Shall God who justifies them (Chrysostom strikingly says, “He saith not, ‘God who remitteth sins,’ but which is much more, ‘God who justifieth.’ For when the vote of the judge himself acquits, and of Such a Judge, of what weight is the accuser?”) Who is he that condemns them? [Is it] Christ who died, yea, who is also risen again, who is also at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us? “All the great points of our redemption are ranged together, from the death of Christ to His still enduring intercession, as reasons for negating the question above.” De Wette.

35.] Who (i. e. what: but masculine, for uniformity with verses 33, 34) shall separate us from the love of Christ?—Is this (1) our love to Christ, or (2) Christ's love to us, or (3) our sense of Christ's love to us? The first of these is held by Origen, Chrysostom, and others. But the difficulty of it lies in consistently interpreting ver. 37, where not our endurance in love to Him, but our victory by means of His love to us, is alleged. And besides, it militates against the conclusion in ver. 39, which ought certainly to respond to this question.—The third meaning is defended by Calvin. But the second, maintained by Beza, Grotius, and many others, appears to me the only tenable sense of the words. For, having shewn that God’s great love to us is such that none can accuse nor harm us, the Apostle now asserts the permanence of that love under all adverse circumstances —that none such can affect it,—nay more, that it is by that love that we are enabled to obtain the victory over all such adversities. And finally he expresses his persuasion that no created thing shall ever separate us from that Love, i. e., shall ever be able to pluck us out of the Father’s hand.

36.] The quotation here expresses,— ‘all which things befall us, as they befall God’s saints of old,—and they are no new trials to which we are subjected:—What, if we verify the ancient description?

37.] Nay (negation of the question preceding), in all these things we are more than conquerors (or, and perhaps better, we are far the conquerors) through Him who loved us (i. e. so far from all these things separating us from His love, that very love has given us a glorious victory over them).—It is doubted whether ‘He who loved us’ be the Father, or our Lord Jesus Christ. This is, I think, decided by “to Him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in His own blood,” Rey. i. 5. The use of such an expression as a title of our Lord in a doxology, makes it very probable that where unexplained, as here, it would also designate Him.

38.] For I am persuaded (a taking up and amplifying of the being ‘far the conquerors,’—our victory is not only over these things, but I dare assert it over greater and more awful than these), that neither death, nor life (well explained by De Wette as the two principal possible states of man, and not as equivalent to ‘any thing dead or living,’ as Calvin and others), nor angels, nor principalities (whether good or bad; the word is used of good, Eph. i. 21; Col. i. 16; of bad, 1 Cor. xv. 24? Col. ii. 15; Eph. vi. 12; here, generally.—Angels, absolutely, seems never to be used of bad angels: if it here means good angels, there is no objection to the rhetorical supposition that they might attempt this separation, any more than to that of an angel from heaven preaching another gospel, Gal. i. 8), nor things present, nor things to come (no vicissitudes of time), nor powers (some confusion has evidently crept into the arrangement. I follow the very strong consent of the ancient MSS.), nor height, nor depth (no extremes of space), nor any other created thing, shall be able to separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord (here plainly enough God’s love to us in Christ,—to us, as we are in Christ, to us, manifested in and by Christ).

CHAP. IX.—XI.] The Gospel being now established, in its fulness and freeness, as the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth,—a question naturally arises, not unaccompanied with painful difficulty, respecting the exclusion of that people, as a people, to whom God’s ancient promises were made. With this national rejection of Israel the Apostle now deals: first (ix. 1–5) expressing his deep sympathy with his own people: then (ix. 6–29) justifying God, who has not (verses 6–13) broken His promise, but from the first chose a portion only of Abraham’s seed, and that (verses 14–29) by His undoubted elective right, not to be murmured at nor disputed by us His creatures: according to which election a remnant shall now also be saved. Then as to the rejection of so large a portion of Israel, their own self-righteousness (verses 30–33) has been the cause of it, and (x. 1–13) their ignorance of God’s righteousness,—notwithstanding that (verses 13–21) their Scriptures plainly declared to them the nature of the Gospel, and its results with regard to themselves and the Gentiles, with which declarations Paul’s preaching was in perfect accordance. Has God then cast off His people (xi. 1–10)? No—for a remnant shall be saved according to the elec-tion of grace, but the rest hardened, not however for the purpose of their destruction, but (xi. 11–24) of mercy to the Gentiles: which purpose of mercy being fulfilled, Israel shall be brought in again to its proper place of blessing (xi. 25–32). He concludes the whole with a humble admiration of the unsearchable depth of God’s ways, and the riches of His Wisdom (xi. 33–36). In no part of the Epistles of St. Paul is it more requisite, than in this portion, to bear in mind his habit of INSULATING the one view of the subject under consideration, with which he is at the time dealing. The divine side of the history of Israel and the world is in the greater part of this portion thus insulated: the facts of the divine dealings and the divine decrees insisted on, and the mundane or human side of that history kept for the most part out of sight, and only so much shewn, as to make it manifest that the Jews, on their part, failed of attaining God’s righteousness, and so lost their share in the Gospel. It must also be remembered that, whatever inferences, with regard to God’s disposal of individuals, may justly lie from the Apostle’s arguments, the assertions here made by him are universally spoken with a national reference. Of the eternal salvation or rejection of any individual Jew there is here no question: and however logically true of any individual the same conclusion may be shewn to be, we know as matter of fact, that in such cases not the divine, but the human side, is that ever held up by the Apostle—the universality of free grace for all—the riches of God’s mercy to all who call on Him, and consequent exhortations to all, to look to Him and be saved. The apparent inconsistencies of the Apostle, at one time speaking of absolute decrees of God, and at another of culpability in man,—at one time of the election of some, at another of a hope of the conversion of all,—resolve themselves into the necessary conditions of thought under which we all are placed, being compelled to acknowledge the divine Sovereignty on the one hand, and human free will on the other, and alternately appearing to lose sight of one of these, as often as for the time we confine our view to the other.

IX. 1–5.] The Apostle’s deep sympathy with his own people Israel. The subject on which he is about to enter, so unwelcome to Jews in general, coupled with their hostility to himself, and designation of him as a deceiver (2 Cor. vi. 8: comp. also 2 Cor. i. 17; ii. 17; iv. 1, 25 vii. 2), causes him to begin with a previous apology or depreciation, bespeaking credit for simplicity and earnestness in the assertion which is to follow. This depreciation and assertion of sympathy he puts in the forefront of the section, to take at once the ground from those who might charge him, in the conduct of his argument, with hostility to his own alienated people.—I say [the] truth in Christ (as a Christian,—as united to Christ; the ordinary sense of the expression “in Christ,” so frequent with the Apostle),—I lie not (confirmation of the preceding, by shewing that he was aware of what would be laid to his charge, and distinctly repudiating it),—my conscience bearing me witness of the same (not, “also bearing me witness,” as A.V. It is accordance with the fact, not joint testimony, which is asserted) in the Holy Spirit (much as “in Christ” above:—a conscience not left to itself, but informed and enlightened by the Spirit of God), I have great sorrow and unceasing anguish in my heart, The reason of this grief is reserved for a yet stronger description of his sympathy in the next verse.

3.] For I could wish (literally, I was wishing). This imperfect tense is not historical, alluding to his days of Pharisaism as some have supposed, but implies, as very often, a half-expression-of a desire: ‘I was wishing, had it been possible.’ The sense of the imperfect tense in such expressions is the proper and strict one,—and no new discovery, but common enough in every schoolboy's reading: the act is unfinished, an obstacle intervening) that I myself (see ch. vii. 25; it gives emphasis, as 'I, Paul,' 2 Cor. x. 1, Gal. y. 2: 'I, the very person who write this, and whom ye know') were accursed (a thing accursed, "anathema," in the original: an irrevocable devotion to God, or, a thing or person so devoted. All persons and animals thus devoted were put to death; none could be redeemed, Lev. xxvii. 28, 29. The subsequent scriptural usage of the word arose from this. It never denotes simply an exclusion or ex-communication, but always devotion to perdition,—a curse. Attempts have been made to explain away the meaning here, by understanding excommunication; or even natural death only: but excommunication included cursing and delivering over to Satan:—and the mere wish for natural death would, as Chrysostom eloquently remarks, be altogether beneath the dignity of the passage. Perhaps the strangest, interpretation is that of Dr. Burton: "St. Paul had been set apart and consecrated by Christ to His service; and he had prayed that this devotion of himself might be for the good of his countrymen:"—it is however no unfair sample of a multitude of others, all more or less shrinking from the full meaning of the fervid words of the Apostle) from Christ (i. e. cut off and separated from Him for ever in eternal perdition. No other meaning will satisfy the plain sense of the words. On this wish, compare Exod. xxxii. 32) in behalf of (in the place of: or, if thus I could benefit, deliver from perdition) my brethren, my kinsmen according to the flesh—The wish is evidently not to be pressed as entailing on the Apostle the charge of inconsistency in loving his nation more than his Saviour. It is the expression of an affectionate and self-denying heart, willing to surrender all things, even, if it might be so, eternal glory itself, if thereby he could obtain for his beloved people those blessings of the Gospel which he now enjoyed, but from which they were excluded. Nor does he describe the wish as ever actually formed; only as a conceivable limit to which, if admissible, his self-devotion for them would reach. Others express their love by professing themselves ready to give their life for their friends; he declares the intensity of his affection by reckoning even his spiritual life not too great a price, if it might purchase their salvation.

4.] Not only on their relationship to himself does he ground this sorrow and this self-devotion: but on the recollection of their ancient privileges and glories—Who are Israelites (a name of honour, see John i. 47; 2 Cor. xi. 22; Phil. iii. 5); whose (is) the adoption (see Exod. iy. 22; Deut. xiv. 1; xxxii. 6; Isa. i. 2), and the glory (perhaps their general preference and exaltation, consequent on the adoption,—but far more probably, as all the other substantives refer to separate matters of fact,—the Shechinah, or visible manifestation of the divine Presence on the mercy-seat between the cherubim; see references), and the covenants (not, the two tables of the law,—as some understand it,—which formed but one covenant, and are included in "the giving of the law;" nor, the Old and New Testament Covenants,—as others,—see Gal. iv. 24 ff.: but the several renewals of the covenant with Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and finally with the whole people at Sinai:—see Gen. xv. 9–21; xvii. 4, 7, 10; xxvi. 24; xxviii. 13; Exod. xxiv. 7, 8), and the giving of the law ("if others boast of their Solons and Lycurguses, how far juster ground of boasting: is there of the Lord as Lawgiver?"? Calvin. The word includes both the act of giving the Law, and the Law thus given), and the service (ordinances of worship: see Heb. ix. 1, 6: the words in brackets are not expressed in the original, but are implied in the word used), and the promises (probably only those to the patriarchs, of a Redeemer to come, are here thought of, as the next two clauses place the patriarchs and Christ together without any mention of the prophets. So Abraham is described, Heb. vii. 6, as "he that had the promises"),—w hose are the fathers (probably to be limited to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob:—but Stephen gives the appellation a much wider meaning in Acts vii. 11, 12, 19, 39, 44, and so apparently St. Paul himself, Acts xiii. 17. In all those places, however, except Acts vii. 19, "our" is joined with the word "fathers," whereas here it is absolute: so that the above limitation may be true),—and of whom is Christ, so far as regards the flesh (the expression implies that He was not entirely sprung from them, but had another nature; 'on His human side'—"as far as pertains to His human body"), who is God over all (this word all is of uncertain gender in the original, but must be probably taken as neuter: all things, not "all persons:" compare ch. xi. 36), blessed for ever. Amen.—The punctuation and application of this doxology have been much disputed. By the early Church it was generally rendered as above, and applied to Christ. Passages, it is true, have been collected from the fathers to shew that they applied the words "God over all" to the FATHER alone, and protested against their application to the SON; but these passages themselves protest only against the erroneous Noetian or Sabellian view of the identity of the Father and the Son, whereas in Eph. iv. 5, 6, "one Lord," "one God and Father of all, who is over all," are plainly distinguished. That our Lord is not, in the strict exclusive sense, "the God who is over all," every Christian will admit, that title being reserved for the Father: but that He is "God over all" none of the above-mentioned passages goes to deny.—The first trace of a different interpretation, if it be one, is found in an assertion of the Emperor Julian, who says that our Lord is never called God by St. Paul, nor by St. Matthew, or St. Mark, but by St. John only. The next is in the punctuation of two of our later manuscripts of the eleventh and twelfth centuries, which arrange the sentence thus: of whom as concerning the flesh is Christ. God over all [be] blessed for ever." This is followed by several among the moderns, and generally by Socinians. The objections to this rendering are, (1) ingenuously suggested by Socinus himself, and never yet obviated,—that without one exception in Hebrew or Greek, wherever an ascription of blessing is found, the predicate blessed precedes the name of God. (2) That the words who is on this rendering, would be superfluous altogether (see below). (3) That the doxology would be unmeaning and frigid in the extreme. It is not the habit of the Apostle to break out into irrelevant ascriptions of praise; and certainly there is here nothing in the immediate context requiring one. If it be said that the survey of all these privileges bestowed on his people prompts the doxology,—surely such a view is most unnatural: for the sad subject of the Apostle's sympathy, to which he immediately recurs again, is the apparent inanity of all these privileges in the exclusion from life of those who were dignified with them. If it be said that the incarnation of Christ is the exciting cause, the words "according to the flesh" come in most strangely, depreciating, as it would on that supposition, the greatness of the event, which then becomes a source of so lofty a thanksgiving. (4) That the expression "blessed for ever" is twice besides used by St.

Paul, and each time unquestionably not in an ascription of praise, but in an assertion regarding the subject of the sentence. The places are, ch. i. 25, and 2 Cor. xi. 31: whereas he uses the phrase “Blessed be God” as an ascription of praise, without joining “for ever.” See the rest of the discussion in my Greek Test. I have shewn there, that the rendering given in the text is not only that most agreeable to the usage of the Apostle, but the only one admissible by the rules of grammar and arrangement. It also admirably suits the context: for, having enumerated the historic advantages of the Jewish people, he concludes by stating one which ranks far higher than all,—that from them sprung, according to the flesh, He who is God over all, blessed for ever.—Amen is the accustomed ending of such solemn declarations of the divine Majesty: compare ch. i. 25.

6–13.] God has not broken his promise: for He chose from the first but a portion of the seed of Abraham (6–9), and again only one out of the two sons of Rebecca (10–13).

6.] Not as though (i. e. ‘but I do not mean such a thing, as that....,’ or ‘the matter however is not so, as that.. .’) the word (i. e. the promise) of God hath fallen to the ground (or, to nothing, viz. by many, the majority of the nominal Israel, missing the salvation which seemed to be their inheritance by promise).—For not all who are sprung from Israel (Israel meaning Jacob, according to Tholuck: but this does not seem necessary: Israel here as well as below may mean the people, but here in the popular sense, there in the divine idea), (these) are Israel (veritably, and in the sense of the promise).

7.] Nor, because they are (physically) the seed of Abraham, are they all children (so as to inherit the promise): but (we read) “In Isaac shall thy seed be called” (i. e. those only shall be called truly and properly, for the purposes of the covenant, thy seed, who are descended from Isaac, not those from Ishmael or any other son).

8.] That is (that amounts, when the facts of the history are recollected, to saying), Not they which are the children of the flesh (begotten by natural generation, compare John i. 13, and Gal. iv. 29) are the children of God; but the children of the promise (begotten not naturally, but by virtue of the divine promise [Gal. iv. 23], as Isaac) are reckoned for seed.

9.] For this word was (one) of promise (not, ‘For this is the word of promise.’) The stress is on promise: the children of promise are reckoned for seed: for this word, in fulfilment of which Isaac was born, was a word of promise). According to this time (literally in the Hebrew, ‘when the time (shall be) reviviscent,’ i.e. next year at this time. The change into “Sarah shall bear a son” is probably made for the sake of emphasis—the promise was to Sarah) I will come, and there shall be a son to Sarah (so literally in the Greek).

10, 11.] And not only (so) (i. e. not. only have we an example of the election of a son of Abraham by one woman, and the rejection of a son by another, but also of election and rejection of the children of the same woman, Re-becca, and that before they were born); but when Rebecca also had conceived by one man (in the former case, the children were by two wives; the difference between that case and this being, that there, was diversity of parents, here, identity. The points of contrast being then this diversity and identity, the identity of the father also is brought into view. “For Rebecca was Isaac’s only wife, and had both her children by Isaac: and yet these children by the same father and the same mother, the issue of the same birth,—own brothers on both sides, and twins besides, had not the same destiny”), our father Isaac (“our father” is probably said without any special reference, the Apostle speaking as a Jew. If with any design, it might be to shew that even among the Patriarchs’ children such distinction took place.—Christians being children of promise, the expression might apply to them: but the argument here is to shew that not all the children of promise belonged to the election. See ch. iv. 1–12),—for without their having been yet born (the subject, “the children,” is to be supplied partly from the fact of her pregnancy just stated, partly from the history, well known to the readers), or having done any thing good or ill, to the end that the purpose of God according to (purposed in pursuance of, or in accordance with, or with reference to His) election may (not might; the pur-pose is treated as one in all time, which would be nullified if once thwarted) abide (stand firm),—not depending on works (ch. iii. 20; iv. 2), but on him that calleth (this is decisive against the Pelagianism of the Romanists, who by making our faith as foreseen by God the cause of our election, affirm it to be dependent on works); it was said to her, “The elder shall serve the younger” (this prophecy is distinctly connected in Gen. xxv. 23 with the prophetic description of the children as two nations,—‘the one people shall be stronger than the other people, and the elder shall serve the younger.’ But the nations must be considered as spoken of in their progenitors, and the elder nation is in fact that sprung from the elder brother. History records several subjugations of Edom by the kings of Judah; first by David (2 Sam. viii. 14);—under Joram they rebelled (2 Kings viii. 20), but were defeated by Amaziah (2 Kings xiv. 7), and Elath taken from them by Uzziah (2 Kings xiv. 22); under Ahaz they were again free, and troubled Judah (2 Chron. xxviii. 16, 17, comp. 2 Kings xvi. 6, 7)—and continued free, as prophesied in Gen. xxvii. 40, till the time of John Hyrcanus, who reduced them finally, so that thenceforward they were incorporated among the Jews): as it is written, Jacob I loved, but Esau I hated (there is no necessity here to soften the ‘hated? into ‘loved less:’ the words in Malachi preeved on the fullest meaning of hate, see ver. 4, “The people against whom the Lord hath indignation for ever”).

14–29.] This election was made by the indubitable right of God, Who is not therefore unjust.

14.] What then shall we say (anticipation of a difficulty or objection,—but not put into the mouth of an objector)? Is there unrighteousness (injustice) with (in) God (viz. in that He chooses as He will, without any reference to previous desert)? God forbid.

15.] For He saith to Moses, “I will have mercy on whomsoever I have mercy, and I will have compassion on whomsoever I have compassion” (the meaning apparently is, ‘whenever I have mercy on any, it shall be pure mercy, no human desert contributing; which agrees better with the next verse than the ordinary rendering, which lays the stress on the “whomsoever;” and is not inconsistent with ver. 18, “he hath mercy on whom he will,” because if God’s mercy be pure mercy without any desert on man’s part, it necessarily follows that He has mercy on whom He will, His will being the only assignable cause of the selection).

16.] So then (inference from the citation) it is not of (God’s mercy ‘does not belong to,’—‘is not in the power of’) him that willeth (any man willing it), nor yet of him that runneth (any man contending for it, see reff. and Phil. iii. 14. There hardly can be any allusion to Abraham’s wish for Ishmael, Gen. xvii. 18, and Esau’s running to hunt for venison, as some think), but of God that hath mercy.—I must pause again here to remind the student, that I purposely do not enter on the disquisitions so abundant, in some commentaries on this part of Scripture, by which it is endeavoured to reconcile the sovereign election of God with our free will. We shall find that free will asserted strongly enough for all edifying purposes by this Apostle, when the time comes. At present, he is employed wholly in asserting the divine Sovereignty, the glorious vision of which it ill becomes us to distract by continual downward looks on this earth. I must also protest against all endeavours to make it appear, that no inference lies from this passage as to the salvation of individuals. It is most true (see remarks at the beginning of this chapter) that the immediate subject is the national rejection of the Jews: but we must consent to hold our reason in abeyance, if we do not recognize the inference, that the sovereign power and free election here proved to belong to God extend to every exercise of His mercy—whether temporal or spiritual—whether in Providence or in Grace—whether national or individual. It is in parts of Scripture like this, that we must be especially careful not to fall short of what is written: not to allow of any compromise of the plain and awful words of God’s Spirit for the sake of a caution which He Himself does not teach us.

17.] The same great truth shewn on its darker side:—as regards not only God’s mercy, but His wrath also.—For (confirmation of the universal truth of the last inference) the scripture (identified with God, its Author: the case is different when merely something contained in Scripture is introduced by “the Scripture saith:” there the Scripture is merely personified. The justice of this remark will be apparent, if we reflect that this expression could not be used of the mere ordinary words of any man in the historical Scriptures, Ahab, or Hezekiah,—but only where the text itself speaks, or where God spoke, or, as here, some man under inspiration of God) saith unto Pharaoh, For this very purpose did I raise thee up (literally in the Hebrew, “made thee stand;” the Septuagint have “thou wert preserved to this day” they apparently understood it of Pharaoh being kept safe through the plagues. This has perhaps been done to avoid the strong assertion which the Apostle here gives, purposely deviating from the Septuagint, that Pharaoh was ‘raised up,’ called into action in his office, to be an example of God’s dealing with impenitent sinners), that I may shew forth my power (those deeds of miraculous power, of which Egypt was then witness) in thee (‘in thee as an example,’—‘in thy case,’—‘by thee’), and that my name may be published abroad in all the earth (compare as a comment, the words of the song of triumph, Exod. xv. 14–16).

18.] Therefore he hath mercy on whom he will (ref. to ver. 15, where see note), and whom he will he hardeneth.—The frequent recurrence of the expression “to harden the heart” in the history of Pharaoh should have kept Commentators from attempting to give to harden here the sense of treating hardly, against which the next verse would be decisive, if there were no other reason for rejecting it. Whatever difficulty there lies in this assertion, that God hardeneth whom He will, lies also in the daily course of His Providence, in which we see this hardening process going on in the case of the prosperous ungodly man. The fact is patent, whether declared by revelation or read in history: but to the solution of it, and its reconciliation with the equally certain fact of human responsibility, we shall never attain in this imperfect state, however we may strive to do so by subtle refinements and distinctions. The following is the admirable advice of Augustine, from whom in this case it comes with double weight, seeing that he was a strenuous upholder of God’s sovereign grace: “Let it be enough for the Christian, living as yet by faith, and not yet seeing what is perfect, but knowing it only in part, to know, or to believe, that God acquits none except of His free mercy, through our Lord Jesus Christ, and condemns none, except of most equitable justice, through the same our Lord Jesus Christ. But why He acquits or does not acquit one rather than another, let him who can, search into the so great deep of His judgments: but—let him beware of the precipitous descent.”

19.] Thou wilt say then unto me (there seems no reason to suppose the objector a Jew:—the objection is a general one, applying to all mankind, and likely to arise in the mind of any reader. The expression “O man” seems to confirm this), Why then (then is omitted in our received text, but is found in our principal authorities) doth he yet find fault (yet, as ch. iii. 7: assuming your premises,—‘if this be so:’ at the same time it expresses a certain irritation on the part of the objector)? For who resisteth (not, ‘hath resisted,’ which is a mistake on the part of the A.V.) his will (i. e. if it be His will to harden the sinner, and the sinner goes on in his sin, he does not resist, but goes with the will of God)? Yea rather (or, Nay but: these words take the ground from under the previous assertion and supersede it by another: implying that it has a certain shew of truth, but that the proper view of the matter is yet to be stated. They thus convey, as in Luke xi. 28, an intimation of rebuke; here, with severity: ‘that which thou hast said, may be correct human reasoning—but as against God’s sovereignty, thy reasoning is out of place and irrelevant'), O man (perhaps without emphasis implying the contrast between man and God,—for this is done by the emphatic thou following, and we have the same address, "O man," unemphatic in ch. ii. 1), who art THOU that repliest against God?— (implying, 'thou hast neither right nor power to call God to account in this manner,'—Notice, that the answer to the objector's question does not lie in these verses 19–21, but in the following (see there);—the present verses are a rebuke administered to the spirit of the objection, which forgets the immeasurable distance between us and God, and the relation of Creator and Disposer in which He stands to us. As Chrysostom and Calvin well remark, "he first by this rebuke humiliates the objector, and prepares his mind to receive the answer to his impious cavil")—Shall the thing formed (properly of a production of plastic art moulded of clay or wax) say to him that formed it, "Why didst thou make me thus?"— These words are slightly altered from Isa. xxix. 16, "Shall the work say of him that made it, He made me not? or shall the thing framed say of him that framed it, He had no understanding?"—Or (intro-duces a new objection, or fresh ground of rebuke, see ch. ii. 4; iii. 29; vi. 3; xi. 2) hath not the potter power over the clay (the similitude from Isa. xlvi. 9. In Eccl. xxiii. 13, we have a very similar sentiment "As the clay is in the potter's hand, to fashion it at his pleasure, so man is in the hand of him that made him, to render to them as liketh him best.")—And even more strikingly so, Wisd. xv. 7: "For the potter, tempering soft earth, fashioneth every vessel with much labour for our service: yea, of the same clay he maketh both the vessels that serve for clean uses, and likewise also all such as serve to the contrary: but what is the use of either sort, the potter himself is the judge." See also Jer. xviii. 6), out of the same lump to make one vessel unto honour (honourable uses), and another unto dishonour (dis-honourable uses. See 2 Tim., in the reff.—The honour and dishonour are not here the moral purity or impurity of the human vessels, but their ultimate glorification or perdition. The Apostle, in asking this question, rather aims at striking dumb the objector by a statement of God's undoubted right, against which it does not become us men to murmur, than at unfolding to us the actual state of the case. This he does in the succeeding verses; see above)?

22.] What if (1) God, purposing to shew forth His wrath, and to make His power (that which He could do) known, endured with much longsuffering vessels of wrath fitted (prepared, made complete and ready) for destruction: and (what if this took place) (2) to the end that He might make known the riches of His glory on (i. e. 'toward,' 'with regard to') the vessels of mercy, which He before prepared for glory (I have given the whole, that my view of the construction might be evident: viz. that (1) and (2) are parallel clauses, both dependent on what if; purposing giving the intent of the first, and to the end that he might make known that of the second.—The argument is, 'What if God, in the case of the vessels of wrath prepared for destruction, has, in willing to manifest His power and wrath, also exhibited towards them longsuffering (to lead them to repentance, ch. ii. 4,—a mystery which we cannot fathom), and in having mercy on the vessels of mercy prepared for glory, has also made manifest the riches of His glory?' Then in both these dispensations will appear, not the arbitrary power, but the rich goodness of God.—The theological difficulties in the words fitted for destruction, and which he before prepared for glory (mind, in both cases God is the agent: He fits the one for destruction, and prepares the other for glory), are but such as have occurred repeatedly before, and are inherent, not in the Apostle's argument, nor even in revelation, but in any consistent belief of an omnipotent and omniscient God. See remarks on ver. 18.—Vessels of wrath and vessels of mercy are vessels prepared to subserve, as it were to hold, His wrath and mercy: hardly, as Calvin, instruments to shew them forth: that is done, over and above their being vessels, but is not necessary to it.—These vessels of wrath and vessels of mercy are not to be, with a view to evade the general application, confined to the instances of Pharaoh and the Jews: these instances give occasion to the argument, but the argument itself is general, extending to all the dealings of God).

24.] whom (viz. vessels of mercy) He also called, [even] us, not from among the Jews only, but also from among the Gentiles? It being entirely in the power of God to preordain and have mercy on whom He will, He has exercised this right by calling not only the remnant of His own people, but a people from among the Gentiles also,

25, 26.] It is difficult to ascertain in what sense the Apostle cites these two passages from Hosea as applicable to the Gentiles being called to be the people of God. That he does so, is manifest from the words themselves, and from the transition to the Jews in ver. 27. In the prophet they are spoken of Israel; see ch. i. 6–11, and ch. ii. throughout: who after being rejected and put away, was to be again received into favour by God. Two ways are open, by which their citation by the Apostle may be understood. Either (1) he brings them forward to shew that it is consonant with what we know of God's dealings, to receive as His people those who were formerly not His people—that this may now take place with regard to the Gentiles, as it was announced to happen with regard to Israel,—and even more,—that Israel in this, as in so many other things, was the prophetic mirror in which God foreshewed on a small scale His future dealings with mankind,—or (2) he adduces them from mere applicability to the subject in hand, implying, 'It has been with us Gentiles, as with Israel in the prophet Hosea.' I own I much prefer the former of these, as more consonant with the dignity of the argument, and as apparently justified by the also,—as He saith also in Hosea, implying perhaps that the matter in hand was not that directly prophesied in the citation, but one analogous to it. Chrysostom takes the same view. Her is used, because the Jewish people was typified by the daughter of the prophet, Hos. i. 6, who was called Lo-ruhamah, 'not having obtained mercy.' —By in the place... there, must not I think be understood, in any particular place, as Judaea, nor among any peculiar people, as the Christian Church: but as a general assertion, that in every place where they were called 'not His people,' there they shall be called 'His people.'

27.] A proof from Scripture of the fact, that a part of Israel are excluded. Here again the analogy of God's dealings, in the partial deliverance of Israel from captivity, and their great final deliverance from death eternal, is the key to the interpretation of the prophecy cited. The words are spoken by Isaiah of the return from captivity of a remnant of Israel.

28.] The reference of this latter part of the citation is not very plain. It is almost verbatim from the Septuagint, the for being inserted by the Apostle as continuing the testimony, ‘for the prophet proceeds.’ The literal rendering of the Hebrew is, “The consummation (or consumption) decided, overfloweth with righteousness: for a decision (or consumption) and a decree shall the Lord Jehovah of Sabaoth make in the midst of all the land.” As it stands in the Septuagint, the meaning seems to be, the Lord will complete and soon fulfil His word in righteousness (viz. his denunciation of consuming the Assyrian and liberating the remnant of His people): for the Lord will make a rapidly-accomplished word in the midst of all the land. If the above interpretation be correct, and the view which I have taken of the analogy of prophecy, it will follow that this verse is adduced by the Apostle as confirming the certainty of the salvation of the remnant of Israel, seeing that now, as then, He with whom a thousand years are as a day, will swiftly accomplish His prophetic word in righteousness.

29.] Another proof of a remnant to be saved, from a preceding part of the same prophecy. The citation is verbatim from the Septuagint, who have put “seed” for that which is in the Hebrew “a remnant,” i.e. something left.

30–33.] The Apostle takes up again the fact of Israel’s failure, and shews how their own pursuit of righteousness never attained to righteousness, being hindered by their self-righteousness and rejection of Christ. These verses do not contain, as Chrysostom and others think, the solution of the whole difficulty; this solution is simply in the creative right of God, as declared ver. 18;—but they are a comment on ver. 16, that it is not of him that willetteth, nor of him that runneth: the same similitude of running being here resumed, and it being shewn that, so far from man’s running having decided the matter, the Jews who pressed forward to the goal attained not, whereas the Gentiles, who never ran, have attained. If this is lost sight of, the connexion of the whole is much impaired, and from doctrinal prejudice, a wholly wrong turn given to the Apostle’s line of reasoning,—who resolves the awful fact of Israel’s exclusion not into any causes arising from man, but into the supreme will of God,—which will is here again distinctly asserted in the citation from Isaiah (see below).—What then shall we say? This question, when followed by a question, implies of course a rejection of the thought thus suggested—but when, as here, by an assertion, introduces a further unfolding of the argument from what has preceded. That the Gentiles, which pursue not after (see Phil. iii. 13) righteousness (not justification, which is merely ‘the being accounted righteous,’ ‘the way in which righteousness is ascribed’: not this, but righteousness itself, is the aim and end of the race), attained to (the whole transaction being regarded as a historical fact) righteousness, even (righteousness—not however that arising from their own works, but the righteousness, &c.) the righteousness which is of faith.

31.] But Israel, pursuing after the law of righteousness (what is the law of righteousness? It may mean either (1) an ideal law of righteousness, a justifying law,—or (2) the law of Moses, thus described: or (3) which I believe to be the true account of the words, “the law of righteousness” is put regarding the Jews, rather than merely “righteousness,” because in their case there was a prescribed norm of apparent righteousness, viz. the law, in which rule and way they, as matter of fact, followed after it. The above, as I believe, mistaken interpretations arise from supposing the law of righteousness to be equivalent to righteousness itself, which it is not. The Jews followed after, aimed at the fulfilment of ‘the law of righteousness,’ thinking by the observance of that law to acquire righteousness, See ch. x. 3, 5, and note; and compare John’s coming ‘in the way of righteousness,’ Matt. xxi. 32), arrived not at (the word is not the same as that rendered “attained to” in the preceding verse) the law (fell far short even of that law, which was given them, The words “of righteousness,” which follow here in the A.V., are omitted by nearly all our most ancient authorities. The sense is more difficult, but in reality more complete, without these words. The Jews followed after, thinking to perform it entirely, their law of righteousness: which the Apostle defines, ch. x. 5, to be righteousness which is by the law. But they did not arrive at, come up to the requirements of,—the law—they therefore never attained righteousness), Wherefore? because [pursuing after it] not by faith, but as (used subjectively, as ‘if about to obtain their object by’) by [the] works [of the law] (these words, of the law, are omitted by some ancient authorities, but inserted by others. If we omit them, the clause will stand, but as by works), they stumbled at the stone of stumbling (the similitude of a race is still kept up. The “for” found here in the A.V., is omitted by nearly all our ancient authorities. Its insertion has arisen from a period being placed at the word law. It confuses the sense, making it appear as if the stumbling was the cause of, or at all events coincident with, their pursuing not by faith, but&c., whereas it was this mistaken method of pursuing which caused them to stumble against the stone of stumbling. We have instances in the Greek chariot races, of competitors, by an error in judgment in driving, striking against the pillar round which the chariots were to turn, There is a close analogy between our text and the exhortation in Heb. xii 1 f. There, after the triumphs of faith have been related, we are exhorted to run with patience the race set before us, looking to Jesus, the Author and Finisher of our faith; where notice, that the sacred Writer seems to have had in his mind the same comparison of Him to the pillar or goal, to which the eyes of the runners would be exclusively directed).

33.] Appeal to the prophecy of Isaiah, as justifying this comparison of Christ to a stone of stumbling. The citation is gathered from: two places in Isaiah, The ‘stone of stumbling and rock of offence,’ mentioned ch. viii. 14, is substituted for the ‘cornerstone elect, precious,’ of ch. xxviii. 16. The solution of this is very simple. Isa. viii. 14 was evidently interpreted by the Jews themselves of the Messiah: for Simeon, Luke ii. 34, when speaking of the child Jesus as the Messiah, expressly adduces the prophecy as about to be fulfilled. Similarly Isa. xxviii. 16 was interpreted by the Chaldee Targum, the Babylonish Talmud, &c, What was there then to prevent the Apostle from giving to this Stone, plainly foretold as to be laid in Zion, that designation which prophecy also justifies, and which bears immediately on the matter here in hand? See 1 Pet. ii. 6–8, where the same two texts are joined, and also Ps. cxviii. 22. Shall not be put to shame seems to be a secondary meaning of the Hebrew word, which signifies, as in our version of Isa. xxviii. 16, ‘shall not make haste: i.e. shall not fly in terror, shall not be confounded.

CHAP. X. 1–13.] The Jews, though zealous for God, are yet ignorant of God's righteousness (1–3) as revealed to them in their own Scriptures (4–18).

1.] Brethren (“now, as if the severity of the preceding argument were passed over, he affectionately addresses them as brethren.” Bengel), the inclination (or, desire) of my heart and my supplication to God on their behalf (Israel, se ch. ix. 32; the insertion of “Israel” in the text is against the authority of all our oldest MSS. and versions) (is) for (their) salvation (lit. ‘towards salvation.’ The Apostle’s intention seems to be, to destroy any impression which his readers may have received un-favourable to his love of his own people, from the stern argument of the former chapter).

2.] For (reason why I thus sympathize with their efforts, though misdirected) I bear witness to them that they have a zeal for God, but not according to (in accordance with, founded upon, and carried on with) knowledge (accurate apprehension of the way of righteousness as revealed to them).

3.] For (ex-planation of not according to knowledge) not knowing (i. e. not recognizing; the A.V., ‘being ignorant of,’ is liable to the objection that it may represent to the reader a state of excusable ignorance, whereas they had it before them, and overlooked it) the righteousness of God (not, the way of justification appointed by God, as Stuart and others; but that only righteousness which avails before God, which becomes ours in justification; see De Wette’s note, quoted on ch. i. 17), and seeking to set up their own righteousness (again, not justification, but righteousness: that, namely, described ver. 5; not that it was ever theirs, but the Apostle speaks subjectively), they were not subjected (the passive, were not subjected,—not as in A.V., “have not submitted themselves,”—expresses the result only; it might be themselves, or it might be some other, that should have subjected them,—but the historical fact was, that they were not subjected) to the righteousness of God (the “righteousness of God” being considered as a rule or method, to which it was necessary to conform, but to which they were never subjected, as they were to the law of Moses).

4–13.] The “righteousness of God” is now explained to be summed up in that Saviour who was declared to them in their own Scriptures.—For (establishing what was last said, and at the same time unfolding the “righteousness of God” in a form which rendered them inexcusable for its non-recognition) Christ is the end of the law (i. e. the object at which the law aimed: compare the similar expression 1 Tim. i. 5, “the end of the commandment.”) Various meanings have been given to the word end. (1) End, “finis,” chronological: ‘Christ is the termination of the law. So Augustine, Luther, and others. But this meaning, unless understood in its pregnant sense, that Christ, who has succeeded to the law, was also the object and aim of the law, says too little. In this pregnant sense Tholuck takes the word ‘end,’ the end in time and in aim. It may be so; but I prefer simply to take in the idea of Christ being the end, i.e. aim of the law, as borne out by the citations following, in which nothing is said of the transitoriness of the law, but much of the notices which it contains of righteousness by faith in Christ. (2) Clement of Alexandria, Calvin, and others, take end for ‘accomplishment,’ a sense included in the general meaning, but not especially treated here,—the quotations following not having any reference to it. (3) The meaning, end in the sense of object or aim, above adopted, is that of Chrysostom, Beza, and others. Chrys. observes: “For if Christ is the end of the law, he who has not Christ, although he may seem to possess righteousness, possesses it not: but he who has Christ, even if he have not thoroughly observed the law, has all. To take an example. The end of the art of medicine is health. As, therefore, he who is able to produce health, even if he know nothing of medicine, has all: but he who knows not how to produce health, however he may seem to study the art, fails altogether: so it is with the law and faith: he who has the latter, has the end of the former: but he who has not the latter, is stranger to both”) unto righteousness (i. e. so as to bring about righteousness, which the law could not do) to every one that believeth.—‘Had they only used the law, instead of abusing it, it would have been their best preparation for the Saviour’s advent. For indeed, by reason of man’s natural weakness, it was always powerless to justify. It was never intended to make the sinner righteous before God; but rather to impart to him a knowledge of his sinfulness, and to awaken in his heart earnest longings for some powerful deliverer. Thus used, it would have ensured the reception of the Messiah by those who now reject Him. Striving to attain to real holiness, and increasingly conscious of the impossibility of becoming holy by an imperfect obedience to the law’s requirements, they would gladly have recognized the Saviour as the end of the law for righteousness.’ Ewbank. 5.] For (proof of the impossibility of legal righteousness, as declared even in the law itself) Moses describeth the righteousness which is of (abstract,—not implying that it has ever been attained, but rather presupposing the contrary) the law, saying] That the man which hath done them (the ordinances of the law) shall live in (in the strength of, by means of, as his status) it (the “righteousness accruing by such doing of them. The reading “them,” in A.V., is against the authority of our most ancient MSS.).—As regards the life here promised, the Jewish interpreters themselves included in it more than mere earthly felicity in Canaan, and extended their view to a better life hereafter. Earthly felicity it doubtless did impart, comp. Deut. xxx. 20; but even there 'life' seems to be a general promise, and length of days a particular species of felicity. 'In the New Test.,' Tholuck observes, "this idea (of life) is always exalted into that of life blessed and eternal:—see Matt. vii. 14; xviii. 8, 9; Luke x. 28." 6–8.] The righteousness which is of faith is described, in the words spoken in Scripture by Moses of the commandment given by him,—as not dependent on a long and difficult process of search, but near to every man, and in every man's power to attain. I believe the account of the following citation will be best found by bearing in mind that the Apostle is speaking of Christ as the end of the law for righteousness to the believer. He takes as a confirmation of this, a passage occurring in a prophetic part of Deuteronomy, where Moses is foretelling to the Jews the consequences of rejecting God's law, and His mercy to them even when under chastisement, if they would return to Him, He then describes the law in nearly the words cited in this verse. Now the Apostle, regarding Christ as the end of the law, its great central aim and object, quotes these words not merely as suiting his purpose, but as bearing, where originally used, an a fortiori application to faith in Him who is the end of the law, and to the commandment to believe in Him, which (1 John iii. 23) is now 'God's commandment.' If spoken of the law as a manifestation of God in man's heart and mouth, much more were they spoken of Him, who is God manifest in the flesh, the end of the law and the prophets. This view is, it is true, different from that of almost all eminent Commentators, ancient and modern,—who regard the words as merely adapted or parodied by the Apostle as suiting his present purpose. But we must remember that it is in this passage St. Paul's object not merely to describe the righteousness which is of faith in Christ, but to shew it described already in the words of the law.—But the righteousness which is of faith speaketh on this wise (personified, as Wisdom in the Proverbs), Say not in thine heart (i. e. think not, a Hebrew idiom. The original in Deuteronomy has merely, "that thou shouldest say.") The Apostle cites freely, giving the explanation of this saying, viz. thinking, Who shall ascend into heaven? that is (see note above;—that imports in its full and unfolded meaning), to bring down Christ:—or, Who shall descend into the deep (or, the abyss)?—that is, to bring up Christ from the dead.—There is some difficulty in assigning the precise view with which the Apostle introduces these questions. Tholuck remarks, "The different interpretations may be reduced to this, that the questions are regarded either (1) as questions of unbelief, or (2) as questions of embarrassment, or (3) as questions of anxiety." The first view is represented by De Wette, who says, "In what sense these questions, from which the righteousness which is of faith dissuades men, are to be taken, is plain from ver. 9, where the Resurrection of Christ is asserted as the one most weighty point of historical Christian belief:—they would be questions of unbelief, which regards this fact as not accomplished, or as now first to be accomplished. Thus, also, probably, are we to understand the first question, as applying to the Incarnation of Christ." This is more or less also the view of many other Commentators. (2) The second view, that they are questions of embarrassment, is taken by Stuart, who says, "The whole (of Moses's saying) may be summed up in one word, omitting all figurative expression: viz. the commandment is plain and accessible. You can have, therefore, no excuse for neglecting it. So in the case before us. Justification by faith in Christ is a plain and intelligible doctrine. It is not shut up in mysterious language.... It is like what Moses says of the statutes which he gave to Israel, plain, intelligible, accessible.... It is brought before the mind and heart of every man: and thus he is without excuse for unbelief." (3) The third view, that they are questions of anxiety, is that of Calvin, Tholuck, and others: by none perhaps better expressed than by Ewbank, Comm. on the Ep. to the Rom. p. 74: "Personifying the great Christian doctrine of free justification through faith, he represents it as addressing every man who is anxious to obtain salvation, in the encouraging words of Moses: 'Say not in thine heart, (it says to such an one,) &c....' In other words, 'Let not the man, who sighs for deliverance from his own sinfulness, suppose that the accomplishment of some impossible task is re-quired of him, in order to enjoy the blessings of the Gospel. Let him not think that the personal presence of the Messiah is necessary to ensure his salvation. Christ needs not to be brought down from heaven, or up from the abyss, to impart to him forgiveness and holiness. No. Our Christian message contains no impossibilities. We do not mock the sinner by offering him happiness on conditions which we know that he is powerless to fulfil. We tell him that Christ's word is near to him: so near, that he may speak of it with his mouth, and meditate on it with his heart.... Is there any thing above human power in such a confession, and in such a belief? Surely not. It is graciously adapted to the necessity of the very weakest and most sinful of God's creatures.' I will now take up the three views afresh and state the objections. (1) The objection to this view, as alleged by Tholuck, is, that in it the contrast with ver. 5 is lost sight of. And this is so far just, that it must be confessed we thus lose the ideas which the Apostle evidently intended us to grasp, those of insuperable difficulty in the acquisition of righteousness by the law and of facility,—by the gospel. Also,—it puts too forward the allegation of the great matters of historical belief, which are not Here the central point of the argument, but introduced as the objects which faith, itself that central point, apprehends. (2) The last objection has some force as against this view. The regarding the questions as mere questions of difficulty and intellectual bewilderment does not adequately represent the zeal for God predicated of the Jews, on the assumption of which the whole passage proceeds. Here, however, it seems to me, we have more truth than in (1): for the plainness and simplicity of the truths to be believed is unquestionably one most important element in the righteousness which is of faith. (3) Here we have the important element just mentioned, not indeed made the prominent point of the questions, but, as it appears to me, properly and sufficiently kept in view. The anxious follower after righteousness is not disappointed by an impracticable code, nor mocked by an unintelligible revelation: the word is near him, therefore accessible; plain and simple, and therefore apprehensible; and, taking (1) into account, we may fairly add,—deals with definite historical fact, and therefore certain: so that his salvation is not contingent on an amount of performance which is beyond him, and therefore inaccessible; irrational, and therefore inapprehensible: undefined, and therefore involved in uncertainty.—Thus, it seems to me, we satisfy all the conditions of the argument: and thus also it is clearly brought out, that the words themselves could never have been spoken by Moses of the righteousness which is of the law, but of that which is of faith.

8.] But what saith it? The word is near thee, in thy mouth (to confess), and in thy heart (to believe): that is (see above), the word of faith (which forms the substratum and object of faith, see Gal. iii. 2; 1 Tim. iv. 6), which we (ministers of Christ: or perhaps, I Paul) preach (this ver. has been explained in dealing with vv. 6, 7);

9.] because (explanation of the word being near thee. Others, seeing that the same word in the original means “because,” and “that,” take the latter meaning here, and regard this verse as merely giving the import of the “word of faith which we preach.” But as Tholuck observes, (1) the duty of confessing the Lord Jesus can hardly be called part of the contents of the preaching of faith, but the prominence given to that duty shews a reference to the words of Moses: (2) the making the word render a reason for the fact above stated, suits much better the context and form of the passage: (3) the fact of the confession with the mouth standing first, also shews a reference to what has gone before: for when the Apostle brings his own arrangement in ver. 10, he puts, as natural, the belief of the heart first) if thou shalt confess with thy mouth (same order as ver. 8) the Lord Jesus, and believe in thine heart that God raised Him from the dead (here, as in 1 Cor. xv. 14, 16, 17, regarded as the great central fact of redemption), thou shalt be saved (inherit eternal life)—Here we have the two parts of the above question again introduced: the confession of the Lord Jesus implying His having come down from heaven, and the belief in His resurrection implying His having been brought up from the dead.

10.] For (refers back to ver. 6, where the above words were ascribed to the righteousness which is of faith, and explains how believing with the heart refers to the acquiring of righteousness) with the heart faith is exercised (the original verb is impersonal, it is believed: i.e. as in the text, man believeth) unto (so as to be available to the acquisition of) righteousness; and (literally but: as if it were said, ‘not only so: but there must be an outward confession, in order for justification to be carried forward to salvation’) with the mouth confession is made unto salvation.—Clearly the words righteousness and salvation are not used here, as De Wette and others maintain, merely as different terms for the same thing, for the sake of the parallelism: but salvation is the end and topstone of justification, consequent not merely on the act of justifying faith, as the other, but on a good confession before the world, maintained unto the end.

11.] For (proof of the former part of ver. 10) the scripture saith, Whosoever believeth on Him shall not be ashamed.

12.] For (an explanation of the strong expression ‘whosoever believeth,’ as implying the universal offer of the riches of God’s mercy in Christ) there is no distinction of Jew and Greek (Gentile—See ch. iii. 22): for the same Lord of all (viz. Christ, who is the subject here: verses 9, 11, 13 cannot be separated. So Origen, Chrysostom, and most of the ancients. So “Lord of all” is said of Christ, Acts x. 36. Most modern Commentators would render the words, “the same [Person] is Lord of all.” But I prefer the usual rendering, both on account of the strangeness of “the same” thus standing alone, and because this Apostle uses the expression “the same Lord,” 1 Cor. xii. 5, and even “the same God,” 1 Cor. xii. 6) is rich unto all (‘by unto’ is signified the direction in which the stream of grace rushes forth.’ Olshausen) who call upon Him:

13.] for (Scripture proof of this assertion) every one whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord (Jehovah,—but used here of Christ beyond a doubt, as the next verse shews. There is hardly a stronger proof, or one more irrefragable by those who deny the Godhead of our Blessed Lord, of the unhesitating application to Him by the Apostle of the name and attributes of Jehovah) shall be saved.

14, 15.] It has been much doubted to whom these questions refer,—to Jews or to Gentiles? It must, I think, be answered, To neither exclusively. They are generalized by the “whosoever” of the preceding verse, to mean all, both Jews and Gentiles. And the inference in what follows, though mainly concerning the rejection of the unbelieving Jews, has regard also to the reception of the Gentiles: see below on verses 19, 20.—At the same time, us Meyer remarks, “the necessity of the Gospel mission must first be laid down, in order to bring out in strong contrast the disobedience of some.”—How then (i. e. it being conceded that the foregoing is so) can (I have followed the majority of the chief MSS in reading can throughout this passage instead of “shall”) they (men, represented by the “whosoever” of ver. 13) call on Him in whom they have not believed (i. e. begun to believe: so ch. xiii. 11)? But (in an English version we are obliged to render these buts by and; and so of those which follow. In the original, they are not copulatives, but dis-junctives) how can they believe (in Him) of whom they have not heard? But how can they hear without a preacher? But how can men preach unless they shall have been sent? as it is written, How beautiful are the feet of them who bring glad tidings of peace, who bring glad tidings of good things!—The Apostle is shewing the necessity and dignity of the preachers of the word, which leads on to the universality of their preaching, leaving all who disobey it without excuse. He therefore cites this, as shewing that their instrumentality was one recognized in the prophetic word, where their office is described and glorified.—The applicability of these words to the preachers of the Gospel is evident from the passage in Isaiah itself, which is spoken indeed of the return from captivity, but in that return has regard to amore glorious one under the future Redeemer. We need not therefore say that the Apostle uses Scripture words merely as expressing his own thoughts in a well-known garb; he alleges the words as a prophetic description of the preachers of whom he is writing.

16.] In this preaching of the Gospel some have been found obedient, others disobedient: and this was before announced by Isaiah. The persons here meant are as yet kept indefinite,—but evidently the Apostle has in his mind the unbelieving Jews, about whom his main discourse is employed.—Howbeit not all hearkened to (historic: during the preaching) the glad tidings (and this too was no unlooked-for thing, but predetermined in the divine counsel): for Isaiah saith, Lord (the word Lord is not in the Hebrew), who [hath] believed the hearing of us (i. e. as in our version, our report: but it is important in this passage to keep the word one and the same throughout, as it is in the original; otherwise we lose the force of the Apostle's argument)?

17.] Faith then (conclusion from ver. 16, “who believed our report?”) is from hearing (i. e. the publication of the Gospel produces belief in it), and the hearing (the effect of the publication of the Gospel) is through (not, ‘in obedience to,’ but ‘by means of,’ as its instrument and vehicle) the word of Christ (such is the reading of our oldest authorities. ‘God’ has probably been a rationalizing correction, to suit better the sense of the prophecy).

18.] But (in anticipation of an objection that Israel, whom he has especially in view, had not sufficiently heard the good tidings), I say, Did they not hear (the “hear” of ver. 14 is carried on through verses 16 and 17 to this in ver. 18)? Nay, verily (ch. ix. 20, note), Into all the earth went forth their voice, and to the ends of the world their words.—Psal. xix. is a comparison of the sun, and glory of the heavens, with the word of God. As far as ver. 6 the glories of nature are described: then the great subject is taken up, and the parallelism carried out to the end. So that the Apostle has not, as alleged in nearly all the Commentators, merely accommodated the text allegorically, but taken it in its context, and followed up the comparison of the Psalm.—As to the assertion of the preaching of the Gospel having gone out into all the world, when as yet a small part of it only had been evangelized,—we must remember that it is not the extent, so much as the universality in character, of this preaching, which the Apostle is here asserting: that word of God, hitherto confined within the limits of Judea, had now broken those bounds, and was preached in all parts of the earth. See Col. i. 6, 23.

19.] But (in anticipation of another objection, that this universal evangelizing and admission of all, had at any rate taken the Jews by surprise,—that they had not been forewarned of any such purpose of God) I say, Did Israel (no emphasis on Israel—they are not first here introduced, nor have the preceding verses been said only of the Gentiles; but they have been during those verses in the Apostle's mind, and are now named for distinctness' sake, because it is not now a question of their having heard, which they did in common with all, but of their having been aware from their Scriptures of God's intention with regard to themselves and the Gentiles) not know (supply, not ‘the Gospel,’ “the hearing,” as Chrysostom and others,—but, the fact that such a general proclamation of the Gospel would be made as has been mentioned in the last verse, raising up the Gentiles into equality and rivalry with themselves. Others supply variously, ‘the truth of God,’—so as to have an advantage over the Gentiles: “the righteousness of God,” &c.)*—First (in the order of the prophetic roll; i.e. in their very earliest prophet. Tholuck observes, ‘The Apostle has in his mind a whole series of prophetic sayings which he might adduce, but gives only a few instead of all, and would shew by the ‘first,’ that even in the earliest period the same complaint [of Israel's unbelief] is found’) Moses saith, I will provoke you (the Hebrew and Septuagint have ‘them’) to jealousy against (those who are) no nation (the Gentiles, as opposed to the people of God), against a nation that hath no understanding (the spiritual fool of Ps. xiv. 1; lii. 1; Prov. xvii. 21) will I provoke you. The original reference of these words, as addressed to Israel by Moses, is exactly opposite to the Apostle's argument. Moses prophetically assumes the departure of Israel from God, and his rejection of them, and denounces from God that, as they had moved Him to jealousy with their ‘no-gods’ (idols) and provoked Him to anger by their vanities,—so He would, by receiving into his favour a ‘no-nation,’ make them jealous, and provoke them to anger by adopting instead of them a foolish nation.

20.] But (even more than this: there is stronger testimony yet) Isaiah is very bold and saith (i. e. as we say, ‘dares to say,’ ‘ventures to speak thus plainly’), I was found (so the Septuagint, the Hebrew has ‘I was sought: but apparently in the sense of Ezek. xiv. 3; xx. 3, ‘enquired of:?’ which amounts to being found) by those who sought me not; I became manifest to those who asked not after me. De Wette und other modern Commentators have maintained that Isa. lxv. 1 is spoken of the Jews, and not of the Gentiles; their main argument for this view being the connexion of ch. lxiv. and lxv. But even granting this connexion, it does not follow that God is not speaking in reproach to Israel in ch. lxv. 1, and reminding them prophetically, that while they, His own rebellious people, provoke Him to anger, the Gentiles which never sought Him have found Him. ‘The nation which was not called by my Name,’ in lxv. 1, can only primarily mean the Gentiles.

21.] But in regard of (not, as A.V. ‘φο,’ but ‘with regard to’) The words are not an address) Israel (evidently emphatic;—the former words having been said of the Gentiles) he saith (Isa. lxv. 2), All the day I stretched forth my hands (the attitude of gracious invitation) to a people disobedient and gainsaying (rebellious; the same word occurs Deut. xxi. 18).

CHAP. XI. 1–10.] Yet God has not cast off His people, but there is a remnant according to the election of grace (1–6),—the rest being hardened (7–10).

1.] I say then (a false inference from ch. x. 19–21,—made in order to be refuted), Did (meaning, It cannot surely be, that) God cast off His people (as would almost appear from the severe words just adduced)? It is not so (God forbid). For I also am an Israelite (see Phil. iii. 5), of the seed of Abraham (mentioned probably for solemnity's sake, as bringing to mind all the promises made to Abraham), of the tribe of Benjamin (so Phil. iii. 5).—There is some question with what intent the Apostle here brings forward himself. Three answers are open to us: either (1) it is as a case in point, as an example of an Israelite who has not been rejected, but is still one of God's people: so almost all the Commentators—but this is hardly probable,—for in this case (a) he would not surely bring one only example to prove his point, when thousands might have been alleged,— (4) it would be hardly consistent with the humble mind of St. Paul to put himself alone in such a place,—and (c) “God forbid” does not go simply to deny a hypothetical fact, but: applies to some deprecated consequence of that which is hypothetically put:—or (2) he implies, ‘How can I say such a thing, who am myself an Israelite’ &c.? ‘Does not my very nationality furnish a security against my entertaining such an idea—or (3) which I believe to be the right view, but which I have found only in the recent commentary of Mr. Ewbank,—as implying that if such a hypothesis were to be conceded, it would exclude from God's kingdom the writer himself, as an Israelite. This seems better to agree with “God forbid,” as deprecating the consequence of such an assertion.—But a question even more important arises, not unconnected with that, just discussed: viz. who are His people? In order for the sentence to bear the meaning just assigned to it, it is obvious that His people must mean the people of God nationally considered. If Paul deprecated such a proposition as the rejection of God's people, because he himself would thus be as an Israelite cut off from God's favour, the rejection assumed in the hypothesis must be a national rejection. It is against this that he puts in his strong protest. It is this which he disproves by a cogent historical parallel from Scripture, shewing that there is a remnant even at the present time according to the election of grace: and not only so, but that that part of Israel (considered as having continuity of national existence) which is for a time hardened, shall ultimately come in, and so all Israel (nationally considered again, Israel as a nation) shall be saved. Thus the covenant of God with Israel, having been national, shall ultimately be fulfilled to them as a nation: not by the gathering in merely of individual Jews, or of all the Jews individually, into the Christian Church,—but by the national restoration of the Jews, not in unbelief, but as a Christian believing nation, to all that can, under the gospel, represent their ancient pre-eminence, and to the fulness of those promises which have never yet in their plain sense been accomplished to them. I have entered on this matter here, because a clear understanding of it underlies all intelligent appreciation of the argument of the chapter. Those who hold no national restoration of the Jews to pre-eminence, must necessarily confound the present remnant according to the election of grace, with the remainder, who nationally shall be grafted in again. See this more fully illustrated where that image occurs, ver. 17 ff.

2.] God did not cast away his people which he foreknew (i. e. ‘which, in His own eternal decree before the world, He selected as the chosen nation, to be His own, the depositary of His law, the vehicle of the theocracy, from its first revelation to Moses, to its completion in Christ's future kingdom. It is plain that this must here be the sense, and that the words must not be limited, with Origen, Augustine, Chrysostom, and Calvin, to the elect Christian people of God from among the Jews, with Paul as their representative: see on ver. 1. On this explanation, the question of ver. 1 would be self-contradictory, and this negation a truisim. It would be inconceivable, that God should cast off His elect).—Or (see ch. ix. 21)—introduces a new objection to the matter impugned. This particle cannot well be introduced here in an English version) know ye not what the Scripture saith in [the history of] Elijah (better thus than ‘with regard to, or 'of Elias, A.V.’) how he pleads with (see ch. viii. 26) God against Israel, &c.—The citation is a free one from the Septuagint.—The altars, as De Wette observes, were those on the high places, dedicated to God.

4.] But what saith the divine response to him? I have left to myself (here the Apostle corrects a mistake of the Septuagint, who have for “I have left,” “thou shalt leave: and he has added “to myself,” a simple and obvious filling up of the sense) seven thousand men. who (the sense of the saying, as far as regards the present purpose, is to shew that all these were faithful men; in the original text and Septuagint (see also the English version), it is implied that these were all the faithful men. But this was not necessary to be brought out here) never bowed knee to Baal.

5.] Thus then (analogical inference from the example just cited) in the present time also (or, even in the present time, viz. of Israel's national rejection) there is a remnant (literally, there has become a remnant: a part has remained faithful, which thus has become a remnant) according to (in virtue of,—in pursuance of) the election (selection, choice of a few out of many) of grace (made not for their desert, nor their foreseen congruity, but of God's free unmerited favour).

6.] ‘And let us remember, when we say an election of grace, how much those words imply: viz. nothing short of the entire exclusion of all human work from the question. Let. these two terms be regarded as, and kept, distinct from one another, and do not let us attempt to mix them, and so destroy the meaning of each.’ So that the meaning of the verse is to clear up and remove all doubt concerning the meaning of ‘election of grace,’—and to profess on the part of the Apostle perfect readiness to accept his own words in their full sense, and to abide by them.—The clause enclosed in brackets does not exist in most of our ancient MSS. and versions: it exists in the oldest of all, the Vatican MS., and in the Syriac, which is the oldest of the versions. The object being precision, it is much more probable that the Apostle should have written both clauses in their present formal parallelism, and that the second should have been early omitted from its seeming superfluity, than that it should have been inserted from the margin. Besides which, the words do not correspond sufficiently with those of the first clause to warrant the supposition of their having been constructed to tally with it.—But (directing attention to the consequence of the admission, the election of grace) if by grace (the selection has been made), it is no longer (when we have conceded that, we have excluded its being) of (arising out: of, as its source) works: for (in that case) grace no longer becometh (literally, i.e. becomes no longer—loses its efficacy and character as) grace (the freedom and spontaneous character, absolutely necessary to the idea of grace, are lost, the act having been prompted from without):—but if of (arising out of, as the cause and source of the selection) works, no longer is it (the act of selection) grace: for (in that case) work no longer is work (the essence of work, in our present argument, being ‘that which earns reward,’ and the reward being, as supposed, the election to be of the remnant,—if so earned, there can be no admixture of divine favour in the matter; it must be all earned, or none: none conferred by free grace, or all). These cautions of the Apostle are decisive against all attempts at compromise between the two great antagonist hypotheses, of salvation by God’s free grace, and salvation by man’s meritorious works. The two cannot be combined without destroying the plain meaning of words.—If now the Apostle’s object in this verse be to guard carefully the doctrine of election by free grace from any attempt at an admixture of man’s work, why is he anxious to do this just at this point? I conceive, because he is immediately about to enter on a course of exposition of the divine dealings, in which, more than ever before, he rests all upon God’s sovereign purpose, while at the same time he shews that purpose, though apparently severe, to be one, on the whole, of grace and love.

7.] What then (what therefore must be our conclusion from what has been stated? We have seen that God hath not cast off his own chosen nation, but that even now there is a remnant. This being so, what aspect do matters present? This he asks to bring out an answer which may set in view the rest who were hardened)? That which Israel is in search of (viz. righteousness, see ch. ix. 31; x. 1 ff.), this it (as a nation) found not, but the election (the abstract, because Israel has been spoken of in the abstract, and to keep out of view for the present the mere individual cases of converted Jews in the idea of an elected remnant) found it;

8.] but the rest were hardened (not ‘blinded.’) This meaning, frequently given to the word here occurring in the original, is now generally acknowledged to be a mistake. Were hardened is passive, and implies God as the agent), according as it is written (if we are to regard these passages as merely analogous instances of the divine dealings, we must remember that the perspective of prophecy, in stating such cases, embraces all analogous ones, the divine dealings being self-consistent,—and especially that great one, in which the words are most prominently fulfilled),—God gave them a spirit of stupor, eyes that they should not see, and ears that they should not hear; unto this present day.—These last words are not, as in A.V., to be separated from the citation, and joined to “were hardened:” they belong to the words in Deuteronomy, and are adduced by St. Paul as applying to the day then present, as they did to the when Moses spoke them: see 2 Cor. 15.

9.] And David saith, Let their table be made a snare and a trap (or, net: the word more usually signifies ‘a hunt,’ or the act of taking or catching,—but here a net, the instrument of capture. It is not in the Hebrew nor in the Septuagint, and is perhaps inserted by the Apostle to give emphasis by the accumulation of synonymes), and a stumblingblock, and a recompence to them:

10.] let their eyes be darkened, that they may not see, and their back bow thou down always. ((“Instead of bending the back, the Hebrew text speaks of making the loins to tremble. This elsewhere is a sign of great terror, Nah. ii. 10; Dan. v. 6: and the darkening of the eyes betokens in the Psalm, a weakened, humbled, servile condition, just, as in Deut. xxviii. 65–67. It is plain from the word always, that we must not suppose the infirmities of age to be meant. The Apostle might well apply such a description to the servile condition of the bondmen of the law, see Gal. iv. 24.” Tholuck.)

11–24.] Yet this exclusion and hardening has not been for their destruction, but for mercy to the Gentiles, and eventually for their own restoration.

11.] I say then (see on ver. 1), Did they (who? see below) stumble in order that they should fall (not, “so that they fell,” as Origen, Chrysostom, and others, denoting the result merely: neither the grammar nor the context will bear this: the Apostle is arguing respecting God’s intent in the trespass of the Jewish nation. He here calls it by this mild name, to set forth that it is not final. The persons who stumbled are those who are designated by “they” in the following verses, i.e. the Jews as a people: not the unbelieving individuals, who are characterized as “they which fell,” ver. 22. He regards the “rest” as the representatives of the Jewish people, who have nationally stumbled, but not in order to their final fall, seeing that God has a gracious purpose towards the Gentiles even in this “stumbling” of theirs, and intends to raise them nationally from it in the end. This distinction, between the stumblers, the whole nation as a nation, and the fallen, the unbelieving branches who have been cut off, is most important to the right understanding of the chapter, and to the keeping in mind the separate ideas, of the restoration of individuals here and there throughout time, and the restoration of Israel at the end.—The stress here is on the word fall, and it is the fall which is denied: not on the words “in order that,” so that the purpose merely should be denied, and the fall admitted)? God forbid: but (the truer account of the matter is) by their trespass (not fall, as E. V.) salvation [is come] to the Gentiles, for to provoke them (Israel) to jealousy.—Two gracious purposes of God are here stated, the latter wrought out through the former. By this stumble of the Jews out of their national place in God’s favour, and the admission of the Gentiles into it, the very people thus excluded are to be stirred up to set themselves in the end effectually to regain, as a nation, that preeminence from which they are now degraded.

12.] Then the Apostle argues on this, as Meyer well says, “from the prosperous effect of a worse cause, to the more prosperous effect of a better cause.”—But (‘taking for granted, that’—as in last verse—taking for granted the historical fact, that the stumble of the Jews has been coincident with the admission of the Gentiles) if their trespass is the riches of the world (the occasion of that wealth,—the wealth itself being the participation in the unsearchable riches of Christ), and (this latter clause parallel to and explanatory of the less plainly expressed one before it) their diminishing, the riches of the Gentiles, how much more (shall) their fulness (be all this)?—On the words here used, diminishing and fulness, much question has been raised. I have taken both as answering strictly to the comparison here before the Apostle’s mind, viz. that of impoverishing and enriching, the possessives their, and of the world, of the Gentiles, as subjective: ‘if their impoverishment be the wealth of the Gentiles, how much more shall their enrichment be!’—But several other interpretations are possible. (1) Diminishing may mean, as in 1 Cor. vi. 7, degradation, and fulness would then be re-exaltation to the former measure of favour,—or perhaps ‘their completion,’ ‘their highest degree of favour.’ (2) If we regard the meaning of “fulness” in ver. 25, we shall be tempted here to understand it ‘full number,’ and similarly diminishing, ‘small number.’ So the majority of Commentators. Thus the argument will stand: ‘If their unbelief (i. e. of one part of them) is the world’s wealth, and their small number (i. e. of believers, the other part of them), the Wealth of the Gentiles, how much more their full (restored) number?’ i.e. as Olshansen explains it, ‘If so few Jews can do so much for the Gentile world, what will not the whole number do?’ But thus we shall lose the argument, from the less to the greater,—‘if their sin has done so much, how much more their conversion?’ unless indeed it be said that reduction of numbers implies a national trespass. Besides, it can hardly be shewn that the original word rendered diminishing will bear this meaning of ‘a small number.’ (3) Tholuck, from whom mostly this note is taken, notices at length the view of Olshausen, after Origen, that the idea of a definite number of the elect is here in the Apostle’s mind,—that the falling off of the Jews produces a deficiency in the number, which is filled up by the elect from the Gentiles, as ver. 25: understanding by fulness both there and here, if I take his meaning aright, the number required to fill up the roll of the elect, whether of Jews, as here, or Gentiles, as there. Tholuck, while he concedes the legitimacy of the idea of a fulness of the elect, maintains, and rightly, that in this section no such idea is brought forward: and that it would not have been intended, without some more definite expression of it than we now find.—I have thought it best, as above, considering the very various meanings and difficulty of the word fulness, to keep here to that which seems to be indicated by the immediate context, which is, besides, the primitive meaning of the word.—It must be noticed, that the fact, of Israel being the chosen people of God, lies at the root of all this argument. Israel is the nation, the covenant people,—the vehicle of God’s gracious purposes to mankind. Israel, nationally, is deposed from present favour. That very deposition is, however, accompanied by an outpouring of God’s riches of mercy on the Gentiles; not as rivals to Israel, but still considered as further from God, formally and nationally, than Israel. If then the disgrace of Israel has had such a blessed accompaniment, how much more blessed a one shall Israel’s honour bring with it, when His own people shall once more be set as a praise in the midst of the earth, and the glory of the nation.

13.] ‘Why, in an argument concerning the Jews, dwell so much on the reference to the Gentiles discernible in the divine economy regarding Israel? Why make it appear as if the treatment of God’s chosen people were regulated not by a consideration of them, but of the less favoured Gentiles?’ The present verse gives an answer to this question.—But (such, and not “for,” is the reading of our most ancient MSS. and versions. The disjunctive conjunction introduces an apology for the foregoing verse: i.e. “in thus speaking, let it be understood that”...) I am speaking to you (the) Gentiles: inasmuch therefore (this word, which is not in the received text, is read by our oldest MSS.) as I am [the] Apostle of the Gentiles, I glorify mine office (by striving for their conversion and edification at all times,—by introducing a reference to them and their part in the divine counsels, even when speaking of mine own people), if by any means I may (regarding it as a real service done on behalf of Israel, thus to honour mine office by mentioning the Gentiles, if this mention may) provoke to jealousy mine own flesh (the Jews), and may save some of them.

15.] For (a reason for my anxiety for the salvation of Israel: not merely for the sake of mine own kinsmen, but because their recovery will bring about the blessed consummation of all believers. Verses 13, 14 should not then be in a parenthesis, as sometimes printed) if the rejection of them (not ‘their loss,’ as Luther and others, by which the antithesis to what follows is weakened) be (the occasion of) the reconciliation of the world (of the Gentiles, viz. to God), what (‘of what, kind,’ in its effect) (will be) the receiving of them, but (the occasion of) life from the dead?—Life from the dead may be variously taken. (1) It may be metaphorical, as in ch. vi. 13, and may import, that so general a conversion of the world would take place, as would be like life from the dead. So, more or less, many Commentators, who explain it of a joy like that of the resurrection. But against this interpretation lies the objection, that this is already involved in the reconciling of the world, and thus no new idea would be brought out by the words, which stand in the most emphatic position. (2) It may mean that ‘life from the dead’ literally should follow on the restoration of the Jewish people; i.e. that the Resurrection, the great consummation, is bound up with it. So Chrysostom, Origen (who says, “Then will take place the receiving of, Israel, when the dead also shall receive life, and the world from corruptible shall be made incorruptible, and mortals shall be endowed with immortality”), and many others. The objection to this view seems to be, that the Apostle would hardly have used life from the dead thus predicatively, if he had meant by it a fixed and predetermined event;—but that, standing as it does, it must be qualitative, implying some further blessed state of the reconciled world, over and above the mere reconciliation. This might well be designated ‘life from the dead, ' and in it may be implied the glories of the first resurrection, and deliverance from the bondage of corruption, without supposing the words life from the dead to be equivalent to the resurrection of the dead.—Stuart well compares Ezek. xxxvii. 1–14, which was perhaps before the mind of the Apostle.

16–24.] Such a restoration of Israel was to be expected from a consideration of their destination and history. This is set forth in similitudes, that of the root and branches being followed out at some length,—and their own position, as engrafted Gentiles, brought to the mind of the readers.—Moreover (a further argument for their restoration, following on ver. 11) if the firstfruit be holy, so also is the lump (not here the firstfruit of the field, as some have understood it, nor does the lump mean the cake made by the priests out of the firstfruits which fell to them, Deut. xviii. 4;—but the portion of the kneaded lump of dough, which was offered as a heave-offering to the Lord, and so sanctified for use the rest: see the reference where the same words occur):—and if the root be holy, so also are the branches.—Who are the firstfruit and the root? First of all, there is no impropriety in the two words applying to the same thing. For though, the branches being evolved from the root, it rather answers to the lump than to the firstfruit, and though the firstfruit succeeds the lump in time, while the root precedes the branches,—yet the holiness is the point of comparison, and in holiness the firstfruit precedes and gives existence to the lump. This being so, (1) the firstfruit and root have generally been taken to represent the patriarchs; and I believe rightly (except that perhaps it would be more strict correct to say, Abraham himself). The words, “beloved for the fathers’ sake,” in ver. 28, place this reference almost beyond doubt. Origen explains the root to be our Lord. But He is Himself a branch, by descent from Abraham and David (Isa. xi. 1; Matt. i. 1), if genealogically considered; and if mystically, the whole tree (John xv. 1). De Wette prefers to take as the firstfruit and root, the ideal theocracy founded on the patriarchs,—the true, faithful children of the patriarchs, and as the branches, those united by mere external relationship to these others. This he does, because in the common acceptation, the branches who are cut off ought to be severed from their physical connexion with Abraham, &c., which they are not. This objection I do not conceive applicable here: because, as we see evidently from ver. 23, the severing and re-grafting are types, not of genealogical disunion and reunion, but of spiritual. Meanwhile, this view appears less simple than the ordinary one, which, as I hope to shew, is borne out by the whole passage. (2) Then, who are indicated by the lump and the branches? ISRAEL, considered as the people of God. The lump, which has received its holiness from the firstfruit, is Israel, beloved for the father’s sakes: the assemblage of branches, evolved from Abraham, and partaking of his holiness. But one thing must be especially borne in mind. As Abraham himself had an outer and an inner life, so have the branches. They have an outer life, derived from Abraham by physical descent. Of this, no cutting off can deprive them. It may be compared to the very organization of the wood itself, which subsists even after its separation from the tree. But they have, while they remain in the tree, an inner life, nourished by the circulating sap, by virtue of which they are constituted living parts of the tree: see our Lord’s parable of the vine and the branches, John xv. 1 ff. It is of this life, that their severance from the tree deprives them: it is this life, which they will re-acquire, if grafted in again.—The holiness then here spoken of, consists in their dedication to God as a people—in their being physically evolved from a holy root. This peculiar holiness (see 1 Cor. vii. 14, where the children of one Christian parent are similarly called holy) renders their restoration to their own stock a matter, not of wonder and difficulty, but of reasonable hope and probability.—I notice in passing, that those expositors who do not hold a restoration of the Jewish people to national preeminence, find this passage exceedingly in their way, if we may judge by their explanations of this holiness. E.g. Mr. Ewbank remarks: ‘Holy they are, inasmuch as there is no decree against their restoration to their place of life and fruitfulness.’ Surely this is a new meaning of ‘holy’: the same would be true of a Hottentot: in his case, too, there is no decree against his reception into a place (and in Mr. E.’s view, the restoration of the Jew is nothing more) of life and fruitfulness in the Church of God.

17.] But (introduces a hypothesis involving a seeming inconsistency with the holiness just mentioned) if some of the branches (the word some depreciates the number, in order to check the Gentile pride) were broken out (so literally: broken off from the tree), and thou (a Gentile believer), being a wild olive (i. e. a sprout or branch of a wild olive), wast grafted in (there is an apparent difficulty here: that the Apostle reverses the natural process in grafting. It is the wilding, in practice, which is the stock, and the graft inserted is a sprout of the better tree. I believe that he does not here regard what is the fact in nature: but makes a supposition perfectly legitimate,—that a wilding graft, on being inserted into a good tree, thereby becomes partaker of its qualities. No allusion can be intended to a practice mentioned by Columella, of inserting a wilding graft into a good tree to increase the vigour and growth of the tree: for this would completely stultify the illustration—the point of which is, a benefit received by the wilding from the tree, not one conferred by the wilding on it) among them (i. e. among the branches: or perhaps them may imply the remnants of the branches broken off), and wast made a partaker of the root (most of our oldest MSS. omit the word “and,” here found in the revised text) of the fatness (of that root, on union with which all the development of life and its fertility depend: which is the source of the fatness. With “and,” it will mean, of the source of life, and also of the development of that life itself in all richness of blessing) of the olive tree;

18.] boast not against the branches (which were broken off). But if thou boastest against them (know that..., or let this consideration humble thee, that... Similarly 1 Cor. xi. 16, “But if any man seemeth to be contentious,... we have no such custom”), it is not thou that bearest the root, but the root thee.—The ground of humiliation is—“Thou partakest of thy blessings solely by union with God’s spiritual church, which church has for its root that Father of the faithful, from whom they are descended. Regard them not therefore with scorn.” This is expanded further in ver. 20.

19.] Thou wilt then (it being supposed that thou boastest, and defendest it) say, The branches (viz. which were broken off—not the whole branches) were broken off, that I (emphatic) might be grafted in.

20.] Well (the fact, involving even the purpose, assumed by the previous speaker, is conceded. The prompting cause of their excision, their unbelief, is distinct from the divine purpose of their excision, the admission of the Gentiles, and belongs to a different side of the subject);—because of their unbelief (or perhaps, ‘through unbelief,’ abstract) they were broken off, but thou by thy faith standest (in thy place in the tree, opposed to being broken off. Tholuck prefers the sense of standing and falling in ch. xiv. 4, and certainly the adoption of the word “fell” ver. 22, seems to shew that the figurative diction is not strictly preserved).—Be not high-minded, but fear:

21.] for if God spared not the natural branches (the branches which grew according to natural development, and were not engrafted), [take heed] (there is no word representing “take heed” in the original. We may supply ‘I fear,’ or ‘it is to be feared, or simply ‘fear’ lest He spare not THEE also.

22.] The caution of the preceding: verse is unfolded into a setting before the Gentile of the true state of the matter.—Behold therefore (i. e. assuming that thou enterest into the feeling prompted by the last verse) the goodness and the severity of God:—towards those who fell (see on ver. 11.—Here they who fell are opposed to the person addressed, the figure being for the moment dropped: for the expression “who fell” can hardly be used of the branches, but of men), severity; but toward thee, God’s (this genitive, omitted in the received text, is found in all our oldest MSS. The repetition is quite in the manner of the Apostle: see 1 Cor. i. 24, 25) goodness, if thou continue in his goodness; for (we supply, otherwise: i.e. assuming that thou dost not continue in that goodness) thou also shalt be cut off.

23.] And they moreover, if they continue not in their unbelief, shall be grafted in: for God is able to graft them in again. (Some represent this last clause as implying, that God’s power to graft them in again has always been the same, but has waited for their change of mind, to act. ‘But surely the other interpretation is far better, viz. that the Apostle obscurely includes in the term “grafting in,” the removal of their unbelief and the awakening of faith, and this last especially he looks for from above.’—for the power of God would not be put forward, if the other were the meaning.)

24.] For (proof that, besides God’s undoubted power to re-engage them, the idea of their being so re-engrafted is not an unreasonable one) if THOU wast cut off from the olive tree which is by nature wild, and wast grafted contrary to nature into a good olive tree: how much more shall these, which be the natural branches, be grafted into their own olive tree? It is a question, as Tholuck remarks, whether by nature and contrary to nature denote merely growth in the natural manner and growth (by engraving) in an unnatural (i. e. artificial) manner,—or that the wild is the nature of the Gentile, and the good olive that of the Jew, so that the sense would be—‘If thou wert cut out of the wild olive which is thine naturally, and wert engrafted contrary to (thy) nature into the good olive, how much more shall these, the natural branches,’ &c. But then the latter part of the sentence does not correspond with the former. We should then expect it to stand, ‘How much more these, who shall, agreeably to (their) nature, be grafted, &c. Tholuck describes the question as being between a comparison of engraving and not engraving, and one of engraving the congruous and the incongruous: and, on the above ground, decides in favour of the former,—by nature signifying merely natural growth, contrary to nature, unnatural growth, i.e. the growth of the grafted scion. But however this may fit the former part of the sentence, it surely cannot satisfy the requirements of the latter, where the natural branches are described as being engrafted (which would be in this view contrary to nature) into their own olive tree. We must at least assume a mixture of the two meanings, the antithesis of by nature and contrary to nature, being rather verbal than logical,—as is so common in the writings of the Apostle. Thus in the former case, that of the Gentile, the fact of natural growth is set against that of engrafted growth: whereas in the latter, the fact of congruity of nature (their own olive tree) is set against incongruity,—as making the re-engrafting more probable.

25–32.] Prophetic announcement that this re-engrafting SHALL ACTUALLY TAKE PLACE (25–27), and explanatory justification of this divine arrangement (28–32).

25.] For (I do not rest this on mere hope or probability, but have direct revelation of the Holy Spirit as to its certainty) I would not have you ignorant, brethren (an expression used by the Apostle to announce, either as here some authoritative declaration of divine truth, or some facts in his own history not previously known to his readers), of this mystery (the meanings included in the word mystery may be thus classified: (1) such matters of fact as are inaccessible to reason, and can only be known through revelation: (2) such matters as are patent facts, but the process of which cannot be entirely taken in by the reason. We may add a third sense,—that, which is no mystery in itself, but by its figurative import. Of the first, we may cite ch. xvi. 25; 1 Cor. ii. 7–10; Eph. i. 9; iii. 4; vi. 19; Col. i. 26, as examples: of the second, 1 Cor. xiv. 2; xiii. 2; Eph. v. 32; 1 Tim. iii. 9, 16: of the third, Matt. xiii. 11; Rev. i. 20; xvii. 5; 2 Thess. ii. 7.—The first meaning is evidently that in our text:—‘a prophetic event, unattainable by human knowledge, but revealed from the secrets of God’), lest ye should be wise in your own conceits (that ye do not take to yourselves the credit for wisdom superior to that of the Jews, in having acknowledged and accepted Jesus as the Son of God,—seeing that ye merely have received mercy through their unbelief, ver. 30),—that hardening (not ‘blindness;’ see above on ver. 7, and Eph. iv. 18, note) is come upon Israel in part (i. e. a portion of Israel have been hardened), until (this until has been variously understood by those who wish to escape from the prophetic assertion of the restoration of Israel. So Calvin says, “until” has no reference to progress or order of time, but rather means in order that the fulness of the Gentiles may come in. Others interpret it, “while the fulness... shall come in:” but all these are mere evasions) the fulness (completion) of the Gentiles (shall have) come in (to the Church or Kingdom of God, where we, the Apostle and those whom he addresses, are already: as we use the word ‘come in,’ with reference to the place in which we are. Or the word may be used absolutely, as it seems to be in Luke xi. 52, of entering into the Kingdom of God).—In order to understand the fulness of the Gentiles, we must bear in mind the character of the Apostle’s present argument. He is dealing with nations: with the Gentile nations, and the Jewish nation. And thus dealing, he speaks of the fullness of the Gentiles coming in, and of all Israel being saved: having no regard for the time to the individual destinies of Gentiles or Jews, but regarding nations as each included under the common bond of consanguinity according to the flesh. The fulness of the Gentiles I would regard then as signifying ‘the full number,’ ‘the totality,’ of the nations, i.e. every nation under heaven, the prophetic subjects (Matt. xxiv. 14) of the preaching of the gospel. The idea of an elect number, however true in, itself, does not seem to belong to this passage.

26.] And thus (when this condition shall have been fulfilled) all Israel shall be saved (Israel as a nation, see above: not individuals,—nor is there the slightest ground for the notion. This prophecy has been very variously regarded. Origen, understanding by the all Israel which shall be saved, the elected remnant, yet afterwards appears to find in the passage his notion of the final purification of all men,—of the believing, by the word and doctrine: of the unbelieving, by purgatorial fire.—Chrysostom gives no explanation: but on our Lord’s words in Matt. xvii. 11, he says, “When He says that Elias shall come and restore all things, He speaks of Elias himself, and of the conversion of the Jews which shall then take place,”—and shortly after calls him the Forerunner of the Lord’s second coming. Similarly Theodore and Gregory of Nyssa; so also Augustine, saying, “That in the last times, before the judgment, the Jews (by means of Elias who shall expound the law to them) shall believe in Christ, is a thing much asserted in the sayings and hearts of the faithful.” Similarly most of the fathers and schoolmen. Jerome, however, on Isa. xi. 11, says, “By no means, as our Judaizers say, shall all Israel be saved at the end of the world when the fulness of the nations shall have come in; but we understand all this of the first advent.” Grotius and Wetstein believe it to have been fulfilled after the destruction of Jerusalem, when, as Eusebius relates, thousands of the circumcision became believers in Christ. But Tholuck has shewn that neither could the number of Gentiles received into the Church before that time have answered to the fullness of the Gentiles, nor those Jews to all Israel, which expression accordingly Grotius endeavours to explain by a Rabbinical formula, that “all Israel have a part in the Messiah;” and this saying he supposes the Apostle to have used in a spiritual sense, meaning the Israel of God, as Gal. vi. 16.—The Reformers for the most part, in their zeal to impugn the millenarian superstitions then current, denied the future general conversion of the Jews, and would not recognize it even in this passage:—Luther did so recognize it, at one time, but towards the end of his life spoke most characteristically and strongly of what he conceived to be the impossibility of such national conversion.—Calvin says: “Many understand this of the Jewish people, as if Paul said that they should be restored to religion as before; but I extend the name of Israel to all the people of God, in this sense, when the Gentiles shall have entered in, the Jews also from their defection shall betake themselves to the obedience of the faith, and thus will be completed the salvation of all the Israel of God, which must be compounded of both: but so that the Jews shall have the prior place as being the firstborn in the family of God.” Bengel and Olshausen interpret all Israel of the elect believers of Israel:—Beza, Tholuck, and many others, hold that the words refer, as I have explained them above, to a national restoration of Israel to God’s favour.—I have not mixed with the consideration of this prophecy the question of the restoration of the Jews to Palestine, as being clearly irrelevant to it: the matter here treated being, their reception into the Church of God:

as it is written] This quotation appears to have for its object to shew that the Redeemer was to come for the behoof of God’s own chosen people.—For out of Sion, the Septuagint have ‘for the sake of Sion,’ the A.V. ‘to Zion.’ The Apostle frequently varies from the Septuagint, and a sufficient reason can generally be assigned for the variation: here, though this reason is not apparent, we cannot doubt that such existed, for the Septuagint version would surely have suited his purpose even better than “out of,” had there been no objection to it. It may be that the whole citation is intended to express the sense of prophecy rather than the wording of any particular passage, and that the Apostle has, in the words “out of Sion,” summed up the prophecies which declare that the Redeemer should spring out of Israel. The Hebrew and A.V. have, ‘and unto them that turn from transgression in Jacob.’

27. when I take away] from another place in Isa. (ref.),—hardly from Jer. xxxi. 34, as Stuart thinks;—and also containing a general reference to the character of God’s new covenant with them, rather than a strict reproduction of the original meaning: of any particular words of the prophet. “How came the Apostle, if he wished only to express the general thought, that the Messiah was come for Israel, to choose just this citation, consisting of two combined passages, when the same is expressed more directly in other passages of the Old Testament? I believe that the term ‘shall come?’ gave occasion for the quotation: if he did not refer this directly to the second coming of the Messiah, yet it allowed of being indirectly applied to it.” Tholuck.

28.] With regard indeed to the gospel (i. e. ‘viewed from the gospel-side,’)—looked on as we must look on them if we confine our view solely to the principles and character of the Gospel), they (the Jewish people considered as a whole) are enemies (i. e. hated by God, i.e. in a state of exclusion from God's favour) for your sakes: but with regard to the election (viz. of Israel to be God's people, see verses 1, 2—not that of Christians:—i. e. 'looked on as God's elect people'), they are beloved for the fathers' sakes (i. e. not for the merits of the fathers, but because of the covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, so often referred to by God as a cause for His favourable remembrance of Israel).

29.] For (explanation how God's favour regards them still, though for the present cast off) the gifts (generally) and calling (as the most excellent of those gifts. That calling seems to be intended, by which God adopted the posterity Abraham into covenant. A very similar sentiment is found ch. iii. 3, where the same is called "the faithfulness of God." But the words are true not only of this calling, but of every other. Bengel says, 'gifts, toward the Jews: calling, toward the Gentiles.' But thus the point of the argument seems to be lost, which is, that the Jews being once chosen as God's people, will never be entirely cast off) of God cannot be repented of (i. e. are irretactable: do not admit of a change of purpose. The E.V., 'without repentance,' is likely to mislead. Compare Hosea xiii. 14).

30.] For (illustration of the above position) as ye in times past were disobedient to God (nationally—as Gentiles, before the Gospel), but now by (as the occasion; the breaking off of the natural branches giving opportunity for the grafting in of you) the disobedience of these (i. e. unbelief, considered as an act of resistance to the divine will: see 1 John iii. 23), have obtained mercy (viz. by admission into the church of God): even so have these also now (under the Gospel) been disobedient (are now in a state of unbelieving disobedience), that by the mercy shewn to you (viz. on occasion of the fulness of the Gentiles coming in) they also may obtain mercy.

32.] For (foundation of the last stated arrangement in the divine purposes) God shut up (the indefinite past tense, which should be kept in the rendering, refers to the time of the act in the divine procedure) all men in disobedience (general here,—every form, unbelief included), that He may have mercy on all.—No mere permissive act of God must here be understood. The Apostle is speaking of the divine arrangement, by which the guilt of sin and the mercy of God were to be made manifest. He treats it, as elsewhere (see ch. ix. 18 and note), entirely with reference to the act of God, taking no account, for the time, of human agency; which, however, when treating of us and our responsibilities, he brings out into as prominent a position: see as the most eminent example of this, the closely following ch. xii 1, 2—But there remains some question, who are the all men of both clauses? Are they the same? And if so, is any support given to the notion of a general restoration of all men? Certainly they are identical: and signify all men, without limitation. But the ultimate difference between the all men who are shut up under disobedience, and the all men upon whom mercy is shewn is, that by all men this mercy is not accepted, and so men become self-excluded from the salvation of God. GOD's ACT remains the same, equally gracious, equally universal, whether men accept His mercy or not. This contingency is here not in view: but simply God's act itself.—We can hardly understand the all men nationally. The marked universality of the expression recalls the beginning of the Epistle, and makes it a solemn conclusion to the argumentative portion, after which the Apostle, overpowered with the view of the divine Mercy and Wisdom, breaks forth into the sublimest apostrophe existing even in the pages of Inspiration itself.

33–36.] Admiration of the goodness and wisdom of God, and humble ascription of praise to Him.

33.] There is some doubt whether the words wisdom and knowledge are genitives after riches, as in A.V., or parallel with it, as in the Revised Text. See the matter discussed in full in my Greek Test.; where Larrive at the conclusion that the three genitives are all co-ordinate: the first denoting the riches of the divine goodness, in the whole, and in the result just arrived at, ver. 32: the second, the divine wisdom of proceeding in the apparently intricate vicissitudes of nations and individuals: the third (if a distinction be necessary, which can hardly be doubted) the divine knowledge of all things from the beginning,—God's comprehension of the end and means together in one unfathomable depth of Omniscience.—How unsearchable are His judgments (the determinations of His wisdom, regarded as in the divine Mind. Some however deny this meaning, and render the word decrees, referring it to the blinding of the Jews), and His ways unable to be traced out (His methods of proceeding!).

34.] For (confirmation of what is said in the preceding verse, by a citation from Scripture. It is made from two separate places in the Septuagint, more perhaps as a reminiscence than as a direct quotation) who hath known the mind of the Lord? or who hath been His counsellor?

35.] Or who hath previously given to Him, and shall have recompence made to him again?—From Job xli. 2 (11 of our version), where the Septuagint. have "who shall withstand me, and endure?" But the Hebrew is nearly as our A.V., 'who hath anticipated (i. e. by the context, conferred a benefit on) me, that I may repay him?" And to this the Apostle alludes, using the third person.—We can hardly doubt that this question refers to the freeness and richness of God's mercy and love.

36.] For (ground of verses 33–35. Well may all this be true of Him, for) of Him (in their origin. "See how in these last words he sets forth what he has alluded to in all that he has said above, the mystery of the Trinity. For as here that which he says, 'for of Him and through Him and unto Him are all things,' agrees with what the same Apostle says elsewhere, as 1 Cor. viii. 6, and that all things are revealed by the Spirit of God; so when he says, 'O the depth of the riches!' he signifies the Father, of whom are all things: and ‘the depth of the wisdom,’ he signifies Christ, who is the wisdom of God: and ‘the depth of the knowledge,’ he signifies the Holy Spirit, who knows even the deep things of God,” Origen), and through him (in their subsistence and dis-posal), and unto Him (for His purposes and to His glory), are all things (not only, though chiefly, men,—but the whole creation). And, if this be rightly understood,—not of a formal allusion to the Three Persons in the Holy Trinity, but of an implicit reference to the three attributes of Jehovah respectively manifested to us by the Three coequal and coeternal Persons,—there can hardly be a doubt of its correctness.—Only those who are dogmatically prejudiced can miss seeing that, though St. Paul has never definitively expressed the doctrine of the Holy Trinity a definite formula, yet hie was conscious of it as a living reality

XII. 1-XV. 13.] PRACTICAL EXHORTATIONS FOUNDED ON THE DOCTRINES BEFORE STATED. And first, ch. xii. general exhortations to a Christian life.

1.] therefore may apply to the whole doctrinal portion of the Epistle which has preceded, which, see Eph. iv. 1; 1 Thess. iv. 1, seems the most natural connexion,—or to ch. 3 xi. 35, 36,—or to the whole close of ch. xi. Theodore remarks: “What the eye is in are body, that faith is to the soul, and the knowledge of divine things. Yet it has need of practical virtue, as the eye has need of hands and feet and the other parts of the body. And therefore the divine Apostle to his doctrinal argument subjoins ethical instruction also.”

by] This particle introduces an idea, the consideration of which is to give force to the exhortation.

the mercies of God] viz. those detailed and proved throughout the former part of the Epistle. “By these very facts, he says, I beseech you, by which ye were saved: as if any one wishing to make an impression on one who had received great benefits, were to bring his Benefactor himself to supplicate him. Chrysostom.

to present] ‘The verb used is the regular word for bringing to offer in sacrifice.

your bodies] Most Commentators say, merely for “yourselves,”—to suit the metaphor of a sacrifice, which consisted of a body: some, because the body is the organ of practical activity, which practical activity is to be dedicated to God: better still, as an indication that the sanctification of Christian life is to extend to that part of man’s nature which is most completely under the bondage of sin.

a living sacrifice] Chrysostom strikingly says, “How can the “body become a sacrifice? let the eye look upon nothing evil, and it has become a sacrifice: let the tongue speak nothing shameful, and it has become an offering: let the hand do nothing unlawful, and it has become a burnt-offering. Nay, this is not sufficient, but we need the active practice of good,—the hand must do alms, the mouth must bless them that curse, the ear must give attention without ceasing to divine lessons. For a sacrifice hath nothing impure, a sacrifice is the firstfruit of other things. And let us therefore with our hands, and our feet, and our mouth, and all our other members, render firstfruits unto God.”

living] In opposition to the Levitical sacrifices, which were slain animals. Our great sacrifice, the Lord Jesus, having been slain for us, and by the shedding of His Blood perfect remission having been obtained by the mercies of God, we are now enabled to be offered to God no longer by the shedding of blood, but as living sacrifices.

your rational service] rational is opposed to carnal or fleshly, see Heb. vii. 16, So Chrysostom, “having in it nothing corporeal, nothing gross, nothing subject to sense.” Theodore and others take it as ‘having reason,’ opposed to sacrifices of animals which have no reason: Basil and Calvin, as opposed to superstitious. But the former meaning is far the best, and answers to the “spiritual sacrifices” of 1 Pet. ii. 5.

2.] this world, here, the whole world of the ungodly, as contrasted with the spiritual kingdom of Christ.—The renewing of your mind is not the instrument by which, but the manner in which the metamorphosis takes place: that wherein it consists.

that ye may discern, viz. in this process and the active Christian life accompanying it: not ‘that ye may be able to prove,’ ‘acquire the faculty of proving,’ as some Commentators: the Apostle is not speaking of acquiring wisdom here, but of practical proof by experience.

good and wellpleasing, and perfect are not epithets of the will of God, as in A.V., for in that case they would be superfluous, and in part inapplicable (seeing that that which is perfect does not require further specification): but abstract neuters, see verse 9, that ye may prove what is the will of God (viz. that which is) good and wellpleasing (to Him) and perfect.

3-21.] Particular exhortations grounded on and expanding the foregoing general ones. This is expressed by the for, which resumes, and binds to what has preceded. And first, an exhortation to humility in respect of spiritual gifts, vv. 3-8.

3.] I say, a mild expression for ‘I command;’ enforced as a command by the following words, through the grace given to me, i.e. ‘by means of my apostolic office,’ of the grace conferred on me to guide and exhort the church.’ reff.

to every man that is among you,—a strong bringing out of the individual application of the precept. “He says it not to this person or that person only, but to ruler and ruled, to bond and free, to simple and wise, to woman and man.” Chrysostom.

not to be highminded, &c.] There is a play on the words here in the original, which can only be clumsily conveyed in another language: ‘not to be high-minded, above that which he ought to be minded, but to be so minded, as to be sober-minded.’ His measure of faith is his receptivity of graces of the Spirit, itself no inherent congruity, but the gift and apportionment of God. It is in fact the subjective designation of the grace which is given us, verse 6. But we must not say, with Ewbank, that “faith, in this passage, means those gifts or graces which the Christian can only receive through faith:” this is to confound the receptive faculty with the thing received by it, and to pass by the great lesson of our verse, that this faculty is nothing to be proud of, but God’s gift.

4.] For, elucidating the fact, that God apportions variously to various persons: because the Christian community is like a body with many members having various duties. See the same idea further worked out, 1 Cor. xii. 12 ff.

5. severally] i. e., as regards individuals.

members one of another is equivalent, to fellow-members with one another,—members of the body of which we one with another are members.

6.] The and is more than a mere copula: ‘and not only so, but’.... grace, see above ver. 3, on the “measure of faith.” These gifts are called, 1 Cor. xii. 7, “the manifestation of the Spirit.” On prophecy, see note, Acts xi. 27.

[let us prophesy] according to the proportion of faith] But what faith? Objective (‘faith which is believed’), or subjective (‘faith by which we believe’) the faith, or our faith? The comparison of “the measure of faith” above, and the whole context, determine it to be the latter; the measure of our faith: ‘let each contain himself within the limits of his own lot, and keep the measure of his revelation, and let not one seem to himself to know all things.’ To understand the words objectively, as ‘the rule of faith,’ as many R.-Cath. expositors, and some Protestant, e.g. Calvin, seems to do violence to the context, which aims at shewing that the measure of faith, itself the gift of God, is the receptive faculty for all spiritual gifts, which are therefore not to be boasted of, nor pushed beyond their provinces, but humbly exercised within their own limits.

7. ministry] any subordinate ministration in the Church. In Acts vi. 1 and 4, we have the word applied both to the lower ministration, that of alms and food, and to the higher, the ministry of the word, which belonged to the Apostles. But here it seems to be used in a more restricted sense, from its position as distinct from prophecy, teaching, exhortation, &c.

in our ministry] Let us confine ourselves humbly and orderly to that kind of ministration to which God’s providence has appointed us, as profitable members of the body.

he that teacheth] The prophet spoke under immediate inspiration; the teacher under inspiration working by the secondary instruments of his will and reason and rhetorical powers. Paul himself seems ordinarily, in his personal ministrations, to have used teaching. He is nowhere called one of the prophets, but appears as distinguished from them in several places: e.g. Acts xi. 27; xxi. 10, and apparently xiii. 1. Of course this does not affect the appearance of prophecies, commonly so called, in his writings. The inspired teacher would speak, though not technically prophecies, yet the mind of the Spirit in all things: not to mention that the apostolic office was one in dignity and fulness of inspiration far surpassing any of the subordinate ones, and in fact including them all.

in his teaching] as before: he is to teach in the sphere, within the bounds, of the teaching allotted to him by God,—or for which God has given faculty.

8.] The exhorter was not necessarily distinct from the prophesier,—see 1 Cor. xiv. 31.

he that giveth appears to be the giver of the alms to the poor,—either the deacon himself, or some distributor subordinate to the deacon. This however has been doubted, and not without reason: for a transition certainly seems to be made, by the omission of the “or,” from public to private gifts. We cannot find any ecclesiastical meaning for sheweth mercy (though indeed Calvin and others understand by it, “widows and others who, according to the ancient custom of the Church, were appointed over ministrations to the sick''),—and the very fact of the three preceding being all limited to their respective official spheres, whereas these three are connected with qualitative descriptions, speaks strongly for their being private acts, to be always performed in the spirit described. On the rendering the original word liberality, and not simplicity, see note in my Greek Test.

He that ruleth or presideth—but over what? If over the Church exclusively, we come back to offices again: and it is hardly likely that the rulers of the Church, as such, would be introduced so low down in the list, or by so very general a term, as this. In 1 Tim. iii. 4, 5, 12, we have the verb used of presiding over a man's own household: and in its absolute usage here, I do not see why that also should not be included.

with diligence] implying that he who is by God set over others, be they members of the Church or of his own household, must not allow himself to forget his responsibility, and take his duty indolently and easily, but must rule with earnestness, making it a serious matter of continual diligence.

he that sheweth mercy] This is the very best rendering: and I cannot conceive that any officer of the Church is intended, but every private Christian who exercises compassion. It is in exhibiting compassion, which is often the compulsory work of one obeying his conscience rather than the spontaneous effusion of love, that cheerfulness is so peculiarly required, and so frequently wanting. And yet in such an act it is even of more consequence towards the effect,—consoling the compassionate, than the act itself. “A word is better than a gift,” Eccl. xviii. 16.

9–21.] Exhortations to various Christian principles and habits.

9. Abhor that which is evil] This very general exhortation is probably, as Bengel says, an explanation of “without dissimulation,”—our love should arise from a genuine cleaving to that which is good, and aversion from evil: not from any by-ends.

10.] The word rendered affectionate is properly used of the love of near relatives to one another, and agrees therefore exactly with brotherly love.

out-doing one another] Not, as A.V., “preferring one another:” but as Chrysostom explains it, “do not wait to be loved by another, but thyself spring forward to the act, and make the beginning.”

11.] in diligence (or, zeal: not ‘business,’ as A.V., which seems to refer it to the affairs of this life, whereas it relates, as all these in verses 11, 12, 13, to Christian duties as such: as ‘fervency of spirit,’ ‘acting as God's servants,’ ‘rejoicing in hope,’ &c.) not slothful; in spirit, fervent (this expression is used of Apollos in Acts xviii. 25. The Holy Spirit lights this fire within: see Luke xii. 49; Matt. iii. 11).

serving the Lord] There is a remarkable variety in reading here. Some of our ancient MSS. here have kairo, “time,” instead of kurio, “Lord,” “serving the time,” or, “the opportunity.” But the weight of external authority is strongly in favour of the ordinary reading. The balance of internal probability, though not easy at once to settle, is I am persuaded on the same side. The main objection to the words, “serving the Lord,” has ever been, that thus the Apostle would be inserting here, among particular precepts, one of the most general and comprehensive character. But this will be removed, if we remember, of what he is speaking: and if I mistake not, the other reading has been defended partly owing to forgetfulness of this. The present subject is, the character of our zeal for God. In it we are not to be slothful, but fervent in spirit,—and that, as servants of God. A very similar reminiscence of this relation to God occurs Col. iii. 22–24. The command, to be servants of the time, or opportunity, would surely come in, very inopportune in the midst of exhortations to the zealous service of God. As to its applicability at all to Christians, De Wette well remarks, “The Christian may and should certainly employ (Eph. v. 16) time and opportunity, but not serve it.”

13. given to hospitality] This is but a feeble rendering of the original, which is, pursuing, making earnestly a point of hospitality; and on which Chrysostom remarks, “He does not say, practising, but pursuing, teaching us not to wait for those that are in need, but rather to run after them and track them out.”

14.] “The Sermon on the Mount must have been particularly well known; for among the few references in the N.T. Epistles to the direct words of Christ there occur several to it: e.g. 1 Cor. vii. 10. James iv. 9; v. 12 (we may add iv. 3; i. 2, 22; ii. 5, 13; v. 2, 3, 10). 1 Pet. iii. 9, 14; iv. 14.” Tholuck.

16.] Having the same spirit towards one another, i.e. actuated by a common and well-understood. feeling of mutual allowance and kindness, condescending to men of low estate] It is a question, whether this is the rendering, or whether it should not be “inclining unto the things that be lowly." I have discussed the two in the note in my Greek Test., and found reason to uphold the rendering of the A.V. The other however is perfectly legitimate, and appears to suit better the former part of the sentence. But the Apostle's antitheses do not require such minute correspondence as this. The sense then must decide. The insertion of the seemingly incongruous "Be not wise in your own conceits" is sufficiently accounted for by reference to ch. xi. 25, where he had stated this frame of mind as one to be avoided by those whose very place in God's church was owing to His free mercy. Being uplifted one against another would be a sign of this fault being present and operative.

17.] The Apostle now proceeds to exhort respecting conduct to those without.

Provide things honourable] from the Septuagint version of Prov. iii. 4, which has "provide things honourable before the Lord and men." The A.V. there gives a totally different rendering.

18.] The condition attached to this com: mand is objective only—not 'if you can,' but if it be possible—if others will allow it. And this is further defined by as much as dependeth on YOU; all YOUR part is to be peace: whether you actually live peaceably or not, will depend then solely on how others behave towards you.

19.] So Matt. v. 39, 40.

dearly beloved] "The more difficult this duty, the more affectionately does the Apostle address his readers, with this word." Tholuck.

give place] allow space, i.e. 'interpose delay,' to wrath. We must not understand wrath to mean 'your anger,' nor (though it comes to that) 'God's anger,' but 'anger,' generally;—'give wrath room:' 'proceed not to execute it hastily, but leave it for its legitimate time, when He whose it is to avenge, will execute it: make not the wrath your own, but leave it for God.' So in the main, but mostly understanding the wrath to be exclusively that of God, Chrysostom, Augustine, Theodore, and the great body of Commentators.—Some Fathers interpret it, 'yield to the anger (of your adversary)'; but this meaning for the words is hardly borne out.—The citation varies from the Septuagint, which has, "in the day of vengeance I will repay," and is nearer the Hebrew, "mine is revenge and requital." It is very remarkable, that in Heb. x. 30 the citation is made in the same words.

20.] Nay rather, if is the reading of our three oldest MSS.; the therefore (A. V.) is very variously read and placed by the later ones.—What is meant by thou shalt heap coals of fire? The expression "coals of fire" occurs more than once in Ps. xviii., of the divine punitive judgments. Can those be meant here? Clearly not, in their bare literal sense. For however true it may be, that ingratitude will add to the enemy's list of crimes, and so subject him more to God's punitive judgment, it is impossible that to bring this about should be set as a precept, or a desirable thing among Christians. Again, can the expression be meant of the glow and burn of shame which would accompany, even in the case of a profane person, the receiving of benefits from an enemy? This may be meant; but is not probable, as not sufficing for the majesty of the subject. Merely to make an enemy ashamed of himself, can hardly be upheld as a motive for action. I understand the words, 'For in thus doing, you will be taking the most effectual vengeance:' as effectual as if you heaped coals of fire on his head.

21.] If you suffered yourselves to be provoked to revenge, you would be yielding to the enemy,—overcome by that which is evil: do not thus,—but in this, and in all things, overcome the evil (in others) by your good.

CHAP. XIII. 1–7.] The duty of cheerful obedience to the authorities of the state, It has been well observed that some special reason must have given occasion to these exhortations. We can hardly attribute it to the seditious spirit of the Jews at Rome, as their influence in the Christian Church there would not be great; indeed, from Acts xxviii. the two seem to have been remarkably distinct. But disobedience to the civil authorities may have arisen from mistaken views among the Christians themselves as to the nature of Christ's kingdom, and its relation to existing powers of this world. And such mistakes would naturally be rifest there, where the fountain of earthly power was situated: and there also best and most effectually met by these precepts coming from apostolic authority. The way for them is prepared by verses 17 ff. of the foregoing chapter. 1 Pet. ii. 13 ff. is parallel: compare notes there.

1.] submit himself, i.e. 'be subject of his own free will and accord.'—For there is no authority (in heaven or earth—no power at all) except from God: those that be (the existing powers which we see about us), have been ordained by God. We may observe that the Apostle here pays no regard to the question of the duty of Christians in revolutionary movements. His precepts regard an established power, be it what it may. It, in all matters lawful, we are bound to obey. But even the parental power does not extend to things unlawful. If the civil power commands us to violate the law of God, we must obey God before man. If it commands us to disobey the common laws of humanity, or the sacred institutions of our country, our obedience is due to the higher and more general law, rather than to the lower and particular. These distinctions must be drawn by the wisdom granted to Christians in the varying circumstances of human affairs: they are all only subordinate portions of the great duty of obedience to LAW. To obtain, by lawful means, the removal or alteration of an unjust or unreasonable law, is another part of this duty: for all authorities among men must be in accord with the highest authority, the moral sense. But even where law is hard and unreasonable, not disobedience, but legitimate protest, is the duty of the Christian.

2.] shall receive to themselves condemnation, viz. punishment from God, through His minister, the civil power.

3.] And the tendency of these powers is salutary: to encourage good works, and discourage evil. Tholuck observes, that this verse is a token that the Apostle wrote the Epistle before the commencement of the Neronian persecution. Had this been otherwise, the principle stated by him would have been the same: but he could hardly have passed so apparent an exception to it without remark.

4.] the sword, perhaps in allusion to the dagger worn by the Cæsars, which was regarded as a symbol of the power of life and death. In ancient and modern times, the sword has been carried before sovereigns. It betokens the power of capital punishment: and the reference to it here is among the many testimonies borne by Scripture against the attempt to abolish the infliction of the penalty of death for crime in Christian states.

for wrath seems to be inserted for the sake of parallelism with “for good” above: it betokens the character of the vengeance, —that it issues in wrath. The wrath is referred to in “the wrath,” ver. 5.

5.] Wherfore, because of the divine appointment and mission of the civil officer.

ye must needs submit yourselves—there is a moral necessity for subjection:—one not only of terror, but of conscience: compare “for the Lord’s sake,” 1 Pets ii. 13.

6.] For this cause also is parallel with “wherefore” ver. 5,—giving another result of the divine appointment of the civil power;—not dependent on ver. 5.

for they (the authorities) are ministers of God, attending continually to this very thing, viz. ministration. Tertullian remarks, that what the Romans lost by the Christians refusing to bestow gifts on their temples, they gained by their conscientious payment of taxes.

7.] tribute is direct payment for state purposes: custom is toll, or tax on produce.

fear, to those set over us and having power: honour, to those, but likewise to all on whom the state has conferred distinction.

8-10.] Exhortation to universal love of others.

8.] ‘Pay all other debts: be indebted in the matter of love alone.’ This debt increases the more, the more it is paid: because the practice of love makes the principle of love deeper and more active. By the word law is meant, not the Christian law, but the Mosaic law of the decalogue. “He who practises Love, the higher duty, has, even before he does this, fulfilled the law, the lower.” De Wette.

9.] The words “thou shalt not bear false witness,” inserted in the A.V., are omitted in almost all our most ancient authorities.

comprehended, i.e. brought under one head,—“united in the one principle from which all flow.”

10.] All the commandments of the law above cited are negative: the formal fulfilment of them is therefore attained, by working no ill to one’s neighbour. What greater things Love works, he does not now say: it fulfils the law, by abstaining from that which the law forbids.

11-14.] Enforcement of the foregoing, and occasion taken for fresh exhortations, by the consideration that THE DAY OF THE LORD IS AT HAND.

11.] And this, i.e. ‘and let us do this,’ viz., live in no debt but that of love, for other reasons, and especially for this following one.

sleep here imports the state of worldly carelessness and indifference to sin, which allows and practises the works of darkness. The imagery seems to be taken originally from our Lord’s discourse concerning His coming: see Matt. xxiv. 42; Mark xiii. 33, and Luke xxi. 28–36, where several points of similarity to our verses 11–14 occur.

salvation] as “your redemption,” Luke xxi. 28, and ch. viii. 23, is said of the accomplishment of salvation.—Without denying the legitimacy of an individual application of this truth, and the importance of its consideration for all Christians of all ages, a fair exposition of this passage can hardly fail to recognize the fact, that the Apostle here as well as elsewhere (1 Thess. iv. 17; 1 Cor. xv. 51), speaks of the coming of the Lord as rapidly approaching. Prof. Stuart and others are shocked at the idea, as being inconsistent with the inspiration of his writings. How this can be, I am at a loss to imagine. “OF THAT DAY AND HOUR KNOWETH NO MAN, NO NOT THE ANGELS IN HEAVEN, NOR EVEN THE SON, BUT THE FATHER,” Mk. xiii. 32.—And to reason, as Stuart does, that because St. Paul corrects in 2 Thess. ii, the mistake of imaging it to be immediately at hand (or even actually come, see note there), therefore he did not himself expect it soon, is surely quite beside the purpose. The fact, that the nearness or distance of that day was unknown to the Apostles, in no way affects the prophetic announcements of God’s Spirit by them, concerning its preceding and accompanying circumstances. The ‘day and hour’ formed no part of their inspiration;—the details of the event, did. And this distinction has singularly and providentially turned out to the edification of all subsequent ages. While the prophetic declarations of the events of that time remain to instruct us, the eager expectation of the time, which they expressed in their day, has also remained, a token of the true frame of mind in which each succeeding age (and each succeeding age more strongly than the last) should contemplate the ever-approaching coming of the Lord. On the certainty of the event, our faith is grounded: by the uncertainty of the time our hope is stimulated, and our watchfulness aroused.

12.] The night, the lifetime of the world,—the power of darkness, see Eph. vi. 12 the day, the day of the resurrection, 1 Thess. v. 4; Rev. xxi. 25; of which resurrection we are already partakers, and are to walk as such, Col. iii. 1–4; 1 Thess. y. 5–8. Therefore,—let us lay aside (as it were a clothing) the works of darkness (see Eph. v. 11–14, where a similar strain of exhortation occurs), and put on the armour of light (described Eph. vi. 11 ff.—the arms belonging to a soldier of light—one who is of the “sons of light” and “sons of the day,” 1 Thess. v. 5).

13.] chambering, in a bad sense: the act itself being a defilement, when unsanctified by God’s ordinance of marriage. The words are both plural in the original, chamberings and wantonesses: i.e. various kinds, or frequent repetitions, of these sins.

14.] Chrysostom says, on Eph. iv. 24, “So we say of friends, ‘Such an one has put on such an one,’ when we mean to describe great love and unceasing intercourse.”

Romans: Chapter 14

CHAP. XIV. 1–XV. 13.] ON THE CONDUCT TO BE PURSUED TOWARDS WEAK AND SCRUPULOUS BRETHREN.—There is some doubt who the weak in faith were, of whom the Apostle here treats; whether they were ascetics, or Judaizers. Some habits mentioned, as e.g. the abstinence from all meats, and from wine, seem to indicate the former: whereas the observation of days, and the use of such expressions as “unclean,” ver. 14, and again the argument of ch. xv. 7–13, as plainly point to the latter. The difficulty may be solved by a proper combination of the two views. The over-scrupulous Jew became an ascetic by compulsion. He was afraid of pollution by eating meats sacrificed or wine poured to idols: or even by being brought into contact, in foreign countries, with casual and undiscoverable uncleanness, which in his own land he knew the articles offered for food would be sure not to have incurred. He therefore abstained from all prepared food, and confined himself to that which he could trace from natural growth to his own use. We have examples of this in Daniel (Dan. i.), Tobit (Tob. i. 10, 11), and in some Jewish priests mentioned by Josephus, who having been sent prisoners to Rome, “did not forget their piety towards God, but lived on figs and walnuts.” And Tholuck refers to the Mishna as containing precepts to this effect. All difficulty then is removed, by supposing that of these over-scrupulous Jews some had become converts to the gospel, and with neither the obstinacy of legal Judaizers, nor the pride of ascetics (for these are not hinted at here), but in weakness of faith, and the scruples of an over-tender conscience, retained their habits of abstinence and observation of days. On this account the Apostle characterizes and treats them mildly: not with the severity which he employs towards the Colossian Judaizing ascetics, and those mentioned in 1 Tim. iv. 1 ff.—The question treated in 1 Cor. viii. was somewhat different: there it was, concerning meat actually offered to an idol. In 1 Cor. x. 25–27, he touches the same question as here, and decides against the stricter view.

1–12.] EXHORTATION TO MUTUAL FORBEARANCES, ENFORCED BY THE AXIOM, THAT EVERY MAN MUST SERVE GOD ACCORDING TO HIS OWN SINCERE PERSUASION.

1.] The general duty of a reconciling and uncontroversial spirit towards the weak in faith.—In the original this verse is connected with the last by the particle “but:” and it is thus bound on to the general exhortations to mutual charity in ch. xiii.: as if it had been said, ‘in the particular case of the weak in faith,’ &c.: but also implies a contrast, which seems to be, in allusion to the Christian perfection enjoined in the preceding verses,—‘but do not let your own realization of your state as children of light make you intolerant of shortcoming and infirmity in others.’ The particular weakness consisted in a want of broad and independent principle, and a consequent bondage to prejudices.

faith therefore is used in a general sense, to indicate the moral soundness conferred by faith,—the whole character of the Christian's conscience and practice, resting on faith.

weak in the faith imports holding THE FAITH imperfectly, i.e. not being able to receive the faith in its strength, so as to be above such prejudices.

receive ye] 'give him your hand,' as the old Syriac Version renders it: 'count him one of you.' so far from rejecting or discouraging him.

[yet] not for] i.e. but not with a view to: 'do not adopt him as a brother, in order then to begin'...

deciding of doubts] literally, discernments of thoughts, i.e. 'disputes in order to settle the points on which he has scruples.' Namely, those scruples in which his weakness consists,—and those more enlightened views in you, by which you would fain remove his scruples. Do not let your association of him among you be with a view to settle these disputes.

2. eateth herbs] See remarks introductory to this chapter.

3.] despise, for his weakness of faith,—judge, for his laxity of practice.—For God hath received (adopted into his family) him (i. e. the eater, who was judged,—his place in God's family doubted: not the abstainer, who was only despised, set at nought,—and to whom the words cannot. by the construction apply).

4.] Who art thou (see ch. ix. 20) that judgest the servant of another (viz. of Christ,—for the lord in this passage is marked, verses 8, 9, as being Chirst,—and the Master is the same throughout. "God," mentioned before, is unconnected with this verse)? to his own lord (i. e. 'it i own master's matter, and his alone, that') he standeth (remains in the place and estimation of a Christian, from which thou wouldest eject him; not, 'stands hereafter in the judgment,' which is not in question here: see 1 Cor. x. 12) or falleth (from his place, see above). But he shall be made to stand (notwithstanding thy doubts of the correctness of his practice): for the Lord (or, his Lord, in allusion to the words "to his own Lord" above) is able to make him stand (in faith and practice. These last words are inapplicable, if standing and falling at the great day are meant).—Notice, this argument is entirely directed to the weak, who uncharitably judges the strong,—not vice versa. The weak imagines that the strong cannot be a true servant of God, nor, retain his amidst such temptation. To this the Apostle answers, (1) that such judgment belongs only to Christ, whose servant he is: (2) that the Lord's almighty Power is able to keep him up, and will do so.

5.] One man (the weak) esteemeth (selects for honour) one day above another [day]: another (the strong) esteemeth (worthy of honour) every day. Let each be fully persuaded in his own mind.—It is an interesting question, what indication is here found of the observance or non-observance of days of obligation in the apostolic times. The Apostle decides nothing: leaving every man's own mind to guide him in the point. He classes the observance or non-observance of particular days, with the eating or abstaining from particular meats. In both cases, he is concerned with things which he evidently treats as of absolute indifference in themselves. Now the question is, supposing the divine obligation of one day in seven to have been "recognized by him in any form, could he have thus spoken? The obvious inference from his strain of arguing is, that he knew of no such obligation, but believed all times and days to be, to the Christian strong in faith, ALIKE. I do not see how the passage can be otherwise understood. If any one day in the week were invested with the sacred character of the Sabbath, it would have been wholly impossible for the Apostle to command or uphold the man who judged all days worthy of equal honour,—who, as in ver. 6, paid no regard to the (any) day. He must have visited him with his strongest disapprobation, as violating a command of God. I therefore infer, that sabbatical obligation to keep any day, whether seventh or first, was not recognized in apostolic times. It must be carefully remembered, that this inference does not concern the question of the observance of the Lord's Day as an institution of the Christian Church, analogous to the ancient Sabbath, binding on us from considerations of humanity and religious expediency, and by the rules of that branch. of the Church in which Providence has placed us, but not in any way inheriting the divinely-appointed obligation of the other, or the strict prohibitions by which its sanctity was defended. The reply commonly furnished to these considerations, viz. that the Apostle was speaking here only of Jewish festivals, and therefore cannot refer to Christian ones, is a quibble of the poorest kind: its assertors themselves distinctly maintaining the obligation of one such Jewish festival on Christians. What I maintain is, that had the Apostle believed as they do, he could not by any possibility have written thus. Besides, in the face of the words every day, the assertion, that Jewish festivals only were contemplated, is altogether precluded.

6.] The words in brackets do not occur in most of our early authorities. They were probably omitted from the similar ending of both clauses in the original having misled some early copyists, and the eye having passed from one to the other (a very usual mistake); but perhaps. it may have been intentionally done, after the observation of the Lord's Day came to. be regarded as binding.

giveth thanks, adduced as a practice of both parties, shews the universality among the early Christians of thanking God at meals: see 1 Tim. iv. 3, 4.—The “saying grace” of the abstainer, was over his ‘dinner of herbs.’

the Lord throughout the verse is CHRIST.

7.] This verse illustrates the former, and at the same time sets in a still plainer light than before, that both parties, the eater and the abstainer, are servants of another, even Christ.—Liveth and dieth represent the whole sum of our course on earth.

8.] The inference,—that we are, under all circumstances, living or dying (and much more eating or abstaining, observing days, or not observing them), CHRIST’ S: His property.

9.] And this lordship over all was the great end of the Death and Resurrection of Christ. By that Death and Resurrection, the crowning events of his work of Redemption, He was manifested as the righteous Head over the race of man, which now, and in consequence man’s world also, belongs by right to Him alone.

lived, viz. after His death; lived again.

both of the dead and of the living] These terms are repeated here for uniformity with what has gone before in verses 7, 8: in sense comprehending all created beings.

10.] He returns to the duty of abstaining,—the weak, from judging his stronger brother; the strong, from despising the weaker.

11.] The citation is nearly according to the A.V., except that as I live is “I have sworn by myself,” and make confession to God is “swear.”

12.] The stress is on concerning himself: and the next verse refers back to it, laying the emphasis on one another. ‘Seeing that our account to God will be of each man’s own self, let us take heed lest by judging one another (judging here in the general sense of ‘pass judgment on,’ including both the despising of the strong and the judging of the weak) we incur the guilt of destroying one another.’

13–23.] EXHORTATION TO THE STRONG TO HAVE REGARD TO THE CONSCIENTIOUS SCRUPLES OF THE WEAK, AND FOLLOW PEACE, NOT HAVING RESPECT MERELY TO HIS OWN CONSCIENCE, BUT TO THAT OF THE OTHER, WHICH IS HIS RULE, AND BEING VIOLATED LEADS TO HIS CONDEMNATION.

13.] See above: the second exhortation, let this be your judgment, is used as corresponding to the first, and is in fact a play on it. The former word, the stumblingblock, seems rather to refer to an occasion of sin in act: the latter, to offence in thought, scruple. 14.] The general principle laid down, that nothing is by its own means,—i. e. for any thing in itself,—unclean, but only in reference to him who reckons it to be so.

am persuaded in (not, as A.V., by) the Lord Jesus] These words give to the persuasion the weight, not merely of Paul’s own opinion, but of apostolic authority. He is persuaded, in his capacity as connected with Christ Jesus,—as having the mind of Christ.

15.] The for here is elliptical, depending on the suppressed re-statement of the precept of ver. 13: ‘But this knowledge is not to be your rule in practice, but rather,’ &c., as in ver. 13: ‘for if,’ &c.—Meat, or food, is thus barely put, to make the contrast greater between the slight occasion, and the great mischief done. The mere grieving your brother, is an offence against love: how much greater an offence then, if this grieving end in destroying—in ruining (causing to act against his conscience, and so to commit sin and be in danger of quenching God’s Spirit within him) by a MEAL of thine, a brother, for whom Christ died! “Value not thy meat more than Christ valued His life.” Bengel. See an exact parallel in 1 Cor. viii. 10.

16.] Your strength of faith is a good thing; let it not pass into bad repute: use it so that it may be honoured, and encourage others.

17.] For it is not worth while to let it be disgraced and become useless for such a trifle; for no part of the advance of Christ’s gospel can be bound up in, or consist in, meat and drink: but in righteousness (of course to be taken in union with the doctrine of the former part of the Epistle—righteousness by justification,—bringing forth the fruits of faith, which would be hindered by faith itself being disturbed), peace (“with our brethren, to which is opposed this love of controversy,” Chrysostom), and joy (“arising from unanimity, which this wrangling annuls,” Chrysostom) in the Holy Ghost:—in connexion with, under the indwelling and influence of the Holy Ghost.

18. approved of men] as a man of peace and uprightness: “for all men will yield admiration, not so much to perfection, as to peace and unanimity. For in the benefits of this latter all can share, but in that other, no one,” Chrysostom.

19.] Inference from the foregoing two verses, mutual edification, i.e. the work of edification, finding its exercise in our mutual intercourse and allowances.

20.] the work of God has been variously understood: as righteousness, peace, and joy; or, the Christian standing of the offended brother, so as to be parallel to ver. 15: or as the faith of thy fellow-Christian: or as the kingdom of God, ‘the spread of the Gospel’ But I believe the expression edification having just preceded is the clue to the right meaning: and that this word represents edification in the Apostle’s mind. He calls Christians in 1 Cor. iii. 9, “God’s husbandry, God’s building” (the same word as edification here). ‘Thus it will mean, thy fellow-Christian, as a plant of God’s planting, a building of God’s raising. All things indeed are clean; nevertheless it is evil to the man (‘there is criminality in the man’) who eateth with offence (i. e. giving offence to his weak brother. That this is the right interpretation is shewn by the sentence standing between two others, both addressed to the strong, who is in danger of offending the weak. But Chrysostom and others take the sense of ‘receiving offence,’ and understand it of the weak).

21.] It is good not to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor [to do] any thing (the Apostle, as so often, is deducing a general duty from the particular subject) wherein (in the matter of which) thy brother stumbleth, or is offended (see on ver. 13), or is weak (Tholuck remarks that the three verbs form a gradual anti-climax from greater to less; “stumbleth, or even is offended, or even is weak”).

22. The faith which thou hast, have [it] to thyself before God ‘Before God,’—because He is the object of faith: hardly, as Erasmus, “because he wishes to repress the vain-glory which usually accompanies knowledge,”—for there is no trace of a depreciation of the strong in faith in the chapter,—only a caution as to their conduct in regard of their weaker brethren.—With the word Blessed begins the closing and general sentence of the Apostle with regard to both: it is a blessed thing to have no scruples (the strong in faith is in a situation to be envied) about things in which we allow ourselves (Olshausen refers to the addition in one of our ancient MSS. at Luke vi. 4,—where our Lord is related to have seen a man tilling his land on the Sabbath, and to have said to him, “If thou knowest what thou art doing, blessed art thou; but if thou knowest not, thou art cursed, and a transgressor of the law”). But he that doubteth (he that is not in that situation) incurs condemnation by eating (the case in point is here particularized), because [he eateth] not of faith (i. e. as before, from a persuasion of rectitude grounded on and consonant with his life of faith. That ‘faith in the Son of God’ by which the Apostle describes his own life in the flesh as being lived (Gal. ii. 20), informing and penetrating the motives and the conscience, will not include, will not sanctify, an act done against the testimony of the conscience): but (introducing an axiom, as Heb. viii. 13) whatsoever is not of (grounded in, and therefore consonant with) faith (the great element in which the Christian lives and moves and desires and hopes), is sin.—Augustine, Thomas Aquinas, and others, have taken this text as shewing that “the whole life of unbelievers is sin.” Whether that be the case or not, cannot be determined from this passage, any more than from Heb. xi. 6, because neither here nor there is the unbeliever in question. Here the Apostle has in view two Christians, both living by faith, and by faith doing acts pleasing to God:—and he reminds them that whatever they do out of harmony with this great principle of their spiritual lives, belongs to the category of sin. In Heb. xi. he is speaking of one who had the testimony of having (eminently) pleased God: this, he says, he did by faith; for without faith it is impossible to please Him. The question touching the unbeliever must be settled by another enquiry: Can he whom we thus name have faith,—such a faith as may enable him to do acts which are not sinful? a question impossible for us to solve.

Romans: Chapter 15

CHAP. XV. 1–13.] FURTHER EXHORTATIONS TO FORBEARANCE TOWARDS THE WEAK,—FROM THE EXAMPLE OF CHRIST (1–3),—AND TO UNANIMITY (4–7) AA BETWEEN JEW AND GENTILE, SEEING THAT CHRIST WAS PROPHETICALLY ANNOUNCED AS THE COMMON SAVIOUR OF BOTH (8–13).

1.] By the words we that are strong, the Apostle includes himself among the strong, as indeed he before indicated, ch. xiv. 14.

the infirmities are general, not merely referring to the scruples before treated.

2.] The qualification, for his good with a view to edification, excludes all mere pleasing of men from the Christian’s motives of action. The Apostle repudiates it in his own case, Gal. i. 10.

3. Christ pleased not himself for, “He might have escaped reproach, He might have avoided suffering what He did, if He had consulted His own pleasure: howbeit He willed not thus, but looking at our good, He overlooked His own pleasure;” Chrysostom. The words in the Messianic Psalm are addressed to the Father, not to those for whom Christ suffered: but they prove all that is here required, that He did not please Himself; His sufferings were undertaken on account of the Father’s good purpose—mere work which He gave Him to do.

4.] The Apostle both justifies the above citation, and prepares the way for the subject to be next introduced, viz. the duty of unanimity, grounded on the testimony of these Scriptures to Christ. The expression, whatsoever things were written aforetime, applies to the whole ancient Scriptures, not to the prophetic parts only.

our, viz. of us Christians.

patience, as well as comfort, is to be joined with of the scriptures,—otherwise it stands unconnected with the subject of the sentence. The genitives then mean, the patience and the comfort arising from the scriptures, produced by their study.

5, 6.] Further introduction of the subject, by a prayer that God, who has given the Scriptures for these ends, might grant them unanimity, that they might with one accord shew forth His glory.—In the title given to God, the patience and comfort just mentioned are taken up again: q.d. “The God who alone can give this patience and comfort.”

according to (the spirit and precepts of) Christ Jesus.

6.] We may also render this expression, here and elsewhere, ‘God, and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.’ But the ordinary rendering, the God and Father.... is preferable on account of its simplicity.

7.] Wherfore (on which account, viz. that. the wish of the last verse may be accomplished) receive ye (see ch. xiv. 1) one another, as Christ also received you,—to the glory of God (i. e. with a view to God’s glory). That this is the meaning, “that the Gentiles glorify God for His mercy,” appears by ver. 9. The Apostle does not expressly name Jewish and Gentile converts as those to whom he addresses this exhortation, but it is evident from the next verse that it is so.

8.] For (reason for the above exhortation) I say that Christ hath been made (i.e. come as: the effects still enduring) a minister (He came to minister, Matt. xx. 28) of the circumcision (an expression nowhere else found, and doubtless here used by Paul to humble the pride of the strong, the Gentile Christians, by exalting God’s covenant people to their true dignity), for the sake of God’s truth (i. e. for the fulfilment of the Divine pledges given under the covenant of circumcision), in order to confirm the promises made unto the fathers (literally, the promises of the fathers; so “the blessing of Abraham,” Gal. iii. 14, Christ came to the Jews in virtue of a long-sealed compact, to the fulfilment of which God’s truth was pledged): and (I say) that the Gentiles glorified God (meaning, that ‘each man at his conversion did so.’) These words cannot by any possibility be rendered as in the A.V., “that the Gentiles might glorify God”) on account of [His] mercy (the emphasis is on mercy: the Gentiles have no covenant promise to claim,—they have nothing but the pure mercy of God in grafting them in to allege—therefore the Jew has an advantage), &c.—The citations are from the Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms. The first, originally spoken by David of his joy after his deliverances and triumphs, is prophetically said of Christ in His own Person. It is adduced to shew that among the Gentiles Christ’s triumphs were to take place, as well as among the Jews.

10.] again he saith,—or, it saith, viz. the Scripture, which is in substance the same.

11, 12.] The universality of the praise to be given to God for His merciful kindness in sending His Son is prophetically indicated by the first citation. In the latter a more direct announcement is given of the share which the Gentiles were to have in the root of Jesse. The version is that of the Septuagint, which here differs considerably from the Hebrew. The latter is nearly literally rendered in A.V.: “And in that day there shall be a root (Hebrew, ‘and it shall happen in that day, the branch’) of Jesse, which shall stand for an ensign of the people: to it shall the Gentiles seek.”

13.] The hortatory part of the Epistle, as well as the preceding section of it (ver. 5), concludes with a solemn wish for the spiritual welfare of the Roman Church.—The words of hope connect with “shall hope” of the foregoing verse, as was the case with “of patience and comfort” in ver 5.

joy and peace, as the happy result of faith in God, and unanimity with one another: see ch. xiv, 17.

XV. 14–XVI. 27.] CONCLUSION OF THE EPISTLE. PERSONAL NOTICES, RESPECTING THE APOSTLE HIMSELF (xv. 14–33), RESPECTING THOSE GRELTED (xvi. 1–16), AND GREETING (xvi. 16–28);—AND CONCLUDING DOXOLOGY (xvi. 24–27).

14–33.] He first (14–16) excuses the boldness of his writing, by the allegation of his office as Apostle of the Gentiles.

14.] even I myself (i. e., ‘notwithstanding what I have written:’ see ch. vii. 25, note. It may mean, ‘without information from others,’ ‘I, on my own account’). ye also yourselves, i.e. without exhortation of mine.

15.] The words in some measure restrict the character of “more boldness” to certain parts of the Epistle, e.g. ch. xi. 17 ff. 25; chaps. xiii. and xiv. because of the grace,&c., i.e. ‘my apostolic office was the ground and reason of my boldness.’

16.] ministering as a priest in the gospel of God (the Apostle is using a figure in which he compares himself to a priest, and the Gentiles to the sacrifice which he was offering: see below), that the offering up of the Gentiles (genitive of apposition: the Gentiles themselves are the offering; so Theophylact, “This is my priesthood, to preach the Gospel. My knife is the word, ye are the sacrifice”) may be acceptable, sanctified by the Holy Ghost.—The language is evidently figurative, and can by no possibility be taken as a sanction for any view of the Christian minister as a sacrificing priest, otherwise than according to that figure—viz. that he offers to God the acceptable sacrifice of those who by his means believe on Christ.

17–22.] The Apostle boasts of the extent and result of his apostolic mission among the Gentiles, and that in places where none had preached before him—I have then (consequent on the grace and ministry just mentioned) my boasting (i. e. ‘I venture to boast:’ not ‘I have whereof I may glory,’ as A.V.) in Christ Jesus (there is no stress on this—it merely qualifies the boasting as no vain glorying, but grounded in, consistent with, springing from, his relation and subserviency to Christ) in (concerning) the things which pertain to God (my above-named sacerdotal office and ministry)

18.] In our English text, this verse has been put into the affirmative form, in which alone it can be made to convey a clear sense to the English reader: see below. The connexion is: ‘I have real ground for glorying’ (in a legitimate and Christian manner; and the literal rendering of the original which follows is nearly as in A.V.). For I will not (as some false apostles do, see 2 Cor. x. 12–18) allow myself to speak of those things which Christ has nor done by me (but by some other), in order to the obedience (subjection to the Gospel) of the Gentiles (then, as if the sentence were in the affirmative form, ‘I will only boast of what Christ has veritably done by me towards the obedience of the Gentiles,’ he proceeds), by word and deed, in the power of signs and wonders, in the power of the [Holy] Spirit.—The signs and wonders are not spiritual, but external miraculous acts,—see 2 Cor. xii. 12. 19.] So that (result of this working of Christ by him) from Jerusalem (the eastern boundary of his preaching) and round about (Jerusalem: round about is not to be joined with as far as Illyricum, but refers to Jerusalem, meaning perhaps its immediate neighbourhood, perhaps Arabia (?), Gal. i. 17,—but hardly Damascus and Cilicia, seeing that they would come into the route afterwards specified, from Jerusalem to Illyricum), as far as Illyricum (Illyricum bordered on Macedonia to the South. It is possible that St. Paul may literally have advanced to its frontiers during his preaching in Macedonia; but I think it more probable, that he uses it broadly as the ‘terminus of his journeys,’ the next province to that in which he had preached), I have fully preached (literally, fulfilled) the Gospel of Christ;

20.] yet limits the foregoing assertion) on this wise ‘after the following rule) making it my ambition to preach the gospel, not where Christ was (previously) named, that I might not build upon another man’s foundation: but according as it is written (i. e. according to the following rule of Scripture: I determined to act in the spirit of these words, forming part of a general prophecy of the dispersion of that Gospel which I was preaching).&c.—The citation is from the Septuagint. Our A.V. renders: “That: which had not been told them, shall they see: and that which they had not heard, shall they consider.”

22.] For which cause,—not, because a foundation had been already laid at Rome by another: this would refer to merely a secondary part of the foregoing assertion: the expression refers to the primary, viz. his having been so earnestly engaged in preaching elsewhere. these many times: not, ‘for the most part,’—or, ‘the greater number of times,’ which would suggest the idea that there had been other occasions on which this hindrance had not been operative.

23.] I have no more place, or occasion (viz. of apostolic work).—On the construction of this sentence, see note in my Greek Test.).—Respecting the question whether this journey into Spain was ever taken, the views of Commentators have differed, according to their conclusion respecting the liberation of the Apostle from his imprisonment at Rome. I have discussed this in the Introduction to the Pastoral Epistles,§ii.

24.] some-what is an affectionate limitation of the expression I be filled, implying that he would wish to remain much longer than he anticipated being able to do,—and also, as Chrysostom says, “because no length of time can fill me, nor cause in me satiety of your company.”

25.] See Acts xix. 21; xxiv. 17; 2 Cor. viii. 19. ministering, not to minister, because he treats the whole action as already begun.

26.] See 2 Cor. ix. 1 ff. the poor among the saints which are at Jerusalem] Olshausen remarks, that this shews the community of goods in the church at Jerusalem not to have lasted long: compare. Gal. ii. 10.

27.] The fact is re-stated, with a view to an inference from it, viz. that their good pleasure was not merely a matter of benevolence, but of repayment: the Gentiles being debtors to the Jews for spiritual blessings. This general principle is very similarly enounced in 1 Cor. ix. 11. It is suggested by’ Grotius and others, that by this St. Paul wished to hint to the Romans the duty of a similar contribution.

28.] fruit, probably said generally,—fruit of the faith and love of the Gentiles. secured] literally, sealed: “as if he were laying it up into royal treasures, in an inviolable and safe place.” Chrysostom. by you (i. e. through your city).

29.] The fulness of the blessing of Christ imports that richness of apostolic grace which he was persuaded he should impart to them. So he calls his presence in the churches a “benefit,”— literally, a grace or favour, 2 Cor. i. 15. See also ch. i. ll. 30–32.] the love of the Spirit, the love shed abroad in the heart by the Holy Ghost;—a love which teaches us to look not only on our own things, but on the things of others.

31.] Compare Acts xx. 22; xxi. 10–14. The exceeding hatred in which the Apostle was held by the Jews, and their want of fellow-feeling with the Gentile churches, made him fear lest even the ministration with which he was charged might not prove acceptable to them.

32.] and may with you find rest ‘that we may mutually refresh ourselves, I after my dangers and: deliverance, you after your anxieties for me.’

CHAP. XVI. 1–16.] RECOMMENDATION OF PHEBE: GREETINGS.

1, 2.] In all probability Phebe was the bearer of the Epistle, as stated in the subscription. deaconess] See 1 Tim. iii. 11, note. Pliny in his celebrated letter to Trajan says, “I thought it requisite to enquire the truth even by torture, from two handmaids who were called ministrae (deaconesses).” The deaconesses must not be confounded with the widows of 1 Tim. v. 3–16, as has sometimes been done.—CENCHREE, the port of Corinth, on the Saronic gulf of the Ægean, for commerce with the east (Acts xviii. 18), nine of our miles from Corinth. The Apostolical Constitutions make the first bishop of the Cenchrean church to have been Lucius, consecrated by St. Paul himself.

2.] in the Lord, i.e. in a Christian manner,—as mindful of your common Lord: as becometh saints, i.e. “as saints ought to do,”—refers their conduct to her;—not, ‘as saints ought to be received.’ assist her] Her business at Rome may have been such as to require the help of those resident there. a succourer of many] This may refer to a part of the deaconess’s office, the attending on the poor and sick of her own sex. of myself also] when and where, we know not. It is not improbable that she may have been, like Lydia, one whose heart the Lord opened at the first preaching of Paul, and whose house was his lodging.

3, 4.] The form Prisca is also found 2 Tim. iv. 19. On Prisca and Aquila see note, Acts xviii. 2. They must have returned to Rome from Ephesus since the sending of the first Epistle to the Corinthians:—see 1 Cor. xvi. 19: and we find them again at Ephesus (?), 2 Tim. iv. 19.—Their endangering of their lives for Paul may have taken place at Corinth (Acts xviii. 6 ff.) or at Ephesus (Acts xix). See Neander, Pfl. u. Leit., p. 441.—The ‘churches of the Gentiles’ had reason to be thankful to them, for having rescued the Apostle of the Gentiles from danger.—It seems to have been the practice of Aquila and (1 Cor. xvi. 19) and some other (Col. iv. 15, Philem. 2) to hold assemblies for worship in their houses, which were saluted, and sent salutations as one body in the Lord. Some light is thrown on the expression by the following passage from the Acts of the Martyrdom of Justin: “The answer of Justin Martyr to the question of the prefect (Rusticus) ‘Where do you assemble?’ exactly corresponds to the genuine Christian spirit on this point. The answer was, ‘Where each one can and will. You believe; no doubt, that we all meet together in one place; but it is not so, for the God of the Christians is not shut up in a room, but, being invisible, He fills both heaven and earth, and is honoured every where by the faithful’ Justin adds, that when he came to Rome, he was accustomed to dwell in one particular spot, and that those Christians who were instructed by him, and wished to hear his discourse, assembled at his house. (This assembly would accordingly be ‘The Church in the house of Justin’) He had not visited any other congregations of the Church.”

5.] Epænëtus is not elsewhere named. the firstfruits, the same metaphor being in the Apostle’s mind as in ch. xv. 16,—the first believer. Asia, not Achaia, is read by all our most ancient MSS.

6.] None of the names occurring from ver. 5–15 are mentioned elsewhere (except possibly Rufus: see below).

7.] The person to be saluted may be Junia, feminine, in which case she is probably the wife of Andronicus,—or Junias, masculine. It is uncertain also whether the word Kinsmen means fellow-countrymen, or relations. Aquila and Priscilla were Jews: so would Mary be, and probably Epænëtus, being an early believer. If so, the word may have its strict meaning of ‘relations.’ But it seems to occur in verses 11, 21 in a wider sense. fellow prisoners] When and where uncertain. of note among the apostles] Two explanations are given, (1) that they themselves are counted among the Apostles: thus Chrysostom: “To be Apostles at all is a great thing; but to be also of note among them, mark what an encomium it is:” (2) ‘noted among the Apostles, i.e. well known and spoken of by the Apostles. Thus many Commentators.—But, as Tholuck remarks, had this latter been the meaning, we should have expected some expression like in all the Churches (2 Cor. viii. 18). I may besides remark, that for St. Paul to speak of any persons as celebrated among the Apostles in sense (2), would imply that he had more frequent, intercourse with the other Apostles, than we know that he had; and would besides be improbable on any supposition. The whole question seems to have sprung up in modern times from the idea that the Apostles must mean the Twelve only. If the wider sense found in Acts xiv. 4, 14; 2 Cor. viii. 23; 1 Thess. ii. 6 (compare i. 1), be taken, there need be no doubt concerning the meaning, which also] refers to Andronicus and Junia, not to the Apostles.

8 ff.] beloved in the Lord, i.e. beloved in the bonds of Christian fellowship. fellow labourer in (the work of) Christ.—Origen and others have confounded Apelles with the well-known Apollos, but apparently without reason.

10.] approved (by trial) in (the work of) Christ.—It does not follow that either Aristobulus or Narcissus were themselves Christians. Only those of their families are here saluted who were in the Lord: for we must understand this also in the case of Aristobulus' household: see above. Grotius, Neander, and others, have taken Narcissus for the well-known freedman of Claudius. But this can hardly be, for he was executed in the very beginning of Nero's reign, i.e. about 55 A.D., whereas (see Introduction, §iv. 4, and Chronol. Table) this Epistle cannot have well been written before 58 A.D. Perhaps the family of this Narcissus may have continued to be thus known after his death.

13.] Rufus may have been the son of Simon of Cyrene, mentioned Mark xv, 21: but the name was very common, the elect,—not to be softened to merely excellent, a sense unknown to our Apostle;—elect, i.e. one of the elect of the Lord. and mine the Apostle adds from affectionate regard towards the mother of Rufus: ‘my mother,’ in my reverence and affection for her. Jowett compares our Lord's words to St. John, John xix. 27.

14.] These Christians of whom we have only the names, seem to be persons of less repute than the former. Hermasis thought by Origen to be the author of the book called “The Shepherd of Hermas.” But this latter is generally supposed to have been the brother of Pius, bishop of Rome, about 150 A.D. The brethren which are with them, of ver. 14, and all the saints which are with them, of ver. 15, have been taken to point to some separate associations of Christians, perhaps assemblies as in ver. 5: or unions for missionary purposes.

16.] The meaning of this injunction seems to be, that the Roman Christians should take occasion, on the receipt of the Apostle's greetings to them, to testify their mutual love, in this, the ordinary method of salutation, but having among Christians a Christian and holy meaning, see reff. It became soon a custom in the churches at the celebration of the Lord's Supper. All the churches of Christ salute you] This assurance is stated evidently on the Apostle's authority, speaking for the churches; not implying those only whom he himself had visited, ch. 26; but vouching for the brotherly regard in which the Roman church was held by all churches of Christ. The above misunderstanding has led to the exclusion of the word all, which is read in all our oldest MSS.

17–20.] WARNING AGAINST THOSE WHO MADE DIVISIONS AMONG THEM.—To what persons the Apostle refers, is not plain. Some think the Judaizers to be meant, not absolutely within the Christian pale, but endeavouring to sow dissension in it. Others think that St. Paul merely gives this warning in case such persons came to Rome. Judging by the text itself, we infer that these teachers were similar to those pointed out in Phil. iii. 2, 18; 1 Tim. vi. 3 ff.; 2 Cor. xi. 13, 20: unprincipled and selfish persons, seducing others for their own gain: whether Judaizers or not, does not appear: but considering that the great opponents of the Apostle were of this party, we may perhaps infer that they also belonged to it.

17.] The doctrine here spoken of is probably rather ethical than doctrinal; compare Eph. iv. 20–24.

19.] See ch. i. 8. Their obedience being matter of universal notoriety, is the ground of his confidence that they will comply with his entreaty, ver 17,—Some slight reproof is conveyed in I rejoice... yet... They were well known for obedience, but had not been perhaps cautious enough with regard to these designing persons and their pretended wisdom. See Matt. x. 16, of which words of our Lord there seems to be here a reminiscence.

20.] “Seeing that he had mentioned those who caused divisions and offences, he says the God of peace that he might encourage them to expect liberation from these persons.” Chrysostom: and so most Commentators. De Wette prefers taking the God of peace more generally, as ‘the God of salvation,’ and the usage of the expression (see references) seems to favour this. shall bruise Satan is a similitude from Gen. iii. 15. It does not express any wish, but a prophetic assurance, and encouragement in bearing up against all adversaries, that it would not be long before the great Adversary himself would be bruised under their feet. The grace, &c.] It appears as if the Epistle was intended to conclude with this usual benediction, but the Apostle found occasion to add more. This he does also in other Epistles: see 1 Cor. xvi. 23, 24; similarly Phil. iv. 20, and vv. 21–23 after the doxology,—2 Thess. iii. 16, 17, 18:—1 Tim. vi. 16, 17 ff.:—2 Tim. iv. 18, 19 ff.

21–24.] GREETINGS FROM VARIOUS PERSONS.

21.] Lucius must not be mistaken for Lucas (or Lucanus),—but was probably Lucius of Cyrene, Acts xiii. 1, see note there—Jason may be the same who is mentioned Acts xvii. 5, as the host of Paul and Silas at Thessalonica.—A ‘Sopater (son) of Pyrrhus of Berea’ occurs Acts xx. 4, but it is quite uncertain whether this Sosipater is the same person. my Kinsmen, see above, ver. 7. These persons may have been Jews; but we cannot tell whether the expression may not be used in a wider sense.

22.] There is nothing strange (as Olshausen supposes) in this salutation being inserted in the first person. It would be natural enough that Tertius the amanuensis, inserting the words, should change the form into the first person, and afterwards proceed from the dictation of the Apostle as before. Some suppose him to have done this on transcribing the Epistle.—Tholuck notices this irregularity as a corroboration of the genuineness of the chapter. On the supposed identity of Tertius with Silas, see note on Acts xv. 22.

23.] Gaius is mentioned 1 Cor. i. 14, as having been baptized by St. Paul. The host of the whole Church probably implies that the assemblies of the church were held in his house:—or perhaps, that his hospitality to Christians was universal.—Erastus, holding this office, can hardly have been the same who was with the Apostle in Ephesus, Acts xix. 22. It is more probable that the Erastus of 2 Tim. iv. 20 is identical with this than with that other. our brother] See 1 Cor. i. 1: one among the brethren. The rest have been specified by their services or offices.

24.] The benediction repeated; see above on ver 20.

25–27.] CONCLUDING DOXOLOGY. The genuineness of this doxology and its position in the Epistle have been much questioned. From the external evidence, which may be seen in the various readings in my Greek Test., it is plain that its genuineness as a part of the Epistle is placed beyond all reasonable doubt. This unusual character of the position and diction of this doxology has been used as an internal argument against the genuineness of the portion. St. Paul never elsewhere ends with such a doxology. His doxologies, when he does use such, are simple, and perspicuous in construction, whereas this is involved, and rhetorical. This objection however is completely answered by the supposition that the doxology was the effusion of the fervent mind of the Apostle, on taking a general survey of the Epistle. We find in its diction striking similarities to that of the pastoral Epistles: a phenomenon occurring in several places where St. Paul writes in a fervid and impassioned manner,—also where he writes with his own hand. ‘That the doxology is made up of unusual expressions taken from Paul’s other writings, that it is difficult and involved, are facts, which if rightly argued from, would substantiate, not its interpolation, but its genuineness: seeing that an interpolator would have taken care to conform it to the character of the Epistle in which it stands, and to have left in it no irregularity which would bring it into question. The construction is exceedingly difficult: but the reader must be referred to the notes on the Greek Test. in order to appreciate its difficulty. In an English version we are obliged to adopt one hypothesis or other as to the construction, and thus translate more plainly than the literal rendering would warrant

25.] according to, i.e. in reference to, ‘in sub-ordination to,’ and according to the requirements of. the preaching of Jesus Christ can hardly mean, ‘the preaching which Jesus Christ hath accomplished by me’ (ch. xv. 18)—but the preaching of Christ, i.e. making known of Christ, as the verb is used 1 Cor. i. 23; xv. 12, and in many other places. according to the revelation] This second according to is best taken, not as co-ordinate to the former one, and following the verb “to “establish you,” nor as belonging to “him that is able,” which would be an unusual limitation of the divine Power,—but as subordinate to what has gone immediately before,—the preaching of Jesus Christ according to, &c. the mystery] The mystery (sec ch. xi. 25, note) of the Gospel is often said to have been thus hidden From eternity in the counsels of God—see Eph. iii. 9; Col. i. 26; 2 Tim. i. 9; Tit. i. 2; 1 Pet. i. 20; Rev. xiii. 8.

26.] See ch. i. 2. The prophetic writings were the storehouse out of which the preachers of the gospel took their demonstrations that Jesus was the Christ see Acts xviii. 28; more especially, it is true, to the Jews, who however are here included among all the nations. according to the commandment] may refer either to the prophetic writings being drawn up by the command of God,—or to the manifestation of the mystery by the preachers of the gospel thus taking place. The latter seems best to suit the sense. eternal refers back to eternal ages before. The word is the same in the original, and should have been kept scrupulously the same in the English, not, as here and in Matt. xxii. 46, rendered by two different English terms.

27.] The words through Jesus Christ must, by the requirements of the construction, be applied to the only wise God, and not (as in the A.V.) to glory. It must be rendered to the only wise God through Jesus Christ, i. e. Him who is revealed to us by Christ as such.—The to whom cannot without great harshness be referred to Christ, seeing that the words to the only wise God resume the chief subject of the sentence, and to them the relative pronoun must apply.

THE FIRST LETTER OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS

1 Corinthians: Chapter 1

CHAP. I. 1–3.] ADDRESS AND GREETING.

1.] The words through the will of God point probably to the depreciation of Paul's apostolic authority at Corinth. In Gal. i. 1 we have this much more strongly asserted. But they have a reference to Paul himself also: "as they point in their aspect of authority, towards the churches, so, in their aspect of a humble and earnest mind, they come from Paul himself," says Bengel. Chrysostom, referring the words to called, says, "Because it was His will we were called, not because we were worthy." Sosthenes can hardly be assumed to be identical with the ruler of the synagogue in Acts xviii. 17: see note there. He must have been some Christian well known to the church at Corinth. Thus Paul associates with himself Silvanus and Timotheus in the Epistles to the Thessalonians: and Timotheus in 2 Cor. Chrysostom attributes it to modesty, that he associates with himself one by far his inferior. Some have supposed Sosthenes to be the writer (i. e. the amanuensis) of the Epistle, see Rom. xvi. 22. Possibly he may have been one of the household of Chloe (ver. 11) through whom the intelligence had been received, and the Apostle may have associated him with himself as approving the appeal to apostolic authority. Perhaps some slight may have been put upon him by the parties at Corinth, and for that reason St. Paul puts him forward. our brother as 2 Cor. i. 1, of Timothy.

2.] On the words the church of God which is at Corinth, Calvin remarks; "It may perhaps seem strange that he should call by the name of the Church of God that assembly of men among whom so many corruptions were rife, that Satan seemed to reign there rather than God. And it is certain that he had no design of flattering the Corinthians; for he speaks by the Spirit of God, who does not use flattery. Yet, among so many defilements, what kind of an appearance of a Church can any longer be found? I answer, that, however many vices had crept in, however many corruptions of doctrine and of morals, there were yet some signs of a true Church. This passage is carefully to be noted, to keep us from requiring in this world a Church without any spot or wrinkle; or refusing this title to any assembly in which all is not according to our wish. For this is a dangerous temptation, to think that there is no Church, unless where there appears perfect purity. For whoever persuades himself of this, will at length find it necessary to separate off from all other men, and give himself out for the only holy man in the world, or else to found a peculiar sect with a few hypocrites for his followers. If we ask what cause had St. Paul to recognize the Church at Corinth? the answer is, because he saw among them the doctrine of the Gospel, Baptism, the Supper of the Lord; symbols by which the Church ought to be discerned." On the words of God, Chrysostom remarks, "not of this man and of that man, but of God," taking the expression as addressed to the Corinthians to remind them of their position as a congregation belonging to GOD, and not to any head of a party. Perhaps this is too refined, the words "the Church of God" being so usual with St. Paul, —see references.

sanctified in Christ Jesus] (i. e. hallowed, dedicated) to God in (in union with and by means of) Jesus Christ. See Rom. i. 7, note.

called [to be] saints, with all, &c.] These words do not belong to the designations just preceding, 'as are all, &c.', but form part of the address of the Epistle, so that these all are partakers with the Corinthians in it. They form a weighty and precious addition,—made here doubtless to shew the Corinthians, that membership of God's Holy Catholic Church consisted not in being planted, or presided over by Paul, Apollos, or Cephas (or their successors), but in calling on the name of our Lord Jesus Christ. The Church of England has adopted from this verse her solemn explanation of the term, in the 'Prayer for all sorts and conditions of men:' "More especially, we pray for the good estate of the Catholic Church: that it may be so guided and governed by thy good Spirit, that all who profess and call themselves Christians may be led into the way of truth, and hold the faith in unity of spirit, in the bond of peace, and in righteousness of life." The phrase "to call upon the name of the Lord," was one adopted from the Old Test.: see Joel ii. 32; the adjunct our Lord Jesus Christ, defines that Lord (Jehovah) on whom the Christians called, to be Jesus Christ,—and is a direct testimony to the divine worship of Jesus Christ, as universal in the Church. in every place, both their's (in their country, wherever that may be) and our's. This connexion is far better than to join both their's and our's with Lord, thereby making the first our superfluous. their's, refers to the all that call, &c., our's to Paul, and Sosthenes, and those whom he is addressing. 3.] See Rom. i. 7, note. Olshausen remarks, that peace has peculiar weight here on account of the dissensions in the Corinthian Church.

4-9.] THANKSGIVING, AND EXPRESSION OF HOPE ON ACCOUNT OF THE SPIRITUAL STATE OF THE CORINTHIAN CHURCH. There was much in the Corinthian believers for which to be thankful, and on account of which to hope. These things he puts in the foreground, not only to encourage them, but to appeal to their better selves, and to bring out the following contrast more plainly.

4. my God] so Rom. i. 8; Phil. i. 3.

always] expanded in Phil. i. 4 into “always in every prayer of mine.” in Christ Jesus] This in must not, as in A.V., be rendered “by;” the grace had been given to them in Christ, as members of Christ. So also below.

5. in every thing] general: particularized by in all teaching, and all knowledge. The former represents the truth preached; the latter, the truth apprehended. They were rich in the preaching of the word, had among them able preachers: and rich in the apprehension of the word, were themselves intelligent hearers. See 2 Cor. viii. 7, where to these are added faith, zeal, and love.

6. the testimony of Christ] the witness concerning Christ delivered by me. was firmly established,—took deep root among you; i.e. ‘as was to have been expected, from the impression made among you by my preaching of Christ.’ This confirmation was internal, by faith and permanence in the truth, not external, by miracles.

7.] so that ye come not behind (others) in any gift [of grace];—gift [of grace] here has its widest sense, of that which is the effect of grace,—not meaning ‘spiritual gifts,’ in the narrower sense, as in ch. xii. 4. This is plain from the whole strain of the passage, which dwells not on outward gifts, but on the inward graces of the Christian life.

waiting for the revealing of our Lord Jesus Christ] which is the greatest proof of maturity and richness of the spiritual life; implying the co-existence and co-operation of faith, whereby they believed the promise of Christ,—hope, whereby they looked on to its fulfillment,—and love, whereby that anticipation was lit up with earnest desire; compare the words, “to all them that love His appearing,” 2 Tim. iv. 8.

8. who] viz. God, ver. 4, not Jesus Christ, in which case we should have “in the day of His appearing,” or, “in His day.” The also besides shews this.

until the end, i.e. to the end of the world, not merely ‘to the end of your lives.’

9.] See Phil. i. 6; 1 Thess. v. 24. The fellowship of His Son, as Meyer well remarks, is the glory of the sons of God, Rom. viii. 21: for they will be joint-heirs with Christ, glorified together,—see Rom viii. 17, 23; 2 Thess. ii. 14. The mention of fellowship may perhaps have been intended to prepare the way, as was before done in ver. 2, for the reproof which is coming.—Chrysostom remarks respecting verses 1–9, “See how he is always riveting them close with the name of Christ. He makes mention, not of any apostle or teacher, but evermore of Him who is their desire, as if he were endeavoring to bring back men after a debauch to their sound state. For nowhere in any other epistle is the name of Christ so often repeated. Here in a few verses it occurs many times, and is in fact the connecting link of almost all the introductory part of the Epistle.”

10—IV. 21.] Reproof OF THE PARTY-DIVISIONS AMONG THEM: BY OCCASION OF WHICH, THE APOSTLE EXPLAINS AND DEFENDS HIS OWN METHOD OF PREACH-ING ONLY CHRIST TO THEM.

10.] by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ (as “by the mercies of God,” Rom. xii. 1): “as the bond of union, and as the most holy name by which they could be adjured.” Stanley.

that ye all speak the same thing is a contrast to what follows, “I am of Paul, I of Apollos, I of Cephas, I of Christ,” ver. 12,—but further implies the having the same sentiments on the subjects which divided them: see Phil. ii. 2.

11.] We cannot fill up them [which are of the house] of Chloe (simply them of Chloe in the original), not knowing whether they were sons or servants, or other members of her family. Nor can we say whether Chloe was an inhabitant of Corinth, or some Christian woman known to the Corinthians elsewhere, or an Ephesian, having friends who had been in Corinth.

12.] Respecting the matter of fact to which the verse alludes, I have given references in the Introduction,§ii. 10, to the principal theories of the German critics, and will only here re-state the conclusions which I have there endeavored to substantiate: (1) that these designations are not used as pointing to actual parties formed and subsisting among the Corinthians, but (2) as representing the SPIRIT WITH WHICH THEY CONTENTED against one another, being the sayings of individuals, and not of parties: as if it were said, ‘You are all in the habit of alleging against one another, some your special attachment to Paul, some to Apollos, some to Cephas, others to no mere human teacher, but barely to Christ, to the exclusion of us his Apostles.’ (3) That these sayings, while they are not to be made the basis of any hypothesis respecting definite parties at Corinth, do nevertheless hint at matters of fact, and are not merely by way of example: and (4) that this view of the verse, which was taken by Chrysostom, Theodoret, Theophylact, and Calvin, is borne out, and indeed necessitated, by ch. iv. 6 (see there).

I am of Paul] This profession, of being guided especially by the words and acts of Paul, would probably belong to those who were the first fruits of, or directly converted under, his ministry. Such persons would contend for his apostolic authority, and maintain doctrinally his teaching, so far being right; but, as usual with partisans, would magnify into importance practices and sayings of his which were in themselves indifferent, and forget that theirs was a service of perfect freedom under one Master, even Christ. With these he does not deal doctrinally in the Epistle, as there was no need for it: but involves them in the same censure as the rest, and shews them in ch. ii., iii., iv. that he had no such purpose of gaining personal honor among them, but only of building them up in Christ.

I of Apollos] Apollos (Acts xviii. 24, ff.) had come to Corinth after the departure of Paul, and being eloquent, might attract some, to whom the bodily presence of Paul seemed weak and his speech contemptible. It would certainly appear that some occasion had been taken by this difference, to set too high a value on external and rhetorical form of putting forth the gospel of Christ. This the Apostle seems to be blaming (in part) in the conclusion of this, and the next chapter. And from ch. xvi. 12, it would seem likely that Apollos himself had been aware of the abuse of his manner of teaching which had taken place, and was unwilling, by repeating his visit just then, to sanction or increase it.

I of Cephas] All we can say in possible explanation of this is, that as Peter was the Apostle of the circumcision,—as we know from Gal. ii. 11 ff. that his course of action on one occasion was reprobated by Paul, and as that course of action no doubt had influence and found followers, it is very conceivable that some of those who in Corinth lightly esteemed Paul, might take advantage of this honored name, and cite against the Christian liberty taught by their own spiritual founder, the stricter practice of Peter. If so, these persons would be mainly found among the Jewish converts or Judaizers; and the matters treated in ch. vii.—ix. may have been subjects of doubt mainly with these persons.

and I of Christ] A rendering has been proposed which need only be mentioned to be rejected: viz, that St. Paul having mentioned the three parties, then breaks off, and adds, speaking in his own person, “and I (I Paul) am of Christ,” not of any of these preceding. The words seems to apply to those who make a merit of not being attached to any human teacher,—who therefore slighted the apostleship of Paul. To them frequent allusion seems to be made in this and in the second Epistle, and more especially in 2 Cor. x. 7–11. For a more detailed discussion of the whole subject, see the Introduction, as referred to above.

13.] Is Christ (the Person of Christ, as the centre and bond of Christian unity,—not, the gospel of Christ, nor the Church of Christ, nor the power of Christ, i. e His right over all) divided (‘into various parts,’ one under one leader, another under another,—which in fact amounts to His being divided against Himself)? The question applies to all/addressed, not to the last. In that case the words would mean ‘Has Christ become the property of one part only? which they cannot do.

was Paul crucified for you?] literally, Surely Paul was not crucified for you? By repudiating all possibility of himself being the Head and name-giver of their church, he does so even more strongly for Cephas and Apollos: for he founded the church at Corinth. On the expression, baptized into the name of, see Matt. xxviii. 19.

14.] It may seem surprising that St. Paul should not have referred to the import of baptism itself as a reason to substantiate his argument. He does not this, but tacitly assumes, between ver. 13 and 14, the probability that his having baptized any considerable number among the Corinthians would naturally have led to the abuse against which he is arguing.

I thank God, &c.] ‘I am (now) thankful to God, who so ordered it that I did not,’ &c. Crispus, the former ruler of the synagogue, Acts xviii. 8. Gaius, afterwards the host of the Apostle, and of the church, Rom. xvi. 23.

15.] lest represents the purpose, not of the Apostle’s conduct at the time, but of the divine ordering of things: ‘God so arranged it, that none might say,’ &c.

16.] He subsequently recollects having baptized Stephanas and his family (see ch. xvi. 15, 17),—perhaps from information derived from Stephanas himself, who was with him:—and he leaves an opening for any others whom he may possibly have baptized and have forgotten it. The last clause is important as against those who maintain the absolute omniscience of the inspired writers on every topic which they handle.

17.] This verse forms the transition to the description of his preaching among them. His mission was not to baptize:—a trace already, of the separation of the offices of baptizing and preaching.

Chrysostom says: “To baptize a man under instruction, and already believing, is in the power of any one whatever: for the free will of the candidate does all, and the grace of God: but when the instruction of unbelievers is to be carried on, much toil is needed, and much skill: and in those days personal danger was besides incurred.” It is evident that this is said in no derogation of Baptism, for he did on occasion baptize,—and it would be impossible that he should speak lightly of the ordinance to which he appeals (Rom. vi. 3) as the seal of our union with Christ.

not in wisdom of speech] It seems evident from this apology, and other hints in the two Epistles, e.g. 2 Cor. x. 10, that the plainness and simplicity of Paul's speech had been one cause among the Corinthians of alienation from him. Perhaps, as hinted above, the eloquence of Apollos was extolled to St. Paul's disadvantage.

in (as the element in which: better than ‘with’) wisdom of speech (i. e. the speculations of philosophy: that these are meant, and not mere eloquence or rhetorical form, appears by what follows, which treats of the subject, and not merely of the manner of the preaching), lest the Cross of Christ (the great central point of his preaching; exhibiting man’s guilt and God’s love in their highest degrees and closest connexion) should be made of none effect.

This would come to pass rather by philosophical speculations than by eloquence.

18.] For (explanation of the foregoing clause,—and that, assuming the mutual exclusiveness of the preaching of the Cross and wisdom of speech, and the identity of “they that are perishing” with the lovers of wisdom of speech, as if it were said, ‘wisdom of speech would nullify the Cross of Christ: for the doctrine of the Cross is to the lovers of that wisdom, folly. The reasoning is elliptical and involved) the preaching (literally, speech or doctrine). “There is a word, an eloquence, which is most powerful, the eloquence of the Cross: referring to the term wisdom of speech. Stanley) of the cross is to them that are perishing (those who are through unbelief on the way to everlasting perdition), foolishness; but to us who are being saved (those who are being saved are those in the way of salvation:—who by faith have laid hold on Christ, and are by Him in the course of being saved) it is the power (see Rom. i. 16, and note: i.e. the perfection of God’s Power—the Power itself, in its noblest manifestation) of God.

19.] For (continuation of reason for not preaching in wisdom of speech: because it was prophesied that such wisdom should be brought to nought by God) it is written, &c.

The citation is after the Septuagint, with the exception of “I will destroy,” for “I will hide.” The Hebrew is ‘the wisdom of the wise shall perish, and the prudence of the prudent shall disappear.’ But as Calvin truly says, “the wisdom perishes because the Lord destroys it; the prudence disappears because it is blotted out and annihilated by God.”

20.] The question implies disappearance and exclusion.

the wise, generally: the scribe, the Jewish interpreter of the law; the disputer, the Greek arguer.

made foolish] “Shewn to be foolish in comparison with the embracing of the doctrine of the Cross.” Chrysostom. 21.] For (explanation of “hath made foolish”) when (not temporal, but equivalent to ‘seeing that’) in the wisdom of God (as part of the wise arrangement of God. Some render it, ‘by the revelation of the wisdom of God,’ which was made to the Gentiles, as Rom. i., by creation, and to the Jews by the law:—Chrysostom takes it for the wisdom manifest in His works only. But I very much doubt the legitimacy of this use of wisdom, as equivalent to those things by which the wisdom is manifested) the world (Jew and Gentile, see next verse) through its wisdom (as a means of attaining knowledge: or, but I prefer the other, “through the wisdom [of God] which I have just mentioned:” so Stanley) knew not (could not find out) God, God was pleased by the foolishness of preaching (literally, ‘of the proclamation;’ by that preaching which is reputed folly by the world) to save them that believe.—Rom. i. 16 throws light on this last expression as connected with ‘the power of God.’ in our ver. 18, and with what follows here. There the two are joined: “for it (the Gospel of Christ) is the power of God to every one that believeth.”

22. ask for signs] see Matt. xii. 38, xvi. 1; Luke xi. 16; John ii. 18, vi. 30. The sign required was not, as I have observed on Matt. xii. 38, a mere miracle, but some token from Heaven, substantiating the word preached.

23.] Still the expansion of the words, “the foolishness of preaching.” Now, a stumbling block as regards the Jews, and foolishness as regards the Gentiles, correspond to the general term foolishness before.

24.] This verse plainly is a continuation of the opposition to ver. 22 before begun, but itself springs by way of opposition out of the words “a stumbling block to Jews, and foolishness to Greeks,”—and carries the thought back to verses 18 and 21.

power, as fulfilling the requirement of the seekers after a sign:—wisdom,—of those who sought wisdom.—The repetition of Christ gives solemnity, at the same time that it concentrates the power and wisdom in the Person of Christ; as if it had been said, ‘Christ, even in His humiliation unto death, the power of God and wisdom of God.’

25.] Because (reason why Christ [crucified] is the power and wisdom of God) the foolishness of God (that act of God which men think foolish) is wiser than men (surpasses in wisdom, not only all which they call by that name, but men, all possible wisdom of mankind); and the weakness of God (that act of God which men think weak) is stronger than men (not only surpasses in might all which they think powerful, but men themselves,—all human might whatsoever. The latter clause introduces a fresh thought, the way for which however has been prepared by the mention of power in verses 18, 24. The Jews required a proof of divine Might: we give them Christ crucified, which is to them a thing weak: but this weak thing of God is stronger than men).

26.] See a similar reminder on the part of the Apostle, 1 Thess. i. 4. For seems best to apply to what has immediately gone before. As a proof that the foolishness of God is wiser than men, and the weakness of God stronger than men, he calls attention to the fact that the Christian church, so full of divine wisdom and strength by the indwelling Spirit of God, consisted for the most part, not of the wise or mighty among men, but of those whom the world despised.

your calling—the vocation and standing of Christian men.

how that not many [of you] are wise according to the flesh (“he means, in that wisdom which may be acquired by human diligence without the teaching of the Holy Spirit.” Estius), not many mighty, not many noble. ‘This is far better than to supply (as A.V., and most Commentators) were, or, are called after noble. Olshansen observes: “The ancient Christians were for the most part slaves and men of low station; the whole history of the expansion of the church is in reality a progressive victory of the ignorant over the learned, the lowly over the lofty, until the emperor himself laid down his crown before the cross of Christ.”

27, 28.] the foolish things (nenter for more generalization, but in fact equivalent to the foolish men. This is shewn by the wise men following, in that case it being necessary to use the masculine, as “wise things” could not well be said) of (belonging to) the world: not in the eyes of the world, which would not fit the sense: for they were not only seemingly but really foolish, when God chose them.

put to shame, by shewing to the wise and the strong, the foolish and the weak entering the kingdom of heaven before them.

the base things, matter of fact—the low-born: the things which are despised, matter of estimation. Omitting the “and” (see the A.V.), which is certainly the true reading, the things which are not may belong to all four, the foolish, the weak, the base, and the despised,—but more probably it has reference only to the last two. The expression are not, means, as good as have no existence. Olshausen refines on the expression too much, when he explains it of those who have lost their old carnal life, and have not yet acquired their new spiritual one: it more probably means, things (persons) of absolutely no account in the world, unassignable among men, which the base and despised are—Meyer remarks, that the threefold repetition of God chose, with the three “contrasts to wise, mighty, and noble”, announces the fact with a triumphant emphasis.

bring to nought] reduce to the state of things that are not.’ All the things that are, all the realities, of the world, are of absolutely no account, unassignable, in God’s spiritual kingdom. Literally, That all flesh may have no ground of boasting before God; i.e. may be deprived of all ground of boasting.

30.] But (contrast to the boasting just spoken of) of Him are ye (from Him ye, who once were as things that are not, now are.—He is the Author of your spiritual life) in (in union with) Christ Jesus, who was made (not, ‘is made’) wisdom (standing us in stead of all earthly wisdom, and raising us above it by being from God);—Wisdom—in His incarnation, in His life of obedience, in His teaching, in His death of atonement, in His glorification and sending of the Spirit: and not only Wisdom, but all that we can want to purify us from guilt, to give us righteousness before God, to sanctify us after His likeness) unto us from God, both righteousness and sanctification (the source of our justification before God) and redemption (by His Spirit: observe the rendering, implying that in these two, righteousness and sanctification, The Christian life is complete—that they are so joined as to form one whole—our righteousness as well as our sanctification. As Bisping well remarks, “righteousness and sanctification are closely joined, and form but one idea, that of Christian justification: righteousness the negative side, in Christ’s justifying work—sanctification the positive, the imparting to us of sanctifying grace”), and redemption (by satisfaction made for our sin: or perhaps deliverance, from all evil, and especially from eternal death, as Rom. viii. 23: but I prefer the other). See this construction of the sentence, as against that in A.V., justified, in the note in my Greek Test.

31.] The citation is freely made from the Septuagint. This verse, declaring, in opposition to ver. 29, the only true ground of boasting, viz. in God and His mercies to us in Christ, closes the description of God’s dealing in this matter. He now reverts to the subject of his own preaching.

II. 1–5.] ACCORDINGLY, PAUL DID NOT USE AMONG THEM WORDS OF WORLDLY WISDOM, BUT PREACHING CHRIST CRUCIFIED ONLY, IN THE POWER OF THE SPIRIT.

1.] And I (as one of the we of i. 23, and also with reference to the preceding verse, He that glorieth, let Him glory in the Lord), when I came to you, brethren, came declaring unto you the testimony of God, not with excellency of speech or of wisdom.

2.] Literally, For I did not resolve to know any thing (meaning, “the only thing that I made it definitely my business to know, was”) among you, save Jesus Christ (His Person), and Him (as) crucified (His Office). It would seem that the historical facts of redemption, and especially the crucifixion of Christ, as a matter of offence, had been kept in the background by these professors of human wisdom. “We must not overlook, that Paul does not say ‘to know any thing of or concerning Christ,’ but to know HIM HIMSELF, to preach HIM HIMSELF. The historical Christ is also the living Christ, who is with His own till the end of time; He works personally in every believer, and forms Himself in each one. Therefore it is universally CHRIST HIMSELF, the Crucified and the Risen One, who is the subject of preaching, and is also Wisdom itself: for His history evermore lives and repeated itself in the whole church and in every member of it: it never waxes old, any more than does God Himself;—it retains at this day that fulness of power, in which it was revealed at the first foundation of the church.” Olshausen.

3.] And I; in the original the personal pronoun is repeated for emphasis, the nature of his own preaching being the leading subject-matter here.—The weakness and fear and much trembling must not be exclusively understood of his manner of speech as contrasted with the rhetorical preachers, for these follow in the next verse,—but partly of this, and principally of his internal deep and humble persuasion of his own weakness, and the mightiness of the work which was entrusted to him. So in Phil. ii. 12, 13, he commands the Philippians to work out their own salvation with fear and trembling, for it was God that wrought in them. The weakness may have reference to the weak bodily presence of 2 Cor. x. 10. Chrysostom and others understand it of persecutions: but in the places to which he refers, it has a far wider meaning,—viz. infirmitates, including those resulting from persecution.

4.] And (following naturally on the weakness, &c., just mentioned—‘as corresponding to it) my speech and my preaching (in the original speech refers to the course of argument and inculcation of doctrine, Preaching to the announcement of facts) Was not with (literally, in: did not consist of, was not set forth in) persuasive words of [man's] wisdom (see margin), but with (in, see above) demonstration of the Spirit and of power: i.e. either, taking the genitives as objective, demonstration having for its object, demonstrating, the presence or working of the Spirit and Power of God:—or, taking them subjectively, demonstration (of the truth) springing from the Spirit and Power of God. I prefer the latter. It can hardly be understood of the miracles done by the Spirit through him, which accompanied his preaching (so Chrysostom and others), for he is here simply speaking of the preaching itself.

5.] may not stand in, i.e. may not be grounded on,—owe its origin and stability to. “The Spirit is the original Creator of Faith, which cannot be begotten of human caprice, though man has the capability of hindering its production: and it depends for its continuance on the same mighty Spirit, who is almost without intermission begetting it anew.” Olshausen.

6–16.] YET THE APOSTLE SPOKE WISDOM AMONG THE PERFECT, BUT OF A KIND HIGHER THAN THE WISDOM OF THIS WORLD; a wisdom revealed from God by the Spirit, only intelligible by the spiritual man, and not by the unspiritual. The Apostle rejects the imputation, that the Gospel and its preaching is inconsistent with wisdom, rightly understood: nay, shews that the wisdom of the Gospel is of a far higher order than that of the wise in this world, and far above their comprehension.

6.] Yet contrasts with the foregoing.

we] viz. ‘we Apostles:’ not “I Paul, though he often uses the plural with this meaning:—for, ch. iii. 1, he resumes “And I, brethren...” among the perfect] i.e. when discoursing to those who are not babes in Christ, but of sufficient maturity to have their senses exercised (Heb. v. 14) so as to discern good and evil. That this is the right interpretation, the whole following context shews, and especially ch. iii. 1, 2, where a difference is laid down between the milk administered to babes, and the strong meat to men. ‘The difference is in the matter of the teaching itself: there is a lower, and there is a higher teaching. On the other hand, Chrysostom and many others understand the difference to be merely in the estimate formed of the same teaching according as men were spiritual or unspiritual, interpreting among the perfect to mean ‘in the estimation of the perfect,’ which is allowable, but plainly irreconcilable with the whole apologetic course of the chapter, and most of all with ch. iii. 1, where he asserts that he did not speak this wisdom to the Corinthians.—We are then brought to the enquiry,—what was this wisdom? “Meyer limits it too narrowly to consideration of the future kingdom of Christ. Riicker adds to this, the higher views of the divine ordering of the world with respect to the unfolding of God’s kingdom,—of the meaning of the preparatory dispensations before Christ, e.g. the law,—of the manner in which the death and resurrection of Christ promoted the salvation of mankind. According to ver. 12, the knowledge of the blessings of salvation, of the glory which accompanies the kingdom of God, belongs to this higher species of teaching. Examples of it are found in the Epistle to the Romans, in the setting forth of the doctrine of justification,—of the contrast between Christ and Adam,—of predestination (compare the word ‘mystery,’ Rom. xi. 25), and in the Epistles to the Eph. and Col. (where the word ‘mystery’ often occurs) in the declarations respecting the divine plan of Redemption and the Person of Christ; nay, in our Epistle, ch. xv. Of the same kind are the considerations treated, Heb. vii.—x.: cf. iv. 11 ff’ De Wette.

but a wisdom not of this world,—not, as A.V., ‘not the wisdom of this world,’ which loses the peculiar force of the negative.—These rulers are parallel with the “wise,” “mighty,” “noble,” of ch. i. 26, and are connected with them expressly by the words that are coming to nought, referring to “that He might bring to nought the things that are,” ch. i. 28. They comprehend all in estimation and power, Jewish or Gentile. Chrysostom says, “By rulers of the world here he does not mean any spiritual beings, as some say: but those in estimation, those in power, those who think worldly matters worth contending for, philosophers and rhetoricians and authors: for these men have often ruled, and proved demagogues.” who are coming (more literally, being brought) to nought, viz. by God making choice of the weak and despised, and passing over them, ch. i. 28: not said of their transitoriness generally,—nor of their power being annihilated at the coming of Christ,—nor of their having indeed crucified Christ, but of their being brought to nought by His Resurrection and the increase of His Church.

7.] But we speak GOD’s wisdom (emphasis on the word God’s):—the wisdom which God possesses and has revealed in a mystery (i. e. as handling a mystery, dealing with a mystery. So we have “my understanding in the mystery of Christ,” Eph. iii. 4.—The Romanist expositors, taking the connexion rightly, have wrested the meaning to support the idea of the secret discipline which they imagine to be here hinted at, explaining the words in a mystery to mean, “not openly and promiscuously among all, because all cannot receive it: but secretly and to the few, namely, those who are spiritual and perfect.” So Estius), even the (hitherto) hidden wisdom (see Rom. xvi. 25; Col. i. 26):—which God foreordained before the worlds (literally, the ages of time) unto (in order to, the purpose of this preordination) our glory (our participation in the things which He has prepared for them that love Him, ver. 9: glory, as contrasted with the bringing to nought of the rulers).

8.] Which is in apposition with the former which, and does not refer to glory, as Tertullian supposed, saying, “he adds concerning our glory, that none of the princes of this world knew it:” for this would be departing from the whole sense of the context, which is, that the wisdom of God was hidden from men.

for had they known it,&c., is a proof from experience, that the rulers of this world, of whom the Jewish rulers were a representative sample, were ignorant of the wisdom of God. Had they known it, they would not have put to a disgraceful death Him who was the Lord of glory,—i. e. who possesses in His own right glory eternal, see John xvii. 5, 24.—These words are not a parenthesis, but continue the sense of the foregoing, completing the proof of man’s ignorance of God’s wisdom;—even this world’s rulers know it not, as they have shewn: how much less then the rest.

9 f.] But (opposition to ver. 8) a s it is written, Things which the eye hath not seen, and the ear hath not heard, and which have not entered into the heart of man, things which God hath prepared for them that love Him, hath God revealed unto us through His Spirit.—Whence is the citation made? Origen says, “that it is found in no canonical book, but in the ‘secrets of Elias the prophet.’” a lost apocryphal book:—Chrysostom and Theophylact give the alternative, either that the words are a paraphrase of Isa. lii. 15, or that they were contained in some lost book, of which Chrysostom argues that there were very many, and that but few remain to us. Jerome believes the words to be those of Isa. Ixiv. 4, paraphrased.—I own that probability seems to me to incline to Jerome’s view, especially when we remember, how freely St. Paul is in the habit of citing. The words of Isa. Ixiv. 4, are quite as near to the general sense of the citation as is the case in many other instances, and the words have not entered into the heart of man may well be a reminiscence from Isa. Ixiv. 17, not far from the other place: see A.V., in the margin of that place. Such minglings together of clauses from various parts are not unexampled with the Apostle, especially when, as here, he is not citing as authority, but merely illustrating his argument by Old Test. expressions.

10. the Spirit] the Holy Spirit of God but working in us and with our spirits, Rom. viii. 16.

searcheth] the original verb is used of active research, implying accurate knowledge the deep things] literally, the depths: see reff. There is a comparison here between the Spirit of God and the spirit of a man, which is further carried out in the next verse. And thus, as the spirit of a man knows the depth of a man, all that is in him, so the Spirit of God searches and knows the manifold and infinite depths of God—His Essence, His Attributes, His Counsels:

and being the Spirit which is in us, besides being the Spirit of God, teaches us, according to our capacity, those depths of God.

11.] For who among MEN knoweth the things of a MAN (the emphasis is on men and man as compared with God), except the spirit of a man which is in him? So also the things of God knoweth none, save only the Spirit of God.—We may remark that the comparison here must not be urged beyond what is intended by the Apostle. He is speaking of the impossibility of any but the Spirit of God conferring a knowledge of the things of God. In order to shew this, he compares human things with divine, appealing to the fact that none but the spirit of a man knows his matters. But further than this he says nothing of the similarity of relation of God and God's Spirit with man and man's spirit: and to deduce more than this, will lead into error on one side or the other. In such comparisons as these especially, we must bear in mind the constant habit of our Apostle, to contemplate the thing adduced, for the time, only with regard to that one point for which he adduces it, to the disregard of all other considerations.

12. the spirit of the world] Not merely, the mind and sentiments of unregenerate mankind, but the spirit (personally and objectively taken) of the world,—the spirit which now worketh in the children of disobedience, Eph. ii. 2, where it is strictly personal. On the other hand, we have received, not only 'the Spirit of God,' but the Spirit which is FROM God,—shewing that we have received it only by the will and imparting of Him whose Spirit it is. And this expression prepares the way for the purpose which God has in imparting to us His Spirit, that we may know the things freely given to us by God, i. e., the treasures of wisdom and of felicity which are the free gifts of the gospel dispensation, “the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him,” ver. 9.

13.] Which things also we speak, viz. the things freely given to us by God: we not only know them by the teaching of the Holy Ghost, but also speak them, not in words (arguments, rhetorical forms, &c.) taught by man's wisdom, but in words taught by the Spirit.

interpreting spiritual things to the spiritual] There considerable difficulty about the rendering of this clause. I have discussed the various proposals in the note in my Greek Test., and seen reason to adopt that represented in the text. ‘The others may be briefly stated to be (1) that of the A.V., “c omparing spiritual things with spiritual:? (2) that of Chrysostom and others, “explaining spiritual things by spiritual things,” e.g. difficult spiritual truths of the New Test. by Old Test. testimonies and types: (3) that of Erasmus, Calvin, and the best recent German expositors, “attaching spiritual words to spiritual things,” which we should not do, if we used words of worldly wisdom to expound them.

14.] He now prepares the way for shewing them that he could not give out the depths of this spiritual wisdom and eloquence to them, because they were not fitted for it, being carnal (ch. iii. 1–4).

The natural, or animal man, as distinguished from the spiritual man, is he, whose governing principle and highest reference of all things is the animal soul, that which animates his fleshly body. In him, the spirit, being unvivified and uninformed by the Spirit of God, is overborne by the animal soul, with its desires and its judgments,—and is in abeyance, so that he may be said to have it not; see on Jude 19. The animal soul (psyche in Greek) is that side of the human soul, so to speak, which is turned towards the flesh, the world, the devil: so that the psychical man is necessarily in a measure carnal (ch. iii. 3), also earthly, and devilish, as James iii. 15.

receiveth not i.e. rejects,—not, cannot receive, understands not, which is against the context,—for we may well understand that which seems folly to us, but we reject it, as unworthy of our consideration:—and it besides would involve a tautology, this point, of inability to comprehend, following by and by.

he cannot know them (viz. the things of the Spirit, the matter of our spiritual teaching, itself furnished by the Spirit), because they are spiritually (by the spirit of a man exalted by the Spirit of God into its proper paramount office of judging and ruling, and inspired and enabled for that office) discerned.

15.] But (on the contrary) he that is spiritual (he, in whom the spirit rules: and since by man's fall the spirit is overridden by the animal soul, and in abeyance, this always presupposes the infusion of the Holy Spirit, to quicken and inform the spirit—so that there is no such thing as an unregenerate spiritual man) discerneth all things (not merely all spiritual things; for the Apostle is generalizing, and shewing the high position of the spiritual man, who alone can judge things by their true standard), yet he himself is discerned by none (who is not also spiritual, see ch. xiv. 29; 1 John iv. 1, where such judgment is expressly attributed to Christian believers). “For,” says Chrysostom, “he that can see, discerns all belonging to him who cannot see, but by none of these latter is he himself discerned.”

16.] PROOF OF THE ASSERTION, THAT HE HIMSELF IS DISCERNED BY NONE. In order for an unassisted man, not gifted from Christ, to judge the spiritual man, he must know the mind of the Lord, the intent and disposition of Christ; yea more, must be able to teach, to instruct, Christ—being not, as the spiritual man, taught by Him, he must have an independent wisdom of his own, which Christ has not:—and who is there, of whom this can be said? But we (the spiritual, among whom he includes himself and the other Apostles) have (not a wisdom independent of Christ, nor do we know His mind, nor can we teach Him, but) the mind of Christ: the same mind, in our degree of apprehensiveness of it, by the imparting of His Spirit, which is in Him:—and so can judge all things. The mind of the Lord is the spiritual intent and designs of Christ.—THE LORD, in the prophecy, is spoken of JEHOVAH; but in the whole of Isa. xl., the incarnate Jehovah is the subject.

III. 1–4.] HE COULD NOT SPEAK TO THEM IN THE PERFECT SPIRITUAL MANNER ABOVE DESCRIBED, SEEING THAT THEY WERE CARNAL, AND STILL REMAINED SO, AS WAS SHEWN BY THEIR DIVISIONS.

1.] And I, or as it may be rendered, I also; i.e. as well as the natural man, was compelled to stand on this lower ground,—he, because he cannot understand the things of the Spirit of God: 1, because you could not receive them. But it is perhaps better to render as in the text, and understand it, with Stanley, And I, as in ch. ii, 1, “What I have just been saying, was exemplified in our practice.”

as unto men of flesh] The Apostle uses two different words here and in ver. 3 to convey the idea of carnality. Here it is the more gross and material word, signifying made of flesh: there it is the finer and figurative word carnal, partaking of the character, and under the influence of the flesh. And there is a propriety in this distinction. Here, he says that he was compelled to speak to them as if they were only of flesh,—as if they were babes, using in both cases the material comparison, and the particle of comparison, “as.” But in ver. 3 he drops comparison, and asserts matter of fact—‘Are ye not still fleshly, carnal, living after the flesh, resisting the Spirit?’ as if it had been said, ‘I was obliged to regard you as mere men of flesh, without the Spirit: and it is not far different even now: ye are yet fleshly—ye retain the same character.’

as unto babes in Christ] The opposite term, “perfect in Christ,” is found Col. i. 28 and in connexion with this, Heb. v. 13, 14. The Jews called the novices in their schools “sucking babes.” A recent proselyte also was regarded by them as a new-born infant.—He speaks of his first visit to Corinth, when they were recently admitted into the faith of Christ.—and excuses his merely elementary teaching by the fact that they then required it. Not this, but their still requiring it, is adduced as matter of blame to them.

2.] See the same figure in Heb. v. 12.

after the manner of (unrenewed and ungodly) men, equivalent to “according to the flesh,” Rom. viii. 4; see note on ch. xv. 32.

4.] He names but two of the foregoing designations, ch. i. 12: intending, both there more fully, and here briefly, rather to give a sample of the sectarian spirit prevalent than to describe, as matter of tact, any sects into which they were actually divided: see note there, and on ch. iv. 6. Meyer sees in the mention here of Paul and Apollos only, a reference to the two methods of teaching which have been treated of in this section: but as I have before said, the German Commentators are misled by too definite a view of the Corinthian parties. men, i.e. walking after the manner of men, carnal. The reading “carnal,” in the A.V., is against the authority of all our most ancient MSS.

5–15.] HE TAKES OCCASION, BY EXAMPLE OF HIMSELF AND APOLLOS, TO EXPLAIN TO THEM THE TRUE PLACE AND OFFICE OF CHRISTIAN TEACHERS: THAT THEY ARE IN THEMSELVES NOTHING (VV. 5–8), BUT WORK FOR GOD (vv. 9, 10), EACH IN HIS PECULIAR DEPARTMENT (ver. 10; cf. ver. 6) EACH REQUIRING SERIOUS CARE AS TO THE MANNER OF HIS WORKING, SEEING THAT A SEARCHING TRIAL OF ITS WORTH WILL BE MADE IN THE DAY OF THE LORD (vv. 10–15).

5.] This inference follows on the assumption of the truth of the divided state of things among them: ‘Who then...., seeing that ye exalt them into heads over you?’ The question is not asked by an objector, but by St. Paul himself; when an objector is introduced he notifies it, as ch. xv. 35; Rom. ix. 19.

ye believed, as in the references: ye became believers. In the A.V., the question is carried on to the end of the verse, but against the authority of all our most ancient MSS.

6.] The similitude is to a tilled field: the plants are the Corinthians, as members of Christ, vines bearing fruit: these do not yet appear in the construction: so that I prefer supplying nothing after planted and watered, regarding merely the acts themselves. Apollos was sent over to Corinth after St. Paul had left it (Acts xviii. 27), at his own request, and remained there preaching during Paul’s journey through Upper Asia (ib. xix. 1).

7.] After the words God that giveth the growth, supply in the mind in every thing.

8.] are one in the nature of their ministry,—generically, for both are the servants of the divine will.

but each...] Here he introduces a new element—the separate responsibility of each minister for the results of his own labour, so that, though in their service they are one,—in their work they are diverse. ‘The stress is twice on his own.

9.] Proof of the last assertion, and introduction of Him, from Whom each shall receive. The stress thrice on God's:—shall receive, &c.,—for it is of GOD that we are the fellow-labourers (in subordination to Him, as is of course implied: but to render it ‘fellow-workers with one another, under God,’ is contrary to usage, and not at all required, see 2 Cor. v. 20; vi. 1), of GOD that ye are the tillage, of GOD that ye are the building. This last new similitude is introduced on account of what he has presently to say of the different kinds of teaching, which will be more clearly set forth by this, than by the other figure.

10.] According to the grace of God,&c., as an expression of humility, fitly introduces the assertion of wisdom which follows. The grace is not the peculiar grace of his apostleship—for an Apostle was not always required to lay the foundation, e.g., this was not so in Rome:—but that given to him in common with all Christians (ver. 5), only in a degree proportioned to the work which God had for him to do.

wise, i.e. skilful. The proof of this skill is given, in his laying a foundation: the unskilful master-builder lays none, see Luke vi. 49. The foundation (ver. 11) was and must be, JESUS CHRIST: the facts of redemption by Him, and the reception of Him and His work by faith.

another, ‘whoever comes after me,’ not only Apollos.

buildeth, present tense, as the necessary state and condition of the subsequent teacher, be he who he may. The building on, over the foundation, imports the carrying them onward in knowledge and intelligent faith.

how, emphatic, meaning here, with what material.

11.] ‘I speak of superimposing merely, for it is unnecessary to caution them respecting the foundation itself: there can be but one, and that one HAS ALREADY BEEN (objectively, for all, see below) LAID BY GOD.’ At the same time, in taking this for granted, he implies the strongest possible caution against attempting to lay any other.

can no man lay, not no man lay, for it would be unlawful: for it is assumed, that God's building is to be raised—and it can only be raised on this one foundation All who build on other foundations are not God's fellow-labourers, nor is their building His at all.

that which is laid] not, ‘by me,’ but ‘by God,’ for universal Christendom; but actually laid in each place, as regards that church, by the minister who founds it.

Jesus Christ, THE PERSONAL, HISTORICAL CHRIST, as the object of all Christian faith. Not any doctrine, even that of the Messiahship of Jesus, is the foundation, but JESUS HIMSELF.

12.] The but implies that though there can be but one foundation, there are many ways of building upon it. To the right understanding of this verse it may be necessary to remark, (1) that the similitude is, not of many buildings, but of one, see ver. 16,—and that one, raised on Christ as its foundation:—different parts of which are built by the ministers who work under Him,—some well and substantially built, some ill and unsubstantially (2) That gold, silver, &c., refer to the matter of the ministers’ teaching primarily; and by inference, to those whom that teaching penetrates and builds up in Christ, who should be the living stones of the temple: not, as many of the ancients thought, to the moral fruits produced by the preaching in the individual members of the church: (3) that the builder of the worthless and unsubstantial is in the end SAVED (see below): so that even his preaching was preaching of Christ, and he himself was in earnest. (4) That what is said does not refer, except, by accommodation, to the religious life of believers in general;—but to the DUTY AND REWARD OF TEACHERS. At the same time, such accommodation is legitimate in so far as each man is a teacher and builder of himself. (5) That the various materials specified must not be fancifully pressed to indicate particular doctrines or graces, as e.g. Schrader (in his life of St. Paul) has done, “Some build with the gold of faith, with the silver of hope, with the imperishable costly stones of love,—others again with the dead wood of unfruitfulness in good works, with the empty straw of a spiritless, ostentatious knowledge, and with the bending reed of a continually-doubting spirit.” This, however ingenious, is beside the mark, not being justified by any indications furnished in our Epistle itself.

costly stones] Not, precious stones, as commonly understood, i.e. ‘gems,’ but ‘costly stones,’ as marbles, porphyry, jasper,

&c.: compare 1 Kings vii. 9 ff.—By the wood, hay, straw, he indicates the various perversions of true doctrine, and admixtures of false philosophy which were current: so Estius, “not heretical and pernicious doctrine, for such would destroy the foundation: but that which wanted purity and solidity: as for example that which was too much mingled with human and philosophical or even Jewish opinions: that which was more curious than useful: that which occupied Christian men’s minds with vain amusement.”

13.] The work of each man (i. e. that which he has built: his part in erecting the building of God) shall (at some time) be made manifest (shall not always remain in the present uncertainty but be tested, and shewn of what: sort it is): for the day shall declare it (the day of the Lord: so most Commentators ancient and modern. The other interpretations are (1) ‘the day of the destruction of Jerusalem, which shall shew the vanity of Judaizing doctrines: but this is against both the context, and our Apostle’s habit of speaking, and goes on the assumption, that nothing but Jewish errors are spoken of.—(2) ‘the lapse of time, as in the Latin proverb (“the day shall teach”), which is still more inconsistent with the context, which necessitates a definite day, and a definite fire:—(3) ‘the light of day,’ i.e. of clear knowledge, as opposed to the present time of obscurity and night:—but the fire here is not a light-giving, but a consuming flame: and, as Meyer remarks, even in that case the “day” would be that of Christ’s appearing, see Rom. xiii. 12:—(4) “the day of tribulation:”—so Augustine: but this again is not definite enough: the words “shall receive wages” can hardly be said of mere abiding the test of tribulation):—because it (the day—not, the work, which would introduce a mere tautology with the next clause) is [to be] revealed (in the original, is revealed, the present tense, expressing the definite certainty of prophecy: or perhaps rather the attribute of that day, which is, to be revealed, &c.) in fire (‘accompanyed,’ ‘clothed,’ ‘girt,’ ‘with fire;’ i.e. fire will be the element in which the day will be revealed. See 2 Thess. i. 8, and Mal. iii. 2, 3, iv. 1, to which latter place the reference is. But notice, that this is not the fire of hell, into which the gold, silver, and costly stones will never enter, but the fire of judgment, in which Christ will appear, and by which all works will be tried. This universality of trial by fire is equally against the idea of a purgatorial fire, which most convenient and lucrative fiction has been mainly based by the Romanists on a perversion of this passage. Their own Commentators are divided on the question whether there is any allusion to it in this passage); and each man’s work, of what sort it is, the fire itself shall prove (the fire itself, of its own power, being a consuming fire).

14.] If any man’s work shall endure (i. e. stand the fire,—being of incomsumable materials) which he built on the foundation,—he shall receive wages (as a builder;—i. e. ‘shall be rewarded for his faithful and effectual work as a teacher’):

15.] if any man’s work shall be burned up (i. e. consist of such materials as the fire will destroy: Stanley adds, “It is possible that this whole image, as addressed to the Corinthians, may have been suggested, or at least illustrated, by the conflagration of Corinth under Mummius: the stately temples [one of them remaining to this day] left standing amidst the universal crash and destruction of the meaner buildings”), he shall suffer loss (literally, be mulcted, viz. of the wages which would otherwise have been his): but he himself shall be saved (having held, and built on, the true foundation Jesus Christ, he shall not be excluded from that salvation which is the free gift of God to all who believe on Christ, but shall get no especial reward as a faithful and effectual teacher. Compare 2 John 8, “Look to yourselves that we lose not the things which we have wrought, but receive full wages:” so literally. Meyer remarks, that our Lord hints at such persons under the name of “the last,” Matt. xx. 16: Mark x. 31), yet so as through fire:—i. e. as a builder whose building was consumed would escape with personal safety, but with the loss of his work.—Chrysostom, and others of the ancients, strangely understand it, that he shall not be consumed like his works, but shall be saved from this, and burnt for ever in the fire of Hell, unconsumed. But (1) the fire of Hell is quite alien from the context (see above),—and (2) the meaning thus given to being saved is unexampled,—and least of all could be intended where the coming of the Lord is spoken of: compare among other places, ch. v. 5. Grotius and others explain the words as a proverb, ‘as out of a fire, i.e. ‘with difficulty.’ But this is needless here, as the figure itself is that of a fire. The whole imagery of the passage will be best understood by carefully keeping in mind the key, which is to be found in the words God’s building, and the temple of God, as connected with the prophecy of Malachi iii. 1–3 and iv. 1. The Lord thus coming to His temple in flaming fire, all the parts of the building which will not stand that fire will be consumed the builders of them will escape with personal salvation, but with the loss of their work, through the midst of the conflagration.

16–23.] THE FIGURE IS TAKEN UP AFRESH AND CARRIED FURTHER: AND MADE THE OCCASION OF SOLEMN EXHORTATION, SINCE THEY WERE THE TEMPLE OF GOD, NOT TO MAR THAT TEMPLE, THE HABITATION OF HIS SPIRIT, BY UNHOLINESS OR BY EXALTATION OF HUMAN WISDOM: WHICH LAST AGAIN WAS IRRELEVANT AS WELL AS SINFUL; FOR ALL THEIR TEACHERS WERE BUT THEIR SERVANTS IN BUILDING THEM UP TO BE GOD’S TEMPLE,—YEA ALL THINGS WERE FOR THIS END, TO SUBSERVE THEM, AS BEING CHRIST’S, BY THE ORDINANCE, AND TO THE GLORY OF GOD THE FATHER,

16.] The foregoing figures, with the occasion to which they referred, are now dropped, and the building of God recalled, to do further service. This building is now, as in Mal. iii. 1, and as indeed by implication in the foregoing verses, the temple of God (the stress on the word temple, not on “God”), the habitation of His Spirit.

Are ye ignorant that... an expression of surprise arising out of their conduct.—Meyer rightly remarks, that “the expression is the temple of God, not a temple of God: for St. Paul does not conceive of the various churches as various temples of God, which would be inconsistent with a Jew's conception of God's temple, but of each Christian church as, in a mystical sense, the temple of Jehovah. So there would be, not many temples, but many churches, each of which is, ideally, the same temple of God." And, we may add, if the figure is to be strictly justified in its widest acceptation, that all the churches are built together into one vast temple: compare Eph. ii. 22.

17.] destroyeth, or, marreth, whether as regards its unity and beauty, or its purity and sanctity: here, the meaning is left indefinite, but the latter particulars are certainly hinted at,—by the word holy, below.

shall God destroy, or, mar, either by temporal death, as in ch. xi. 30; or by spiritual death, which is more probable seeing that the figurative temple is spoken of, not the material temple:—and as temporal death was the punishment for defiling the material temple (Exod. xxviii. 43. Levit. xvi. 2), so spiritual death for marring or defiling of God's spiritual temple.

holy is the constant epithet of the temple in the Old Test., see Ps. xi. 45 lxxix. 1. Hab. ii. 20, and passim.

the which, i.e. holy; not, 'which temple ye are', which would be tautological after ver. 16, and would hardly be expressed by the word in the original. Meyer well remarks that this clause is the minor proposition of a syllogism:—'Whoever mars the temple of God, him will God destroy, because His temple is holy: but ye also, as His ideal temple, are holy:—therefore, whoever mars you, shall be destroyed by God.'

18–20.] A warning to those who would be leaders among them, against self-conceit.

18.] deceive himself, not meaning, with reference to what the Apostle has just laid down, but generally, viz. by thinking himself wise, when he must become a fool in order to be wise.—If any man seemeth to be (i. e. thinks that he is) wise among you in this world (the whole assumption of wisdom made by the man, as made in this present world, must be false), let him become a fool (by receiving the gospel in its simplicity, and so becoming foolish in the world's sight), that he may become (truly) wise.

19.] Reason why this must be:—shewn from Scripture. with God, i. e in the judgment of God.—The sense is, 'If God uses the craft of the wise as a net to catch them in, such wisdom is in His sight folly, since He turns it to their confusion'

20.] In the Psalm it is, the thoughts of man; the Psalmist however is speaking of the proud, ver. 2 f., and such, when these high thoughts are in question, would be the worldly wise.

21–23.] A warning to them in general, not to boast themselves in human teachers.

21.] So then, viz. seeing that this world's wisdom is folly with God: or perhaps as a more general inference from what has gone before since ch. i., that as the conclusion there was, "he that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord,"—so now, having gone into the matter more at length, he concludes, Let no man glory in men. This boasting in men is explained in ch. iv. 6 to mean, "not to be puffed up each for one against another."

For all things are your's] 'For such boasting is a degradation to those who are heirs of all things, and for whom all, whether ministers or events, or the world itself, are working together: see Rom. viii. 28; and iv. 13, 22, 23.] Specification of some of the things included under all things; and first of those teachers in whom they were disposed to boast,—in direct reference to ch. i. 12. But having enumerated Paul, Apollos, Cephas, he does not say "or Christ," but adding the world itself and its events and circumstances, he reiterates the all are your's, as if to mark the termination of this category, and changing the form, concludes with and ye (not only one part of you) are Christ's: and Christ is God's (see below).—The expressions life, death, things present, things to come, have no special reference to present circumstances but are perfectly general.

23.] On the change of the possessives see above:—Christ is not yours, in the sense in which all things are,—not made for and subserving you—but you are His—and even that does not reach the Highest possession: He possesses not you for Himself: but the Head of Christ is God, ch. xi. 3—CHRIST HIMSELF, the Incarnate God the Mediator, belongs to God, is subordinate to the Father, see John xiv. 28; and xvii. But this mediatorial subordination is in no way inconsistent with His eternal and co-equal Godhead: see note on Phil. ii. 6–9; and on ch. xv. 28, where the subjection of all things to Christ, and His subjection to the Father, are similarly set forth—There is a striking similarity in the argument in this last verse to that in our Lord's prohibition Matt. xxiii. 8–10.

IV. 1–5.] HE SHEWS THEM THE RIGHT VIEW TO TAKE OF CHRISTIAN MINISTERS (vv. 1, 2); BUT, FOR HIS PART, REGARDS NOT MAN'S JUDGMENT OF HIM, NOR EVEN JUDGES HIMSELF, BUT THE LORD IS HIS JUDGE (vv. 3, 4). THEREFORE LET THEM ALSO SUSPEND THEIR JUDGMENTS TILL THE LORD'S COMING, WHEN ALL SHALL BE MADE PLAIN.

1.] so, emphatic, preparatory to “as,” in ch. iii. 15.

a man is used in the most general and indefinite sense, as ‘man’ in German.—The whole is opposed to glorying in men: the ministers of Christ are but subordinates to Him, and accountable to God.

us, here, not ‘us ministers generally,’ see below, ver. 6, but ‘myself and Apollos,’ as a sample of such.

ministers of Christ, see ch. iii. 5, 22, 23. But in the words, stewards of the mysteries of God, we have a new figure introduced. The Church, 1 Tim. iii. 15, is the “house of God,”—and those appointed to minister in it are stewards and dispensers of the property and stores of the Master of the house. These last are the mysteries, hidden treasures, of God,—i. e. the riches of his grace, now manifested in Christ, ch. ii. 7; Rom. xvi. 25, 26, which they announce and distribute to all, having received them from the Spirit for that purpose. “These mysteries are those of the Incarnation, Passion, and Resurrection of Christ, of our Redemption, of the calling of the Gentiles, and the rest which is included in Evangelical doctrine.” Estius: who also, as a Romanist, attempts to include the sacraments among the mysteries in this sense. The best refutation of this is given by himself: “Since Paul himself has said in the first chapter, Christ sent me not to baptize, but to preach the Gospel, it is more correct to understand by these mysteries of God the doctrines of our faith.” It may be doubted, whether, in the New Test. sense of mysteries, the sacraments can be in any way reckoned as such: for the word signifies a (usually divine) proceeding, once hidden, but now revealed, or now hidden, and to be revealed; under neither of which categories can the sacraments be classed.

2.] Moreover it is required in (the case of) stewards (literally, it is sought for: enquiry is made in the case of stewards) here [on earth] (here [on earth]) is emphatic and points to what follows, that though in the case of stewards enquiry was necessarily made here below, yet he, God's steward, awaited no such enquiry from the day of man's judgment, but one at the coming of the Lord) that a man be found (proved to be) faithful (emphatic).

3.] But to me (contrast to the case of the stewards into whose faithfulness enquiry is made here on earth) it is (amounts to) a very small thing,—very little,—that I should be judged (enquired into, as to my faithfulness) by you, or by (literally) the day of man, i.e. of man's judgment (in reference to here above, and contrast to the day of the Lord, to which his appeal is presently made, ver. 5, and of which, as testing the worth of the labour of teachers, he spoke so fully ch. iii, 13–15), nay, I do not even judge (hold not an enquiry on: literally, ‘but neither do I, &c.’) myself:

4.] for I know nothing against myself (the A.V., ‘I know nothing by myself’, was a phrase commonly used in this acceptation at the time; compare Ps. xv. 4, Com. Prayer Book version, ‘He that setteh not by himself, i.e. is not wise in his own conceit. ‘I know no harm by him,’ is still a current expression in the midland counties See Deut. xxvii. 16; Ezek. xxii. 7, in A.V. So Donne, Serm. lvii., “If thine own spirit, thine own conscience, accuse thee of nothing, is all well? why, I know nothing by myself, yet am I not thereby Justified.” This meaning of ‘by’ does not appear in our ordinary dictionaries), yet am I not hereby justified (i. e. it is not this circumstance which clears me of blame—this does not decide the matter. There can be no reference to forensic justification here, by the very conditions of the context: for he is speaking of that wages of the teacher, which may be lost, and yet personal salvation be attained, see ch. iii. 15); but he that judgeth (holds an enquiry on) me is the Lord (Christ, the judge).

5.] So then (because the Lord is the sole infallible dijudgetor) judge nothing (concerning us, of merit or demerit) before the time, until the Lord [shall have] come, who shall both bring to light (throw light on) the hidden things of darkness (general—all things which are hidden in darkness), and make manifest the counsels of the hearts (then first shewing, what your teachers really are, in heart): and then shall each man have his (fitting) praise from God.—Praise is not a word which may be taken either way, praise or blame, as the ease may be, but strictly praise. He refers to glorying in men:—they, their various parties, gave exaggerated praise to certain teachers: let them wait till the day when the fitting praise (be it what it may) will be adjudged to each from God; Christ being the Judge appointed by God, Acts x. 42, and so His sentences being from God. See also Acts xvii. 31, and Rom. ii. 16, God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ.

6–13.] HE EXPLAINS TO THEM (ver. 6) THAT THE MENTION HITHERTO OF HIMSELF AND APOLLOS (and by parity of reasoning, of Cephas and of Christ, in ch. i, 12) HAS A MORE GENERAL DESIGN, viz. TO ABSTRACT THEM FROM ALL PARTY SPIRIT AND PRIDE: WHICH PRIDE HE THEN BLAMES, AND PUTS TO SHAME BY DEPICTING, AS A CONTRAST, THE LOW AND AFFLICTED STATE OF THE APOSTLES THEMSELVES.

6.] Now (he comes to the conclusion of what he has to say on their party divisions) these things (many expositors limit “these things" to what has been said since ch. iii. 5. But there surely is no reason for this. The Apostle's meaning here must on all hands be acknowledged to be, 'I have taken out two names as samples, that you may not attach yourselves to and be proud of any party leaders, one against another.' And if these two names which had been last mentioned, why not analogously, those four which he had also alleged in ch. i. 12? have I transferred to myself and Apollos (i. e. when I might have set them before you generally and in the abstract as applying to all teachers, I have preferred doing so by taking two samples, and transferring to them what was true of the whole. 'This is far more probable than the explanation of Chrysostom and others, that he put in his own name and that of Apollos instead of those of the real leaders of sects, concealing them on purpose) for your sakes; that in us ye (as your example: by having our true office and standing set before you) may learn this (so literally), "Not above those things which are written" (i. e. not to exceed in your estimate of yourselves and us, the standard of Scripture,—which had been already in part shewn to them in the citations ch. i. 19, 31; iii. 19; not, what has been written in this Epistle: for the term "it is written" in these New Test. books always refers to the Old Test. Some suppose the words cited from Deut. xvii. 20,—whereas it is far better to give them a perfectly general reference. Chrysostom and others refer it to words of our Lord in the New Test., such as Matt. vii. 1, 3; xxiii. 12; Mark x. 43, 44, but these could not be indicated by "it is written:" compare ch. vii. 10 and note), that ye be not puffed up each for one against another (i. e. 'that you may not adhere together in parties to the detriment or disparagement of a neighbour who is attached to a different party').

7.] For (reason why this puffing up should be avoided) who distinguisheth thee (from others? meaning, that all such conceits of pre-eminence are unfounded. That pre-eminence, and not merely distinction is meant, is evident from what follows)?—And what hast thou that thou didst not receive ('from God'—not, 'from me as thy father in the faith')? but if (which I concede) thou receivedst it, &c.—He speaks not only to the leaders, but to the members of parties,—who imagined themselves superior to those of other parties,—as if all, for every good thing, were not dependent on God, the Giver.

8.] The admonition becomes ironical: "You behave as if the trial were past, and the goal gained; as if hunger and thirst, after righteousness were already filled, and the Kingdom already brought in." The emphases are on already in the two first clauses, and on without us in the third. The three verbs form a climax. Any interpretation which stops short of the full meaning of the words as applied to the triumphant final state (explaining them of Knowledge, of security, of the lordship of one sect over another), misses the force of the irony, and the meaning of the latter part of the verse.

without us] or, apart from us: 'because we, as your fathers in Christ, have ever looked forward to present you, as our glory and joy, in that day.'—There is an exquisite delicacy of irony, which Chrysostom has well caught: "He shews their unreasonableness and their exceeding folly. In trials and troubles, he says, all has been in common to us both: but in the reward and the crown, ye are first."—The latter part of the verse is said bonā fidē and with solemnity; And I would indeed that ye did reign (that the Kingdom of the Lord was actually come, and ye reigning with Him), that we also might reign together with you (that we, though deposed from our proper place, might at least be vouchsafed a humble share in your kingly glory).

9.] For (and there is abundant reason for this wish which I have just uttered, in our present afflicted state) methinks,—God hath set forth (before the eyes of the world) us the Apostles (meaning all the Apostles, principally himself and Apollos) last (last and vilest: not, in respect of those who went before,—last, as the prophets were before us), as men sentenced to death; for we are made a spectacle to the world, to angels (good angels: the word put absolutely, never either includes, or signifies, bad angels), and to men (the general term, the world, is afterwards specialized into angels and men).

10.] Again, the bitterest irony: 'how different our lot from yours! How are you to be envied—we, to be pitied!—There is a distinction in for Christ's sake, and in in Christ: We are foolish for Christ's sake (on account of Christ,—our connexion with Him does nothing but reduce us to be fools), whereas you are wise in Christ, have entered into full participation of Him, and grown up to be wise, subtle Christians.

weak and strong are both to be understood generally: the weakness is not here that of persecution, but that of ch. ii. 3: the strength is the high bearing of the Corinthians.

ye are in honour (in glorious repute, party leaders and party men, highly honoured and looked up to), whereas we are despised (without honour). Then this last word leads him to enlarge on the disgrace and contempt which the Apostles met with at the hands of the world.

11–13.] He enters into the particulars of this state of affliction, which was not a thing past, but enduring to the present moment.

11.] Even unto this present hour is evidently not to be taken strictly as indicative of the situation of Paul at the time of writing the Epistle, but as generally describing the kind of life to which, then and always, he and the other Apostles were exposed. See, on the subject matter, 2 Cor. xi. 23–27.

are naked] i.e. in want of sufficient clothing: cf. “in cold and nakedness,” 2 Cor. xi. 27.

are buffeted], i.e. suffer insult: there is no need to press the strict meaning.

12.] As testimonies to Paul’s working with his own hands, see Acts xviii. 3; xx. 34; ch. ix. 6; 1 Thess. ii. 9; 2 Thess. iii. 8. That the other Apostles did the same, need not necessarily be inferred from this passage, for he may be describing the state of all by himself as a sample: but it is conceivable, and indeed probable, that they did.

being reviled, &c.] ‘So far are we from vindicating to ourselves places of earthly honour and distinction, that we tamely submit to reproach, persecution and evil repute;—nay, we return blessing, and patience, and soft words.’

13.] we intreat, i.e. we answer with mild and soothing words.

as the filth of the world] A climax of disgrace and contempt summing up the foregoing particulars: we are become as it were the refuse of the whole earth. The original word means that which is removed by a thorough purification, the offal or refuse. Some suppose it to imply that they were the expiation of the world, and shew that it was used of persons offered to the gods as expiation in a pestilence or other public calamity.

the offscouring of all things, means much the same as the former designation,—but the expression is more contemptuous.

14–21.] CONCLUSION OF THIS PART OF THE EPISTLE:—IN WHAT SPIRIT HE HAS WRITTEN THESE WORDS OF BLAME: viz. IN A SPIRIT OF ADMONITION, AS THEIR FATHER IN THE FAITH, WHOM THEY OUGHT TO IMITATE. TO THIS END HE SENT TIMOTHY TO REMIND THEM OF HIS WAYS OF TEACHING.—WOULD SOON, HOWEVER, COME HIMSELF,—IN MILDNESS, OR TO PUNISH, AS THE CASE MIGHT REQUIRE.

14. not... to shame you] literally, not as one who shames yon, see ch. vi. 5: xv. 34, 15.] Justification of the expression “my beloved children.” ten thousand, the greatest possible number—see ch. xiv. 19.

schoolmasters] He was their spiritual father: those who followed, Apollos included, were but tutors, having the care and education of the children, but not the rights, as they could not have the peculiar affection of the father. He evidently shews by the word ten thousand, that these schoolmasters were more in number than he could wish,—including among them doubtless the false and party teachers: but to refer the word only to them and their despotic leading or to confine its meaning to the stricter sense of the word used in the original, the slave who led the child to school, is not here borne out by the facts. See Gal. iii. 24, 25, and note.

for in Christ Jesus (as the spiritual element in which the begetting took place: so commonly “in Christ,” applied to relations of life, see ver. 17, twice) through the gospel (the preached word being the instrument) I (emphatic) begat you (there is also an emphasis on you,—in your case, I it was who begot you).

16.] therefore, because I am your father. imitators, not only, nor perhaps chiefly, in the things just mentioned, vv. 9–13,—but as ver. 17, in my ways in Christ, my manner of life and teaching.

17.] For this cause,—in order that you may the better imitate me by being put in mind of my ways and teaching. On the fact, see Introduction,§ii. 2.

my child] see 1 Tim. i, 2, 18; 2 Tim. i. 2. Meyer remarks, that by the strict use of the word child (distinct from “son”) in this passage (compare verses 14, 15) we have a certain proof that Timothy was converted by Paul: see Acts xiv. 6, 7, and note. “The phrase seems to be used here in reference to ‘beloved children,’ ver. 14: ‘I sent ‘Timotheus, who stands to me in the same relation that you stand in’” Stanley.

in the Lord] points out the spiritual nature of the relationship.

shall remind you] Timothy, by being himself a close imitator of the Christian virtues and teaching of his and their spiritual father, would bring to their minds his well-known character, and way of teaching, which they seemed to have well-nigh forgotten. See 2 Tim. iii. 10.

every where in every church.] To shew the importance of this his manner of teaching, he reminds them of his unvarying practice of it:—and as he was guided by the Spirit, by inference, of its universal necessity in the churches.

18–20.] To guard against misrepresentation of the coming of Timothy just announced, by those who had said and would now the more say, ‘Paul dare not come to Corinth,’ he announces the certainty of his coming, if the Lord will.

shortly] How soon, see ch. xvi. 8. I will “know, i.e. I will inform myself of—not the words of them which are puffed up (those I care not for), but the power: whether they are really mighty in the Spirit, or not. This general reference of power must be kept, and not narrowed to the power of working miracles: or energy in the work of the gospel: he leaves it general and indefinite.

20.] Justification of this his intention, by the very nature of that kingdom of which he was the ambassador.

the kingdom of God, (the kingdom of Heaven, Matt. iii. 2; iv. 17 and passim; of God, Mark i. 15, al.) announced by the prophets, preached by the Lord and the Apostles, being now prepared on earth and received by those who believe on Christ, and to be consummated when He returns with His saints: see Phil. iii, 20, 21; Eph. v. 5.

is not (i. e. does not consist in, has not its conditions and element of existence) in (mere) word, but in power—is a kingdom of power.

21.] He offers them, with a view to their amendment, the alternative: ‘shall his coming be in a judicial or in a friendly spirit?’ as depending on themselves. It is literally, must I come?

with a rod; but not only ‘with,’ as accompanied with: the preposition in the original gives the idea of the element: in which, much as “with glory” not only with a rod, but in such purpose as to use it. He speaks as a father.

the Spirit of meekness] generally explained, a gentle spirit, meaning by the word spirit, his own spirit: but Meyer has remarked, that in every place in the New Test. where spirit is joined with an abstract genitive, it imports the Holy Spirit, and the abstract, genitive refers to the specific working of the Spirit in the case in hand. So the Spirit of truth (John xv. 26; xvi. 13; 1 John iv. 6), of adoption (Rom. viii. 15), of faith (2 Cor. iv. 13), of wisdom (Eph. i. 17), of holiness (Rom. i. 4). There may seem to be exceptions to this; as, e.g. a spirit of weakness, Luke xiii. 11; of bondage, Rom. viii. 15; of slumber, Rom. xi. 8; of fear, 2 Tim. i. 7; of error, 1 John iv. 6. We may indeed say, that in none of these cases is the spirit subjective or the phrase a mere circumlocution; but the spirit is objective, a possessing, indwelling spirit, whether of God or otherwise.

V. 1–18.] CONCERNING A GROSS CASE OF INCEST WHICH HAD ARISEN, AND WAS HARBOURED, AMONG THEM (verses 1–8): AND QUALIFICATION OF A FORMER COMMAND WHICH HE HAD GIVEN THEM RESPECTING ASSOCIATION WITH GROSS SINNERS (9–13). The subject of this chapter is bound on to the foregoing by the question of ch. iv. 21: and it furnishes an instance of those things which required his apostolic discipline.

1.] hath (as wife most probably, not merely as concubine: the word in Such cases universally in the New Test. signifying to possess in marriage: and the words, he that did this deed, ver. 2, and him that hath so done this deed, ver. 3, seem to point to a consummation of marriage, not to mere concubinage) his father’s wife (i. e. his step-mother, see Lev. xviii. 8: the Apostle uses the designation, his father’s wife, to point out the disgrace more plainly. It may seem astonishing that the authorities in the Corinthian church should have allowed such a case to escape them, or if known, should have tolerated it. Perhaps the universal laxity of morals at Corinth may have weakened the severity even of the Christian elders: perhaps as has often been suggested, the offender, if a Jewish convert, might defend his conduct by the Rabbinical maxim that in the case of a proselyte, the forbidden degrees were annulled, a new birth having been undergone by him. This latter however is rendered improbable by the fact that the Apostle says nothing of the woman, which he would have done, had she been a Christian:—and that Jewish maxim was taxed with the condition, that a proselyte might marry any of his or her former relatives, only provided they came over to the Jewish religion. The father was living, and is described in 2 Cor. vii. 12, as “he that suffered wrong;” and from the Apostle saying there that he did not write on his account, he was probably a Christian).

2. ye are puffed up] Not, which would be absurd,—at the occurrence of this crime, nor as Chrysostom and some others fancy, because the offender was a party teacher: but, as before, with a notion of their own wisdom and spiritual perfection: the being puffed up is only a fault which co-existed with this disgrace, not one founded upon it.

and did not rather mourn (viz. when the crime became first known to you), that (your mourning would be because of the existence of the evil, i.e. with a view to its removal) he who did this deed might be removed from among you (viz. by your casting him out from your society).

3–5.] justifies the expression just used, by declaring the judgment which the Apostle, although absent, had already passed on the offender.

3.] I verily, I for my part.. hath so done...] The so may point to some peculiarly offensive method in which he had brought about the marriage, which was known to the Corinthians, but unknown to us. Or we may understand it, ‘under such circumstances,’ ‘being such as he is, a member of Christ’s body.’ But this, being before patent, would hardly be thus emphatically denoted. Perhaps after all, it refers merely to the peculiar heinousness of the kind of offence: compare “such fornication,” in ver. 1.

4.] ‘This sentence stands thus: In the name of our Lord Jesus belongs to the clause to deliver such an one,&c., that which intervenes being parenthetical (when ye have been assembled together and my spirit with the power of our Lord Jesus).

my spirit, i.e. ‘I myself, in spirit, endowed by our Lord Jesus with apostolic power:’ and then the words with the power of our Lord Jesus Christ belong to my spirit, and are not to be taken as indicating a mere element in the assembly. What does the sentence here prescribed import? Not mere excommunication, though it is doubtless included. It was a delegation to the Corinthian church of a special power, reserved to the Apostles themselves, of inflicting corporeal death or disease as a punishment for sin. Of this we have notable examples in the case of Ananias and Sapphira, and Elymas, and another hinted at 1 Tim. i. 20. The congregation itself could expel from among themselves,—but it could not give over to Satan for the destruction of his flesh, without the authorized concurrence of the Apostle’s spirit, with the power of the Lord Jesus Christ. What the destruction of his flesh was to be, does not appear: certainly more than the mere destruction of his pride and lust by repentance, as some suppose: rather, as Chrysostom suggests, “that Satan might afflict him with a malignant ulcer, or other disease.” Estius’s objection to this, that in 2 Cor. ii. and vii. we find no trace of such bodily chastisement is not to the point,—because we have no proof that this delivering to Satan was ever inflicted,—nor does the Apostle command it, but only describes it as his own determination, held as it were in terrorem over the offender. See note on ver. 13.—Observe, destruction of his flesh, the offending element, not of his body. St. Paul could not say this, seeing that the body is to partake of the salvation of the spirit;—but not the flesh, see ch. xv. 50.

5.] The aim of the destruction of the flesh,—which he said, as Chrysostom remarks, “to put bounds to the devil, and not to allow him to advance further.” Thus the proposed punishment, severe as it might seem, would be in reality a merciful one, tending to the eternal happiness of the offender. A greater contrast to this can hardly be conceived, than the terrible forms of excommunication subsequently devised, and even now in use in the Romish church, under the fiction of delegated apostolic power. The delivering to Satan for the destruction of the spirit, can belong only to those who do the work of Satan.

6.] ‘How inconsistent with your harbouring such an one, appear your high flown conceits of yourselves!’

Your glorying: literally, your matter of glorying. Are you not aware that a little leaven imparts a character to the whole lump? That this is the meaning, and not, ‘that a little leaven will, if not purged out, leaven the whole lump,’ is manifest from the point in hand, viz. the inconsistencyistency of their boasting: which would not appear by their danger of corruption hereafter, but by their character being actually lost. One of them was a fornicator of a fearfully depraved kind, tolerated and harbored: by this fact, the character of the whole was tainted.

7.] The old leaven is not the man, but the crime, attaching to their character as a church, which was a remnant of their unconverted state, their “old man.” This they are to purge out from among them. The command alludes to the careful ‘purging out’ from the houses of every thing leavened before the commencement of the feast of unleavened bread.—That ye may be a new lump (opposed to the “old man” of old and dissolute days), as ye are (normally, and by your Christian profession) unleavened (i. e. dead to sin and free from it). This indicating the state by profession the normal state, as a fact, and the grounding of exhortations on it, is common enough with our Apostle,—see Rom. vi. 3, 4: ch. iii. 16, and other places, and involves no tautology here, any more than elsewhere.—An unfortunate interpretation has been given to these words,—as ye are now celebrating the feast of unleavened bread;’ and has met with some recent defenders. See in my Greek Test. the reasons which have led me to decide against this view. I can only say here, that the reference is one wholly alien from the habit and spirit of our Apostle. The ordinances of the old law are to him not points on whose actual observance to ground spiritual lessons, but things passed in, their literal acceptance, and become spiritual verities in Christ. He thus regards the Corinthian church as (normally) the unleavened lump at the Passover; he beseeches them to put away the old leaven from among them, to correspond with this their normal state: for, he adds, it is high time for us to be unleavened in very deed, seeing that our passover was sacrificed (see reff.: and compare Heb. ix. 26, 28), even Christ (the days of unleavened bread began with the Passover-sacrifice): so then let us keep the feast (not the actual Passover, but the continued Passover-feast of Christians on whose behalf Christ has died. There is no change of metaphor: the Corinthians are the living loaves of bread, as believers are the living stones of the spiritual temple), not with (literally, in, as our element) t he old leaven (general—our old unconverted state), neither (particular) with (in, see al ove) the leaven of malice and wickedness (the genitives are of apposition,— ‘the leaven which is vice and wickedness’); but with (in) the unleavened bread (literally, unleavened things, see Exod. xii. 15, 18) of sincerity and truth. 9–18.] Correction of their misunderstanding of a former command of his respecting keeping company with fornicators.

9.] I wrote unto you in my letter (not this present epistle,—for there is nothing in the preceding part of this Epistle which can by any possibility be so interpreted,—certainly not either ver. 2 or ver. 6, which are commonly alleged by those who thus explain it—and “in my epistle” would be a superfluous and irrelevant addition, if he meant the letter on which he was now engaged:—but, a former epistle, which has not come down to us:—compare the similar expression, 2 Cor. vii. 8, used with reference to this epistle,—and see note on 2 Cor. i. 15, 16) not to company with fornicators: 10.] not absolutely limits the prohibition, which perhaps had been complained of owing to its strictness, and the impossibility of complying with it in so dissolute a place as Corinth, and excepts the fornicators of this world, i.e. who are not professing Christians: not under all circumstances with the fornicators of this world.

of this world, belonging to the number of unbelievers,—Christians who were fornicators being expressly excluded. So St. Paul ever uses this expression, ch. iii. 19; (2 Cor. iv. 4;) Eph. ii. 2.

covetous and extortioners are joined by and, as belonging to the same class—that of persons greedy of money.

for then must ye needs go out of the world] i.e. to search for another and purer one.

11. as it is, I wrote unto you] i.e. my meaning was....;—‘but, the case being so, that ye must needs consort with fornicators among the heathen, I wrote to you, not to consort, &c.’—That this is the meaning, and not, as A.V., ‘But now I have written, &c., seems plain; I have given the reasons in my note in the Greek Test. Thus by the right rendering, we escape the awkward inference deducible from the ordinary interpretation,—that the Apostle had previously given a command, and now retracted it.

an idolater] One who from any motive makes a compromise with the habits of the heathen, and partakes in their sacrifices: Chrysostom well remarks, “He introduces by anticipation the subject of things offered to idols, which he is about to treat by and by.” Seeing that no not to eat must imply a more complete separation than not to company, it cannot be applied to the agape, or love-feasts only, but must keep its general meaning,—not even to sit at table with such an one.—This rule, as that in 2 Thess. iii. 15, regards only their private intercourse with the offending person: nothing is here said of public excommunication, though for some of these crimes it would be implied.

12.] Ground of the above limitation. them that are without] It was among the Jews the usual term for the Gentiles. He means, ‘this might have been easily understood to be my meaning: for what concern have I with pronouncing sentence on the world without, or with giving rules of discipline for them? I could only have referred to persons among yourselves. ‘My judgment was meant to lead your judgment. This being the case, what concern had I with those without? Is it not on those within, that your judgments are passed?’

13.] But them that are without GOD judgeth. The present tense expresses the attribute and office of God. ‘To judge those without is God’s matter? These remarks about judging form a transition point to the subject of the next chapter. But having now finished his explanation of the prohibition formerly given, and with it the subject of the fornicator among them, he gives, before passing on, a plain command in terms for the excommunication (but no more: not the punishment mentioned in vv. 3–5) of the offender. And this he does in the very words of Deut. xxiv. 7. The “therefore,” in the A.V., has absolutely no authority in its favour. The “received text” reads “And ye shall put away....:” but all the ancient authorities read as our text.

CHAP. VI. 1–11.] PROHIBITION TO SETTLE THEIR DIFFERENCES IN THE LEGAL COURTS OF THE HEATHEN: RATHER SHOULD THESE BE ADJUDGED AMONG THEMSELVES (1–6): BUT FAR BETTER NOT TO QUARREL—RATHER TO SUFFER WRONG, WAITING FOR JUSTICE TO BE DONE AT THE COMING oF THE LORD, WHEN ALL WHO DO WRONG SHALL BE EXCLUDED FROM HIS KINGDOM (6–11).

1.] Dare: the word appears to be used to note, by so strong an expression, the offended Christian sense of the church. He points at no particular individual, but any one: for he proceeds in the plural, in verses 4, 7. Chrysostom remarks that the Apostle uses the term the unjust, and not. the unbelievers, to put the matter before them in its strongest light, seeing that it was justice of which they were in search in going to law.—The Rabbinical books prohibited the going to law before Gentiles. In adding, and not before the saints, the Apostle does not mean that the Christians had their courts of law, but that they should submit their differences to courts of arbitration among themselves. Such courts of arbitration were common among the Jews.

2.] know ye not (appeals to an axiomatic truth) that the saints shall judge the world?—i. e. as assessors of Christ, at His coming: so Daniel vii. 22; see also Matt. xix. 28. All attempts to elude this plain meaning of the words are futile: whether by understanding that Christians shall condemn the world by their holy lives, or that they would become magistrates and judges in the world. The context shews plainly, that the saints are to be the judges, sitting in judgment.

are ye unworthy of (i. e. to hold or pronounce) the smallest judgments? These judgments are called smallest, in comparison with the weighty judgments which shall be held hereafter: see ver. 4.

3.] The same glorious office of Christians is again referred to, and even a more striking point of contrast brought out.

angels] always, where not otherwise specified, good angels: and therefore here; the “ministering spirits” of Heb. i. 14: but exactly how we shall judge them, is not revealed to us. Chrysostom and most Commentators, interpret, it of bad angels, or of bad and good together.

things that pertain to this life: properly, matters relating to a man's livelihood.—The meaning is, civil causes, matters of mine and thine.

4.] The description of these secular causes is emphatically repeated as being the only sort of judgments which were in question here.—On the possibility of rendering this verse in two ways, see in my Greek Test. The context, and arrangement of words in the original, favour that in our text. The context is this: ‘Your office is to judge angels' mere business causes of this world are almost beneath your notice. If such causes arise among you (he continues in a lofty irony), set those to judge them who are of no account among you:—do not go out of your own number to others to have them judged: the meanest among you is capable of doing it. Let it be noticed that he is passing to ver. 7, where he insists on the impropriety of judgments in this life's matters between Christians at all, and is here depreciating them ironically.

5.] The opening words refer to the ironical command in ver. 4—I say this to put you to shame.

Is there so completely a lack of all wise men among you... He now suggests the more Christian way of settling their differences, viz. by arbitration: and asks, ‘Are you come to this, that you are obliged to set any to judge at all,—have you no wise man among you, who shall be able (in such event) to decide (as arbitrator) between his brethren (literally, his brother: which expression is not without use: it prevents the apparent inference, which might be made if “his brethren” were used, that one wise man was to be appointed universal arbitrator,—and confines the appointment of the arbitrator to each possibly arising case respectively)?

6.] (It seems not to be so): nay, &c., as implied in ver. 1.

7.] He gives his own censure of their going to law at all.

altogether, i.e. without the aggravation of its being before unbelievers.

a fault, literally, a falling short, viz. of your inheritance of the kingdom of God—a hindrance in the way of your salvation: see ver. 9:—not, as ordinarily understood, a moral delinquency.

8.] The YE is emphatic, and the account of it is to be found in an ellipsis after the end of ver. 7, to the effect, ‘as our Lord commanded us His disciples,’ or ‘as it behoves the followers of Christ.’ Then this comes in contrast: You on the contrary do wrong, and defraud, and that (your) brethren.

9.] ‘Ye commit wrong:’ this looks as if you had forgotten the rigid seclusion from the kingdom of God of all wrong-doers of every kind; see Gal. v. 21.

Be not deceived] This caution would be most salutary and needful in a dissolute place like Corinth. It is similarly, and with an express reference to evil communications, ch. xv. The mention of fornicators refers back to ch. v., and is taken up again, verses 12 ff.

drunkards, see on ch. v. 11.

11.] ‘These things were the former state of some among you: but ye are now in a far different state.’ I cannot think with Meyer that such things is used in contempt, such a horde, or rabble: it is rather ‘of such a kind,’ these things, were some of you: but ye washed them off (viz. at your baptism. The verb in the original cannot by any possibility be passive in signification, as it is generally, for doctrinal reasons, here rendered. It regards the fact of their having submitted themselves to Christian baptism. See ref. Acts), but (there is, in the repetition of but, the triumph of one who was under God the instrument of this mighty change) ye were sanctified (not in the doctrinal sense of progressive sanctification, but so that whereas before you were unholy, by the reception of the Holy Ghost you became dedicated to God and holy), but ye were justified (by faith in Christ, you received the “righteousness of God,” Rom. i. 17), in the name of the Lord Jesus, and in the (working of the) Spirit of our God. These two last clauses must not be fancifully assigned amongst the preceding. They belong to all. The spiritual washing in baptism, “the sanctification of the children of God, the justification of the believer, are all wrought in the Name of the Lord Jesus, and are each and all the work of the Spirit ‘of our God.—By the our again, he binds the Corinthians and himself together in the glorious blessings of the gospel-state, and mingles the oil of joy with the mourning which by his reproof’ he is reluctantly creating.

12–20.] CORRECTION OF AN ABUSE OF THE DOCTRINE OF CHRISTIAN FREEDOM WHICH SOME AMONG THEM HAD MADE, THAT, AS MEATS WERE INDIFFERENT, SO WAS FORNICATION (vv. 12–17). STRONG PROHIBITION OF, AND DISSUASIVE FROM THIS SIN (vv. 18–20).

12.] Statement of the true doctrine of Christian freedom

All things are lawful unto me are the bona fide words of the Apostle himself, not, as some have understood them, the saying of an opponent cited by him. For (1) the sentiment is a true Christian axiom: all things being of course understood, as it evidently was even by the abusers of the doctrine, of things (supposed by them) indifferent. (2) It is not introduced by any clause indicative of its being the saying of another, which is St. Paul’s habit in such cases, see Rom. xi. 19. (3) The Apostle does not either deny or qualify the lawfulness, but takes up the matter from another point of view, the expediency. The “me” is spoken in the person of Christians generally. So also in ver. 15, ch. vii. 7, viii. 13, x. 23, 29, 30, xiv.

11. not all things are expedient, or advantageous—in the most general sense: distinguished from “are edifying,” ch. x. 23, where the words again occur. The assertion is equivalent to I will not be deprived of my freedom by any practice;—i. e. indulge in any practice which shall mar this liberty and render it no real freedom, making me to be one under power, instead of one exercising it.

13, 14.] The argument is,—meats (of which he doubtless had often impressed on them that t hey were indifferent, whence the abuse) are expressly created for the belly, and the belly for them, by its organization being fitted to assimilate them; and both these are of a transitory nature: in the change to the more perfect state, God will do away with both. Therefore meats are indifferent. But neither is the body created for fornication nor can this transitoriness be predicated of it: the body is for the Lord, and the Lord (in His mediatorial work) for the body: and God raised up the Lord, and will raise up us (i. e. our bodies): so that, the body is not perishable, and (resumed ver. 18) he that fornicates, sins against his own body. THEREFORE, fornication is not an indifferent thing. It is very remarkable how these verses contain the germ of three weighty sections of the Epistle about to follow, and doubtless in the Apostle’s mind when he wrote them, (1) the relation between the sexes: (2) the question of meats offered to idols: (3) the doctrine of the Resurrection of the Body.

13.] The belly is the appointed receptacle for meats—they, its appointed nourishment.

God shall destroy...] viz. at the appearing of the Lord: when, ch. xv. 51, 52, we shall be changed from a spiritual body, to be a natural body: not, at death. But, on the other hand, the body was not made for the practice of fornication. The reciprocal subserviency of the belly and meats is shewn by their coextensiveness in duration, and perishing together: but when fornication (and even that lawful use which is physical the same, but which is not ere contemplated) shall have for ever passed away, the body shall be subserving its real use—that of being an instrument for the Lord’s work.

and the Lord for the body] not, only for the body; but for the body; to sanctify our bodies by His Spirit, and finally to glorify them for Himself, see Rom. viii. 11. This final reference must not be excluded here, though it is not the principal thought:—rather the redemption of the body from sin, and making it into a member of Himself by the Spirit.

14.] So far from the case of the Lord and the body answering to the other, God raised up the Lord (Rom. viii. 11), and will raise us up too by His Power.

15.] Resumption of the fact that the body is for the Lord, and the Lord for the body. The two are so intimately connected, that the Lord is a mystical Body, of which our bodies, parts of ourselves in our perfect organization, are members. This Christian axiom is introduced as before by Know ye not that... (literally) Having then (i. e. granted that my body is a member, and my members are members of Christ) alienated (or taken away). This word is not merely superfluous, ‘Shall I take... and make them...,’ as A.V.) Christ’s members (i. e. my own members), shall I make them an harlot’s members?—The expression is put as coarsely and startlingly as possible, with the emphasis on the word harlot’s.

16.] Explanation and justification of the expression, members of an harlot. As if he had said, “Do you think the expression ‘make them members of an harlot’ too strong?”

one body, viz. ‘with her.’ The full construction would be “that he which is joined to an harlot, and the harlot, are one body. but he is here bringing out the criminality of the fornicator and leaves the other out of view.—The citation is spoken of marriage; but here as above (see on ver. 13) he is treating merely of the physical union, which is the same in both cases.

saith he, viz. GOD, who is the speaker in the Scriptures so in citing the same words, our Lord gives them to “Him that made them from the beginning,” Matt. xix. 5. They were spoken by the mouth of Adam, but prophetically, under God’s inspiration. The words they two are not in the Hebrew, but in the Septuagint and the Samaritan Pentateuch, and are found in the Rabbinical citations of the passage. See note on Matt. xix. 5.

17.] Union to God, His service, His ways, is often expressed by this word (joined or attached in the Septuagint, but here that inner union with Christ in spirit is meant, and of which is the normal state of every believer, and of which it may be said that he is one spirit with Christ. See John xvii. 21, and the parable of John xv. 1–7. Meyer rightly remarks, that the mystical marriage between Christ and His Church must not be pressed here, as the relations of the compared are not correspondent. Still however, the inner verity of that mystical relation is the ground of both passages.

18–20.] Direct prohibition of fornication, and its grounds.

18.] Flee might be followed by therefore, but is more forcible in this disconnected form.

Every sin...] The assertion, which has surprised many of the Commentators, is nevertheless strictly true. Drunkenness and gluttony, e.g. are sins done in and by the body, and are sins by abuse of the body. but they are still outside the body,—introduced from without, sinful not in their act, but in their effect, which effect it is each man’s duty to foresee and avoid. But fornication is the alienating that body which is the Lord’s, and making it a harlot’s body—it is sin against a man’s own body, in its very nature,—against the verity and nature of his body; not an effect on the body from participation of things without, but a contradiction of the truth of the body, wrought within itself. When man and wife are one in the Lord,—united by His ordinance,—no such alienation of the body takes place, and consequently no sin, 19.] Justification of the assertion next preceding,—and this by an amplification of the principles above laid down.

your body (i. e. the body of each man among you, but put singular, to keep, as in ch. iii. 16, the unity of the idea of God’s temple, or perhaps because the body in its attributes is in question here) is the temple of (possessed by, as His residence the Holy Spirit which is in you (reminiscence of the reality of His indwelling), which ye have from God (reminiscence whose Spirit He is, and so preparation for the following inference), and are not your own (so that ye have no right to alienate your body, not being yours).

20.] Proof, that ye are not your own. The possession of your body as His temple, by the Holy Ghost, is a presumptive proof that ye are not; but there is also a proof in matter of fact: For ye were bought (not, as A.V., are bought, which destroys the historic reference) with a price (viz. the blood of Christ, see 1 Pet. i. 18, 19; Matt. xx. 28; Gal. iii. 18. This buying is here mentioned mainly with reference to the right of possession, which Christ has thereby acquired in us. In other places it is alleged as a freeing from other services: e.g. that of sin [Rom. vi. 17, 18], of the law and its curse [Gal. iii] of Satan [Col. i. 13]):

glorify therefore God (i. e. not praise God, but glorify Him by your acts) in your body (not, by means of your body, but in your body, as the temple of God; see John xiii. 32). The words “and in your spirit, which are God’s,” added in the A.V., are wanting in almost all our earliest authorities.

1 Corinthians: Chapter 7

CHAP. VII. 1–40.] REPLY TO THEIR ENQUIRIES RESPECTING MARRIAGE; BY WHICH OCCASION IS GIVEN FOR VARIOUS COLLATERAL INSTRUCTIONS AND COMMANDS In order to the right understanding of this chapter, it will be well to remember, that the enquiries in the letter of the Corinthians appear to have been made in disparagement of marriage, and to have brought into doubt whether it were not better to avoid it where uncontracted, and break it off where contracted, or this last at all events where one of the parties was an unbeliever. These questions he answers, vv. 1–16: and puts on their true grounds, vv. 17–24. They appear also to have asked respecting virgins, what was their duty, and that of their parents, as to their contracting marriage. This he discusses its various aspects of duty and Christian expediency, vv. 25–38. Then he concludes with an answer and advice, respecting the liberty of a woman to marry after the death of her husband.—The whole is written under the strong impression (see on this,-notes, Acts ii. 20; Rom. xiii. 11, and 2 Cor. v.: and Introd. to 1 Thess. §iv. 5–10) of the near approach of the end of this state of things (vv. 29–31), and as advising them under circumstances in which persecution, and family division for the Gospel’s sake, might at any time break up the relations of life. The precepts therefore and recommendations contained in the chapter are to be weighed, as those in ch. viii. al., with reference to change of circumstances; and the meaning of God’s Spirit in them with respect to the subsequent ages of the Church, to be sought by careful comparison and inference, not rashly assumed and misapplid.—I may also premise, that in hardly any portion of the Epistles has the hand of correctors and interpolators of the text been busier, than here. The absence of all ascetic tendency from the Apostle's advice, on the point where asceticism was busiest and most mischievous was too strong a testimony against it, to be left in its original clearness.

1, 2.] Concession of the expediency (where possible) of celibacy, but assertion of the practical necessity of marriage, as a remedy against fornication.

good] not morally good: for in ver. 28 expressly not sin, but inexpediency, is the reason for not marrying: nor good in the sense of more excellent, as Jerome, saying, "if it is good not to touch a woman, it is therefore evil to touch one:" but expedient, generally: 'more for a man's best interests under present circumstances:' as we say in English, 'it is the best way,' in the colloquial sense: so also throughout the chapter: see the word qualified, ver. 26, by the addition of "on account of the present necessity." This assertion is obviously here made in the widest sense, without present regard to the difference between the lawful and unlawful use of the woman. The idea that the assertion applies to abstinence from intercourse in the already married (see again below), is altogether a mistake.

2.] The former course is expedient—would avoid much 'trouble in the flesh: but as a general rule it may not be, seeing that for a more weighty reason the contrary course is to be recommended.—But on account of [the] fornications (the many instances of fornication current), let each man have his own wife, and let each woman have her own husband. The saying is not concessive, but imperative; not, "may have," but "must have." So the other expressions, "let them marry," ver. 9, "let her remain," ver. 11, &c. With regard to the idea of some, that the Apostle here gives a very low estimate of marriage, as solely a remedy against fornication\the true answer is, that St. Paul does not either here, or in this chapter at all, give any estimate of marriage in the abstract. His estimate, when he does, is to be found Eph. v. 25–32.

3, 4.] The duty of cohabitation incumbent on the married. This point was in all probability raised in the letter of the Corinthians 'The Apostle's command is a legitimate following out of the reason, because of fornications, above.'

3. her due] This is the reading of all our most ancient. MSS.:—the physical duty of a husband.

4.] The ground of this being another's while they remain their own, is to be found in the oneness of body, in which the marriage state places them.

5.] in order that ye may have undisturbed leisure for prayer. The original (see in my Greek Test.) shews that the prayer meant is not ordinary, but extraordinary,—seasons of urgent supplication.—The addition, in the received text, of the words "fasting and," shews how such passages as this have been tampered with by the ascetics. The words are wanting in all our principal oldest authorities.

may be together, not "come together," as it has been amended, because to be together in this sense is the normal state of the married. The sense is,—the aim of the temporary separation is not that you may keep apart, but for a certain end, and then that you may be united again.

in order that Satan tempt you not] Purpose of the re-union stated, by that which might happen did it not take place: viz. that a temptation might arise, to fulfil the natural desires in an unlawful manner.

6.] But this I say by way of allowance (for you), not by way of command.

this refers, as the context (ver. 7) shews, to the whole recommendation given in ver. 5. This recommendation all depended on the possibility of their being tempted by incontinence he gives it not then as a command in all cases, but as an allowance for those to whom he was writing, whom he knew, and assumes, to be thus tempted. The meaning 'by permission, A.V., is ambiguous appearing as if it meant by permission of the Lord (to say it).

7. as I myself] viz. in a state of continence: see below on ver. 8. What follows is said in the most general way, as a milder expression of 'all have not the gift of continence.'

after this manner... after that] both are said generally, not one in the way in which I have it of continence another in the way of marrying (i. e. though he have not this, and be therefore better married, yet has some other).

8, 9.] Advice to the unmarried, that it is best so to remain, but better to marry than be inflamed with lust.

8.] the unmarried, of both sexes: not as usually interpreted, widowers, or unmarried males alone: this is shewn by the contrasted term, "the married," which embraces (see vv. 10, 11) both sexes.

and to the widows may be added as singling out widows especially;—or more probably, because “the unmarried” would naturally be taken as those who never were married, and thus widows would not be understood to be included, It is good for them, i.e. ‘it is their best way.’ see on ver. 1.

even as I] i.e. unmarried. This brings the Apostle’s own circumstances more clearly before us than ver. 7, which might be misunderstood: and there can be little doubt from this, that he never was married. There is a passage of Clement of Alexandria which says that St. Paul in a certain epistle addressed “his yokefellow, whom he did not carry about with him on grounds expedient for his ministry.” But the words “true yokefellow,” Phil. iv. 3, certainly have no reference to a wife: see note there.

9.] it is better to marry than to burn, i.e. “than to be wasted by the hidden flame of lust in the conscience.” Augustine.

10, 11.] Prohibition of separation after marriage; or, in case of separation, of another marriage. These married persons, as the unmarried and widows above, are all Christians. The case of mixed marriages he treats ver. 12 ff. They are those already married.

10. not I, but the Lord] Ordinarily, the Apostle (I) writes, commands, gives his advice, under conscious inspiration of the Holy Spirit of God. See ver. 40. He claims expressly, ch. xiv. 37, that the things “which I write unto you” should be recognized as “the Lord’s commandment.” But here he is about to give them a command resting, not merely on inspired apostolic authority, great and undoubted as that was, but on that of THE LORD HIMSELF. So that all supposed distinction between the Apostle’s own writing of himself and of the Lord, is quite irrelevant. He never wrote of himself, being a vessel of the Holy Ghost, who ever spoke by him to the church. The distinction between that which is imperative, and that which is optional, that which is more and that which is less weighty in his writings, is to be made by the cautious and believing Christian, from a wise appreciation of the subject-matter, and of the circumstances under which it was written. ALL is the outpouring of the Spirit, but not all for all time, nor all on the primary truths of the faith.—Not I, but the Lord, viz. in the reff. especially Matt. See also in Mark, where the woman’s part is brought out. That it occupies the principal place here, is perhaps because the Christian women at Corinth may have been the most ready to make the separation: or perhaps, because the woman, from her place in the matrimonial union, may be more properly said to be separated from the man, than the man to be separated from the woman.

be separated, whether by formal divorce or otherwise; the “let her be reconciled” below, is like this, an absolute passive; undefined whether by her own or her husband’s doing.

11.] The former part of the verse, as far as “husband,” is parenthetical. It supposes a case of actual separation, contrary of course to Christ’s command: if such have really taken place, the additional sin of a new marriage (Matt. v. 32) must not be committed, but the breach healed as soon as possible.

and that the husband leave not his wife] The Apostle does not add the qualification “except for the cause of fornication,” found in Matt. v. 32 (xix. 9), but not in Mark x. 11 or Luke xvi. 18. But we cannot hence infer that he was not aware of it. The rule, not the exception, here was in his mind: and after what had been before said on the subject of fornication, the latter would be understood as a matter of course.

12–16.] Directions for such Christians as were already married to Heathens. Such a circumstance must not be in itself a ground of separation,—and why: but if the unbelieving party wish to break off the union, let it be so.

12.] to the rest, perhaps in respect of their letter of enquiry—the only ones not yet dealt with. At all events, the meaning is plain, being those who are involved in mixed marriages with unbelievers.

I, not the Lord, i.e. I Paul, in my apostolic office, under the authority of the Holy Spirit (see above on ver. 10), not the Lord, i.e. not Christ by any direct command spoken by Him: it was a question with which HE did not deal, in His recorded discourses. The contentment of the wife also, presupposes his own wish to continue united.

13.] Meyer remarks, that the Apostle uses the general term leave here, of both parties, the husband and wife, not “put away” (as Matt. v. 31, &c.), which would apply only to the husband. In the A.V. this identity of terms is unfortunately neglected. The same word, leave, or part from, would well have expressed both cases.—By the Greek as well as Roman customs, the wife had the power of effecting a divorce. At Athens,—when the divorce originated with the wife, she was said to leave the house of her husband: when with the husband to be sent away. At Rome, the only exception to the wife’s liberty of effecting a divorce appears to have been in the case of a freedwoman who had married her patronus. Olshausen thinks that St. Paul puts both alternatives, because he regards the Christian party as the superior one in the marriage. But, as Meyer remarks, this would be inconsistent with the fundamental law of marriage, Gen 16, and with the Apostle’s own view of it, ch. xi. 3, xv. 34; Eph. v. 22; 1 Tim. ii. 11, 12.

is sanctified] The meaning will best be apprehended by remembering (1) that holiness, under the Gospel, answers to dedication to God under the law; (2) that the sanctified under the Gospel are the body of Christian men, dedicated to God, and thus become His in a peculiar manner: (3) that this being so, things belonging to, relatives inseparably connected with, the people of God, are said to be hallowed by their holiness: not holy in themselves, but sanctified, i.e. included in the holiness of the faithful relative. Chrysostom well shews the distinction between this case and that in ch. vi. 15, that being an impious connexion,—in and under the condition of the very state, in which the other party is impure: whereas this is a connexion according to a pure and holy ordinance, by virtue of which, although the physical unity in both cases is the same, the purity overbears the impurity.

in the wife... in the brother] in, i.e. his or her sanctity is situated in, rests in, the other.

are] not would be, nor were, as A.V., but present: because the supposed case is assumed and the ind. pres. used of what has place on its assumption.

holy] as above: holy to the Lord. On this fact, Christian children being holy, the argument is built. This being so,—they being hallowed, because the children of Christians,—it follows that that union out of which they sprung, must as such have the same hallowed character; i.e. that the insanity of the one parent is in it overborne by the sanctity of the other. The fact of the children of Christians, God's spiritual people, being holy, is tacitly assumed as a matter of course, from the precedent of God's ancient covenant people.—With regard to the bearing of this verse on the subject of Infant Baptism,—it seems to me to have none, further than this: that it establishes the so far, between Christian and Jewish children, as to shew, that if the initiatory rite of the old covenant was administered to the one,—that of the new covenant, in so far as it was regarded as corresponding to circumcision would probably as a matter of course be administered to the other. Those who deny any such inference, forget, as it seems to me, that it is not personal holiness which is here predicated of the children, any more than of the unbelieving husband or wife, but holiness of dedication, by strict dependence on one dedicated. Notwithstanding this holiness, the Christian child is individually born in sin and a child of wrath; and individually needs the washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost, just as much as the Jewish child needed the typical purifying of circumcision and the sacrificial atonements of the law. So that in this holiness of the Christian child, there is nothing inconsistent with the idea, nor with the practice, of Infant Baptism.

is not put under bondage] i.e. the same necessity does not exist when a believer is joined to an unbeliever as when believers are joined. In this latter case, to abide in the union is imperative; in the other, if the unbeliever wishes to dissolve the union, it may be dissolved.

in peace] Not the same as “to peace” (A. V.), but signifying the moral element in which we are called to be: see ver. 22 below.—The meaning is, “let the unbeliever depart, rather than by attempting to retain the union, endanger that peace of household and peace of spirit, which is part of the calling of a Christian.”—Observe, (1) that there is no contradiction in this license of breaking off such a marriage, to the command of our Lord in Matt. v. 32,—because the Apostle expressly asserts, ver. 12, that our Lord's words do not apply to such marriages as are here contemplated. They were spoken to those within the covenant, and as such apply immediately to the wedlock of Christians (ver. 10), but not to mixed marriages. (2) That the question of re-marrying after such a separation, is here left open: on this, see note on Matt. v. 32. (3) That not a word here said can be so strained as to imply any license to contract marriages with unbelievers. Only those already contracted are dealt with: the being unequally yoked with unbelievers is expressly forbidden, 2 Cor. vi. 14, and by implication below, ver. 39.

16.] This verse is generally understood as a ground for remaining united, as ver. 13, in hope that conversion of the unbelieving party may follow, thus ver. 15 is regarded altogether parenthetical. But (1) this interpretation is harsh as regards the context, for ver. 15 is evidently not parenthetical,—and (2) (see my Greek Test.) it is hardly grammatically admissible. The fact is, that the verse is not a ground for remaining united, in hope, &c.,—but a ground for consummating a separation, and not marring the Christian's peace for so uncertain a prospect as that of converting the unbelieving party. The question thus preserves its strict sense, How knowest thou (about the question) whether....? and the verse coheres with the words immediately preceding, “God hath called us in peace.” The meaning then of the verse will be as follows: (Let the unbeliever depart: hazard not for an uncertainty the peace in which you ought to be living as Christians:) for what assurance hast thou, O wife, whether thou shalt be the means of thy husband's conversion? Or what assurance hast thou, O husband, whether thou shalt be the means of thy wife's conversion? “This interpretation is the only one compatible with the obvious sense of ver. 15, and of the expression how knowest: thou whether thou shalt save; and is also in exact harmony with the general tenor of the Apostle's argument, which is not to urge a union, but to tolerate a separation Stanley; the rest of whose note is deeply interesting as to the historical influence of the verse as commonly misunderstood.

17.] Only takes an exception, by way of caution, to the foregoing motive for not remaining together (ver. 16). The Christian partner might carry that motive too far, and be tempted by it to break the connexion on his own part; a course already prohibited (verses 12–14). Therefore the Apostle adds, Only (only be careful not to make this a ground for yourselves causing the separation) as to each the Lord distributed [his lot], as God has called each, so (in that state, without change) let him walk.

so ordain I...] “he says this to make them readier to obey, by all being included under the command.” Theophylact.

18–24.] Examples of the precept just given.

18–20.] First example: CIRCUMCISION.

18.] Was any one called [being] circumcised, i.e. at the time of his conversion.

become uncircumcised] By a surgical operation; see 1 Macc. i. 15. The practice usually was adopted by those who wished to appear like the Gentiles, and to cast off their ancient faith and habits. Among the Christians a strong anti-Judaistic feeling might lead to it.

19.] See Gal. v. 6, where our keeping of the commandments of God is expressed by “faith working by love,” and Gal. vi. 15, where it is given by “a new creature” (or “creation”). See an interesting note in Stanley’s “Epistles to the Corinthians,” on the relation of these three descriptions. After God supply, as in our text, [in every thing]: see a similar construction in ch. iii. 7.

20.] Formal repetition of the general precept, as again ver. 24. calling does not mean calling in life, but strictly calling (‘vocation’) by God. The calling of a circumcised person would be a calling in circumcision, and by this he was to abide.

21–24.] Second example: SLAVERY. Wast thou called (converted) being a slave? care not for it: nay even if thou canst be made free, use it (i. e. remain in slavery) rather. ‘This rendering, which is that of all the ancient commentators, is absolutely required by the words in the original: see in my Greek Test. It is also required by the context: for the burden of the whole passage is, ‘Let each man remain in the state in which he was called’ The other interpretation,—mentioned by Chrysostom and given by Erasmus and Luther, Beza, Calvin, Grotinus, and almost all the moderns, understands it to mean liberty:—“but if thou art able to become free, take advantage of it rather” The objections to this, besides that it is grammatically inadmissible as a rendering of the original, are:—(1) Its utter inconsistency with the general context. The Apostle would thus be giving two examples of the precept,—“let each abide in the same calling wherein he was called,” one of which would convey a recommendation of the contrary course. This is well followed out in Chrysostom. (2) Its entire contradiction to ver. 22: see below. (3) It would be quite inconsistent with the teaching of the Apostle,—that in Christ (Gal. iii. 28) freeman and slave are all one,—and with his remarks on the urgency and shortness of the time in this chapter (ver. 29 ff.), —to turn out of his way to give a precept merely of worldly wisdom, that a slave should become free if he could. (4) The import of the verb rendered “use it,” in such a connexion, which suits better the remaining in, enduring, labouring under, giving one’s self up to, an already-existing state, than the adopting or taking advantage of a new one.

22.] Ground of the above precept. For the slave who was called in the Lord (not as A.V., ‘He who is called in the Lord being a slave.’ in the Lord: as the element which what is about to be stated takes place) is the Lord’s freed man. The Lord’s freed man is not here in the ordinary Roman sense ‘the Lord’s manumitted slave:’ for the former master was sin or the devil, see on ch. vi. 20;—but only, a freed man belonging to Christ, viz. freed by Christ from the service of another. This the reader would understand as a matter of course: in like manner he that was called, being free (not the freeman being called), is the slave of Christ. Christ’s service is perfect freedom, and the Christian’s freedom is the service of Christ. But here the Apostle takes, in each case, one member of this double antithesis from the outer world, one from the spiritual. The (actual) slave is (spiritually) free: the (actually) free is a (spiritual) slave. So that the two are so mingled, in the Lord, that the slave need not trouble himself about his slavery, nor seek for this world’s freedom, seeing he has a more glorious freedom in Christ, and seeing also that his brethren who seem to be free in this world are in fact Christ’s servants, as he is a servant. It will be plain that the reason given in this verse is quite inconsistent with the prevalent modern rendering of ver. 21.

23.] Following out of the idea, the slave of Christ, by reminding them of the PRICE PAID whereby Christ PURCHASED them for His (eh. vi. 20): and precept thereupon, BECOME NOT SLAVES OF MEN: i.e. ‘do not allow your relations to human society, whether of freedom or slavery, to bring you into bondage so as to cause you anxiety to change the one or increase the other.’ Chrysostom and others think the precept directed against eye-service, and general regard to men’s opinion. But it is better to restrict it (however it may legitimately be applied generally) to the case in hand. Others understand it as addressed to the free, and meaning that they are not to sell themselves into slavery: but this is evidently wrong: as may be seen by the change to the second person plural as addressing all his readers: besides that a new example would have been marked as in vv. 18, 21. See Stanley's note.

24.] The rule is again repeated, but with the addition with God, reminding them of the relations of Christ's freed man and Christ's slave, and of the price paid just mentioned: of that relation to God in which they stood by means of their Christian calling.

25–38.] Advice (with some digressions connected with the subject) concerning the MARRIAGE OF VIRGINS.

25.] virgins is not to be understood unmarried persons of both sexes, a meaning which, though apparently found in Rev. xiv. 4 (see note there), is perfectly unnecessary here, and appears to have been introduced from a mistaken view of vv. 26–28. The emphasis is on commandment—command of the Lord have I none, i.e., no expressed precept; so that, as before, there is no marked comparison between "the Lord," and "I."

to be faithful, i.e., as a steward and dispenser of the hidden things of God, and, among them, of such directions as you cannot make for yourselves, but require one so entrusted to impart to you. This sense, which has occurred in the estimate given of himself in this very Epistle, is better than the more general ones of true or believing.

26.] The question of the marriage of virgins is one involving the expediency of contracting marriage in general: this he deals with now, on grounds connected with the then pressing necessity.

then follows on 'I give my judgment,' and introduces the "judgment."

this indicates what is coming, viz. "so to be." good, see note on 1: the best way.

the present (or instant) necessity: viz. that prophesied by the Lord, Matt. xxiv. 8, 21, &c.: which shall precede His coming: see especially verr. 19 there: not, the cares of marriage, as Theophylact, and others, nor persecutions, as Photius, which are only a part of the apprehended troubles. These the Apostle regards as instant, already begun: for this is the meaning, not imminent shortly to come. See note on 2 Thess. ii, 2, where this distinction is very important.

so to be] how? "Even as I," in ver. 8? perhaps better, as he is: on account of the following context, ver. 27. This, in the case of the unmarried, would amount to the other: and the case of virgins is now that especially under consideration.

27.] The expression, so to be, re-stated and illustrated: neither the married nor the unmarried are to seek for a change. 'The general recommendation here is referable alike to all cases of marriage, and does not touch on the prohibition of ver. 10, —only dissuading from a spirit of change in consideration of the instant necessity. It seems better to take the verse thus, than to regard it as inserted to guard against misunderstanding of the preceding judgment of the Apostle.

Art thou loosed? does not imply previous marriage, but describes all those who are not bound by the marriage tie, whether previously married or not.

28.] Not sin, but outward trouble, will be incurred by contracting marriage, whether in the case of the unmarried man or of the virgin; and it is to spare them this, that he gives his advice. The literal rendering is,—But if also thou shalt have married, thou didst not sin (viz. when thou marriedst); and if a virgin shall have married, she sinned not; but such persons, viz. they who have married, shall have tribulation in the flesh: but I (emphatic, my motive is) am sparing you (endeavoring to spare you this trouble in the flesh by advising you to keep single).

29–31.] He enforces the foregoing advice by solemnly reminding them of the shortness of the time, and the consequent duty of sitting loose to all worldly ties and employments.

29. this I say...] 'What I just now said, of marrying being no sin, might dispose you to look on the whole matter as indifferent: my motive, the sparing you outward affliction, may be underrated in the importance of its bearing: but I will add this solemn consideration? the time henceforth is shortened, i.e., the time that remains is short: the interval between now and the coming of the Lord has arrived at an extremely contracted period. These words have been variously misunderstood. (1) The time has been by Calvin, Mstius, and others, interpreted 'the space of man's life on earth: which, however true it may be, and however legitimate this application of the Apostle's words, certainly was not in his mind, nor is it consistent with his usage of the word: see Rom. xiii. 11; Eph. v. 16,—or with that of the great prophecy of our Lord which is the key to this chapter, Luke xxi, 8; Mark xiii. 33. (2) The word which we render shortened has been understood as meaning calamitous. But it never has this signification. (3) The word henceforth has been by some (e. g. in A.V., so also Tertullian, Jerome, the Vulgate, Luther, Calvin, and others) joined to what follows: ‘it remains that both they, &c.

But usage is against this, and the continuity of the passage would be very harshly broken; whereas by the other rendering all proceeds naturally. See more in my Greek Test.

in order that...] The end for which the time has been (by God) thus gathered up into a short compass: in order that both they, &c.: i.e. in order that Christians, those who wait for and shall inherit the coming kingdom, may keep themselves loose in heart from worldly relationships and employments: that the married may not fetter his interests to his wedlock, nor the mourner to his misfortunes nor the joyous to his prosperity, nor the man of commerce to his gain, nor the user of the world to his use of the world. We may notice that according to this only right view of the sense, the clauses following are not precepts of the Apostle, but the objects, as regards us, of the divine counsel in shortening the time.

31. using it to the full] The word in the original appears here to imply that intense and greedy use which turns the legitimate use into a fault. This meaning is better than ‘abuse’ (A. V.), which is allowable, and is adopted by many. The end of the verse gives a reason for the assertion that the time is short; the clauses which have intervened being subordinate to those words: see above.

for the fashion (meaning not mode, or habit, but present external form. So in Phil. ii. 8, ‘being found in fashion as a man’) of this world is passing away (is in the act of being changed, as a passing scene in a play.—This shews that the time is short:—the form of this world is already beginning to pass away. Stanley compares a remarkable parallel, 2 Esdr. xvi. 40–44, probably copied from this passage).

32–34.] Application of what has been just said to the question of marriage.

32.] But (i. e. since this is so—since the time is so short, and that, in order that we Christians may sit loose to the world) I wish you to be without worldly cares (undistracted). Then he explains how this touches on the subject.

34.] The literal rendering is—Divided also is the (married) woman and the virgin, divided in interest [i. e. in cares and pursuits] from one another: not merely, different from one another as would seem at first sight from the words of the text. On the question arising from different readings, see my Greek ‘Test—The judgment of marriage here pronounced by the Apostle must be taken, as the rest of the chapter, with its accompanying conditions. He is speaking of a pressing and quickly shortening period, which he regards as yet remaining before that day and hour of which neither he, nor any man knew. He wishes his Corinthians, during that short time, to be as far as possible totally undistracted. He mentions as an objection to marriage, that which is an undoubted fact of human experience:—which is necessarily bound up with that relation; and without which the duties of the relation could not be fulfilled. Since he wrote, the unfolding of God’s Providence has taught us more of the interval before the coming of the Lord than it was given even to an inspired Apostle to see. And as it would be perfectly reasonable and proper to urge on an apparently dying man the duty of abstaining from contracting new worldly obligations,—but both unreasonable and improper, should the same person recover his health, to insist on this abstinence any longer; so now, when God has manifested His will that nations should rise up and live and decay, and long centuries elapse before the day of the coming of Christ, it would be manifestly unreasonable to urge,—except in so far as every man’s time is getting shorter and shorter, and similar arguments are applicable,—the considerations here enforced. Meanwhile they stand here on the sacred page as a lesson to us how to regard, though in circumstances somewhat changed, our worldly relations: and to teach us, as the coming of the Lord may be as near now, as the Apostle then believed it to be, to act at least in the spirit of his advice, and be, as far as God’s manifest will that we should enter into the relations and affairs of life allows, without distraction. The duty of ver. 35 is incumbent on all Christians, at all periods.

35.] Caution against mistaking what has been said for an imperative order, whereas it was only a suggestion for their best interest.

this] viz. verses 32–34. for your own (emphatic) profit, i.e. not for my own purposes—not to exercise my apostolic authority: not that I may cast a snare (lit. ‘a noose;’ the metaphor is from throwing the noose in hunting or in war) over you (i. e. entangle and encumber you with difficult precepts), but with a view to seemliness (compare Rom. xiii. 13), and waiting upon the Lord without distraction. Stanley draws out the parallel to the story in Luke x. 39–42: Mary sitting by the feet of Jesus, while Martha was cumbered with much serving, and careful about many things: the very words used in the original there being almost the same as here.

36–38.] For seemliness’ sake: and consequently, if there be danger, by a father withholding his consent to his daughter’s marriage, of unseemly treatment of her, let an exception be made in that case: but otherwise, if there be no such danger, it is better not to give her in marriage.—But (introduces an inconsistency with what is seemly) if any one (any father) thinks that he is behaving unseemly towards his virgin daughter (viz “in setting before her a temptation to sin with her lover, or at least, bringing on her the imputation of it, by withholding his consent to her marriage), if she be of full age (for before that the imputation and the danger consequent on preventing the marriage would not be such as to bring in the unseemliness. Or the reference may be to the supposed disgrace of having a grown-up unmarried daughter in his house. See Stanley's note, and compare Eccles xii. 9.—and thus it must be (i. e. and there is help for it, they are bent on it beyond the power of dissuasion. Thus, viz., that they

what he will (as his determination on this thought of his) let him do, he sinneth not (for there is no sin in marriage): let them (his daughter and her lover) marry.

37.] But he who stands firm in his heart i.e. his purpose,—having no such misgiving that he is behaving unseemly), not involved in any necessity (no urgent circumstances as in the other case; no determination to marry on the part of his daughter, nor attachment formed), but has liberty of action respecting his personal wish (to keep his daughter unmarried), and has determined this in his own (his own, as it is a matter of private determination only) heart (determined this: it is not stated what, but is understood by the reader to mean, the keeping his daughter unmarried) to keep (in her present state) his own virgin daughter, shall do well. 39, 40.] Concerning second marriages of women.

39. is bound] viz. to her husband, or perhaps absolutely, is bound, in her marriage state.

only in the Lord, i.e. within the limits of Christian connexion—in the element in which all Christians live and walk;—‘let her marry a Christian?’

40. she is more blessed] Not merely happier, in our merely social secular sense: but, including this, happier, partly by freedom from the attendant trials of the “present necessity,”—but principally for the reason mentioned verse 34. “To higher blessedness in heaven, which became attached to celibacy afterwards in the views of its defenders, there is no allusion here” Meyer.

and I think] This is modestly said, implying more than is expressed by it,—not as if there were any uncertainty in his mind. It gives us the true meaning of the saying that he is giving his opinion, as ver. viz. not that he is speaking without inspiration, but that in the consciousness of inspiration he is giving that counsel which should determine the question.

I also] ‘as well as other teachers.’ Whether said with a general or particular reference, we cannot tell, from not being sufficiently acquainted with the circumstances.

1 Corinthians: Chapter 8

VIII. 1—XI. 1.] ON THE PARTAKING OF MEATS OFFERED TO IDOLS, AND ASSISTING AT FEASTS HELD IN HONOUR OF IDOLS.

CHAP. VIII. 1–13.] Though (vv. 1–6) for those who are strong in the faith, an idol having no existence, the question has no importance, this is not so with all (ver. 2); and the infirmities of the weak must in such a matter be regarded in our conduct (vv. 8–13).

1.] The things sacrificed to idols were those portions of the animals offered in sacrifice which were not laid on the altar, and which belonged partly to the priests, partly to those who had offered them. These remnants were sometimes eaten at feasts held in the temples (see ver. 10), or in private houses (ch. x. 27 f.), sometimes sold in the markets, by the priests, or by the poor, or by the niggardly. Theophrastus describes it as characteristic of an illiberal man, that when giving his daughter in marriage he sells those portions of the victim which were over after the sacrifice. ‘They were sometimes also reserved for future use. ‘Theophrastus mentions it as belonging to the shameless man, that when he has offered a sacrifice to the gods, he salts away the remnants, and goes to dine with a neighbour. Christians were thus in continual danger of meeting with such remnants. Partaking of them was an abomination among the Jews: see Numb. xxv. 2; Ps. cxi. 28; Rey. ii. 14; Tobit. 10–12; and was forbidden by the Apostles and elders assembled at Jerusalem, Acts xv. 29; xxi. 25. That St. Paul in the whole of this passage makes no allusion to that decree, but deals with the question on its own merits, probably is to be traced to his wish to establish his position as an independent Apostle, endowed with God's Holy Spirit sufficiently himself to regulate such matters. But it also shews, how little such decisions were at that time regarded as lastingly binding on the whole church: and how fully competent it was, even during the lifetime of the Apostles, to Christians to open and question on its own merits, a matter which they had, for a special purpose, once already decided.

we all have knowledge] Who are all? Some say, Paul himself and the enlightened among the Corinthians: some, these latter alone: and some think it said ironically, some concessively, of them. But it is manifest from verses 4–6, which are said in the widest possible reference to the faith of all Christians, that all Christians must be intended here also. But then, ver. 7, he says, “there is not in all men this knowledge,” obviously pointing at the weak Christian brother: and how are the two to be reconciled? By taking, I believe, the common-sense view of two such statements, which would be, in ordinary preaching or writing, that the first was said of what is professed and confessed,—the second of what is actually and practically apprehended by each man. Thus we may say of our people, in the former sense, ‘all are Christians: all believe in Christ? but in the latter, ‘all are not Christians; all do not believe.’ knowledge, viz. concerning them.—From here to end of ver. 3 is virtually a parenthesis.

Knowledge, abstract; i.e., when alone, or improperly predominant: it is the attribute of knowledge, ‘barely,’ to puff up.

love] viz. ‘towards the brethren;’ see Rom. xiv. 15, and ch. x. 23.

edifieth] Keep the literal meaning: helps to build up (God’s spiritual temple), ch. iii. 9.

2, 3.] ‘The general deductions, (1) from a profession of knowledge, and (2) from the presence of love, in a man:—expressed sententiously and without connecting particles, more, as Meyer observes, after the manner of St. John in his Epistles.—The case supposed is the only one which can occur where love is absent and conceit present; a man can then only think he knows, —no real knowledge being accessible without humility and love. Such a man knows not yet, as he ought to know: has had no real practice in the art of knowing. —But if a man loves God (which is the highest and noblest kind of love, the source of brotherly love, 1 John y. 2), this man (and not the wise in his own conceit) is known by Him. The explanation of this latter somewhat difficult expression is to be found in Gal. iv. 9, “Now that ye know God, or rather are known of God.” So that here we may fairly assume that he chooses the expression is known by Him in preference to that which would have been, had any object of knowledge but the Supreme been treated of, the natural one, viz. the same knoweth Him. We cannot be said to Know God, in any full sense (as here) of the word to know. But those who become acquainted with God by love, are known by Him: are the especial objects of the divine Knowledge,—their being is pervaded by the Spirit of God, and the wisdom of God is shed abroad in them. So in 2 Tim. ii. 19, “The Lord knoweth them that are His.” See also Ps. i. 6, and ch. xiii. 12.

4.] The subject is resumed, and further specified by the insertion of the eating of.

we know that there is no idol in the world, i.e. that the idols of the heathen (meaning not strictly the images, but the persons represented by them) have no existence in the world. That they who worship idols, worship devils, the Apostle himself asserts ch. x. 20; but that is no contradiction to the present sentence, which asserts that the deities imagined by them, Jupiter, Apollo, &c., have absolutely no existence. Of that subtle Power which, under the guise of these, deluded the nations, he here says nothing. The rendering of the A.V., and many Commentators, ancient and modern,—‘an idol is nothing in the world?’ ch. x. 19; Jer. x. 3, is certainly wrong here, on account of the exact verbal parallel, there is no God but one, which follows. The insertion of “other” (wanting in all our most ancient MSS.) has probably been occasioned by the wording of the first commandment, “Thou shalt have none other gods but me.”

5, 6.] Further explanation and confirmation of ver. 4.

5.] For even supposing that beings named gods EXIST (the chief emphasis is on exist, on which the hypothesis turns), whether in heaven, whether upon earth, as (we know that) there are (viz. as being spoken of, Deut. x. 17, “The Lord thy God is God of gods, und Lord of lords:” see also Ps. cxxxvi. 2, 3) gods many, and lords many (the Apostle brings in an acknowledged fact, on which the possibility of the hypothesis rests—‘Even if some of the many gods and many lords, whom we know to exist, be actually identical with the heathen idols...’ He does not concede this, but only puts it),

6.] yet TO US (emphatic: however that matter may be, we hold) there is ONE GOD, the Father (the Father answers to Jesus Christ in the parallel clause below, and serves to specify what God—viz. the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ), of Whom (as their Source of being) are all things, and we unto (i. e. for) Him (His purposes—to serve His will); and one Lord Jesus Christ (notice the one God opposed to many gods, and one Lord to many lords), by Whom (as Him by whom the Father made the worlds, John i. 3; Heb. i. 2) are all things, and we (but here secondly, we as His spiritual people, in the new creation) by Him.—The inference from the foregoing is that, of itself, the eating of meat offered to idols is a thing indifferent, and therefore allowed. The limitation of this licence now follows.

7.] But not in all is the knowledge (of which we have been speaking: i.e. see above, is not in them in their individual apprehension, though it is by their profession as Christians): but some through their consciousness to this day, of the (particular) idol (i. e. through their having an apprehension to this day of the reality of the idol, and so being conscientiously afraid of the meat offered, as belonging to him: not wishing to be connected with him), eat it as offered to an idol; and their conscience being weak is defiled. By the expression even until now, it is shewn that these weak ones must have belonged to the Gentile part of the Corinthian church: to those who had once, before their conversion, held these idols to be veritable gods. Had they been Jewish converts, it would not have been consciousness of the idol which would have troubled them, but apparent violation of the Mosaic law.

8.] Reason why we should accommodate ourselves to the prejudices of the weak in this matter: because it is not one in which any spiritual advantage is to be gained, but one perfectly indifferent.

will not affect our (future) standing before God, or, as in text, s hall not be reckoned to us before God.

9.] But, that is, “I acknowledge this indifference—this licence to eat or not to eat; but it is on that very account, because it is a matter indifferent, that ye must take heed,” &c.—The particular stumbling block in this case would be, the tempting them to act against their conscience:—a ‘practice above all others dangerous to a tian: see below, ver. 11.

10.] Explanation how the stumblingblock may arise.

any man, i.e. any weak brother, see below.—The words thee which hast knowledge seem to imply that the weak brother is aware of this, and looks up to thee as such. The word rendered emboldened is literally edified, built up, not without a certain irony, seeing it is accompanied by a description of the man as weak,—for thus the building up would be without solid foundation—a building up undo ruin, as Calvin calls it.

11.]...and (thus) the weak perishes (hereafter: see the parallel, Rom, xiv. 15 and note) by (literally, in, as the element in which,—he entering into it as his own, which it is not) thy knowledge,—the brother, in whose behalf Christ died?—See again Rom. xiv. 15.

12.] thus, viz. as described in wv. The and which follows fixes, and explains what is meant by sinning against the brethren.

wound] literally, smite. Chrysostom says, “What can be more unfeeling than to smite one who is weak?”

13.] Fervid expression of his own resolution consequent on these considerations by way of an example to them.

meat] in the most general sense: food, i.e. any article of food, as ver. 8; purposely indefinite here; ‘if such a matter ter as food...’ but presently particularized.

flesh] meaning, in order the more certainly not to eat flesh offered to an idol, I will abstain from every kind of flesh.

1 Corinthians: Chapter 9

IX. 1–27.] He digressively illustrates. the spirit of self-denial which he professed. in the resolution of ch. vii. 13,—by contrasting his rights as an Apostle with his actual conduct in abstaining from demanding them (verses 1–22). This self-denying conduct he further exemplifies, verses 23–27, for their imitation,

1.] He sets forth, (1) his independence of men (contrast ver. 19); (2) his apostolic office; (3) his dignity as an Apostle, in having been vouchsafed a sight of Christ Jesus our Lord; (4) his efficiency in the office, as having converted them to God.

free] So that the resolution of ch. viii. 13 is not necessitated by any dependence on my part on the opinion of others. The order of the clauses adopted in the Revised Text is that found in our most ancient authorities.

have I not seen Jesus Carist our Lord?] Not, during the life of our Lord on earth, as some think, nor is such an idea supported by 2 Cor. v. 16; see note there;—but, in the appearance of the Lord to him by the way to Damascus (Acts ix. 17; ch. xv. 8); and also, secondarily, in those other visions and appearances,—recorded by him, Acts xviii. 9 (?) xxii. 17,—and possibly on other occasions since his conversion.

in the Lord is not a mere humble qualification of my work (i. e. God’s work, not mine),—but designates, as elsewhere, the element, in which the work is done: they were his work as an Apostle, i.e. as the servant of the Lord enabled by the Lord, and SO IN THE LORD. See ch. iv. 15

2.] At least my apostleship cannot be denied by you of all men, who are its seal and proof.

the seal] as being the proof of his apostolic calling and energy, by their conversion: better than,—by the signs and wonders which he wrought among them. Their conversion was the great proof.

in the Lord belongs to the whole sentence, see above, on ver. 1.

3.] This belongs to the preceding, not, as in A.V., to the following verses:

This, viz. the fact of your conversion: this word is the predicate, not the subject—as in John i. 19; xvii. 3, and stands here in the emphatic place before the verb; referring to what went before. With ver. 4 a new course of questions begins, which furnish no defence. me is emphatic.

4.] He resumes the questions which had been interrupted by giving the proof of his Apostleship. ‘The plural, we, seems to apply to Paul alone: for though Barnabas is introduced momentarily in ver. 6, there can be no reference to him in ver. 11. It may perhaps be used as pointing out a matter of right, which any would have had on the same conditions (see ver. 11), and as thus not belonging’ personally to Paul, as do the things spoken of in verses 1, 2, 15. This however will not apply to ver. 12, where the emphatic me is personal.

5.] Have we not the power to take about with us (also to be maintained at the cost of the churches, for this, and not the power to marry, is here the matter in question) as a wife, a (believing) sister (or, ‘to bring with us a believing wife;’ these are the only renderings of which the words are legitimately capable. From a misunderstanding of this passage grew up a great abuse, that of missionaries taking about with them women of wealth, who ministered to them of their substance. Such women are mentioned with reprobation by Epiphanius, and were forbidden by the Council of Nicaea), as well as the other Apostles (in the wider sense, not only the Twelve; for, ver. 6, Barnabas is mentioned. It does not follow hence that all the other Apostles were married; but that all had the power, and some had used it), and the brethren of the Lord (mentioned not because distinct from the Apostles, though they were absolutely distinct from the Twelve, see Acts i, 14,—but as a further specification of the most renowned persons, who travelled as missionaries, and took their wives with them. On the brethren of the Lord, see note, Matt. xiii. 55. They were in all probability the actual brethren of our Lord by the same mother, the sons of Joseph and Mary. The most noted of these was James, the Lord’s brother [Gal. i. 19; ii. 9, 12, compare Acts xii. 17; xv. 13; xxi. 18], the resident bishop of the Church at Jerusalem; the others known to us by name were Joses [or Joseph], Simon, and Judas, see note on Matt. ib.), and Cephas (Peter was married, see Matt. viii. 14. A beautiful tradition exists of his encouraging his wife who was led to death, by saying, “O thou, remember the Lord.” Clement ‘of Alexandria relates that he had children On a mistake which has been made respecting St. Paul’s (supposed) wife, see note on ch. vii. 8)?

6.] Or (implying what the consequence would then be, see ch. vi. 2, 9: does not introduce a new “liberty,” but a consequence of the denial of the last two) have I only and Barnabas (why Barnabas? Perhaps on account of his former connexion with St. Paul, Acts xi. 30; xii. 25; xiii. 1-xv. 39; but this seems hardly enough reason for his being here introduced. It is not improbable that, having been at first associated with Paul, who appears from the first to have abstained from receiving sustenance from those among whom he was preaching, Barnabas, after his separation from our Apostle, may have retained the same self-denying practice, “This is the only time when he is mentioned in conjunction with St. Paul, since the date of the quarrel in Acts xv. 39.” Stanley) not power to abstain from working (i. e. power to look for our maintenance from the churches, without manual labour of our own)?

7-12.] Examples from common life, of the reasonableness of the workman being sustained by his work.

7.] From the analogies of human conduct: (1) The soldier.

at his own charges] with pay furnished out of his own resources. (2) The husbandman. (3) The shepherd.

8.] Am I speaking these things merely according to human judgment of what is right? Or (see note, ver. 6) does the law too not say these things?

9.] (It does say them) For in the law of Moses it is written, Thou shalt not muzzle an ox while treading out the corn. It was and still is the custom in the East, to place the newly-reaped grain on a floor in the open air, and then, by means of oxen, or buffaloes, to crush out the grain from the husk, either by the feet of the beasts, or by machines dragged by them.

Is it for the OXEN that God is taking care?—The question imports, In giving this command are the oxen, or those for whom the law was given, its objects? And to such a question there can be but one answer. Every duty of humanity has for its ultimate ground, not the mere welfare of the animal concerned, but its welfare in that system of which MAN is the head: and therefore, man’s welfare. The good done to man’s immortal spirit by acts of humanity and justice, infinitely outweighs the mere physical comfort of a brute which perishes.

10.] Or (the other alternative being rejected) on OUR account (i. e. on account of us ministers of the Gospel: not, of men in general) altogether (altogether, excluding entirely the other idea) doth he (or perhaps it, the law) say (this)? yea, for our sakes it (viz., “Thou shalt not muzzle the ox,” &c.) was written: because the plougher (not literal but spiritual, see below) ought to plough in hope, and the thresher (to thresh) in hope of partaking (of the crop).—The words used in this sentence are evidently spiritual, and not literal. They are inseparably connected with for our sakes, which precedes them: and according to the common explanation of them as referring to a mere maxim of agricultural life, would have no force whatever. But spiritually taken, all coheres. “The command (not to muzzle, &c.) was written on account of us (Christian teachers), because we ploughers (in the ‘husbandry of God,’ ch. iii. 9) ought to plough in hope,—and we threshers (answering to the ‘ox that treadeth out the corn’) ought to work in hope of (as the ox) having a share.’—No minute distinction must be sought between the plougher and the thresher. The former is perhaps mentioned on account of the process answering to the breaking up the fallow ground of Heathenism:—the latter on account of its occurrence in the precept.

11.] The we (both times strongly emphatic:—we need sorely some means of marking in our English Bibles, for ordinary readers, which words have the emphasis), although plural, in fact applies to Paul alone. The secondary emphasis is on you and your. It is one of those elaborately antithetical sentences which the great Apostle wields so powerfully in argument.

spiritual and carnal (see Rom. xv. 27) need no explanation. The first are so called as belonging to the spirit of man (some say, as coming from the Spirit of God: but it is better to keep the antithesis exact and perspicuous), the second as serving for the nourishment of the flesh.

12.] others does not necessarily point at the false teachers; more, besides them, may have exercised this power.

we bear all things] The verb thus rendered was commonly used of vessels containing, holding without breaking, that which was put into them; thence of concealing or covering, as a secret; and also of enduring or bearing up against.

all things: viz. labour, privations, hardships. The hindrances to the Gospel would arise from his being charged with covetousness and self-seeking, which his independence of them would entirely prevent.

13, 14.] Analogy of the maintenance of the Jewish priesthood from the sacred offerings, with this right of the Christian teacher, as ordained by Christ—It has been rightly remarked, that they which minister about the holy things can only mean the priests, not including the Levites and therefore that both clauses apply to the same persons.—On the practice referred to, see Numb. xviii. 8 ff.; Deut. xviii, 1 ff—No other priesthood but the Jewish can have been in the mind of the Apostle. The Jew knew of no altar but one: and he certainly would not have proposed heathen sacrificial customs, even in connexion with those appointed by God, as a precedent for Christian usage: besides that the idea is inconsistent with the words Thus also, which follow: see below.

14.] Thus also (i. e. in analogy with that His other command) did the Lord (Christ; the Author, by His Spirit, of the Old Testament as well as the New) appoint (viz. Matt. x. 10; Luke x. 8) to those who are preaching the gospel, to live of (be maintained by) the gospel. Observe, that here the Apostle is establishing an analogy between the rights of the sacrificing priests of the law, and of the preachers of the gospel. Had those preachers been likewise sacrificing priests, is it possible that, all allusion to them in such a character should have been here omitted? But as all such allusion is omitted, we may fairly infer that no such character of the Christian minister was then known. As Bengel remarks on ver. 13: “If the mass were a sacrifice, Paul would have expressed this conclusion in the next verse accordingly.”

15.] none of these things is best explained of the different forms of power which have been mentioned.

I have not written these things however, that it may be so (viz., after the examples which I have alleged) done to me (in my): for it were good for me rather to die (or better for me to die), than that any one should make void my (matter of) boasting. In saying “to die,” he does not mean, as Chrysostom and others have supposed, of famine, by not being supported, but only that he prefers this his boasting even to life itself.

16 ff.] The reason why he made so much of this matter of boasting, viz. that his mission itself gave him no advantage this way, being an office entrusted to him, and for which he was solemnly accountable: but in this thing only had he an advantage to be able to boast of it, that he preached the gospel without charge. The English reader must beware not to ion “preach the gospel,” as if it made a distinction between preaching “the gospel” and preaching something else: it simply represents the word “evangelize,” i.e. perform the work of a Christian missionary.

17.] For (illustration and confirmation of the “woe” pronounced above) if I am doing this (preaching) of mine own accord (as a voluntary undertaking, which in St. Paul’s case was not so: not as A. V. “willingly,” for this was so), I have a reward (i. e. it of mine own will I took up the ministry, it might be conceivable that a reward, or usages, might be due to me. That this was not the case, and never could be, is evident and the clause therefore is only hypothetical): but if involuntarily (which was the case, see Acts ix. 15; xxii. 14; xxvi. 16), with a STEWARDSHIP (emphatic) have I been entrusted (and therefore from the nature of things, in this respect I have no reward, or wages, for merely doing what is my bounden duty, see Luke xvii, 7–10; but woe if I fail in it).

18.] Ordinarily thus arranged and rendered: ‘What then ts my reward? (It is), in preaching I make the gospel to be without cost, that I use not my power in the gospel.’ But this in the A.V., though perhaps an allowable rendering of the original, is not true. His. making the gospel to be without cost, was not his reward, but his boasting: and these two are not identical. The boasting was present: the reward future. i am persuaded that the following is the true rendering: What then is my reward (in prospect), that I while preaching, render the gospel without cost (i. e. what reward have I in prospect that induces me to preach gratuitously), in order not to use (as carrying out my design not to use) to the full (see ch. vii. 31, and note: not, to abuse, as A.V.) my power in the gospel?

19 ff.] He now proceeds to answer the question, ‘What prospect of reward could induce me to do this?’ Yea (literally for, that is to say, the reward must have been great and glorious in prospect), being free from the power of all men, I enslaved myself (when I made this determination; and have continued to do so) to all, that I might gain (not, all, which he could not exactly say, but) the largest number (of any: that hereafter Paul’s converts might be found to be the most: see below on ver. 24). This word, that I might GAIN, is THE ANSWER to the question, “What is my reward?” This having gained the greater number is distinctly referred to by him elsewhere, as his reward in the day of the Lord: see especially 1 Thess. ii. 19, 20. And it is for this reason that the expression, “that I might gain,” is three times repeated; and, as we shall presently see, that the similitude at the end of the chapter is chosen.

20–22.] specializes the foregoing assertion, I made myself servant to all, by enumerating various parties to whose weaknesses he had conformed himself in order to gain them.

20.] unto the Jews I became as a Jew] See examples, Acts xvi. 3; xxi. 26. The Jews here are not Jewish converts, who would be already won in the sense of this passage.

to them that are under the law....] These again are not Jewish converts (see above); nor proselytes, who would not be thus distinguished from other Jews, but are much the same as the last-mentioned, the Jews, only to the number of these the Apostle did not belong, not being himself under the law, whereas he was nationally a Jew.

21. to them that are without law] These are the Heathen; hardly, as Chrysostom supposes, such as Cornelius, fearing God but not under the law. St. Paul became as a Heathen to the Heathen, e.g., when he discoursed at Athens (Acts xvii.) in their own manner, and with arguments drawn from their own poets.

not being (being conscious of not being, remembering well in the midst of my being as without law, that I was not) an outlaw from God, but a subject-of-the-law of Christ (the words seem inserted rather to put before the reader the true position of a Christian with regard to God’s law revealed by Christ, than merely with an apologetic view, to keep his own character from suffering by the imputation of lawlessness), that I may gain them that are without law. The weak here can hardly be the weak Christians of ch. viii. and Rom. xiv., who were already won, but those who had not strength to believe and receive the Gospel. This sentence then does not bring out a new form of condescension 22. to all men...] This sums up the above, and others not enumerated, in one general rule,—and the various occasions of his practising the condescension in one general result.—To all men I am become all things (i. e. to each according to his situation and prejudices), that by all means (or perhaps in all ways: but I prefer the other) I may save some (emphatic:—some out of each class in the “all men.” It is said, as is the following verse, in extreme humility, and distrust of even an Apostle’s confidence, to shew them the immense importance of the reward for which he thus denied and submitted himself).

23.] But (as much as to say, ‘not only this of which I have spoken, but all’) all things I do on account of the gospel, that I may be a fellow-partaker (with others) of it (of the blessings promised in the gospel to be brought by the Lord at his coming).

24 ff.] ‘This is my aim in all I do: but inasmuch as many run in a race, many reach the goal, but one only receives the prize,—I as an Apostle run my course, and you must so run yours, as each to labour not to be rejected at last, but to gain the glorious and incorruptible prize’ This, as compared with the former context, seems to be the sense and connexion of the passage. He was anxious, as an Apostle, to labour more abundantly, more effectually than they all: and hence his condescension to all men, and self-denial: accompanied with which was a humble self-distrust as to the great matter itself of his personal salvation, and an eager anxiety to secure it. These he proposes for their example likewise.

24.] The allusion is primarily no doubt to the Isthmian games, celebrated “under the shadow of the huge Corinthian citadel” (Stanley); but this must not be pressed too closely: the foot-race was far too common. an element in athletic contests, for any accurate knowledge of its predominance in some and its insignificance in others of the Grecian games to be here supposed. Still less must it be imagined that those games were to be celebrated in the year of the Epistle being written. The most that can with certainty be said, is that he alludes to a contest which, from the neighbourhood of the Isthmian games, was well known to his readers. See Stanley’s note: who, in following out illustrations of this kind, writes with a vivid graphic power peculiarly his own.

Thus (after this manner—viz. as they who run all, each endeavouring to be the one who shall receive the prize: not as the one who receives it—for the others strive as earnestly as he) run (no contrast is intended between the stadium, where one only can receive the prize, and the Christian race, where all may. Such a contrast would destroy the sense), in order that ye may [fully] obtain (the prize of your calling, see Phil. iii. 14).

25.] There is one point in the comparison yet included in the so, the conduct of the athletes in regard of temperance, which he wishes to bring into especial prominence for their imitation:—as concerning the matter in hand, his own abstinence from receiving this world's self, in order to save himself and them that heard him.—The emphasis is on every man, thus shewing the so above to refer to all who run. contendeth is more general than “runneth” as much as to say, ‘Every one who engages, not only in the race, but in any athletic contest,’ and thus strengthening the inference. The garlands with which the victors were crowned were variously of olive, parsley, ivy, or (in the Isthmian games) of pine. See Stanley.

but we] supply are temperate in all things in order to obtain... He takes for granted the Christian’s temperance in all things, as his normal state.

26.] I then (emphatic—he recalls the attention from the incidental exhortation, and reminiscence of the Christian state, to the main subject, his own abstinence from receiving, and its grounds) so run, as not uncertainly (i. e. without any sure grounds of contending or any fixed object for which to contend; both these are included); so fight I, as not striking the air (and not my adversary). The allusion is not to a “sham fight,” or rehearsal of a fight with an imaginary adversary, but to a fight with a real adversary (viz. here, the body) in which the boxer vainly hits into the air, instead of striking his antagonist:

27.] but I chastise [bruise] my body (the word literally signifies to strike heavily in the face, so as to render black and blue. The body is the adversary, considered as the seat of the temptations of Satan, and especially of that self-indulgence which led the Corinthians to forget their Christian combat, and sit at meat in the idol’s temple. The abuse of this expression to favour the absurd practice of the flagellants, or to support ascetic views at all, need hardly be pointed out to the rational, much less to the Christian student. It is not even of fasting or prayer that he is here speaking, but as the context, vv. 19–23, shews, of breaking down the pride and obstinacy and self-seeking of the natural man by laying himself entirely out for his great work—the salvation of the greatest number: and that, denying himself “solace” from without: “My hands have been worn away (Acts xx. 34) with the black tent-cloths, my frame has been bowed down with this servile labour.” Stanley), and enslave it: lest perchance having pro claimed (the word proclaimed is used absolutely, and answers to our use of preached. The subject of the proclamation might be the laws of the combat, or the names of the victors, each by one in the capacity of herald: probably here the former only, as answering to the preaching of the Apostles. The nature of the case shews that the Christian herald differs from the agonistic herald, in being himself a combatant as well, which the other was not: and that this is so, is no objection to thus understanding the word. “This introduces indeed a new complication into the metaphor: but it is rendered less violent by the fact.... sometimes the victor in the games was also selected as the herald to announce his success.” Stanley) to others, I myself may prove rejected (from the prize: not, as some Commentators from the contest altogether, for he was already in it). An examination of the victorious combatants took place after the contest, and if it could be proved that they had contended unlawfully, or unfairly, they were deprived of the prize and driven with disgrace from the games. So the Apostle, if he had proclaimed the laws of the combat to others, and not observed them himself, however successful he might apparently be, would be personally rejected as unqualified in the great day. And this he says with a view to shew them the necessity of more self-denial, and less going to the extreme limit of their Christian liberty; as Chrysostom says, “If to me the having preached, and taught, and brought thousands to the faith, suffices not to salvation, if my personal course have not been lawfully run, much more will this be so with you.”

1 Corinthians: Chapter 10

X. 1–22.] He proceeds, in close connexion with the warnings which have just preceded, to set before them the great danger of commerce with idolatry, and enforces this by the example of the rebellions and rejections of God's ancient people, who were under a dispensation analogous to and typical of ours (1–11); and by the close resemblance of our sacrament of the Lord's Supper,—their eating of meats sacrificed—and the same act among the heathen, in regard of the UNION in each case of the partakers in one act of participation. So that THEY COULD NOT EAT THE IDOL'S FEAST WITHOUT PARTAKING OF IDOLATRY i. e., VIRTUALLY ABJURING Cunrist (vv. 15–22)

1.] For joins to the preceding. He had been indicating the necessity of self-subduing (ch. ix 24–27), and now enforces it in the particular departments of abstaining from fornication, idolatry, &c., by the example of the Jews of old.

our fathers] He uses this expression, not merely speaking for himself and his Jewish converts, but regarding the Christian church as a continuation of the Jewish, and the believer as the true descendant of Abraham. all... all... all, each time with strong emphasis, as opposed to “the more part of them,” ver. 5. ALL had these privileges, as all of you have their counterparts

were under the cloud] The pillar of cloud, the abode of the Divine presence went before them, and was to them a defence: hence it is sometimes treated of as covering the camp, e.g. Ps. cv. 39, “He spreadeth a cloud for a covering,” and thus they would be under it. So also Wisd. x. 17, xix. 7,—“the cloud covering the camp,” see Exod. xiii. 21, xiv. 20.

2.] were baptized: literally, baptized themselves unto Moses; entered by the act of such immersion into a solemn covenant with God, and became His church under the law as given by Moses, God’s servant,—just as we Christians by our baptism are bound in a solemn covenant with God, and enter His church under the Gospel as brought in by Christ, God’s eternal Son; see Heb. iii. 5, 6.

in the cloud and in the sea] The cloud and the sea were both aqueous; and this point of comparison being obtained, serves the Apostle to indicate the outward symbols of their initiation into the church under the government of Moses as the servant of God, and to complete the analogy with our baptism. The allegory is obviously not to be pressed minutely: for neither did they enter the cloud, nor were they wetted by the waters of the sea; but they passed under both, as the baptized passes under the water, and it was said of them, Exod. xiv. 31, “T hen the people feared the Lord, and believed the Lord, and his servant Moses.”

3.] They had what answered to the one Christian sacrament, Baptism:—now the Apostle shews, that they were not without a symbolic correspondence to the: other, the Lord’s Supper. ‘The two elements in this Christian sacrament were anticipated in their ease by the manna and the miraculous stream from the rock: these elements, in their case, as well as ours, symbolizing THE BODY AND BLOOD OF CHRIST. The whole passage is a standing testimony, incidentally, but most providentially, given by the great Apostle to the importance of the Christian Sacraments as necessary to membership of Christ, and not mere signs or remembrances; and an inspired protest against those who, whether as individuals or sects, would lower their dignity, or deny their necessity.

spiritual meat] The manna is thus called from its being no mere physical production, but miraculously given by God—the work of His Spirit. ‘Thus Isaac is called, Gal. iv. 29, “he that was born after the Spirit,” in opposition to Ishmael, “him that was born after the flesh.” Josephus calls the manna “a divine and marvellous food,” Antt. iii. 1. 6; and in Ps. lxxviii. 24 it is said, “he had given them of the corn of heaven.” We can scarcely avoid recognizing in these words a tacit reference to our Lord’s discourse, or at all events to the substance of it,—John vi. 31–58.

4.] It is hardly possible here, without doing violence to the words and construction, to deny that the Apostle has adopted the tradition current among the Jews, that the rock followed the Israelites in their journeyings, and gave forth water all the way. Thus Rabbi Solomon, on Num. xx. 2: “Throughout all the forty years it was to them a well.” and Schéttgen cites from the Bammidbar Rabba, “How came that well, which is mentioned Num. xxi. 16? Answer. It was like a stone, or a swarm of bees, and it rolled on, and accompanied them in their journeys. When they encamped, and the tabernacle was set up, the rock came and rested in the entrance of the tent. Then came the Princes and stood by it, saying ‘Spring up, O well, &c.,’ and it sprung up.” He also gives other testimonies.—The only ways of escaping this inference are (1) by setting aside the natural sense altogether, as Chrysostom does, understanding the saying, not of water at all, but of the spiritual rock, i.e. Christ, who went with them and wrought wonders; or (2) by taking the rock as equivalent to the water from the rock: so Calvin, who says, ‘How could the rock, which stood fixed in its place, have accompanied the Israelites? As if it were not plain that by the word ‘rock’ is denoted the flow of water, which never deserted the people.’ But against both of these we have the plain assertion, representing matter of physical fact, they drank from the Spiritual (or, miraculous) rock which followed them: and I cannot consent to depart from what appears to me the only admissible sense of these words. How extensively the traditional reliques of unrecorded Jewish history were adopted by the apostolic men under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit the apology of Stephen may bear witness.

But (distinction between what they saw in the rock and what we see in it: they drank from it and knew not its dignity: but the rock was Christ.—In these words there appear to be three allusions: (1) to the ideas of the Jews themselves: so the Targum on Isa. xvi. 1: “They shall bring gifts to the Messiah of the Israelites, who shall be strong, inasmuch as in the desert he was the Rock, the Church of Zion.” so also in Wisd. x. 15 ff., the wisdom of God (see note on John i. 1) is said to have been present in Moses, to have led them through the wilderness, &c. That the MESSIAH, the ANGEL OF THE COVENANT, was present with the church of the Fathers, and that his upholding power was manifested in miraculous interferences for their welfare, was a truth acknowledged no less by the Jew than by the Christian. (2) To the frequent use of this appellation, A ROCK, for the God of Israel. See, among other places, Deut. xxxii. 4, 15, 18, 30, 31, 37; 1 Sam. ii. 2; 2 Sam. xxii. 2 and passim xxviii. 8, &c.; Psalms passim, and especially lxxviii. 20, compared with v. 35; see also Rom. ix. 33; 1 Pet. ii. 8. Hence it became more natural to apply the term directly to Christ, as the ever present God of Israel. (3) To the sacramental import of the water which flowed from the rock, which is the point here immediately in the Apostle’s mind. As well in sacramental import as in upholding physical agency, that rock was Christ. The miraculous (spiritual) food was (sacramentally) the flesh of Christ: the miraculous (spiritual) drink was the blood of Christ: so that the Jews’ miraculous supplies of food and drink were sacramentally significant of the Body and Blood of Christ, in kind analogous to the two great parts of the Christian Supper of the Lord. In the contents prefixed to the chapters in the A.V., we read as the import of these verses, “The Sacraments of the Jews are types of ours,” which though perhaps correctly meant, is liable to be erroneously understood; inasmuch as no sacramental ordinance can be a type of another, but all alike, though in different degrees of approximation, and by different representations, types of Him, who is the fountain of all grace. The difference between their case and ours is generally, that they were unconscious of the sacramental import, whereas we are conscious of it: “they knew not that I healed them,” Hos. xi. 3: and in this particular case, that Christ has come to us “not by water only, but by water and blood,” 1 John v. 6: HIS DEATH having invested our sacramental ordinance with another and more deeply significant character. To enter more minutely into the import of the words, “the rock was Christ, would be waste of time and laboUr. ‘The above reasons abundantly justify the assertion, without either pressing the verb was beyond its ordinary acceptation, or presuming to fix on the Apostle a definiteness of meaning which his argument does not require.

5.] Howbeit with the more part of them (in fact the exceptions were Joshua and Caleb only) God was not well pleased.

6.] But (the contrast being, between the events themselves, and their application to us) these things happened as (our examples: the literal rendering is) figures (not ‘types,’ as we now use the word, meaning by type and antitype, the material representation, and the ultimate spiritual reality—but figures, as one imperfect ceremonial polity may figure forth a higher spiritual polity, but still this latter may not itself be the ultimate antitype) of us (the spiritual Israel as distinguished from the literal),—in order that we might not be (God’s purpose in the figures: of course an ulterior purpose, for they had their own immediate purpose as regards the literal Israel) lusts (so literally; and the use of the substantive forcibly depicts the habit) after evil things (generally: no special reference yet to the Corinthian feasters, as Grotius supposes), as they also (i. e. supposing us to be like them) lusted.

7.] Now the special instances of warning follow. Notice, that all four of these were brought about by the lusting after evil things, not distinct from it.—This instance is singularly appropriate. The Israelites are recorded to have sat down and eaten and drunken at the idol feast of the golden calf in Horeb: the very temptation to which the Corinthians were too apt to yield. And as the Israelites were actually idolaters, doing this as an act of worship to the image: so the Corinthians were in danger of becoming such, and the Apostle therefore puts the ease in the strongest way, neither be (literally, become) ye idolaters.

to play] The Hebrew word is properly to dance to music. The dance was an accompaniment of the idol feast.

8.] Another prominent point in the sins of the Corinthian church. three and twenty thousand] The number. was twenty-four thousand, Num. xxv. 9, and is probably set down here from memory. The subtleties of Commentators in order to escape the inference, are discreditable alike to themselves and the cause of sacred Truth. Although the sin of Baal-peor was, strictly speaking, idolatry, yet the form which it exhibited was that of fornication, as incident to idolatrous feasting, see Num. xxv. 1, 2. ‘Thus it becomes even more directly applicable to the case of the Corinthians.

9.] The word rendered tempt means, tempt beyond endurance, ‘tempt thoroughly.’

the Lord] On the reading, see in my Greek Testament. The tempting of the Lord was,—as on the other occasions alluded to Num. xiv. 22, where it is said that they tempted God ten times,—the daring Him, in trying His patience by rebellious conduct and sin. Compare the similar use of the verb to tempt, Acts v. 9; xv. 10. And he warns the Corinthians, that they should not in like manner provoke God by their sins and their partaking with idols.

10.] Murmur has been by some understood of murmuring against their teachers, as the Israelites against Moses and Aaron, Num. xiv. 2; xvi. 41. But not to mention that this was, in fact, murmuring against God, such a reference would require something more specific than the mere word murmur. The warning is substantially the same as the last, but regards more the spirit, and its index, the tongue. As Theophylact says, “they did not bear trials manfully, but murmured, saying, When will the promised good things come, and how long will troubles last?”—The destruction referred to must be that related Num. xvi. 41 ff., when the pestilence (which though it is not so specified there, was administered on another occasion by a destroying angel, 2 Sam. xxiv. 16, 17, see also Exod. xii. 23) took off 14, 700 of the people. The punishment of the unbelieving congregation in Num. xiv., to which this is commonly referred, does not seem to answer to the expression “were destroyed by the destroyer,” nor to the term “some of them,” seeing that all except Joshua and Caleb were involved in it.

11. by way of example] or figure. Meyer cites from the Rabbis, “Whatever happened to the fathers, was a sign to their posterity.”

the ends of the world] An expression corresponding to “the completion tion of the ages,” rendered the end of the world in Matt. xiii. 39; xxviii. 20: this being literally, the ends of the ages of this world's lifetime. So Chrysostom, "He means nothing else than that the terrible judgment is close at hand."

are come] literally, have reached. The ages are treated as occupying space, and their extent as just coincident with our own time. See a similar figure in ch. xiv. 36.

12.] he standeth, viz. in his place as a member of Christ's church, to be recognized by him at His coming for one of His. 'To such an one the example of the Israelites is a warning to take heed that he fall not, as they did from their place in God's church.'

13.] There are two ways of understanding the former part of this verse. Chrysostom and others take it as a continuation and urging of the warning of the verse preceding, by the consideration that no temptation had yet befallen them but such as was within the power of human endurance: but a greater temptation is imminent:—while Calvin and others regard it as a consolation, tending to shew them that taking heed not to fall, is within the limits of their power, seeing that their temptation to sin was nothing extraordinary or unheard of, but only 'according to man.' and they might trust to God's loving care, that no temptation should ever befall them which should surpass their power to resist. This latter seems to me beyond doubt the correct view. For, besides the requirements of the construction, &c., the other view restricts the sense of temptation to persecution, which it here does not mean, but solicitation to sin, in accordance with the whole context.

hath taken you, not 'took you,' shews that the temptation was still soliciting them.

faithful] He has entered into a covenant with you by calling you: if He suffered temptation beyond your power to overcome you, He would be violating that covenant. Compare 1 Thess. v. 24, "Faithful is He that calleth you, who also will do it."

will..... make also the way to escape] Then God makes the temptation too: arranges it in His Providence, and in His mercy will ever set open a door for escape.

the (way to) escape, i.e. which belongs to the particular temptation.

in order that you may be able to bear (it): observe, not, 'will remove the temptation?' but, 'will make an escape simultaneously with the temptation, to encourage you to bear up against it'

14.] Conclusion from the above warning examples : IDOLATRY IS BY ALL MEANS TO BE SHUNNED; not tampered with, but fled from.

flee from presses very strongly the entire avoidance. 'This verse of itself' would by inference forbid the Corinthians having any share in the idol feasts; but he proceeds to ground such prohibition on further special considerations.

15–22.] By the analogy of the Christian participation in the Lord's supper, and the Jewish participation in the feasts after sacrifices, joined to the fact that the heathens sacrifice to devils, he shews that the partaker in the idol feast is a PARTAKER WITH DEVILS; which none can be, and yet be a Christian.

15.] An appeal to their own sense of what is congruous and possible,—as introducing what is to follow.

as to wise men expresses an assumption on the Apostle's part, that they are wise men. ye is emphatic—be YE the judges of what I am saying.

16.] The analogy of the Lord's Supper, which, in both its parts, is a participation in Christ. The stress throughout to ver. 20 is on participation and partakers. The cup of blessing is explained immediately by which we bless,—over which we speak a blessing, and is the Christian form of the Jewish cup in the Passover, over which thanks were offered after the feast,—in blessing of which cup, our Lord instituted this part of the ordinance: see note on the history in Matt. xxvii. The explanation, the exp which brings a blessing, is wrong, as being against this analogy.

which we bless] i.e. consecrate with a prayer of thanksgiving. Observe, the first person plural is the same throughout: the blessing of the cup, and the breaking of the bread, the acts of consecration, were not the acts of the minister, as by any authority peculiar to himself, but only as the representative of the whole Christian congregation. The figment of sacerdotal consecration of the elements by transmitted power, is as alien from the apostolic writings as it is from the spirit of the Gospel.

the participation (i. e. that whereby the act of participation takes place) of the Blood. of Christ?—The strong literal sense must here be held fast, as constituting the very kernel of the Apostle's argument. The wine is the Blood, the bread is the Body, of Christ. (In what sense the Blood and the Body, does not belong to the present argument.) We receive unto us, make by assimilation parts of ourselves, that wine, that bread: we become therefore, by participation of that Bread, one Bread, i. e ONE BODY: hence the close and literal participation in and with Christ. If we are to understand this word is to mean, represents or symbolizes, the argument is made void. On the other hand it is painful to allude to, though necessary to reprobate the caricature of this real union with Christ, which is found in the gross materialism of transubstantiation. See further on ch. xi. 26, 27.

which we break] probably already the breaking of the bread. in the communion was part of the act of consecration, and done after the example of our Lord in its institution. See ch. xi. 24; Acts ii. 42; xx. 7, 11. For the rest, see above.

17.] Because we, the (assembled) many (so literally), are one bread (by the assimilation of that one bread partaken: not ‘one loaf’) one Body (by the participation of the Body of Christ, of which that bread is the vehicle); for the whole of us partake of that one bread. By partaking of that bread, we become, not figuratively but literally, one bread: it passes into the substance of our bodies, and there is in every one who partakes, a portion of himself which is that bread. The bread which was before, is now ourselves. But that loaf, broken and blessed, is the medium of participation of the Body of Christ; we then, being that one bread, are one Body; for we all partake of that one bread. The argument is a very simple and direct one;—the bread is the Body of Christ;—we partake of the bread: therefore we partake of the Body of Christ. Of these propositions, the conclusion is implied in the form of a question in ver. 16: the minor stated in the latter clause of ver. 17; its connexion with the major producing the conclusion given in the former clause, “This is my body.” The major itself, “because we being many are one bread, one body,” is suppressed, as being a maxim familiar to Christians.

18.] Another example of Participation from the Jewish feasts after sacrifice.

Israel after the flesh, the actual material Israel, as distinguished from “Israel after the Spirit,” see Rom. ii. 29; Gal. iv. 29; and “the Israel of God,” Gal. vi. 16.

they which eat the sacrifices, viz. those parts of the sacrifices which were not offered; see on ch. viii. 1—The parts to be offered are specified, Levit. iii. 3; the practice of eating the remainder of the meat sanctioned and regulated, ib. vii. 15–18.

partakers with the altar (in a strict and peculiar sense,—the altar having part of the animal, the partaker another part; and by the fact of the religious consecration of the offered part, this connexion becomes a religious connexion. The question has been raised, and with reason, why the Apostle did not say partakers with God? Meyer answers,—because the Jew was already in covenant with God, and the Apostle wished to express a closer connexion, brought about by the sacrifice in question:—De Wette,—because he was unwilling to ascribe so much to the mere act of sacrifice, see Heb. x. 1 ff: and to this latter view I incline, because, as De Wette remarks, “God” would have suitèd the analogy better than “altar,” but St. Paul avoids it, and evidently is reluctant to use it. Still the inference lies open, to which our Saviour’s saying points, Matt. xxiii. 20, 21. The altar is GOD’S altar).

19, 20.] The inference from the preceding analogies would naturally be, that St. Paul was then representing the idols as being in reality what the heathen supposes them to be—and the eater of meats offered to them, as partaking with the idol. This objection be meets,—but with the introduction of a new fact to their consideration—that the things which the heathen sacrifice, they sacrifice really to devils.

19.] What do I say then? i. e., what am I then assuming? that a thing sacrificed to an idol is any (real) thing so sacrificed (i. e. has any real existence as a thing sacrificed?) or that an idol is any thing (real?) e.g. that Jupiter is Jupiter, in the sense of a living power)?—Not so; but (I say) that the things which they (i. e. the Gentiles) sacrifice, they sacrifice to devils, and not to God (the word does not signify ‘false gods,’ nor can it hear the sense in which it is used in the mouth of idolaters themselves, Acts xvii. 18,—but, as always in the Septuagint and New Testament, when used by worshippers of the true God, ‘DEVILS,’ ‘evil spirits.’ the words are from Deut. [ref.], see also Ps. xciv. 5 [Baruch iv. 7]. Heathendom being under the dominion of Satan [the ruler of this world], he and his angels are in fact the powers honoured and worshipped by the heathen, however little they may be aware of it): but (so literally: the inference being suppressed, ‘and ye therefore by partaking in their sacrifices would be partakers with devils: but’) I would not have you be (become) partakers with devils.

21.] Reason of the wish,—sententiously expressed without any “for.”

Ye cannot applies of course to the real spiritual participation of the table of the Lord so as to profit by it: to moral possibility. The cup of devils is said, as corresponding to the cup of which mention has been already made, not as some fancy, referring to the libation at an idol feast.

the table is used in the sense of the meats laid on the table. From this passage probably, the “Table of the Lord” became an expression current in all ages of the Christian Church.

22.] What? (literally, or) do we provoke (are we provoking: is it our wish to provoke, that He may assert His power) the Lord (Christ) to jealousy (by dividing our participation between Him and devils)?—see Deut. xxxii. 21, which evidently is before the Apostle's mind:—are we stronger than He (are we then such, that we can afford to defy His power to punish)?

23–XI. 1.] Now that he has fully handled the whole question of partaking in idol feasts, and prepared the way for specific directions as about a matter no longer to be supposed indifferent, he proceeds to give those directions, accompanying them with their reasons, as regards mutual offence or edification.

23.] He recurs to the plea of ch. vi. 12:—reasserts his modification of it, with a view, after what has passed since, to shew its reasonableness, and to introduce the following directions.

not all things edify] viz. the Christian body: tend to build up the whole, or the individual parts, of that spiritual temple, God's building.

24.] Further following out of the idea suggested by edify. This ought to be our object: the bringing on one another to perfection, not the pleasing ourselves, see Rom. xv. 2, 3. but his neighbour's good] i.e. but every one his neighbour's good.

25.] The key to understanding this and the following verse is, to remember that conscience is used in each case of the conscience of the person spoken of, i.e. in the two first cases, that of the reader,—in the third, as explained by the Apostle, that of the weak brother: see there.—Every thing which is being sold (offered for sale) in the flesh-market, eat, making no enquiry (whether it is meat offered to idols or not), on account of your conscience: this reason is attached to the whole command, not only to the “asking no question”—as is shewn by the parallel below, ver. 28,—where the reason given is joined also to the command, “eat not.” The meaning being,—‘eat without enquiry, that your conscience may not be offended.’ If you made enquiry, and heard in reply, that the meat had been offered to idols, your conscience would be offended, and you would eat with offence, risk of stumbling, to yourselves.

26.] The principle on which such an eating ought to rest: that all is GOD'S, and for our use: and where no subjective scruple is cast in, all to be freely partaken of: see 1 Tim. iv. 4.

27.] The same maxim applied to their conduct at a banquet given by a heathen. A miscellaneous banquet, and not a sacrificial feast, is meant. At such, there might be meat which had been offered to idols. Grotius says well on the words, ye are disposed to go, he admonishes them tacitly that they would do better by not going: but he does not prohibit their going: see above, ch. v. 10. On the words for conscience sake, see above, ver. 25.

28.] Who is the person supposed to say this? not, as Grotius, al., think, the host, of whom the expression any man would hardly be used, but it would stand “if he say unto you.” nor, as some think,—some heathen guest, by whom it might be said maliciously, or to put the Christian to the proof,—for his conscience would hardly be so much taken into account in the matter; but, some weak Christian, wishing to warn his brother.

offered in sacrifice (without any mention of its being to idols: such is the reading of our principal ancient MSS.) is apparently placed advisedly, to represent what would be said at a heathen's table.

for his sake that shewed it] i.e. on account of the man who informed you, and (specifying the particular point or points to which the more general preceding clause applies) conscience: i.e. to spare the informer being wounded in his conscience. The quotation, which is in the A.V. repeated here, is omitted in all our ancient authorities.

29.] Explanation of the last words, for conscience sake, as meaning not your own, but that of the informer.

for why is my freedom judged by a conscience not mine own?—i. e. Why should I be so treated (hazard by my actions such treatment) that the exercise of my Christian freedom, eating as I do and giving thanks, should become matter of condemnation to another, who conscientiously disapproves of it?—If I partake thankfully (not, as A.V., “by grace”) why am I to be evil spoken of for that for which I give thanks? These words have been misunderstood. It has been generally supposed that the Apostle is impressing a duty, not to give occasion for the condemnation of their liberty by another's conscience. But the ground on which he is here arguing, is the unfitness, absurdity, injustice to oneself and the cause of God, ver. 31, of so acting as to be condemned for that in which a man not only allows himself, but for which he gives thanks to God. The sentiment is the same as in Rom. xiv. 16, “Let not your good be evil spoken of.”

31.–XI. 1.] GENERAL CONCLUSION OF THIS PART OF THE EPISTLE,—enforced by the example of himself.

31.] This whether then, &c., passing from the special to the general, is not without reference to the last verse, in which the hypothesis is, that the Christian and thankful act of the believer is marred by the condemnatory judgment of his weak brother.

All such hindrances to God's glory they are to avoid; and in all things, eating or drinking or any other particular of conduct (any thing), the stress being on,—whether ye do eat or drink, or do any thing whatsoever; not as A.V. “whatever ye do”), the glory of God is to be the aim, self-regard being set aside: and so,—

32.] all offence is to be avoided (it being understood that this refers to things indifferent, for in other things, both Jews and Greeks must be offended, see ch. i. 23), whether to Jews or Heathens (both these out of the Church), or to the Church of God (their own brethren).

33.] His own course of conduct:—as I in all things please (this expresses, as Meyer well remarks, not the result, but the practice on Paul's part; for to please all men would be impossible even for one who had no fixed principle, still less for one like St. Paul).

that they, his great aim and end;—so ch. ix. 22.

may be saved: compare on the sense, Phil. ii. 4, 5.

1 Corinthians: Chapter 11

XI. 2–34.] REPROOFS AND DIRECTIONS REGARDING CERTAIN DISORDERS WHICH HAD ARISEN IN THEIR ASSEMBLIES: VIZ. (1) THE NOT VEILING OF THEIR WOMEN IN PUBLIC PRAYER (VV. 2–16): (2) THE ABUSE OF THE LOVE-FEASTS (17–34).

2–16.] The law of subjection of the woman to the man (2–12), and natural decency itself (13–16), teach that women should be veiled in public religious assemblies.

2.] But implying a distinction from the spirit, of the last passage, which was one of blame, and exhortation to imitate him. He praises them for the degree in which they did this already, and expresses it by the slighter word “ye remember me.” all things, see above, on ch. x. 33.

and ye keep (continue to believe and practise) the traditions (apostolic maxims of faith and practice, delivered either orally or in writing, 2 Thess. ii. 15), according as (according to the words in which) I delivered (them) to you. This was their general practice: the exceptions to it, or departures at all events from the spirit of those traditions, now follow.

3.] “It appears, that the Christian women at Corinth claimed for their sex an equality with the other, taking occasion by the doctrine of Christian freedom and abolition of sexual distinctions in Christ (Gal. iii. 28). The gospel unquestionably did much for the emancipation of women, who in the East and among the Ionian Greeks (not among the Dorians and the Romans) were kept in unworthy dependence. Still this was effected in a quiet and gradual manner: whereas in Corinth they seem to have taken up the cause of female independence somewhat too eagerly. The women overstepped the bounds of their sex, in coming forward to pray and to prophesy in the assembled church with uncovered heads. Both of these the Apostle disapproved,—as well their coming forward to pray and to prophesy, as their removing the veil: here however he blames the latter practice only, and reserves the former till ch. xiv. 34. In order to confine the women to their true limits, he reminds them of their subjection to the man, to whom again he assigns his place in the spiritual order of creation, and traces this precedence up to God Himself.” De Wette.

of every man] ‘of every Christian man’ (so Chrysostom and others), certainly,—and for such the Apostle was writing: but not only of every Christian man: the Headship of Christ is over all things to His Church, Eph. i. 22, and thus He is Head of every man.—The word Head, in each case, means the head next above. This must be borne in mind, for Christ is THE HEAD of the Christian woman, as well as of the Christian man.—God is the Head of Christ, not only according to His human nature: the Son is, in his Sonship, necessarily subordinate to the Father: see ch. iii. 23, note, and ch. xv. 28.—From Christ, the order descends first: then, in order to complete the whole, ascends up to God.—Observe, that though (Gal. iii. 28) the distinction of the sexes is abolished in Christ, as far as the offer of and standing in grace is concerned, yet for practical purposes, and for order and seemliness, it subsists and must be observed.

4.] The case of the man here treated, was regarded by the ancient Commentators as an actually occurring one among the Corinthians:—but by recent ones, as hypothetically put, to bring out that other abuse which really had occurred. Had it been real, more would have been said on it below: but from ver. 5 onwards, attention is confined to the woman.

prophesying] i.e. discoursing in the Spirit; see on ch. xii. 10.

having his head covered] The Jews when praying in public put over their heads a veil, called the Tallith, to shew their reverence before God and their unworthiness to look on Him. Among the Greeks it was the custom to worship with the head bare; among the Romans, with the head veiled. This passage of St. Paul has ever ruled the custom in the Christian church.

dishonoureth his head] i.e. Christ: not, his own head literally,—except in so far as the literal and metaphorical senses are both included,—the literal head of the man being regarded as the representative of his spiritual Head (see this brought out in Stanley's note): for the head of the man, in this respect of honouring or dishonouring, has been, ver. 3, explained to be CHRIST. Him he dishonours, by appearing veiled before men, thus recognizing subjection to them in an assembly which ought to be conformed to Christian order.

5.] The case of the woman is just the converse. She, if she uncovers herself (on the manner of covering, see below ver. 15 note) in such an assembly, dishonours her head (the man; not literally, her own head [except as above]: of this kind of dishonour there is no mention at all in our passage, and ver. 3 has expressly guarded us against making the mistake) by apparently casting off his headship: and if this is to be so, the Apostle proceeds, why not go further, and cut off her hair, which of itself is a token of this subjection? But if this be acknowledged to be shameful (it was a punishment of adulteresses), let the further decency of the additional covering be conceded likewise.

6.] The argument see above. let her ALSO, besides being unveiled, &c.

7-9.] A second reason for the same,—from the dependence of the man on God only, but of the woman on the man.

7.] For refers back to and gives a reason for the words "let her be covered," the difference between the sexes being assumed,—that one should be and the other should not be veiled.

the image... of God, Gen. i. 26. This the man is, having been created first,—directly, and in a special manner: the woman indirectly, only through the man.

and (the representative of the) glory of God: on account of his superiority and godlike attributes among other created beings. This is obviously the point here brought out, as in Ps. viii. 6; not that he is set to shew forth God's glory, because God glories in him. Man is God's glory: He has put in him His Majesty, and he represents God on earth: woman is man's glory: taken (ver. 8) from the man, shining not with light direct from God, but with light derived from man. This of course is true only as regards her place in creation, and her providential subordination, not in respect of the dependence of every woman's individual soul directly on God, and not on man, for supplies of grace and preparations for glory. The Apostle omits in this case the image, because anthropologically the woman is not the image of the man, on account of the difference of the sexes: and also perhaps because thus he would seem to deny to the woman the being created in the divine image, which she is as well as the man, Gen. i. 26, 27. The former reason appears the more probable.

8.] For gives the reason of the former assertion, "the woman is the glory of the man,"—viz. that the man is not (emphasis on "IS,"—'takes not his being,' in the fact of his original creation. The propagation of the species is not here in view) out of the woman, but the woman out of the man (compare Gen. ii. 28, "She shall be called woman, because she was taken out of man").

9.] For neither (parallel with ver. 8—another reason: not subordinate to it) was the man created (emphasis on "CREATED" as before on is) on account of the woman, &c.—In this verse, besides the manner of, creation, out of the man, the occasion of creation, for the sake of the man, is insisted on; see Gen. ii. 18 ff.

10.] For this cause, on account of what has just been said, by which the subordination of the woman has been proved:—refers to vv. 7-9.

the woman ought to have power on her head (i. e. the sign of power or subjection: shewn by the context to mean a veil). So Diodorus Siculus speaks of an image of a queen, having three kingdoms on its head, to signify that she was daughter and wife and mother of a king; where 'kingdoms' evidently mean crowns, the tokens of kingdom. And as there from the context it is plain that they indicated participation in the glory of the kingdoms, so here it is as evident from the context that the token of power indicates being under power: and such token is the covering. In this meaning all the principal Commentators agree, both ancient and modern. See some of the differing views discussed in my Greek Test.

because of the angels] i.e. because in the Christian assemblies the holy angels of God are present, and delighting in the due order and subordination of the ranks of God's servants,—and by a violation of that order we should be giving offence to them. So Chrysostom,—“Knowest thou not that thou standest with angels? with them thou singest, with them thou praisest: and wilt thou stand laughing?" And in another place he says, "To shew that the whole air is full of angels, only hear what the Apostle says, when he is rebuking the women and ordering them to wear a veil on their heads." Some, with a modification of this rendering, take the angels to mean the guardian angels, appointed, one to take charge of each Christian. So Theophylact and Theodoret. But though such angels certainly do minister to the heirs of salvation, see Matt. xviii. 10 and note,—there does not appear to be any immediate allusion to them here. Others again understand 'bad angels,' who might themselves be lustfully excited (so Tertullian),—or might tempt men so to be,—or might injure the unveiled themselves. But the angels, absolute, never means any thing in the N.T. except the holy angels of God. See some other explanations in my Greek Test. But still a question remains, WHY should the Apostle have here named the angels, and adduced them as furnishing a reason for women being veiled in the Christian assemblies? I believe the account given above to be the true one, and the reason of adducing it to be that the Apostle has before his mind the order of the universal church, and prefers when speaking of the assemblies of Christians to adduce those beings who, as not entering into the gradation which he has here described, are conceived as spectators of the whole, delighted with the decency and order of the servants of God. Stanley thinks the most natural explanation of the reference to be, that the Apostle was led to it by a train of association familiar to his readers, but lost to us: and compares the intimations of a similar familiarity on their part with the subjects of which he was treating in 2 Thess. ii. 5–7.

11.] Yet is neither sex insulated and independent of the other in the Christian life. In the Lord, i.e., in the Christian state; a well-known phrase. See e.g. Rom. xvi. 2, 8, 11, 12 (twice), &c.

12.] And in this, the Christian life accords with the original ordinance of God. For (proof of ver. 11) as the woman is (was taken, Gen. ii. 21 f.) out of the man, so the man (is born, in the propagation of the human race) by means of the woman; but all things (both man and woman and all things else: a general maxim, see 2 Cor. v. 18) are of (as their source,—thus uniting in one great head both sexes and all creation) God.—They are dependent on one another, but both on HIM: the Christian life, therefore, which unites them in Christ, is agreeable to God's ordinance.

13.] Appeal to their own sense of propriety: cf. ch. x. 15.

in your own selves] Each man within himself, in his own judgment.

14. nature itself] i.e. the mere fact of one sex being by nature unveiled, i.e. having short hair,—the other, veiled, i.e. having long hair. This plainly declares that man was intended to be uncovered,—woman, covered. When therefore we deal with the proprieties of the artificial state, of clothing the body, we must be regulated by nature's suggestion: that which she has indicated to be left uncovered, we must so leave: that which she has covered, when we clothe the body, we must cover likewise. This is the argument. The word nature does not mean sense of natural propriety, but NATURE,—the law of creation.

have long hair] "To have long or beautiful hair is a sign of effeminacy. Paris in Homer is reproached as having long hair," Eustathius.—The Apostle (see above) makes no allusion to the customs of nations in the matter, nor is even the mention of them relevant; he is speaking of the dictates of nature herself.

15.] See on ver. 14: compare Milton, Par. Lost, iv. 304 ff.

a covering, properly a wrapper, or enveloping garment. "In this passage," says Stanley, "the Apostle would refer to the 'peplum,' which the Grecian women used ordinarily as a shawl, but on public occasions as a hood also, especially at funerals and marriages."

16.] cuts off the subject, already abundantly decided, with a settlement of any possible difference by appeal to universal apostolic and ecclesiastical custom. But if any man seemeth to be contentious,—i. e. 'if any arises who appears to dispute the matter, who seems not satisfied with the reasons I have given, but is still disputations.' Before what follows, we must supply "let him know, that."

we (emphatic)—the Apostles and their immediate company,—including the women who assembled in prayer and supplication with them at their various stations, see Acts xvi. 13.

no such custom] The best modern Commentators agree with Chrysostom in understanding this, "no such custom as that of being contentious." But surely it would be very unlikely, that after so long a treatment of a particular subject, the Apostle should wind up all by merely a censure of a fault common to their behaviour on this and all the other matters of dispute. Such a rendering seems to me almost to stultify the conclusion:—"If any will dispute about it still, remember that it is neither our practice, nor that of the Churches, to dispute." It would seem to me, but for the weighty names on the other side, hardly to admit of a question, that the custom referred to alludes to the practice of women praying uncovered. So Theodoret and many others. He thus cuts off all further disputation on the matter, by appealing to universal Christian usage: and to make the appeal more solemn, adds the words of God to “the Churches,”—the assemblies which are held in honour of and for prayer to God, and are His own Churches. Observe “the Churches,” not “the Church.” The plurality of independent testimonies to the absence of the custom, is that on which the stress is laid. This appeal, ‘TO THE CHURCHES,’ was much heard again at the Reformation: but has been since too much forgotten.

17-34.] CORRECTION OF ABUSES REGARDING THE LOVE-FEASTS (AGAPÆ) AND THE PARTAKING OF THE SUPPER OF THE LORD.

17.] refers back to what has been said since ver. 2, and forms a transition to what is yet to be said. But this (viz. what has gone before, respecting the veiling of women, not as Chrysostom and others, that which follows: see below) I command you (not, ‘announce to you,’ nor ‘declare to you from report,’ which are senses of the original word unknown to the New Test., where it only means ‘to command,’—to deliver ‘by way of precept.’ This makes it hardly possible to refer the word this to what follows: for if so, some definite command should immediately succeed) not praising (refers to the praise bestowed on them in v. 2, and excepts what has been said since from that category) [you]; because ye come together not for the better (so that edification results), but for the worse (so that propriety is violated, and the result is to the hindering of the faith). These last words are introduced with a manifest view to include more than the subject hitherto treated, and to prepare the way for other abuses of their assemblies to be noticed.

18.] in the first place—where is the second particular found, answering to this first one? Ordinarily, it is assumed that the schisms are the first abuse, the disorders in the Agapæ (love-feasts: beginning with ver. 20), the second. But I am convinced that this view is wrong. For (1) neither special blame, nor correction of an abuse, is conveyed in vv. 18, 19: nor is it so much as intimated, on the ordinary hypothesis, what the character of these divisions was. And (2) the words of ver. 22, “shall I praise you in this? I praise you not,” plainly refer back to ver. 17, and shew that the whole is continuous. The divisions before the Apostle’s mind are, specifically, those occurring at the Agapæ, but on the mention of them he breaks off to shew that such divisions were to be no matters of surprise, but were ordained to test them,—and in ver. 20 he returns with the very words, “when ye come together,”—to the immediate matter in hand, and treats it at length. See more on ver. 21, ff.—But the question still remains, where is the second point, answering to this first one? Again (with Meyer and Macknight) I answer,—at ch. xii. 1. The ABUSE OF SPIRITUAL GIFTS, which also created disorder in their assemblies, ch. xiv. 23 al., and concerning which he concludes, xiv. 40, “let all things be done decently and in order,” was the other point before his mind, when he wrote this first. That he takes no notice in ch. xii. 1, by any word implying that it was a second point, of what has gone before, will be no objection to the above view to any one who is acquainted with our Apostle’s style.

in assembly] not local, as A.V., ‘in the Church,’ but equivalent to “in one place,” ver. 20. In ver. 16, where the same word (ecclesia) was used of distinct bodies of Christians, it was not possible to keep the word assemblies: but it should be done where the sense admits it, and it suits the matter in hand.

divisions] of what sort, is specified below; viz. that he does not here refer to the party dissensions of ch. i. 10, nor could he say of them “I partly believe it,” but strictly to divisions which took place at their meetings together, viz. that each takes before other his own supper, &c.

and I partly believe it] Said in gentleness: as if it were, “I am unwilling to believe all I hear concerning the point, but, some I cannot help believing.”

19. there must] in the divine appointment, that, which follows expressing God’s purpose thereby. Our Lord had said “It must needs be, that offences come,” Matt. xviii. 7:—and Justin Martyr quotes among His sayings prophetic of division in the church, “there shall be divisions (schisms) and heresies.” From the pointed manner in which there must also or even be heresies.... is said, I should be inclined to think that the Apostle tacitly referred to the same saying of our Lord: for there must be (not only dissensions but) even heresies (not in the ecclesiastical or doctrinal sense, but indicating a further and more matured separation, where not only is there present: dissension, as in the Agapæ, but a deliberate choice and maintenance of party distinction. It does not appear, in spite of all that has been written in Germany on the supposed parties of ch. i. 10, that such separations had yet taken place among the Corinthians. Nor even in Clement’s Epistle, forty years after this, do we find any allusion to such, but only, as here, to a general spirit of dissension and variance) among you, that the approved [also] (i.e. as well as the other party, who would become manifest by their very conduct. This word also is found in some of our oldest MSS., and not in others) may be made manifest among you; viz. through a better and nobler spirit being shewn by them, than by the contentious and separatists.

20.] The same subject—resumed from ver. 18: see notes on “in the first place.”—When then ye come together (are assembling, present tense, and perhaps here, where he deals with particulars, this is to be pressed,—as their intention in thus assembling is blamed) to one place—there is no eating (or, it is not to eat, i.e. with any idea of eating) the Lord’s Supper (emphasis on the Lord’s, as opposed to “his own” below).

the Lord's Supper] 'the Supper instituted by the Lord.' This was an inseparable adjunct, in the apostolic times, to their agapæ or feasts of love. Chrysostom and Tertullian give an ample description of these feasts, which were of the nature of mutual contributions, where each who was able brought his own portion,—and the rich additional portions for the poor. During and after this feast, as shewn by the institution, by the custom at the Passover, by the context here, and by the remnants of the ancient custom and its abuse until forbidden by the council of Carthage,—the ancient Christians partook of the Supper of the Lord. It was necessary for the celebration of the Lord's Supper, that all should eat of the same bread and drink of the same cup; and in all probability, that a prayer should be offered, and words of consecration said by the appointed ministers. Hence cessation of the feast itself, and solemn order and silence, would be necessitated even by the outward requirements of the ordinance. These could not be obtained, where each man was greedily devouring that which he had brought with him: where the extremes were seen, of one craving, and another being drunken. This being their practice, there could be no possibility, and at the same time no intention of celebrating the Lord's Supper,—no provision for it, nor discernment of the solemnity of it.

21.] taketh before another, viz. during the feast, not at home, before coming. Obviously the each one must be limited to the rich: the poor had no supper of their own to take, and were the losers by the selfishness of the rich.

one is craving (the poor), another is drunken (the rich. There is no need to soften the meaning of this latter word, as Meyer says, "Paul draws the picture in strong colours, and who can say that the reality was less strong?").

22.] For (a reason for the blame in the foregoing: this should not be: for) have you no houses, to eat, &c.: meaning, 'at home is the place to satiate the appetite, not the assembly of the brethren.'

or do ye shew your contempt for (pres.) the congregation of God (of God, to express the dignity of the congregation. This contempt was expressed by their not sharing with the congregation the portion which they brought),—and put to shame those who have not (houses to eat and to drink in, and therefore come to the daily agapæ to be fed)? What must I say to you? shall I praise you in this matter? I praise you not. (See ver. 17.)

23–25.] To shew them the solemnity of the ordinance which they thus set at nought, he reminds them of the account which he had before given them, of its INSTITUTION BY THE LORD. Matt. xxvi. 26–29; Mark xiv. 22–25; Luke xxii. 19, 20.

23.] For I (no emphasis on "I") received from the Lord (by special revelation, see Gal. i. 12. If the Apostle had referred only to the Evangelic tradition or writings (?) he would not have used the first person singular, but would have said, "we received." I may remark, that the similarity between this account of the Institution, and that in St. Luke's Gospel, is only what might be expected on the supposition of a special revelation made to St. Paul, of which that Evangelist, being St. Paul's companion, in certain parts of his history availed himself) that which I also delivered (in my apostolic testimony) unto you, (viz.) That the Lord Jesus, &c.

Literally, He was being betrayed. "There is an appearance of fixed order, especially in these opening words, which indicates that this had already become a familiar formula." Stanley. In the original there is no word inserted between is and for, such as broken or given. See note on Matt. xxvi. 26.

25.] See Luke xxii. 20.

After the same manner] viz., He took, and having given thanks, He gave to them.

This cup is the new covenant in (ratified by the shedding of, and therefore standing in, as its conditioning element) my blood.

as oft as ye drink...] Not a general rule for all common meals of Christians; but a precept that as often as that cup is drunk, it should be in remembrance of Him: on these last words is the emphasis: see below.

26.] For gives an explanatory reason for the words "in remembrance of Me," viz. that the act of eating and drinking is a proclamation of the Death of the Lord till His coming. The Apostle is substantiating the application of the Lord's words by the acknowledged nature of the rite. It is a proclamation of His Death; and thus is a remembrance of Him. It is so, by our making mention of in it, and seeing visibly before us and partaking of, His Body broken, and His Blood shed.

till he come] The words ye declare are addressed directly to the Corinthians, not to them and all succeeding Christians; the Apostle regarding the coming of the Lord as near at hand, in his own time; see notes on 2 Cor. v. 1–10. After the coming, there will be no longer any need of the symbols of His Body, since the Body itself will be with us; therefore the Apostle says, "Till He come."

27.] A consequence, from the nature of the ordinance being, to proclaim the Death of the Lord: the guilt of the unworthy participation of either of the elements. The Death of the Lord was brought about by the breaking of His body and shedding His blood: this Death we proclaim in the ordinance by the bread broken—the wine poured out, of which we partake: whoever therefore shall either eat the bread or drink the cup of the Lord unworthily (see below, ver. 29) shall be guilty of the Body and Blood of the Lord: i.e. shall be subject to the penalty of offence against the Body and Blood of Christ. Such an one proclaims the Death of Christ, and yet in an unworthy spirit—with no regard to that Death as his atonement, or a proof of Christ's love: he proclaims that Death as an indifferent person: he therefore partakes of the guilt of it. Chrysostom strikingly says, “He makes that Death a murder, and not a sacrifice” The Romanists absurdly enough defend by this or (the meaning of which is not to be changed to and, as is most unfairly done in our A.V., and the completeness of the argument thereby destroyed) their practice of communicating only in one kind. Translated into common language, and applied to the ordinary sustenance of the body, their reasoning stands thus: “Whoever eats to excess, or drinks to excess, is guilty of sin: therefore eating, without drinking, will sustain life.”

28.] The but implies an opposition to, and wish to escape from, the guilt just suggested.

examine himself] prove himself: ascertain by sufficient tests, what his state of feeling is with regard to the death of Christ, and how far this feeling is evinced in his daily life—which are the best guarantees for a worthy participation.

and so] i.e. ‘after examination of himself?’ The case in which the self-examination ends in an un-favourable verdict, does not come under consideration, because it is assumed that such a verdict will lead to repentance and amendment.

29.] For he that eateth and drinketh (of the bread and of the cup: certainly not, as Meyer suggests, ‘the mere eater and drinker, he who partakes as a mere act of eating and drinking,’ which is harsh to the last degree, and refuted by the parallel, ver. 27. The word “unworthily” is spurious, not occurring in our most ancient MSS., and having found its way into the text by repetition from ver. 27), eateth and drinketh judgment to himself (i. e. brings on himself judgment by eating and drinking. The judgment meant, as is evident by vv. 30–32, is not ‘damnation,’ as rendered in our A.V., a mis-translation, which has done infinite mischief), not appreciating (i. e. if he discern not, “if he have no idea of the solemnity of the ordinance, or of the magnitude of the gift bestowed on him.” Chrysostom) the body (of the Lord: here standing for the whole of that which is symbolized by the Bread and the Cup, the Body and Blood. The mystery of these, spiritually present in the elements, he, not being spiritual, does not appreciate: and therefore, as in ver. 27, falls under the divine judgment, as trifling with the Death of Christ).

30.] Experimental proof of the assertion that he eateth and drinketh judgment to himself. from the present sicknesses and frequent deaths among the Corinthian believers.—We may distinguish weaklings, persons whose powers have failed spontaneously, from invalids, persons whose powers are enfeebled by sickness. Both words refer to physical, not moral weaknesses.

31.] But contrasts with this state of sicknesses and deaths—it might be otherwise. This discerned (the result of the examination commanded before) is the same word in the original as that rendered discern in ver. 29, and should be carefully kept the same in the translation, the idea being the same.

32.] But now that we are judged, it is by the Lord (emph.) that we are being chastised (to bring us to repentance), that we may not be (eternally) condemned with the (unbelieving) world.

33.] General conclusion respecting this disorder. So then (wherefore), my brethren (milder persuasive: as has been the assumption of the first person me, vv. 31, 32), when ye are coming together to eat, wait for one another (contrast to the unseemly hurry blamed in ver. 21).

34.] The Agapæ were not meals to satiate the bodily appetites, but for a higher and holier purpose: let the hungry take off the edge of his hunger at home: see ver. 22.

the rest] viz. things omitted (probably matters of detail) in the above directions. Perhaps they had asked him questions respecting the most convenient time or manner of celebration of the Lord's supper: points on which primitive practice widely differed.

when I come, literally, whenever I shall have come: the Apostle being uncertain as to the time.

1 Corinthians: Chapter 12

CHAPP. XII.–XIV.] ON THE ABUSE OF SPIRITUAL GIFTS: especially PROPHESYING, and SPEAKING WITH TONGUES. The second particular requiring correction in their assemblies, see ch. xi. 18, note. Chrysostom well says: “This whole passage is very obscure: and the obscurity is caused by our ignorance of the facts, and by the failure of phenomena which then were occurring, but now occur no longer."

XII] ON THE NATURE, INTENT, AND WORTH OF SPIRITUAL GIFTS IN GENERAL.

1-3.] The foundation of all spiritual utterance is the confession of Jesus as the Lord: and without the Spirit no such confession can be made.

1.] Some have thought that the Corinthians had referred this question to the Apostle's decision: but from the formula, I would not have you ignorant, it rather looks as if, like the last, it had been an abuse which he had heard of, and of his own instance corrects.

spiritual gifts] In the original the adjective only is expressed, the substantive having to be supplied. It is most likely neuter, as in ch. xiv. 1; spiritual gifts: so Chrysostom and most commentators—not masculine, as in ch. xiv. 37: so Grotius and others, who maintain that the subject of this section is not the things, but the persons, quoting ch. xiv. 5. But surely the things are the main subject, enounced here, vv. 4–11, and treated of through the rest of the chapter; the inspired persons being mentioned only incidentally to them.

2.] Reason why they wanted instruction concerning spiritual gifts—because they once were heathen, and could not therefore have any experience in spiritual things. Ye know (that) when ye were Gentiles, led about (or, carried away: not necessarily, ‘led wrong;’ the context seems rather to favour the idea of being ‘led at will,’ blindly transported hither and thither) to idols which were without utterance (‘the God in whom you now believe is a living and speaking God—speaking by his Spirit in every believer: how should you know any thing of such spiritual speech or gifts at all, who have been accustomed to dumb idols?’), just as ye happened to be led (viz., on each occasion. These last words imply the absence of all fixed principle in the oracles of Heathendom, such as he is about to announce as regulating and furnishing the criterion of the spiritual gifts of Christendom. This even as ye might be led might take a man to contradictory oracles, the whole system being an imposture—their idols being void of all power of utterance, and they being therefore imposed on by the fictions of men, or evil spirits, who led them).

3.] The negative and positive criteria of inspiration by the Spirit of God: viz. the rejection, or confession, of Jesus as the Lord.

Wherefore, ‘because ye have been hitherto in ignorance of the matter.’ in the Spirit of God—in the Holy Ghost] The Spirit of God, or the Holy Ghost, is the Power pervading the speaker, the Element in which he speaks.

Jesus is accursed] Jesus (not Christ, the Name of office, itself in some measure the object of faith,—but Jesus, the personal Name,—the historical Person whose life was matter of fact: the curse, and the confession, are in this way far deeper) is accursed (see Rom. ix. 3, note). So, Jesus is Lord (all that is implied in lord being here also implied: and we must not forget that the Greek word Kyrios, here used, is the solemn accustomed name in the Septuagint version for the Hebrew JEHOVAH). By these last words the influence of the Holy Spirit is widened by the Apostle from the supernatural gifts to which perhaps it had been improperly confined, to the faith and confession of every Christian.—It is remarkable that in 1 John iv. 1, 2, where a test to try the spirits is given, the human side of this confession is brought out,—‘that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh,’—St. John having to deal with those who denied the reality of the Incarnation.

4-6.] But (as contrasted to this absolute unity, in ground and principle, of all spiritual influence) there are varieties of gifts (gifts, i.e. eminent endowments of individuals, in and by which the Spirit indwelling in them manifested Himself,—the manifestation of the Spirit in each man:—and these either directly bestowed by the Holy Ghost Himself, as in the case of healing, miracles, tongues, and prophesying, or previously granted them by God in their unconverted state, and now inspired, hallowed, and potentiated for the work of building up the church,—as in the case of teaching, exhortation, knowledge. Of all these gifts, faith working by love was the necessary substratum and condition), but the same Spirit (as their Bestower,—see the sense filled up in ver. 11):

5.] And there are varieties of ministries (appointed services in the church, in which as their channels of manifestation the gifts would work), and the same Lord (Christ, the Lord of the church, whose it is to appoint all ministrations in it. These ministrations must not be narrowed to the ecclesiastical orders, but kept commensurate in extent with the gifts which are to find scope by their means, see verses 7–10: and) varieties of operations (effects of divine working: not to be limited to miraculous effects, but understood again commensurately with the gifts of whose working they are the results), and the same God, Who worketh all of them in all persons (all the gifts in all who are gifted). Thus we have GOD THE FATHER, the First Source and Operator of all spiritual influence in all: GOD THE SON, the Ordainer in His Church of all ministries by which this influence may be legitimately brought out for edification: GOD THE HOLY GHOST, dwelling and working in the church, and effectuating in each man such measure of His gifts as He sees fit.

7-11.] These operations specified in their variety, but again asserted to be the work of one and the same Spirit.

7.] To each individual, however (the emphasis on each, as shewing the character of what is to follow, viz. individual distinction of gifts. But, or however, is contrasted with the same God of the last verse; through the workings of One God, One Lord, One Spirit, they are bestowed variously on each man), is given the manifestation of the Spirit (the manifestation by which the Spirit acts: it is a general term including gifts, ministrations, and operations, and) with a view to profit (with the profit of the whole body as the aim).

8-10.] On the question, whether or not any studied arrangement of the gifts of the Spirit is here found, see my Greek Test. I have there seen reason to conclude that a rigorous distribution (as e.g. into intellectual and practical, and their subdivisions) cannot be traced; but that at the same time there is a sort of arrangement, brought about not so much designedly, as by the falling together of similar terms,—the word of wisdom,—the word of knowledge;—kinds of tongues,—interpretation of tongues. Unquestionably, any arrangement must be at fault, which proceeding on psychological grounds, classes together the speaking with tongues and the interpretation of tongues: the working of miracles, and the discernment of spirits.

8.] For appeals to matter of fact, as the ground of the assertion in ver. 7, both as to the giving, and as to the gift being for profit.

the word of wisdom..... the word of knowledge] What is the distinction? According to Neander, wisdom represents the skill, which is able to reduce the whole practical Christian life into its due order in accordance with its foundation principles; knowledge, the theoretical insight into divine things. But Bengel and others take them conversely, knowledge for the practical, wisdom for the theoretical. Meyer says, “Wisdom means the higher Christian wisdom (see on ch. ii. 6) in and of itself;—so that discourse which expresses its truths, makes them clear, applies them, &c. is the word of wisdom. But this does not necessarily imply the speculative penetration of these truths,—the philosophical treatment of them by deeper and more scientific investigation, in other words, knowledge: and discourse which aims at this is the word of knowledge.” This last view is most in accordance with the subsequently recognized meaning of knowledge (gnosis) and the gnostic, and with the Apostle’s own use of wisdom in the passage referred to, ch. ii. 6.

These are bestowed according to (the disposition,—see ver. 11,—of) the same Spirit.

9.] faith, as Chrysostom explains it, “He does not here mean faith in doctrines, but that which works miracles, of which our Lord said, ‘If ye had faith as a grain of mustard seed, &c.’ (Matt. xvii. 20), and respecting which the Apostles offered their petition, ‘add unto us faith’ (Luke xvii. 5): for this faith is the mother of miracles.” This seems to be the meaning here; a faith, enabling a man to place himself beyond the region of mere moral certainty, in the actual realization of things believed, in a high and unusual manner.

in the same Spirit] in, i.e. by and through, as the effective cause and the medium.

gifts of (miraculous) healings] plural, to indicate the different kinds of diseases, requiring different sorts of healing.

10.] operations of miraculous powers (in general).

prophecy] speaking in the Spirit. Meyer gives an excellent definition of it: “discourse flowing from the revelation and impulse of the Holy Spirit, which, not being attached to any particular office in the church, but improvised,—disclosed the depths of the human heart and of the divine counsel, and thus was exceedingly effectual for the enlightening, exhortation, and consolation of believers, and the winning of unbelievers. The prophet differs from the speaker with tongues.... in that he speaks with the understanding, not ecstatically: from the teacher, thus: ‘He that prophesies speaks all that he utters, from the Spirit: whereas he that teaches, sometimes speaks of his own mind.’” Chrysostom.”

discernings of spirits] i.e. the power of distinguishing between the operation of the Spirit of God, and the evil spirit, or the unassisted human spirit: see 1 John iv. 1, and compare “giving heed to seducing spirits,” 1 Tim. iv. 1. The exercise of this power is alluded to ch. xiv. 29.

Kinds of tongues] i.e. the power of uttering, in ecstasy, as the mouthpiece of the Spirit, prayer and praise in languages unknown to the utterer,—or even in a spiritual language unknown to man. See this subject dealt with in the note on Acts ii. 4, and ch. xiv. 2 ff.

interpretation of tongues] the power of giving a meaning to what was thus ecstatically spoken. This was not always resident in the speaker himself: see ch. xiv. 13.

11.] The Spirit is the universal worker in men of all these powers, and that according to His own pleasure: see above: on vv. 4–6.

severally] or respectively. This unity of the source of all spiritual gifts, in the midst of their variety, he presses as against those who valued some and undervalued others, or who depreciated them all.

12–30.] As the many members of the body compose an organic whole, and all belong to the body, none being needless, none to be despised; so also those who are variously gifted by the Spirit compose a spiritual organic whole, the mystical body of Christ. First, however, vv. 12, 13, this likeness of the mystical Christ to a body is enounced, and justified by the facts of our Baptism.

12.] The organic unity of the various members in one body, is predicated also of CHRIST, i.e. the church as united in Him, see ch. vi. 15. The word for confirms the preceding “one and the selfsame Spirit,” by an analogy. By the repetition,—“the body”.... “of the body”.... “one body,” the unity of the members as an organic whole is more strongly set forth.

13.] This shewn from our being baptized into one body, and receiving one Spirit.—For in (see on ver. 9) one Spirit also (the emphasis on “one Spirit,” to which words also belongs) we were all baptized into one Body, whether Jews or Greeks, whether slaves or freemen; and we all were made to drink of one Spirit (or, ‘all watered by one Spirit, viz. the water of baptism,’ here taken as identical with the Spirit whose influence accompanied it).—So (understanding the whole verse of baptism) Chrysostom and others refer the latter half to the Lord’s Supper: and this is mentioned by Chrysostom, Luther, and others. Olshausen, and others, to the abiding influence of the Spirit in strengthening and refreshing. But the past tense “we were made to drink,”... referring to a fact gone by, is fatal to both these latter interpretations: besides that it would be harsh to understand even “we were made to drink into one Spirit,” and impossible to understand “we were made to drink of one Spirit,” of the cup in the Lord’s Supper.

14.] Analogy, by which this multiplicity in unity is justified: it is even so in the natural body, which, though one, consists of many members. The object of the continuation of the simile seems to be, to convince them that their various gifts had been bestowed by God on them as members of the Christian body, and that they must not, because they did not happen to possess the gifts of another, consider themselves excluded from the body,—in which the weaker as well as the stronger, the less comely as well as the more comely members were necessary. The reader will remember the fable of the belly and members, spoken by Menenius Agrippa to the mutinous plebeians of Rome, when they seceded to the Mons Sacer. See other illustrations in my Greek Test.

15. is it therefore not of the body?] These words here, and in the next verse, may be taken, “it is not there-fore not of the body.” But they are best taken as a question appealing to the sense of the reader: they thus have more of the vigour and abruptness of the Apostle’s style.

of the body, i.e. belonging to the body as an aggregate.

17.] The necessity of the members to one another, and to the body.

18.] But now, i.e. but as the case really stands.

as he pleased answers to “as he willeth,” ver. 11.

19.] The same ‘reductio ad absurdum,’ which has been made in the concrete twice in ver. 17, is now made in the abstract: if the whole were one member, where would be the body (which by its very idea “has many members,” see xx. 12, 14)?

20.] brings out the fact in contrast to ver. 19, as ver. 18 in contrast to ver. 17.

21–26.] And the spiritual gifts are also necessary to one another. This is spoken of in reproof of the highly endowed, who imagined they could do without those less gifted than themselves, as the preceding to those of small endowment, who were discontented with their gifts.

22, 23.] Nay, the relation between the members is so entirely different from this, that the very disparagement, conventionally, of any member, is the reason why more care should be taken of it. I understand by “those members of the body which seem to be more feeble,” those members which in each man’s case appear to be inheritors of disease, or to have incurred weakness. By this very fact, their necessity to him is brought out much more than that of the others.

23.] So also in the case of the parts which we think to be less honourable—on which usage has set the stamp of dishonour. Perhaps he alludes (as distinguished from “uncomely parts” below) to those limbs which we conceal from sight in accordance with custom, but in the exposure of which there would be no absolute indecency. So Chrysostom, “He says well which seem, and which we think (but I should draw a distinction between the two, in accordance with the above explanation of the weaker parts, and render the one which seem to be [of themselves], and the other, which we think [conventionally], on which see Acts xvi. 20, note), shewing that this verdict is given, not by the nature of things, but by public opinion.”

we bestow more abundant honour] viz. by clothing: honouring them more than the face, the noblest part, which we do not clothe.

our uncomely parts] Here there is no qualification, such as which seem, or which we think,—and no ambiguity. Chrysostom says, “These parts enjoy more honour: for even the miserably poor, if compelled to go with the rest of their body naked, will not endure to shew these parts unclothed.”

24.] The comely parts are in some measure neglected, not needing to be covered or adorned: but God (at the creation) tempered the body together (compounded it of members on a principle of mutual compensation),—to the deficient part giving more abundant honour.

25.] that there be no disunion (see ver. 21) in the body, but that the members may have the same care (viz. that for mutual well-being) for one another.

26.] And [accordingly], in matter of fact: we see that God’s temperament of the body has not failed of its purpose, for the members sympathize most intimately with one another.

if one... suffereth, all... suffer with it] “For,” says Chrysostom, “when the heel, as often happens, is pricked by a thorn, the whole body feels it, and is distressed: the back is bent, and the belly and thighs are contracted, and the hands, like attendants and servants, approach and draw out the offending substance, and the head leans over, and the eyes look for it with anxious care.”

or one... is honoured (literally glorified), all.... rejoice with it] Chrysostom again with equal beauty instances, “the head is crowned, and the whole man is glorified; the mouth speaks, and the eyes laugh and are joyous.” But perhaps the analogy requires that we should rather understand the glorification of those things which physically refresh or benefit the member, e.g. anointing or nourishment.

27.] Application of all that has been said of the physical body, to the Corinthians, as the mystical body of Christ: and to individuals among them, as members in particular, i.e. each according to his allotted part in the body. Each church is said to be the body of Christ, as each is said to be the temple of God (see ch. iii. 16, note): not that there are many bodies or many temples; but that each church is an image of the whole aggregate, a microcosm or little world, having the same characteristics.

28.] The divine disposition of the members in the spiritual body.

some was apparently intended to if followed by “others,” but meanwhile another argument, first, secondly, thirdly, occurs to the Apostle, and some is left uncorrected, standing alone.

in the (universal) church; a sense more frequently found in the Epistle to the Ephesians, than in any other part of St. Paul’s writings.

first apostles] Not merely the Twelve are thus designated, but they and others who bore the same name and had equal power, e.g. Paul himself, and Barnabas, and James the Lord’s brother: see also note on Rom. xvi. 7.

prophets] See above on ver. 10.

teachers] those who had the gift of expounding and unfolding doctrine and applying it to practice,—the word of wisdom and the word of knowledge.

miraculous powers] He here passes to the abstract nouns from the concrete,—perhaps because no definite class of persons was endowed with each of the following, but they were promiscuously granted to all orders in the church: more probably, however, without any assignable reason: as in Rom. xii. 6–8, he passes from the abstract to the concrete.

helpings] i.e. assisting the sick, and the like, forming one department of the ministrations of ver. 5: as do also governings, a higher department, that of the presbyters or bishops—the direction of the, various churches.

divers kinds of tongues] “Do you see where he places this gift, and how he uniformly assigns it the last rank?” Chrysostom. There certainly seems to be intention in placing this last in rank: but I am persuaded that we must not seek for a classified arrangement: here, as above, vv. 7–11, it seems rather suggestive than logical: the gifts of healings naturally suggesting the helpings,—and those again, the assistances to carry out the work of the church, as naturally bringing in the governings, the rule and guidance of it.

29, 30.] The application of the questions already asked vv. 17–19.

29. miracles] The words [workers of], supplied in the English text, have no representative in the original. The Apostle has above placed the concrete, apostles, prophets, teachers, in apposition with miraculous powers, and gifts of healings; and now proceeds with the same arrangement till he comes to gifts of healings, which being too palpably unpredictable of persons, gives rise to the change of construction, have all gifts of healings.

31.] But (he has been shewing that all gifts have their value: and that all are set in the church by God: some however are more valuable than others) do ye aim at the greater gifts (greater is explained ch. xiv. 5). This exhortation is not inconsistent with ver. 11: but, as we look for the divine blessing on tillage and careful culture, so we may look for the aid of the Spirit on carefully cultivated powers of the understanding and speech: and we may notice that the greater gifts those of prophecy and teaching, consisted in the inspired exercise of the conscious faculties, in which culture and diligence would be useful accessories.

Literally, an eminently excellent way, viz. of emulating the greatest gifts:—so Theophylact: “and herewith if ye must at all events be ambitious of gifts, I will shew you an eminent,” i.e. a more exalted “way, one which leads to all gifts that are: he means, the way of love.”

CHAP. XIII. 1–13.] THE PANEGYRIC OF LOVE, as the principle without which all gifts are worthless (1–8): its attributes (4–7): its eternity (8–12): its superior dignity to the other great Christian graces (13).—This may,” says Meyer, “without impropriety be ‘called a Psalm of Love:’”—the “Song of Love” of the New Test. (see Ps. xlvi. title). “On each side of this chapter the tumult of argument and remonstrance still rages: but within it all is calm: the sentences move in almost rhythmical melody: the imagery unfolds itself in almost dramatic propriety: the language arranges itself with almost rhetorical accuracy. We can imagine how the Apostle’s amanuensis must have paused to look up in his master’s face at the sudden change of his style of dictation, and seen his countenance lighted up as it had been the face of an angel, as the sublime vision of divine perfection passed before him.” Stanley.

1.] Though I speak (or, should speak) supposes a case which never P has been exemplified: even if I can speak.

with the tongues of men and of angels] “See where he sets out: first beginning with that which seemed to them so great and wonderful, the gift of tongues.” Chrysostom. It is hardly possible to understand tongues here of any thing but articulate forms of speech: i.e. languages. See note on Acts ii, 4.—Of men (generic) and of angels (generic): i.e. of ‘all men and all angels,’ whatever those tongues may be.

love] LOVE to all, in its most general sense, as throughout the chapter: no distinction being here drawn between love to man and to God, but the general principle dealt with, from which both spring. The ‘caritas’ of the Latin versions has occasioned the rendering ‘charity’ in most modern versions. Of this word Stanley remarks, “The limitation of its meaning on the one hand to mere almsgiving, or on the other to mere toleration, has so much narrowed its sense, that the simpler term ‘Love,’ though too general exactly to meet the case, is now the best equivalent.”

I am become] the case supposed is regarded as present: ‘if I can speak.... I am become.

sounding brass] Brass of any kind, struck and yielding a sound: i.e. something insensible and inanimate. No particular musical instrument seems to be meant.

cymbal] “Cymbals,” says Josephus, “were large broad plates of brass.” The Hebrew name for them is most expressive, “Tzeltzelim.” There appear to have been two sorts, mentioned in Ps. cl. 5, “sweet (well-tuned) cymbals,” and “loud (high-sounding) cymbals.” Winer thinks the former answered to our castagnettes, the latter to our cymbals. The larger kind would be here meant.

2.] all mysteries are all the secrets of the divine counsel,—see Rom. xi. 25 (note); xvi. 25. The knowledge of these would be the perfection of the gift of prophecy.

all faith (literally, all the faith) hardly, as Stanley, implies, ‘all the faith in the world,’ but rather, ‘all the faith required to,’ &c.; or perhaps the article conveys the allusion to our Lord’s saying, Matt. xvii. 20; xxi. 21, ‘all that faith,’ so as, &c.

3.] “The true and most significant sense is ‘though I dole away in mouthfuls all my property or estates.’ Who that has witnessed the almsgiving in a Catholic monastery, or the court of a Spanish or Sicilian bishop’s or archbishop’s palace, where immense revenues are syringed away in farthings to herds of beggars, but must feel the force of the Apostle’s half-satirical expression?” MS. note by Coleridge, quoted by Stanley.

give up my body that I may be burned] So in Dan. iii. 28, “they yielded their bodies,” the Septuagint has, “to the burning,” but the Hebrew and A.V. omit this. See also 2 Macc. vii. 37. He evidently means in self-sacrifice: for country, or friends. Both the deeds mentioned in this verse are such as ordinarily are held to be the fruits of love, but they may be done without it, and if so are worthless. The variation indicated in the margin is the reading of three of our oldest MSS. It differs only by one letter from that in the text: the verb for “be burned” being “kauthesōmai,” that for “boast” being “kauchesōmai.” It is not easy to decide between the two. The objection to “that I may boast” seems to be that it introduces an irrelevant and confusing element, a boastful motive, into a set of hypotheses which put forward merely an act or set of acts on the one side, and the absence of love on the other, and indeed, worse still, that it makes an hypothesis which would reduce the self-sacrifice to nothing, and would imply the absence of love; and so would render the “yet have not love” unnecessary.

4-7.] The blessed attributes of love.

4.] longsuffering is the negative side, kindness the positive, of a loving temper: the former the withholding of anger; the latter, the exercise of kindness.

envieth not] the word in the original means more,—‘knows neither envy nor jealousy:’ both are included under it.

vaulteth not itself] The word in the original is an universal one; a good definition of its meaning is given by Basil, as including “all that a man takes upon himself, not from duty or necessity, but for the sake of self-exaltation.” An equivalent English expression would perhaps be, displays not itself.

5.] doth not behave itself unseemly appears to be general, without particular reference to the disorders in public speaking with tongues.

its own] Love is so personified, as here to be identified with the man possessing the grace, who does not seek his own: see ch. x. 33.

imputeth not the evil] “not only plots no evil, but does not even suspect any against the beloved person,” Chrysostom: and this is better and more accordant with the sense of the verb used, than the more general rendering, ‘thinketh no evil.’ And we must not overlook the article, which seems here to have the force of implying that the evil actually exists; ‘the evil’ which is,—but Love does not impute it. So Theodoret: “It forgives those who have erred, having no suspicion that they have done so with bad motive.”

6.] rejoiceth not at (the) unrighteousness, i.e. at its commission by others, as is the habit of the unloving world.

rejoiceth with the truth] Most Commentators, as the A. V., altogether overlook the force of the verb and the altered construction, and render ‘rejoiceth in the truth:’ but the rendering in the text is the only one which preserves the force of the words: rejoices with the Truth, the Truth being personified, and meaning especially the spread among men (as opposed to unrighteousness) of the Truth of the Gospel, and indeed of the Truth in general,—in opposition to those who (Rom. i. 18) “hold down the truth in unrighteousness,”—who (2 Tim. iii. 8) “withstand the truth.”

7.] all things, i.e. all things which can be borne with a good conscience, and this applies to all four things mentioned: all things, viz., which can be borne, believed, hoped, or endured.

beareth] The verb is the same as that in ch. ix. 12, where see note. Some would render it here “covers,” but the variation in sense from ch. ix. is needless.

believeth] viz. without suspicion of another.

hopeth] viz. even against hope—hoping what is good of another, even when others have ceased to do so.

endureth] viz. persecutions and distresses inflicted by others, rather than shew an unloving spirit to them.

8–12.] The eternal abiding of love when other graces have passed away.

By whether, whether, whether, the general idea, gifts, is split into its species—be there prophesyings—be there speakings in tongues, be there knowledge.—Chrysostom and others understand the two first futures, shall be done away, and shall cease, of the time when, the faith being every where dispersed, these gifts should be no longer needed. But unquestionably the time alluded to is that of the coming of the Lord: see ver. 12. and this applies to all these, not to the last (knowledge) only. The two first, prophesyings and tongues, shall be absolutely superseded: knowledge relatively: the imperfect, by the perfect.

9, 10.] Reason given;—that our knowledge and our prophesying (utterance of divine things) are but partial, embracing but a part: but when that which is perfect (entire—universal) shall have come, this partial shall be abolished—superseded. See Eph. iv. 11–13, where the same idea is otherwise expressed.

11.] Analogical illustration of ver. 10.

The child (or babe) and the perfect are used in contrast, ch. ii. 6; iii. 1; xiv. 20.

I spoke, I thought (was minded, or felt), I reasoned (or judged). There can hardly be an allusion, as some think, to the three gifts, of tongues (I spoke), prophesy (I thought, which suits but very lamely), and knowledge (I reasoned).

now that I am become a man, I have brought to an end the ways of a child: not, as A.V., ‘when I became a man I put away....’ as if it were done on a set day;—this rendering is ungrammatical.

12.] Contrast between our present sight and knowledge,—and those in the future perfect state.

For justifies the analogy of the former verse: for it is just so with us.

now, in our present condition, until the Lord’s coming.

in a glass] literally, through a mirror: i.e. according to the popular illusion, which regards the object, really seen behind the mirror, as seen through it. We must think, not of our mirrors of glass, but of the imperfectly-reflecting metallic mirrors of the ancients.

obscurely] literally, in an enigma. There is a reference to the Septuagint version of Numb. xii. 8, “I will speak to him mouth to mouth, apparently, and not by enigmas.” We are almost obliged in an English version to take the words adverbially,—‘enigmatically’ (so A.V., ‘darkly’): but the strict propriety of the expression is thus disguised. “In an enigma” means, ‘in a dark discourse,’ viz. the revealed word, which is dark, by comparison with our future perfect knowledge.

then, i.e., “when that which is perfect is come;” ver. 10, “at the Lord’s coming, and after.”

face to face] literally, face towards face, i.e. by immediate intuition: so Gen. xxxii. 30.

I shall thoroughly know even as I was (during this life: he places himself in that state, and uses the aor. as of a thing gone by) thoroughly known.—In this life we are known by God, rather than know Him: see Gal. iv. 9; ch. viii. 3, note.—The sense of this important past tense must not be forced, as in A.V., to a present.

13.] Superiority of Love to the other great Christian graces.—Some gifts shall pass away,—but these three great graces shall remain for ever,—FAITH, HOPE, LOVE. This is necessarily the meaning,—and not that love alone shall abide for ever, and the other two merely during the present state. For (1) the words but now do not mean in this present state, as opposed to what has just been said, ver. 12,—but as things have been shewn to be,—at this stage of our argument,—and the inference from them is just the contrary of that implied in the other rendering: viz. that since tongues, prophesyings, knowledge, will all pass away, we have left but THESE THREE. (2) From the position of the verb abideth, it has a strong emphasis, and carries the weight of the clause, as opposed to the previously-mentioned things which shall be done away. (3) From the expression, these three, a preeminence is obviously pointed out for faith, hope, and love, distinct from aught which has gone before.—This being the plain sense of the words, how can faith and hope be said to endure to eternity, when faith will be lost in sight, and hope in fruition? With hope, there is but little difficulty: but one place has inscribed over its portals, “Leave hope behind, all ye that enter here.” New glories, new treasures of knowledge and of love, will ever raise, and nourish, blessed hopes of yet more and higher,—hopes which no disappointment will blight. But how can faith abide,—faith, which is the evidence of things not seen,—where all things once believed are seen? In the form of. holy confidence and trust, faith will abide even there. The stay of all conscious created being, human or angelic, is dependence on God: and where the faith which comes by hearing is out of the question, the faith which consists in trusting will be the only faith possible. Thus Hope will remain, as anticipation certain to be fulfilled: Faith will remain, as trust, entire and undoubting:—the anchor of the soul, even where no tempest comes. See this expanded and further vindicated in my Quebec Chapel Sermons, Vol. i. Serm. viii.

The greater (or in English, greatest) of these,—not ‘greater than these.’ “The greater,” as De Wette beautifully remarks, “because it contains in itself the root of the other two: we believe only one whom we love,—we hope only that which we love.’ And thus the forms of Faith and Hope which will there for ever subsist, will be sustained in, and overshadowed by, the all-pervading superior element of eternal Love.

CHAP. XIV. 1–25.] Demonstration of THE SUPERIORITY OF THE GIFT OF PROPHECY OVER THAT OF SPEAKING WITH TONGUES.

1.] Transition from the parenthetical matter of the last chapter to the subject about to be resumed. Pursue after Love (let it be your great aim,—important and enduring as that grace has been shewn to be): meantime however (during that pursuit; making that the first thing, take up this as a second) strive for spiritual gifts (gifts is not expressed in the Greek: see note on ch. xii, 1), but more (more than spiritual gifts in general: i.e. more for this than for others; chiefly) that ye may prophesy.

2–20.] Prophecy edifies the BRETHREN more than speaking with tongues.

2.] For he that speaketh in a tongue, speaketh not unto men; but unto God: for noone understandeth him (literally, heareth him: but obviously it is meant, hears with intelligence: i.e. as a general rule, the assembly do not understand him; some, who have the gift of interpretation of tongues, may,—but they are the exception), but (opposed to no one understandeth him) in the spirit (in his spirit, as opposed to in his understanding: his spirit is the organ of the Holy Ghost, but his understanding is unfruitful; see vv. 14, 15) he speaketh mysteries (things which are hidden from the hearers, and sometimes also from himself).

3.] But (on the other hand) he who prophesieth speaketh to men edification (genus), and (species) exhortation, and (species) consolation. See the definition of prophecy given on ch. xii. 10.

4.] that he edifieth himself does not necessarily involve his understanding what he speaks: the exercise of the gift in accordance with the prompting of the Spirit, may be regarded as an edification: the intensity of the feeling of prayer or praise in which he utters the words is edifying to him, though the words themselves are unintelligible. This view is necessary on account of what is said in ver. 5, that if he can interpret, he can edify not only himself but the church.

the church (i. e. the assembled Christians): see note on ch. xi. 18.

5.] He shews that it is from no antipathy to or jealousy of the gift of tongues that he thus speaks; but (force of the howbeit) that he wished them all to speak with tongues, but rather that they should prophesy. The distinction between the wishing them all to speak with tongues, as the simple direct object of the wish, and his wishing that they should prophesy, as its higher and ulterior object, has been lost in the A.V.

6.] Example of the unprofitableness of speaking with tongues without interpreting,—expressed in the first person as of himself.

But now] i.e. if this be so,—viz. that there is no edification without interpretation: see note on ch. xiii. 13.

if I come] Chrysostom understands the first person to imply ‘not even I myself should profit you,’ &c. But then some emphatic expression, such as “I myself,” would have been used.

in revelation] The ground of “prophecy,” is “revelation,” and that of “teaching,” is “knowledge:” the former being a direct speaking in the Spirit, and the latter a laying forth by the aid of the Spirit of knowledge acquired. Thus in, as referred to revelation and knowledge, denotes the internal element:—as referred to prophecy and teaching, the external element, of the spiritual activity.

7-11.] Instances, to shew that unintelligible discourse profits nothing. And first,

7-9.] from musical instruments.

7.] The renderings, ‘even things without life’ (A. V.), or ‘things which, though without life, yet give sound,’ are inadmissible.

Literally, If they shall not have yielded a distinction (of musical intervals) in their tones, how shall be known that which is being played on the flute, or that which is being played on the harp (i. e. what tune is played in either case: repetition being made to shew that two distinct instances are contemplated, not necessarily ‘one tune, either piped, or harped’)? The observation of Meyer, that this example is decisive against foreign languages being spoken in the exercise of this gift, is shewn to be irrelevant by the next example, from which the contrary might be argued—the uncertain sound of the trumpet being exactly analogous to an unknown language, not to an inarticulate sound. But the fact is that all such inferences, from pressing analogies close, are insecure.

8.] uncertain, in its meaning: for a particular succession of notes of the trumpet then, as now, gave the signals for attack, and retreat, and the various evolutions of an army.

9.] Application of these instances.

by the tongue is most naturally understood physically, by means of your tongue, as answering to the utterance of the sound by the musical instruments. But the technical rendering, “by means of the (unknown) tongue,” is allowable.

speaking into the air implies the non-reception by hearers of what is said.

10, 11.] Another example of the unprofitableness of an utterance not understood.

10.] It may be belongs to so many, this latter term representing some fixed number, but not assignable by the information which the writer possesses, or not worth assigning. See similar expressions, Acts v. 8,—and 2 Sam. xii. 8.

kinds of voices (i. e. languages)] The use of voices, and not tongues, is no doubt intentional, to avoid confusion, the word tongue being for the most part used in this passage in a peculiar meaning: but no argument can be grounded on it as to the tongues being languages or not.

none, i. e. none of them, no kind of voice.

is without signification; or, is inarticulate.

11.] If then, seeing that none is without meaning: for if any were, the imputations following would not be just. We assume that a tongue which we do not understand has a meaning, and that it is the way of expression of some foreign nation.

a barbarian,—a foreigner, in the sense of one who is ignorant of the speech and habits of a people.

12.] Application of the analogy, as in ver. 9.—The even so is evidently meant as in ver. 9, but is rendered somewhat difficult by the change of the construction into a direct exhortation. It is best therefore to give to it the meaning, after the lesson conveyed by this example.

Thus likewise ye (i. e. after the example of people who would not wish to be barbarians to one another,—avoiding the absurdity just mentioned), emulous as ye are of spiritual gifts (reff.), seek them to the edifying of the church, that ye may abound: not, as in A. V., ‘seek that ye may excel (abound in them) to the edifying of the church.’

13.] Hortatory inference from the fore-going examples.

my spirit, not as in ver. 32, and Chrysostom, “the spiritual gift given to me, and moving my tongue,”—but as in Acts xvii. 16, my (own) spirit, taking himself as an example, as above, ver. 6: a use of the word familiar to our Apostle, and here necessary on account of “my mind” following, ‘When I pray in a tongue, my higher being, my spirit, filled with the Holy Ghost, is inflamed with holy desires, and rapt in prayer: but my intellectual part, having no matter before it on which its powers can be exercised, bears no fruit to the edification of others (nor of myself:’ but this is not expressed in the word “unfruitful:” see the usage of “fruit,” by St. Paul, Rom. i. 13; vi. 21, 22; xv. 28; Gal. v. 22).

15.] What then is (the case)? (i. e. as our ‘What then?’ See Rom. iii. 9; vi. 15.—‘What is my determination thereupon?’)—I will pray with my spirit, but I will pray also with my mind (i. e. will interpret my prayer for the benefit of myself and the church), &c. This resolution, or expression of self-obligation, evidently leads to the inference by and by clearly expressed, ver. 28, that if he could not pray with his mind, he would keep silence.

I will sing] hence we gather that the two departments in which the gift of tongues was exercised were prayer and praise. On the day of Pentecost it was confined to the latter of these.

16.] The discourse changes from the first person to the second, because the hypothesis contains an imputation of folly or error.

Literally. if thou shalt have blessed in spirit (“in” used of the manner in which, the element; not of the specific instrument, as in the last verse), how shall he that fills (i. e. is in) the situation of a private man (the word here used, in speaking of any business or trade, signifies a lay person, i.e., one unacquainted with it as his employment. Thus in state matters, it is one out of office, in philosophy, one uneducated and rude. So here it is, one who has not the gift of speaking and interpreting.—The word situation or place is not to be taken literally, as if these “private men” had any separate seats in the congregation: the expression is figurative) say the AMEN (the Amen which is always said: see Deut. xxvii. 15–26; Neh. viii. 6. From the synagogue it passed into the Christian church; so Justin Martyr says, “When the president has finished the prayers and the thanksgiving, the whole people present give assent, saying, Amen”) to (at the end of) thy thanksgiving, since what thou sayest he knows not?—This is, as Doddridge has remarked, decisive against the practice of praying and praising in an unknown tongue, as ridiculously practised in the church of Rome.

17.] well is not ironical, but concessive; it is not the act of thanksgiving in a tongue that the Apostle blames, for that is of itself good, being dictated by the spirit: but the doing it not to the edification of others.

the other] the private man spoken of before.

18, 19.] Declaration of his own feeling on the matter, highly endowed as he was with the gift. —I thank God I speak with a tongue (have the gift of speaking with tongues) more than you all.

19.] in (the) assembly, ‘in the congregation.’ This is the best rendering here, and wherever there is a chance of the word church being mistaken as meaning a building.

20.] With this exhortation he concludes this part of his argument, in which he reproves the folly of displaying and being anxious for a gift in which there was no edification. Bengel remarks that the address, Brethren, carries with it kindness and meekness.

in your understanding] as this preference would shew you to be.

21–25.] By a citation from the Old Test. he takes occasion to shew that tongues are a sign to the unbelieving only: and that even for them they are profitless in comparison with prophecy.

21.] In the law is here in the wider sense, as in John x. 84; xii. 34; xv. 25;—where the Psalms are thus quoted. The context of the passage quoted is thus: The scoffers in Jerusalem (see ver. 14) are introduced as scorning the simplicity of the divine commands, which were line upon line, precept upon precept, as if to children (vv. 9, 10). Jehovah threatens them that, since they would not hear these simple commands, He would speak to them by men of other tongues, viz. the Assyrians, their captors.—Here, as in many other cases, the historical sense is not so much considered, as the aptness of the expressions used for illustrating the matter in hand; viz. that belief would not be produced in the unbelieving by speaking to them in strange tongues.

With (literally, in: in the person of) men of other tongues: A.V., and Hebrew, have it with another tongue; and it is placed second. The Apostle personifies it, and gives it the prominence.

in (as speaking in, using as the organ of speech) lips of others (strangers, see ref.). Hebrew, ‘in (by) stammerers of lip’; A.V. ‘with stammering lips’.

unto this people] in Isa., the Israelites: here taken generally for the unbelieving world. v for all that they will not hear me] This is the point of the passage for St. Paul’s argument: see ver. 23:—“for them, and not for us: but even for them, protitless in the main”—not even under such circumstances will they listen to me: even this sign will be for them ineffectual.

22.] So then, viz. according to the words of the foregoing prophetic passage.

the tongues, in the then acceptation of the term. He is not interpreting the prophecy, nor alluding to the tongues there spoken of, but returns back to the subject in hand—the tongues about which his argument was concerned:

are for a sign: but there is no emphasis on the words,—the meaning being much the same as if “for a sign” were omitted, and it stood “so then the tongues are not for,” &c. Not seeing this, Commentators have differed widely about the meaning of the word sign. But all dwelling on this word would introduce an element foreign to the argument, which is, that tongues are (sign) for the unbelieving, not for the believing.

not to them that believe, but to unbelievers, i.e. ‘men who do not believe;’ not, as Neander, and others, ‘men who will not believe;’ the word “unbelievers” must be kept to the same sense through this whole passage, and plainly by ver. 23, it is not one who will not believe, but an unbeliever, open to conviction. The mistake has been occasioned by regarding those to whom the prophecy was directed, and interpreting Paul by Isaiah, instead of by himself.

Prophecy, i. e. inspired and intelligent exposition of the word and doctrine, was eminently for believers, but, as below, would be also profitable to unbelievers, furnishing a token that God was truly among his assembled servants.

23–25.] Instances given of the opera-tion of both on the ungifted or the un-believer.

23.] therefore following up the axiom just laid down, by supposing a case = if then....—The first case put answers to the former half of ver. 22: the second, to the latter.—The supposition is this: that all the (Corinthian) church is assembled, and all its members speak with tongues (not in a tumultuary manner—that is not part of the present hypothesis, for if it were, it must apply equally to ver. 24, which it clearly cannot: but that all have the gift, and are in turn exercising it):—then private persons, ‘plain believers,’ persons unacquainted with the gift and its exercise, come in. It is obvious that the hypothesis of all being assembled, and all having the gift, must not be pressed. to infer that no such private person could be found: no one hypothesizes thus rigidly. If any will have it so, then, as Meyer, we may suppose the private persons to come from another congregation: but the whole difficulty seems to me mere trifling. The private person plainly cannot be an unbeliever, for his case is separately mentioned. Such plain men, or perhaps a company of unbelievers, have come in:—they have no understanding of what is going on: the ‘tongues’ sound to them an unmeaning jargon; and they come to the conclusion, ‘These men are mad;’ just as men did infer, on the day of Pentecost, that the speakers were drunken.

24.] But if all (see above) prophesy (i. e. intelligibly lay forth, in the power of the Spirit, the Christian word and doctrine), and there enter any (singular now, setting forth that this would be the effect in any case: plural before, to shew that however many there might be, not one could appreciate the gift) unbeliever or plain man (the unbeliever is mentioned first now, because the great stress is on the power of prophecy in its greatest achievement, the conversion of the unbeliever; but the private persons were first before, because the stress there was on the unprofitableness of tongues, not only to the unbeliever, but to the “plain men” also), he is convicted by all (the inspired discourse penetrating, as below, into the depths of his heart,—by all, i.e. by each in turn): he is searched into by all (each inspired speaker opening to him his character): the hidden things of his heart become manifest (those things which he had never before seen are revealed,—his whole hitherto unrecognized personal character laid out. Instances of such revelations of a man to himself by powerful preaching have often occurred, even since the cessation of the prophetic gift): and thus (thus convicted, searched, revealed to himself:—in such a state of mind) having fallen on his face he will worship God, announcing (by that his act, which is a public submission to the divine Power manifest among you: or, but not. so well, aloud, by declaration of it in words) that of a truth (implying that previously he had regarded the presence of God among, them as an idle tale; or, if a plain Christian, had not sufficiently realized it) God is among you (or in each of you: by His Spirit).—In this last description the “private person” is thrown into the background, and (see above) the greater achievement of prophecy, the conviction and conversion of the unbeliever, is chiefly in view. “For a similar effect of the disclosure of a man’s secret self to himself, compare the fascination described as exercised by Socrates over his hearers by the ‘conviction’ and ‘judgment’ of his questions in the Athenian market-place. Grote’s Hist. of Greece, 609–611.” Stanley.

26–35.] Regulations respecting the exercise of spiritual gifts in the assemblies.

26.] The rule for all, proceeding on the fact of each having his gift to contribute when they come together: viz. that all things must be done with a view to edification.

Literally, whenever ye happen to be assembling together: the present vividly describes each coming with his gift, eager to exercise it.

a psalm] most probably a hymn of praise to sing in the power of the spirit, as did Miriam, Deborah, Symeon, &c. See ver. 15.

a doctrine] an exposition of doctrine or moral teaching: belonging to the gift of prophecy, as indeed do also psalm and revelation, the latter being something revealed to him, to be prophetically uttered.

a tongue, i.e. an act of speaking in tongues: see vv. 18, 22.

an interpretation] See below, and ver. 5.

Let all things be done unto edification] THE GENERAL RULE, afterwards applied to the several gifts: and 27, 28.] to the speaking with tongues.

27.] by two (at each time, i.e. in one assembly: not more than two or three might speak with tongues at each meeting), or at the most three, and by turn (one after another, not together); and let one (some one who has the gift,—and not more than one) interpret (what is said in the tongue).

28.] But if there be not an interpreter, let him (the speaker in a tongue) be silent in the church; but (so in original, i.e. let him not quench his gift, but exercise it in private) let him speak for himself and for God (i. e. in private, with only himself and God to witness it. Theophylact thinks it means, “softly and quietly, to himself:” which does not seem to agree with the conditions; the speaking being essential to the exercise of the gift).

29–33.] Similar regulations for PROPHECY.

29.] two or three, viz. at one assembling;—not together; this is plainly prohibited, ver. 30. There is no “at the most,” as in the other case, because he does not wish to seem as if he were limiting this most edifying of the gifts.

the others, i.e. prophets,—or perhaps, any person possessing the gift of discerning of spirits mentioned ch. xii. 10 in immediate connexion with prophecy. Such would exercise that gift, to determine whether the spirit was of God: see ch. xii. 3; 1 John iv. 1–3.

30.] But if a revelation shall have been made to another (prophet) while sitting by, let the first (who was prophesying) hold his peace (give place to the other: but clearly, not as ejected by the second in any disorderly manner: probably, by being made aware of it and ceasing his discourse),

31, 32.] He shews that the keeping silent of the first is no impossibility, but in their power to put into effect.—For ye have the power (the primary emphasis of the sentence is on ye can, which is not merely permissive, as A.V., ‘ye may,’ but asserts the possession of the power) one by one all to prophesy (i. e. you have power to bring about this result—you can be silent if you please), in order that all may learn, and all may be comforted (or, exhorted).

32.] And (not, for: but a parallel assertion to the last, ‘ye have power, &c. and’) spirits of prophets (i. e. their own spirits, filled with the Holy Spirit: not the Spirit of God within each: and so in ver. 12: the inspired spirit being regarded as a spirit in a peculiar sense—from God, or otherwise. See the distinction plainly made 1 John iv. 2: “In this ye know the Spirit of God: every spirit,” &c.) are subject to prophets (i. e. to the men whose spirits they are. But very many Commentators take the word to signify other prophets. “The gift that is in thee, and the working of the spirit which is in thee, is subjected to the gift of the other, who is moved to prophesy,” Theophylact. But the command “let the first keep silence,” would be superfluous, if his gift was in subjection to another).)

33.] Reason of the above regulations. The premiss, that the church is God’s church, is suppressed. He is the God of peace, not confusion: therefore those assemblies which are His, must be peacefully and orderly conducted. And this character of God is not one dependent for its truth on preconceived views of Him:—we have a proof of it wherever a church of the saints has been gathered together. ‘In all the churches of the saints, God is a God of peace: let Him not among you be supposed to be a God of confusion’ I am compelled to depart from the majority of modern critics of note, who join these words, “As in all the churches of the saints,” with what follows,—and to adhere to the common arrangement of this latter clause. My reason is, that taken as beginning the next paragraph, the clause would be harsh beyond example, and superfluous, as anticipating the reason about to be given, “for it is not permitted,” &c. Besides which, it is more in accordance with St. Paul’s style, to place the main subject of a new sentence first, see 1 Tim. iii. 8, 11, 12; and we have an example of reference to general usage coming in last, in aid of other considerations, ch. xi. 16: but it seems unnatural that it should be placed first in the very forefront of a matter on which he has so much to say.

34, 35.) Regulation prohibiting women to speak publicly in the church, and its grounds.

34. but [supply, it is ordered them] to be in subjection] The same construction, where a second verb must be supplied from the context, occurs 1 Tim. iv. 3. See there.

the law] See reference. Their speaking in public would be of itself an act of in dependence; of teaching the assembly, and among others their own husbands.

35.] This prohibits another kindred irregularity—their asking questions publicly. They might say in answer to the former command to keep silence, ‘But if we do not understand any thing, are we not to ask?’ The stress is on learn.

their own, confining them to their own husbands, to the exclusion of other men.

a shame] See ch. xi. 6: indecent, bringing deserved reproach.

36–40.] GENERAL CONCLUSION: the unseemliness and absurdity of their pretending to originate customs unknown to other churches, as if the word of God first went forth from them: and the enforcement of his apostolic authority. Then, a summary in a few words of the purport of what he has said on the spiritual gifts, and a repetition, in another form, of the fundamental precept, ver. 26.

36.] This question seems to refer to all the points of church custom which he has been noticing, and to be inseparably connected with what follows,—the recognition of his apostolic orders, as those of God.

37.] spiritual, i.e. one spiritually endowed: not quite as in ch. ii. 15. the things which I am writing, viz. ‘these regulations which I am now making.’

the Lord’s, emphatic: the Lord’s [commandment]: carrying His authority. No more direct assertion of inspiration can be uttered than this. “Paul stamps here: the seal of apostolic authority: and on that seal is necessarily Christ.” Meyer.

38. let him be ignorant] implying both the hopelessness of reclaiming such an one, and the little concern which his opposition gave the Apostle. Some of our principal MSS. have this verb in the passive, he is unknown, i.e. as we now say, he is ignored, seal. by God: compare ch. viii. 2, 35 xiii. 12; Gal. iv. 9.

39.] The words earnestly desire and forbid not express the different estimations in which he held the two gifts.

40.] But, i.e. only provided, that...

in order] i.e. in right time and in due proportion.

1 Corinthians: Chapter 15

CHAP. XV.] OF THE RESURRECTION OF THE DEAD; WHICH SOME IN THE CORINTHIAN CHURCH DENIED.

For the enquiry, WHO they were that denied the Resurrection, see note on ver. 12.

1–11.] The Apostle lays the foundation of his intended polemical argument in the historical fact of the RESURRECTION OF CHRIST. But he does not altogether assume this fact. He deals with its evidence, in relating minutely the various appearances of the Lord after His Resurrection, to others, and to himself. Then, in ver. 12, the proclamation of Christ’s Resurrection as the great fact attending the preaching of the gospel, is set against the denial of the Resurrection by some of them, and it is subsequently shewn that the two hang together, so that they who denied the one must be prepared to deny the other; and the consequences of this latter denial are pointed out. But it by no means follows, as some have assumed, that the impugners were not prepared to deny the Resurrection of Christ.—The Apostle writes not only for them, but for the rest of the Corinthian believers, shewing them the historical certainty, and vital importance of Christ’s Resurrection, and its inseparable connexion with the doctrine which they were now tempted to deny.

1, 2.] I make known: not, as most Commentators, ‘I remind you,’ nor, ‘I direct your attention to’ (both which meanings are inadmissible, from the usage of the word); but as text, I make known, i.e. ‘make known anew:’ not without some intimation of surprise, and reproach to them:—the (whole) gospel; not merely the Death and Resurrection of Christ, which were primary parts of it; the reproach still continues; as if he had said, ‘I am constrained to begin again, and declare to you the whole gospel which I preached to you.'

which also ye received] The thrice repeated also indicates a climax:—which ye also received, in which moreover ye stand, by means of which ye are even being saved (in the course of salvation).

Literally, if ye hold fast, with what discourse I preached to you. He is speaking of the import, not of the grounds of his preaching: for of this he reminds them below, not of the arguments.

unless ye believed] The only chance if you hold fast what I have taught you, of your missing salvation, is the hardly supposable one, that your faith is vain, and the gospel a fable; see ver. 14, of which this is an anticipation:—unless (perchance) ye believed (not as A.V. ‘have believed,’ which confuses the idea: it is, ‘became believers’) in vain. So Chrysostom, who remarks: “At first he says this softly and cautiously, but he kindles as he goes on, and presently bares his head and shouts out, ‘If Christ is not risen, &c.’” This explanation of the words appears to me the only tenable one. Some understand them of a vain and dead faith, which the Apostle will not suppose them to have. But surely if the previously expressed condition, not holding fast what they had heard, were fulfilled, their faith could not be vain or dead; and again the accurate rendering of the verb is against this interpretation: unless ye became believers in vain, not, “unless, faith has been a vain one.” A still further reason is, the parallelism of “believed in vain” here and “so ye believed,” ver. 11: leading to the inference that the term “in vain” here relates not to the subjective insufficiency of their faith, but to the (hypothetical) objective nullity of that on which their faith was founded.

3-11.] A detail of the great facts preached to them, centering in THE RESURRECTION OF CHRIST.

3. first of all] In relation, not to order of time, but to importance; this being, as Theophylact observes, as it were the foundation of the whole faith.

that which I also received] viz. (see ch. xi. 23 and note) from the Lord himself, by special revelation. Before his conversion he may have known the bare fact of the Death of Jesus, but the nature and reason of that Death he had to learn from revelation:—the Resurrection he regarded as a fable,—but revelation informed him of its reality, and its accordance with prophecy. On the following clauses, “the earliest known specimen of what may be termed the creed of the early Church,” it is well worth the English reader’s while to consult Stanley’s notes, and his dissertation at the end of the section.

for our sins] i. e., ON BEHALF OF OUR SINS: viz. to atone for them.

according to the scriptures] This applies to Christ’s Death, Burial, and Resurrection on the third day: see references.

4. he hath risen] The perfect tense marks the continuation of the state thus begun, or of its consequences.

5.] That the following appearances are related in chronological order, is evident from the use of the definite marks of sequence, then, after that,.... last of all.

he appeared to Cephas] See Luke xxiv. 34.

the twelve] used here popularly, as decemviri, and other like expressions, although the number was not full. The occasion referred to seems to be that in John xx. 19 ff.; Luke xxiv. 36 ff. Clearly we must not with Chrysostom suppose Matthias to be included as possibly having seen Him after His ascension: for the appearance is evidently one and the same.

6.] He drops the construction with “that,” dependent on “I delivered to you,” and proceeds in a direct narration. But evidently the sense of the former construction continues: he is relating what he had received and preached to them.

to above five hundred bre-then] From Matt. xxviii. 17, it appears (see note there) that others besides the eleven witnessed the appearance on the mountain in Galilee. But we cannot say that it is the appearance here referred to:—nor indeed is it likely that so many as 500 believers in Jesus would have been gathered together in Galilee: both from its position in the list, and from the number who witnessed it, this appearance would seem rather to have taken place at Jerusalem, and before the dispersion of the multitudes who had assembled at the Passover: for we find that the church at Jerusalem itself (Acts i. 15) subsequently contained only 120 persons.

remain] i.e., survive. The circumstance of most of them remaining alive is mentioned apparently by way of strengthening the evidence; “and can attest it, if required.”—hardly for the reason suggested by Stanley, that the dead among them would have been worse off even than others, if there were no resurrection, having been “tantalized by the glimpse of another world in the vision of their risen Lord.”

7. to James] Probably, from no distinguishing epithet being added, the celebrated James, the brother of the Lord: see Gal. i. 19. So Chrysostom, See notes on ch. ix. 5, Matt. xiii. 55, and the Introduction to the Epistle of James.—This appearance cannot however be identical with that additional one quoted by Jerome from the Gospel according to the Hebrews: “James had vowed that he would not eat bread, from the hour when he had drunk the cup of the Lord, until he should see him rising from the dead.” This would imply that the appearance was very soon after the Resurrection, and before any of those large collections of believers, in which James would naturally be present.

to all the apostles] This is decisive for the much wider use of the term apostle than as applying to the Twelve only: and a strong presumption that James, just mentioned, and evidently here and Gal. i. 19 included among the apostles, was not one of the Twelve. Chrysostom extends the term to the Seventy of Luke x., and others.

8.] But last of all, as to the abortively born, he appeared to me also, viz. on the road to Damascus. This, and this only, can here be meant; as he is speaking, not of a succession of visions, but of some one definite apparition.

9, 10.] Digressive, explanatory of the expression which he has just applied to himself.

9. I] The stress is on the personal pronoun: ‘I, and no other.’ to be called] ‘to bear the honourable name of an Apostle.’

10. But by the grace of God] “With the humiliating conviction of his own unworthiness is united the consciousness of that higher Power which worked on and in him,—and this introduces his chastened self-consciousness of the extent and success of his apostolic labours.” De Wette. The position of these words, and the repetition of “his grace” afterwards, shew the emphatic prominence which he assigns to the divine Grace.

what I am] viz. in my office and its results, The church has admirably connected this passage, as Epistle for the 11th Sund. after Trin., with that other speech of a Pharisee, Luke xviii. 11,—“God, I thank thee, that I am not as other men are;” see note there.

laboured] Spoken of his apostolic work, in all its branches; see Phil. ii. 16.

than they all] This may mean than all taken separately, or than all together. This latter, though preferred by some Commentators, seems hardly necessary, and introduces an element of apparent exaggeration.

yet not I] explanatory, to avoid misapprehension.

not I, however, but the grace of God with me (i. e. laboured with me).—That is,—the Grace of God worked with him in so overwhelming a measure, compared to his own working, that it was no longer the work of himself but of divine Grace. On the co-agency of the human will with divine Grace, but in subordination, see Matt. x. 20; 2 Cor. v. 20; vi. 1, and ch. iii. 9, note.

11.] He resumes the subject after the digression respecting himself:—it matters not whether it were I or they (the other Apostles)—SUCH is the purport of our preaching—SUCH was your belief:—so, after this manner, viz., that Christ died, was buried, and rose again, as verses 3, 4.

12–19.] On the fact of Christ's Resurrection, announced in his preaching, and confessed in their belief, he grounds (negatively) the truth of the general Resurrection:—If the latter be not to happen, neither has the former happened:—and he urges the results of such a disproof of Christ's Resurrection.

12.] introduces the argument for the resurrection, by referring to its denial among a portion of the Corinthian church.

But belongs to the whole question, and is opposed to “if we preach” and “so ye believed” of the foregoing verse.—The word Christ has the leading emphasis, as an example of that which is denied by some among you: But if CHRIST is (not subjunctive, be preached): he is arguing from a matter of fact, not from a mere hypothesis) preached that He is risen from the dead (if an instance of such resurrection is a fact announced in our preaching), how say some among you (how comes it to pass that some say) that a resurrection of the dead does not exist (stress on is, in reading the English text)? If the species be conceded, how is it that some among you deny the genus?

some among you] It is an interesting question, WHO these some were: and one which can only be answered by the indications which the argument in this chapter furnishes. (1) Were they Sadducees? If so, the Apostle would hardly have begun his argument with the fact of the Resurrection of Jesus. And yet we must remember that he is arguing not with the deniers, but with those who being as yet sound, were liable to be misled by them. But the opposition between Sadduceism and Christianity was so complete, that we have little reason to think that any leaven of the Sadducees ever found its way into the church. (2) Were they Epicureans? Probably not, for two reasons: (a) the Epicurean maxim, “Let us eat and drink,” &c., is represented as a legitimate consequence of adopting their denial of the resurrection, not as an accompaniment of, much less as the ground of it: and (b) had the Epicurean element entered to any extent into the Corinthian church, we certainly should have had more notice of its exceedingly antichristian tenets. It is possible that the deniers may have been, or been in danger of being, corrupted by mixture with Epicureans without, from the warning of ver. 33. (3) Were they Jews? If not Sadducees, hardly Jews at all, or Judaizers: a strong tenet of Pharisaism was this very one of the Resurrection, see Acts xxiii. 6: and we know of no tendency of Essenism which should produce such a denial. (4) They must then have been Gentile believers, inheriting the unwillingness of the Greek mind to receive that of which a full account could not be given, see vv. 35, 36: and probably of a philosophical and cavilling turn. Meyer argues, from the antimaterialistic turn of the Apostle’s counter-arguments, vv. 35 ff.,—that the objections were antimaterialistic also: De Wette infers the very opposite, which certainly seems to me more probable.—No trace whatever is found in the argument of an allegorizing character in the opponents, as was that of Hymenzus and Philetus, who maintained that the resurrection was past already, 2 Tim. ii. 17, 18, as some suppose.—Whether the Apostle regarded the resurrection of the body as inseparably bound up with a future existence of the soul does not very clearly appear in this chapter. From the use of the word “perished,” ver. 18, which must refer, not to annihilation, but to perdition, it would seem that he admitted an independent existence of the soul; as also from Phil. i. 23. But from ver. 32, it would seem that the Apostle regarded the denial of the resurrection as involving that of the future state and judgment.—On the question to which of the (supposed) Corinthian parties the opponents belonged, I have nothing to say, not recognizing the divisions into the Pauline, Apollonian, Petrine, and Christine parties as having any historical foundation; see note on ch. i. 12.

13.] But is the argumentative particle frequent in mathematical demonstrations.

then neither is Christ risen] This inference depends on the maxim, “that if the genus disappear, the species goes with it;” the Resurrection of Christ being an instance of the rule, that dead men rise; inasmuch as He is man, this is enlarged on, vv. 20–22.

14. but] again introducing a new inference.

vain, idle, ‘empty,’ ‘without result:’ in both clauses the adjective is placed first for emphasis.

also, i.e. if “Christ’s Resurrection be gone, then also our faith is gone.”

15.] false witnesses of (i. e. with regard to) God, not ‘of God, as belonging to God,’ as some: and false witnesses, as bearing false testimony (see below), not, as pretending to be witnesses, and not being.

16.] Repetition of the inference in ver. 13, for precision’s sake.

17, 18.] Repetition of the consequence already mentioned in ver. 14, but fuller, and with more reference to its present and future calamitous results.

17. to no purpose] The word is a different one from that used above, ver. 14, and more directly points at the frustration of all on which faith relies as accomplished,—e. g. the removal of the guilt and power of sin;—and of all to which hope looks forward, e.g. bliss after death for those who die in Christ. This is so, because Christ’s Resurrection accomplished our justification (Rom. iv. 25), and, through justification, our future bliss, even in the disembodied state (for that seems here to be treated of).

18.] they which fell asleep in Christ perished (i. e. passed into misery in Hades). He uses the past tenses, not perfects, speaking of the act. of death, not of the continuing state: the act of falling asleep in Christ was to them perdition.

in Christ] in communion with, membership of Christ.

On the word fell asleep, Meyer quotes a beautiful sentence from Photius: “When speaking of Christ, he calls it death, that he may confirm His suffering; but when speaking of us, he calls it sleep, that he may console our pangs. Again, where the resurrection is past, he is bold, and speaks of death: but where it is yet in hope, he speaks of sleep.”

19.] Assuming this perdition of the dead in Christ, the state of Christians is indeed miserable. It has perhaps not been enough seen that there are here two emphases, and that only belongs to the aggregate of both. According to the ordinary interpretation, ‘If in this life only we have hope in Christ...,’ it would be implied that in reality we s hall have hope in Christ in another state also, which would not agree with the perfect tense, we have had hope. The right arrangement gives the key to the sentence: ‘If only [in this life we have had hope in result...’—The perfect tense, we have had hope, implies the endurance of the hope through our lives.

Literally, we are more to be pitied (more miserable) than all men, viz. because they, all other men, live at ease,—we on the contrary are ever exposed to danger and death: because our hope is more intense than that of all others, and leads us to forego more: and to be disappointed in it, would be the height of misery.

20–28.] Reassertion of the truth that Christ IS RISEN from the dead,—and prophetic exposition of the consequences of that great event.

20.] now, ‘as matters now stand:’ see note on ch. xiii. 13.

as (the) firstfruits of them that sleep] The sense is, ‘Christ, in rising from the dead, is but the firstling or earnest of the resurrection of the whole number of those that sleep.’ There does not appear to be any intended reference to the legal ordinance of the firstfruits (Lev. xxiii. 10, 11): but however general the application of the analogy may be, it can hardly fail to have been suggested to the mind of a Jew by the Levitical ordinances, especially as our Lord rose on the very morrow after the Paschal Sabbath, when (l. c.) the firstfruits were offered.

of them that sleep] from the logical connexion, should mean, not the dead in Christ, but all the dead; see next verse: but it is the Christian dead who are before the Apostle’s mind.

21.] MAN the bringer-in both of death and life: explanation (not proof) of Christ being the “firstfruits of them that sleep:” and (1) in that He is MAN: it being necessary that the firstfruit should be as the lump. The verity lying at the root of this verse is, that by MAN ONLY can general effects pervading the whole human race be introduced.

22.] (2) In that He is (and here the fact of His being the Lord of Life and Righteousness, and the second and spiritual Head of our nature, are assumed) to us the bringer-in of LIFE, as Adam was the bringer-in of DEATH.

in Adam... in Christ] in community with, as partakers in a common nature with Adam and Christ: who are respectively the sources, to the whole of that nature (all men), of death, and life, i.e. (here) physical death, and rescue from physical death. The practice of St. Paul to insulate the objects of his present attention from all ulterior considerations, must be carefully here borne in mind. The antithesis is merely between the bringing in of death by Adam, and of life (its opposite) by Christ. No consequence, whether on the side of death or of life, is brought into consideration. That death physical involved death eternal—that life eternal (in its only worthy sense) involves bliss eternal, is not so much as thought of, while the two great opposites, Death and Life, are under consideration. This has been missed by many Interpreters, and the reasoning thereby marred. But the ancients, and the best of the moderns, keep to the universal reference. Theophylact’s note is clear and striking: “He adds the argument by which what has been said is confirmed. It was needful, he says, for the same nature which was defeated, itself to triumph, and for him who was stricken, himself to be victorious. For in Adam, i.e. because of Adam’s transgression, all men fell under death; and therefore in like manner in Christ all shall rise again: i.e. because Christ was found sinless, and not subject to death, because He died voluntarily, and rose again, because it was not possible that He should be holden of death, being the Prince of Life.” See on the great antithesis, Rom. v. 12 ff., and notes.

23.] But in this universal Resurrection ALL SHALL NOT HOLD THE SAME RANK. The word used does not mean order of priority, but rank, or ‘troop in an army.’ The three ranks are mentioned in order of priority, but this does not constitute their distinctive character: Christ is the firstfruits—this is His own rank, see Col. i. 18:—they that are Christ’s follow at His coming, who are the lump (as understood by the context, and implied by the term firstfruits), in the proper and worthiest sense, made like unto Him and partaking of His glory; then (after how long or how short a time is not declared, and seems to have formed no part of the revelations to St. Paul, but was afterwards revealed,—see Rey. xx. 4–6: compare also 1 Thess. iv. 15–17) shall come THE END, viz. the resurrection of the rest of the dead, here veiled over by the general term, the end,—that resurrection not being in this argument specially treated, but only that of Christians. The key to the understanding of this passage is to be found in the prophecy of our Lord, Matt. xxiv. xxv., but especially in the latter chapter. The resurrection and judgment of them that are Christ’s forming the subject of vv. 1–30 there, and the end,—the great final gathering of all the nations, of vv. 31–46.

the firstfruits, therefore necessarily the first rank: and hence the word stands first.

they that are Christ’s] The same as “the dead in Christ,” 1 Thess. iv. 16, No mention occurs here of any judgment of these his own servants, as in Matt. xxv., for it does not belong to the present subject.

at his coming] Literally, “in his coming,” as forming part of, involved in, His appearing,—which, as the great event of the time, includes their resurrection in it. It ought to be needless to remind the student of the distinction between this “coming of Christ” and the final judgment: it is here peculiarly important to bear it in mind.

24. Then] next in succession, introducing the third rank,—see above.

the end] the end of all: not the end of the resurrection, as some:—nor, of this present world, as Chrysostom and others,—which properly happens at the coming of Christ: nor exactly of the Kingdom of Christ, as Grotius and Billroth: but generally THE END, when all shall be accomplished, the bringing in and fulness of the kingdom by the subjugation of the last enemy, the whole course of the mediatorial work of Christ, the salvation of the elect; the time indicated by Matt. xxv. ult.:

when he (Christ) delivereth up (the present tense is used for that which is certainly attached to the event as its accompaniment. When is literally whenever, indicating the uncertainty of the time when) the kingdom to God and the Father, i.e., to him who is God and His Father.—Then the rest of the section as far as ver. 28, is in explanation of the giving up the kingdom. And it rests on this weighty verity: THE KINGDOM OF CHRIST over this world, in its beginning, its furtherance, and its completion, has one great end,—THE GLORIFICATION OF THE FATHER BY THE SON. Therefore, when it shall be fully established, every enemy overcome, every thing subjected to Him, He will,—not, reign over it and abide its King, BUT DELIVER IT UP TO THE FATHER. Hence, as in ver. 25, His reign will endure, not like that of earthly kings, WHEN HE shall have put all enemies under His feet, but only TILL He shall have, &c.,—and then will be absorbed in the all-pervading majesty of Him for whose glory it was from first to last carried onward. It may be observed (1) that the whole of this respects the mediatorial work and kingdom: the work of redemption, and that Lordship over dead and living, for which Christ both died and rose. Consequently nothing is here said which can affect either (1) His co-equality and co-eternity with the Father in the Godhead, which is prior to and independent of this mediatorial work, and is not limited to the mediatorial kingdom: or (2) the eternity of His Humanity: for that Humanity ever was and is subordinate to the Father; and it by no means follows that when the mediatorial kingdom shall be given up to the Father, the Humanity in which that kingdom was won, shall be put off: nay, the very fact of Christ in the body being the firstfruits of the resurrection, proves that His body, as ours, will endure for ever: as the truth that our humanity, even in glory, can only subsist before God by virtue of HIS Humanity, makes it plain that He will be VERY MAN to all eternity, the kingdom] That kingdom, which in its fullest sense is then first His. At this very time of the end, Matt. xxv. 34, He first calls Himself by the title of THE KING. The name will no sooner be won, than laid at the feet of the Father, thus completing by the last great act of Redemption the obedience which he manifested in his Incarnation, and in His death.

all rule, &c., not only hostile power and government, but as the context necessitates, ALL power. Christ being manifested as universal King, every power co-ordinate with His must come under the category of hostile: all kings shall submit to Him: the kingdoms of the world shall become the Kingdoms of the Lord and of His Christ:—and see the similar expressions Eph. i. 21, where speaking by anticipation, the Apostle clearly indicates that legitimate authorities, all the powers that he, are included. Compare by all means Rev. xi. 15.

25.] See on the last verse:—this is the divine appointment with regard to the mediatorial kingdom, that it should last till, and only till, all enemies shall have been subdued to it.

till he... viz. Christ, not the Father: it is parallel with the former sentence, “when He shall have done away, &c.,” and included in the mediatorial acts of Christ, who in His world’s course goes forth “conquering and to conquer,” Rev. vi. 2. It is otherwise in ver. 27: see there.

26.] Death is the last enemy, as being the consequence of sin: when he is overcome and done away with, the whole end of Redemption is shewn to have been accomplished. Death is personified, as in Rev. xx. 14.

27.] Scriptural proof of the above declaration.

He, viz., from the Psalm, GOD, the Father.—See on the Psalm itself, Heb. ii. 7 ff. notes.

when he shall declare...] The meaning then is: ‘when God, who in Ps. viii. 6 has announced the subjection, shall hereafter have declared that this subjection is come to pass.’—This form of expression was suggested to the Apostle by his having already expressed himself in the words of a saying of God.

28.] On the sense, see above. “The interpretations, that subjection is only an hyperbolical expression for the entire harmony of Christ with the Father (Chrysostom and others): the limitation of it to His human nature (Theodoret, Augustine, and others), with the declarative explanation that it will then become plain to all, that Christ even in regard of His kingship is, on the side of His Humanity, dependent on the Father,—and the addition, that Christ will then in his divine nature reign with the Father (so Calvin): the interpretation (of the words the Son Himself!), as referring to Christ’s mystical Body, i.e. the Church (Theodoret),—are idle subterfuges.” De Wette. The refutation of these and all other attempts to explain away the doctrine here plainly asserted, of the ultimate subordination of the Son, is contained in the three precise and unambiguous words, the that God (alone) may be all [things] in all,—i. e. recognized as sole Lord and King: “all things will be subordinated to the Son,—the Son to the Father.” Bengel.

29–34.] ARGUMENTS FOR THE REALITY OF THE RESURRECTION, from the practice (1) of those who were baptized for the dead, (2) of the Apostles, &c., who submitted to daily peril of death.

29.] Else resumes the main argument, which has been interrupted by the explanation since ver. 23 of “each in his own order.” After it is an ellipsis of ‘if it be as the adversaries suppose.’

what shall they do? There is in these words a tacit reprehension of the practice about to be mentioned, which it is hardly possible altogether to miss. Both by the third person and by the words they which are, he indirectly separates himself and those to whom he is writing from participation in or approval of the practice:—the meaning being, what will become of—‘what account can they give of their practice?’

The participle is present, those who are [in the habit of being] baptized—not past, “those who have been baptized.” The distinction is important as affecting the interpretation. See below.

on behalf of the dead] viz. the same dead who are spoken of in the next clause and throughout the chapter as the subjects of the resurrection—not dead in any figurative sense.

the dead, the article marking the particular dead persons on behalf of whom the act took place. Before we pass to the explanation, it will be well to go through the next question: If dead men are not raised at all, why do they trouble themselves to be baptized for them (so, and not as in A.V., is the sentence to be arranged)? Thus much being said as to the plain meaning of the words used, there can be no doubt as to their interpretation. The only legitimate reference is, to a practice, not otherwise known to us, not mentioned here with any approval by the Apostle, not generally prevalent, but in use by some, of survivors allowing themselves to be baptized on behalf of (believing?) friends who had died without baptism. With the subsequent similar practices of the Cerinthians and Marcionites this may or may not have been connected. All we clearly see from the text, is that it unquestionably did exist. The other principal interpretations are discussed in my Greek Test. Bengel well says that “even to catalogue all of them would require a dissertation.” I may briefly say here that all labour under one of the following fatal faults, either: (1) they make the word dead figurative in meaning; (2) they give an unnatural sense to for, or in behalf of; or (3) they make the appeal to refer to some feature common to the baptism of all Christians. The only justifiable rendering, as given above, is adopted by Ambrose, and by Anselm, Erasmus, Grotius, &c., and recently by some of the principal modern expositors. The ordinary objection to it is, that thus the Apostle would be giving his sanction to a superstitious usage, or at all events mentioning it without reprobation. But this is easily answered, by remembering that if the above view is correct, he does not mention it without a slur on it;—and more completely still, by observing that he thus uses a custom which otherwise would displease him, to shew the untenableness of the error which he is combating: reserving, perhaps, the reprehension of the practice for its proper season. Stanley’s concluding remarks are worth quoting: “On the whole, therefore, this explanation of the passage (that given above) may be safely accepted, (1) as exhibiting a curious relic of primitive superstition, which, after having, as the words imply (?), prevailed generally in the apostolic church, gradually dwindled away till it was only to be found in some obscure sects, where it lost its original significance: (2) as containing an example of the Apostle’s mode of dealing with a practice, with which he could have no real sympathy; not condemning or ridiculing it, but appealing to it as an expression, however distorted, of their better feelings.”

30.] Not only the practice of those just spoken of, but his own, and that of those like him, who lived a life of perpetual exposure to death, were absurd, if there be no resurrection. Observe that the argument here applies coy to the future existence of the soul.

31.] To die day by day is a strong expression for to be daily in sight of death and expecting it. See 2 Cor. iv. 11.—This he strengthens by an asseveration, grounded on his boast of them as his work in Christ: not that this is immediately or proximately at stake in the matter, but much as we should say, “As I love you, it is true.” He would not think of deceiving those of whom he boasted before God in connexion with Christ.

32.] The stress of the first clause is on the words after the manner of men, and its meaning, merely as man, i.e. ‘according to this world’s views,’ ‘as one who has no hope beyond the grave;’ see ref. If thus only he fought, &c., where was his profit (seeing he despised all those things which, with such a view, might compensate for such a fight,—fame, praise, &c.)?

I fought with beasts (not as A.V. “I have fought:” he refers to one special occasion). How? and when? Most ancient and modern Commentators take the expression figuratively: of which use I have cited examples i in my Greek Test. And this explanation must be right: for his Roman citizenship would have precluded his ever being literally thrown to beasts: and even supposing him to have waived it, and been miraculously rescued, as many suppose, is it conceivable that such an event should have been altogether unrecorded in the Acts?—Adopting the figurative rendering,—we cannot fix on any recorded conflict which will suit the words. His danger from Demetrius and his fellow-craftsmen (Acts xix.) had not. yet happened (see Introduction, § vi. 2): but we cannot tell what opposition, justifying this expression, the “many adversaries” of ch. xvi. 9, may ere this have made to his preaching.

If dead men rise not, i.e. ‘if none of the dead rise.’ These words are best joined with the following, as Chrysostom and most of the Commentators: Theophyl., Beza, Bengel, Griesb., Meyer, De Wette, al.,—not with the preceding, as A.V. and others. For the expression “after the manner of men” already expresses their meaning in the preceding sentence: and the form of ver. 29 seems to justify this arrangement, besides that otherwise “Let us eat and drink, &c.” would stand awkwardly insulated.

Let us eat and drink...] In Isa. the words represent the recklessness of those who utterly disregard the call of God to weeping and mourning, and feast while their time lasts.

33.] The tendency of the denial of the resurrection, represented by the Epicurean maxim just quoted, leads him to hint that this denial was not altogether unconnected with a practice of too much intimacy with the profligate society around them.

Be not deceived, as in ch. vi. 9, introduces a warning against oral self-deception.

Evil communications corrupt good manners..] These words form an Iambic verse, and occur in this form in a fragment of the Greek comic poet, Menander.

34.] Awake out of (your moral) intoxication, already possessing you by the influence of these men.

righteously] i.e., so as to recover your righteousness, which you are in danger of losing.

ignorance] The stress is on this word: for some (the “some among you” of ver. 12, most probably, are hinted at, and the source of their error pointed out) have (are affected with) ignorance (an absence of all true knowledge) of God. I speak (or, I am speaking: it refers to the spirit of the whole passage) this to your shame. “Some” shews that these among them were not the heathen without:—the existence of such in the Corinthian church was a disgrace to the whole.

35–50.] The argument passes from the fact of the resurrection, already substantiated, to the MANNER of it: which is indicated, and confirmed, principally by analogies from nature.

35.] The new difficulty is introduced in the form of a question from an objector. This is put first generally, How..., In what manner,—and next specifically, With what kind of body are they to come (forth at that time)?

36–41.] Analogies illustrative of the question just asked: and first, that of seed sown in the earth (36–38).

36.] This similitude was used by our Lord of His own Resurrection, John xii. 24.

is not quickened] Its life is latent in it; but is not developed into quick and lively action without the death of the deposited seed,—i. e. its perishing, disappearing from nature.

37.] Before, the death of the seed was insisted on: now, the non-identity of the seed with the future plant. He names the plant the body which shall be, having already in his eye the application to the Resurrection.

38.] according as He pleased, viz. at the creation: the past tense setting forth the one act of the divine Will giving to the particular seed the particular development at first, which the species retains: whereas “pleaseth” would imply a fresh act of the divine Will giving to every individual seed his own body. But the whole gift to the species being God’s, to continue or withhold, the present tense, giveth, still holds good.

a body of its own] Such then being the case with all seeds, why should it be thought necessary that the same body should rise as was sown, or that God cannot give to each a resurrection-body, as in nature?

39–41.] And the more,—because we have examples from analogy of various kinds of bodies; viz. (1) in the flesh of animals (ver. 39): (2) in celestial and terrestrial bodies (ver. 40): (3) in the various characters of light given by the sun, moon, and stars.

40. celestial bodies] not, according to our modern expression, heavenly bodies,—for they are introduced first ver. 41, and if we apply these words to them, we must suppose the Apostle to have imagined the stars to be endowed with bodies in the literal sense: for he is here comparing not figurative expressions, but physical realities:—nor (as Chrysostom and others) the bodies of the righteous, as opposed to those of the wicked; for in these there is no organic difference whatever: but, as Meyer and De Wette, ‘the bodies of angels,’—the only heavenly organisms of which we are aware (except indeed the Resurrection-body of our Lord, and that of those few who have been taken into glory, which, as belonging to the matter in question, are not alleged) which will bear comparison with bodies on earth.

glory belongs to the celestial more strictly than to the terrestrial. In Luke ix. 26, we have, “in His own glory, and that of His Father, and that of the holy angels.”

41.] This third analogy is suggested by glory just before. There is no allusion whatever here, as some have imagined, to different degrees of glorification of the bodies of the blessed; the introduction of such an idea confuses the whole analogical reasoning: which is, that even various fountains of light, so similar in its aspect and properties, differ; the sun from the moon and the stars: the stars (and much more vividly would this be felt under the pure sky of the East than here) from one another: why not then a body here from a resurrection-body, both bodies, but different?

42–44 a.] APPLICATION OF THESE ANALOGIES TO THE DOCTRINE OF THE RESURRECTION.

42.] So, viz. in the entire diversity of that which is raised. again from the former body.

It is sown] “He might have said ‘is buried,’ bat he prefers is sown, that he may the better insist on the similitude of corn just brought forward.” Grotius.

43.] in dishonour (“for what is more loathsome than a decomposing corpse?” Chrysostom),—in glory: regarding, as throughout this argument (see on ver. 24), on! resurrection of the just: see Phil. iii. 21.

in weakness,—the characteristic of the lifeless body, which is relaxed and powerless. Chrysostom understands weakness of its inability to resist corruption: De Wette would refer it to the previous state of pain and disease: but it seems better to understand it of the powerlessness of the corpse, contrasted with in power,—or, in vigour, viz. the fresh and eternal energy of the new body free from disease and pain.

44, a natural body] an animal body, of which the “psyché,” the animal soul, was the acting and informing power. This soul having departed out of it, does not do away with the correctness of the predicate: its whole organism which still remains when it is sown, is arranged to suit this predominance of the animal soul.

a spiritual body] Theophylact, having explained a natural body as above, proceeds, “A spiritual body is one rich with the working of the Holy Spirit, and administered in all things by Him. For though now the Spirit worketh in us, yet not as it shall then, nor continuously. For when we commit sin, He departeth from us. And even when the Spirit is present, the soul administereth the body: but then the Spirit shall for ever abide in the body of the just.” But: this is not quite enough:—for thus the body might remain as it is, sin only being removed: whereas it shall be no longer a body in which the soul predominates to the subordination of the higher part, the spirit, but one in which the spirit, and that informed fully by the Spirit of God, shall predominate,—its organism being conformed not to an animal, but to a spiritual life: see on ch. vi. 13.—Some have understood spiritual to mean, ethereal, airy, but the other is certainly right.

44 b–49.] REASSERTION AND CONFIRMATION OF THE EXISTENCE OF THE SPIRITUAL BODY.

44 b.] If there exists an animal body, there exists also a spiritual; i.e. it is no more wonderful a thing, that there should be a body fitted to the capacities and wants of man’s highest part, his spirit, than (which we see to be the case) that there should be one fitted to the capacities and wants of his subordinate animal soul. The emphasis is both times on is, or exists.

45.] Confirmation of this from Scripture.

So, viz. in accordance with what has been just said.—The citation extends only to the words “man became a living soul;” “first” and “Adam” are supplied, as are also the concluding words, in which lies the real confirmation. The words quoted serve therefore rather for the illustration of man being a soul, than for a proof of the existence of the spiritual body.

last, as being the last HEAD of humanity,—to be manifested in the last times; or merely in contrast to the first.

became a life-giving spirit] When? This has been variously answered. The principal periods selected are His Incarnation, His Resurrection, and His Ascension. But it seems to me that the question is not one to be pressed: in the union of the two natures, the second Adam was constituted a life-bestowing Spirit, and is such now in heaven, yet having the resurrection-body. The whole complex of His suffering and triumphant state seems to be embraced in these words. That his resurrection-state alone is not intended, is evident from the words “from heaven,” ver. 47. He was a “life-giving spirit,” even while in the “natural (animal) body”; and is still such in the “spiritual body.” The life implied in the word life-giving, is the resurrection-life: see John v. 21, 28; Rom. viii, 11.

46.] But in the natural order, that which is animal precedes that which is spiritual.

47.] So exactly in Gen. ii. 7. God made man of the dust of the ground. Meyer has some excellent remarks here, with which I entirely agree:—“Since the body of Adam is thus characterized as a psychical (animal) body, as ver. 45, and animal organism involves mortality (ver. 44), it is clear that Paul treats of Adam not as created exempt from death: in strict accordance with Gen. ii. 7; iii. 19. Nor does this militate against his teaching that death came into the world through sin, Rom. v. 12. For had our first parents not sinned, they would have remained in Paradise, and would, by the use of the Tree of Life, which God had not forbidden them (Gen. ii. 16, 17), have become immortal (Gen. iii. 22). But they were driven out of Paradise, ere yet they had tasted of this tree (Gen. iii. 22), and so, according to the record in Genesis also, Death came into the world by sin.”

from heaven] either, in this glorified Body, at his coming: or, in his whole Personality as the God-man: this latter seems more probable from John iii. 18, where “the Son of man” is designated as “he that came down from heaven.”

48.] the earthly Adam: they that are earthly, his posterity on earth: the heavenly, Christ: they that are heavenly, His risen people. See, as admirably illustrating this verse, Phil. iii. 20, 21.

49.] The difference between the two readings (see margin) is occasioned, as in Rom. v. 1 (where see note), by the confusion of the long and short o in Greek. An exhortation would certainly here be entirely out of place; and the confusion of the two letters is so common, that it may be doubted whether we have a right to call this a various reading at all. The indefinite past tense bore (this form, rather than “bare,” which would be ambiguous in sound), not “have borne,” as A.V., is used, because the time imagined is when this life is past, and the resurrection instant...

50–54.] THE NECESSITY OF THE CHANGE OF THE ANIMAL BODY INTO THE SPIRITUAL, IN ORDER TO INHERIT GOD’ S KINGDOM. THE MANNER OF THAT CHANGE PROPHETICALLY DESCRIBED: AND THE ABOLITION OF DEATH IN VICTORY CONSEQUENT ON IT.

50. But this I say] He thus calls attention to something to be observed, and liable to be overlooked. Not only is the change of body possible, and according to natural and spiritual analogies,—but it is NECESSARY.

flesh and blood] equivalent to “the natural body,” the present organism of the body, calculated for the wants of the animal soul.

corruption... incorruption] the abstracts, representing the impossibility of the corrupt inheriting the incorrupt, as one grounded in these qualities.

doth... inherit] The present tense sets forth the absolute impossibility in the nature of things.

51.] He proceeds to reveal to them something of the process of the change at the resurrection-day. This he does under the name of a mystery, a hidden doctrine (see references).

We shall not all sleep] There is the most extraordinary variation of reading here. Several of our most ancient MSS., including the Sinaitic, read, “We shall all sleep, but we shall not all be changed.” But the Vatican MS. and the ancient Syriac version read as in our text. The variation probably arose from the difficulty presented by the fact that St. Paul and his readers had all died. Hence the “not” was transferred to the other clause, to the detriment of the sense. The emphasis is both times on all—“[All of us] shall not sleep, but [all of us] shall be changed.” i.e. “the sleep of death cannot be predicated of [all of us], but the resurrection-change can.

52. in a moment] literally, in an atom (of time): i.e. in a point of time absolutely indivisible.

at (literally, in, as part of the events of) the last trumpet-blowing] The word last must obviously not be refined upon as some have done, identifying it with the seventh trumpet of the Apocalypse;—nor pressed too closely as if there were necessarily no trump after it,—but is the trump at the time of the end, the last trump, in a wide and popular sense. See 1 Thess. iv. 16.

we] So also the Apostle speaks in 1 Thess. iv. 15,— “We that are alive, and remain to the coming of the Lord,” in which number he firmly believed that he himself should be: see 2 Cor. vi. ff., and notes.

53.] Confirmation of the last words, by a re-statement of the necessity of putting on incorruptibility and immortality.

this corruptible... this mortal] this indicating his own body. Compare on the figure of putting on, 2 Cor. v. 3 and notes.

54.] But when, &c. is repetition, in a triumphant spirit, of the description of the glorious change.

55.] TRIUMPHANT EXCLAMATION of the Apostle, realizing in his mind that glorious time; expressed nearly in the terms of the prophetic announcement of Hosea, xiii. 14, which the Septuagint renders, “‘Where is thy cause, O Death? where is thy sting, O Hadés?’” The figure of death as a venomous beast is natural, from the serpent, Gen. iii. Num. xxii.—The souls in Hadés being freed by the resurrection, Death’s victory is gone: sin being abolished by the change of the animal body (the source of sin) to the spiritual, his sting is powerless.

56.] See above: and compare Rom. v. 12, and vii.

57.] For this blessed consummation of victory over death, he breaks out in thanks to God, who gives it to us (present, as being certain) through our Lord Jesus Christ (the Name in full, as befits the solemnity and majesty of the thanksgiving).

58.] Conclusion of the whole by an earnest exhortation.

Wherfore—seeing that the victory is sure.

stedback, unmoveable] a climax:—in reference, viz. to the doubt which is attempted to be raised among you on this matter.

in the work of the Lord] The work of the Lord is the Christian life, with its active and passive duties and graces, the bringing forth the fruits of the Spirit.

knowing (as you do—being convinced by what has been said) that your labour (bestowed on the work of the Lord) is not vain (which it would be were there no resurrection) in the Lord.

1 Corinthians: Chapter 16

CHAP. XVI.] VARIOUS DIRECTIONS AND ARRANGEMENTS (1–18). SALUTATIONS (19, 20). AUTOGRAPH CONCLUSION AND BENEDICTION (21–24).

1–4.] Directions respecting the collection and trans-mission of alms for the poor saints at Jerusalem.

1. for the saints] i.e., the poor among the saints who were in Jerusalem, Rom. xv. 26. See also 2 Cor. viii. 1 ff.; ix. 1 ff; and on the poverty of the church at Jerusalem, note on Acts ii. 44. That poverty was no doubt increased by the continual troubles with which Jerusalem was harassed in this, the distressful close of the Jewish national history. See other causes in Stanley. That the mother church of Christendom should be thus, in its need, sustained by the daughter churches, was natural; and it is at the same time an affecting circumstance, to find him the most anxious to collect and bear to them this contribution whose former persecuting zeal had doubtless (see Acts xxvi. 10) made not a few of those saints widows and orphans.

as I gave order] We do not find any such order in the Epistle to the Galatians: ch. ii. 10 there being merely incidental. It had probably been given during his journey among them, Acts xviii. 23,—or perhaps by message (?) from Ephesus. Not as A.V., ‘as I have given order,’ but as I gave order.

He refers to the occasion, whatever it was, when that order was given.—Bengel remarks: “He proposes. the example of the Galatians to the Corinthians, that of the Corinthians and Macedonians to the Romans.” 2 Cor. ix. 2. Rom. xv. 26.

2.] On the observance of the first day of the week, see notes, Acts xx. 7, and Rom. xiv. 5. Here there is no mention of their assembling, which we have in Acts xx. 7, but a plain indication that the day was already considered as a special one, and one more than others fitting for the performance of a religious duty.

Literally, let each of you lay up at home whatsoever he may by prosperity have acquired (‘whatsoever he may be prospered in:’ i.e. the pecuniary result of any prosperous adventure, or dispensation of Providence), that there may not, when I come, THEN be collections to be made. His time would be better employed in imparting to them a spiritual benefit than in urging them to and superintending this duty.

3.] “See,” says Bengel, “how so great a man is unwilling to open any chink to suspicion.”

by (or with) letters cannot belong to ye shall approve, as in A.V.; (for what need of letters from them when he was with them, or before his coming, if the person recommended were not to be sent off before his arrival?) but is mentioned as the safe and—proper way of giving credentials to those sent;—them will I send,—the alternative which follows, of himself accompanying them, being already in the mind of the Apostle.

letters, plural,—meaning, either that each should have his letter of credentials,—or more probably, that Paul would give them letters to several persons in Jerusalem.—Meyer well remarks: “Hence we see how common in Paul’s practice was the writing of Epistles. Who knows how many private letters of his, not addressed to churches, have been lost? The only letter of the kind which remains to us (except the Pastoral Epistles), viz. that to Philemon. owes its preservation perhaps to the mere circumstance that it is at the same time addressed to the church in the house of Philemon. See ver. 2.”

4.] But if it (the occasion,—dependent on the magnitude of your collection) be worthy of my also taking the journey (i. e. if your collection be large enough to warrant an apostolic mission, in order to carry it—not said for security, nor to procure himself a fair reception at Jerusalem,—but with the sense of the dignity of an apostolic mission), they shall go in my company. This did apparently take place, see Acts xx. 4 ff.

5-9.] Taking up “when I am come,” he announces his plan of visiting them.

5.] This plan was a change from his former intention, which had been (see 2 Cor. i. 15, 16, and note) to pass through them to Macedonia, and again return to them from Macedonia, and thence to Judæa. This he had apparently announced to them in the lost Epistle alluded to ch. v. 9 (or in some other), and he now tacitly drops this scheme, and announces another. For this he was charged (2 Cor. i. 17 ff.) with levity of purpose:—but his real motive was, lenity towards them, that he might not come to them in sorrow and severity (2 Cor. i. 23; ii. 1). The second plan he adhered to: we find him already in Macedonia when 2 Cor. was written (2 Cor. ii. 13; viii. 1; ix. 2, 4), and on his way to Corinth (2 Cor. xii. 14; xiii. 1);—and in Acts xx. 1, 2, the journey is briefly narrated.

for Macedonia I pass through is not parenthetical, but pass through is opposed (by but) to to abide.—The present tense implies his now matured plan,—not as in the erroneous subscription of the Epistle, that he was on his way through Macedonia, when he wrote the word.

6. I shall abide] This, of which he speaks uncertainly, was accomplished; he spent (Acts xx. 3) three months, and those (ib. ver. 6) the three winter months in Greece, at Corinth.

ye, Meyer justly remarks is emphatic, and conveys an affectionate preference, in his present plan, for them.—Whither he should go from Corinth, was as yet uncertain, see ver. 4,

7. For I am not willing this time to see you in passing] There is a slight, but a very slight, reference to his change of purpose (see above): the word now, or this time, refers to the occasion, the news from ‘them of Chloe,’ which had made it advisable that he should not now pay them a mere passing visit.

for] ground of his not wishing to see them—but not the ultimate one, see above.

permit] literally, shall have permitted me, i.e. ‘if it shall so turn out, in the Lord’s direction of my work, that I shall then find my way open to do so.’

8, 9.] His present plan regarding his stay in Ephesus (where he was writing).

Pentecost] viz., that next coming. This probably happened so, or nearly so, notwithstanding the tumult of Acts xix.: for he already (see there, vv. 21, 22) was meditating his departure, and had sent on two of his company when the tumult occurred.

door, see reff.: an opportunity of action, great refers to the extent of the action thus opened before him: effectual to its requirements: neither of them (though “great” may be referred to a door) properly agreeing with the figure, but both with the reality.

many adversaries] See Acts xix. 9, 23 ff.

10, 11.] Recommendation of Timothy to their good reception and offices.—He had preceded Paul (Acts xix. 22) in the journey to Macedonia. From the expression if Timothy come, it would appear to have been probable, but not quite certain, that he would visit them. In ch. iv. 17 he is described as sent on for that purpose: so that the if may merely refer to the necessary uncertainties of the journey.

10. without fear] There must have been some special reason for this caution respecting Timothy besides that assigned by Meyer, &c., that he would naturally be depreciated as only a subordinate of Paul, whom so many of them opposed. His youth occurs to us, mentioned 1 Tim. iv. 12: but even that is not enough, and would hardly be intended here without some reference to it. De Wette’s conjecture may not be without foundation, that he was perhaps of a timid disposition. Meyer objects that we have no historical trace of this: but I think some are to be found in 1 Tim.:—e. g. iii. 15 (see note); v. 22, 23.

the work of the Lord] See ch. xv. 58, note.

11, in peace] without strife and contention.

for I look for him] “He says this,” observes Chrysostom, “as a caution to them, in order that, knowing that whatever treatment Timothy should receive at their hands would be reported to the Apostle, they might be more courteous to him.” “and at the same time,” adds Theophylact, “making Timothy more the object of their respect, when they heard how important he was to the Apostle, so that he expected him.” By with the brethren it would appear, comparing ver. 12, that more brethren besides Erastus (Acts xix. 22) accompanied Timotheus to Macedonia.

12.] Of Apollos: that he was not willing at present to go to them. He excuses Apollos from coming that the Corinthians might not imagine that the hindrance had arisen from him, the Apostle. Meyer remarks, perhaps the Corinthians had expressly desired that Apollos should be sent to them.

with the brethren] perhaps, those who went with Timotheus (see above): perhaps those who were to bear this letter, ver. 17.

and] not ‘but:’ it merely couples the exhortation with its result.

convenient time] The present time not seeming to him a suitable one: apparently on account of the divisions hinted at in the beginning of the Epistle.

13.] “To shew them that not on their teachers but on themselves depended their hopes of salvation, he says, watch, for that they were sleeping: stand, for that they were wavering: quit you like men, be strong, for they were shewing themselves cowards: let all you do be done in love, for that they were in strife.’ Chrysostom.

15–18.] Recommendation of the family of Stephanas to their honourable regard: and by occasion, expression of his own joy at the presence of Stephanas and his companions.

15.] the firstfruits; see Rom. xvi. 5: the first Achæan converts. This family were among the few baptized by Paul, see ch. i. 16.

to minister unto the saints] or, to service for the saints: in what way, does not appear: but perhaps, from the fact of Stephanas being at that time in Ephesus,—for journeys and missions.

16.] ye also, you in your turn,—in return for their self-devotion.

submit yourselves] viz. in honouring their advice and being ready to be directed by them: there is an allusion to ‘have set themselves’ above.

unto such] to such persons, meaning the individuals of Stephanas’s family, whom they knew.

17.] Perhaps Fortunatus and Achaicus were members of the family of Stephanas. The Fortunatus mentioned by Clement at the end of his Ep. i. to the Corinthians may be the same.

the coming] viz. to Ephesus.

that which was lacking on your part] or, the want of you; i.e. of your society.—Grotius interprets it, “What all ought to have done, they have done, viz. have given me information about your defects.” and holds them to have been “those of (the house of) Chloe,” mentioned in chap. i. 11. But it is very improbable that he should mention thus a family so distinguished as this: he names them just after, ch. i. 16, as the household of Stephanas:—and still more improbable that one of so fine feeling should add of the bearers of such tidings, they refreshed my spirit and your's, which would on that hypothesis be almost ironical.

18. and your's] This is a beautiful expression of true affection used in consciousness of the effect of this epistle on them: as if he had said, ‘it is to their presence here that you owe much of that in this my letter which I know will refresh and cheer your spirits.’ acknowledge therefore] i.e. recognize, hold in honour.

19, 20.] Salutations.

19. in the Lord] See note, Rom. xvi. 2. On Aquila and Priscilla, see Rom. xvi. 3, 4; Acts xviii. 2. They had removed from Corinth (Acts xviii. 1) to Ephesus (ib. 26), and had there, as subsequently at Rome (xvi. 3, 5), an assembly of the faithful meeting in their dwelling.

20.] All the brethren—the whole Ephesian church.

with an holy kiss] See Rom. xvi. 16, note.

21–24.] Autograph conclusion. The salutation is the final greeting, which, according to 2 Thess. iii. 17, was always in his own hand, the rest having been written (see Rom. xvi. 22) by an amanuensis.

22.] He adds, as in Col. iv. 18; Eph. vi. 24, some exhortation, or solemn sentence, in his own hand, as having especial weight. On the distinction between the two words used for “to love,” see notes on John xxi. 15. The negation here of the feeling of personal affection, “has no love in his heart for,” is worthy of note, as connected with the curse which follows.

let him be Anathema] On Anathema, see note, Rom. ix. 3:—let him be accursed.

Maran-atha (see A.V.) is an Aramaic expression for the Lord cometh, and is probably unconnected with Anathema, added perhaps as recalling some remembrance of the time when Paul was among them: at all events, as a weighty watchword tending to recall to them the nearness of His coming, and the duty of being found ready for it.

24. My love be with you] Because the Epistle had contained so much that was of a severe character, he concludes it with an expression of affection; so Chrysostom, “After so much fault-finding he does not turn away from them, but loves and embraces them, far off as they were:” i.e. “my love has nothing in it of human or carnal, but is spiritual, and in Christ.” Theophylact.

THE SECOND LETTER OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS

2 Corinthians: Chapter 1

CHAP. I. 1, 2.] ADDRESS AND GREETING.

1. by the will of God] See 1 Cor. i. 1, note.

Timothy our brother] So of Sosthenes, 1 Cor. i. 1; perhaps in this case with peculiar emphasis: see 1 Cor. iv. 17; 1 Tim. i. 2, 18; 2 Tim. ii. 1. On his being with Paul at this time, see Introd. to this Epistle, §ii. 4.

with all the saints] This, and the Epistle to the Galatians, were circular letters to all the believers in the respective countries: the variation of expression in the two cases ("to the churches of Galatia," Gal. i. 2) being accounted for by the circumstance that the matter of this Epistle concerned directly the church at Corinth, and indirectly all the saints in the province,—whereas that to the Galatians, being to correct deep-rooted Judaizing error, directly concerned all the churches of Galatia.—Achaia comprehended Hellas (Greece proper) and Peloponnesus (Morea); the province was so named by the Romans because they became possessed of them by subduing the Achaeans league. On the history of the province, see Acts xviii. 12 and note.

2.] See 1 Cor. i. 3.

3–11.] THANKSGIVING FOR DELIVERANCE FROM GREAT DANGER OF HIS LIFE:—HIS ABILITY TO COMFORT OTHERS IN AFFLICITION. Commentators have endeavoured to assign a definite purpose to this opening of the Epistle.—De Wette thinks that Paul had no definite purpose, except to pour out the thankfulness of his heart, and to begin by placing himself with his readers in a position of religious feeling and principle far above all discord and dissension. But I cannot agree with this. His purpose shews so plainly through the whole latter part of the chapter, that it is only consistent with verses 12–24 to find it beginning to be introduced here also. I believe that Chrysostom has given the right account: "The not coming annoyed and discomposed them, especially as he had promised he would come, but had spent all the time in Macedonia, and seemed to have preferred others to them. For this cause, knowing the feeling against him on this matter, he tells them the cause of his not coming. But he does not set it down plainly, nor does he say, 'I know that I promised to come, but as I was hindered by troubles, forgive me, and do not charge me with contumaciousness of purpose:' but manages the matter in another way, in a more dignified and trustworthy manner, exalting it by speaking of consolation in his troubles, that they might not even ask for the cause wherefore he disappointed them." The postponed journey to Corinth, through the latter part of the chapter, is coming more and more visibly into prominence, till it becomes the direct subject in ver. 23,

3.] Blessed (above all others) is the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ] Here, as in Rom. xv. 6, De Wette would render, "God, and the Father....." which grammatically is allowable; but I prefer the other rendering, on account of its greater likelihood and simplicity.

the Father of mercies] i.e. who has shewn us so great mercies. 4.] The Apostle in this Epistle uses mostly the first person plural, perhaps including Timothy, perhaps, inasmuch as he writes apostolically (compare "us the apostles," said of himself and Apollos, 1 Cor. iv. 9), as speaking of the Apostles in common. This however will not explain all places where it occurs elsewhere: e.g. 1 Thess. ii. 18, "We would have come to you, even I Paul, once and again,"—where see note. So that after all perhaps it is best to regard it merely as an idiomatic way of speaking, when often only the singular is intended.

that we may be able] "The Apostle lived not for himself, but for the Church: so that whatever grace God conferred on him, he thought given not for himself alone, but to enable him the better to help others." Calvin.

5.] 'As He is, so are we in this world:' 1 John iv. 17.

as the sufferings of Christ (endured by Christ, whether in his own person, or in his mystical body, the Church, see Matt. xxv. 40, 45) abound towards us (i. e. in our case, see reff.), even so through Christ our consolation also aboundeth.—The form of expression is altered in the latter clause: instead of "the comfort of Christ aboundeth," we have through Christ aboundeth also our comfort. And not without reason:—we suffer, because we are His members: we are consoled, because He is our Head.

6.] And all this for your benefit.—But whether we are afflicted, (it is) on behalf of your comfort and salvation (the great end of the comfort), which (comfort and salvation) is working in the endurance of the same sufferings which we also suffer:—and our hope is stedfast on your behalf (that you will endure hardness, and be consoled and saved);—or whether we are comforted, (it is) for your comfort and salvation. This arrangement agrees best with the sense, besides being in accordance with the best MSS. On the place of the words, “and our hope is stedfast for you,” see in my Greek Test.

7.] Knowing refers back to “we be comforted:”—we are comforted with the assurance that, &c.

so are ye of the comfort also] not, “so shall ye be,” as A.V.: he is speaking generally, of the community of consolation subsisting mutually between himself and the Corinthians; and it was this thought which helped to console him.

8.] It is generally supposed that the tribulation here spoken of was the danger into which St. Paul was brought by the tumult at Ephesus, related in Acts xix. This opinion has been recently defended by Neander, Wieseler, and Dr. Davidson, but impugned by De Wette, on the grounds, (1) that “in Asia” can hardly refer to Ephesus, which St. Paul generally names, 1 Cor. xv. 82; xvi. 8; (2) that he was not in danger of his life in this tumult. The first ground is hardly tenable: there would be an appropriateness in the expression “in Asia” here, as he has in his mind an apologetic account of the reasons which hindered him from leaving those parts and coming to them. I own, however, that the strong expressions here used do not seem to me to find their justification in any thing which we know of that tumult or its consequences. I am unable to assign any other event as in the Apostle’s mind: but the expressions seem rather to regard a deadly sickness, than a persecution: see below, verses 9, 10.

so that we utterly despaired even of life] Such an expression surely would not be used of a tumult, where life would have been the first thing in danger, if Paul had been at all mixed up in it,—but to some wearing and tedious suffering, inducing despondency in minor matters, which even reached the hope of life itself.

9.] carries on and intensifies the description of his hopeless state.

we had in ourselves the response (or, sentence) of death, i.e. our answer within ourselves to the question, ‘Life or Death?’ was, ‘Death.’

that we should not...] The expression of purpose is very similar in ch. iv. 7.

which raiseth the dead] Our thoughts were weaned from all hope of surviving in this life, and fixed on that better deliverance which God shall work when He raises us from the dead.—To see in this expression merely a figure (as De Wette), and understand ‘Who raiseth the dead’ as equivalent to ‘Who delivers men from peril of their lives?’ because such peril is below and elsewhere (ch. xi. 23) called “death,” is surely very forced. Understanding it literally as above, I cannot see how it can be spoken with reference to the Ephesian tumult. If it alludes to any external danger, I should be disposed to refer it to the same obscure part of St. Paul’s history to which he alludes 1 Cor. xv. 32, where he also speaks of the hope of the resurrection as his great support. But there would be this objection, that these two passages can hardly refer to the same event; this evidently had taken place since the sending of the first Epistle. 10.] who delivered us from so great a death, and will deliver us,—on whom we hope that He will also continue to deliver us. The first “will deliver” regards the immediate future,—the “will continue to deliver” the continuance of God’s help in time distant and uncertain.—The whole verse (as De Wette confesses, who although he repudiates the Ephesian tumult, yet interprets the passage as alluding to external danger) seems to favour the idea of bodily sickness being in the Apostle’s mind.

11.] On the various possible renderings of the latter part of this verse, see in my Greek Test.

12–24.] EXPRESSION OF HIS CONFIDENCE IN HIS INTEGRITY OF PURPOSE TOWARDS THEM (12–14), AND DEFENCE OF HIMSELF AGAINST THE CHARGE OF FICKLENESSE OF PURPOSE IN NOT HAVING COME TO THEM (15–24).

12.] For, reason why they should help him with their united prayers.

in holiness and sincerity of God] i.e. either ‘belonging to God, where “His righteousness” is spoken of, Matt. vi. 38, or ‘which is the gift of God,’ as Rom. iii. 21, 22,—or better than either, as the A.V. paraphrases it, ‘godly,’ i.e. maintained as in the service of and with respect to God. Calvin interprets it, “in the sight of God.”

not in fleshly wisdom] which fleshly wisdom is any thing but holy and pure, having many windings and insincerities in order to captivate men.

but in the grace of God] i.e. in that grace which he had received (Rom. i. 5), “for obedience of the faith among all the nations,”—the grace of his apostleship. To this he often refers, see Rom. xii, 3, xv. 15; Eph, iii. 2, al.

more abundantly] “Not that his conversation among others had been less sincere: but because he had to shew more proofs of his sincere conversation among the Corinthians: having preached the Gospel gratis, and without charge to them, sparing their weakness.” But perhaps it may relate only to the longer time, and greater opportunities which he had had at Corinth for shewing his purity of purpose.

13, 14.] Confirmation of the foregoing assertion. For we do not write to you any other things, except those which ye read or even acknowledge, and I hope shall continue to acknowledge to the end:—i. e. ‘my character in my writings is one and the same, not fickle and changing, but such as past facts have substantiated it to be, and as I hope future facts to the end of my life will continue to do.’

as also ye did partly (that part of you, viz. which have fairly tried me: partly, because they were divided in their estimate of him, and those who were prejudiced against him had shut their minds to this knowledge) acknowledge us, that we are your boast, even as ye also are our's, in the day of the Lord Jesus.

are, present, as of that which is a settled recognized fact. The experimental mutual knowledge of one another as a ground of boasting was not confined to what should take place in the day of the Lord, but regarded a present fact, which should receive its full completion at the day of the Lord.

15–24.] His defence of himself against the charge of fickleness of purpose for not having come to them.

15.] this confidence, viz., of my character being known to you as that of an earnest and sincere man. before, viz., before he visited Macedonia, where he now was.

ye might have a second benefit] Literally, grace: i.e. an effusion of the divine grace by presence.

second, because there would thus have been opportunity for two visits, one in going towards Macedonia, the other in returning. This is, I believe, the only interpretation which the words will bear. See my Greek Test. I do not believe this passage to be relevant to the question respecting the number of visits which St. Paul had made to Corinth previously to writing these Epistles. See on that question, Introd. to 1 Cor. §v.

16.] If this is the same journey which is announced in 1 Cor. xvi. 5, the idea of visiting them in the way to Macedonia as well as after having passed through it, must have occurred to him subsequently to the sending of that Epistle; or may even then have been a wish, but not expressed, from uncertainty as to its possibility,—the main and longer visit being there principally dwelt on. But perhaps the following is the more likely account of the matter. He had announced to them in the lost Epistle (see 1 Cor. v. 9) his intention, as here, of visiting them on his way to Macedonia: but the intelligence from “them of the household of Chloe” had altered his intention, so that, in 1 Cor. xvi., he speaks of visiting them after he should have passed through Macedonia. For this he was accused of levity of purpose. Certainly, some intention of coming to them seems to have been mentioned in that lost Epistle; see 1 Cor. iv. 18. But the “being brought on his way to Judea” can hardly but be coincident with the almsbearing scheme of 1 Cor. xvi. 4: in which case the two plans certainly are modifications of one and the same.

17.] Literally, Did I at all use levity (of purpose)? Or those things which I plan, do I plan according to the flesh (i. e. according to the changeable, self-contradictory, and insincere purposes of the mere worldly and ungodly man), that there should be with me (not, ‘so that there is with me:’ he is speaking not merely of the result, but of the design: ‘do I plan like the worldly, that I may shift and waver as suits me?’) the yea yea, and the nay nay (i. e. both affirmation and negation concerning the same thing)? Chrysostom and many others take it thus, which is an allowable translation: ‘Or those things which I plan, do I plan after the flesh (as fleshly men do), so that my yea must (at all events) be yea, and my nay nay?’ i.e. as worldly men who perform their promise at all hazards, and whatever the consequences, whereas I am under the guidance of the Spirit, and can only journey whither He permits. But this explanation is directly against the next verse, where yea and nay is clearly parallel to yea yea, and nay nay, here, the words being repeated, as in Matt. v. 37, without altering the sense: and inconsistent with ver. 23 and ch. ii. 1, where he says that his alteration of plan arose from a desire to spare them.

18.] Such fickleness, you know, was not my habit in preaching to you.

God is faithful, that] i.e. as A.V. paraphrases, “as God is true, or faithful:” a form of asseveration.

our word (which we preached, 1 Cor. i. 18) to you is not (present, inasmuch as the character of the doctrine was present and abiding. The present has been altered to the easier ‘was’) yea and nay (i. e. inconsistent with itself).

19.] Confirmation of the last verse, by affirming the same of the great Subject of that doctrine, as set before them by Paul and his colleagues.

the Son of God is prefixed for “solemnity, and to shew how unlikely fickleness or change is in Christ, being such as He is, Compare 1 Sam xv. 29, ‘The Strength of Israel will not lie nor repent.’

Christ, personal—not meaning, the doctrine concerning Christ—HE HIMSELF is the centre and substance of all Christian preaching: see 1 Cor. i. 23, and note at ii.

2. Silvanus] so 1 Pet. v. 12; the same as Silas, see Acts xviii. 5 and al. He names his companions, as shewing that neither was he inconsistent with himself, nor were they inconsistent with one another. The Christ was the same, whether preached by different persons, or by one person at different times.

but is made yea in him] Christ as preached, i.e. our preaching concerning Christ, is made yea, finds its reality, in Christ Himself. ‘Christ preached as the Son of God by us, has become yea in Him,’ i.e. has been affirmed and substantiated as verity by the agency of the Lord Himself.

20. For how many soever be the promises of God, in Him is the yea (the affirmation and fulfilment of them all); wherefore also through Him is the Amen, for glory to God by our (the Apostles’) means. On the reading I must refer to my Greek Test.

21.] confirmeth us (in believing) in Christ. which anointed us, after the words us with you, and the and, cannot refer to any anointing of the Apostles only, but must be taken of all, Apostles and Corinthians. “Making us prophets, priests, and kings: for these three sorts of persons were anciently anointed.” Chrysostom.

22.] This sealing us again cannot refer to the Apostles alone, nor is John vi. 27 any ground for such a reference,—but as in the other references, to all, sealed by the Holy Spirit to the day of redemption.

to spare you, i.e. out of a feeling of compassion for you.

I forebore coming] literally, “I no longer came,” viz. after the first time: see Introd. to 1 Cor. §v. 6. The following verse seems to be added to remove any false inference which might have been drawn from the word “spare” as seeming to assert an unreasonable degree of power over them. But why over your faith? He had power over them, but it was in matters of discipline, not of faith: over matters of faith not even an Apostle has power, seeing it is in each man’s faith that he stands before God. And he puts this strongly, that in matters of faith he is only a fellow-helper of their joy (the “joy in believing,” Rom. xv. 18), in order to shew them the real department of his apostolic power, and that, however exercised, it would not attempt to rule their faith, but only to secure to them, by purifying them, joy in believing. He proceeds to say, that it was the probable disturbance of this joy, which induced him to forego his visit.

2 Corinthians: Chapter 2

CHAP. II. 1-4.] FURTHER EXPLANATION OF THE REASON OF THE POSTPONEMENT OF HIS VISIT.

1.] this refers to what follows: see reff.

not come again to you in sorrow] This is the only fair rendering of the words; implying, that some former visit had been in grief. Clearly the first visit, Acts xviii. 1 ff., could not be thus described: we must therefore infer, that an intermediate unrecorded visit had been paid by him. On this subject, compare ch. xii. 14; xiii. 1 and notes: and see Introd. to 1 Cor. §v.

in sorrow is explained in vv. 2, 3 to mean in mutual grief. ‘I grieving you (ver. 2), and you grieving me’ (ver. 3): not St. Paul’s grief alone, nor grief alone inflicted on them by St. Paul.

2. For] Reason why I would not come to you in grief: because I should have to grieve those who formed my proper material for thankfulness and joy.

I has a peculiar emphasis: ‘If I cause you grief’... implying, ‘there are who cause you sufficient.’

3.] I put in writing this same thing, viz. the thing which I “determined,” ver. 1: the announcement of my change of purpose in 1 Cor. xvi. 7, which had occasioned the charge of fickleness against him. See other supposed meanings discussed in my Greek Test.

having confidence in (reposing trust on) you all, that my joy is that of all of you: i.e. trusting that you too would feel that there was sufficient reason for the postponement, if it interfered with our mutual joy.—Meyer well observes, that the expression you all, in spite of the existence of an anti-pauline faction in the Corinthian church, is a true example of the love which “believeth all things, hopeth all things,” 1 Cor. xiii. 7.

4.] Explanation (for) that he did not write in levity of purpose, but under great trouble of mind,—not to grieve them, but to testify his love: he wrote, out of (this was the inducement) much tribulation (inward, of spirit, not outward) and anguish of heart with (under the accompaniment and as it were investiture of) many tears.

more abundantly] Does St. Paul mean, ‘than to other churches (?)’—so Chrysostom (referring to 1 Cor. iv. 15; ix. 2, &c.): Estius thinks, the comparative is not to be pressed, but understood as ‘overmuch’ (in the A.V.) in ver. 7,—‘exceedingly.’

5–11.] DIGRESSIVE REFERENCE TO THE CASE OF THE INCESTUOUS PERSON, WHOM THE APOSTLE ORDERS NOW TO BE FORGIVEN, AND REINSTATED. From the “sorrow” of the former verses, to him who was one of the principal occasions of that grief, the transition is easy.

5.] But if any one hath caused sorrow (a delicate way of pointing out the one who had occasioned it), he hath grieved, not me (not,—‘not only me,’ which destroys the meaning,—‘I am not the aggrieved person, but you’), but in part (i. e. more or less; ‘partially’), that I be not too heavy on him (this gives the reason why he used the expression “more or less,” which qualifies the blame cast on the offender), all of you. See the other renderings discussed in my Greek Test.

6. to such a man] Meyer remarks on the expression as being used in mildness, not to designate any particular person: but the same designation is employed in 1 Cor. v. 5. this punishment: what it was, we are unable with certainty to say; but 1 Cor. v. seems to point to excommunication as forming at least a part of it. But it was not a formal and public, only a voluntary individual abstinence from communion with him, as is shewn by its being inflicted by “the more part of them” only: the anti-pauline party probably refusing compliance with the Apostle’s command.

sufficient] not in duration, though that would be the case, but in magnitude: sufficient, as having: produced its desired effect, penitence. 7.] So that on the contrary you (should) rather (than continue the punishment) forgive and comfort him, &c. Not, as A.V., ‘by overmuch sorrow.’ but by the increase of sorrow which will come on the continuance of his punishment.

The expression be swallowed up does not set any definite result of the excessive sorrow before them, such as apostasy, or suicide, but leaves them to imagine such possible.

8.] to confirm, hardly (as usually understood) to ratify by a public decree of the church: if (see above) his exclusion was not by such a decree, but only by the abstinence of individuals from his society, the ratifying their love to him would consist in the majority making it evident to him that he was again recognized as a brother.

9.] Reason why they should now be ready to shew love to him again,—the end of St. Paul’s writing to them having been accomplished by their obeying his order. For to this end also did I write: the also signifying that my former epistle, as well as my present exhortation, tended to this, viz. the testing your obedience.

that I might know the proof of you, whether in all things ye are obedient] This was that one among the various objects of his first Epistle, which belonged to the matter at present in hand, and which he therefore puts forward: not by any means implying that he had no other view in writing it. 10.] Another assurance to encourage them in forgiving and reinstating the penitent; that they need not be afraid of lack of Apostolic authority or confirmation of their act from above—he would ratify their forgiveness by his sanction.

To whom, &c.] ‘Your forgiveness is mine:’ not said generally, but definitely, pointing at the one person here spoken of, and no other.

Then he substantiates this assurance, by further assuring them, that his forgiveness of any fault in this case, if it takes place, takes place on their account.

in the person of Christ] i.e. acting as, Christ, in the same way as he had commanded the punishment, “in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ,” 1 Cor. v. 4.

11.] follows out and explains “for your sakes:”—to prevent Satan getting any advantage over us (the Church generally: or better, us Apostles), in robbing us of some of our people,—viz., in causing the penitent offender to despair and full away from the faith. Chrysostom remarks, “The word ‘advantage’ is used appropriately, in a case where Satan would be conquering us by our own weapons. For him to make a man his prey by means of sin, is his proper attribute: but not through penitence: the weapon is ours, not his.” The word has yet another propriety: the offender was to be delivered over to Satan for the destruction of the flesh—care must be taken lest we be overreached by Satan, and his soul perish likewise.

his devices] such devices, as coming from him, are special matters of observation and caution to every Christian minister; much more to him who had the care of all the churches. See 1 Pet. v. 8.—The personality and agency of the Adversary can hardly be recognized in plainer terms than in both these passages.

12–17.] HE PROCEEDS (after the digression) TO SHEW THEM WITH WHAT ANXIETY HE AWAITED THE INTELLIGENCE FROM CORINTH, AND HOW THANKFUL HE WAS FOR THE SEAL OF HIS APOSTOLIC MINISTRY FURNISHED BY IT.—The only legitimate connexion is that with vv. 1–4.

12.] To Troas, viz., on his journey from Ephesus, Acts xx. 1, 2; 1 Cor. xvi. 5–9.

for (the purpose of preaching) the gospel of Christ] He had been before at Troas, but the vision of a Macedonian asking for help prevented his remaining there. He now revisited it, purposely to stay and preach. On his return to Asia he remained there seven days, Acts xx. 6–12.

and a door,&c.] and an opportunity of apostolic action being afforded me.

in the Lord defines the sort of action implied, and that to which the door was opened. It is remarkable that in speaking of this joy, though not of the same place, St. Paul uses this expression, 1 Cor. xvi. 9. Compare the interesting passage at Troas on his return from Europe the next spring, Acts xx. 6–13.

13.] I had no rest for my spirit (not as in A.V. ‘in my spirit:’ compare “the dove found no rest for the sole of her foot,” Gen. viii. 9). He could not with any tranquillity prosecute the spiritual duties opened to him at Troas. Paul had sent Titus to Corinth, ch. xii. 18, partly to finish the collection for the saints, but principally to bring intelligence respecting the effect of the first Epistle. Probably it had been fixed that they should meet at Troas.

Titus my brother implies a relation closer than merely that of Christian brotherhood—my colleague in the Apostleship.

them] the disciples there, understood from the context.

14–17.] Omitting, as presupposed, the fact of his having met with Titus in Macedonia, and the nature of the intelligence which he brought, he grounds on these a thanksgiving for that intelligence, and a magnification of his apostolic office. It is evidently beside the purpose to refer this thanksgiving to the diffusion of the gospel in Macedonia, or in Troas, or to general considerations:—both the context, and the language itself (see below), shew that its reference is to the effects of the apostolic reproof on the Corinthians.

14. leadeth us in triumph] Two kinds of persons were led in triumph: the participants of the victory, and the victims of the defeat. In Col. ii. 15, where only the same word is used in the original, the latter are plainly meant; here, according to many Commentators, the former: which however is never elsewhere the reference of the word, but it always implies triumphing over. The proud Cleopatra refused the terms offered her by Augustus, using this word, and saying, “I will not be triumphed over.” Meyer in consequence understands it in this sense here: who ever triumphs over us, i.e. “who ceases not to exhibit us, His former foes, as overcome by Him:”—and adds, “God began His triumph over them at their conversion:—over Paul at Damascus, where he made him a servant, from being an enemy. This triumph he ever continues, not ceasing to exhibit before the world these his former foes, by the results of their present service, as overcome by Him. This, in the case before us, was effected by Paul, in that (as Titus brought him word to Macedonia) his Epistle had produced such good results in Corinth.” De Wette objects to this as a strange way of expressing thankfulness for deliverance from our anxiety. But is it so to those who look beneath the surface? In our spiritual course, our only true triumphs are God's triumphs over us. His defeats of us, are our only real victories. I own that this yet appears to me to be the only admissible rendering. We must not violate the known usage of a word, and invent another for which there is no precedent, merely for the sake of imagined perspicuity. Such is that of 'causeth us to triumph,' A.V., and some Commentators. See also the following context.

in Christ, as usually, in our connexion with, 'as members of' Christ: not 'by Christ.'

the savour, i.e. smell. The similitude is not that of a sacrifice, but still the same as before: during a triumph, sweet spices were thrown about or burnt in the streets. As the fact of the triumph, or approach of the triumphal procession, was made known by these odours far and wide, so God diffuses by our means, who are the materials of His triumph, the sweet odour of the knowledge of Christ (who is the Triumpher, Col. ii. 15).

of the knowledge] genitive of apposition; the odour, which, in the interpretation of the figure, is the knowledge.

of him] i.e. Christ: see next verse.

15.] Here the propriety of the figure is lost, and the source of the odour identified with the Apostles themselves. For we are unto God a sweet savour of Christ (i. e. of that which was diffused by the odour, viz. the knowledge of Christ). Estius says, "As of some fragrant unguent of flowers or herbs, we diffuse among all, as a wholesome and sweet odour, the report of His name"), among them that are being saved, and among them that are perishing, "Whether men be saved, or whether they perish, the gospel continues to possess its own virtue, and we continue being that which we are; and as the light, though it blind the weak-eyed, is light, for all this darkening: and honey, though it be bitter to the sick, is sweet by nature: so the gospel is of sweet savour, even though some be perishing through disbelief of it." Chrysostom and Theophylact.

16 a.] to the one (the latter) an odour arising from death and tending to death: to the other (the former) an odour arising from life and tending to life. The odour was, CHRIST,—who to the unbelieving is Death, a mere announcement of a man crucified, and working death by unbelief: but to the believing, Life, an announcement of His resurrection and Life,—and working in them life eternal, by faith in Him. The double working of the gospel is set forth in Matt. xxi. 44; Luke ii. 34; John ix. 39.

16 b.] In order to understand the connexion, we must remember that the purpose of vindicating his apostolic commission is in the mind of St. Paul, and about to be introduced by a description of the office, its requirements, and its holders. This purpose already begins to press into its service the introductory and apologetic matter, and to take every opportunity of manifesting itself. In order then to exalt the dignity and shew the divine authorization of his office, he asks this question: And (see remarks at ver. 2) for (to accomplish) these things (this so manifold working in the believers and unbelievers,—this emission of the sweet savour of Christ every where) who is sufficient? He does not express the answer, but it is too evident to escape any reader, indeed it is supplied in terms by ch. iii. 5. For these things is put first, in the place of emphasis, to detain the attention on its weighty import, and then who is purposely put off till the end of the question, to introduce the interrogation unexpectedly.

17.] the many here points definitely at those false teachers, of whom he by and by, ch. x.—xii., speaks more plainly.

Literally, we are not in the habit of adulterating (the word from which the verb is derived originally signifies any kind of huckster or vender, but especially of wine,—and thence, from the frequency of adulteration of wine, the cognate verb implied to adulterate. The same is expressed ch. iv. 2, by "handling the word of God deceitfully") the word of God, but as of sincerity (the subjective regard of the speakers), but as from God (the objective regard—a dependence on the divine suggestion), we speak before God (with a consciousness of His presence) in Christ (not 'in the name of Christ, nor 'concerning Christ,' nor "according to Christ:" but as usual, in Christ; as united to Him, and members of His body, and employed in His work).

2 Corinthians: Chapter 3

CH. III. 1—VI. 10.] BEGINNING WITH A DISOWNING OF SELF-RECOMMENDATION, THE APOSTLE PROCEEDS TO SPEAK CONCERNING HIS APOSTOLIC OFFICE AND HIMSELF AS THE HOLDER OF IT, HIS FEELINGS, SUFFERINGS, AND HOPES, PARTLY WITH REGARD TO HIS CONNEXION WITH THE CORINTHIANS, BUT FOR THE MOST PART IN GENERAL TERMS.

1–3.] He disclaims a spirit of self-recommendation.

1.] Are we beginning again? alluding to a charge probably made against him of having done this in his former epistle; perhaps in its opening section, and in some passages of chs. v. ix., and in ch. xiv. 18; xv. 10 al.—See 2 Cor. x. 18.

or need we (literally, “or, perhaps we need;” which gives an ironical turn to the question), as some (so 1 Cor. iv. 18; xv. 12; Gal. i. 7, he speaks of the teachers who opposed him, as “some.”) Probably these persons had come recommended to them, by whom does not appear, whether by churches or Apostles, but most likely by the former, and on their departure requested similar recommendations from the Corinthian church to others), epistles of recommendation to you, or from you?

2.] Ye are our epistle (of commendation) written on our hearts (not borne in our hands to be shewn, but engraven, in the consciousness of our work among you, on our hearts. There hardly can be any allusion, as Olshausen thinks, to the twelve jewels engraven with the names of the tribes and borne on the breastplate of the High Priest, Exod. xxviii. 21. The plural seems to be used, as so often in this Epistle,—see e.g. ch. vii. 3, 5,—of Paul himself only), known and read by all men (because all men are aware, what issue my work among you has had, and receive me the more favourably on account of it. But ‘all men’ includes the Corinthians themselves; his success among them was his letter of recommendation to them as well as to others from them):

3.] literally, manifested to be (that ye are) a n epistle of Christ (i. e. written by Christ,—not, a3 Chrys., al., concerning Christ:—He is the Recommender of us, the Head of the church and sender of us His ministers) which was ministered by us (i. e. carried about, served in the way of ministration by us as its bearers,—not, as some explain it, written by us as amanuense s: see below), having been inscribed, not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God (so the tables of the law were “written with the finger of God,” Exod. xxxi. 18); not on stone tables (as the old law, ib.), but on (your) hearts, (which are) tables of flesh. The apparent change in the figure in this verse requires explanation. The Corinthians are his Epistle of recommendation, both to themselves and others; an Epistle, written by Christ, ministered by St. Paul; the Epistle itself being now the subject, viz. the Corinthians, themselves the writing of Christ, inscribed, not on tables of stone, but on hearts, tables of flesh. The Epistle itself, written and worn on St. Paul’s heart, and there known and read by all men, consisted of the Corinthian converts, on whose hearts Christ had written it by His Spirit. I bear on my heart, as a testimony to all men, that which Christ has by His Spirit written in your hearts. On the tables of stone and of flesh, see Exodus, as above, Prov. iii. 3; vii. 3; Jer. xxxi. 31–34, and on the contrast, also here hinted at in the background, between the heart of stone and the heart of flesh, Ezek. xi. 19; xxxvi. 26.

4-11.] His honour of his apostolic office was no personal vanity, for all the ability of the Apostles came from God, who had made them able ministers of the new covenant (4-6), a ministration infinitely more glorious than that of the old dispensation (7-11).

4.] The connexion with the foregoing is immediate: he had just spoken of his consciousness of apostolic success among them (which assertion would be true also of other churches which he had founded) being his worldwide recommendation. It is this confidence of which he here speaks. Such confidence, however, we possess through Christ toward God: i.e. ‘it is no vain boast, but. rests_on power imparted to us through Christ in regard to God, in reference to God’s work and our own account to be given to Him.’

5.] Not that (i. e. ‘I mean not, that’....) we are able to think any thing (to carry on any of the processes of reasoning or judgment, or faith belonging to our apostolic calling: there is no ellipsis, ‘any thing great,’ or ‘good,’ or the like) of ourselves, as if from ourselves (of ourselves and from ourselves, are parallel the latter more definitely pointing to ourselves as the origin),—but our ability (to carry on any such Proce) is from (as its source) God;

6.] who also hath enabled us as ministers of the new covenant (i. e. the gospel, Eph. iii. 7; Col. i. 23, as distinguished from the law: see 1 Cor. xi. 25; Gal. iv. 24:—the stone tables and fleshy tables are still borne in mind, and lead on to a fuller comparison of the two covenants),—not [ministers] of (the) letter (in which, viz. in formal and literal precept, the Mosaic law consisted), but of (the) spirit (in which, viz. in the inward guiding of the Spirit of God, the gospel consists. Bengel remarks: ‘Paul, even when he was writing, was carrying on the ministration not of the letter, but of the spirit: Moses, even when he wrote not, was a minister of the letter’): for the letter (mere formal and literal precept of the law) killeth (as in Rom. vii., —brings the knowledge of sin, its guilt and its punishment. The reference is not to natural death, which is the result of sin where there is no law: nor to the law executing punishment), but the spirit (of the gospel, i.e. God’s Holy Spirit, acting in and through Christ, Who “became a life-giving Spirit,” 1 Cor. xv. 45. See also below, ver. 17) giveth life (not merely life eternal, but the whole new life of the man of God, see Rom. vi. 4, 11; viii. 2, 10).

7-11.] And this ministration is infinitely ae glorious than was that of Moses under the old Covenant. He argues from the less to the greater: from the transitory glory of the killing letter, to the abiding glory of the life-giving Spirit.

7.] But (passing to another consideration,—the comparison of the two ministrations) if the ministration of death, in letters (of that death which the law, the code of literal and formal precept, brought in), engraven on stones (it seems strange that the ministration should be described as engraven on stones; but the ministration is the whole putting forth of the dispensation, the purport of which was summed up in the decalogue, written on stones. The decalogue thus written was, as in ver. 3, ministered by Moses), was [constituted] in glory (as its state or accompanying condition:—the abstract as yet, to be compared with the glory of the other:—the concrete, the brightness on the face of Moses, is not yet before us), so that the sons of Israel could not fix their eyes on (they were afraid to come nigh him, Exod. xxxiv. 30—so that could not is not said of physical inability, but of inability from fear) the face of Moses on account of the glory of his face, which was transitory (supernaturally conferred for a season, and passing away when the occasion was over): how shall not rather the ministration of the Spirit (by these words is meant the ministration of life in the Spirit, as formally opposed to the other:—but it is not so expressed, because the Spirit is the principle of life, whereas the Law only led to death) be (future, because the glory will not be accomplished till the manifestation of the kingdom) in glory?

9.] For (an additional reason in arguing from the less to the greater) if the ministration of condemnation was (or, is) glory, much more doth the ministration of righteousness abound in glory.—The ministration of condemnation, because (Rom. vii. 9 ff.) the Law detects and condemns sin:—the ministration of righteousness, because (Rom. i. 17) therein the righteousness of God is revealed and imparted by faith. 10.] For (substantiation of the foregoing “much more”) indeed (or, even) t hat which hath been glorified (viz. the ministration of condemnation, which was glorious by the brightness on the face of Moses) hath not been glorified (has lost all its glory) in this respect (i. e. when compared with the gospel), on account of (i. e. when we take into consideration) the surpassing glory (viz. of the other ministration).

11.] For (a fresh ground of superiority in glory of the Christian over the Mosaic ministry) if that which is being done away (not here, as above, the brilliancy of the visage of Moses, for that was the glory, but the ministry itself, the whole purpose which that ministry served, which was parenthetical and to come to an end) was with glory, much more is that which abideth (the everlasting gospel) in glory.

12, 13.] F rom a consciousness of this superior glory of his ministration, the Apostle uses great plainness of speech, and does not, as Moses, use a veil.

12.] viz. that expressed by such an hope, ver. 8: the hope of the ultimate manifestation of exceeding glory as belonging to his ministration.

great openness of speech “Tell me, towards whom? God, or the disciples? Clearly, towards you, under instruction as disciples. That is, we every where speak freely, concealing nothing, reserving nothing, suspecting nothing, but speaking out plainly: and we have no fear of dazzling your eyes, as Moses did those of the Jews.” Chrysostom.

13.] and (do) not (place a veil on our face) as Moses placed a veil on his face, in order that (see below) the sons of Israel might not look stedfastly on the termination of that which was being done away (viz. his ministration, see ver. 11, but spoken of as glorified: ‘the glory of his ministration’).—A mistake has been made with regard to the history in Exod. xxxiv. 35, which has considerably obscured the understanding of this verse. It is commonly assumed, that, Moses spoke to the Israelites, having the veil on his face, and this is implied in our version—‘till Moses had done speaking with them, he put a veil on his face.’ But the Hebrew and Septuagint gave a different account: “and when he ceased speaking to them, he put a veil over his face.” He spoke to them without the veil, with his face shining and glorified:—when he had done speaking, he placed the veil on his face: and that, not because they were afraid to look on him, but as here, that they might not look on the end, or the fading, of that transitory glory; that they might only see it as long as it was the credential of his ministry, and then it might be withdrawn from their eyes. Thus the declaration of God’s will to them was not in openness of speech, but was interrupted and broken by intervals of concealment, which ours is not. The opposition is twofold: (1) between the veiled and the unveiled ministry, as regards the mere fact of concealment in the one case, and openness in the other: (2) between the ministry which was suspended by the veiling, that its end might not be seen, and that which proceeds from glory to glory, having no termination. On the common interpretation, Commentators have found an almost insuperable difficulty in the purpose here stated, “that the children of Israel might not,” &c. The usual escape from it has been to render it (see A.V.), ‘so that the Israelites could not’, as in vér. 7. But this is an ungrammatical rendering of the Greek. I may remark also, that the narrative in Exodus, the Septuagint version of which the Apostle here closely follows (see below on ver. 16), implies that the brightness of Moses’ face had place not on that one occasion only, but throughout his whole ministry between the and the people. When he ceased speaking to them, he put on the veil: but whosoever he went in before the Lord to speak to Him, the veil was removed till he came out, and had spoken to the Israelites all that the Lord had commanded him, during which speaking they saw that his face shone,—and after which speaking he again put on the veil. So that the veil was the symbol of concealment and transitoriness: the part revealed they might see: beyond that, they could not: the ministry was a broken, interrupted one; its end was wrapped in obscurity.—In the words, “the end of that which was being done away,” we must not think, as some Commentators have done, of Christ (Rom. x. 4), any further than it may be hinted in the background that when the law came to an end, He appeared.

14–18.] The contrast is now made between the CHILDREN OF IsRAEL, on whose heart this veil still is in the reading of the O.T., and US ALL (Christians), who with uncovered face behold the glory of the Lord. This section is parenthetical. Before and after it, the ministry is the subject: in it, they to whom the ministry is directed. But it serves to shew the whole spirit and condition of the two classes, and thus further to substantiate the character of openness and. dom asserted of the Christian 14. But (also) their understandings were hardened] These words evidently refer, as well as what follows, not, to the end, which they did not see, but to that which they did see: to that which answers to the present reading of the Old Covenant, viz. the word of GOD imparted by the ministration of Moses. And by these words the transition is made from the form of similitude just used, to that new one which is about to be used; ‘not only was there a veil on Moses’ face, to prevent more being known, but also their understandings were darkened: there was, besides, a veil on their hearts’—To refer this hardening of their understandings to the present hard-heartedness of the Jews under the freedom of speech of the Gospel, as some do, is, in my view, to miss the whole sense of the passage. No reference whatever is made to the state of the Jews under the preaching of the gospel, but only as the objects of the O.T. ministration,—then, under the oral teaching of Moses,—now, in the reading of the O.T.—In order to understand what follows, the change of similitude must be carefully borne in mind.

the same vaill] ‘the veil once on Moses’ face,’ is now regarded as laid on their hearts. It denoted the ceasing, the covering up, of his oral teaching; for it was put on when he had done speaking to the people. Now, his oral teaching has altogether ceased, and the ministry is carried on by a book. But as when we listen, the speaker is the agent, and the hearers are passive,—so on the other hand, when we read, we are the agents, and the book is passive. The book is the same to all: the difference between those who understand and those who do not understand is now a subjective difference—the veil is no longer on the face of the speaker, but on the heart of the reader. So that of necessity the form of the similitude is changed.

For (answering to an understood clause, ‘and remain hardened’) to the present day the same veil (which was once on the face of Moses) remains at the reading of the Old Covenant (i. e. ‘Testament: as we now popularly use the words, the book comprising the ancient Covenant), the discovery not being made (by the removal of the veil: literally, it not being unvailed), that it (the Old Test.) is done away (or, being done away: but the other is better here) in Christ (that the Old Covenant has passed away, being superseded by Christ). This I believe to be the only admissible sense of the words, consistently with the symbolism of the passage. The renderings, ‘remains not taken away—for it (i. e the veil) is done away in Christ,’ and (as A.V.) ‘remaineth.... untaken away... which veil is done away in Christ,’—are inadmissible: (1) because they make the verb is done away, which throughout the passage belongs to the glory of the ministry, to apply to the veil: and (2) because ‘they give no satisfactory sense. It is not because the veil can only be done away in Christ, that it now remains untaken away on their hearts, but because their hearts are hardened. The word in the original, unvailed, has been probably chosen, as is often the practice of the Apostle, on account of its relation to vail,—it not being unvailed to them that...

15.] But (reassertion of the fact that it is not unvailed, with a view to the next clause) to this day, whenever Moses is read, a veil lieth upon their heart (understanding).

16.] Here, the object of comparison is, the having on a veil, and taking it off on going into the presence of the Lord. This Moses did: and the choice of the same words as those of the Septuagint, shews the closeness of the comparison: “But whosoever Moses went in before the Lord to speak to Him, the veil was taken away.” This shall likewise be done in the case of the Israelites: when it (i. e. their heart,—not Israel, as some think,—nor Moses, as others) turneth to the Lord (here again the word is carefully chosen, being the very expression of the Septuagint, when the Israelites, having been afraid of the glory of the face of Moses, returned to him after being summoned by him:—“they were afraid to come nigh him; and Moses called them, and they turned to him....”—a nd the Lord appears to be used for the same reason), the veil is taken away (not, as A.V., ‘shall be,’ because “their heart” is the subject, and thus the taking away becomes an individual matter, happening whenever and wherever conversion takes place). Let me restate this,—as it is all-important towards the understanding of verses 17, 18. ‘When their heart goes in to speak with God,—ceases to contemplate the dead letter, and begins to commune with the Spirit of the old covenant (the Spirit of GOD), then the veil is removed, as it was from the face of Moses.’

17.] Now the Lord is the Spirit: i.e. the Lord of ver. 16 is the Spirit, whose word the O.T. is: the spirit,—as opposed to the letter;—which giveth life, ver. 6: meaning, ‘the Lord,’ as here spoken of, “Christ,” ‘is the Spirit,’ is identical with the Holy Spirit: not personally nor essentially, but, as is shewn by the words “the Spirit of the Lord” following, in this department of His divine working:—Christ, here, is the Spirit of Christ. and where the Spirit of the Lord (see above) is, is liberty. They are fettered in spirit as long as they are slaves to the letter, as long as they have the veil on their hearts; but when they turn to the Lord the Spirit, which is not a Spirit of bondage, but of adoption, Rom. viii. 15,—and by virtue of whom “thou art no longer a slave, but a son,” Gal. iv. 7,—then they are at liberty.

18.] But (the sight of the Jews is thus intercepted; in contrast to whom) WE all (‘all Christians: not ‘we Apostles and teachers:’ the contrast is to the children of Israel above), with unvailed face (the veil having been removed at our conversion: the stress is on these words) beholding in a mirror the glory of the Lord (i. e. Christ: from ver. 16, 17. The gospel is this mirror, the ‘Gospel of the glory of God,’ ch. iv. 4, and we, looking on it with unveiled face, are the contrast to the Jews, with veiled hearts reading their law), are being transfigured into the same image (which we see in the mirror: the image of the glory of Christ, see Gal. iv. 19; and 1 John iii. 3. But the change here spoken of is a spiritual one, not the bodily change at the Resurrection: it is going on here in the process of sanctification) from glory to glory (this is explained, either [1] ‘from one degree of glory to another:’ so most Commentators and De Wette, or [2] ‘from [by] the glory which we see, into glory,’ as Chrysostom: “from the glory of the Spirit, into our own glory which shall be wrought in us.” I prefer the former, as the other would introduce a tautology, the sentiment being expressed in the words following), as by the Lord the Spirit. The transformation is effected by the Spirit, the Author and Upholder of spiritual life, who “takes of the things of Christ, and shews them to us,” John xvi. 14, see also Rom. viii. 10, 11,—who sanctifies us till we are holy as Christ is holy; the process of renewal after Christ’s image is such a transformation as may be expected by the agency of the Lord, the Spirit,—Christ Himself being the image, see ch. iv. 4. The other renderings are out of the question, viz.: (1) “the Lord of the Spirit,” i.e. Christ, whose Spirit He is; which seems to me to convey very little meaning, besides being an expression wholly unprecedented: (2) that of A.V. and of the Vulgate, and others, ‘the Spirit of the Lord,’ and (3) that of Chrysostom and others, ‘the Spirit who is the Lord.’

2 Corinthians: Chapter 4

IV. 1–6.] Taking up again the subject of his freedom of speech (ch. iii. 12), he declares his renunciation of all deceit, and manifestation of the truth to every man (ver. 2), even though to some the Gospel be hidden (vv. 3, 4). And this because he preaches, without any selfish admixture, only the pure light of the Gospel of Christ (vv. 5, 6).

1.] For this cause refers to the previous description of the freeness and unvailedness of the ministry of the Gospel, and of the state of Christians in general (ch. iii. 18).

seeing we have this ministry further expands and explains the opening words.

even as we received mercy (from God at the time of our being appointed; compare the same expression, 1 Tim. i. 16) belongs to what went before, not to what follows, and is a qualification, in humility, of seeing we have—‘possessing it, not as our own, but in as far as we were shewn mercy.’

we shrink not back; i.e. we do not behave ourselves in a cowardly manner, do not shrink from plainness of speech and action. The conduct repudiated is the opposite of manly plain-speaking. But (cowardice alone prompting concealment in such a case, where it does not belong to the character of the ministry itself) we have renounced the hidden things of shame (the having any views, ends, or practices which such as have them hide through shame: not, as De Wette, the hidden things of infamy or dishonesty. Shame is subjective, meaning fear arising from expectation of exposure. It is plain from the context that it refers, not to crimes and unholy practices, but to crooked arts, of which men are ashamed, and which perhaps were made use of by the false teachers), not walking (having our daily conyersation) in craftiness, nor handling deceitfully (see ch. ii. 17, note) the word of God; but by the manifestation of the truth (as our only means, see 1 Thess. ii. 3, 4;—the words come first, as emphatic) recommending ourselves (a recurrence to the charge and apology of ch. iii. 1 ff.) to (with reference to,—to the verdict of) every conscience of men (so literally: every possible variety of the human conscience; implying there is no conscience but will inwardly acknowledge this, however loath some among you may be outwardly to confess it) in the sight of God (as ch. ii. 17: not merely to satisfy men’s consciences, but with regard to God’s all-seeing eye, which discerns the heart).

3.] And even if (‘which I concede;’—see note 1 Cor. iv. 7) our gospel (the gospel preached by us) is vailed, it is among (in the estimation of) the perishing that it is vailed. The allegory of ch. iii. is continued,—the hiding of the gospel by the veil placed before the understanding.

4.] in whose case (it is true that) the god of this world (the Devil, the ruling principle in the men of this world) [hath] blinded (the original is blinded, and is said of a purely historical event: but in an English version we are obliged to convey the idea by the perfect, hath blinded) the understandings of the unbelieving (i. e. who, the perishing, are victims of that blinding of the understandings of the unbelieving, which the Devil is habitually carrying on), that the illumination of (i. e. shining from) the gospel of the glory of Christ, who is the image of God (recurrence to the allegory of ch. iii. 18; Christ is the image of God, “the shining forth of His glory,” Heb. i. 3, into which same image, we, looking on it in the mirror of the gospel, are changed by the Spirit; but which glorious image is not visible to those who are blinded by Satan), might not shine forth (“unto them” is omitted in all our most ancient MSS.; the object of the god of this world was not merely to prevent them from being illuminated, but to stop the shining forth altogether).

5, 6.] We have no reason to use trickery or craft, having no selfish ends to serve: nor concealment, being ourselves enlightened by God, and set for the spreading of light.

5.] For we preach not (the subject of our preaching is not) ourselves (Meyer understands ‘as lords;’ but as De Wette observes, this would anticipate the development of thought which follows, the contrast between Christ Jesus as lord, and ourselves as your servants, not being yet raised), but Christ Jesus as Lord; and ourselves as your servants for Jesus' sake (on account of Him and His work).

6.] Because (explains and substantiates the last clause,—that we are your servants for Jesus' sake) (it is) God, Who said Out of darkness light shall shine (allusion to Gen. i. 3: the change to the words in the A.V. appears to have been made because the words cited are not the exact ones spoken by the Creator), that shined in our hearts (the physical creation bearing an analogy to the spiritual), in order to (so literally) the shining forth (to others) of the knowledge (in us) of the glory of God in the face of Christ ('the glory of God manifested in Christ'). The figure is still derived from the history in ch. iii, and refers to the brightness on the face of Moses: the only true effulgence of the divine glory is from the face of Christ.

7-18.] This glorious ministry is fulfilled by weak, afflicted, persecuted, and decaying vessels, which are moreover worn out in the work (7-12). Yet the spirit of faith, the hope of the resurrection, and of being presented with them, for whom he has laboured, bears him up against the decay of the outer man, and all present tribulation (13-18). We are not justified in assuming that a definite reproach of personal meanness had induced the Apostle to speak thus. For he does not deal with any such reproach here, but with matters common to all human ministers of the word.—All this is a following out in detail of the assertion, "we shrink not back," ver. 1, already enlarged on in one of its departments, that of not shrinking from openness of speech,—and now to be put forth in another, viz. bearing up against outward and inward difficulties.—If any polemical purpose is to be sought, it is the setting forth of the abundance of sufferings, the glorying in weakness (ch. xi. 23, 30), which substantiated his apostolic mission: but even such purpose is only in the background; he is pouring out, in the fulness of his heart, the manifold discouragements and the far more exceeding encouragements of his office.

7.] this treasure, viz. 'the light of the knowledge of the glory of God', ver. 6. "Being that he had spoken many and great things concerning this ineffable glory: that no one might say, 'But how is it that being partakers of so great glory we remain in the mortal body?' he goes on to say that this very thing is the chief marvel, and the grandest proof of God's power, that an earthen vessel can carry so much brightness, and he the deposit of such a treasure." Chrysostom. Some think the treasure to be the whole ministry: but it seems simpler to refer it to that which has immediately preceded, in a style like that of Paul, in which each successive idea so commonly evolves itself out of the last. The vessel is the body, not the whole personality; the "outer man" of ver. 16; see ver. 10. And in the troubles of the body the personality shares, as long as it is bound up with it here. Herodotus tells a story of Darius Hystaspes, that he stored up his tribute by melting the gold into earthen pots, and when he wanted it, breaking the vessels.

the exceeding greatness of the power, viz. of the power consisting in the effects of the apostolic ministry (1 Cor. ii. 4), as well as in the upholding under trials and difficulties.

may be God's] may belong to (i. e. be seen to belong to) God.

8-10.] He illustrates the expression, earthen vessels, in detail, by his own experience and that of the other ministers of Christ.

8.] (literally) in every way (or, on every side) pressed, but not (inextricably) crushed; in perplexity, but not in despair (a literal statement of what the last clause stated figuratively: as Stanley, "bewildered, but not benighted"); persecuted, but not deserted (the word is used of desertion both by God and by man. Some (among whom is Stanley) would render this clause 'pursued, but not left behind'; but the sense thus would be quite beside the purpose, as the Apostle is speaking not of rivalry from those who as runners had the same end in view, but of troubles and persecutions); struck down (as with a dart during pursuit. It is ordinarily interpreted of a fall in wrestling; but figures from the games would be out of place (see above) in the present passage, and the attempt to find them has bewildered most of the modern Commentators), but not destroyed;

10.] always bearing about in our body (i. e. ever in our apostolic work, having our body exposed to and an example of: or perhaps even, as Stanley, "bearing with us, wherever we go, the burden of the dead body.") But see below) the killing (so literally: the word occurs in the New Test. only once besides,—in Rom. iv. 19, where it signifies figuratively, utter lack of strength and vital power. But here the literal sense, 'the being put to death,' must evidently be kept, and the expression understood as in 1 Cor. xv. 31, where the Apostle states that he dies daily) of Jesus, that the life also of Jesus may be manifested in our body: i.e. 'that in our bodies, holding up against such troubles and preserved in such dangers, may be shewn forth that mighty power of God which is a testimony that Jesus lives and is exalted to be a Prince and a Saviour:'—not, 'that our repeated deliverances might resemble His Resurrection, as our sufferings His Death, as Meyer, who argues that the literal meaning must be retained, as in the other member of the comparison, owing to the same expression, "in our body," occurring. But, as De Wette justly observes, the bodily deliverance is manifestly a subordinate consideration, and the life of far higher significance, testified indeed by the body's preservation, but extending far beyond it.

11.] Explanation and confirmation of ver. 10.—For we which live (which live, asserting that to which death is alien and strange, an antithesis to being "delivered unto death," as in the other clause "life" is to "in our mortal flesh") are alway being delivered unto death (in dangers and persecutions, so ch. xi. 23, "in deaths oft") on account of Jesus (so in Rev. i. 9, John was in Patmos “on account of the word of God, and on account of the testimony of Jesus Christ”), that the life also of Jesus may be manifested in our mortal flesh (the antithesis is more strongly put by mortal flesh than it would be by mortal body in Rom. viii. 11, the flesh being the very food of decay and corruption). By this antithesis, the wonderful greatness of the divine power is strikingly brought out: God exhibits DEATH in the living, that He may exhibit LIFE in the dying.

12.] By it is also brought out that which is here the immediate subject,—the vast and unexampled trials of the apostolic office, all summed up in these words: So then death worketh in us, but life in you; i.e. ‘the trials by which the dying of Jesus is exhibited in us, are exclusively and peculiarly OUR OWN,—whereas (and this is decisive for the spiritual sense of the word life) the life, whereof we are to be witnesses, extends beyond ourselves, nay, finds its field of action and energizing IN YOU.’ Chrysostom, Calvin, and others, take the verse ironically, “so we have all the danger, and you all the profit:” but such a sentiment seems alien from the spirit of the passage. Meyer, as unfortunately, limits the meaning to natural life, whereas (as above) the context plainly evinces spiritual life to be meant, not merely natural.—In Rom. viii. 10, 11, the vivifying influence of His Spirit who raised Jesus from the dead is spoken of as extending to the body also; here, the upholding influence of Him who delivers and preserves the body, is spoken of as vivifying the whole man: LIFE, in both places, being the higher and spiritual life, including the lower and natural. ‘And, in our relative positions,—of this life, YE are the examples,—a church of believers, alive to God through Christ in your various vocations, and not called on to be exhibited in an arena (1 Cor. iv. 9: Heb. x. 33), as WE are, who are (not indeed excluded from that life,—nay, it flows from us to you,—but are) more especially examples of conformity to the death of our common Lord:—in whom DEATH WORKETH.’

13–18.] ENCOURAGEMENTS: and first, FAITH, which enables us to go on preaching to you. But (contrast to the foregoing state of trial and working of death in us) having the same spirit of faith (not distinctly the Holy Spirit,—but still not merely a human disposition: the indwelling Holy Spirit penetrates and characterizes the whole renewed man) with that described in the Scriptures, I believed, therefore I spoke (the connexion of the words in the Psalm is not clear); we too believe, and therefore we also speak (continue our preaching of the gospel, notwithstanding such vast hindrances within and without);

14.] knowing (fixes, and expands in detail the indefinite term “we believe,” and thus gives the ground of their speaking,—not, as commonly understood, the matter of which we speak) that He which raised up (from the dead) the Lord Jesus will raise up us also (from the dead hereafter, see 1 Cor. vi. 13, 14:—not in a figurative resurrection from danger, as Meyer and some others) with Jesus (not necessarily in 4 figurative sense; even in the passages where a figurative sense is the prevailing one, it is only as built upon the fact of a literal ‘raising with Christ,’ to be accomplished at the great day: see Eph. ii. 6; Col. iii. 1, 3; 1 Thess. v. 10), and present us with you (i. e. as in Jude 24, at the day of His coming). The idea that the Apostle could not thus speak of the resurrection, because he expected (1 Cor. xv. 51, 52; i. 8; ch. i. 13, 14) to be alive at the day of Christ, is best refuted by this very passage, ch. v. 1 ff., where his admission of at least the possibility of his death is distinctly set forth. The fact is that the anticipation of being raised here, having respect rather to the contrast of the future glory with the present suffering, does not necessarily imply one or other side of the alternative of being quick or dead at the Lord’s coming, but embraces all, quick and dead, in one blessed resurrection-state.—This confidence, of being presented at that day “together with you” is only analogous to his expressions elsewhere; see ch. i. 14; 1 Thess. ii. 19, 20;

15.] Explanation of together with you as a ground of his trust: with reference also to what was said of life working in you, ver. 12; viz. that all, both the sufferings and victory of the ministers, are for the church: see the parallel expression, ch. i. 6, 7.

For all things (of which we have been speaking: or perhaps hyperbolically, ALL THINGS, the whole working and arrangements of God, as in 1 Cor. iii. 22) are on your behalf, that Grace, having abounded by means of the greater number (who have received it), may multiply the thanksgiving (which shall accrue) to the glory of God. Besides this rendering (1), three others are possible: (2) ‘that Grace, having abounded, may, on account of the thanksgiving of the greater number, be multiplied to the glory of God:’ (3) ‘that Grace, having abounded, may, by means of the greater number, multiply the thanksgiving to the glory of God:’ (4) ‘that Grace, having multiplied by means of the greater number the thanksgiving, may abound to the glory of God.’ See these discussed, and my reason for preferring (1), in my Greek Test. As to the sense see the very similar sentiment, ch. i. 11), thanksgiving is the highest and noblest offering of the Church to God’s glory (compare Ps. 1. 23): that this may be rendered, in the best sense, as the result of the working of grace which has become abundant by means of the many recipients, is the great end of the Christian ministry.

16–18.] Second ground of encouragement—HOPE.

16.] Wherefore (on account of the hope implied in the faith spoken of ver. 14, which he is about to expand) we shrink not back (as in ver. 1: but now, owing to despair); but (on the contrary) though even our outward man is being wasted away (i. e. our body, see Rom. vii. 22, is, by this continued “killing” and “working of death,” being worn out):—he is not as yet speaking of dissolution by death, but only of gradual approximation to it), yet our inner (man) is being renewed day by day: i.e. ‘our spiritual life, the life which testifies the life of Jesus, even in our mortal bodies (ver. 11), is continually fed with fresh accessions of grace: see next verse. So Chrysostom,—“How renewed? by faith, by hope, by zeal, by determination to brave down danger. The more the sufferings of the body, the more does the soul learn to value her hopes, and becomes brighter, as gold more and more purified in the fire."

17, 18.] Method of this renewal.

For the present light (burden) of our affliction worketh out for us (‘effects,’ ‘is the means of bringing about’) in a surpassing and still more surpassing manner (i. e. so as to exceed beyond all measure the tribulation) an eternal weight of glory (eternal weight opposed to present lightness).

18.] Subjective condition under which this working out takes place. while we look not at (‘propose not as our aim,’ ‘spend not our care about’) the things which are seen (“earthly things,” Phil. iii. 19. Chrysostom strikingly says, “All things that are seen, whether they be torment, or ease: so as to be neither relaxed by the one, nor borne down by the other”), but at the things which are not seen (not, things invisible: for as Bengel well remarks, “many things which are not seen, shall become visible when the pilgrimage of faith is over”): for the things which are seen are temporary (not, as A.V., ‘temporal,’ ‘belonging to time,’ but ‘fleeting,’ ‘only for a time,’—i. e. till the day of Christ); but the things which are not seen are eternal. Chrysostom again: “Whether they be reigning in glory, or suffering in torment: that he may deter them by the one, and encourage them by the other.”

CHAP. V. 1–10.] Further specification of the hope before spoken of, as consisting in anticipation of an eternity of glory after this life, in the resurrection-body: which leads him evermore to strive to be found well-pleasing to the Lord at His coming: seeing that all shall then receive the things done in the body. 1.] For (gives the reason of ch. iv. 17,—principally of the emphatic words of that verse, “more and more exceedingly,”—showing how it is that so wonderful a process takes place) we know (as in ch. iv. 14,—are convinced, as a sure matter of hope) that if (‘supposing;’ indefinite and doubtful: if this delivering to death continually should end in veritable death. The case is hypothetical, because many will be glorified without the dissolution taking place: see 1 Cor. xv. 51, 53) our earthly tabernacle-dwelling (the similitude is not derived from the wandering of the Israelites in the wilderness, nor from the tabernacle, but is a common one with Greek writers. “The whole passage is expressed through the double figure of a house or tent, and a garment. The explanation of this abrupt transition from one to the other may be found in the image which, both from his occupation and his birthplace, would naturally occur to the Apostle,—the tent of Cilician hair-cloth, which might almost equally suggest the idea of a habitation and of a vesture,” Stanley. Chrysostom observes: “Having said a tabernacle-dwelling, and having thus implied easy taking down and transitoriness, he opposes to this the house which is eternal”) were dissolved (‘a gentle word,’ Bengel: i.e. ‘taken down,’ “done away with”), we have (as Meyer rightly remarks, the present tense is used of the time at which the dissolution shall have taken place. But even then the dead have it not in actual possession, but only prepared by God for them against the appearing of the Lord: and therefore they are said to have it in the heavens. The A.V., according to the present punctuation, yields no sense: ‘not made with hands, eternal in the heavens’) a building (no longer a tabernacle) from God (‘in an especial manner prepared by God,’ ‘pure from God's hands: not as contrasted with our earthly body, which, see 1 Cor. xii. 18, 24, is also from God), a dwelling not made with hands (here again, not as contrasted with the fleshy body, for that too is “not made with hands,” but with other dwellings, which are “made with hands.”) Remember again the Apostle’s occupation of a tent-maker), eternal, in the heavens (see above).—A difficulty has been raised by some Commentators respecting the intermediate disembodied state,—how the Apostle here regards it, or whether he regards it at all. But none need be raised. The dwelling which in this verse is said, at the time of dissolution, to be in the heavens, is, when we put it on, in the next verse, our own dwelling-place, which is from heaven. Thus the intermediate state, though lightly passed over, as not belonging to the subject, is evidently in the mind of St. Paul.—Some Commentators understand these words themselves (“a dwelling not made with hands, eternal, in the heavens”) of the intermediate state of absence from the body: others, of an immediate glorified body in heaven, to be united with the body of the resurrection. Calvin hesitates: “It is uncertain whether he intends the state of blessed immortality which awaits the faithful after death, or the incorruptible and glorious body which shall be after the resurrection. In either of these senses there is nothing objectionable: but I prefer taking it, that the beginning of this building shall be the blessed state of the soul after death, and its consummation the glory of the final resurrection.” But if this be so, (1) the parallel will not hold, between the dwelling in one case, and the dwelling in the other,—and (2) the language of ver. 2 is against it, see below.

2.] For also (our knowledge, that we possess such a building of God, even in the case of our body being dissolved, is testified by the earnest desire which we have, to put on that new body without such dissolution taking place. See the similar argument in Rom. viii. 18, 19) in this (tabernacle) we groan (see Rom. viii. 23), longing (i. e. because we desire, the reason of our groaning) to put on over this (viz. by being alive at the day of Christ, and not dissolved as in ver. 1:—see on ver. 4 below.—The similitude is slightly changed: the house is now to be put on, as an outer garment, over the fleshy body) our dwelling-place (the word is slightly different from that rendered dwelling in ver. 1: that one being more general, this more appropriated to an inhabitant) from heaven (treated now as if brought with the Lord at His coming, and put upon us who are alive, and remain then.—“Therefore,” says Bengel, “this dwelling-place is not heaven itself”).

3.] seeing that we shall verily be found (shall prove to be) clothed (‘having put on clothing,’ viz. a body), not naked (without a body: see this rendering justified in my Greek Test., where I have also discussed the other translations. The verse asserts strongly, with a view to substantiate and explain ver. 2, the truth of the resurrection or glorified body; and I see in it a reference to the deniers of the resurrection, whom the Apostle combated in 1 Cor. xv.: its sense being this: “For I do assert again, that we shall in that day prove to be clothed with a body, and not disembodied spirits.” 4.] Confirmation and explanation of ver. 2.

For also (a reason, why we long to clothe ourselves with our house which is from heaven, as in ver. 2) we who are in this tabernacle (literally, the tabernacle, i.e., before spoken of) do groan, being burdened (not by troubles and sufferings, nor by the body itself, which would be directly opposite to the sense: but, for the reason which follows): because we are not willing (literally, as follows) to divest ourselves (of it), but to put on (that other) over it, that our mortal part may (not, die, but) be swallowed up by life (absorbed in and transmuted by that glorious principle of life which our new clothing shall superinduce upon us).—The feeling expressed in these verses was one most natural to those who, as the Apostles, regarded the coming of the Lord as near, and conceived the possibility of their living to behold it. It was no terror of death as to its consequences—but a natural reluctance to undergo the mere act of death as such, when it was within possibility that this mortal body might be superseded by the immortal one, without it.

5.] This great end, the having the mortal part swallowed up by life, is justified as the object of the Apostle’s fervent wish, seeing that it is for this very end, that this may ultimately be accomplished, that God has wrought us (see below) and given us the pledge of the Spirit;—But (and this my wish has reason: for) He which wrought us (prepared us, by redemption, justification, sanctification, which are the qualifications for glory) unto this very purpose (viz. that last mentioned—having the mortal part swallowed up by life—not the investing ourselves with the body from heaven, a mere accident of that glorious absorption: see below) is God, who gave unto us (a sign that our preparation is of Him) the earnest (see ch. i. 22, and note) of (gen. of apposition) the Holy Spirit.—The Apostle, in this verse, is no longer treating exclusively of his own wish for the more summary swallowing up of the mortal by the glorified, but is shewing that the end itself, which he individually, or in common with others then living, wishes accomplished, in this particular form of investiture, is, under whatever form brought about, that for which all the preparation, by grace, of Christians, is carried on, and to which the earnest of the Spirit points forward.

6-8.] He returns to the confidence expressed in ver. 1; that however this may be, whether this wish is to be fulfilled or not, he is prepared to accept the alternative of being denuded of the body, seeing that it will bring with it a translation to the presence of the Lord.—Being confident then (because it is God’s express purpose to bring us to glory, as in last verse) always (either under all trials: or, always whether this hope of investiture over the mortal body, or the fear of the other alternative, be before us,—which latter I prefer), and knowing (not as the ground of our confidence, but correlative with it, and the ground of the contentment expressed below), that whilst in our home in the body, we are absent from our home in the Lord (the similitude of the body as our dwelling being still kept up: see similar sentiments respecting our being wanderers and strangers from our heavenly home while dwelling in the body, Phil. iii. 20; Heb. xi. 13; xiii. 14), for (proof of our absence from our home in the Lord) we walk (the usual figurative sense, ‘go on our Christian course,’—not literal, as of pilgrims) by means of faith, not by means of appearance (not “sight,” as rendered in A.V. and by many Commentators (the substantive cannot possibly have this meaning)—i. e. ‘faith, not the actual appearance of heavenly things themselves, is the means whereby we hold on our way,’ a sure sign that we are absent from those heavenly things), still (the last clause seeming to have somewhat dashed that confidence) we are confident, and are well content rather to go from (out of) our home in the body, and come to our home with the Lord: i.e. ‘if (as in ver. 1) a dissolution of the body be imminent, even that, though not according to our wish, does not destroy our confidence: for so sensible are we that dwelling in the body is a state of banishment from the Lord, that we prefer to it even the alternative of dissolution, bringing us, as it will, into His presence.’

9, 10.] Wherefore (this being so,—our confidence, in event whether of death, or of life till the coming of the Lord, being such) it is also (besides our confidence) our aim (literally, our ambition), that whether present (dwelling in the body) or absent (from the body at the time of His appearing), we may be well-pleasing unto Him (i. e. ‘whether He find us in the body or out of the body, we may meet with His approval in that day.’ That this is the sense, the next verse seems to me to shew beyond question. For there he renders a reason for the expressions, and fixes the participles as belonging to the time of His coming. But this meaning has not, that I am aware, been seen by the Commentators, and in consequence, the verse has seemed to be beset with difficulties. See them discussed in my Greek Test.).

10.] For (explanation and fixing of the words “we may be well-pleasing unto Him,” as to when and how testified) we all (and myself among the number) must be made manifest (not merely ‘appear,’ which is a most unfortunate rendering of the A.V., giving to the reader merely the idea of “appearing before,” as when summoned to a magistrate) before the judgment seat (the bema, or “lofty seat, raised on an elevated platform, usually at the end of the basilica, or hall of justice, so that the figure of the judge must: have been seen towering above the crowd which thronged the long nave of the building.” Stanley) of Christ; that each one may receive (the technical word for receiving wages) the things (done) in the body (literally, through the body, as a medium or organ of action), according to the things which he did (in the body), whether (it were) good or bad (singular, as abstract). I may observe that no more definite inference must be drawn from this verse as to the place which the saints of God shall hold in the general judgment, than it warrants; viz. that they as well as others, shall be manifested and judged by Him (Matt. xxv. 19): when, or in company with whom, is not here so much as hinted.

11–13.] Having this ambition,—being a genuine fearer of God (see below)—he endeavours to make his plain dealing EVIDENT TO MEN, as it IS EVIDENT TO GOD. He will give the Corinthians whereof to boast concerning him in reply to his boastful adversaries: this his conduct being, whatever construction may be put on it, on behalf of God and them. 11.] Knowing then, i.e. being then conscious of ('no strangers to') the fear of the Lord (not as A.V., 'the terror of the Lord;')—but meaning, this wholesome fear of Christ as our Judge. The expression is particularly appropriate for one who had been suspected of double-dealing and insincerity: he was inwardly conscious of the principle of the fear of God guiding and leading him), we persuade men (the stress on men, 'it is MEN that we attempt to persuade.'—Of what? Some say, of the truth of Christ's religion; win them to Christ, which however suits the rendering 'the terror of the Lord,' better than the right one: Chrysostom and others say, 'of our own integrity,' and from the context it must have reference to ourselves; and I therefore agree with this latter interpretation, I may remind the English reader that there are few texts so much perverted as this one, owing to the rendering of the A.V. It is frequently understood, and preached upon, as if it meant, "knowing how terrible God is, we persuade others to fear Him." a meaning as far as possible from the Apostle's mind), but unto God we are already made manifest (we have no need to persuade HIM of our integrity, for He knows all things); and I hope (am confident) that we have been made manifest in your consciences also.

12.] We are not recommending ourselves again unto you (see ch. iii. 1), but are giving you occasion of glorying on our behalf (of us, as your teachers, and to the upholding of our ministry), that ye may have it (viz. occasion of boasting) against those who glory in face (fair outward appearance) and not in heart (i. e. in those things which they exhibit, and are outwardly, see ch. xi. 18, not in matters which are in their hearts implying that their hearts: are indifferent about the matters of which they boast).

13.] For (ye have good reason to boast of me as your teacher; seeing that) whether we have been mad (there is no need to soften the meaning to 'inordinately praise ourselves,' as Chrysostom; or 'act foolishly,' as others. "Paul, thou art mad," had been once said, Acts xxvi. 24, and doubtless this charge was among the means taken to deprecate his influence at Corinth), it was for God (in God's work and to His glory): or whether we be of sound mind, it is for you (on your behalf. 'So that you have reason to glory in us either way; if you will ascribe to us madness, it is a holy madness, for God; if you maintain and are convinced of our sobriety, it is a soundness in your service').

14–19.] And his constraining motive is the love of Christ: who died for all, that all should live to Him; and accordingly the Apostle has no longer any mere knowledge or regards according to the flesh, seeing that all things are become new in Christ, by means of the reconciliation effected by God in Him, of which reconciliation Paul is the minister.

14.] For (reason of his devotion under all reports and circumstances, to God and to you, as in last verse) Christ's love (not love to Christ, as "the love of Christ" in English may mean,—but Christ's love to men, subjective, as most Commentators; as shewn in His death, which is the greatest proof of love, see Rom. v. 6–8. Meyer remarks that the genitive of the person after "love" is with St. Paul always subjective,—Rom. v. 5, 8; viii. 35, 39; ch. viii. 24; xiii. 13; Eph. ii. 4; Phil. i. 9 al., whereas with St. John it is not always so, 1 John v. 3.—St. Paul expresses love of, i.e. towards, by the preposition 'to,' Col. i. 4. 1 Thess. iii. 12) constraineth us (a better word could not be found: the idea is that of forcible limitation, either in a good or a bad sense,—of confining to one object, or within certain bounds, be that one object a painful or glorious one,—those bounds the narrow limits of distress, or the course of apostolic energy, as here. 'Constraineth us,' generally:—limits us to one great end, and prohibits our taking into consideration any others. "There is a figure in this verb constraineth: it is signified, that it cannot be but that he who truly weighs and considers that marvellous love which Christ testified towards us by His death, being as it were bound to Him and attached by the tightest bond, should devote himself to His service." Calvin), having judged this (i. e., because we formed this judgment, viz. at our conversion:—learned to regard this as a settled truth), that One died for all (not only, for the benefit of all,—but instead of all, suffered death in the root and essence of our humanity, as the second Adam. This death on behalf of all men is the absolute objective fact: that all enter not into the benefit of that Death, is owing to the nonfulfilment of the subjective condition which follows), therefore all died (i. e. therefore, in the death of Christ, all, the all for whom He died, died too: i.e. see below, became planted in the likeness of His death,—died to sin and to self, that they might live to Him. This was true, objectively, but not subjectively till such death to sin and self is realized in each: see Rom. vi. 8 ff. The rendering of the A.V., "then were all dead," is inadmissible both from the construction of the original, and the context: 'One on behalf of all died, therefore all died: if One died the death of [belonging to, due from] all, then all died [in and with Him]'):

15.] and he died for all, that they which live (in this life, see ch. iv. 11:—not, 'those who live spiritually,' which would altogether strike out the sense, for it is, that they may live spiritually, &c.) should no longer (now that His death has taken place) live unto themselves (with self as their great source and end of action, to please and to obey), but unto Him that died, and rose again for them (for, i.e. strictly ‘in the place of:’ as the Death of Christ is our death, so His Resurrection is our resurrection).

16.] So that (accordingly,—consistently with our judgment expressed ver. 15) we (in opposition to our adversaries, the false teachers; not general of all Christians,—but as yet spoken of the Apostle himself [and his colleagues?]) henceforth (since this great event, the Death of Christ) know no man according to (as he is in) the flesh (Meyer well remarks: “Since all are [ethically] dead, and each man is bound to live only to Christ, not to himself, our knowledge of others must be altogether independent of that which they are according to the flesh,—must not be regulated according to the flesh. And the connexion of ver. 16 with ver. 15 shews that we must not take these words as furnishing the subjective rule of our knowledge,—so that the explanation would be, ‘according to mere human knowledge,’ ‘apart from the enlightening of the Holy Spirit,’ see ch. i. 17; 1 Cor. i. 26,—but as the objective rule, cf. ch. xi. 18; John viii. 15; Phil. iii. 4,—so that ‘to know any one according to the flesh’ means ‘to know any one according to his mere human individuality,—‘to know him as men have judged him by what he is in the flesh, not by what he is according to the spirit, as a Christian, as a new creature, ver. 17. He who knows no man according to the flesh has, e.g. in the case of the Jew, entirely lost sight of his Jewish origin,—in that of the rich man, of his riches,—in that of the learned, of his learning,—in that of the slave, of his servitude, &c., see Gal. iii. 28”): if even we have known Christ according to the flesh, now however we know Him (thus) no longer.—The fact alluded to in the concessive clause, is, not any personal knowledge of the Lord Jesus while He was on earth, but that view of Him which St. Paul took before his conversion, when he knew Him only according to His outward apparent standing in this world, only as Jesus of Nazareth.—Observe, the stress is not on the word Christ, ‘If we have known even Christ after the flesh,’ &c., as usually understood; but on have known, as belonging to the past, contrasted with our present knowledge. Observe likewise, that “according to the flesh,” as above also, is not to be taken as the subjective qualification of our knowledge, but as belonging to the word Christ,—‘Christ according to the flesh.’—St. Paul now, since his conversion, knew Him no longer as thus shewn, but as declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the Spirit of holiness. At that time God was pleased to reveal His Son in him, Gal. i. 16. See by all means Stanley’s remarks, on the absence of all local and personal recollections of our Lord’s life, in the apostolic age.

17.] So that (additional inference from what has gone before) if any man is in Christ (‘in Christ, i.e. in union with Him: Christ being the element in which by faith we live and move), he is a new creature (or ‘creation,’—the act implying here the result of the act. See Col. iii. 10, 11; Eph. ii. 10; iv. 23.—‘He has received,’ ‘passed into,’ ‘a new life,’ John iii. 3): the old things (of his former life—all the old selfish and impure motives, views, and prejudices) are passed away (there does not appear to be any allusion, as Chrysostom thinks, to the passing away of Judaism, but only to the new birth, the antiquation of the former unconverted state, with all that belonged to it); behold (a reminiscence of Isa. xliii. 18, 19), they (the old things) are become new.

18.] And all things (in this new creation: he passes to a more general view of the effects of the death of Christ—viz. our reconciliation to God) are of God (as their source), who reconciled us (all men, from next verse, where “the world” is parallel) to Himself through Christ (as an atonement, an expiatory sacrifice, ver. 21, for sin which made us “God’s enemies,” see Rom. v. 10), and gave (committed) unto us (Apostles, not mankind in general; for had it been so,—in the next verse which is parallel, ‘into their hands, not ‘into our hands,’ must have stood after “them” and “their” just preceding) the ministration of the reconciliation (the duty of ministering in that office, whose peculiar work it is to proclaim this reconciliation: so “the ministration of righteousness” ch. iii. 9—Observe, that the reconciliation spoken of in this and the next verse, is that of God to us, absolutely and objectively, through His Son: that whereby He can complacently behold and endure a sinful world, and receive all who come to Him by Christ. This, the subjective reconciliation,—of men to God,—follows as a matter of exhortation, ver. 20);

19.] to wit (or how), that God was reconciling the world to Himself in Christ (was cannot, as in the A.V., belong to in Christ, ‘God was in Christ, reconciling’ &c. This participle is past: He has accomplished the reconciliation.—The world, i.e., the whole world,—man, and man’s world, entire, with all that therein is, see Col. i. 20, but considered, see “them” and “their” below, as summed up in man), not reckoning unto them their trespasses (the participle is a present one: He does not, after this reconciliation, impute to any man his trespasses); and having put into our hands (literally, placed in us; ‘laid upon us, as our office and charge, and, besides, ‘empowered us for, put in our souls by His Spirit.’—‘Us,’ viz. Apostles and teachers) the word of the reconciliation (as ‘the word of the Cross,’ 1 Cor. i. 18).

20, 21.] He describes his office as that of an ambassador for Christ, consisting in beseeching them, ON THEIR PART, to be reconciled to God: and that, in consideration of the great Atonement which God has provided by Christ.—On Christ’s behalf then (i. e. in pursuance of the imposition on us of the “word of the reconciliation”) we are ambassadors, as though God were intreating by us: we pray (‘you,’ but not uttered as an integral part of the present text, not a request now made and urged, as Rom. xii. 1; he is describing the embassage; we are ambassadors, and in our embassage it is our work to beseech—‘Be ye, &c.’) on Christ’s behalf, Be reconciled to God:—‘be reconciled,’ strictly passive: «God was the RECONCILER—let this reconciliation have effect on you—enter into it by faith.’ Our A.V., by inserting the word ‘ye,’ has given a false impression, making it appear as if there were an emphasis on it, corresponding to God being reconciled to us,— whereas it is the simple being reconciled in that reconciliation in which God was in Christ, the Reconciler.

21.] states the great fact on which the exhortation to be reconciled is grounded:—viz. the unspeakable gift of God, to bring about the reconciliation.—It is introduced without a ‘for’ (which has been supplied), as still forming part of the word of the reconciliation.—Him who knew not sin (with what reference is this said? Some think, to the Christian’s necessary idea of Christ; others, to God’s judgment of Him. I much prefer to either, regarding it as said with reference to Christ Himself, Who said, John viii. 46, “Which of you convicteth Me of sin?” He was thus one ‘who knew not,’ i.e. by contact, personal experience, ‘sin.’ See, for the sense, 1 Pet. ii. 2; Heb. vii. 26. He made (to be) sin (not, ‘a sin-offering,’ as Augustine and others, for the word seems never to have the meaning: and if it had, the former sense of the same word in this same sentence would preclude it here: nor “a sinner,” as Meyer, and others: but, as De Wette, and others, SIN, abstract, as opposed to RIGHTEOUSNESS which follows: compare “a curse,” Gal. iii. 13. He, on the Cross, was the Representative of Sin,—of the sin of the world) for us (or, instead of us: I prefer here the former, because the purpose of the verse is to set forth how great things God has done for us:—the other, though true, does not seem so applicable.—The words for us are emphatic); that we might become (at once, and by this one act. The form of the word in the original necessitates this,—joining the whole justification of all God’s people, as one act accomplished, with the Sacrifice of Christ) the Righteousness of God (see above: representatives of the Righteousness of God, endued with it and viewed as in it, and examples of it) in Him (im union with Him, and by virtue of our standing in Him).

2 Corinthians: Chapter 6

CHAP. VI. 1–10.] He further describes his apostolic embassage, as one of earnest exhortation not to receive the grace of God in vain (vv. 1, 2), and of approving himself, by many characteristics and under various circumstances, as the minister of God (vv. 3–10).

1.] with Him is not expressed in the original, but these are evidently the right words to supply: with God, Whose representatives they were, and Whose grace they recommended. This is implied not only in what went before, but, in the words, “the grace of God,” of our verse itself.—Moreover, while working with God, we also intreat that ye (when preaching to you,—or others, when preaching to others: he still is describing his practice in his ministry, not using a direct exhortation to the Corinthians) receive not the grace of God (i. e. the reconciliation above spoken of) to no purpose (i. e. un-accompanied by sanctification of life).

2.] Ground of the exhortation: viz. the importance of the present time as the day of acceptance, shewn by a Scripture citation.—For He (God, with whom we are fellow-workers, and whose grace we re-command) saith, “In an accepted time (Heb. ‘in the season of grace’) I heard thee, and in the day of salvation I helped thee:” behold (inserted for solemnity—to mark the importance of what follows), NOW is the favourably-accepted time (the word is a strong term,—the very time of most favourable acceptance, said from the ful-ness of his feeling of the greatness of God’s grace); behold, NOW is the day of salvation. “For he who striveth in such a time, when so much of God’s gift is shed “abroad, in which grace is so great, shall easily gain the prize.” Chrysostom. The prophecy is one directly of the Lord Jesus, as the restorer and gatherer of his people; and the time of acceptance is the interval of the offer of the covenant to men, con-ceded to Him by the Father.

3–10.] And this doing, he approves himself as the minister of God by various characteristics, and under manifold circumstances in life.

3.] This word, giving, and all the following participles, vv. 9, 10, qualify the verb we intreat, in ver. 1, shewing the pains and caution used by him to enforce this exhortation by his example as well as his precept. So Grotius: “He shews how much in earnest is the advice of one who, in order that he may gain his end, shrinks from no manner of sufferings.” But evi-dently, before the list is exhausted, he passes beyond the mere confirmation of his preaching, and is speaking generally of the characteristics of the Christian ministry.

offence; literally, stum-bling; see Rom. xiv. 13.

that the ministry be not blamed] or reproached. The ministry, the office itself, would be reproached, if cause of offence were found in the character of its bearers.

4. as God’s ministers, recommending ourselves] recommending ourselves, as ministers of God should do: not, recommending ourselves as ministers of God: the ambiguity of the A.V. might have been avoided by a different arrangement of words: ‘in all things, as the ministers of God, approving ourselves.’ ‘The fol-low-ing nouns, following in each case the preposition in, are all in specification of in every thing: but not all of the same sort: some signify instruments by which, some, situations in which, some both these. Bengel remarks: “A notable gradation. ‘There follow thrice three particulars of suffering (i. e. from tribulation to fast-ings), by which patience is exercised: troubles, inflictions, labours.’”

5.] On stripes, see Acts xvi. 23, and ch. xi. 23, 24.

imprisonments] At Philippi only as yet, as far as we know from the narrative of the Acts;—but there must have been many other occasions, see eh. xi. 23. He may have been imprisoned at Antioch in Pisidia, Acts xiii. 50, and at Lystra, xiv. 19, and at Corinth, xviii. 12, 11: and we cannot tell what may have befallen him during his journeys, Acts xv. 41; xvi. 6; xviii. 23.

in tumults] See Acts xiii. 50; xiv. 5, 19; xvi. 22; xvii. 5; xviii. 12, and above all, xix. 23–41.

labours] The word usually, and here, signifies ‘labour in the Lord,’ for His sake. So also the verb ‘to labour,’ Rom. xvi. 6, 12 (twice), Chrysostom and others interpret it of his manual work, 1 Cor. iv. 12; but see ch. xi. 23, where this can hardly be; it is most probable that the weariness of his excessive apostolic labour was in his mind.

watchings] Chrysostom says, “During the nights in which he taught, or perhaps even wrought with his hands also.” But I would rather believe the watchings to have been watchings through anxiety for the churches.

in fastings] This is generally taken to refer to involuntary hunger and thirst. But the word does not appear to be ever so used; and in ch. xi. 27, Paul himself distinguishes “in fastings” from “in hunger and thirst.” The strict meaning of fastings must therefore be retained.

6.] The nine preceding substantives (see on ver. 4) have expanded the word patience. We now resume the main catalogue, with in pureness, which is variously explained: of bodily chastity:—of unselfishness:—I prefer to understand it to mean general purity of character;—unblameableness of life, and singleness of purpose.

in knowledge] of the Gospel, in a high and singular degree; see 1 Cor. ii. 6 ff.

in kindness] a kind and considerate demeanour.

in the Holy Ghost] as the Power by Whom all these motives are wrought.

7. in the word of truth] is taken by some as subjective,—‘in speaking, or teaching truth’—‘in discourse, the contents whereof were truth.’ the other (objective) sense is better, in the word of the truth, viz. the Gospel in which we labour.

in the power of God] viz. the Power spoken of ch. iv. 7,—the power manifested in every part of our apostolic working,—not merely in miracles.

through (in is changed for through, first apparently on account of the weapons: the word armour, in our present acceptance of it, means only the defensive casing: of the body, whereas this includes all the weapons, of offence and defence. “They are the weapons of, i.e. marking them more distinctly as instruments,—and then continued) the weapons of righteousness (belonging to,—or furnished by,—the righteousness which is of faith. That panoply, part of which only in the more particular specification of Eph. vi. 13–17, viz. the breastplate, is allotted to righteousness,—is here all assigned to it.—Some of the ancient Commentators understand by the word, ‘instruments,’ as in Rom. vi. 13, and interpret these instruments to be, situations and opportunities of life, whether prosperous, on the right-hand, or adverse, on the left: but the other interpretation is in better accordance with the Apostle’s habit of comparison,—see ch. x. 4; Eph. vi. 13 ff.; 1 Thess. v. 8).

which are on the right and left: i.e. encompassing and guarding the whole person. Most recent Commentators explain it, both right-handed,—i. e. of attack, the sword and spear,—and left-handed,—i. e. of defence, the shield: but the original seems to require the other interpretation. On the interpretation prosperity and adversity, see above.

8.] Perhaps the instrumental signification of through need not be strictly retained. The preposition, once adopted, is kept for the sake of parallelism, though with various shades of meaning. Here it points out the medium through which. Thus understood, these two pairs in ver. 8 will form an easy transition from instrumental, through medial, to the passive characteristics which follow.

as deceivers] From speaking of repute, he passes to the character of the repute.—In all these capacities and under all these representations or misrepresentations, we, as ministers of God, recommend ourselves. In these following clauses a new point is perhaps brought out, viz. the difference of our real state from our reputed one. That this is the case with “as dying, and, behold, we live,” and all following, is of course clear. But is it so with the two clauses preceding that one? Do they mean, ‘as deceivers, and yet true, as unknown, and yet well known,’ or,—‘as deceivers, and as true men, as unknown, and as well known?’ I own I am not clear on this point: but rather prefer the latter alternative (see in my Greek Test.). In the English text, I have kept literally to the Greek, supplying nothing, but leaving the ambiguity where it was.

as chastened] Surely we must now drop altogether the putative meaning of the as. ‘The sense has been (see above) some time verging that way, and in the clauses which follow, the as expresses just what it does in “being, as we are”... viz. “as God’s ministers.”—Ps. cxviii. 18, “The Lord hath chastened me sore: but He hath not given me over unto death,” seems to have been in the Apostle’s mind.

10.] Here even more clearly than before, the first member of the clause cannot express the opinion of his adversaries, but must point to the matter of fact. poor again can hardly have been reproach, but sets forth the fact—as poor men, but enriching (not by distribution of alms, as Chrysostom and others think, but by imparting spiritual riches; see 1 Cor. i. 5) many;—as having nothing (in the sense in which they who “have” are to be as though they “had not,” 1 Cor. vii. 29,—in the improper sense of ‘to possess,’ in which we here use the word—thus, we have nothing, are destitute), but possessing (finally and as our own, our inheritance never to be taken away; in that sense of the word ‘to possess’ which this world’s buyers are not to use, 1 Cor. vii. 30) all things. See a similar ‘possession of all things,’ 1 Cor. iii. 22: though this reaches further than even that,—to the boundless riches of the heavenly inheritance.

11—VII. 1.] EARNEST EXHORTATIONS TO SEPARATIONS FROM UNBELIEF AND IMPURITY.

11–13.] These verses form a conclusion to the preceding outpouring of his heart with regard to his apostolic ministry, and at the same time a transition to the exhortations which are to follow. 11.] Our (my) mouth is open (the word seems to refer to the free and open spirit shewn in the whole previous passage on the ministry, in which he had so liberally imparted his inner feelings to them) towards you, Corinthians (“the addition of their name is significant of much love, and of warmth, and of rhetorical skill: for it is our habit to cast about in our conversation constantly the bare names of those we love.” Chrysostom. See Phil. iv. 15; Gal. iii. 1, which last is written under a very different feeling), our (my) heart has become enlarged. These last words are very variously explained. Chrysostom and others understand them of the expansive effect of love on the heart: Luther and others, of the enlargement of joy, which does not however agree with “be ye enlarged also,” below: nor with the general context, either of what precedes or of what follows: for to refer it to ch. vii. 4, is evidently far-fetched, the intermediate matter being of such a different character. I believe the precise sense will only be found by taking into account the “be ye enlarged also,” below, and the occurrence of the expression in Ps. cxix. 32, “I will run the way of Thy commandments, when Thou shalt enlarge my heart.” Some light is also thrown upon it by the words “receive (make room for) us,” ch. vii. 2. The heart is considered as a space, wherein its thoughts and feelings are contained. We have seen the same figure in our expressions, ‘large-hearted,’ ‘narrow-minded.’ In order to take in a new object of love, or of desire, or of ambition, the heart must be enlarged. The Apostle has had his heart enlarged towards the Corinthians: he could and did take them in, with their infirmities, their interests, their Christian graces, their defects and sins: but they did not and could not take him in: he was misunderstood by them, and his relation to them disregarded. This he here asserts, and deprecates. He assures them of their place in his heart, which is wide enough for, and does contain them; and refers back to this verse in ch. vii. 3, thus: ‘I have said before, that ye are in our hearts’... He tells them, ver. 12.] that they are not straitened in him, i.e. that any constraint which they may feel towards him, any want of confidence in him and persuasion of his real appreciation of their state and interests, arose not from his being really unable to appreciate them, and love them, and advise them,—but from their own confined view of him, of his love, his knowledge of and feeling for them. 13.] as a recompence in the same kind, i.e. in the same manner, as a return for my largeness of heart to you.

as unto my children (explains the use of the word recompence—it being naturally expected of children, that they should requite the love and care of their parents, by corresponding love and regard).

14—VII. 1.] Separate yourselves from unbelief and impurity. On the nature of the connexion, Stanley has some good remarks. He now applies to circumstances which had arisen among the Corinthians the exhortation which in ver. 1 he described himself as giving in pursuance of his ministry of reconciliation. The following exhortations are general, and hardly to be pressed as applying only to partaking of meats offered to idols, or to marriage with unbelievers,—but regard all possible connexion and participation,—all leanings towards a return to heathenism which might be bred by too great familiarity with heathens.

Be not (literally, become not, perhaps, as expressing, ‘do not enter into those relations in which you must become’) incongruous yokefellows (the word in the original, and the idea, come from Lev. xix. 19) with unbelievers.

what fellowship] i.e. ‘what share in the same thing, what community. righteousness is the state of the Christian, being justified by faith: he is therefore excluded from iniquity (literally, lawlessness), the proper fruit of faith being obedience.

light, of which we are the children, 1 Thess. v. 5, and not of darkness.

15. Belial] The meaning of the Hebrew word is ‘contemptibleness,’ ‘wickedness:’ it is found 1 Sam. ii. 12, and other places: see reff. It appears to have been subsequently personified, and used as here for a name of the Evil One.

16. for ye are...] explanation of “the temple of God,” as applying to them, and justification of it by a ion from the prophetic Scriptures. ‘The words cited are compounded of Levit. xxvi. 12, and Ezek. xxxvii. 26, 27. 17.] The necessity of separation from the heathen enforced by another citation, Isa. lii. 11, freely given from memory; and I will receive you being moreover substituted from Ezek. xx. 34, for ‘the Lord will go before you, and the God of Israel will be your rereward.’ The unclean thing must be understood of the pollutions of heathenism generally, not of any one especial polluted thing, as meat offered to idols. 18.] The citation continues, setting forth the blessings promised to those who do thus come out from heathendom. Various passages of the O.T. are combined. In 2 Sam. vii. 14, we have “I will be his father, and he shall be my son.” The expression “m y sons and my daughters” is found Isa. xlivi. 6; and “thus saith the Lord of Hosts” begins the section from which the former clauses are taken, 2 Sam. vii. 8.

2 Corinthians: Chapter 7

VII. 1.] Inference from the foregoing citations:—seeing that we have such glorious promises, we are to purify ourselves (not merely, ‘keep ourselves pure:’ purification belongs to sanctification, and is a gradual work, even after conversion). of flesh, as the actual instrument and suggester of pollution: of spirit, as the recipient through the flesh, and when the ent, the retainer and propagator of umess. The exhortation is general: against impure acts and impure thoughts.

perfecting holiness gives the positive side of the foregoing negative exhortation: every abnegation and banishing of impurity is a positive advance of that sanctification, in the fear of God (as its element), to which we are called.

2–16.] CONCERNING THE EFFECT ON THEM, AND RESULTS IN THEIR CONDUCT, WHICH HIS FORMER EPISTLE HAD PRODUCED.

2–4.] He introduces the subject by a friendly assurance of his love and bespeaking of theirs, as before in ch. vi. 11, 13.

2.] Receive, make room for, see above on ch. vi. 13.

wronged no man] Reasons why they should make room for him in their hearts: we (when he dwelt among them,—the verbs refer to a set time, not to his course hitherto) wronged no man (in outward acts, namely,—in the exercise of his apostolic authority, or the like),—we ruined no man (this probably also of outward conduct towards others),—we cheated no man.—To understand these verbs as applying to the contents of the former Epistle, is very forced. If “wronged” had really referred to the severe punishment of the incestuous person, “ruined” to the delivering him over to Satan, and “defrauded” to the power which Paul gained over them by this act of authority, surely we should have found more express indication of such reference in the text. But no allusion has as yet been made to the former Epistle; and therefore it is much better to understand the words generally of the time when he resided among them, “In how many ways of which history says nothing, may such ruining of others be laid to the charge of Paul? How easily might his severe visitation of sin, his zeal for eleemosynary collections, his habit of lodging with members of the churches, and the like, have been thus unfavourably characterized!” Meyer.

3.] I do not say it (ver. 2) for condemnation (with a condemnatory view, in a spirit of blame: there is no “you,” or “of you,” expressed, nor should it be supplied. He means, ‘I do not say ver. 2 in any but a loving spirit’): for (and this shews it) I have said before (viz. ch. vi. 11 f. see note there), that ye are in our hearts (this was implied in ch. vi. 11) to die together and live together, i.e. ‘so that I could die with you or live with you.’

4.] confidence, which leads to and justifies boldness, not here ‘of speech,’ as A.V. after Chrysostom and others.

his glorying to others, in speaking of them.

comfort, literally, the comfort (which I have received), viz. that furnished by the intelligence from you: though this is anticipating what follows vv. 7, 9, I cannot but believe it to have been already before the Apostle’s mind.

I overflow] literally, I am made exceedingly to abound: see Matt. xiii. 12.

in all our tribulation refers to both preceding clauses. What tribulation he means is explained in the next verse. 5–7.] The intelligence received from them through Titus, and its comforting effect on the Apostle’s mind.

5.] For gives a reason for the mention of tribulation above: indeed connects with ch. ii. 12, 13, where he has spoken of the trouble which he had before leaving Troas. For indeed (literally, also), after our coming to Macedonia, our flesh had no rest (there is a slight, but very slight distinction, from ‘I had no rest in my spirit,’ ch. ii. 12. Titus was now present, so that that source of inquietude was removed; but the outward ones, of tightings generating inward fears (but see below), yet remained. No further distinction must be drawn—for the words “within were fears,” evidently shew that “flesh” must be taken in a wide sense); without, fightings (the omission of “were” renders the description more graphic), within, fears. It is best, as St. Paul speaks of our flesh, to understand without of the state of things without him personally, contentions with adversaries, either within or without the church, and within of that within him personally, fears, for ourselves, for others, or for you, how you might have received our letter.

6.] It was the not finding Titus which had given him such uneasiness in Troas, ch. ii. 12.

in the coming of Titus, as the conditional element or vehicle of the consolation. So also twice in next verse.

7.] not only...., but also in the comfort with which he was comforted concerning yon: i.e. ‘we shared in the comfort which Titus felt in recording to us your desire,’ &c. see ver. 13. He rejoiced in announcing the news: we in hearing them.

your longing desire—either longing to see me, or longing to fulfil my wishes. The former is the more simple.

your lamentation] viz. in consequence of my rebuke in my former Epistle. the more, viz. than before, at the mere coming of Titus.

8-11.] He expresses his satisfaction at the effect produced on them, as superseding his former regret that he had grieved them.

8.] Because (reason of the joy just expressed) though I even grieved you with (by means of) my epistle, I do not (now) repent (having written it), though I even did repent it (before the coming of Titus). Erasmus and others take the words to mean ‘even supposing I repented it before, which was not the case:’ Calvin and others think that the word repent is loosely used for regret. The reason of these departures from grammatical construction and the meaning of words, is, for fear the Apostle should seem to have repented of that which he did under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit. But there is no difficulty, even on the strictest view of inspiration, in conceiving that the Apostle may have afterwards regretted the severity which he was guided to use; we know that Jonah, being directed by inspiration to pronounce the doom of Nineveh, endeavoured to escape the unwelcome duty: and doubtless St. Paul, as a man, in the weakness of his affection for the Corinthians, was tempted to wish that he had never written that which had given them pain. But the result shewed that God’s Spirit had ordered it well, that he should thus write; and this his repentance was repented of again.

9.] Now, emphatic as distinguishing his present joy from his repentance: now that I know not only of your grief, but of its being grief which worked repentance.

after a godly manner] literally, ‘with reference to God,’ i.e. with a mind regarding God’s estimate of your conduct.

in order that ye might in nothing be damaged by us: not ‘so that ye did not...;’ as many Commentators:—the divine purpose of their grief is indicated; ‘God so brought it about, in order that your grief occasioned by me might have, not an injurious, but a beneficial effect.’

10.] How ‘grief according to God’ produces such an effect. For grief according to God (so literally) works (brings about, promotes, see reff.) repentance unto salvation never to be regretted. The epithet ‘never to be regretted’ belongs not to “repentance,” but to “salvation:” ‘salvation which none will ever regret’ having attained, however difficult it may have been to reach, however dearly it may have been bought.

the sorrow of the world, i.e. ‘the grief felt by the children of this world:’ grief for worldly substance, for character, for bereavement, without regard to God’s hand in it.

worketh death] i.e. death eternal, as contrasted with “salvation:” not ‘deadly sickness,’ or ‘suicide,’ as some explain it. The grief which contemplates nothing but the blow given, and not the God who chastens, can produce nothing but more and more alienation from Him, and result in eternal banishment from His presence. The verbs used in the two clauses differ: the former is rather works, ‘contributes to,’ and the latter works out, ‘results in.’

this selfsame thing, of which I have been speaking.

what carefulness, i.e. earnestness, as contrasted with your former carelessness in the matter.

yea] nay, not carefulness, merely,—that is saying too little;—but.... what clearing of yourselves] viz. to Paul by means of Titus, asserting their innocence in the matter; see below.

what indignation] against the offender.

what fear] “lest I should come with a rod,” Bengel: fear of Paul: not here of God. The context is brought well out by Chrysostom. He says, on what longing desire, “meaning, towards myself. Having mentioned fear,—in order that he might not seem to be lording it over them, he immediately sets them right by saying, what longing desire: which last points to love, not to power.”

what zeal] on God's behalf, to punish the offender;—exacting of punishment being the infliction of justice itself. Bengel remarks, that the six nouns preceded by yea, fall into three pairs: the first relating to their own feelings of shame,—the second to Paul, and the third to the offender.

In every thing must be understood only of participation of guilt: by their negligence, and even refusal to humble themselves (1 Cor. v. 2), they had in some things made common cause with the offender. Of this, now that they had shewn so different a spirit, the Apostle does not speak.

the matter,—perhaps, not only, ‘of which I have been speaking,’—but with allusion to the kind of sin which was in question.

12.] He shews them that to bring out this zeal in them was the real motive of his writing to them, and no private considerations.

Wherefore, i.e. ‘in accordance with the result just mentioned.’

he that suffered wrong would be the father of the incestuous person who “had his father's wife,” 1 Cor. v. 1.—It would be easy for any of the Apostle's adversaries to maintain that the reproof had been administered from private and interested motives. But he wrote, in order to bring out their zeal on his behalf (i. e. to obey his command), and make it manifest to themselves in God's sight. It was not to exhibit to them his zeal for them that he wrote, but to make manifest to them, to bring out among them, their zeal to regard and obey him.

13. For this cause (literally, on this account: on account of the fulfilment of this purpose) we are comforted; but in addition to (or, on the occurrence of) our comfort we rejoiced very much more at the joy of Titus, because his spirit has been refreshed by you all. A similar declaration to that in ver. 7, where not only the arrival of Titus, but his comfort wherewith he was comforted by them, is described as the ground of the Apostle's joy. According to the received reading (‘your comfort,’ see A.V.), the sense would hardly represent the real state of things.

14.] This increased joy was produced by the verification which my former boasting of you to Titus now received.

if I have boasted at all] see one particular in which he boasted of them, ch. ix. 2.

I was not put to shame, viz., by being shewn, on Titus' coming to you, to have boasted in vain:—‘but truthfulness was shewn to be my constant rule of speech, to whomsoever I spoke.’—But as we spake (generally, not merely in our teaching) all things to you in truth (truthfully), so also our boasting (concerning you) before Titus was (was proved to be: was, as shewn by proof) truth. De Wette suggests that the Apostle had described (by anticipation) to Titus in glowing terms the affection and probable prompt obedience of the Corinthians, as an encouragement to his somewhat unwelcome journey.

15.] enlarges the words ‘was found to be truth.’—And his heart is more abundantly (turned) toward you, remembering as he does the obedience of you all, how (i. e. which was shewn in the fact that) with fear and trembling ye received him. ‘Fear and trembling,’ i.e. ‘lest ye should not pay enough regard to my injunctions and honour enough his mission from me.’

16.] I rejoice (more expressive than with a connecting particle) that in every thing I am (re)-assured by you: ‘am of good courage, in contrast to my former dejection, owing to your good conduct.’

2 Corinthians: Chapter 8

CHAP. VIII. 1—IX. 15.] SECOND PART OF THE EPISTLE: CONCERNING THE COLLECTION FOR THE SAINTS.

1–6.] He informs them of the readiness of the Macedonian churches to contribute for the poor saints (at Jerusalem), which led him also to beg of Titus to complete the collection at Corinth. See some interesting geographical and historical notices in Stanley's introduction to this section, edn. 2, pp. 479 f.

1. the grace of God] For every good gift and frame of mind comes by divine grace, not by human excellency: and this occasion was most opportune for resting the liberality of the Macedonian churches on God's grace, that he might not be extolling them at the expense of the Corinthians, but holding out an example of the effusion of that grace, which was common to the Corinthians also, if they sought and used it.—The original expression is, given among,—shed abroad in, the churches of Macedonia.

2.] how that in much proof of tribulation (though they were put to the proof by much tribulation) (was) the abundance of their joy (i. e. their joy abounded), and their deep poverty abounded unto (produced abundant fruit, 'so as to bring about'....) the riches (the riches which have actually become manifest by the result of the collection) of their liberality.

3–5.] Proof of this. For according to their power, I testify, and beyond their power, voluntarily, with much exhortation beseeching of us the grace and fellowship of the ministry to the saints (i. e. to allow them a share in that grace and fellowship): and not as we expected (i. e. far beyond our expectation), but themselves they gave first (i. e. above all: as the inducing motive: not first in point of time, but in point of importance, see Rom. ii. 9, 10) to the Lord and to us by the will of God (the Giver of grace, who made them willing to do this: not the same as "according to the will of God," which only expresses [whatever it may imply] consonance with the divine will: whereas "by the will of God" makes the divine will the agent).

6.] So that we besought Titus, that as he had before (before the Macedonians began to contribute: 'during his visit from which he had now returned') begun it, so he would also complete among you this grace also (this act of grace or mercy, also,—as well as other things which he had to do among them. It does not belong to this,—'this grace also, as well as other graces,'—but to this grace altogether). 7–15.] Exhortations and inducements to perform this act of charity.

7.] But marks the transition to an exhortation: breaking off from arguments, of which enough have been alleged.

in faith, see ch. i. 24.

word, and knowledge] for both these, see 1 Cor. i. 5: for the latter, 1 Cor., viii. 1.

in all diligence, because diligence may be manifold, even in a good sense.

this is emphatic here, although it is not in ver. 6: 'this grace also;—other graces having been enumerated. Grotius remarks, "Paul was not ignorant of the rhetorical art of stirring the mind by praise."

8.] Lest his last words should be misunderstood, he explains the spirit in which they were said: not as a command, but by way of inducement, by mention of the earnestness of others, and to try the genuineness of their love.

by means of] not as A. V., "by occasion of," which is an ungrammatical rendering of the original: he treats the zeal of others as the instrument by which, in the way of emulation, the effect was to be produced.

9.] Explanation of 'proving the sincerity of your love, by upholding His example in the matter. Whom we ought to resemble.

the (act of) grace:—the beneficence.

that] consisting in this, that (literally).

he being rich became poor:—not merely by His renunciation of human riches during His life on earth, but by His examination of His glory (Phil. ii. 6, 7), when, as Athanasius says, "He took up into Himself our impoverished nature." The stress is on for your sakes, to raise the motive of gratitude the more effectually in them.

that by His poverty (as the efficient cause) ye might become rich: viz. with the same wealth in which he was rich,—the kingdom and glory of Heaven, including all the blessings which He came to bestow on us. Chrysostom adds, "If thou dost not believe that poverty creates wealth, consider thy Master, and thou wilt doubt no longer."

10.] Ver. 9 was parenthetic: he now resumes the proposition of ver. 8, that he did not speak by way of command.... And I give my opinion in this matter, the stress being on opinion, as distinguished from command. "I give my judgment," as rendered in the version of the Five Clergymen, is objectionable here, as conveying the very idea which the Apostle wishes to negative, that of an authoritative decision.

for this (viz. ‘my giving my opinion, and not commanding’) is expedient for you, seeing that ye (‘My giving my opinion, rather than commanding, is expedient for you, who have already shewn yourselves so willing.’ A command from me would be a lowering of you, and depreciation of your zeal) began before them (the Macedonian churches, see below), not only the act, but also the mind to act, from a year ago: i.e., ‘not only were you before them in the deed itself, but also in the will to do it.’—The sense has been missed by many of the Commentators, from not observing the comparison implied, and applying it only to the Corinthians themselves beginning. In that case, as the will comes before the deed, to say, you began not only to do, but also to will, would be unmeaning. But there are three steps in the collection for the saints,—the wishing it, the setting about it, and the completion of it. And the Corinthians had begun not only the second, but even the first of these, before the Macedonians. Long employed as they had then been in the matter, it was more creditable to them to receive advice from the Apostle, than command. 11.] But (contrast of your former zeal with your present need to be reminded of it) now complete the act itself also (now shew not only the completion of a ready will in the act begun, but complete the act also); that as (there was) (with you) readiness of will, so (there may) also (be) completion according to your means (not, ‘out of that which ye have,’ as A.V., but ‘after the measure of your property’).

12.] Explanation of the last mentioned qualification,—that on it, zeal being presupposed, and not on absolute quantity, acceptability depends.

For if there is first the willing mind,—according to what it may happen to possess, it is acceptable, not according to what it posseseth not. The construction of the sentence is simple enough: the willing mind being the subject throughout, as if personified: readiness in God’s service is accepted if its exertion be commensurate with its means,—and is not measured by an unreasonable requirement of what it has not.

13–15.] Further explanation that the present collection is not intended to press the Corinthians according to what they possessed not.

For (it is) not (the collection is not made) that there may be to others (the saints at Jerusalem) relief, and to you distress (of poverty):

14.] but that, by the rule of equality, at this present time (of their need: the stress is on these words, as suggesting that this relation may hereafter be altered) your abundance may subserve their deficiency; that also (supposing circumstances changed) their abundance may subserve your want. The reference is still, as is evident from the next verse, to the supply of temporal wants, in respect of which there should be a mutual relieving and sharing among Christians. But the passage has been curiously misunderstood to mean, ‘that their (the Jewish Christians) abundance in spiritual things may be imparted to you to supply your deficiency’ Thus Chrysostom and others,—the ancients regarding this imparting as the Gospel-benefit received from them by the Gentiles (which however was past, not future, and is urged as a motive for gratitude, see Rom. xv. 27), and the modern Romanists introducing the monstrous perversion of the attribution of the merits of the saints to others in the next world. So Estius: ‘This passage of the Apostle shews, against the heretics of our time, that Christians of inferior sanctity may be helped, even in another world, by the merits of the saints. And we may note the virtue of alms, which make a man partaker of the merits of him on whom they are conferred.’

that there may be equality: as it is written (i. e. according to the expression used in the Scripture history, of the gathering of the manna), He that (gathered) much did not exceed (the measure prescribed by God); and he that (gathered) little did not fall short (of it). The fact of equality being the only point brought into comparison as between the Israelites of old and Christians now, it is superfluous to enquire minutely how this equality was wrought among the Israelites. The quotation is presumed by the Apostle to be familiar to his readers.

16–24.] Of Titus and two other brethren whom Paul had commissioned to complete the collection.

16.] The sense is taken up from ver. 6.

the same, viz. as I have in my heart.

17.] Proof of this: that Titus received indeed Paul’s exhortation to go to them (said, to shew his subordination,—or perhaps to authenticate his authorization by the Apostle), but in reality was too ready to go, to need any exhortation:—and therefore set forth (the past tense, indicating things which will have passed before the letter is received) of his own accord to them.

18–21.] Commendation of a brother sent with Titus.

18.] the brother cannot surely be, as some Commentators have understood, ‘the brother of Titus:’ the delicate nature of the mission would require that there should be at least no family connexion between those sent to fulfil it. This and the other are called in ver. 23 “our brethren,” and were unquestionably Christian brethren in the usual sense. Who this was, we know not. Chrysostom and others suppose Barnabas to be meant: but there is no historical ground for this, and we can hardly suppose him put under Titus. Others suppose Silas: to whom this last objection would also apply: besides that he was well known to the Corinthians, and therefore would not need this recommendation. Origen, Jerome, and others, Luke:—and of these, all before Grotius (who pointed out the mistake; which however I see lately reproduced in Mr. Birks’s Horæ Apostolicae, p. 242 f.) suppose the words, “whose praise in the Gospel,” to refer to his gospel, which he wrote;—but this is altogether without proof, as is the assumption by others that it was Mark. It may have been Trophimus, who (Acts xx. 4) accompanied Paul into Asia, and (xxi. 29) to Jerusalem: so De Wette and Wieseler. If the expression whose praise in (the matter of) the Gospel is throughout all the Churches, is to be compared with any similar eulogium, that of Gaius in Rom. xvi. 23, seems to correspond most nearly: “Gaius, mine host and [the host] of the whole church:” but he was resident at Corinth, see 1 Cor. i. 14. A Gaius, a Macedonian, is mentioned Acts xix. 29, as one of the fellow-travellers of Paul, as here, together with Aristarchus, which latter we know accompanied him to Jerusalem (but see below on ch. ix. 4).—It must then rest in uncertainty.

19.] Parenthetical (see on ver. 20) adding to his general commendation a particular qualification for this office.

and not only so (i. e. praised in all the churches), but who was also appointed (by vote: elected, ordained) by the churches (of Macedonia? see ver. 1) as our fellow-traveller (to Jerusalem, from what follows) in (the matter of: the best English version is with) this charity which is being ministered by us,—in order to subserve the glory of the Lord, and our readiness (this clause refers not to “being ministered by us,” as usually interpreted, but to the fact related, the union of this brother with Paul in the matter of the alms, which was done to avoid suspicions detrimental to Christ’s glory, and to the zeal of the Apostle):

20.] taking heed of this (the participle belongs to ver. 19, being parenthetical), that no one blame us (ver. 18) in the matter of this abundance (of contributions) which is being ministered by us.

21.] ‘And such caution is in accordance with our general practice.’ See reff. The words are quoted from the Septuagint version of Prov. iii. 4.

22.] Still less can we determine who this second brother is. Every possible person has been guessed. Several would answer to the description, ‘whom we have many times in many matters proved to be earnest.’ By our uncertainty in these two cases, we may see how much is required, to fill up the apostolic history at all satisfactorily.

through the great confidence which he hath toward you: belongs to his present access of diligence, not to the fact of the Apostle having sent him. The brother had, by what he had heard from Titus, conceived a high opinion of the probable success of their mission. 23.] General recommendation of the three. Whether concerning Titus (we may supply I speak or I write, or as in A.V., ‘any do enquire?’ or we need not supply any thing), he is my partner and (especially) my fellow-worker toward yo whether our brethren (be in question: viz. the two mentioned—but in the original the word is generalized ‘whether any brethren of ours’), they are Apostles (in the more general sense of Acts xiv. 14; 1 Thess. ii. 6; Phil. ii. 25) of the churches (i. e. ‘are of the churches, what we are of the Lord’—persons sent out with authority), the glory of Christ (i. e. men whose work tends to Christ’s glory).

24.] Shew then (continue to shew) to them the proof of your love (‘to us,’ or perhaps, ‘to your poor brethren:’—but the former is more likely), and of our boasting concerning you, in the sight of the churches.

2 Corinthians: Chapter 9

IX. 1–5.] He recurs to the collection itself, and prays them that they would make good before the brethren his boasting of them, and prepare it before his own coming.

1.] The connexion with the last verse is thus, ‘I beseech you to receive the brethren whom I send, courteously: for concerning the duty of ministration to the saints, it is surely superfluous for me to write to you who are so prompt already.’ No new subject begins, as some have supposed; nor is there any break in the sense at all. Some obscurity has been introduced unnecessarily, by taking the ministration for the saints for merely this collection which is now making: whereas the Apostle chooses such general terms as a mild reproof to the Corinthians, who, well aware as they were of the duty of ministering to the saints, were yet somewhat remiss in this particular example of the duty. There is an emphasis on write, inasmuch as those who carried this letter would be present witnesses of their conduct.

2.] for (ground of this non-necessity of his writing) I am aware of your readiness, of which I am in the habit of boasting concerning you to Macedonians (Bengel remarks on the present tense, that St. Paul was therefore still in Macedonia), that Achaia (he does not say ye—he is relating his own words to the Macedonians) hath been ready (viz. to send off the money: and that consequently nothing remained but for authorized persons to come and collect it. The Apostle, judging by their readiness, had made this boast concerning them, supposing it was really so. That this is the sense is shewn by ver. 4) from last year: and the zeal which proceeds from you (‘which has its source in you, and whose influence goes forth from you’) stirred up very many of them (but not only the example of your zeal: see ch. viii. 1).

3.] Yet (contrast, not to his boasting above: implying fear lest he should have been making a vain boast concerning them) I sent (epistolary past, as in ch. viii. 18, 22) the brethren, in order that our [matter of] boasting concerning you may not in this particular be proved empty (‘that our boast of you, so ample and various—ch. vii. 4, may not break down in this one department.’ Estins well calls it “a sharp exhortation of the Apostle combined with tacit praise”): that, as I said (when? in ver. 2? or, in his boasting to the Macedonians? or, in 1 Cor. xvi. 1?—Most naturally, in ver. 2. If he had meant, to the Macedonians, it would probably have been “I am saying.” as I boast above: if in 1 Cor. xvi., it would have been more clearly expressed.—If so, I said refers merely to their being ready, as he had boasted they were), ye may be prepared (see above on ver. 2):

4.] lest perchance if Macedonians should come with me (to you: to bring me on my way, or to bear the Macedonian collection. We may infer from this expression, that neither of the two brethren above mentioned, ch. viii. 18, 22, was a Macedonian), and should find you unprepared (with your collection, see ver. 2), we (who have boasted), not to say, ye (who were boasted of), should be put to shame in [the matter of] this confidence (respecting you).

5.] I therefore (because of ver. 4) thought it necessary to exhort the brethren (Titus and the two others), that they should go before (my coming) unto you, and previously prepare your long announced beneficence (i. e. long announced by me to the Macedonians, ver. 2).

beneficence, literally, blessing; not used only of a blessing in words, but of one expressed by a present, as Gen. xxxiii. 11; Judg. i. 15. This sense of blessing, combined with the primitive sense, affords the Apostle an opportunity for bringing out the true spirit in which Christian gifts should be given), that this same may be ready in such sort as beneficence, and not as covetousness (i. e. as the fruit of blessing, poured out from a beneficent mind, not of a sparing covetous spirit which gives no more than it need).

6, 7.] He enforces the last words by an assurance grounded in Scripture and partly cited from it, that as we sow, so shall we reap.

this] Some supply ‘I say,’ as 1 Cor. vii. 29. But I would rather take it as an imperfect construction, in which this is used merely to point at the sentiment which is about to follow:—But this—(is true), or But (notice) this....

with blessings] This refers to the spirit of the giver, who must be ‘a cheerful giver,’ not giving murmuringly, but with blessings, with a beneficent charitable spirit: such an one shall reap also with blessings, abundant and unspeakable. The only change of meaning in the second use of the expression is that the blessings are poured on him, whereas in the first they proceeded from him: in both cases they are the element in which he works. So, we bestow the seed, but receive the harvest. The spirit with which we sow, is of ourselves: that with which we reap, depends on the harvest. So that the change of meaning is not arbitrary, but dependent on the nature of things.

7.] A continuation of the same thought:—“sparingly,” and “with blessings,” referred to the spirit of the giver; so does this verse—grudgingly corresponding to “sparingly,” cheerful to “with blessings.”

as he purposeth in his heart; supply, ‘so let him give?’ i.e. let the full consent of the free will go with the gift; let it not be a reluctant offering, given out of grief (so literally), out of an annoyed and troubled mind at having the gift extorted, nor out of necessity,—because compelled. Such givers,—that is implied, God does not love.

8–11.] He encourages them to a cheerful contribution by the assurance that God both can (vv. 8, 9) and will (vv. 10, 11) furnish them with the means of performing such deeds of beneficence.

8. every grace] even in outward good things—to which here the reference is: not excluding, however, the wider meaning of ‘all grace.’

that having at all times in every thing all sufficiency (of worldly substance), ye may abound towards (‘have an overplus for,’ which is not inconsistent with sufficiency, seeing that sufficiency does not exclude the having more, but only the having less than is sufficient: the idea of a man’s having at all times and in all things a sufficiency, would presuppose that he had somewhat to spare) every good work:

9.] as it is written (i. e. fulfilling the character described in Scripture), H e scattered abroad (metaphor from seed); he gave to the poor: his righteousness remaineth for ever.—In what sense is righteousness used? Clearly in the only one warranted by the context—that of ‘goodness proved by beneficence,’—a righteous deed, which shall not be forgotten,—as a sign of righteousness in character and conduct.’ To build any inference from the text inconsistent with the great truths respecting righteousness ever insisted on by St. Paul (as Chrysostom does, when he says, “For also benevolence maketh men righteous, consuming their sins like fire, when it is poured forth with liberality”), is a manifest perversion.

10.] Assurance that God will do this.—But (introduces the new assurance) He that ministers seed to the sower and bread for eating (in the physical world: from Isa. iv. 10. The A.V. here commits the mistake of joining “bread for your food” with the following verb “supply” or “minister”), shall supply and multiply your seed (i. e. the money for you to bestow, answering to the word. “seed to the sower”), and will increase the fruits of your righteousness (from Hos. reff.—the everlasting reward for your bestowals in Christ’s name, as Matt. x. 42; answering to ‘bread for eating,’ which is the result of the sower’s labours).

11.] Method in which you will be thus blessed by God.—In every thing being enriched unto all liberality (i. e. in order that you may shew all liberality), which (of a sort which) brings about by our means (as the distributors of it) thanksgiving (from those who will receive it) to God.

12.] Explanation of the last clause. Because the ministration (not on our part who distribute, though it might at first, sight seem so: the next verse decides the word to mean, ‘your administering by contribution,’ as in ver. 1) of this public service (the proper sense of the word used is, serving the public by furnishing the means of outfit for some necessary purpose) not only serves the end of supplying by its help the wants of the saints, but of abounding by means of many thanksgivings to God;

13.] they (the recipients) glorifying God by means of the proof (i. e. the experience, tried reality—the substantial help yielded by) of this (your) ministration, for the subjection of your confession as regards the Gospel of Christ (i. e. ‘that your confession, you who confess Christ, is really and truly subject in holy obedience, as regards the gospel of Christ.’ But as regards must not be joined with subjection, as in A.V. ‘subjection unto,’—which is unexampled: it is towards, ‘in reference to’), and liberality of your contribution, unto them, and unto all men (the same remarks apply to unto as above).

14.] The construction is difficult. See it discussed in my Greek Test. The meaning is obvious enough, viz. that glory also accrues to God by the prayers of the recipients, who are moved with the desire of Christian love to you, on account of the grace of God which abounds eminently towards (over: in our English version in) you.

15.] Having entered, in the three last verses, deeply into the thankful spirit which would be produced in these recipients of the bounty of the Corinthians, he concludes with an ascription, in the spirit also of a thankful recipient, of unsigned thanks to Him, who hath enriched us by the gift of His only Son, which brings with it that of all things else (Rom. viii. 32), and is, in all its wonders of grace and riches of mercy, truly ineffable. It is impossible to apply such a term, so emphatically placed as here, to any gift short of THAT ONE. And the ascription, as coming from Paul’s fervent spirit, is very natural in this connexion.

2 Corinthians: Chapter 10

CHAP. X. 1—XIII. 13.] THIRD PART OF THE EPISTLE. DEFENCE OF HIS APOSTOLIC DIGNITY, AND LABOURS, AND SUFFERINGS, AGAINST HIS ADVERSARIES: WITH ANNOUNCEMENT OF HIS INTENDED COURSE TOWARDS THEM ON HIS ENSUING VISIT.

X. 1–6.] He assures them of the spiritual nature, and power, of his apostolic office: and prays them not to make it necessary for him to use such authority against his traducers at his coming.

1.] The form in which the chapter begins marks the transition to a new subject,—and the words I Paul myself point on to the personal characteristics mentioned below, setting his apostolic dignity in contrast with the depreciation which follows.

by the meekness and gentleness of Christ as in Rom. xii. 1, using the meekness and gentleness of Christ (Matt. xi. 29, 30) as a motive whereby he conjures them. And most appropriately: he beseeches them by the gentleness of Christ, not to compel him to use towards them a method of treatment so alien from that gentleness: “Remember how gentle my Master was, and force not me His servant to be otherwise towards you.”

who in personal appearance in-deed (am) mean among you (he appropriates concessively, but at the same time with some irony,—the imputation by which versaries strove to lessen the weight of his letters), but when absent am bold (severe, outspoken in blame) towards you:

2.] but (however this may be, as-suming this character of me to be true or not, as you please;—or, notwithstanding that I may have been hitherto bold among you) I beseech [you] (not, God: there is no word expressed in the original), that I may not when present (‘as I intend to be’—‘at my next visit’) have to be bold (see above) with the confidence (official peremptoriness, and reliance on my authority) with which I think to be bold towards (against) some, (namely) those who think ‘of) us as walking according to the flesh “that is, ruling our life and actions according to carnal and human affections. For they thought that Paul, when he was among them, either to curry favours or from fear of offence, or from some human feeling of that kind, had been deterred from using his authority, of which he made boast in his letters.” Estius).

8.] The for here shews that this verse is not the refutation of the charge of walking according to the flesh, but a reason rendered for the request made above; and the words “in the flesh” and “according to the flesh” allude only to the charge just mentioned. This indeed is shewn by the use, and enlargement in vv. 4–6, of the idea of warring, instead of that of walking:—they who accuse us of walking after the flesh, shall find that we do not war after the flesh: therefore compel us not to use our weapons.

Although we walk in the flesh, i.e. are found in the body,—yet we do not take our apostolic weapons from the flesh—do not make its rule, our rule of warfare.

4.] Enlargement of the idea.—If the warfare were according to the flesh, its weapons would be carnal: whereas now, as implied, they are spiritual,—powerful in the sight of God (i. e. ‘in a estimation, after His rule of war-fare’) in order to pulling down of strong holds (see Prov. xxi. 22. Stanley thinks that recollections of the Mithridatic and piratical wars may have contributed to this imagery. The second of these, not more than sixty years before the Apostle’s birth, and in the very scene of his earlier years, was ended by the reduction of 120 strong-holds, and the capture of more than 10, 000 prisoners).

5.] The participle casting down refers to we, the implied subject of ver. 4;—this verse carrying on the figure made use of in the term strong holds. By reasonings he means, as Chrysostom says, “the pride of the Greeks, and the force of sophistries and logical arguments:”—but, not only these:—every towering conceit according to the flesh is also included.

and every high thing (i. e. lofty edifice, fortress or tower) which is being raised (or, raising itself) against the knowledge of God (i. e. the true knowledge of Him in the Gospel; not subjective here, but taken objectively, the things compared being human knowledge, as lifted up against the knowledge of God, i.e. the Gospel itself), and leading captive every intent of the mind (not ‘thought’, as A.V.: not intellectual subjection here, but that of the will, is intended) into subjection to Christ.

6.] (but perhaps some will not thus be subjected. In that case we are ready to inflict punishment on them: but not till every opportunity has been given them to join the ranks of the obedient) when your obedience (stress on your) shall have been fulfilled. He does not mention any persons—not the disobedient, but every (case of) disobedience, and throws out your obedience into strong relief, as charitably embracing all, or nearly all, those to whom he was writing.

7—XII. 18.] A DIGRESSION, IN WHICH HE VINDICATES HIS APOSTOLIC DIGNITY, HIS FRUITFULNESS IN ENERGY AND IN SUFFERINGS, AND THE HONOUR PUT ON HIM BY THE LORD IN REVELATIONS MADE TO HIM.

7–11.] He takes them on their own ground. They had looked on his outward appearance, and designated it as mean. ‘Well then,’ he says: ‘do ye regard outward appearance? Even on that ground I will shew you that I am an Apostle—I will bear out the severity of my letters: I will demonstrate myself to be as much Christ’s as those who vaunt themselves to be especially His.’—This rendering suits the context best, and keeps the sense of in presence in ver. 1. Respecting other renderings, see my Greek Test.

If any one believeth himself to belong to Christ (literally, ‘trusteth to himself to belong.’—From 1 Cor. i. 12, it certainly was one line taken by the adversaries of the Apostle to boast of a nearer connexion with, a more direct obedience to, Christ, in contradistinction to Paul: and to this mind among them he here alludes), let him reckon this again out of his own mind (i. e. let him think afresh, and come to a conclusion obvious to any one’s common sense, and not requiring any extraneous help to arrive at it), that as he is Christ’s, so also are we (that whatever intimate connexion with or close service of Christ he professes, such, and no less, is mine).

8.] This is shewn to be so. Even more boasting than he had ever yet made of his apostolic power, would not disgrace him, but would be borne out by the fact.

For if (literally) we were to boast somewhat more abundantly (than we have ever done: or than in vv. 3–6) concerning our power which the Lord has given for building you up and not for casting you down (“how then has he before said, ‘casting down reasonings? &c.,’ because thus, to cast down the unsound and rotten parts, and to remove obstacles, is the best way of building up.” Chrysostom), I shall not be put to shame (“I shall not be shewn to be acting falsely, nor assuming too much.” Chrysostom).

9.] follows on ver. 8, but requires some clause to be supplied, such as ‘And I say this,’ or the like: I say this, because I wish not to seem, &c.

by my letters] He had written two before this, see 1 Cor. v. 9; but this is not necessarily here implied: for he may reckon this which he is now writing. Still less can we infer hence that a third had been written before this.

10. his bodily presence is weak] No countenance is given by these words to the idea that Paul was of weak physical constitution, or short in stature. His own explanation of them is sufficient as given in 1 Cor. ii. 1 ff. It is, that when he was present among them, he brought, not the strength of presence or words of the carnal teachers, but abjured all such influence, and in fear and trembling preached Christ crucified. It was this, and not weakness of voice, which made his speech to be contemptible. At the same time, the contrast being between his epistles and his word of mouth, his authority as unaccompanied or accompanied by his presence, it must be assumed, that there was something (see on ch. xii. 7) which discommended his appearance and delivery.

11.] such are we, not “such will we be.” Not only the conduct of the Apostle on his next visit, but his general character, is in question.

12–18.] The difficulty of this passage is universally acknowledged. Perhaps the Apostle wrote obscurely, not wishing to point out the offenders more plainly. He substantiates what has just been said, by shewing how unlike he is to those vain persons who boast of other men’s labours;—for he boasts of what God had really done among them by him, and hopes that this boast may be yet more increased.

12.] disclaims resemblance to those false teachers who made themselves their only standard. For we do not venture (ironical; — “while he says what he does not, he upbraids that which they do.” Bengel) to number ourselves with, or compare ourselves with some of those who commend themselves (the charge made against him, “commending,” see ch. iii. 1; v. 12, he makes as a true one against the false teachers): but (they) themselves measuring themselves by themselves, and comparing themselves with themselves, are not wise. On the various renderings, see my Greek Test. Calvin well illustrates the sense, by the reputation which any moderately learned man gained among the ignorant monks of his day. 13.] But we (opposed to those spoken of in last verse) will not (ever: will never allow ourselves to) boast without measure (that is, as they do who compare themselves with themselves, and measure themselves by themselves,—for there is no standard for, no limit to, a man’s good opinion of himself), but according to the measure of the rule (i... ‘the measure pointed out by the rule’) which God apportioned to us as a measure to reach even unto you.

14.] Further explanation of reaching even unto you. For we are not stretching ourselves beyond [our bounds], as (we should be doing) if we did not reach to you: for even as far as unto you did we come in the gospel of Christ (the element in which our advance was made: ‘the gospel,’ i.e. ‘the promulgation of the gospel’).

15.] Carrying out the thought of ver. 14.

not boasting without measure in other men’s labours (the element of the boasting); but having a hope, as your faith increaseth, to be enlarged among you according to our rule (i. e. our apportionment of apostolic work, for we seek not to stretch ourselves (beyond it) unto great abundance (‘so as to abound more than we now do,’ viz. as ver. 16 explains),

16.] so as (with a view) to preach the gospel in the regions beyond you, not (with a view) to boast ourselves within another man’s line (measuring line: according to the metaphor so common among us, ‘in his line’—i. e. ‘within the line which ‘Providence has marked out for him’) with regard to (or, ‘to the extent of: ‘to extend our boasting to’) things ready made to our hand.

17.] He sets forth to them, in contrast to this boasting themselves in another’s line, which was the practice of his adversaries, wherein the only legitimate boasting must consist: viz. in the Lord, the Source of all grace and strength and success in the ministry; see 1 Cor. xv. 10.

18.] The reason of this being, that not the self-commander, but he whom the Lord commands by selecting him as His instrument, as He had the Apostle, and giving him the epistle of commendation, to be known and read by all men, of souls converted and churches founded, is approved, i.e. really and in the end abiding the test of trial.

2 Corinthians: Chapter 11

XI. HIS BOASTING OF HIMSELF: and 1–4.] apologetic introduction of it, by stating his motive,—viz. jealousy lest they should fall away from Christ.

1.] but (why need I request this? for) indeed you (see note, ch. v. 8) do bear with me. The indicative is much better than the imperative rendering. He says it, to shew them that he does not express the wish as supposing them void of tolerance for his weakness, but as having experi-enced some at their hands, and now requiring more.

2.] ‘That forbear-ance which you do really extend to me, and for more of which I now pray, is due from you, and I claim to have it exercised by you, because I have undertaken to present you to Christ as a chaste bride to her hus-band, and (ver. 3) I am jealous for fear of your falling away from Him.’

a jealousy of God] see ch. i, 12, a godly jealousy: see note there.

I betrothed you (viz. at your conversion) to one husband, to present i.e. in order that I may present in you, present you as) a chaste virgin to Christ (viz. at His coming): “The present is the time of betrothal: the future, that of the nuptials, when the cry shall be, ‘Behold the bridegroom.’” Theophylact.

3.] But he fears their being seduced from their fidelity to Christ.

the serpent] He takes for granted that the Corinthians recognized the agency of Satan in the (well-known) serpent: see vv. 13–15, where his transformation of himself for the sake of deceit is alluded to.

4, 5.] The thought here seems to be this:—‘If these new teachers had brought. with them a new Gospel, superseding that which I preached, they might have some claim to your regard. But, since there is but one gospel, that which I preached to you, and which they pretend to preach also, I submit that in that one no claim to regard is prior to mine.’ Observe, that. the whole hypothesis is ironical: it is fixed and clear that there can be no such new gospel: therefore the inference is the stronger.

For (the whole sentence is steeped in irony:—‘the serpent deceived Eve by subtlety: I fear for you, but not because the new teachers use such subtlety—if they did, if the temptation were really formidable, there would be some excuse.’ All this lies in the for) if indeed (the expression introduces a reality, and is full here of deep irony) he that cometh (viz, the false teachers generically thus designated: but here too perhaps there is irony: “he that cometh” was a solemn expression) is preaching (the indicative pres. carries on the ironical assumption, so below) another Jesus, whom we preached not, or ye are receiving a different Spirit (the former word, other, was distinctive of individuality; this word, of kind), which ye received not (from us), or another gospel, which ye accepted not (received, accepted): “differing words, each fitted for its purpose. The will of man has no share in receiving the Spirit, as it has in accepting the Gospel.” Bengel), ye with reason bear with him (irony again: for they not only bore with, but preferred them to their father in the faith. The sense is: ‘there seems to be some excuse in that case,—but even in that, really there is none,—for your tolerating him.’ ‘Seeing that there is but one gospel, and they and I profess to preach one Jesus and impart one Spirit, they have no such claim: mine is superior’). For I reckon that in no respect do I fall short of (literally, have I fallen short of) these overmuch apostles. This expression has very commonly been taken to mean bona fide ‘the greatest Apostles, i.e. Peter, James, and John, or perhaps the Twelve: but (1) this hardly seems to suit the expression overmuch, in which I cannot help seeing some bitterness: (2) it would be alien from the spirit of the passage, in which he institutes no comparison whatever between himself and the other Apostles, but only between himself and the false teachers: (3) had any such comparison been here intended, the point of comparison would not have been, personal eminence in fruits of apostolic work and sufferings, still less, seeing that the other Apostles were unlearned also, the distinction which immediately follows, between a “common man,” and one pretending to more skill,—but priority of arrival and teaching in Corinth: (4) the expression “false Apostles,” ver. 18, seems to me to refer to, and give the plain sense of, this ironical designation of “overmuch Apostles:” (5) the same expression ch. xii. 11 appears even more plainly than here to require this explanation. It has been the practice of Protestant Commentators to adduce this verse against the primacy of Peter, and of the Romanists, to evade the inference by supposing the pre-eminence to be only in gifts and preaching, not in power and jurisdiction. All this will fall to the ground with the supposed reference to the other Apostles.

6.] explains that, though in one particular he may fall short of them, viz. in rhetorical finish and word-wisdom, yet in real knowledge, not so.

a common man] a laic—a man not professionally acquainted with that which he undertakes. The ‘Apostle disclaims mere rhetorical aptitude and power in 1 Cor. ii. 1 ff.

in my knowledge] the depth of his knowledge of the mystery of the gospel, see Eph. iii. 1–4, but in every matter we made things manifest (i. e. the things of the gospel, thereby shewing our knowledge) unto you before all men (i. e. with a view to your benefit).

7.] Another particular in which he was not behind, but excelled, the overmuch apostles, viz. the gratuitous exercise of his ministry among them. On the sense, see 1 Cor. ix. 1 ff. and notes. The supposition is one of sharp irony.

abasing myself] See Acts xviii. 3. The exaltation which they received by his demeaning himself was that of reception into the blessings of the gospel, which was more effectually wrought thereby: not merely, their being thus more favoured temporarily, or in comparison with other churches.

in that I gratuitously, &c.] It was his wish to preach to them gratuitously, which necessitated his abasing himself, i.e. not exercising the apostolic power which he might have exercised, but living on subsidies from others, besides (which he does not here distinctly allude to) his working with his own hands at Corinth.

8.] The ‘other churches’ were the Macedonian, see ver. 9. Among them the Philippians were probably conspicuous, retaining, as doubtless they did, their former affection to him; see Phil. iv. 15, 16.

I robbed is hyperbolic, to bring out the contrast, and shame them.

in order to (to support me in) my ministration to you, gen. obj.

9.] In the former sentence, he implied that he brought with him from Macedonia supplies towards his maintenance at Corinth: here, he speaks of a new supply during his residence with the Corinthians, when those resources failed.

for (reason why he burdened no one) the brethren (who, he does not say: their names were well known to the Co-rinthians. Possibly, Timotheus and Silas, Acts xviii. 5) when they came from Mace-donia (not as A.V., ‘which came’) supplied my wants; and in every thing I kept myself (‘during my residence:’ not, ‘have kept myself, as A.V.) unburdensome to you, and will keep myself.

10.] The truth of Christ is in me, that...; i.e. ‘I speak according to that truth of which Christ Himself was our example, when I say that...;’—there is no oath, nor even asseveration, as A.V. and most Commentators introduce. The expression is exactly analogous to Rom. ix. 1.

this boasting shall not be shut (shall not have its mouth stopped) as regards (or, against) me in the regions of Achaia (where the boasting is imagined as being and speaking).

11.] He pre-supposes, and negatives, a reason likely to be given for this resolution; viz. that he loves them not, and therefore will be under no obligation to them: for we willingly incur obligations to those whom we love.

knoweth, viz. that I love you.

12.] The true reason:—But that which I do, I will also continue to do, in order that I may cut off the occasion (which would be furnished if I did not so) of those who wish for an occasion (viz. of depreciating me by misrepresenting my motives if I took money of you); that, in the matter of which they boast, they may be found even as we. Such appears generally acknowledged to be the rendering: but as to the meaning, there is great variety of opinion. (1) Many of the ancient Commentators assume that they taught gratis, and were proud of it,—and that St. Paul would also teach gratis, to put both on an equality and take this occasion of boasting from them. This would suit the sense of the present verse, but seems (see above) at variance with the fact. (2) Theodoret and others suppose them to have pretended to the credit of self-denial, while really making gain, and that St. Paul means, that he will reduce them from pretended to real self-denial. But this too is inconsistent with the context. St. Paul’s boast of disinterested teaching was peculiarly his own, and there is nothing to shew that the false teachers ever professed or made any boast, of the like. His resolution did not spring out of an actual comparison instituted by them between their own practice and what they might falsely allege to be his, but was adopted even before his coming to Corinth, arguing à priori that it was best to cut off any possible occasion of such depreciation of him from his probable adversaries. (3) I cannot adopt any one of the above accounts of the sentence, for the negative reasons already given, and because all of them seem to me to have missed the clue to the meaning which the chapter itself furnishes. This clue I find in vv. 18 ff. See the other interpretations discussed in any Greek Test. I have endeavoured there to shew that the meaning is, ‘that in the matter (s) of which they boast they may be found even as we:’ i.e. we may be on a fair and equal footing: ‘that there may be no adventitious comparisons made between us arising out of misrepresentations of my course of procedure among you, but that in every matter of boasting, we may be fairly compared and judged by facts.’ And then, before the for of

ver. 13 will naturally be supplied, ‘And this will end in their discomfiture: for realities they have none, no weapons but misrepresentation, being false apostles, &c.

13.] For (see above: the for implying also that the choice of the above line of conduct has been made in a conviction of their falsehood and its efficacy to detect it) such men are false apostles, dishonest workmen (in that they pretend to be teachers of the Gospel, and are in the mean time subserving their own ends), changing themselves into (in appearance) apostles of Christ. By a fair comparison between us, this mask will be stript off;—by the abundance of my sufferings, and distinctions vouchsafed by the Lord, my Apostolicity will be fully proved, and their Pseud-apostolism shewn.

14, 15. for even Satan...] If any definite allusion is here intended, it is perhaps to Job i. 6, &c.: but I would rather suppose the practice of Satan in tempting and seducing men to be intended.

14. an angel of light] God is light, and inhabits light, and His angelic attendants are surrounded with brightness, see Acts xii. 7; Ps. civ. 4; whereas Satan is the Power of darkness, see Luke xxii. 53.

15.] He, as the father of falsehood and wrong (John viii, 44), is directly opposed to “the righteousness of God,” Matt. vi. 33, that manifestation of God by which He is known to us in the Gospel, Rom. i. 17.

of whom (notwithstanding this disguise) the end shall be correspondent to their works (not to their pretensions).

16–21.] Excuses for his intended self-boasting.

16.] again referring to ver. 1, not repeating what he had there said, but again taking up the subject, and expanding that request. ‘The request of ver. 1 in fact implies both requests of this ve: not regarding him as a tool for boasting, or even if they did, as a fool (i. e. yielding to me the toleration and hearing which men would not refuse even to one of whose folly they were convinced) receiving him.

I too, as well as they.

17.] Proceeding on the terms, as a fool, he disclaims for this self-boasting the character of inspiration—or of being said in pursuance of his mission from the Lord.

after the (mind of the) Lord, in pursuance, i.e. in this case, of inspiration from above: not as in 1 Cor. vii. 10, 25, 40.

as it were in foolishness, i.e. ‘putting myself into the situation, and speaking the words of a foolish man vaunting of himself.’

18.] Since many, viz. the false teachers, but not only they:—‘since it is a common habit,’ for he is here speaking as “one of the foolish ones” (see Job ii. 10) boast according to the flesh (i. e. ‘in a spirit of regard’—‘having regard to their extraction, achievements, &c.’ as below vv. 22 ff), I also will boast (according to the flesh).

19.] Bitterly ironical. They were wise—as 1 Cor. iv. 8, “filled full”—so full of wisdom as to be able to tolerate complacently, looking down from their ‘serene height,’ the follies of others. This, forsooth, encourages him to hope for their forbearance and patronage, Compare the earnestness of 1 Cor. And the irony does not stop here: it is not only matter of presumption that they would tolerate fools with complacency, but the matter of fact testified it: they were doing this: and more.

20.] For (proof that they could have no objection to so innocent a man as a fool, when they tolerated such noxious ones are adduced) ye endure (them), if (as is the ease) one bringeth you into slavery (the enslaving understood, is to the man himself, not to the law: see Gal. ii. 4), if one devoureth you (by exaction on your property), if one catcheth you (as with a snare: not as A.V., ‘taketh of you’), if one uplifteth himself, if one smiteth you on the face (in insult, see 1 Kings xxii. 24; Matt. v. 39; Luke xxii. 64; Acts xxviii. 2. This is put as the climax of forbearance. That such violence might literally be expected from the rulers of the early Christian society, is also implied in the command in 1 Tim. iii. 3, Tit. i. 7, that the ‘bishop’ is not to be a ‘striker.’ Even so late as the seventh century the council of Braga, A.D. 675, orders that no bishop at his will and pleasure shall strike his clergy, lest he lose the respect which they owe him.” Stanley).

21.] By way of disparagement I assume that WE (emphatic) were weak (when we were among you). An ironical reminiscence of his own abstinence when among them from all these acts of self-exaltation at their expense; as much as to say (ironically), ‘I feel that I am much letting myself down by the confession that I was too weak ever to do any of these things among you.’ See this rendering defended in my Greek Test.

22.] “The three honourable appellations with which the adversaries magnified themselves,—resting on their Jewish extraction, are arranged so as to form a climax: so that Hebrews refers to the nationality,—Israelites to the theocracy (tom, ix. 4 ff.), and seed of Abraham to the claim to a part in the Messiah (Rom. ix. 7: xi. 1, al.)” Meyer.

23.] Meyer remarks, that all three points of Judaistic comparison, of so little real consequence in the matter, were dismissed with the short and contemptuous. so am I. But that is not enough, now that we are come to the great point of comparison; the consciousness of his real standing, and their nullity as ministers of Christ, requires the I am more, and the holy earnestness of this consciousness pours itself forth as a stream over the adversaries, so as to overwhelm their conceited aspirations to apostolic dignity.

I speak as beside myself] I say it as a madman. This is far stronger than “I speak in foolishness.” it is said from a deep sense of his own unworthiness, and conscious how utterly untrue was “I am more,” in any boasting sense. He therefore repudiates it even more strongly than the “I am bold also,” before. The assertion, I am more, must not be misunderstood. He concedes to them their being ministers of Christ, and assumes (as it were in madness) for himself, something more, if more abundant labours and sufferings are to be any criterion of the matter. That this is the sense, is obvious from the comparison being in the amount of labours and sufferings,—and not, that he denies to them the office of ministers of Christ, and merely puts it hypothetically: “Well, then, if they are to be considered ministers of Christ, I must be something more.” If so, the comparison would not be in the degree of ministerial self-sacrifice, but in the credentials of the ministry itself. Both are now assumed. to be ministers; but if so, Paul is a minister in a much higher degree, more faithful, more self-denying, richer in gifts and divine tokens, than they.

in (the matter of: or, by, by virtue of) labours (occurring) more abundantly,—in prisons (imprisonments) more abundantly (but one such is mentioned in the Acts [xvi. 23 ff.] previous to the writing of this Epistle—Clement, in the celebrated passage of his Ast Epistle to the Corinthians on the labours of Paul, describes him as having seven times borne chains. This whole catalogue should shew the chronologists of the Apostle’s life and epistles, how exceedingly unsafe it is to build only on the history in the Acts for a complete account of his journeys and voyages), in stripes above measure (particularized below), in deaths oft (see reff. and ch. iv. 10. Such was the danger escaped at Damascus, Acts ix. 23, at Antioch in Pisidia, xiii. 50, at Iconium, xiv. 5, 6, at Lystra, ib. 19, at Philippi, xvi, at Thessalonica, xvii. 5 f., at Berœa, ib. 13, and doubtless many others of which we know nothing. See below).

24, 25.] are parenthetical, explaining some of the foregoing expressions: the construction is resumed ver. 26.— At the hands of the Jews five times received I forty save one (in Dent. xxv. 3, it is prescribed that not more than forty stripes should be given, ‘lest thy brother should seem vile unto thee.’ For fear of exceeding this number they kept within it. Meyer remarks that St. Paul might well number it among the deaths, for it was no rare occurrence for the criminal to die under its infliction.—None of these scourgings are mentioned in the Acts), thrice was I beaten with rods (viz. by the Roman magistrates, see Acts xvi. 22, 23, which is the only occasion mentioned in the Acts), once was I stoned (Acts xiv. 19), thrice I suffered shipwreck (not one of these shipwrecks is known to us. Thus we see that perhaps three, perhaps two, voyages of Paul, but certainly one, —previous to this time, must be somewhere inserted in the history of the Acts), a night and day have I spent in the deep (i.e. the sea: probably on some remnant of a wreck after one of his shipwrecks alone or with others).

26.] The construction is resumed from ver. 23.—By journeys frequently, by perils of rivers (the genitives denote the material of the perils; rivers and robbers being the things and persons actually attacking. ‘The perils of rivers’ might arise from crossing or fording, or from floods. The crossing of the rocky and irregular torrents in Alpine districts is to this day attended with danger, which must have been much more frequent. when bridges were comparatively rare. And this is the ease with a road, among others, frequently traversed by Paul, that between Jerusalem and Antioch, crossed as it is by the torrents from the sides of Lebanon. Maundrell says that the traveller Spow lost his life in one of these torrents: see Conybeare and Howson’s Life of St. Paul, edn. 2, vol. i.p. 502, note), by perils of robbers (see note on Acts xiii. 14), by perils from my kindred (or, countrymen: the Jewish nation: from, i.e. arising from: they not being always the direct agents,—but, as in many cases in the Acts, setting on others, or plotting secretly), by perils from the Gentiles, by perils in the city (in Damascus, Acts ix. 23 f.,—Jerusalem, ib. 29,—Ephesus, xix. 23 ff.; and many other places), by perils in the wilderness (literally, in [the] solitude: it may mean the actual desert, or merely the solitude of journeys, as contrasted with ‘the city’), by perils in the sea (not a repetition from ver. 25: there are many perils in the sea short of shipwrecks), by perils among false brethren (who were these? probably persons who wished to be thought. Christian brethren, but were not in heart and conduct, and were opponents of himself personally, rather than designed traitors. to the Christian cause);

27.] by weariness and painfulness, in watchings (see on ch. vi: 5) frequently, in hunger and thirst, in fastings frequently (voluntary fastings, “to purify his soul and tame the flesh,” as Estius, see also ch. vi. 5, note. De Wette here too [see also Stanley] holds to ‘involuntary fastings,’ but he is clearly wrong, for “fastings” are distinguished in the catalogue from “hunger and thirst”), in cold and nakedness (insufficient clothing:—or, literally, when thrust into prison after his scourgings,—or after his shipwrecks).

28.] He passes from particulars, omitting others which might have been specified, to the weight of apostolic care and sympathy which was on him.—Not to mention those (afflictions) which are besides (these), (not as A.V., ‘the things that are without,’—a meaning which the original word never has),—my care (the original word may mean either ‘delay,’ ‘hindrance,’ or ‘care,’ ‘attention,’ ‘matter of earnest thought’) day by day, (viz.) my anxiety for all the churches.

29.] “Care implies sympathy: so that the minister of Christ takes on him the feelings of all, puts on the person of all, that he may accommodate himself to all.” Calvin,

The weakness spoken of may be in various ways; in faith, as Rom. xiv. 1 al., or in purpose, or in courage: that of the Apostle, see 1 Cor. ix. 22, was a sympathetic weakness, a leaning to the same infirmity for the weak brother’s sake, but also a veritable trouble in himself on the weak brother’s account.

I myself] In the former “I,” there was no emphasis: on this one, there is: because in that case he was suffering with the weak: here he stands between the offender and the offended; indignant at the one, sympathizing with the other.

burn not]—with zeal, or with indignation.

30.] partly refers back to what has passed since ver. 23. The infirmity not being mentioned in a different connexion in ver. 29, but that of ver. 21, to which all since has applied. But the words are not without a forward reference likewise. He will boast of his weaknesses—of those things which made him appear mean and contemptible in the eyes of his adversaries. He is about to adduce an instance of escape from danger, of which this is eminently the case: he might be scoffed at as one borne in a basket, or the like—but he is carried on in his fervency of self-renunciation amidst his apparent self-celebration, and he will even cast before his enemies the contemptible antecedents of his career, boasting in being despised, if only for what Christ had done in him. The asseveration in ver. 81 may be applied to the whole, but Lhad rather view it as connected with the strange history about to be related:—‘I will glory in my weaknesses—yea, and I will yet more abase myself—God knows that I am telling sober truth—&c.’ If the solemnity of the asseveration seem out of proportion to the incident, the fervid and impassioned character of the whole passage must be taken into account.

32, 33.] On the fact and historical difficulty, see note, Acts ix. 23, governor] the title is literally Ethnarch, who appears to have been a Prefect, stationed there by the Arabian king. The title appears to have been variously used. See in my Greek Test. The basket here spoken of probably was a “rope-basket,” a net.

2 Corinthians: Chapter 12

CHAP. XII. 1–10.] He proceeds to speak of visions and revelations vouchsafed to him, and relates one such, of which, however, he will not boast, except in as far as it leads to fresh mention of infirmity, in which he will boast, as being a vehicle for the perfection of Christ’s power. In order to understand the connexion of the following, it is very requisite to bear in mind the burden of the whole, which runs through it—“I will boast in mine infirmities.” There is no break between this and the last chapter. He has just mentioned a passage of his history which might expose him to contempt and ridicule—this was one of the weaknesses. He now comes to another: but that other inseparably connected with, and forming the sequel of, a glorious revelation vouchsafed him by the Lord. This therefore he relates, at the same time repudiating it as connected with himself, and fixing attention only on the weakness which followed it.

1.] On the difficult question of the reading in this verse, see my Greek Test.

I must boast, though it is not to my advantage: but I will proceed to visions and revelations of the Lord] as if he said, ‘and the instances I will select are just of that kind in which, of boasting ever were good, it might be allowed.’ vision is the form or manner of receiving revelation. There can hardly be a vision without a revelation of some kind.

of the Lord, i.e., vouchsafed me by the Lord, not of, i.e. revealing, the Lord, as the subject of the vision; for such is not that which follows.

2–4.] An example of such a vision and revelation. The adoption of the third person is remarkable: it being evident from ver. 7 that he himself is meant. It is plain that a contrast is intended between the rapt and glorified person of vv. 2, 4,—and himself, the weak and afflicted and almost despairing subject of the thorn in the flesh of verses 7 ff. Such glory belonged not to him, but the weakness did. Nay, so far was the glory from being his, that he knew not whether he was in or out of the body when it was put upon him; so that the “I myself,” compounded of the mind and the flesh (Rom. vii. 25), clearly was not the subject of it, but as it were another form of his personality, analogous to that which we shall assume when unclothed of the body.—It may be remarked in passing, as has been done by Whitby, that the Apostle here by implication acknowledges the possibility of consciousness and receptivity in a disembodied state.—Let it not be forgotten, that in the context, this vision is introduced not so much for the purpose of making it a ground of boasting, which he does only passingly and under protest, but that he may by it introduce the mention of the thorn in the flesh, which bore so conspicuous a part in his weaknesses, TO BOAST OF WHICH is his present object.

2.] I know (not, ‘knew,’ as A.V.: which is a mistake in grammar, and introduces serious confusion, making it seem as if the fourteen years ago were the date of the knowledge, not, as it really is, of the vision) a man in Christ (i. e., ‘a Christian’) ‘a man whose standing is in Christ; so in Rom. xvi. 7,’ fourteen years ago (the date refers entirely to the event about to be narrated, and probably refers back to the time when he was at Tarsus waiting for God to point out his work, between Acts ix. 30 and xi. 25. See the chronological table in the introduction to the Acts), whether in the body, I know not; or out of the body, I know not: God knoweth (if in the body, the idea would be that he was taken up bodily: if out of the body, to which the alternative manifestly inclines,—that his spirit was rapt from the body, and taken up disembodied); such an one (so ‘such an one’ resumes after a parenthesis, 1 Cor. v. 5) caught up (snatched or taken up) as far as the third heaven.—What is the third heaven? The Jews knew no such limit of number, but commonly recognized seven heavens: and if their arrangement is to be followed, the third heaven will be very low in the celestial scale, being only the material clouds. The safest explanation is, not to follow any fixed division, but judging by the evident intention of the expression, to understand a high degree of celestial exaltation.

3, 4.] A solemn repetition of the foregoing, with the additional particular of his having had unspeakable revelations made to him.—Some think that this was a fresh assumption, as far as the third heaven, and thence into Paradise: but this from the form of the sentence is unlikely. See in my Greek Test.

The paradise here spoken of cannot be the Jewish Paradise, the blissful division or side of Hades (Scheol), where the spirits of the just awaited the resurrection, see note on Luke xvi. 22,—but the Paradise of which our Lord spoke on the Cross,—the place of happiness into which He at His Death introduced the spirits of the just: see on Luke xxiii. 43.

which it is not lawful for a MAN to utter (see above):—imparted by God, but not to be divulged to others: and therefore, in this case, intended, we may presume, for the Apostle’s own consolation and encouragement. Of what kind they were, or by whom uttered, we have no hint given, and it were worse than trifling to conjecture. “They must have been,” says Bengel, “of great sublimity: for not all celestial words are ineffable, e.g., Exod. xxxiv. 6, Isa. vi. 3, which nevertheless were highly sublime.”

5.] Of such a man he will boast, but not (see above on ver. 1) of himself, except it be in his infirmities. He strikes here again the key-note of the whole—boasting in his infirmities. He will boast of such a person, so favoured, so exalted; but this merely by the way: it is not his subject: it introduced, not indeed without reference to the main point, but principally to bring in the infirmity following.

6.] For (supply the sentence for which it renders a reason: ‘Not but that I might boast concerning myself if I would’)—if I shall wish to boast (concerning myself), I shall not be a fool (I shall not act rashly or imprudently, for I shall not boast without solid ground for it); for I shall say the truth: but I abstain, that no one may reckon of me beyond (by a standard superior to that furnished by) what he seeth me (to be), or heareth perchance from me.—Lest he should seem to undervalue so legitimate a subject of boasting, he alleges the reason why he abstains: not that he had not this and more such exaltations, truly to allege: but because he wished to be judged of by what they really had seen and heard of and from himself in person.

7-10.] He now comes to that for which the foregoing was mainly alleged: the infirmit in his flesh, which above others hindered his personal efficiency in the apostolic ministry. 7.] And that I might not by the abundant excess of revelations (made to me) be uplifted, there was given me (‘by God’ certainly not, as Meyer, and others, by Satan, of whom such an expression as was given, would surely hardly be used: compare “the grace given to me,” so often said by the Apostle,—Rom. xii. 3, 6; xv. 15 al., and the absolute use of given for bestowed, portioned out by God, 1 Cor. xi. 15; xii. 7, 8; Gal. iii. 21; James i. 5) a thorn (the word may signify a stake, or sharp pointed staff: Stanley rejects the meaning ‘thorn,’ and supposes the figure to refer to the punishment of impalement) in my flesh (the expression used Gal. iv. 14 of this same affliction, “my temptation which is in my flesh,” seems decisive for rendering thus, and not ‘for my flesh’), the (or, an) angel of Satan (it is doubtful whether the form of the word Satan in the original be nominative or genitive. But usage decides for the genitive. If taken as the nom., the expression would mean a hostile angel, which would be contrary to the universal usage of Satan, as a proper name: some render it, the angel Satan, which is inconsistent with New Test. usage, according to which Satan, though once an angel, is now the Prince of the powers of the air, Eph. ii. 2, and has his own angels, Matt. xxv. 41), that he (the angel of Satan) may buffet me (not, might buffet me: the action of the afflicting thorn continued and was to continue, even when St. Paul was writing to them. This is Chrysostom’s observation), that I may not be uplifted (the repetition gives force and solemnity,—expressing his firm persuasion of the divine intention in thus afflicting him).—As regards the thorn itself, very many, and some very absurd conjectures have been hazarded. They may be resolved into three heads, the two former of which are, from the nature of the case, out of the question below): (1) that Paul alludes to spiritual solicitations of the devil, who suggested to him blasphemous thoughts, so Luther (how characteristically!)—or remorse for his former life: or according to the Romanist interpreters, who want to find here a precedent for their monkish stories of temptations,—incitements to lust. (2) that he alludes to opposition from his adversaries, or some one adversary: so many ancient Commentators, and some modern. (3) that he points to some grievous bodily pain, which has been curiously specified by different Commentators. The ancients mention headache: some have supposed hypochondriac melancholy, which however hardly answers the conditions of a thorn, in which acute pain seems to be implied: see Stanley's note, which is important in other respects also, and full of interest.—On the whole, putting together the figure here used, that of a thorn, occasioning pain, and the buffeting or putting to shame; it seems quite necessary to infer that the Apostle alludes to some painful and tedious bodily malady, which at the same time put him to shame before those among whom he exercised his ministry. Of such a kind may have been the disorder in his eyes, more or less indicated in several passages of his history and Epistles: see notes on Acts xiii. 9; xxiii, 1 f.:—and Gal. iv. 14 (15?); vi. 11 (?). But it may also have been something besides this, and to such an inference probability would lead us; disorders in the eyes, however sad in their consequences, not being usually of a very painful or distressing nature in themselves.

8.] In respect of this (angel of Satan, not thorn, see below) I thrice (Meyer well observes, 'At his first and second request, no answer was given to him: on the third occasion, it came; and his faithful resignation to the Lord's will prevented his asking again') besought the Lord (Christ, see ver. 9), that he might depart from me (the angel of Satan: in Luke iv. 13, the same Greek word is used of the devil departing from our Lord: as also in Acts xxii. 29, "they departed from him which should have examined him").

9.] And He said to me (literally, hath said: but this perfect can hardly in English be represented otherwise than by the historical past; in the Greek, it partakes of its own proper sense—'He said, and that answer is enough:' 'He hath said',—but this last would not contain reference enough to the fact itself. The poverty of our language in the finer distinctions of the tenses often obliges us to render inaccurately, and fall short of, the wonderful language with which we have to deal.—How this was said, whether accompanied by an appearance of Christ to him or not, must remain in obscurity), My grace (not, 'My favour generally'—'My imparted grace') is sufficient for thee (spoken from the divine Omniscience, 'suffices, and shall suffice:' as if it had been said, 'the trial must endure, untaken away: but the grace shall also endure, and never fail thee'): for (the reason lying in My ways being not as man's ways, My Power not being brought to perfection as man's power is conceived to be) (My) Power is made perfect (has its full energy and complete manifestation) in (as the element in which it acts as observable by man) weakness.—See ch. iv. 7, and 1 Cor. ii. 3, 4,—where the influence of this divine response on the Apostle is very manifest.

Most gladly therefore will I rather (than that my affliction should be removed from me, which before that response, I wished) boast (emphatic,—I will rather boast in mine infirmities) in my infirmities, that (by my infirmities being, not removed from me, but becoming my glory) the power of Christ may have its residence in me ('may carry on in me its work unto completion,' as above).

10.] Wherfore (because of this relation to human weakness and divine power) I am well content (it is the same word as that used Matt. iii. 17, "in whom I am well pleased") in infirmities (four kinds of which are then specified,—all coming also, as well as infirmities proper, under the category of infirmities, as hindrances and bafflings of human strength), in insults, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses, on behalf of Christ: for whenever I am weak (applying to all five situations above), then I am mighty.

11–18.] He excuses his boasting, and is thereby led to speak of the signs of an Apostle wrought among them, and to reassert his disinterestedness in preaching to them, on occasion of his past and intended visits.

11.] I am BECOME (the emphasis on the verb,—I am verily become a fool, viz. by this boasting, which I have now concluded, It is still ironical, spoken from the situation of his adversaries) a fool: ye compelled me (ye emphatic): for I (I also emphatic, but more with reference to what has passed: 'ye compelled me, it was no doing of mine, for I, &c.') ought to have been recommended by you (emphatic, by you, not by himself): for I was nothing behind (when I was with you) these overmuch apostles (see on ch. xi. 5: but here even more plainly than there, the expression cannot be applied to the other Apostles, seeing that the assertion would in that case be inconsistent with the fact—the Corinthians never having had an opportunity of comparing him with them), even though I am nothing (see similar expressions of humility, 1 Cor. xv. 9–11).

12.] Confirmation of the boast just made..... The signs indeed of an apostle were wrought out among you ("the Apostle's own personality as the worker is modestly veiled behind the passive." Meyer) in all (possible) patience (endurance of opposition, which did not cause me to leave off working), in signs, and wonders, end mighty deeds.

13–15.] His disinterestedness, shewn in his past, and resolved in his future dealings with them.

13.] The question is asked in bitter irony. It is an illustration of his much endurance, and of the distinction conferred on them by so long manifestation of the signs of an Apostle among them. ‘Was this endurance of working which I shewed, marred by the fact that I worked gratuitously among you?’

ye were inferior to does not imply that all churches suffered loss, and that the loss of the Corinthians was only not greater than that of other churches: but ‘ye suffered loss in comparison with the other churches.’ except that one point, in which of all others they had least reason to complain. This one is put forward to indicate their deep ingratitude, if they did complain, seeing that the only point of difference in their treatment had been a preference: “It is Love, deeply wounded, which speaks,” says Meyer. The irony here reaches its height.

14.] The words must, from the context, mean, the third time I am ready to come, i.e. ‘I am ready to come the third time;’—not, ‘I am the third time ready to come,’ i.e. ‘this is the third time that I have been ready to come to you.’ This latter meaning has been “adopted by many Commentators, in order to evade the difficulty of supposing St. Paul to have been before this time at Corinth. But on this see Introd. to 1 Cor. §y. Here, the context has absolutely nothing to do with his third preparation to come, which would be a new element, requiring some explanation, as in 1 Thess. ii. 18. The natural, and I am persuaded, only true inference from the words here is, ‘I am coming to you a third time,—and I will not burden you this time, any more than I did at my two previous visits.’—Our business in such cases is, not to wrest plain words to fit our preconceived chronology, but to adapt our confessedly most uncertain and imperfect history of the Apostle’s life, to the data furnished by the plain honest sense of his Epistles.

for the children ought not...] St. Paul was the spiritual father of the Corinthian Church, 1 Cor. iv. 14, 15: he does not therefore want to be enriched by them, his children, but rather to lay up riches for them, seeking to have them as his treasure, and thus to enrich them, as a loving father does his children. What it is that is to be laid up, is left indefinite: if pressed strictly, it cannot be earthly treasure in the negative part of the sentence, heavenly, in the positive:—see next verse.

15.] The Apostle promises more than even natural fathers do. They lay up treasures: I will spend them:—and more than that, I will spend myself: even if I must give my flesh for the salvation of your souls, I will not spare it.

16–18.] He refutes a possible, perhaps an actual calumny,—that though he had acted disinterestedly towards then himself, he had some side-way of profiting by them, through others.

16.] But be it so (‘but let us suppose the former matter dismissed’), let the fact be granted, that I myself did not burden you. Then the sense breaks off, and the force of the concession goes no further, the following words making a new hypothesis. Nevertheless, being (by habit and standing) crafty (unprincipled, and versatile in devices), I caught you with guile (with some subtle way). Caught you, in order to practise upon you for my own ends).

17, 18.] Specification, in refutation, of the ways in which this might be supposed to have taken place.

18.] This journey of Titus cannot, of course, be the one spoken of ch. viii. 6, 17, 22; but some previous mission to them before this Epistle was written: probably that from which he returned with the report of their penitence to Paul in Macedonia, ch. vii. 6 ff. We certainly have not elsewhere any hint of “the brother” having accompanied him on this journey: but this is no reason why it should not have been so.

our brother—perhaps one of the two mentioned ch. viii. 18, 22: some other, well known to the Corinthians, but absolutely unknown to us: but not ‘a brother, as in A.V. It is plain from this and from what follows, that this brother was quite subordinate to Titus in the mission.

in the same spirit] The Spirit in which they walked was the Holy Spirit.

in the same footsteps, viz. each as the other: they did not in the minutest particular deviate from my path.

19–21.] He refutes the notion which might arise in the minds of his readers, that he was vindicating himself BEFORE THEM as judges, see 1 Cor. iv. 3; and assures them that he does all for their good, fearing in what state he might find them on his arrival.

19.] Ye have been some time imagining (i. e. during this my self-defence)that it is to you that I am defending myself. Then the answer follows: the assumption being made, and elliptically answered, as in ver. 16.

before God is emphatic, and opposed to “unto you.”

We speak in Christ, as in eh. it. 17, which see.

20.] ‘Edification, of which you stand in need, for, &c.’ He here completely and finally throws off the apologist and puts on the Apostle, leaving on their minds a very different impression from that which would have been produced had he concluded with the apology.

lest, when I arrive, I should find you not such as I wish (in the words, not such as I wish, there is an indefinite possibility of aberration from being such as I wish, presently particularized “lest there be,” &c.), and I should be found by you such as ye wish not (not now “not such as ye wish,” because there is now no indefiniteness; his disposition towards them in such a case could be but of one kind, viz. severity. Chrysostom brings out another point; he does not say, ‘such as I wish not,’ but with more severity, ‘such as ye wish not’).

self-seekings: see note on Rom. ii. 8.

whisperings, i.e. secret ma-lignings,—slanderings, i.e. open detrac-tion.

21. will humble me “There was nothing in which the Apostle more exulted than in the prosperous success of his preaching: nothing on the other hand by which he was made more sad and downcast than when he saw that he had laboured in vain.” Beza. That this humbling, and not that of being obliged to punish, is intended, seems evident: the exercise of judicial au-thority being no humiliation, but the con-trary, and humiliation being the natural result of want of success.

my GOD expresses the conviction that whatever hu-miliation God might have in store for him would be a part of His will respecting him.

I shall bewail] Some explain it that he would have to punish them, and thus be afflicted over them: but punishment seems out of place in this verse, which expresses his fear lest he should be humbled for, and have to lament the case of the im-penitent, —and then, as he declares, ch. xiii. 2, be forced to proceed to discipline; but: this point is not yet introduced. “He shews the feeling of a true and genuine shepherd, when he says that he should have to grieve for the sins of others. Every shepherd ought thus to carry the church in his own soul, be affected by its diseases as by his own, grieve at its sorrows, mourn for its loss.” Calvin.

many of those] Why many? why not all? I believe he uses many of those which have sinned as a mild expression for the many which have sinned, and that we must not therefore press too closely the enquiry.

CHAP. XIII. 1–10.] He warns them of the severity which, on his arrival, if such be the case, he will surely exercise, and prove his apostolic authority. To this proof, how-ever, he exhorts them not to put him.

1.] This third time I am coming to you: i.e. ‘this is the third visit which I am now about to pay you.’ Had not chronological theories intervened, no one would ever have thought of any other rendering. The usual one, «This is the third time that I have been intending to come to you,’ introduces here, as also in ch. xii. 14, an element not only foreign to, but detrimental to, the purpose. The Apostle wishes to impress on them the certainty of this coming, and to prepare them for it by solemn self-examination; and in order to this, he (on this interpreta-tion) uses an expression which would only remind them of the charge of lightness which had been brought against him, and tend to diminish the solemnity of the warning. On St. Paul’s visits to Corinth, see Introd. to 1 Cor. §v.

In the mouth of, &c.] i.e. ‘I will not now, as be-fore, be with you in all long-suffering, as regards the offenders: but will come to a regular process, and establish the truth in a legal manner.’—This explanation, however, has not been the usual one: Chrysostom, Calvin, and others, understanding the two or three witnesses, of St. Paul’s two or three visits, as establishing either (1) the truth of the facts, or (2) the reality of his threats. But it is decisive against this interpretation, as Meyer remarks, that thus the sins committed since the Apostle’s last visit would remain altogether unnoticed.

and three, not for “or three,”—two (and in cases where only two can be had), and three (where so many can be obtained): ‘two and three respectively.’

2.] I have forewarned you, and I now forewarn you, as (I did) when present the second time, so also (I do) now when absent. It seems to me (see my Greek Test.) that this is the only natural way of taking the words.

them which have sinned heretofore] the same persons as are thus designated above, ch. xii. 21.

all the rest of you] who may not have actually sinned, but still require warning, on account of your own personal danger, connexion with those who have, &c.

if I come again] at my next coming. This was what he was last there, and now repeats.

3.] ‘This gives the reason why he will not spare: they required the exertion of discipline; and they challenged him to the proof of his apostolic authority.

a proof of Christ] ‘The genitive is either objective, a proof of Christ speaking in me, i.e. ‘that Christ speaks in me,’—or subjective, ‘a proof given by Christ speaking in me—‘a token of my authority vouchsafed by Christ speaking in me.’ This latter meaning is more suited to what follows, where Christ becomes the subject. Such proof would be, the immediate execution, by divine power, of some punishment denounced by Paul’s word, as in Acts xiii. 11. The assertion tends to remind them of the danger of provoking Christ, who spoke by Paul.

4.] Confirmation of the foregoing assertion. For indeed he was crucified (as the source,—the conditional element,—by which His crucifixion became possible) from weakness, yet He liveth by (source,—source of His life) the Power of God (which raised Him from the dead, Rom. vi. 4; viii. 11; Eph. i. 20; Phil. ii. 9). For we also are weak in Him (i. e. in Him, in our communion with and imitation of Christ, we, as He did, lay aside our power and spare you: we partake of His voluntary abnegation of power which we might have used. The context requires this explanation, and refutes that of Chrysostom and others, that for His sake we suffer persecution and dishonour), but shall live (exercise our apostolic authority, in contrast to the weakness above) with Him (as He now exercises His power in His glorified resurrection life) from (source) the power of God [toward you] (“toward you,” if genuine, may belong either to “the power of God,” or to “we shall live,”—“we shall live with respect to you,” which agrees better with the parallelism, but not so well with the arrangement of the sentence. The sense seems to require the latter interpretation, for the “power of God towards you” would be rather the result than the source of the apostolic energy indicated by we shall live.—I have taken we shall live, as the context plainly requires, figuratively: but many Commentators take it literally, of the resurrection).

5.] “You want to prove Christ speaking in me:—if you necessitate this proof, it will be given. But I will tell you whom rather to prove, Prove YOURSELVES; there let your attention be concentrated, if you will apply tests.”

whether ye are (not ‘be;’ at least not as we now take that word, as subjunctive). ‘Whether you maintain your Christian place and stading in Christ, which will be shewn by the power of Christ’s spirit present and energizing among you.’

reprobates, literally, ‘not abiding the proof,’ worthless,—i. e. in this case, ‘mere pretended Christians.’

6.] But (however it may fall out with your proof of yourselves) I hope (or perhaps better, expect) that ye shall know that we are not worthless (unable to abide the proof to which you put us. The verse is said threateningly: if you wish for a proof to be given by my power to punish, it shall not be wanting).

7.] Yet he prays God rather that they may require no such demonstration of his apostolic power, even though he lose in reputation by it.

not that we should appear....] ‘And the purpose of this my prayer is not to gain any repute by your Christian graces, but that you may be highly endowed with them, and (if it so happen) we may be as of no repute in the judgment of men, by your good conduct tending to the non-exercise and so to the depreciation of our Apostolic power.’

8.] For we have no power against the truth (of the Gospel, not of the facts, as Chrysostom and others.—‘If you walk in the truth, we shall be at one with you, and so have no opportunity of shewing our power’), but (only) on behalf of (in furtherance of the cause and spread of) the truth.

9.] For (confirmation of ver. 8 by the still stronger assertion, WHEREIN his joy consists, and for what he prays) our joy is, when we are weak (have no opportunity for shewing our power in punishment), but ye are mighty (in Christian graces, and requiring no exercise of our authority): this (viz. that the state of the case may be as just mentioned) we also pray for, viz. your perfection (generally,—in all good things).

10.] For this cause (‘because I wish and pray for your perfection’).

these things, ‘this Epistle.’ “For I wish,” says Chrysostom, “that my sharpness should lie in my writings, and not in my acts.”

according to the power, &c.] gives the reason why he did not wish to act sharply,—because the power would seem to be exercised in a direction contrary to that intended by Him who gave it.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE GALATIANS

Galatians: Chapter 1

CHAP. I. 1–5.] ADDRESS AND GREETING. In the very opening sentence of the Epistle, we see the fervour of the Apostle's mind and the weightiness of his subject betraying themselves. The vindication of his own apostolic calling,—and the description of the work and purpose of Christ towards us, shew him to be writing to those who had disparaged that apostleship, and were falling from their Saviour.

1.] It is better not to join the word Apostle (here of course used in its strict and highest sense) with from men, but to let it stand by itself, and take the two prepositions as indicating, from the remote originating cause, by the nearer instrumental one. In St. Paul's case, neither of these was merely human: the Lord Jesus was both the original Sender, and Himself the Announcer of the mission.

and God the Father] If by Jesus Christ, then also by God the Father, in and by whose appointment all the mediatorial acts of Christ in the Headship of His Church are done. The strongest possible contrast is here drawn between man, in the ordinary sense, on the one side, and Jesus Christ, and God the Father, on the other. Had not the Apostle regarded Jesus Christ as one with the Father in the Godhead, he never could have written thus. It is important to remember that the mission of Paul to the actual work of the ministry was by the command of the Holy Spirit, Acts xiii. 2,—proceeding from, and expressing the will of, the Father and the Son.

who raised Him from the dead] Why specified here? Not, I think, because (Meyer) Paul was called to be an Apostle by the risen Saviour,—nor merely to identify the Father as the Originator of the Son's work of Redemption (which is so in Rom. iv. 24,—but here would not immediately concern Paul's calling to be an Apostle),—nor to meet the objection that he had never seen Christ, and turn it into an advantage, in that he alone was commissioned by the already risen and ascended Jesus,—for in this case we should not find "who raised Him" stated as a predicate of the Father, but "which was raised" as one of the Son,—nor as asserting the Resurrection against the Jews and Judaizing Galatians, which is far-fetched,—nor again as expressing an attribute of the Father, without which He can hardly be thought of by the believer,—for this is too loose a relevancy for a sentence so pointed as the present: but because the Resurrection, including and implying the Ascension, was the Father's bestowal on Christ of gifts for men, by virtue of which (Eph. iv. 11) St. Paul's Apostleship had been received. See a similar sentiment in Rom. i. 4, 5.

2.] Who these brethren were, may best be inferred by the Apostle's usage in the addresses of other Epistles, where we have. "Sosthenes our brother" (1 Cor. i. 1), "Timothy our brother" (2 Cor. i. 1. Col. i. 1. Philem. 1). They were his colleagues in the work of the Gospel, his companions in travel, and the like (not all the members of the church where he was, who would hardly be specified as being with him,—besides that such an address would be unprecedented): and their unanimity is here stated, to shew that he was not alone in his doctrines but, joined by all the brethren who were present. At the same time the word all would seem to imply that just now he had many of these brethren with him. But we cannot draw any inference from this as to the date of our Epistle: for we do not know who were his companions on many occasions. At Ephesus, where probably it was written, we hear only of Gaius and Aristarchus (Acts xix. 29), but we cannot say that there were not others: in all likelihood, several more of those mentioned Acts xx. 4, were with him.

unto the churches] The principal cities of Galatia were Pessinus and Ancyra: but this plural seems to imply more than two such churches. See 1 Cor. xvi. 1, and Acts xvi. 6; xviii. 23. That we have here barely the churches, without any honourable adjunct (as in 1 Cor., 2 Cor., 1 Thess., 2 Thess., &c.), must be explained, with Chrysostom: "Behold his pervading indignation: for he saith not 'To the Beloved,' nor 'to the sanctified, but only 'to the churches,'"

3.] See introductory note on Rom. i. 1–7.

4.] He thus, by the way, reminds the Galatians, who wished to return to the bondage of the law, of the great object of the Atonement, which they had forgotten. Ch. iii. 13 is but a re-statement, in more precise terms, of this. who gave himself] viz. as an offering, unto death: an expression only found in the New Test., here and in the Pastoral Epistles. Several such expressions, confined to these writings, will occur: see the inference, in Introduction to the Pastoral Epistles, §1. 32, note.

the present evil world (literally, age), state of things; and make us citizens and inheritors of a better age or world, that. which is to come.

according to the will] And this, (1) not according to our own plan in proportion to our legal obedience or any quality in us, but according to the Father's sovereign will, the prime standard of all the process of redemption: and (2) not so that we may trifile with such rescuing purpose of Christ by mixing it with other schemes and fancies, seeing that it is according to a procedure prescribed by Him, who doeth all things after the counsel of His own will. And this, not as the Jord merely of His works, but as our Father, bound to us in the ties of closest love—for our good, as well as to fulfil His own eternal purpose.

5. to whom be the glory] So on other occasions, when speaking of the wonderful things of God, St. Paul adds a doxology. "In civil life," says Luther, "when we speak of the names of kings or princes, we do it with a submissive gesture, reverence, and genuflexion; much more, when we speak of God, ought we to bend the knee of the heart."

In the glory, or 'the glory which is His,'—the article is probably inserted for solemnity.

for ever and ever] Literally, unto the ages of the ages; see note on Eph. iii. 21.

6–10.] ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE OCCASION OF THE EPISTLE, IN HIS AMAZEMENT AT THEIR SPEEDY FALLING AWAY FROM THE GOSPEL. ASSERTION OF THAT GOSPEL'S EXCLUSIVE CLAIM TO THEIR ADHESION, AS PREACHED BY HIM WHO SERVED GOD IN CHRIST, AND NOT POPULARITY AMONG MEN. We have none of the usual expressions of thankfulness for their faith, &c.; but he hurries vehemently into his subject, and, as Chrysostom says, "his style after this becomes more vehement, as if he were inflamed beyond measure by the thought of the blessings which God hath conferred on us." 6.] I marvel in this sense is a term of mildness, inasmuch as it imports that better things were expected of them,—and of condescension, as letting down the writer to the level of his readers and even challenging explanation from them. Still, like many other such mild words, it carries to the guilty conscience even sharper rebuke than a harsher one would.

so soon] either (1) 'so soon after your conversion,' or (2) 'so quickly,'—'after so little persuasion,' when the false teachers once came among you, or (3) 'so soon after my recent visit among you.' Of these I prefer (1), as more suiting the dignity of the passage, and as the more general and comprehensive reason. But it does not exclude (2) and (3): 'so soon' might be, and might be intended to be, variously supplied. See Introduction, on the time and place of writing this Epistle.

removing, present—not as A.V., 'removed'—is not passive, in the common usage of the word, according to which the Galatians would understand it. Chrysostom says well, "He saith not, 'are removed,' but 'are removing:' i.e. I as yet believe it not: I cannot think that your perversion is yet completed: the very expression is that of one winning them back again." It is interesting to notice, in connexion with the charge of fickleness, the character given by Caesar of the Gauls (by whom Galatia, or Gallo-Grecia, was peopled); "that they were eager and prompt to undertake war, but soon discouraged in calamity: fickle in their decisions, and easily induced to change."

him that called you] this, as almost always with the Apostle, is to be understood (see note on Rom. i. 6) of GOD the Father (see ver. 15; and cf. Rom. viii. 30; ix. 24, 25: 1 Cor. i. 9; vii. 15, 17: 1 Thess. ii. 12: 2 Thess. ii. 14: 2 Tim. i. 9. Also 1 Pet. v. 10).

in (as the element, and hence the medium; not "into," as A. V.) t he grace of Christ. 'Christ's grace' is the elementary medium of our 'calling of God,' as is set forth in full, Rom. v. 15: see also Acts xv. 11. And 'Christ's grace' is the sum of all that He has suffered and done for us to bring us to God;—whereby we come to the Father,—in which, as its element, the Father's calling of us has place.

unto a different (in kind: not 'original,' 'another,' of the same kind, which title he denies it, see below. The adjectives in the two clauses are different) gospel (so called by its preachers; or said by way of at once instituting a comparison unfavourable to the new teachers, logy of "gospel"—good tidings).

7.] The preceding expression, 'a different Gospel,' was a paradoxical one, there being in reality but one Gospel. St. Paul appeared by it to admit the existence of many Gospels, and he therefore now explains himself more accurately, how he wishes to be understood, which "different Gospel," whereto you are falling away, is not another, not a second, besides the one Gospel; except that there are (i. e., in more familiar English, only there are) some that trouble you, &c. That is: 'This different Gospel is only in so far another, that there are certain, who&c.' Notice, that the stress is on not another; so that St. Paul, though he had before said "a different Gospel," yet guards the unity of the Gospel, and explains what he meant by this expression to be nothing but a corruption and perversion of the one Gospel of Christ. 'The nature of this 'different Gospel,' as gathered from the data in our Epistle, was (1), though recognizing Jesus as the Christ, it insisted on circumcision and the observance of the Mosaic ordinances as to times, &c.: (2) it professed to rest on the authority of some of the other Apostles.

the gospel of Christ] perhaps here not "Christ's Gospel," but the Gospel of (i. e. relating to, preaching) Christ. The context only can determine in such expressions whether the genitive is subjective or objective.

8.] But (no matter who they are that trouble you, &c.) even though we (i. e. usually, ‘I, Paul.’ but perhaps used here on account of what was said in ver. 2, “a ll the brethren which are with me”), or an angel from heaven (introduced here as the highest possible authority, next to a divine Person: even were this possible, were the highest rank of created beings to furnish the preacher, &c. See 1 Cor. xiii. 1. Perhaps also, as Chrysostom says, there is a reference to the new teachers having sheltered themselves under the names of the great Apostles), preach (literally, evangelize: it is impossible to preserve in English the form of this word, and in it the reference back to vv. 6, 7) to you any gospel other than (not merely ‘against,’ nor merely ‘besides,’ but indicating ‘beyond,’ in the sense of overstepping the limit into a new region, i.e. it points out specific difference). The preposition is important here, as it has been pressed by Protestants in the sense of ‘besides,’ against Roman Catholic tradition, and in consequence maintained by the latter in the sense of ‘against.’ It in fact includes both) what we preached (evangelized) to you, let him be accursed (of God: no reference to ecclesiastical excommunication; for an angel is here included. See note, Rom. ix. 3, and compare ch. v. 10).

9.] As we have said before (referring, not to ver. 8; for the word more naturally, as in 2 Cor. xiii. 2 [so too 1 Thess. iv. 6], relates to something said on a former occasion,—but to what he had said during his presence with them: see a similar reference, ch. v. 3, 21), 1 also now say again,—If any one is (no longer now a supposition, but an assumption of the fact) preaching to you (evangelizing you), other (with another gospel) than that which ye received (from us), let him be accursed (see above).

10.] For (accounting for, and by so doing, softening, the seeming harshness of the last saying, by the fact which follows) am I NOW (now takes up the “now” of the last verse, having here the principal emphasis on it,—‘in saying this,—‘in what I have just said,’ ‘is this like an example of men-pleasing?’) persuading (seeking to win over to me) MEN (see 1 Cor. iv. 3; 2 Cor. v. 12), or (am I conciliating) God? or do I seek to please MEN (a somewhat wider expression than the other, embracing his whole course of procedure)? (Nay) if I any longer (implying that such is the course of the world before conversion to Christ; not necessarily referring back to the time before his own conversion, any more than that is contained by implication in the words, but rather perhaps to the accumulated enormity of his being, after all he had gone through, a man-pleaser) were pleasing men (either (1) ‘seeking to please men:’ so that the fact, of being well-pleasing to men, does not come into question; or (2) ‘if I were popular with men:’ the original will bear both), I were not the servant of Christ.

11—CHAP. II. 21.] FIRST, or APOLOGETIC PART OF THE EPISTLE; consisting in an historical defence of his own teaching, as not being from men, but revealed to him by the Lord,—nor influenced even by the chief Apostles, but of independent authority.

after, or according to man, i.e. measured by merely human rules and considerations, as it would be were it of human origin.

12.] Proof of this. For neither did I (myself strongly emphatic, ‘neither did I, any more than the other Apostles’) receive it (historically) from man (i. e. ‘any man; generic: nor was I taught it (dogmatically), but by revelation of, i.e. from Jesus Christ.—WHEN did this revelation take place?—clearly, soon after his conversion, imparting to him as it did the knowledge of the Gospel which he afterwards preached; and therefore in all probability it is to be placed during that sojourn in Arabia referred to in ver. 17. It cannot be identical with the visions spoken of, 2 Cor. xii. 1 ff.,—for 2 Cor. was written in A.D. 57, and fourteen years before that would bring us to A.D. 43, whereas his conversion was in 37 (see chronological table in Introduction), and his subsequent silence, during which we may conceive him to have been under preparation by this apocalyptic imparting of the Gospel, lasted but three years, ver. 18.—Nor can it be the same as that appearance of the Lord to him related Acts xxii. 18,—for that was not the occasion of any revelation, but simply of warning and command.—He appears to refer to this special revelation in 1 Cor. xi, 23; xv. 3; 1 Thess. iv. 15; see notes in those places.

13—II. 21.] “Historical working out of this proof: and first (vv. 13, 14) by reminding them of his former life in Judaism, during which he certainly received no instruction in the Gospel from men.

being (literally) a zealous assertor (or defender) of my ancestral traditions (i. e. those handed down in the sect of the Pharisees, Paul being “a Pharisee, the son of Pharisees,” Acts xxiii. 6,—not, the law of Moses).

15–17.] After his conversion also, he did not take counsel with MEN.

15.] It was God’s act, determined at his very birth (see especially Acts xiii. 2), and effected by a special calling: viz., that on the road to Damascus, carried out by the instrumentality of Ananias. To understand this “call” of an act in the divine Mind, is contrary to our Apostle’s usage of the word, see ver. 6; Rom. viii. 30 al. This calling first took place, then the revelation, as here.

into Arabia] On the place which this journey holds in the narrative of Acts ix., see notes on verses 19, 22 there. Its object does not seem to have been the preaching of the Gospel,—but preparation for the apostolic work; though of course we cannot say, that he did not preach during the time, as before and after it (Acts ix. 20, 22), in the synagogues at Damascus. Into what part of Arabia he went, we have no means of determining. The name was a very vague one, sometimes including Damascus, —sometimes extending even to Lebanon and the borders of Cilicia. It was however more usually restricted to that Peninsula now thus called, between the Red Sea and the Persian Gulf. Here we must apparently take it in the wider sense, and understand that part of the Arabian desert which nearly bordered on Damascus. How long he remained there we are equally at a loss to say. Hardly for any considerable portion of the three years: Acts ix. 23 will scarcely admit of this: for those “many days” were manifestly passed at Damascus.—The journey is mentioned here, to account, for the time, and to shew that he did not spend it in conferring with men, or with the other Apostles.

and returned....] compare Acts ix. 22, 25.

18–24.] But after a very short visit to Peter at Jerusalem, he retired to Syria and Cilicia.

18.] At first sight, it would appear as if the three years were to be reckoned from his return to Damascus: but on closer examination we see that after three years stands in opposition to ‘“immediately” above, and the “not going away to Jerusalem” here answers to “going up to Jerusalem” there. So that we must reckon them from his conversion: the period specified in ver. 15 ruling the whole narrative. See also on ch. ii. 1.—This is the journey of Acts ix. 26,—where see note. There is no real discrepancy between that account and this. The incident which led to his leaving Damascus (Acts ix. 25; 2 Cor. xi. 32, 33) has not necessarily any connexion with his purpose in going to Jerusalem: a purpose which may have been entertained before, or determined on after, that incident. To this visit must be referred the vision of Acts xxii. 17, 18.

to visit (i. e. to make the acquaintance of) Cephas—not to get information or instruction from him. Peter was at this early period the prominent person among the Apostles: see note on Matt. xvi. 18.

fifteen days] mentioned to shew how little of his institution as an Apostle he could have owed to Peter. Why no longer; see in Acts ix. 29; xxii. 17–21.

19.] This verse admits of two interpretations, between which other considerations must decide. (1) That James, the Lord’s brother, was one of the Twelve, and the only one besides Peter whom Paul saw at this visit: (2) that he was one of the Apostles, but not necessarily of the Twelve. Of these, (1) apparently cannot be: for after the choosing of the Twelve (John vi. 70), the brethren of our Lord did not believe on Him (John vii. 5): an expression (see note there) which will not admit of any of His brethren having then been His disciples. We must then adopt (2): which is besides in consonance with other notices respecting the term Apostle, and the person here mentioned. I reserve the subject for full discussion in the Introduction to the Epistle of James. See also notes, Matt. x. 3; xiii. 55; John vii. 5.

20.] This asseveration (compare 2 Cor. xi. 31) applies most naturally to the important fact just asserted—his short visit to Jerusalem, and his having seen only Peter and James, rather than to the whole subject of the chapter. If a report had been spread in Galatia that after his conversion he spent years at Jerusalem and received regular institution in Christianity at the hands of the Apostles, this last fact would naturally cause amazement, and need a strong confirmatory asseveration.

21.] The beginning only of this journey is related in Acts ix. 30, where see note. Mr. Howson suggests (edn. 2, i.p. 129, f.) that he may have gone at once from Caesarea to Tarsus by sea, and Syria and Cilicia may afterwards have been the field of his activity,—these provinces being very generally mentioned together, from their geographical affinity, Cilicia being separated from Asia Minor by Mount Taurus. In Acts xv. 23, 41, we find churches in Syria and Cilicia, which may have been founded by Paul on this journey. The supposition is confirmed by our ver. 23: see below.

22, 23.] ‘So far was I from being a disciple of the Apostles, or tarrying in their company, that the churches of Judæa, where they principally laboured, did not even know me by sight.’ The word Judæa must be understood as excluding Jerusalem, where he was known. This seems to be required by Acts ix. 26–29.

23.] They (the members of the churches) heard reports (not, ‘had heard,’ as A.V.), That our former persecutor is now preaching the faith which he once was destroying (see ver. 13). And they glorified God in me (‘in my case.’ i.e., my example was the cause of their glorifying God. By thus shewing the spirit with which the churches of Judæa were actuated towards him, he marks more strongly the contrast between them and the Galatian Judaizers).

II. 1–10.] On his subsequent visit to Jerusalem, he maintained equal independence, was received by the Apostles as of co-ordinate authority with themselves, and was recognized as the Apostle of the uncircumcision. 1. after fourteen years] From what time are we to reckon? Certainly at first sight it would appear,—from the journey last mentioned. And Meyer maintains that we are bound to accept this first impression without enquiring any further. But why? Is the prima facie view of a construction always right? Did we, or did he, judge thus in ch. i. 18? Are we not bound, in all such cases, should any external reason exist for doing so, to reexamine the passage, and ascertain whether our prima facie impression may not have arisen from neglecting some indication furnished by the context? That this is the case here, I am persuaded. The ways of speaking, in ch. i. 18, and here, are very similar. The then in both cases may be well taken as referring back to the same starting point. What would there be forced or unnatural in a statement of the following kind? “After my conversion (ch. i. 15) my occasions of communicating with the other Apostles were these: (1) after three years I went up, &c. (2) after fourteen years had elapsed, I again went up, &c.”? This (compare Chronol. Table in Introduction) would bring the visit here related to the year 50: see below.

again went up I: but nothing is said, and there was no need to say any thing, of another visit during the interval. It was the object of the Apostle to specify, not all his visits to Jerusalem, but all his occasions of intercourse with the other Apostles: and it is mere trifling, when Meyer, in his love of making discrepancies, maintains that in such a narration as this, St. Paul would be putting a weapon into the hands of his opponents by omitting his second journey. That journey was undertaken (Acts xi. 30) in pursuance of a mission from the church at Antioch, to convey alms to the elders of the suffering church at Jerusalem. It was at a period of persecution, when James the son of Zebedee and Peter were under the power of Herod,—and in all probability the other Apostles were scattered. Probably Barnabas and Saul did not see any of them. They merely (Acts xii. 25) fulfilled their errand, and brought back John Mark. If in that visit he had no intercourse with the Apostles, as his business was not with them, the mention of it here would be irrelevant: and to attempt, as Meyer, to prove the Acts inaccurate, because that journey is not mentioned here, is simply absurd.—That the visit here described is in all probability the THIRD related in the Acts (4. D. 50) on occasion of the council of Apostles and elders (Acts xv.), I have shewn in a note to the chronological table in the Introduction. The various separate circumstances of the visit will be noticed as we proceed.

taking Titus also] In Acts xv. 2, we read, “They determined that Paul and Barnabas, and certain other of them, should go up to Jerusalem.” Titus is here particularized by name, on account of the notice which follows, ver. 3: and the also serves to take him out from among the others. On Titus, see Introduction to Epistle to Titus.

2.] But not only carries on the narrative, emphatically repeating the verb, but carries on the refutation also—but I went up (not for any purpose of learning from or consulting others, but)&c. Of his undertaking the journey by (in consequence of) revelation, nothing is said in the Acts: all that is related there being, the appointment by the church of St. Paul and Barnabas and others to go. What divine intimation St. Paul may have received, inducing him to offer himself for the deputation, we cannot say: that some such occurred, he here assures us, and it was important for him to assert it, as shewing his dependence only on divine leading, and independence of any behests from the Jerusalem church. Meyer well remarks, that the history itself of the Acts furnishes an instance of such a double prompting: Peter was induced by a vision, and at the same time by the messengers of Cornelius, to go to Cesarea.

unto them] The Christians at Jerusalem, implied in the word “Jerusalem” above. This wide assertion is limited by the next

but (limits the foregoing: as if to say, “when I say ‘to them,’ I mean”) privately (in a private conference: not to be conceived as separate from, but as specifying, the former communication) to those that were eminent (more at length ver. 6, “they which seemed to be somewhat.” These were James, Cephas, and John, ver. 9,—who appear to have been the only Apostles then at Jerusalem. ‘This is said, not for his own sake, but for that of others: meaning, that all might see the unity of the preaching, and that the truths proclaimed by me were well pleasing to the rest.’ Theodoret), lest by any means I should (seem to) be running, or (to) have run, in vain. It is quite out of the question, that this last clause should express a bona fide fear, lest his ministry should really be, or have been, in vain, without the recognition of the church at Jerusalem: such a sentiment would be unworthy of him, and, besides, at variance with the whole course of his argument here. The reference must be to the estimation in which his preaching would be held by those to whom he imparted it. When we consider the very strong prejudices of the Jerusalem church, this feeling of anxiety, leading him to take measures to prevent his work from being tumultuously disowned by them, is surely but natural.

3.] Howbeit (so far were they from regarding my course to have been in vain, that) not even was Titus, who was with me, a Greek (i. e. though he was a Gentile, and therefore liable to the demand that he should be circumcised), compelled to be circumcised (i. e. we did not allow him to be thus compelled: the facts being, as here implied, that the church at Jerusalem [and the Apostles? apparently not, from Acts xv. 5] demanded his circumcision, but on account of the reason following, the demand was not complied with, but resisted by Paul and Barnabas. So Meyer, and others, and I am persuaded, rightly, from what follows. But usually it is understood, that the circumcision of Titus was not even demanded, and that St. Paul alleged this as shewing his agreement with the other Apostles. But had this been so, besides that the following could not have stood as it does, not the strong expression was compelled, but the weakest possible one would have been used—‘the circumcision of Titus was not even mentioned’):

4.] and that (restricts and qualifies the broader assertion which went before. ‘Titus was not compelled...: and the reason was, &c.’) because of the false brethren who had been foisted in among us (the Judaizers in the church at Jerusalem, see Acts xv. 1), men who crept in to spy out (in a hostile sense) our freedom (from the ceremonial law: to see whether, or how far, we kept it) which we have in Christ Jesus, with intent to enslave us utterly: to whom not even for one hour did we yield with the subjection required of us, that the truth of the gospel (as contrasted with the perverted view which they would have introduced. Had they been overborne in this point, the verity of the Gospel would have been endangered among them,—i. e. that doctrine of justification, on which the Gospel turns as the truth of God) might abide with you (‘you Galatians: not, ‘you Gentiles in general:’ the fact was so,—the Galatians specially, not being in his mind at the time: it is only one of those cases where, especially if a rhetorical purpose is to be served, we apply home to the particular what, as matter of fact, it only shares as included in the general).

6.] He returns to his sojourn in Jerusalem, and his intercourse with ‘those who seemed to be somewhat’ there.

These who seemed to be somewhat may be either subjective (‘those who believe themselves to be something’), or objective (‘those who have the estimation of being something’). The latter is obviously the meaning here.

God respecteth no man’s person i.e. ‘I wish to form all my judgments according to God’s rule—which is that of strict unbiased justice.’ See Eph. vi. 9.

they... imparted nothing unto me] As I, at my first conversion, did not impart it to flesh and blood, so they now imparted nothing to me: we were independent the one of the other. The meaning ‘added’ (A. V. ‘in conference added’) is not justified by the usage of the word.

7.] Not only did they impart nothing to me, but, on the contrary, they gave in their adhesion to the course which I and Barnabas had been (independently) pursuing. ‘In what did this opposition (‘contrary’ course) consist? Apparently in this, that instead of strengthening the hands of Paul, they left him to fight his own battle [practically: but they added the weight of their approval]. They said, ‘Take your own course: preach the Gospel of the uncircumcision to Gentiles, and we will preach the Gospel of the circumcision to Jews.’’ Jowett.

when they saw, viz. by the communication mentioned ver. 2, coupled with the now manifest results of his preaching among the Gentiles. Compare Acts xv. 12. The word intrusted has the emphasis: they saw that I was (literally, am: the state being one still abiding) INTRUSTED with the gospel of the uncircumcision, as Peter with that of the circumcision; therefore they had only to accede to the appointment of God. Peter was not the Apostle of the circumcision only, for he had opened the door to the Gentiles (Acts x., to which Peter himself refers in Acts xv. 7), but in the ultimate assignment of the apostolic work, he wrought less among the Gentiles and more among the Jews than Paul: see 1 Pet. i. 1, and note. But his own Epistles are sufficient testimonies that, in his hands at least, the Gospel of the circumcision did not differ in any essential point from that of the uncircumcision.—Compare, as an interesting trait on the other side, Col. iv. 11.

8.] Parenthetic explanation of this word “intrusted.” The word wrought applies to the signs following with which the Lord accompanied His word spoken by them, and to the power with which they spoke that word. The agent in this working is GOD,—the Father: see 1 Cor. xii. 6; Phil. ii. 13; Rom. xv. 15, 16.

9.] resumes the narrative after the parenthesis.

James] placed first, as being at the head of the church at Jerusalem, and presiding (apparently) at the conference in Acts xv. The expression seemed to be alludes to vv. 2 and 6; see there.

pillars, i. e., principal supporters of the church, men of distinction and weight; afterwards the word came to be used directly in a personal sense, without metaphor. Clement of Rome says that “the most righteous pillars were persecuted.” The words should be apostles are not expressed in the Greek. Some supply “should go,” or “should preach,” which come to much the same. ‘This division of labour was not, and could not be, strictly observed. Every where in the Acts we find St. Paul preaching ‘to the Jews first,’ and every where the Judaizers followed on his track.

10.] which very thing I was also forward to do,—viz., then and always: it was my habit. He uses the singular, because the plural could not correctly be predicated of the whole time to which the verb refers: for he parted from Barnabas shortly after the council in Acts xv. The proofs of this forwardness on his part may be found, Rom. xv. 15–27; 1 Cor. xvi. 1–4; 2 Cor. viii. ix.; Acts xxiv. 17: which, though they probably happened after the date of our Epistle, yet shew the bent of his habitual wishes on this point.

11–17.] He further proves his independence, by relating how he rebuked Peter for temporizing at Antioch. This proof goes further than any before: not only was he not taught originally by the Apostles,—not only did they impart nothing to him, rather tolerating his view and recognizing his mission,—but he on one occasion stood aloof from and reprimanded the chief of them for conduct unworthy the Gospel: thus setting his own Apostleship in opposition to Peter, for the time.

11.] This visit of Peter to Antioch, not related in the Acts, will fall most naturally (for our narrative follows the order of time) in the period described, Acts xv. 35, seeing that (ver. 18) Barnabas also was there. See below.

Cephas] Eusebius quotes out of Clement a story that this Cephas was not the Apostle, but one of the Seventy, of the same name. This was manifestly invented to save the credit of St. Peter. One of the most curious instances of ecclesiastical ingenuity on record has been afforded in the interpretation of this passage by the Fathers. They try to make it appear that the reproof was only an apparent one—that St. Peter was entirely in the right, and St. Paul withheld him to the face, i.e. as they explain it, ‘in appearance merely,’ because he had been blamed by others. So Chrysostom: so Theodoret also: and Jerome.—This view of Jerome’s met with strong opposition from Augustine, who writes to him, nobly and worthily, maintaining that if St. Paul wrote thus, he was lying, in the very passage in which he says, “The things which I write unto you, behold, before God, I lie not.” Afterwards, Jerome abandoned his view for the right one.

because he was condemned] not, ‘because he was to be blamed,’ A.V.: no such meaning can be extracted from the original word. He was ‘a condemned man,’ as we say: by whom, does not appear: possibly, by his own act: or, by the Christians in Antioch: but St. Paul would hardly have waited for the prompting of others to pronounce his condemnation of him. I therefore prefer the former: he was [self] convicted: convicted of inconsistency by his conduct.

12.] These certain men from James have been softened by some Commentators into persons who merely gave themselves out as from James, or who merely came from Jerusalem where James presided. But the candid reader will I think at once recognize in the words a mission from James: and will find no difficulty in believing that that Apostle, even after the decision of the council regarding the Gentile converts, may have retained (characteristically, see his recommendation to St. Paul, in Acts xxi. 18 ff.) his strict view of the duties of Jewish converts,—for that is perhaps all that the present passage requires. And this mission may have been for the very purpose of admonishing the Jewish converts of their obligations, from which the Gentiles were free. Thus we have no occasion to assume that James had in the council been over-persuaded by the earnestness and eloquence of Paul, and had afterwards undergone a reaction: for his course will be consistent throughout. And my view seems to me to be confirmed by his own words, Acts xv. 19, where the emphatic expression, “them which from among the Gentiles are turning unto God,” tacitly implies, that the Jews would be bound as before.

he ate with the Gentiles] As he had done, Acts x., on the prompting of a heavenly vision; and himself defended it, Acts xi. See below.

he withdrew and separated himself] The original expresses that there were more cases than one where he did this: it was the course he took.

fearing them which were of the circumcision] The whole incident is remarkably characteristic of Peter—ever the first to recognize, and the first to draw back from, great principles and truths.

13. joined in his hypocrisy] The word is not (as De Wette says) too strong a one to describe their conduct. They were aware of the liberty in Christ which allowed them to eat with Gentiles, and had practised it: and now, being still aware of it, and not convinced to the contrary, from mere fear of man they adopted a contrary course. The case bore but very little likeness to that discussed in 1 Cor. viii.—x.; Rom. xiv. There, it was a mere matter of licence which was in question: here, the very foundation itself. It was not now a question of using a liberty, but of asserting a truth, that of justification by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the law.

was carried away] “Besides the antagonism in which this passage represents the two great Apostles, it throws an important light on the history of the apostolic church in the following respects:—1] As exhibiting Peter’s relation to James, and his fear of those who were of the circumcision, whose leader we should have naturally supposed him to have been. 2] Also as pourtraying the state of indecision in which all, except St. Paul, even including Barnabas, were in reference to the observance of the Jewish law.” Jowett.

14. before them all] i.e. ‘before the church assembled.’ The words require this, and the reproof would otherwise have fallen short of its desired effect on the Jewish converts.—The speech which follows, and which I believe to extend to the end of the chapter, must be regarded as a compendium of what was said, and a free report of it, as we find in the narratives by St. Paul himself of his conversion. See below.—If thou, being (by birth, originally, cf. Acts xvi. 20 and note) a Jew, livest (as thy usual habit. As Neander remarks, these words shew that Peter had long been himself convinced of the truth on this matter, and lived according to it: see further on ver. 18) as a Gentile (how, is shewn by the fact that he ate with the Gentiles, mentioned above), and not as a Jew, how is it that thou art compelling the Gentiles (i. e. virtually and ultimately; for the high authority of Peter and Barnabas would make the Gentile converts view their course as necessary to all Christians. There is no need to suppose that the persons who came from James actually compelled the Gentile converts to Judaize, as necessary to salvation, and Peter upheld them: nor is there any difficulty in the expression: the present may mean, as it often does, ‘art compelling to the best of thy power,’ ‘doing thy part to compel,’—for such certainly would be the ultimate result, if Jews and Gentiles might not company together in social life—“his principle logically involved this, or his influence and example would be likely to effect it.” Jowett) to Judaize (observe the ceremonial law)?

15.] Some think that the speech ends with ver. 14: others with ver. 15, or ver. 16, or ver. 18: Jowett, that the conversation gradually passes off into the general subject of the Epistle. “Ver. 14,” he says, “is the answer of St.

Paul to St. Peter: what follows, is more like the Apostle musing or arguing with himself, with an indirect reference to the Galatians.” But it seems very unnatural to place any break before the end of the chapter. The Apostle recurs to the Galatians again, in ch. iii. 1: and it is harsh in the extreme to suppose him to pass from his speech to Peter, into an address to them, with so little indication of the transition. I therefore regard the speech (which doubtless is freely reported, and gives rather the bearing of what was said, than the words themselves, as in Acts xxii. and xxvi.) as continuing to the end of the chapter, as do the great majority of Commentators, ancient and modern.

We (thou and I) are Jews by nature (birth), and not sinners from among the Gentiles (he is speaking to Peter from the common ground of their Judaism, and using [ironically?] Judaistic language, in which the Gentiles were called atheists, lawless, unjust, sinners, see Rom. ii. 12; vi. 1; ix. 21; Eph. ii. 12; 1 Sam. xv. 18} knowing nevertheless that a man is not justified by (as the ground of justification) the works of the law,— (supply, nor is any man justified) save through (except by, literally) the faith of Jesus Christ,—we also (as well as the Gentile sinners, casting aside our legal trust) believed in Christ Jesus, that we might be justified by (this time, faith is the ground) the faith of Christ (so literally), and not by the works of the law: because (it is an axiom in our theolog that) by the works of the law shall all flesh find no justification (so in the Greek: in English ‘shall no flesh be justified:’ our language not admitting of the logical form of the Greek: but by this transposition of the negative, the sense is not accurately rendered).

17.] continues the argument. But if, seeking (put first for emphasis—in the course of our earnest endeavour) to be justified in Christ (as the element—the Body, comprehending us the members. This is lost sight of by rendering as A.V., ‘by Christ’), we ourselves also (you and I, addressed to Peter) were found [to be] sinners (as we should be, if we regarded the keeping of the law as necessary; for we should be in the situation of those Gentiles who in the Judaistic view are sinners, faith having failed in obtaining righteousness for us, and we having cast aside the law which we were bound to keep), is not Christ a minister of sin (i. e. are we to admit the consequence which would in that case be inevitable, that Christ, having failed to obtain for his own the righteousness which is by faith, has left them sinners, and so has done all his work only to minister to a state of sin)? Theodoret expresses well the argument. “If our having left the law and become attached to Christ, expecting by our faith in Him to gain righteousness, is to be accounted transgression, the guilt will lie on our Master Christ Himself: for He it was who proposed to us the new covenant. But God forbid that we should dare to utter such a blasphemy.”

18.] For (substantiates the God forbid, and otherwise deduces the being found sinners) if the things which I pulled down, those very things (and no others) I again build up (which thou art doing, who in Casarea didst so plainly announce freedom from the Jaw, and again here in Antioch didst practise it thyself. The first person is chosen for courtesy's sake; the second would have placed Peter, where the first means that he should place himself), I am proving myself a transgressor (a transgressor is the species, bringing me under the genus sinner. So that this is the explanation of the being found sinners). The force of the verse is,—‘You, by now reasserting the obligation of the law, are proving (as far as in you lies) that your former step of setting aside the law was in fact a transgression of it:’ viz. in that you neglected and set it aside.

19.] For I (I myself: the pronoun of the first person, for the first time expressed in the Greek, is marked and emphatic. The first person of the last verse, serves as the transition point to treating, as he now does, of HIS OWN state and course. And this “I,” as that in Rom. vii., is purely and bona fide ‘I Paul;’ not ‘I and all believers’) by means of the law died to the law (Christ was the end of the law for righteousness: the law itself, properly apprehended by me, was my “guide” to Christ: and in Christ, who fulfilled the law, I died to the law: i.e. satisfied the law’s requirements, and passed out of its pale), that I should live to God (the end of Christ’s work, LIFE unto God). Many of the Fathers, and others, take the first law here to mean the Gospel (the “law of the Spirit of life” of Rom. viii. 2): but it will be manifest to any who follow the argument, that this cannot be so. This “through the law dying to the law” is in fact a compendium of his expanded experience in Rom. vii.: and also of his argument in ch. iii. iv. below.

20.] I am (‘and have been’) crucified with Christ (specification of the foregoing dying: the way in which I died to the law was, by being united to, and involved in the death of, that body of Christ which was crucified): but (so literally) it is no longer I that live, but (it is) Christ that liveth in me (the punctuation of the A.V. is altogether wrong, the meaning is ‘but the life is not mine,—but the life is Christ’s within me.’—Christ is the vine, we the branches: He lives, He, the same Christ, through and in every one of His believing people): but (so again literally: it is taken up again, parallel with the two clauses beginning with “but” above) that which (i. e. ‘the life which’) I now (since my conversion, as contrasted with the time before: not the present life contrasted with the future) live in the flesh (in the fleshly body;—which, though it appear to be a mere animal life, is not. So Luther; “I live indeed in the flesh, but I do not count this insignificant particle of life which is going on in me, to be really life. For it is not, but only the mask of life, under which another lives, viz. Christ, who is really my life”) I live in (not ‘by,’ as A.V.: in the faith corresponds to in the flesh: faith, and not the flesh, is the real element in which I live) faith, viz. that (particularizing what sort of faith) of (having for its object, see on ver. 16) the Son of God (so named for solemnity, and because His eternal Sonship is the source of His life-giving power, compare John v. 25, 26), who loved me (the link which binds the eternal Son of God to me), and (proved that love, in that He) gave Himself up (to death) for me (on my behalf).

21] I do not (as thou [Peter] art doing, and the Judaizers) frustrate (or, make void) the grace of God: for (justification of the strong expression, frustrate) if by the law (comes) righteousness (not justification—but the result of justification), then Christ died without cause (not as A.V., ‘in vain,’ with reference to the result of His death, but gratuitously, causelessly;—‘Christ need not have died.’ ‘For,’ says Chrysostom, ‘if, Christ died, it is clear that it was because the law could not justify us: but if the law does justify us, Christ’s death was superfluous’).

Galatians: Chapter 3

CH. III. 1—V. 12.] SECOND, OR POLEMICAL PART OF THE EPISTLE.

1.] The Apostle exclaims indignantly, moved by the fervour and truth of his rebuke of Peter, against the folly of the Galatians, for suffering themselves to be bewitched out of their former vivid apprehension of Christ’s work and Person.

foolish must not, with Jerome, be taken as an allusion to any supposed national stupidity of the Galatians (for they appear to have been ‘very apt to learn, and of ready wit’): it merely springs out of the occasion.

you has the emphasis—‘YOU, to whom,’ &c.

was evidently set forth] We must understand this to refer to the time when he preached Christ among them, which he represents as a previous description in writing of Christ, in their hearts and before their eyes.

crucified, as expressing the whole mystery of redemption by grace, and of freedom from legal obligation. “It has an echo of the being crucified with Christ, in ch. ii. 20.” Jowett.

2.] This only,—not to mention all the other grounds on which I might rest my argument. “I wish to deal with you the shortest and simplest way."

Did ye from (as its ground, see ch. ii. 16) the works of the Law receive the Spirit (evidently here to be taken as including all His gifts, spiritual and external: not as some, "outward spiritual gifts" only: for the two are distinguished in ver. 5), or from the hearing of faith (meaning either, 'that preaching which proclaimed faith,' or, 'that hearing, which received (the) faith.' The first is preferable, because (1) where their first receiving the Gospel is in question, the preaching of it would probably be hinted at, as it is indeed taken up by the "then" below, ver. 5: (2) where the question is concerning the power of faith as contrasted with the works of the law, faith would most likely be subjective)?

3.] Are ye so (to such an extent, emphatic) foolish (as viz. the following fact would prove)? having begun (understand 'the Christian life') in the Spirit (the Spirit, i.e. the Holy Spirit, guiding and ruling the spiritual life, as the 'essence and active principle' of Christianity,—contrasted with the flesh,—the element in which the law worked), are ye now being completed in (as above) the flesh?

4.] Did ye suffer (not "have ye suffered," as A.V.) so many things in vain? There is much controversy about the meaning. Chrysostom, Augustine, and the ancients, and others, understand it of the sufferings which the Galatians underwent at the time of their reception of the Gospel. And, I believe, rightly. For (a) the word "suffer" occurs seven times in St. Paul, and always in the strict sense of 'suffering,' by persecution, or hardship (similarly in Heb., 1 Pet., &c.); (b) the past tense here marks the reference to be to some definite time. Now the time referred to by the context is that of their conversion to the Gospel, compare verses 2, 3, above. Therefore the meaning is, Did ye undergo all those sufferings (not specially mentioned in this Epistle, but which every convert to Christ must have undergone as a matter of course) in vain? if it be really in vain ("if, as it must be, what I have said, 'that ye suffered in vain,' is really the fact").

5.] then takes up again the question of ver. 2, and asks it in another form.

mighty works] not merely "miracles," as A.V.; but, the wonders wrought by divine Power in you (not, as A.V. "among you"; see 1 Cor. xii. 6; Phil. ii. 13; Eph. ii. 2; also Matt. xiv. 2), viz. at your conversion and since.

doeth He it from (out of, or in consequence of: "as the originating or moving cause") the works of the law, or from (as above) the hearing (see above, ver. 2) of faith?

6-9.] A braham's faith was his entrance into righteousness before God: and Scripture, in recording this, records also God's promise to him, by virtue of which all the Faithful inherit his blessing.

6.] The reply to the foregoing question is understood: it is by the hearing of faith. And then enters the thought of God's working as following upon Abraham's faith. The fact of justification being now introduced, whereas before the supplying the Spirit was the matter enquired of, is no real departure from the subject, for both these belong to the "beginning" of ver. 3,—are concomitant and inseparable. On the verse, see note, Rom. iv. 3.

7.] The verb is better taken indicatively, than imperatively. It is no objection to the indicative, that such knowledge could not well be predicated of the Galatians: it is not so predicated, but is here set before them as a thing which they ought to be acquainted with—from this then you know, as much as to say, "it is evident to all." The imperative seems to me to lose the fine edge of the Apostle's argumentative irony.

they which are of faith, as the origin and the starting-point. of their spiritual life: see Rom. ii. 8; iii. 26, and notes.

these] emphatic; these, and these only (see Rom. viii. 14), not they which are of works.

8.] Moreover the scripture (as we say, Nature: meaning, the Author of the Scripture), foreseeing that of faith (emphatic,—'and not of works') God would justify (literally, justifieth: this present tense is used, because it was God's one way of justification—He never justified in any other way—so that it is the normal present; 'God is a God that justifieth') the Gentiles (there is no stress here on the word "Gentiles": no question is raised between the carnal and spiritual seed of Abraham,—the question is between those who were of faith, and those who wanted to return to the works of the law, whether Jews or Gentiles. So that in fact the Gentiles [or, nations] must be here taken in its widest sense, as in the Abrahamic promise soon to be quoted), announced the good news beforehand to Abraham: In thee (not, 'in thy seed,' which is a point not here raised; but strictly in thee, as followers of thy faith, it having first shewn the way to justification before God. That the words will bear that other reference, does not shew that it must be introduced here) shall all the Gentiles (or, nations, see above: not to be restricted to its narrower sense, but expressing, from Gen. xviii. 18; xxii. 18, in a form suiting better the Apostle's present argument, "all the families of the earth," Gen. xii. 3) be blessed.

9.] Consequence of his being blessed in Abraham above, substantiated by ver. 10 below. A share in Abraham's blessing must be the accompaniment of faith, not of works of the law.

with, to shew their community with him in the blessing: faithful Abraham, to shew wherein the community consists, viz. FAITH.

10.] Substantiation of ver. 9: they that are of the works of the law cannot be sharers in the blessing, for they are accursed; it being understood that they do not and cannot continue in all things which are written in the book of the law, to do them: see this expanded in Rom. iii. 9–20.

11, 12.] contain a perfect syllogism, so that “the just shall live by faith” is the major proposition, ver. 12 the minor, and “in the law no man is justified before God,” the consequence. It is inserted to strengthen the inference of the former verse, by shewing that not even could a man keep the law, would he be justified—the condition of justification, as revealed in Scripture, being that it is by faith. But (moreover) that in (not merely the elemental in, but the conditional as well: ‘in and by:’ not ‘through’) the law no man is justified (the normal present: is, in God’s order of things) with (before, in the judgment of) God is evident: for (it is written, that), The just by faith shall live (not ‘The just shall live by faith,’ as A.V. St. Paul is not seeking to shew by what the righteous shall live, but the ground itself of that righteousness which shall issue in life; and the contrast is between “the just by faith,” and “the man that doeth them”): but (or, now: logical, introducing the minor of the syllogism: see above) the law is not of (does not spring from nor belong to) faith: but (its nature is such that), He that hath done them (viz. “my statutes and my judgments,” Lev. xviii. 5) shall live in (conditional element) them (see Rom. x. 5).

13.] But this curse has been removed by the redemption of Christ. The joyful contrast is introduced abruptly, without any connecting particle: see a similar case in Col. iii. 4. The US is emphatic, and applies solely to the Jews. They only were under the curse of ver. 10,—and they being by Christ redeemed from that curse, the blessing of Abraham (justification by faith), which was always destined by God to flow through the Jews to the Gentiles, was set at liberty thus to flow out to the Gentiles. This is the only view which suits the context. To make us refer to Jews and Gentiles, and refer the curse of the law to the law of conscience, is to break up the context altogether.

redeemed us] bought us off: see, besides reff., 1 Cor. vi. 20; vii. 23; 2 Pet. ii. 1; Rev. v. 9.—The form of the idea is,—the Law (personified) held us (Jews) under its curse; (out of this) Christ bought us, BECOMING (emphatic) a curse (not accursed, concrete, but a curse, abstract, to express that he became not only a cursed person, but the curse itself, coextensive with the disability which affected us) for us (the JEWS again. And the meaning is not, ‘instead of us,’ but ‘on our behalf.’ It was in our stead: but that circumstance is not expressed by the form of this sentence).

for it is written, &c., is a parenthesis, justifying the formal expression “having become a curse for us.” The citation omits the words “of God” after “cursed.” They were not to the point here, being understood as matter of course, the law being God’s law. The words are spoken of hanging after death by stoning; and are given, in the place cited, as a reason why the body should not: remain on the tree all night, because one hanging on a tree is accursed of God. Such formal curse then extended to Christ, who died by hanging on a tree.

14] to the end that (the intent of Christ’s becoming a curse) the blessing of Abraham (promised to Abraham: i.e. justification by faith; ver. 9) might be (come) upon the Gentiles (or, nations: but here not all nations, but strictly the Gentiles: see above on ver. 13) in (in and by, conditional element) Christ Jesus; that we (not emphatic: no longer the Jews, but all Christians) might receive (in full, as fulfilled) through the (or, but not so usually, our: perhaps best expressed in English simply by “through faith”) faith the promise of the Spirit (viz. that made Joel ii. 28.—See Acts ii. 17, 33; Luke xxiv. 49,—THE PROMISE of the new covenant). This ‘receiving the promise of the Spirit’ distinctly refers back to ver. 2, where he asked them whether they received the Spirit by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith? “Here is a pause, at which the indignant feeling of the Apostle softens, and he begins the new train of thought which follows with words of wilder character, and proceeds more quietly with his argument.” Windischmann.

15–18.] But what if the law, coming after the Abrahamic promise, abrogated that promise? These verses contain the refutation of such an objection: the promise was not abrogated by the law.

15.] “What is ‘I speak after the manner of men? From human examples.’” Chrysostom. But (see 1 Cor. xv. 32) the expression refers not only to the character of the example chosen, but to the temporary standing-point of him who speaks: I put myself for the time on a level with ordinary men in the world.

a (mere) man’s covenant (not ‘testament,’ although the word has also that meaning; for there is here no introduction of that idea: the promise spoken to Abraham was strictly a covenant, and designated by the word used here (diathéké) in the passages which were now in the Apostle’s mind, see Gen. xv. 18; xvii. 7), when ratified, no one notwithstanding (that it is merely a human covenant) sets aside, or supplements (with new conditions. Nothing is implied as to the nature of the additions, whether consistent or inconsistent with the original covenant: the simple fact that no additions are made, is enounced).

16.] What is now said, in a parenthetical and subsidiary manner, is this: The covenant was not merely nor principally made with Abraham, but with Abraham and HIS SEED, and that seed referred, not to the Jewish people, but to CHRIST. The covenant then was not fulfilled, but awaiting its fulfilment, and He to whom it was made was yet to appear, when the law was given.

the promises] because the promise was many times repeated: e.g. Gen. xii. 7; xv. 5, 18; xvii. 7, 8; xxii. 18.

and to his seed] These words, on which, from what follows, the stress of the whole argument rests, are probably meant to be a formal quotation. If so, the promises quoted must be Gen. xiii. 15; xvii. 8 [Jowett supposes xxi. 12, but qu.?] where the words occur as here.

He saith not] v iz. He who gave the promises—God.

to seeds.... to thy seed] The central point of the Apostle's argument is this: The seed to whom the promises were made, was Christ. To confirm this position,—see Gen. xxii. 17, 18, where the collective seed of ver. 17 is summed up in the individual seed of ver. 18, he alleges a philological distinction, which was also recognized by the Rabbinical schools. This has created considerable difficulty: and all sorts of attempts have been made to evade the argument, or to escape standing committed to the distinction. Jerome (ad loc.), curiously and characteristically, applies the words "I speak after the manner of men" to this distinction especially, and thinks that the Apostle used it as adapted to the calibre of those to whom he was writing: "He had lately called the Galatians foolish, and now he descends to their level and becomes a fool in his argument." The Roman-Catholic Windischmann, one of the ablest and most sensible of modern expositors, says, "Our recent masters of theology have taken up the objection, which is as old as Jerome, and forgetting that Paul knew Hebrew better than themselves, have severely blamed him for urging the singular meaning of seed here, and thus justifying the application to Christ, seeing that the word which occurs here in the Hebrew text, has no plural (Windischmann is not accurate here: the plural is found 1 Sam. viii. 15, in the sense of 'grains of wheat'), and so could not be used. Yet they are good enough to assume, that Paul had no fraudulent intent, and only followed the arbitrary exegesis of the Jews of his time. The argument of the Apostle does not depend on the grammatical form, by which Paul here only puts forth his meaning in Greek,—but on this, that the Spirit of God in the promise to Abraham and the passage of Scripture relating that promise, has chosen a word which implies a collective unity, and that the promise was not given to Abraham and his children. Against the prejudice of the carnal Jews, who held that the promise applied to the plurality of them, the individual descendants of the Patriarch, as such,—the Apostle maintains the truth, that only the Unity, Christ, with those who are incorporated in Him, has part in the inheritance." On these remarks I would observe, (1) that the Apostle's argument is independent of his philology: (2) that his philological distinction must not be pressed to mean more than he himself intended by it: (3) that the collective and individual meanings of seed are both undoubted, and must have been evident to the Apostle himself, from what follows, ver. 29. We are now in a position to interpret the words which is Christ, Meyer says 'Christ is the personal Christ. Jesus, not, as has been held since Augustine's time, Christ and His Church.' This remark is true, and untrue. Christ certainly does not mean 'Christ and His Church:' but if it imports only the personal Christ Jesus, why is it not so expressed? For the word does not here occur in passing, but is the predicate of a very definite and important proposition. The fact is, that we must place ourselves in St. Paul's position with regard to the idea of Christ, before we can appreciate all he meant by this word here. Christians are, not by a figure, but really, the BODY OF CHRIST: Christ contains His people, and the mention even of the personal Christ would bring with it, in the Apostle's mind, the inclusion of his believing people. This seed is, CHRIST: not merely in the narrower sense, the man Christ Jesus, but Christ the Seed, Christ the Second Adam, Christ the Head of the Body. And that this is so, is plain from vv. 28, 29, which are the key to these words: where he says, "For ye all are ONE in Christ Jesus" (notice Jesus here carefully inserted, where the Person is indicated); "and if ye be Christ's, then ARE YE ABRAHAM'S SEED, heirs according to promise." So that while it is necessary for the form of the argument here, to express Him to whom the promises were made, and not the aggregate of His people, afterwards to be identified with Him (but not here in view), yet the Apostle has introduced His name in a form not circumscribing His Personality, but leaving room for the inclusion of His mystical Body.

17.] Inference from vv. 15, 16, put in the form of a re-statement of the argument, as applying to the matters in hand. This however I say (this is my meaning, the drift of my previous statement), The covenant which was previously ratified by God (the words unto Christ seem to have been inserted by some to complete the correspondence with ver. 16: the fact was so, it was 'to Christ,' as its second party, that the covenant was ratified by God), the Law, which took place (was constituted) four hundred and thirty years after, does not abrogate, 80 as to do away the promise. As regards the interval of 430 years, we may remark, that in Exod. xii. 40, it is stated, "The sojourning of the children of Israel who dwelt in Egypt, was four hundred and thirty years." (In Gen. xv. 13, Acts vii. 6, the period of the oppression of Israel in Egypt is roundly stated at 400 years.) But to this, in order to obtain the entire interval between the covenant with Abraham and the law, must be added the sojourning of the Patriarchs in Canaan,—i. e. to the birth of Isaac, 25 years (Gen. xii. 4; xxi. 5),—to that of Jacob, 60 more (Gen. xxv. 26),—to his going down into Egypt, 130 more (Gen. xlvi. 9); in all = 215 years. So that the time really was 645 years, not 430. But in the Septuagint version (and Samaritan Pentateuch) we read, Exod. xii. 40, "The sojourning of the children of Israel which they sojourned in the land of Egypt, and in the land of Canaan, they and their fathers, was four hundred and thirty years;" and this reckoning St. Paul has followed. We have instances of a similar adoption of the Septuagint text in the apology of Stephen: see Acts vii. 14, and note. After all, however, the difficulty lies in the 400 years of Gen. xv. 13 and Acts vii. 6. For we may ascertain thus the period of the sojourn of Israel in Egypt: Joseph was 39 years old when Jacob came into Egypt (Gen. sli. 46, 47; xlvi. 6): therefore he was born when Jacob was 91 ($91 + 39 = 130$: see Gen. xlvi. 9). But he was born 6 years before Jacob left Laban (compare ib. xxx. 25 with xxxi. 41), having been with him 20 years (ib. xxxi. 38, 41), and served him 14 of them for his two daughters (xxxi. 41). Hence, seeing that his marriage with Rachel took place when he was 78; [the marriages with Leah and Rachel being contemporaneous, and the second seven years of service occurring after, not before, the marriage with Rachel; Levi, the third son of Leah, whose first son was born after Rachel's marriage [xxix. 30–32], must have been born not earlier than Jacob's 81st year,—and consequently was about 49 [130–81] when he went down into Egypt. Now (Exod. vi. 16) Levi lived in all 137 years: i.e., about 88 [137–49] years in Egypt. But (Exod. vi. 16, 18, 20) Amram, father of Moses and Aaron, married his father Kohath's sister, Jochebed, who was therefore, as expressly stated Num. xxvi. 59, 'the daughter of Levi, whom her mother bare to Levi in Egypt' Therefore Jochebed must have been born within 88 years after the going down into Egypt. And seeing that Moses was 80 years old at the Exodus (Exod. vii. 7),—if we call x his mother's age when he was born, we have $88 + 80 + x$ as a maximum for the sojourn in Egypt, which clearly therefore cannot be 430 years, or even 400; as in the former case x would = 262,—in the latter 232. If we take x = about 47 (to which might be added in the hypothesis any time which 88 and x might have had in common), we shall have the sojourn in Egypt = 215 years, which, added to the previous 215, will make the required 430. Thus it will appear that the Septuagint, Samaritan Pentateuch, and St. Paul, have the right chronology,—and as stated above, the difficulty lies in Gen. xv. 13 and Acts vii. 6,—and in the Hebrew text of Exod. xii. 40.

18.] See Rom. iv. 14. For if the inheritance (the general term for all the blessings promised to Abraham, as summed up in his Seed who was to inherit the land,—in other words, for the Kingdom of Christ: see 1 Cor. vi. 9, 10) is of the law (i. e. by virtue of the law, having as its ground the covenant of the law), it is no more (not of time, but logical—the 'negative' follows on the hypothesis) of (by virtue of) promise: but (the 'but' of a demonstration, appealing to a well-known fact) to Abraham by promise hath God granted [it] (and therefore it is not of the Law).

19–24.] The use and nature of the Law. What then [is] the Law? For the sake of the transgressions [of it] ("when we hear that the law could not confer righteousness, many thoughts arise,—that it must then be useless, or contrary to God's covenant, or something of that kind." Calvin. The office of the law was, to make sin into TRANSGRESSION,—so that what was before not a transgression might now become one. The law then was added [to the promise, which had no such power], for the sake of [in order to bring about as transgressions] the transgressions [of it] which should be, and thus [ver. 23] to shut us up under sin, viz. the transgression of the law) it was superadded ("this addition does not contradict the assertion of ver. 15, that no one supplements an already ratified covenant. For the law was not given as a supplement, of the covenant, but came in as another institution, additional to that already existing." Meyer), until the seed shall have come to whom (ver. 16) the promise is (not was) made (this seed is of course Christ); being enjoined by means of angels (angels were, according to the Rabbinical view, the enactors and enjoiners of the law: so Josephus speaks; "We," he says, "have been taught the best desires and the holiest laws by means of angels from God." See also Heb. ii. 2; and note on Col. ii. 15. Of course no explaining away of the term angels into men [Moses, Aaron, &c.] can be allowed. Observe, the angels are not the givers of the Law, but its ministers, and instrumental enactors: the Law, with St. Paul, is always God's law; see especially Rom. vii. 22), in the hand of a mediator (viz. MOSES, who came from God to the people with the tables of the law in his hands. Compare his own words, Deut. v. 5, "I stood between the Lord and you at that time, to shew you the word of the Lord." Philo calls Moses by this very name of Mediator: and numerous examples are cited from the Rabbinical books, in which the name Mediator is given to Moses. Why does the Apostle add this last clause? I am inclined to think with Meyer that it is,—not to disparage the Law in comparison with the Gospel or with the promise, but to enhance the solemnity of the giving of the law as a preparation for Christ, in answer to the somewhat disparaging question, "what is the use of the law?" If the being given by means of angels had been here disparaging, as in Heb. ii. 2, "by the Lord" or the like must have been expressed, as there, on the other side, the intervention of a mediator is certainly no disparagement of the old covenant in comparison with the new, for this it has in common with the other. The fact is (see below on ver. 20), that no such comparison is in question here).

20.] The explanations of this verse, so obscure from its brevity, are so numerous (Winer counted 250: Jowett mentions 430) that they require a bibliography of their own. I believe we shall best disentangle the sense as follows. (1) Clearly, the terms a mediator and God are opposed. (2) As clearly cannot be of one and is one are opposed. (3) From this contrast arises an apparent opposition between the law and the promises of God, which gives occasion to the question of ver. 21. Taking up therefore again (1),—a mediator, by whose hand the law was enacted, stands opposed to God, the giver of the promises. And that, in this respect (2);—(a) a mediator is not of one, but (b) God is one. And herein lies the knot of the verse; that is, in (b),—for the meaning of (a) is pretty clear on all hands; viz. that a mediator does not belong to one party (masculine) but to two, as going between one party and another). Then to guide us to the meaning of (b), we must remember, that the numerical contrast is the primary idea: a mediator belongs not to one, but God is one. Shall we then say, that all reference of the term one (as applied to God) beyond this numerical one is to be repudiated? I cannot think so. The proposition "God is one" would carry to the mind of every reader much more than the mere numerical unity of God—viz. His Unity as an essential attribute, extending through the whole divine Character. And thus, though the proposition a mediator is not of one, would not, by itself, convey any meaning but that a mediator belongs to more than one, it would, when combined with God is one, receive a shade of meaning which it did not bear before,—of a state of things involved in the fact of a mediator being employed, which was not according to the oneness of God, or, so to speak, in the main track of His unchanging purpose. And thus (3), the law, administered by the mediator, belonging to a state inconsistent with oneness, a state of two at variance, is apparently opposed to the promises, belonging entirely to THE ONE, the one (faithful) God. And observe, that the above explanation is deduced entirely from the form of the sentence itself, and from the idea which the expression “God is one” must necessarily raise in the mind of its reader, accustomed to the proposition as the foundation of the faith;—not from any preconceived view, to suit which the words, or emphatic arrangement, must be forced. Notice by the way, that the objection, that the Gospel too is in the hand of a mediator, does not apply here: for (a) there is no question here of the Gospel, but only of the promises, as direct from God: (b) the mediator of the Gospel is altogether different, and His work different: He has absolutely reconciled the parties at variance, and MADE THEM ONE in Himself. Remember St. Paul’s habit of insulating the matter in hand, and dealing with it irrespective of all such possible objections. I must refer the reader for even the shortest account of other explanations, to my Greek Test. We may profitably lay down one or two canons of interpretation of the verse. (1) Every interpretation is wrong, which understands Christ by the mediator in this verse. The context determines it to be abstract, and its reference to be to Moses, the mediator of the Law. (2) Every interpretation is wrong, which makes one mean ‘one party’ in the covenant. God is one itself confutes any such view, being a wellknown general proposition, not admitting of a concrete interpretation. (3) Every interpretation is wrong, which confines God is one to its mere numerical meaning, and does not take into account the ideas which the general proposition would raise. 4) Every interpretation is wrong, which deduces from the verse the agreement of the law with the promises: because the Apostle himself, in the next verse, draws the very opposite inference from it, and refutes it on other grounds. (5) Every attempt to set aside the verse as a gloss is utterly futile.

21.] The law being thus set over against the promises,—being given through a mediator between two,—the promises by the one God,—it might seem as if there were an inconsistency between them. The words of God are not without emphasis: the promises given rest immediately on God, and were given by no mediator.

for if, &c.] Notwithstanding all the above features of contrast between the law and the prophets, it is not against them, for it does not pretend to perform the same office: if it did, then there would be this rivalry, which now does not exist. The term to give life takes for granted that we by nature are dead in trespasses and sins.

verily has the emphasis: in very truth, and not only in the fancy of some, by the law (as its ground) would have been righteousness (which is the condition of life eternal.—If life, the result, had been given by the law, then righteousness, the condition of life, must have been by it also: reasoning from the whole to its part).

22.] Howbeit, i.e., but on the contrary (this not being the case,—no law having been given out of which could come righteousness) the scripture (not the Law; but as in ver. 8, the Author of Scripture, speaking by that, His witness) shut up (see note Rom. xi. 32, where the same expression occurs. “The term shut up is beautifully chosen to set off more clearly the idea of Christian freedom by and by.” Windischmann: see ch. v. 1) all (literally, all things: neuter, as indicating the entirety of mankind and man’s world: all human matters) under sin, in order that (the intention of God, as in Rom. xi. 832: not the mere result, here or any where else) the promise (i. e. the things promised—the inheritance, cf. vv. 16, 18) (which is) by (depends upon, is conditioned by) faith of (which has for its object and its Giver—is a matter altogether belonging to) Jesus Christ might be given (be a free gift—given has the emphasis) to them that believe (the word “given” having the emphasis, “to them that believe” does no more than take up the words “by faith” above, as if it had been said ‘to those who fulfil that condition’).

23.] But (this carries us on to a further account of the rationale and office of the law) before (this) faith (not, the faith, in the sense of the objects of faith, but the faith just mentioned, viz. the faith of Jesus Christ, which did not exist until Christ) came (was found, or was possible, in men), we (properly, we Jewish believers—but not here to be pressed, because he is speaking of the divine dealings with men generally—the Law was for all: the only revelation) were kept in ward (not simply ‘kept’ as A.V., but as Chrysostom says, as it were in a fortress), shut up under the law, in order to (said of the preparatory design, not merely of the result, or the arrival of the time: and it may belong either to shut up or to were kept in ward) the faith (as in ver. 22) about to be revealed (‘as long as there was no such thing as faith in Christ, this faith was not yet revealed, was as yet an element of life hidden in the counsel of God.’ Meyer).

24.] So that (taking up the condition in which the last verse left us, and adding to it the fact that we are the SONS of God, ver. 26) the Law hath become (has turned out to be) our tutor (pedagogue, or schoolmaster, see below) unto (ethically; for) Christ (the pedagogue was a faithful slave, entrusted with the care of the boy from his tender years till puberty, to keep him from evil physical and moral, and accompany him to his amusements and studies. The word schoolmaster does not express the meaning fully: but it disturbs the sense less than those have done, who have selected one portion only of the pedagogue’s duty, and understood by it, ‘the slave who leads a child to the house of the schoolmaster,’ thus making Christ the schoolmaster, which is inconsistent with the imagery. On the contrary, the whole schoolmaster’s work is included in the word pedagogue, and Christ represents the freedom of the grown-up son, in which he is no longer guarded or shut up, but justified by faith, the act of a free man; and to Christ as a Teacher there is here no allusion), in order that by faith we can be justified (which may only be done now Christ has come). But (adversative) now that [the] faith (see above) is come, we are no longer under a tutor (pedagogue or schoolmaster).

26.] Reason of the negation in last verse. For ye all (Jews and Gentiles alike) are SONS (no longer children, requiring a tutor) of God through the (or, but not so well, your) faith in Christ Jesus.

27.] For (substantiates and explains the assertion of ver. 26: see below) as many of you as were baptized into (see Rom. vi. 3 and notes) Christ did put on Christ (at that time, compare the verbs in Acts xix. 2: not “have been baptized,” and “have put on,” as A.V., which leaves the two actions only concomitant: the past tenses make them identical: as many as were baptized into Christ, did in that very act, put on, clothe yourselves with, Christ. The force of the argument is well given by Chrysostom: “Why did he not say, ‘As many of you as were baptized into Christ, were born of God?’ for this would naturally follow from having shewn that they were sons. Because he lays down a far more startling proposition. For if Christ is the Son of God, and thou hast put Him on, having the Son in thee, and fashioned after His likeness, thou wert brought into one family with Him and one type.” Observe here how boldly and broadly St. Paul asserts the effect of Baptism on ALL THE BAPTIZED. Luther remarks: “This passage is to be carefully noted against those fanatical spirits who deprecate the majesty of Baptism, and speak wickedly and impiously concerning it. Paul, on the other hand, dignifies Baptism with sublime titles, calling it the font of regeneration and of the renewal by the Holy Spirit (Tit. iii. 5), and here says that all the baptized put on Christ: as if he said: ye have not received in baptism a mere ticket of admission into the number of Christians, as many fanatics of our time have fancied, who have made of baptism a mere admission ticket, i.e. a transitory and empty sign: but he declares that in baptism, they put on Christ: i.e. ye were snatched away from the law into a new birth, which was effected in your baptism.” But we may notice too, as Meyer remarks, that the very putting on of Christ, which as matter of standing and profession is done in baptism, forms a subject of exhortation to those already baptized, in its ethical sense, Rom. xiii. 14).

28.] The absolute equality of all in this sonship, to the obliteration of all differences of earthly extraction or position. See Col. iii. 11; Rom. x. 12; 1 Cor. xii. 13. Observe, “neither Jew nor Greek,”—“neither bond nor free,” but “male and female:” the two former being accidental distinctions which may be entirely put off in falling back on our humanity,—but the latter a necessary distinction, absorbed however in the higher category: “there is no distinction into male and female.”

for] reason why there is neither, &c.—viz. our unity in Christ. The unavoidable inference from an assertion like this is, that Christianity did alter the condition of women and slaves.

one [man], more forcible and more strict than one: for we are one, in Him, “one new man,” as St. Paul says in Eph. ii. 15, speaking on this very subject.

29.] Christ is ‘Abraham’s seed’ (ver. 16): ye are one in and with Christ, have put on Christ; therefore ye are Abraham’s seed; consequently heirs by promise; for to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. The stress is on ye, Abraham’s, and according to promise, especially on the latter,—carrying the conclusion of the argument, as against inheritance by the law. See on this verse, the note on ver. 16 above. “The declaration of ver. 7 is now substantiated by 22 verses of the deepest, the most varied, and most comprehensive reasoning that exists in the whole compass of the great Apostle’s writings.” Ellicott.

Galatians: Chapter 4

IV. 1–7.] The Apostle shews the correspondence between our treatment under the law and that of heirs in general: and thus, by God’s dealing with us, in sending forth His Son, whose Spirit of Sonship we have received, confirms (ver. 7) the conclusion that WE ARE HEIRS.

1. the heir] any heir, generic. The question, whether the father of the heir here is to be thought of as dead, or absent, or living and present, is in fact one of no importance: nor does it belong properly to the consideration of the passage. The fact is, the antitype breaks through the type, and disturbs it: as is the case, wherever the idea of inheritance is spiritualized. The supposition in our text is, that a father (from what reason or under what circumstances matters not) has preordained a time for his son and heir to come of age, and till that time, has subjected him to guardians and stewards. In the type, the reason might be absence, or decease, or even high office or intense occupation, of the father: in the antitype, it is the Father’s sovereign will: but the circumstances equally exist.

differeth nothing from a bond-servant] for he may be coerced, and even corporally punished, by those set over him.

though he be lord of all must be understood essentially, rather than prospectively. It is said of him in virtue of his rank, rather than of his actual estate: in posse, as the lawyers say, rather than in esse.

2.] guardians, overseers of the person; stewards, overseers of the property.

3.] we—are Jews only here included, or Jews and Gentiles? Clearly, both: for “that we might receive the adoption of sons,” ver. 5, is spoken of all believers in Christ. He regards the Jews as, for this purpose, including all mankind (see note on ch. iii. 23), God’s only positive dealings by revelation being with them—and the Gentiles as partakers both in their infant-discipline, and in their emancipation in Christ.

when we were children refers, not to any immaturity of capacity in us, but to the lifetime of the church, as regarded in the time previously appointed by the Father: see below on ver. 4.

the rudiments of the world] There have been various interpretations. The best seems to be, as in Col. ii. 8, 20, the elementary lessons of outward things. Of this kind were all the enactments peculiar to the Law; some of which are expressly named, ver. 10.

4.] the fulness of the time (‘that whereby the time was filled up’): answers to the time appointed by the Father, ver. 2. The Apostle uses this term with regard not only to the absolute will of God, but to the preparations which were made for the Redeemer on this earth, The manifestation of man’s guilt was complete:—and the way of the Lord was prepared, by various courses of action which He had brought about by men as his instruments.

sent forth cannot,—however little, for the purposes of the present argument, the divine side of our Lord’s mission is to be pressed,—mean any thing less than sent forth from Himself.

born of a woman will not bear being pressed, as some have done,—that it was of a woman alone, without co-operation of a man: it is Christ’s HUMANITY which is the point insisted on, not His being born of a virgin. On the other hand, the words cannot for an instant be adduced as inconsistent with such birth: they state generically, what all Christians are able, from the Gospel record, to fill up specifically.

born under the law] ‘born of a woman,’ identified Him with all mankind: born under the law, introduces another condition, in virtue of which He became the Redeemer of those who were under a special revelation and covenant. A Gentile could not (humanly speaking, as far as God has conditioned His own proceedings) have saved the world: for the Jews were the representative nation, to which the representative man must belong.

5.] See above. Christ, being born under the law, a Jewish child, subject to its ordinances,—by His perfect fulfilment of it, and by enduring, as the Head and in the root of our nature, its curse on the tree, bought off (from its curse and power, but see on ch. iii. 18) those who were under the law: and if them, then the rest of mankind, whose nature He had upon Him. Thus in buying off those under the law, He effected that we, all men, should receive (not ‘recover,’ as Augustine and others: there is no allusion to the innocence which we lost in Adam, nor was redemption by Christ in any sense a recovery of the state before the fall, but a far more glorious thing, the bestowal of an adoption which Adam never had) the adoption (the place, and privileges) of sons.

6.] And because ye are sons, God sent forth (not, ‘hath sent forth’—see above) the Spirit of His Son (you being now fellows with that Son in the communion of the Spirit, won for you as a consequence of His atonement: called, Rom. viii. 15, “the Spirit of adoption,” and ib. 9, “the Spirit of Christ,” where participation in Him is said to be the necessary condition of belonging to Christ at all) into our hearts (as he changed from the third person to the first in the foregoing verse, so now from the second: both times from the fervour of his heart, wavering between logical accuracy and generous largeness of sympathy), crying (in Rom. viii. 15, it is “in whom we cry.” Here the Spirit being the main subject, is regarded as the agent, and the believer merely as His organ), Abba, Father. Father is not a mere Greek explanation of Abba, but an address by His name of relation, of Him to whom the term Abba was used more as a token of affection than as conveying its real meaning of ‘my father.’ see notes on Mark xiv. 36, Rom. viii. 15.

7.] Statement of the conclusion from the foregoing, and corroboration, from it, of ch. iii. 29. The second person singular individualizes and points home the inference. This individualization has been gradually proceeding from ver. 5—“that we may receive”—“ye are”—“thou art.”

through God] The received reading, “of God through Christ,” seems to have been an adaptation to the parallel text in Rom. viii. 17.—On the text, Windischmann remarks, “Through God combines, on behalf of our race, the whole before-mentioned agency of the Blessed Trinity: the Father hath sent the Son and the Spirit, the Son has freed us from the law, the Spirit has completed our sonship; and thus the redeemed are heirs through the tri-une God Himself, not through the law, nor through fleshly descent.”

8-11.] Appeal to them, as the result of the conclusion just arrived at, why, having passed out of slavery into freedom, they were now going back again.

8] at that time refers back, not to ver. 3, but to the time referred to in ver. 7, when they were as bond-servants.—In the assertion that they knew not God, there is no inconsistency with Rom. i. 21: there it is the knowledge which the Gentile world might have had: here, the matter of fact is alleged, that they had it not. ye served gods which by nature exist not: see 1 Cor. viii. 4; x. 19, 20 and note. The received reading would mean, “those which are not by nature gods,” i.e. only men, made into gods by human fancy: but this is not the Apostle’s way of conceiving of the heathen deities.

9. or rather are known of (by) God] See note on 1 Cor. viii. 3. Here the propriety of the expression is even more strikingly manifest than there: the Galatians did not so much acquire the knowledge of God, as they were taken into knowledge, recognized, by Him. And this made their fall from Him the more matter of indignant appeal, as being a resistance of His will respecting them. No change of the meaning of known must be resorted to, as ‘approved,’ ‘loved:’ compare Matt. xxv. 12; 2 Tim. ii. 19: also Phil. ii. 12.

weak] so the commandment that went before is called in Heb. vii. 18, weak and unprofitable. Want of power to justify is that to which the word points here.

beggarly] in contrast with the riches which are in Christ. Or both words may perhaps refer back to the state of childhood hinted at in ver. 6, during which the heir is weak, as immature, and a beggar, as not yet in possession. But this would not strictly apply to the rudiments as the Gentiles were concerned with them: see below.

again] These Galatians had never been Jews before: but they had been before under the rudiments of the world, under which generic term both Jewish and Gentile worship was comprised: so that they were turning back again to these rudiments.

again from the beginning to be in bondage: i.e. to begin afresh your whole course of servitude.

10.] This verse supplies a verification of the charge just brought against them interrogatively: explaining one phase at least of their bondage. Wishing to shew to them in its most contemptible light the unworthiness of their decadence, he puts the observation of days in the forefront of his appeal, as one of those things which they already practised. Circumcision he does not mention, because they were not yet drawn into it, but only in danger of being so (ch. v. 2, al.):—nor abstinence from meats, to which we do not hear that they were even tempted.

days, emphatic, as the first mentioned, and also as a more general predication of the habit, under which the rest fall. The days would be sabbaths, new moons, and feast days: see Col. ii. 16, where these are specified.

months] hardly new moons, which were days: but perhaps the seventh month, or any others which were distinguished by great feasts.

times] any festal seasons.

years] can hardly apply to the sabbatical or jubilee years, on account of their rare occurrence, unless indeed we are to suppose that they were then celebrating one: perhaps those observations may be intended which especially regarded the year, as the new year. But this is not likely (see above on “months”): and I should much rather suppose, that each of these words is not minutely to be pressed, but all taken together as a rhetorical description of those who observed times and seasons. Notice how utterly such a verse is at variance with any and every theory of a Christian sabbath, cutting at the root, as it does, of ALL obligatory observance of times as such: see notes on Rom. xiv. 5, 6; Col. ii. 16. “These periodical solemnities of the law shewed, by the fact of their periodical repetition, the imperfection of the dispensation to which they belonged: typifying each feature of Christ’s work, which, as one great and perfect whole, has been performed once for all and for ever,—and were material representations of those spiritual truths which the spiritual Israel bear in union with Christ as a risen Lord. To observe periods then, now in the fulness of time, is to deny the perfection of the Christian dispensation, the complete and finished nature of Christ’s work: to forsake Him as the great spiritual teacher of His brethren, and to return to carnal pedagogues: to throw aside sonship in all its fulness, and the spirit of adoption: and to return to childhood and the rule of tutors and governors.” Bagge: who however elsewhere maintains the perpetual obligation of the Sabbath.

12–16.] Appeal to them to imitate him, on the ground of their former love and veneration for him.

12.] This has been variously understood. But it is best interpreted as referring to the Apostle having in his own practice cast off Jewish habits and become as the Galatians: i.e. a Gentile: see 1 Cor. ix. 20, 21.

Ye did me no wrong] The key to rightly understanding these words is, their apposition with the other verbs, “ye despised not, nor rejected: but ye received me...,” below. To that period they refer: viz. to the time when he first preached the Gospel among them, and the first introduction of this period seems to be in the words, for I am as ye are. Then, I became as you: and at that time you did me no wrong, but on the contrary shewed me all sympathy and reverence. Then comes in the inference, put in the form of a question, at ver. 16,—I must then have since become your enemy by telling you the truth.

13.] because of an infirmity of my flesh: or,—on account of bodily weakness: all other renderings (e. g. ‘in weakness, as A.V.) are ungrammatical, or irrelevant. The meaning is, that it was on account of an illness that he first preached in Galatia: i.e. that he was for that reason detained there, and preached, which otherwise he would not have done. On this, see Introduction,§ii. 3: the fact itself, I cannot help thinking, is plainly asserted here.

at the first] with reference to that second visit hinted at below, ver. 16, and ch. v. 21. See Introduction,§v. 3.

14.] The temptation seems to have been the “thorn in the flesh” of 2 Cor. xii. 1 ff., whatever that was: perhaps something connected with his sight, or some nervous infirmity: see below, and notes on Acts xiii. 9; xxiii. 1. It was their temptation, because it tempted them to disparage and reject his preaching. The expression, which has been altered into “my temptation,” is one of those exquisite and delicate touches, which belong so peculiarly to St. Paul’s mind.

as an angel of God, even as Christ Jesus] a climax:—besides the freedom of angels from fleshly weakness, there is doubtless an allusion to their office as messengers—and to His saying, who is above the angels, Luke x. 16. No inference can be drawn from these expressions being used of the Galatians’ reception of him, that they were already Christians when he first visited them: the words are evidently not to be pressed as intended to be accurate in point of chronology; they mean, not, ‘as you would have received,’ &c., but, ‘as you would (now) receive.’

15.] Where then (i. e. where in estimation, holding what place) (is) your congratulation of yourselves (so literally: the blessedness ye boasted of, in having me among you as your Apostle? This is perhaps as good a rendering as the words will bear)? i.e. considering your fickle behaviour since.

for I bear you witness...] a proof, to what lengths this congratulation of themselves, and consequently their high value for St. Paul ran, at his first visit. In seeking for a reference for this expression, y e would have plucked out your own eyes, and have given them to me, the right course will be, not at once to adopt the conclusion, that they point to ocular weakness on the part of the Apostle,—nor, because they form a trite proverb (signifying any great extent of self-sacrifice for another) in many languages, therefore to set down at once that no such allusion to a personal infirmity can have been intended, but to judge from the words themselves, and our information from other sources, whether such an allusion is likely. And in doing so, I may observe that a proverbial expression so harsh in its nature, and so little prepared by the context, would perhaps hardly have been introduced without some notice, or some particle of climax. Would not the Apostle have more naturally written, “have plucked out even your own eyes?” Had the “even” been inserted, it would have deprived the words of all reference to a matter of fact, and made them purely proverbial. On the other side, the order of the words in the original rather favours the idea that the phrase is a proverbial one. The inference then of any ocular disease from these words themselves seems to me precarious. Certainly Acts xxiii. 1 ff. receives light from such a supposition: but with our very small knowledge on the subject, many conjectures may be hazarded with some show of support from Scripture, while none of them has enough foundation to make it probable on the whole.

16.] Am I then (as things now stand; an inference derived from the contrast between their former love and their present dislike of him) become your enemy (hated by you;—in a passive sense: or perhaps it may be active,—one who hates you) by speaking the truth (see Eph. iv. 15 note) to you? When did he thus incur their enmity by speaking the truth? Not at his first visit, from the whole tenor of this passage: nor in this letter, as some think, which they had not yet read: but at his second visit, see Acts xviii. 23, when he probably found the mischief beginning, and spoke plainly against it.

17.] ‘My telling you the truth may have made me seem your enemy: but I warn you that these men who court you so zealously have no honourable purpose in so doing: it is only in order to get you away from the community as a separate clique, that you may court them.’ Thus the verse seems to fit best into the context. As regards particular words, their shutting out or excluding must bear the meaning of exclusion from a larger and attraction to a smaller, viz. their own, party. Our very word ‘exclusive’ conveys the same idea.

18.] ‘I do not mean to blame them in the abstract for zealously courting you: any teacher who did this in a good cause, preaching Christ, would be a cause of joy to me (Phil. i. 15–18): and it is an honourable thing (for you) to be the objects of this zeal, in a good cause, at all times and by every body, not only when I am (or was) present with you:’ as if he said, ‘I have no wish, in thus writing, to set up an exclusive claim to court you thus—whoever will really teach you good, at any time, let him do it and welcome.’ Then the next verse follows naturally also, in which he narrows the relation between himself and them, from the wide one of a mere “courter” of them, to the closer one of their parent in Christ, much as in 1 Cor. iv. 14 f.

19.] belongs to what follows, not to the preceding. My little children (the diminutive occurs only here in St. Paul, but is manifestly purposely, and most suitably chosen for the propriety of the metaphor. It is found [see reff.] often in St. John, while our Apostle has child, 1 Tim. i. 18; 2 Tim. ii. 1), whom (without the diminutive epithet) I again (a second time; the former was “when I was present with you,” ver. 18) travail with (bear, as a mother, with pain and anxiety, till the time of birth) until Christ shall have been fully formed within you (for Christ dwelling in a man is the secret and principle of his new life, see ch. ii. 20), 20.] yea, I could wish to be present with you now, and to change my voice (from what, to what? Some say, from mildness to severity. But surely such a change would be altogether beside the tone of this deeply affectionate address. I should rather hold,—from my former severity, when I became your enemy by telling the truth, to the softness and mildness of a mother, still telling the truth, but in another tone).

21–30.] Illustration of the relative positions of the law and the promise, by an allegorical interpretation of the history of the two sons of Abraham: “intended to destroy the influence of the false Apostles with their own weapons, and to root it up out of its own proper soil” (Meyer).

21.] do ye not hear (heed) the law, listen to that which the law imparts and impresses on its hearers?

22.] For answers to a tacit assumption of a negative answer to the foregoing question—‘nay, ye do not: for,’ &c.

23.] after the flesh, i.e., according to nature, in her usual course: the other, by [virtue of] the promise, as the efficient cause of Sarah’s becoming pregnant contrary to nature: see Rom. iv. 19.

24.] Which things are allegorical (i. e. as in text, have another meaning): are to be understood otherwise than according to their literal sense. It was the practice of the Rabbinical Jews to allegorize the Old Test. history. “Almost all the things narrated have with them their allegorical and mystical interpretation. Nor can we deprecate their labours in this matter. For St. Paul treats things in the same way, e.g. by speaking of the first and second Adam, of spiritual meat and drink, of Hagar, &c. So also John speaks of the mystical Sodom and Egypt, and predicts by revelation the infliction of the Egyptian plagues on the enemies of the church.” Schöttgen. How various persons take this allegorical comment of the Apostle, depends very much on their views of his authority as a Scripture interpreter. To those who receive the law as a great system of prophetic figures, there can be no difficulty in believing the events by which the giving of the law was prepared to have been prophetic figures also: not losing thereby any of their historic reality, but bearing to those who were able to see it aright, this deeper meaning. And to such persons, the fact of St. Paul and other sacred writers adducing such allegorical interpretations brings no surprise and no difficulty, but only strong confirmation of their belief that there are such deeper meanings lying hid under the O.T. history. That the Rabbis and the Fathers, holding such deeper senses, should have often missed them, and allegorized fancifully and absurdly, is nothing to the purpose: it is surely most illogical to argue that because they were wrong, St. Paul cannot be right. The only thing which really does create any difficulty in my mind, is, that Commentators with spiritual discernment, and appreciation of such a man as our Apostle, should content themselves with quietly casting aside his Scripture interpretation wherever, as here, it passes their comprehension. On their own view of him, it would be at least worth while to consider whether his knowledge of his own Scriptures may not have surpassed ours. But to those who believe that he had the Spirit of God, this passage speaks very solemnly; and I quite agree with Mr. Conybeare in his note on this place, “The lesson to be drawn from this whole passage, as regards the Christian use of the O.T., is of an importance which can scarcely be overrated.” Of course no one, who reads, marks, learns, and inwardly digests the Scriptures, can subscribe to the shallow and indolent dictum of Macknight, ‘This is to be laid down as a fixed rule, that no ancient history is to be considered as allegorical, but that which inspired persons have interpreted allegorically: but at the same time, in allegorizing Scripture, he will take care to follow the analogy of the faith, and proceed soberly, and in dependence on that Holy Spirit, who alone can put us in possession of His own mind, in His word.’ Calvin’s remarks here are good: “As then the family of Abraham was the true Church, so it is beyond doubt that the chief and most memorable events which happened in it, are so many types to us. As there was allegory in circumcision, in sacrifices, in the whole Levitical priest-hood: as there is now in our sacraments,—so, I say, was there then in the family of Abraham. But that is no reason why we should give up the literal sense. It amounts to the same as if Paul said that a figure of the two Testaments in the two wives of Abraham, and of the two people in his two sons, is, as if in a picture, set forth to us.” Not the bare literal historical fact is in question here, but the inner character of God’s dealings with men, of which type, and prophecy, and the historical fact itself, are only so many exemplifications. The difference between the children of the bond-and the free, of the law and the promise, has been shewn out to the world before, by, and since the covenant of the law): for these women (the mothers are the covenants,—the sons, the children of the covenants) are (import in the allegory) two covenants (not ‘revelations,’ but literally covenants between God and men); one (covenant) (indeed) from Mount Sinai (taking its origin from,—or having Mount Sinai as its centre), gendering (bringing forth children: compare the expression, Ye are the children (sons)... of the covenant, Acts iii. 25) unto (with a view to) bondage, which one is (identical in the allegory with) Hagar.

25.] For the word Hagar is (imports) Mount Sinai, in Arabia (i. e. among the Arabians. This rendering, which is Chrysostom’s—“Mount Sinai is called ‘Hagar’ in their vernacular tongue,”—is I conceive necessitated by the arrangement of the sentence us well as by the expression here, “the word Hagar,” not Hagar herself. Testimony has been adduced that the Arabs to this day call Mount Sinai Hadschar: and Chrysostom’s evidence is decisive for his own time. Certainly we have Hagar as a geographical proper name in Arabia Petreæ: the Chal-dee paraphrast always calls the wilderness of Shur Hagra. So that Jowett certainly speaks too strongly when he says, “the old explanations, that Hagar is the Arabic word for a rock or the Arabic noun for Mount Sinai, are destitute of foundation.” As to the improbability at which he hints, of St. Paul quoting Arabic words in writing to the Galatians, we may well suppose St. Paul to have become familiarized, during his sojourn there, with this name for the granite peaks of Sinai), and corresponds (viz. Hagar, which is the subject, not Mount Sinai, see below) with the present Jerusalem (i. e. Jerusalem under the law,—the Jerusalem of the Jews, as contrasted with the Jerusalem of the Messiah’s King-dom), for she (the present Jerusalem, not Hagar) is in slavery with her children.

26.] But (opposes to the last sentence) the Jerusalem above (i. e. the heavenly Jerusalem, the new Jerusalem, Heb. xii. 22. Rev. iii. 12; xxi. 2. The expression here will mean, “the Messianic theocracy, which before the coming of Christ, is the Church, and after it Christ’s Kingdom of glory.” Meyer) is free, which (which said city, which heavenly Jerusalem) is our mother (the emphasis is not on our; nay rather it stands in the least emphatic place, as indicating a relation taken for granted by Christians. See Phil. iii. 20).

27.] Proof of this relation from prophecy. The portion of Isaiah from which this is taken, is directly Messianic: indicating in its foreground the reviviscence of Israel after calamity, but in language far surpassing that event. The citation is from the Septuagint version, verbatim. St. Paul here interprets the barren of Sarah, who bore not according to the flesh (representing the promise), and the fruitful, of Hagar (representing the Law). In the next clause we must not render, as A.V., “many more&c.,” which is inaccurate: but, many are the children of the desolate, more than (rather than; both being numerous, hers are the more numerous) of her, &c.

28.] Now ye (or, we), brethren, like Isaac, are children of PROMISE (emphatic:—are children, not according to the flesh, but by the promise, see ver. 23, and below, ver. 29).

29.] he that was born after the flesh, see ver. 23. It has been thought that there is nothing in the Hebrew text to justify so strong a word as persecuted. It runs, ‘and Sarah saw the son of Hagar mocking’—the Septuagint has, ‘sporting with her son Isaac.’ The Hebrew word is the same as that used when Lot seemed as one that “mocked” to his sons-in-law, Gen. xix. 14. And this would be quite ground enough for the word here, for the spirit of persecution was begun. So that we need not refer to tradition, as many have done, to account for St. Paul’s expression.

him [that was born] after the Spirit, i.e. in virtue of the promise, which was given by the Spirit. Or, ‘by virtue of the Spirit’s agency.’ but the other is better.

30.] Nevertheless: notwithstanding the fact of the persecution, just mentioned. The quotation is adapted from the Septuagint, where my son Isaac (as in our English text) stands for “the son of the freewoman.” We need hardly have recourse to the fact that God confirmed Sarah’s words, in order to prove this to be Scripture: the Apostle is allegorizing the whole history, and thus every part of it assumes a significance in the allegory.

31.] I am inclined to think, against Meyer, and others, that this verse is, as commonly taken, the conclusion from what has gone before: and that the wherefore is bound on to the word inherit preceding. For that we are heirs, is an acknowledged fact, established before, ch. iii. 29; ver. 7. And if we are, we are not the children of the handmaid, of whom it was said that they should not inherit, but of the freewoman, of whose son the same words asserted that he should inherit.

Galatians: Chapter 5

V. 1–12.] This may be called the peroration of the whole second part of the Epistle. It consists of earnest exhortation to them, grounded on the conclusion of the foregoing argument, to abide in their evangelical liberty, and warning against being led away by the false teachers.

1.] With liberty did Christ make us free (i. e. free men is our rightful name and ought to be our estimation of ourselves, seeing that freedom is our inheritance by virtue of Christ’s redemption of us). Stand fast, therefore, and be not again (see note on ch. iv. 9: in fact, the whole world was under the law in the sense of its being God’s only revelation to man) involved in the yoke of bondage.

2.] Behold (it draws attention to what follows, as a strong statement).

I Paul] Calvin says well, “This way of speaking has great emphasis: he puts himself plainly in opposition, and gives his name, that the matter may admit of no doubt. And although his authority had been disparaged. among the Galatians, yet he again asserts it as sufficient to refute all his adversaries.”—The present, in the original, implies the continuance of a habit, q.d. if you will go on being circumcised. He does not say, ‘if you shall have been circumcised.’ Chrysostom remarks, “He that allowed himself to be circumcised did it as fearing the law, and he that thus feared, distrusted the power of grace, and he that distrusts gains nothing from that which he distrusts.” Nothing can be more directly opposed than this verse to the saying of the Judaizers, Acts xv. 1. The exception to the rule in St. Paul’s own conduct, Acts xvi. 3, is sufficiently provided for by the present tense here: see above.

3.] Yea, or moreover, introduces an addition, and a slight contrast—‘not only will Christ not profit.... but....’

to every man who receives circumcision,—‘submits to be circumcised.’—The emphasis is on every man, substantiating, and carrying further, the last verse.

the whole has the stress. The circumcised man became a ‘proselyte of righteousness,’ and bound to keep the whole law. “This true and serious consequence of circumcision the false Apostles had probably at least dissembled.” Meyer.

4.] explains and establishes still further the assertion of ver. 2.—Ye were annihilated from Christ (literally), ye who are being justified (‘endeavouring to be justified,’ ‘seeking justification:’ such is the force of the original word) in (not ‘by:’ it is the element in which, as in the expression “in the Lord”) the law; ye fell from grace.

5.] Proof (hence for) of their having fallen from grace, by a contrary statement of the condition and hope of Christians.

the hope of righteousness] Is this genitive objective, the hope of righteousness, i.e. the hope whose object is perfect righteousness,—or subjective, the hope of righteousness, i.e. the hope which the righteous entertain—viz. that of eternal life? Certainly I think the former:—‘Ye think ye have your righteousness in the law: we, on the contrary, anxiously wait for the hope of righteousness (full and perfect).’

6.] Confirmation of the words by faith, ver. 5.

in Christ, as an element in union with Christ, in the state of a Christian:—in Christ, and that Christ, Jesus of Nazareth.—As parallels to our passage, see Rom. xiv. 17; 1 Cor. vii. 19.

7-12.] He laments their deflexion from their once promising course, and denounces severely their perverters.

7.] Ye were running well (“that is, all your matters were in a prosperous state,—you were advancing right onward to eternal life, which was promised you by the Word.” Luther); who (see ch. iii. 1: the question expresses astonishment) hindered you that ye should not (so literally: the not obeying being the result of the hindrance) obey the truth (i. e. submit yourselves to the true Gospel of Christ)?

8.] The persuasion (to which you are yielding—active) cometh not from (does not spring from, is not originated by) Him that calleth you (i. e. God: see ch. i. 6 and note).

9.] leaven may allude either to men, or to doctrine. In the parallel place in 1 Cor. v. 6, it is moral influence; so also where our Lord uses the same figure, Matt. leaven means doctrine. Nor can there be any objection to taking it as abstract, and “lump” concrete: a little false doctrine corrupts the whole mass (of Christians).

10.] “After the warning of vv. 8, 9, Paul assures his readers that he has confidence in them, but that their perverters shall not escape punishment. An instance of the policy which divides for the sake of ruling.” Meyer.

I, emphatic, I, for my part; ‘as far as regards me....’

On in the Lord, see 2 Thess. iii. 4: it is the element or sphere in which is employed.

that ye will be of no other mind than this, viz. which I enjoin on you,—not in vv. 8, 9 only, but in this Epistle, and in his preaching generally.

he that troubleth you need not be interpreted as referring necessarily to any one conspicuous among the Judaizers, but simply as individualizing the warning, and carrying home the denunciation to each one’s heart among the perverters. Compare “they which unsettle you” below, and ch. i. 75 iv. 17.

his judgment;—i. e. the sentence, understood to be unfavourable, is a burden laid on the judged person, which he bears. The words whosoever he be generalize the declaration to the fullest extent: see ch. i. 8, 9.

11.] The connexion appears to be this: the Apostle had apparently been charged with being a favourer of circumcision in other churches; as shewn e.g. by his having circumcised Timothy. After the preceding sharp denunciation of “him that troubleth you,” and “whosoever he be,” it is open to the adversaries to say, that Paul himself was one of their troublers, by his inconsistency. In the abruptness then of his fervid thoughts he breaks out in this self-defence.

I, emphatic as before, is best understood as referring, not to any change in his preaching as an Apostle (for he appears always to have been of the same mind, and certainly was from the first persecuted by the Jews), but to the change since his conversion, before which he was a strenuous upholder of Judaism. It has been objected to this that the word preach could not be used at that period. But this (even if it be necessary to press the preaching so far into matter of fact) cannot be said with any certainty:—the course of Saul as a zealot may have often led him even to preach, if not circumcision in its present debated position, yet that strict Judaism of which it formed a part.

why am I still persecuted?] still is logical, i.e., what further excuse is there for my being (as I am) persecuted (by the Jews)?—For, if this is so, if I still preach circumcision, then is brought to nought, is done away, the OFFENCE (this word has the emphasis) of the cross—because, if circumcision, and not faith in Christ crucified, be the condition of salvation, then the cross has lost its offensive character to the Jew: ‘For not even the cross did so much scandalize the Jews, as the having to leave off obeying the fathers’ laws. For when they brought up Stephen, they did not allege against him that he worshipped Him who had been crucified, but that he spoke against the law and the holy place.’ Chrysostom.

12.] The verse introduces a climax—I would that they who are unsettling you would even.... As to the verb which follows, (1) it cannot be passive, as A.V., ‘were even cut of.’ (2) It can hardly mean ‘would cut themselves off from your communion,’ as the even is against so mild a wish, besides that this sense of the word is unexampled. (3) The only admissible sense of the word is one carrying harshness, and more, to our ears; viz. amputation. And (4) such a meaning of the word is that in which (agreeably to its primitive classical sense, of hewing off limbs) it is used by the Septuagint translators in Deut. xxiii. 1, and by other authors. It seems to me that this sense must be adopted, in spite of the protests raised against it. And so Chrysostom and the great consensus of ancient and modern Commentators: and, as Jowett very properly observes, “the common interpretation of the Fathers, confirmed by the use of language in the Septuagint version, is not to be rejected only because it is displeasing to the delicacy of modern times.”

13—CH. VI. 5.] THE THIRD or HORTATORY PORTION OF THE EPISTLE, not however separated from the former, but united to it by the current of thought:—and

13—15.] Though free, be one another's servants in love.

13.] For gives the reason why the Apostle was so fervent in his denunciation of these disturbers; because they were striking at the very root of their Christian calling, which was unto (or, on condition of) freedom. Only (make not) your liberty into (or, use it not for) an occasion (opportunity) for the flesh (for giving way to carnal passions), but by means of (your) love be in bondage (so literally: the word is used in opposition to freedom) to one another. Chrysostom remarks, “Here again he hints, that strife, and faction, and the love of rule, and vanity, has been to them the cause of this error: for the desire of rule is the mother of heresies.”

14.] See Rom. xiii. 8, 9.—“The question, how the Apostle can rightly say of the whole law, that it is fulfilled by loving one’s neighbour, must not be answered by understanding the law of the Christian law, or of the moral law only, or of the second table of the decalogue, or of every divinely revealed law in general;—for the whole law cannot, from the circumstances of the whole Epistle, mean any thing but ‘the whole law of Moses;’—but by placing ourselves on the lofty spiritual level from which St. Paul looked down, and saw all other commands of the Jaw so far subordinated to the law of love, that whoever had fulfilled this command, must be treated as having fulfilled the whole.” Meyer: who also remarks that thy neighbour applies to fellow-Christians; compare one another below. 15.] one another has both times the emphasis. Chrysostom says, “He has chosen his words with descriptive purpose. For he says not only ye bite, which is the act, of a man enraged, but also ye devour, which belongs to one persisting in his crime. He that bites gives way to a paroxysm of anger: but he that devours, gives example of the fiercest brutality. And he is speaking of bites and devourings which are not corporeal, but far more savage. For he is not so noxious who eats human flesh, as he who fixes his bites on the soul: for by how much the soul is more precious than the body, by so much more savage is the wounding it.” The literal sense must be kept,—consumed (by one another),—your spiritual life altogether annihilated: “for dissension and strife is corruptive both of the defenders and of the aggressors, and eats out every thing worse than the moth.” Chrysostom. 16—26.] Exhortation to a spiritual life, and warning against the works of the flesh.

16.] But I say refers to ver. 13—repeating, and explaining it: ‘What I mean, is this.’

by the Spirit] The Spirit is not man’s ‘spiritual part,’ nor do the words mean ‘after a spiritual manner;’ it is (as in ver. 5) the Holy Spirit of God: this will be clear on comparing with our vv. 16–18, the more expanded parallel passage, Rom. vii. 22—viii. 11.

ye shall not fulfil] i.e. the Spirit and the flesh exclude one another.

the flesh] the natural man:—that whole state of being in the flesh, out of which spring the practices and thoughts of ver. 19.

17.] Substantiation of the preceding,—that if ye walk by the Spirit, ye shall not fulfil the lusts of the flesh. —The second for gives a reason for the continual lusting of these two against one another: viz., that they are opposites.

that ye may not] not, as A.V., “so that ye cannot.” The purpose of this strife is, on the part of the Spirit, to keep you from doing the things of the flesh, and vice versa: your own desires being, in each case, set aside by the combatants. See this verse expanded in Rom. vii. viii. as above: in vii. 20 we have nearly the same words, and the same construction. It is true that the will there is alleged only on one side, the better will, striving after good: whereas here it must be taken in both senses, for ‘will’ in general, to whichever way inclined. So that our verse requires expansion, both in the direction of Rom. vii. 15–20,—and in the other direction, “for the evil that I desire (after the natural man) I do not: but the good that I desire not, that I do,”—to make it logically complete.

18.] By this verse, the last assertion respecting the flesh and the Spirit is interwoven into the general argument, thus (cf. ver. 23): the law is made for the flesh, and the works of the flesh: the Spirit and flesh are opposites: but if ye are led by (see Rom. ref., “As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are sons of God”) the Spirit, ye are not under the law. This he proceeds to substantiate, by specifying the works of the flesh and of the Spirit.

19.] manifest (emphatic), plain to all, not needing, like the more hidden fruits of the Spirit, to be educed and specified: and therefore more clearly amenable to law, which takes cognizance of things open and manifest. The word rendered wantonness is defined by the Greek writers as meaning ‘readiness for any pleasurable indulgence.’ It does not necessarily include ‘lasciviousness.’

20.] The word rendered sorcery may also mean ‘poisoning.’ But the former is preferable, as more frequently its sense in the Septuagint and New Test., and because Asia was particularly addicted to sorceries (Acts xix. 19).

jealousy (in bad sense)—ref.

wrath] passionate outbreaks.

self-seeking] not ‘strife,’ as A.V. and commonly, in error: see note on Rom. ii. 8,—but unworthy compassings of selfish ends.

divisions seems to lead to heresies, or parties, composed of those who have chosen (such is the derivation of the word) their self-willed line and adhere to it. 21.] I forewarn you (now), and did forewarn you (when I was with you): the fore-in both cases pointing on to the great day of retribution.

22.] the fruit not the works, of the Spirit. The works of the flesh are no fruit, see Rom. vi. 21. These are the only real fruit of men: see John xv. 1–8: compare also John iii. 20, note. They are, or are manifested in, works: but they are much more: whereas those others are nothing more, as to any abiding result for good.

love—at the head, as chief—1 Cor. xiii. See Rom. xii. 9. We must not seek for a detailed logical opposition in the two lists, which would be quite alien from the fervid style of St. Paul.

faith, in the widest sense: faith, towards God and man: of love it is said, 1 Cor. xiii. 7, “it believeth all things.”

23.] meekness,—again, towards God and man: and temperance,—the holding-in of the lusts and desires. This verse (see above on ver. 18) substantiates “ye are not under the law”—for if you are led by the Spirit, these are its fruits in you, and against these the law has nothing to say: see 1 Tim. i. 9, 10.

24.] Further confirmation of this last result, and transition to the exhortations of vv. 25, 26. But (contrast, the one universal choice of Christians, in distinction from the two catalogues) they who are Jesus Christ’s, crucified (when they became Christ’s,—at their baptism, see Rom. vi. 2: not so well, ‘have crucified,’ as A.V.) the flesh with its passions and its desires,—and therefore are entirely severed from and dead to the law, which is for the fleshly, and those passions and desires—on which last he founds,—

25.] If (no connecting particle—giving more vividness to the inference) WE LIVE (emphatic—if, as we saw, having slain the flesh, our life depends on the Spirit) by the Spirit, by the Spirit (emphatic) let us also walk (in our conduct in life: let our practical walk, which is led by choice of our own, be in harmony with that higher life in which we live before God by faith, and in the Spirit).

26.] connected with “let us walk” above, by the first person,—and with ch. vi. 1, by the sense; and so forming a transition to the admonitions which follow.

Let us not become—a mild, and at the same time a solemn method of warning. For while it seems to concede that they were not this as yet, it assumes that the process was going on which would speedily make them so. ‘Let us not be,’ of the A.V., misses this.

vainglorious would include all worldly honour, as not an object for the Christian to seek. 1 Cor. i. 31; 2 Cor. x. 17.

“envying is the correlative act on the part, of the weak, to the provoking on the part of the strong. The strong vauntingly challenged their weaker brethren: they could only reply with envy.” Ellicott.—These words are addressed to all the Galatians:—the danger was common to both parties, the obedient and disobedient, the orthodox and the Judaizers.

Galatians: Chapter 6

VI. 1–5.] Exhortation to forbearance and humility.—Brethren (bespeaks their attention by a friendly address; marking also the opening of a new subject, connected however with the foregoing: see above), if a man be even surprised (surprised has the emphasis, on account of the even). This makes it necessary to assign a meaning to it which shall justify its emphatic position. The only meaning which satisfies the emphasis is that of being caught in the fact, before he can escape) in any transgression, do ye, the spiritual ones (said not in irony, but bonâ fide: referring not to the clergy only, but to every believer), restore such a person (see especially 1 Cor. v. 5, 11) in the spirit of meekness (“the word spirit here seems immediately to refer to the state of the inward spirit as wrought upon by the Holy Spirit, and ultimately to the Holy Spirit, as the inworking power. See Rom. i. 4, viii. 15; 2 Cor. iv. 13; Eph. i. 17: in all of which cases the word seems to indicate the Holy Spirit.” Ellicott); looking to thyself (thus the individual is selected from a multitude previously addressed), lest thou also be tempted (on a similar occasion).

2.] one another’s is in the original prefixed, and emphatic, and has not been enough attended to. You want to become disciples of that Law which imposes heavy burdens on men: if you will bear burdens, bear ONE ANOTHER’ S burdens, and thus fulfil (by this act fulfil) the law of Christ,—a far higher and better law, whose only burden is love. As to the burdens, the more general the meaning we give to the word, the better it will accord with the sense of the command. The matter mentioned in the last verse led on to this: but this grasps far wider, extending to all the burdens which we can, by help and sympathy, bear for one another. There are some which we cannot: see below.

3.] The chief hindrance to sympathy with the burdens of others, is self-conceit: that must be got rid of.

4.] The test applied: emphasis on work, which is the complex, the whole practical result of his life.

prove] i.e. put to the trial, and then (after he has done this) he will have his matter of boasting, that whereof to boast (not without a slight irony,—whatever matter of boasting he finds, after such a testing, will be) in reference to himself alone, and not in reference to the other (or, his neighbour—the man with whom he was comparing himself: general in its meaning, but particular in each case of comparison).

5.] And this is the more advisable, because in the nature of things, each man’s own load (of infirmities and imperfections and sins: not of ‘responsibility,’ which is alien from the context) will (in ordinary life: not ‘at the last day,’ which is here irrelevant, and would surely have been otherwise expressed: the shall bear must correspond with the command “bear ye” above, and be a taking up and carrying, not an ultimate bearing the consequences of) come upon himself to bear.

burden here, hardly with any allusion to ‘Æsop’s well-known fable,’ but the load imposed on each by his own fault. The word in the Greek here, is different from that used in ver. 2. That signifies rather a burden imposed by a grievance, which we can lighten for one another: this, as above, the load which each accumulates for himself.

6–10.] Exhortation (in pursuance of the command in ver. 2, see below), to liberality towards their teachers, and to beneficence in general.

6.] But is used, as bringing out a contrast to the individuality of the last verse.

the word, in its very usual sense of the Gospel,—the word of life.

share with is most probably the meaning, and not “communicate unto,” as there does not appear to be an instance of the transitive use in the New Test. But the two senses come nearly to the same: he who shares in the necessities of the saints, can only do so by making that necessity partly his own, i.e. by depriving himself to that extent, and communicating to them.

in all good things: the things of this life mainly, as the context shews. Nor does this meaning produce any break between vv. 5 and 6, and 6 and 7. From the mention of bearing one another’s burdens, he naturally passes to one way, and one case, in which those burdens may be borne—viz. by relieving the necessities of their ministers; and then,

7.] Regarding our good deeds done for Christ as a seed sown for eternity, he warns them not to be deceived: in this, as in other seed-times, God’s order of things cannot be set at nought: whatever we sow, that same shall we reap.

God is not mocked:—though men in their own minds mock God, this mocking has no objective existence: there is no such thing as mocking of God in reality.

for: i.e. ‘and in this it will be shewn.’

that (emphatic, that and nothing else) shall he also (by the same rule) reap, viz. eventually, at the great harvest. The final judgment is necessarily now introduced by the similitude (“the harvest... is the end of the world,” Matt. xiii. 39), but does not any the more belong to the context in ver. 5.

8.] For—i. e. and this will be an example of the universal rule. he that (now) soweth,—is now sowing.

unto,—with a view to.

corruption—because the flesh is a prey to corruption, and with it all fleshly desires and practices come to nothing: see 1 Cor. vi. 13; xv. 50:—or perhaps in the stronger sense of corruption (see 1 Cor. iii. 17; 2 Pet. ii. 12), destruction.

of the Spirit] See Rom. viii. 11, 15–17.

9.] But (in our case, let there be no chance of the alternative) in well doing (stress on well) let us not be faint-hearted: for in due season (an expression otherwise confined to the pastoral Epistles, see Introduction to those Epistles, §1. 32, and note) we shall reap, if we faint not.

10.] as—not meaning, ‘while,’ nor, ‘according as,’ nor, ‘since,’ causal,—but in proportion as: let our beneficence be in proportion to our season—let the seed-time have its own season, as well as the harvest, ver. 9.

them who belong to the faith: there does not seem in the original word to be any allusion to a household, as in A.V.

11—end.] POSTSCRIPT AND BENEDICTION.

11.] See in how large letters (in what great and apparently unsightly characters: see note on next verse. ‘The original will not bear the rendering how large a letter, as A.V.) I have written (not referring to the following verses only, but to the whole Epistle, see below) unto you with my own hand. I do not see how it is possible to avoid the inference that these words apply to the whole Epistle. If they had reference only to the passage in which they occur, would not “am writing” have been used, as in 2 Thess. iii. 17? Again, there is no break in style here, indicating the end of the dictated portion, and the beginning of the written, as in Rom. xvi. 25; 2 Thess. iii. 17 al. I should rather believe, that on account of the peculiar character of this Epistle, St. Paul wrote it all with his own hand,—as he did the pastoral Epistles: and I find confirmation of this, in the partial resemblance of its style to those Epistles. (See Introduction, as above on ver. 9.) And he wrote it, whether from weakness of his eyes, or from choice, in large characters.

12.] As my Epistle, so my practice: I have no desire to make a fair show outwardly: my letters are not fair of show: and I have no sympathy with these people who wish to make a fair show in the flesh. The term imports not merely ‘in the flesh,’ but in outward things, which belong to man’s natural state: see ch. v. 19.

constrain you] are compelling you:—go about to compel you.

13.] For (proof that they wish only to escape persecution) not even they who are being circumcised (who are the adopters and instigators of circumcision) themselves keep the law (the law, emphatic: the words contain a matter of fact, not known to us otherwise,—that these preachers of legal conformity extended it not to the whole law, but selected from it at their own caprice); but wish you (emphatic) to be circumcised, that in your (your is emphatic) flesh they may make their boast (by being able to allege you as their disciples. In this way they escaped the scandal of the Cross at the hands of the Jews, by making in fact their Christian converts into Jewish proselytes).

14.] But (literally) to me let it not happen (so literally: see note on Rom. vi. 2) to boast, except in the Cross (the atoning death, as my means of reconciliation with God) of our Lord Jesus Christ (the full name for solemnity, and our prefixed, to involve his readers in the duty of the same abjuration), by means of whom (not so well, ‘of which’ [the cross], as many Commentators; the greater antecedent, “our Lord Jesus Christ,” coming after the “cross,” has thrown it into the shade. Besides, it could hardly be said of the Cross, “by means of which,” or, “through which”) the world (the whole system of unspiritual and unchristian men and things) hath been (and is) crucified (not merely ‘dead:’ he chooses, in relation to the cross above, this stronger word, which at once brings in his union with the death of Christ, besides his relation to the world) unto me and I unto the world: i.e. each holds the other to be dead.

15.] See ch. v. 6. Confirmation of last verse: so far are such things from me as a ground of boasting, that they are nothing: the new birth by the Spirit is all in all. a new creature] literally (see note on 2 Cor. v. 17), creation: and therefore the result, as regards an individual, is, that he is a new creature: so that the word comes to be used in both significations.

16.] And as many (reference to the “as many” of ver. 12) as shall walk by this rule (of ver. 15. The word means a ‘straight rule,’ to detect crookedness: hence a rule of life), peace be (not ‘is:’ it is the apostolic blessing, so common in the beginnings of his Epistles: see also Eph. vi. 23) upon them (come on them from God), and (and indeed) upon the Israel of God (the subject of the whole Epistle seems to have given rise to this expression. Not the Israel after the flesh, among whom these teachers wish to enrol you, are blessed: but the ISRAEL OF GOD, described ch. iii. 28, 29. Jowett compares, though not exactly parallel, yet for a similar apparent though not actual distinction, 1 Cor. x. 32).

17. trouble me] How? by rebellious conduct and denying his apostolic authority, seeing that it was stamped with so powerful a seal as he proceeds to state.

for I] (emphatic) for it is I (not the Judaizing teachers) who carry (perhaps as in ver. 5, and ch. v. 10,—bear, as a burden: but Chrysostom’s idea seems more adapted to the triumphant character of the sentence: “He saith not, ‘I have,’ but ‘I bear, as one who is proud of trophies or royal standards’”) in (on) my body the marks of Jesus. The word used, stigmata, implies, the marks branded on slaves to indicate their owners. These marks, in St. Paul’s case, were of course the scars of his wounds received in the service of his Master—cf. 2 Cor. xi. 23 ff.

of Jesus is the genitive of possession: Jesus’s marks, shewing that I belong to Him. There is no allusion whatever to any similarity between himself and our Lord, ‘the marks which Jesus bore:’ such an allusion would be quite irrelevant: and with its irrelevancy falls a whole fabric of disgusting Romanist superstition which has been raised on this verse, and which the fair and learned Windischmann, giving as he does the honest interpretation here, yet attempts to defend in a supplemental note.— Neither can we naturally suppose any comparison intended between these his “stigmata” as Christ’s servant, and circumcision: for he is not now on that subject, but on his authority as sealed by Christ: and such a comparison is alien from the majesty of the sentence.

18.] THE APOSTOLIC BLESSING. No special intention need be suspected in the words with your spirit (as Chrysostom does, saying, “He thus dissuades them from fleshly reliance”), seeing that the same expression occurs at the end of other Epistles: see Phil. iv. 28; Philem. 25; 2 Tim. iv. 22. I should rather regard it as a deep expression of his Christian love, which is further carried on by brethren, the last word,—parting from them, after an Epistle of such rebuke and warning, in the fulness of brotherhood in Christ.

THE EPISTLE OF PAUL THE APOSTLE TO THE EPHESIANS

Ephesians: Chapter 1

CHAP. I. 1, 2.] ADDRESS AND GREETING.

1. through the will of God] See on 1 Cor. i. 1, As these words there have a special reference, and the corresponding ones in Gal. i. 1 also, so it is natural to suppose that here he has in his mind, hardly perhaps the especial subject of vv. 3–11, the will of the Father as the ground of the election of the church, but, which is more likely in a general introduction to the whole Epistle, the great subject of which he is about to treat, and himself as the authorized expositor of it.

to the saints which are in Ephesus] On this, and on Ephesus, see Introduction. If the words “in Ephesus” are omitted, the sentence must be read to the saints, who are also faithful in Christ Jesus. The word saints is used here in its widest sense, as designating the members of Christ’s visible church, presumed to fulfil the conditions of that membership: see especially ch. v. 3. These words follow rather unusually, separated from the saints by the designation of abode: a circumstance which might seem to strengthen the suspicion against the words “in Ephesus,” were not such transpositions by no means unexampled in St. Paul. See the regular order in Col. i. 2.

in Christ Jesus belongs only to the faithful: see Col. i. 2: faithful, i.e. believers (persons who are), in Christ Jesus. This, in its highest sense, not mere truth, or faithfulness, is imported. The saints and faithful denote their spiritual life from its two sides—that of God who calls and sanctifies,—that of themselves who believe. Stier remarks that by the specification, “faithful in Christ Jesus,” “saints” gets its only full and New Test. meaning. He also notices in these expressions already a trace of the two great divisions of the Epistle—God’s grace towards us, and our faith towards Him,

2.] On the form of greeting, compare Rom. i. 7; 1 Cor. i. 3; 2 Cor. i. 2; Gal. i. 3, &c.

3—III. 21.] FIRST PORTION OF THE EPISTLE: THE DOCTRINE OF THE CHURCH OF CHRIST.

And herein,
I. 3–23.] GROUND AND ORIGIN OF THE CHURCH, IN THE FATHER’s COUNSEL, AND His ACT IN CHRIST, BY THE SPIRIT. And herein again, (A) the preliminary IDEA OF THE CHURCH, set forth in the form of an ascription of praise vv. 3–14:—thus arranged:—vv. 3–6] The FATHER, in His eternal Love, has chosen us to holiness (ver. 4),—ordained us to sonship (ver. 5),—bestowed grace on us in the Beloved (ver. 6):—vv. 7–12] In the SON, we have,—redemption according to the riches of His grace (ver. 7), knowledge of the mystery of His will (vv. 8, 9),—inheritance under Him the one Head (vv. 10–12):—vv. 13, 14] through the SPIRIT we are sealed,—by hearing the word of salvation (ver. 13),—by receiving the earnest of our inheritance (ver. 14),—to the redemption of the purchased possession (ib.).

3.] Blessed (see note on Rom. ix, 5: and a similar doxology, 2 Cor. i. 3. Almost all St. Paul’s Epistles begin with some ascription of praise. That to Titus is the only exception [not Gal.: see Gal. i. 5]. See also 1 Pet. i. 3) be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ (see Rom. xv. 6; 2 Cor. i. 3; xi. 31; Col. i. 3—also 1 Cor. xv. 24, Such is the simplest and most forcible sense of the words—Theophylact says, “God and Father of one and the same Christ: God, as of Christ in the flesh; Father, as of God the Word.” See John xx. 17, from which saying of our Lord it is not improbable that the ex-expression took its rise), who blessed (not, as A.V., ‘hath blessed:’ the historical fact in the counsels of the Father being thought of throughout the sentence. “Blessed”—“who blesse d”—“blessin g”—such was the ground-tone of the new covenant. As in creation God blessed them, saying, “Be fruitful and multiply,”—so in redemption,—at the introduction of the covenant, “All families of the earth shall be BLESSED,”—at its completion,—“Come ye BLESSED of my Father.”—But God’s blessing is in facts—ours in words only) us (whom? not the Apostle only: nor St. Paul and his fellow-Apostles:—but, ALL CHRISTIANS—all the members of Christ. The “ye also” of ver. 13 perfectly agrees with this: see there: but the “I also” of ver. 15 does not agree with the other views) in (better than “with:” see below: it is instrumental or medial: the element in which, and means by which, the blessing is imparted) all (i. e. all possible—all, exhaustive, in all richness and fulness of blessing: see ver. 23 note) spiritual blessing (i. e. blessing of the Spirit: as we sometimes understand spiritual, not merely, ‘inward blessing?’ the word in the New Test. always implies the working of the Holy Spirit, never bearing merely our modern inaccurate sense of spiritual as opposed to bodily. See 1 Cor. ix. 11, which has been thus misunderstood) in the heavenly place s (so the expression, which occurs five times in this Epistle, and nowhere else, can only mean; see ver. 20. It is not probable that St. Paul should have chosen an unusual ex-expression for the purposes of this Epistle, and then used it in several different senses. But what is the sense? Our country, place of citizenship, is in heaven, Phil. iii. 20: there our High Priest stands, blessing us. There are our treasures, Matt. vi. 20, 21, and our affections to be, Col. iii. 1 ff.: there our hope is laid up, Col. i. 5: our inheritance is reserved for us, 1 Pet. i. 4. And there, in that place, and belonging to that state, is the blessing, the gift of the Spirit, Heb. vi. 4, poured out on those who mind the things above. Materially, we are yet in the body: but in the Spirit, we are in heaven—only waiting for the redemption of the body to be entirely and literally there) in Christ (“the threefold in after ‘who blessed,’ has a meaning ever deeper and more precise: and should therefore be kept in translating. The blessing with which God has blessed us, consists and expands itself—in all blessing of the Spirit—then brings in Heaven, the heavenly state in us, and us in it—then finally, CHRIST, personally, He Himself, who is set and exalted into Heaven, comes by the Spirit down into us, so that He is in us and we in Him of a truth, and thereby, and in so far, we are with Him in heaven.” Stier):

4.] even as (this explains and expands the foregoing—shewing wherein the blessing consists as regards us, and God’s working towards us. Notice, that whereas ver. 3 has summarily included in the work of blessing the Three Persons, the FATHER bestowing the SPIRIT in CHRIST,—now the threefold cord, so to speak, is un wrapped, and the part of each divine Person separately described: see the argument above) He chose us (se lected, rather than e lected, it is a choosing out of the world, and for Himself. The word is an Old Test. word, and refers to the spiritual Israel, as it did to God’s elect Israel of old. But there is no contrast between their election and ours: it has been but one election throughout—an election in Christ, and to holiness on God’s side—and involving accession to God’s people on ours) in Him (i. e. in Christ, as the second Adam [2 Cor. xv. 22], the righteous Head of our race. In Him, in one wide sense, were all mankind elected, inasmuch as He took their flesh and blood, and redeemed them, and represents them before the Father: but in the proper and final sense, this can be said only of His faithful ones, His Church, who are incorporated in Him by the Spirit. But in any sense, all God’s election is in HIM only) before the foundation of the world (this expression occurs only here in St. Paul. Stier remarks on the necessary connexion of the true doc-trines of creation and redemption: how utterly irreconcilable Pantheism is with this, God’s election, before laying the foundation of the world, of His people in His Son), that we should be (the Apostle seems to have Deut. vii. 6; xiv. 2, before his mind; in both which places the same sentiment, and form of sentence, occurs) holy and blameless (the positive and negative sides of the Christian character. This holiness and unblameableness must not be understood of that justification by faith by which the sinner stands accepted before God: it is distinctly put forth here [see also ch. v. 27] as an ultimate result as regards us, and refers to that sanctification which follows on justification by faith, and which is the will of God respecting us, 1 Thess. iv. 7) before Him (i. e. in the deepest verity of our being—thoroughly penetrated by the Spirit of holiness, bearing His searching eye, ch. v. 27: but at the same time implying an especial nearness to His presence and dear ness to Him—and bearing a foretaste of the time when the elect shall be before the throne of God, Rev. vii. 15. See Col. i. 22, note) in love (against the joining these last words with the following verse, “Having foreordained us in love, &c.,” see my Greek Test. The qualification, as here existing, is in the highest degree solemn and appropriate. Love, that which man lost at the Fall, but which God is, and to which God restores man by redemption, is the great element, in which, as in their abode and breathing-place, all Christian graces subsist, and in which, emphatically, all perfection before God must be found, And so, when the Apostle, ch. iv. 16, is describing the glorious building up of the body, the Church, he speaks of its increasing “to the building up of itself in Love.” And it is his prac-tice in this and the parallel Epistle, to add “in love” as the completion of the idea of Christian holiness—see ch. iii. 18; Col. ii. 2, also ch. iv. 25 v. 2):

5.] having foreordained (predestined) us (subordinate to the act of choosing mentioned above: see Rom. viii. 29, 30, where, the steps are thus laid down in succession;—“whom He foreknew, them He also predestined—whom He predestined, those He also called.” Now the choosing must answer in this rank to the foreknowing, and pre-cede the preordaining. Stier remarks well, “In God, indeed, all is one; but for our human way of speaking and treating, which is necessary to us, there follows on His first decree to adopt and to sanctify, the nearer decision, how and by what this shall be brought about, because it could only thus be brought about”) unto adoption (so that we should become His sons, in the blessed sense of being reconciled to Him and having a place in His spiritual family,—should have the remission of our sins, the pledge of the Spirit, the assurance of the inheritance) through Jesus Christ (THE SON of God, in and by whom, elementally and instrumentally, our adoption consists; com-pare Rom. viii. 29) unto Him (the Father: see Col. i. 20. For the Son could not be in this sentence the last term [the whole reference being to the work and purpose of the Father]. The question what is the meaning of this “unto Him,” is best answered by observing the general drift of the sentence. It seems evident that it must follow on the word “adoption,” and its import must be ‘to [into] Himself,’—i. e. so that we should be partakers of the divine nature: see 2 Pet. i. 4), according to (in pursuance of) the good pleasure of His will,

6.] to (with a view to, as the purpose of the predestination) the praise (by men and angels—all that can praise) of the glory of His grace (the end, God’s end, in our predestination to adoption, is, that the glory,—glorious nature, brightness and majesty, and kindliness and beauty,—of His grace might be an object of men and angels’ praise: both as it is in HIM, ineffable and infinite,—and exemplified in us, its objects; see below, ver. 12), which He freely bestowed upon us (not “He hat h....” The reference is to an act of God once past in Christ, not to an abiding state which He has brought about in us. This, as usual, has been almost universally overlooked, and the perfect, sense given), in (see above on “in Christ,” ver. 3. Christ is our head and including Representative) the Beloved (i. e. Christ:—the Son of His love, Col. i138. He is God’s Beloved above all others,—see Matt. iii. 17; John iii. 16; 1 John iv. 9–11).

7.] Now the Apostle passes, with In whom, to the consideration of the ground of the church in the SON (7–12): see the synopsis above. But the Father still continues the great subject of the whole;—only the reference is now to the Son.

In whom (see on “in Christ,” ver. 3—and compare Rom. iii. 24) we have (objective—‘there is for us’ But not without a subjective implied import, as spoken of those who truly have it—have laid hold of it: “are ever needing and ever having it,” Eadie) the (or, our) Redemption (from God’s wrath—or rather from that which brought us under God’s wrath, the guilt and power of sin, Matt. i. 21. The article expresses notoriety—‘of which we all know,’—‘of which the law testified, and the prophets spoke’) through (as the instrument:—a further fixing of the in whom, shewing in what manner in Him) His blood (which was the price paid for that redemption, Acts xx. 28; 1 Cor. vi. 20: both the ultimate climax of his obedience for us, Phil. ii. 8, and, which is most in view here,—the propitiation, in our nature, for the sin of the world, Rom. iii. 25; Col. 1. 20. It is a noteworthy observation of Harless here, that the choice of the word, the BLOOD of Christ, is of itself a testimony to the idea of expiation having been in the, writer’s mind. Not the death of the victim, but its BLOOD, was the typical instrument of expiation. And I may notice that in Phil. ii. 8, where Christ’s obedience, not His atonement, is spoken of, there is no mention of His shedding His Blood, only of the act of His Death), he remission (not ‘overlooking,’ see note on Rom. iii. 25) of (our) transgressions (explanation of the words, our Redemption: not to be limited, but extending to all riddance from the practice and consequences of our trans-gressions), according to the riches of His grace (this alone would prevent the word “remission” applying to merely the forgiveness of sins. We have in this grace not only redemption from misery and wrath, not only forgiveness,—but we find in it the liberty, the glory, the inheritance of the children of God,—the-crown of eternal life: compare 2 Cor. viii. 9);

8.] which He made to abound (the A.V. is wrong, ‘wherein He hath abounded’) forth to us in all (possible) wisdom and prudence (I would refer these words to God. See the opinion which refers them to us discussed in my Greek Test. It was in God’s manifold wisdom and prudence, manifested in all ways possible for us, that He poured out His grace upon us: and this wisdom and prudence was especially exemplified in that which follows, the notification to us of His hidden will, &c. In Col. i. 9, the reference is clearly different: see note there);

9.] having made known (‘in that He made known.’ This ‘making known’ is not merely the information of the understanding, but the revelation, in its fulness, to the heart) to us (not, the Apostles, but Christians in general, as throughout the passage) the mystery (reff. and Rom. xvi. 25. St. Paul ever represents the redemptive counsel of God as a mystery, i.e. a design hidden in His counsels, until revealed to mankind in and by Christ. So that his use of the word mystery has nothing in common, except, the facts of concealment and revelation, with the mysteries of the heathen world, nor with any secret tradition over and above the gospel as revealed in the Scriptures. All who vitally know that, i.e. all the Christian church, are the initiated: and all who have the word, read or preached, may vitally know it. Only the world without, the unbelieving, are the uninitiated) of (objective genitive, ‘the material of which mystery was, &c.’) His will (that which He purposed), according to His good pleasure (belongs to “having made known,” and specifies it: i.e. so that the revelation took place in a time and manner consonant to God’s eternal pleasure—viz. “unto the dispensation,” &c.) which He purposed in Himself (some render these last words, in him, i.e. in Christ, and they are referred to Christ by Chrys. and the ff., Anselm, Bengel, Luther, all. But this seems impossible, because the words “in Christ” are introduced with the proper name below, which certainly would not occur on the second mention after having said in him, with the same reference),

10.] unto (i. e. in order to, belongs to he purposed, not to “having made known.”) The A.V. takes this “unto” wrongly, as equivalent to “in,” by which the whole sense is confused. Hardly less confusing is the rendering of Calvin and others, until the time of the dispensation, &c., thereby introducing into the act of purposing the complex idea of decreed and laid up, instead of the simple one which the con-text requires) the economy (dispensation) of the fulness of the times (or, the fulfilment of the seasons). The mistake which has misled almost all the Commentators here, and which as far as I know Stier has been the only one to expose, has been that of taking the fulness of the times as a fixed date in the fact, and making it mean, the coming of Christ, as Gal. iv. 4,—whereas usage, and the sense, determine it to mean, the whole duration of the Gospel times; compare especially ch. ii. 7; 1 Cor. x. 11; and Luke xxi. 24; Acts i. 7; iii. 19, 21; 1 Tim. ii. 6. Thus the dispensation of the fulness of the times will mean, the filling up, completing, fulfilment, of the appointed seasons, carrying on during the Gospel dispensation. Now, belonging to, carried on during, this fulfilling of the periods or seasons, is the economy or dispensation here spoken of. And having regard to the derivation and usage of the word, it will mean, the giving forth of the Gospel under God’s providential arrangements. First and greatest of all, HE is the Steward or æconomus, of the dispensation: then, above all others, His divine Son: and as proceeding from the Father and the Son, the Holy Spirit—and then in subordinate degrees every one who is entrusted with carrying out the economy, i.e. all Christians, even to the lowest, as stewards of the manifold grace of God, 1 Pet. iv. 10. The genitive of times is one of belonging or appurtenance), to gather up (the infinitive belongs to and specifies what God’s good pleasure was. The verb, here as in the only other place in the New Test. where it occurs (Rom. xiii. 9), signifies to comprehend, gather together, sum up. As there the whole law is comprehended in one saying, so here all creation is comprehended, summed up, in Christ. See more below: and compare the parallel place, Col. i. 19, 20, and note there) all things (neuter, and to be literally so taken: not as a masculine, which, when a neuter is so understood, must be implied in the context, as in Gal. iii. 22:—the whole creation, see Col. i. 20) in [the] Christ, the things in (literally, on; see below) the heavens (universal—not to be limited to the angels, nor spirits of the just), and the things on the earth (general, as before. All creation is summed up in Christ: it was all the result of the Love of the Father for the Son [see my Doctrine of Divine Love, Serm. I.], and in the Son it is all regarded by the Father. The vastly different relation to Christ of the different parts of creation, is no objection to this union in Him: it affects, as Bengel says, on Rom. viii. 19, "each genus according to its own receptivity." The Church, of which the Apostle here mainly treats, is subordinated to Him in the highest degree of conscious and joyful union: those who are not His spiritually, in mere subjugation, yet consciously; the inferior tribes of creation, unconsciously: but objectively, all are summed up in Him); even in Him (emphatic repetition, to connect more closely with Him the following relative clause), 11.] in whom we (Christians, all, both Jews and Gentiles: who are resolved below into "me" and "you:" see on ver. 12) were also (besides having, by His purpose, the revelation of His will, ver. 9.—Not, A.V. 'in whom also') taken for His inheritance (the prevalent idea of Israel in the Old Test. is a people whom the Lord chose for His inheritance; see Deut. iv, 20; ix. 29; xxii. 9; 3 Kings viii. 51, al. Olshausen calls this 'the realization in time of the election in Christ spoken of before,' viz. by God taking to Himself a people out of all nations for an inheritance—first in type and germ in the Old Test., then fully and spiritually in the New Test. This interpretation will be further substantiated by the note on ver. 12 below), having been foreordained (why mention this again? because here first the Apostle comes to the idea of the universal Church, the whole Israel of God, and therefore here brings forward again that fore-ordination which he had indeed hinted at generally in ver. 5, but which properly belonged to Israel, and is accordingly predicated of the Israel of the Church) according to (in pursuance of) the purpose (repeated again [see above] from ver. 9: compare also ch. iii. 11) of Him who worketh (energizes; but especially in and among material previously given, as here, in His material creation, and in the spirits of all flesh, also His creation) all things (not be restricted to the matter here in hand, but universally predicated) according to the counsel of His will (the counsel here answers to the "good pleasure," ver. 5,—the definite shape which the will, assumes when decided to action—implying in this case the union of sovereign will with infinite wisdom):

12.] (in order) that we (here first expressed, as distinguished from ye, ver. 13: see below) should be to the praise of His glory (see on ver. 6 and ver. 14 below), namely, we who before have hoped in [the] Christ (we Jewish Christians, who, before the Christ came, looked forward to His coming, waiting for the consolation of Israel: compare especially Acts xxviii. 20,—and xxvi. 6, 7. The objection, that so few thus looked, is fully met by the largeness of St. Paul's own expression in this last passage).

13.] In whom are ye also (ye Gentile believers), having (or, since ye) heard (from the time when.... Their hearing was the beginning of their being in him) the word of [the] truth (the word whose character and contents are the truth of God. This word is the instrument of the new birth, James i. 18. See Col. i. 5, and, above all, John xvii. 17), (viz.) the Gospel of your salvation (the Gospel whose contents, whose good tidings are your salvation: compare the expressions, "the Gospel of the grace of God," Acts xx. 24,—"of peace," ch. vi. 15,—"of the Kingdom," Matt. ix. 35,—"of Jesus Christ," Mark i. 1): in whom also (be-longs to "having believed were sealed," not to either verb alone) having believed (i. e. on your believing: the date from which, as "having heard" above: see Acts xix. 2, 'Did ye receive the Holy Ghost when ye believed?'—and Rom. xii 11: see also 1 Cor. iii, 5; xv. 2, 11; Heb. iv. 3. The past tense marks the time when the act of belief first took place) ye were sealed (the fact followed on baptism, which was administered on belief in Christ. See the key-passage, Acts xix. 1–6.—The act of belief is, and is not, contemporaneous with the sealing: it is not, inasmuch as in strict accuracy, faith preceded baptism, and baptism preceded the gift of the Spirit: but it is, inasmuch as on looking back over a man's course, the period of the commencement of his faith includes all its accidents and accompaniments. The figure of sealing is so simple and obvious, that it is perhaps mere antiquarian pedantry to seek for an explanation of it in Gentile practices of branding with the names of their deities, or even in circumcision itself.—The sealing was outward, making manifest to others: see John iii. 33; Rev. vii. 3,—but also inward, an approval and substantiation of their faith: see Rom. viii. 1G; 2 Cor. i. 22; 1 John iii, 24) by the Spirit of the promise (i. e. who "was the promise of the Father," Luke xxiv. 49; Acts i. 4; Gal. iii, 14, 22; and I therefore insert the article), even the Holy One (or, Spirit. There is an emphatic pathos in this addition which should not be lost in the usual prefix, 'the Holy Spirit' The Spirit with whom He sealed you is even His own Holy Spirit—what grace, and mercy, and love, is here!), 14.] who (or, which) is the earnest (the word signifies the first instalment paid as a pledge that the rest, will follow. And so here—the Spirit is the "firstfruits," Rom. viii. 23,—the pledge and assurer to us of "the things granted to us by God," 1 Cor. ii. 12, which eye hath not seen, &c.) of our inheritance (here the first person comes in again, and not without reason. The inheritance belongs to both Jew and Gentile—to all who are the children of Abraham by faith, Gal. iii. 28, 29) for ('in order to,'—not 'until,' as A.V. The purpose expressed is that of the sealing, not of the earnest. These two final clauses express the great purpose of all—not any mere intermediate matter—nor can the Holy Spirit be said to be any such intermediate gift) the [full] redemption (this word is often used by the Apostle in this sense, e.g. ch. iv. 30; Rom. viii. 23, of the full and exhaustive accomplishment of that which the word imports) of the purchased possession (see the sense of the unusual word here occurring in the original discussed in my Greek Test.), unto the praise of His glory (as before, ver. 6; but as Stier well remarks, the glory of His grace does not appear here, grace having done its work. His refers to the Father: compare ver. 17, "the Father of glory." This, the thorough and final redemption of the' Church which He hath acquired to Himself, is the greatest triumph of His glory).

(B) vv. 15–28.] The IDEA OF THE CHURCH carried forward, in the form of a prayer for the Ephesians, in which the fulfilment of the Father's counsel, through the Son and by the Spirit, in His people, is set forth, as consisting in the KNOWLEDGE of the hope of His calling, of the riches of His promise, and the power which He exercises on His saints as first wrought by Him in Christ, whom He has made Head over all to the Church.

15, 16.] INTRODUCTION TO THE PRAYER.—Wherefore (i. e., on account of what has gone before since ver. 3: but especially of what has been said since ver. 13, where ye also first came in:—because ye are in Christ, and in Him were sealed, &c.) I also (also, either as resuming the first person after the second,—or as corresponding to “ye also” above) having heard of (on the indication supposed to be furnished by this respecting the readers, see Introd. §ii. 12) the faith in the Lord Jesus which is among you (this is not the same as “your faith,” A.V., but it implies the possibility of some not having this faith, and thus intensifies the prayer which follows), and [the love which ye have] towards all the saints (the omission of the words in brackets may have been occasioned by similar endings, but the three ancient MSS. which leave them out are perfectly independent of one another), cease not giving thanks for you, making mention of you in my (ordinary, see Rom. i. 9 note) prayers;

17.] Purport and purpose of the prayer:—that the God of our Lord Jesus Christ (see on ver. 3, The appellation is here solemnly and most appropriately given, as leading on to what is about to be said in vv. 20 ff. of God’s exaltation of Christ to be Head over all things to His Church. To His God, Christ also in the days of His flesh prayed, “Father, glorify thy Son:” and even more markedly in that last cry, “My God, my God”), the Father of Glory (not, merely the author, or source, of glory: but God is the Father,—by being the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ,—of that glory, the true and all-including glory, and only glory, of the Godhead, which shone forth in the Manhood of the only-begotten Son (John i. 14),—the true Shechinah, which His saints beheld in the face of Christ, 2 Cor. iv. 4, 6, and into which they are changed by the Lord the Spirit, ib. iii. 18. In fact, 2 Cor. iii. 7—iv. 6, is the key to this sublime expression), would give unto you the Spirit (certainly it would not be right to take the word here as signifying solely the Holy Spirit, nor solely the spirit of man: rather is it the complex idea, of the spirit of man indwelt by the Spirit of God, so that as such, it is His special gift; see below) of wisdom (not, which gives wisdom, but which possesses it as its character; to which appertains wisdom) and of revelation (i. e. that revelation which belongs to all Christians: see 1 Cor. ii. 10 ff.: not the spiritual gifts of the early Church;—nor could the Apostle be alluding to any thing so trivial and fleeting, see 1 Cor. xiii. xiv. To those who are taught of God’s Spirit, ever more and more of His glories in Christ are revealed, see John xvi. 14, 15) in (belongs to would give: as the element and sphere of the working of this gift of the Spirit) full knowledge (not knowledge only, but knowledge full and complete: see 1 Cor xiii. 12) of Him: (of Him refers to the Father,—not to Christ, as some think; compare “his” four times in vv. 18, 19: Christ first becomes thus designated in ver. 20), having the eyes of your heart enlightened (the expression eyes of your heart is somewhat unusual. The word “heart” in Scripture signifies the very core and centre of life, where the intelligence has its post of observation, where the stores of experience are laid up, and the thoughts have their fountain. Thus the eyes of the heart would be those pointed at in Matt. vi. 22, 23,—that inner eye of the heart, through which light is poured in on its own purposes and motives, and it looks out on, and perceives, and judges things spiritual: the eye, as in nature, being both receptive and contemplative of the light); that you may know (purpose of the enlightening) what is the hope (i. e. the nature of the hope itself, involving also of course the nature of the thing hoped for, which gives its whole complexion to the hope) of (belonging to, see on ch. iv. 4) His calling (i. e. the calling wherewith he called us. All the matters mentioned, the calling, the inheritance, the power, are His,—but not all in the same sense: see below. On calling, see notes, Rom. viii 28–30), what the riches of the glory of His inheritance (“what a rich, sublime cumulation, setting forth in like terms the weightiness of the matters described!” Meyer. See Col. i. 27) in (in the case, as exemplified in; not so weak as ‘among,’—nor merely ‘in,’ so as to refer to its subjective realization in them) the saints (join together “His inheritance in the saints;”—that inheritance of His, the subjects of which, as its inheritors, are the saints),

19.] and what the surpassing greatness of his power to us-ward who believe (not His future power in the actual resurrection only is spoken of, but THE WHOLE of His energizing to us-ward from first to last, principally however His present spiritual work, as implied by the present tense, “who [now] believe,” not, as in 2 Thess. i. 10, “that believed:” see also Col. ii. 12, and 1 Pet. i. 3–5. This power is exerted to us-ward, which expression of the A.V. I retain, as giving better the prominence to us in the fact of its direction, than the more usual but tamer ‘toward us’), accord-ing to (in proportion to,—as might be expected from: but more than this—His power to us-ward is a part of, a continuation of, or rather included as a consequence in, the other) the working (putting forth in action, in an object) of the might of His strength (His might, the actual measure of His strength. The latter is the attribute, subjectively considered: the former the weight of that attribute, objectively es-teemed: the operation, in matter of fact, of the might of that strength), which (viz. working: compare ver. 6, note) He hath wrought in Christ (our firstfruits: nor only this, but our Head, in virtue of God’s working in whom, His power to us-ward is made possible and actual), in that He raised Him from the dead (the resurrection of Christ was not a mere bodily act, an earnest of our bodily resurrection, but was a spiritual act, the raising of His humanity [which is ours], consisting of body and soul, from infirmity to glory, from the curse to the final triumph. In that He died, HE DIED UNTO SIN once; but in that He liveth, HE LIVETH UNTO GOD. And so we who believe, knit to him, have died unto sin and live unto God. It is necessary to the understanding of the following, thoroughly to appreciate this—or we shall be in danger of regarding, with the shallower expositors, Christ’s resurrection as merely a pledge of our bodily resurrection, or as a mere figure representing our spiritual resurrection,—not as involving the resurrection of the Church in both senses), and setting Him at His right hand (see especially Mark xvi. 19) in the heavenly places (see on ver. 3: and Matt. vi. 9, note. But the fact of the universal idea, of God's dwelling being in heaven, being only a symbolism common to all men, must not for a moment induce us to let go the verity of Christ's bodily existence, or to explain away the glories of His resurrection into mere spiritualities. As Stephen saw Him, so He veritably is: in human form, locally existent), up above (the word seems to imply, not far above but simply local elevation) all rule (compare Matt. xxviii. 18), and authority, and power, and lordship (the most reasonable account of the four words seems to be this: above all rule gives the high-est and fullest expression of exaltation: and authority is added as filling out rule in detail: authority being not only government, but every kind of official power, primary and delegated: compare Matt. viii. 9; x. 1; xxi. 23 ff; Luke xx. 20; xxiii. 7. Then in the second pair power is mere might, the raw material, so to speak, of authority: lordship is that pre-eminence which power establishes for itself. So that in the first pair we descend from the higher and concentrated to the lower and diffused: in the second we ascend from the lower and diffused to the higher and concentrated. The following shews that in this enumeration not only earthly, nor only heavenly authorities are meant to be included, but both together,—so as to make it perfectly general. That the evil spirits are included, is therefore manifest: see also ch. vi. 12; 1 Cor. xv. 24–26), and every name that is named (further generalization: indicating not merely titles of honour, nor persons, but a transition from the authorities, &c. to all things below: answering to “nor any other creature,” in Rom. viii. 39. And this transition passes into still wider meaning in the following words), not only in this present state, but also in that which is to come (compare again Rom. viii. 38—not only time present and to come, but the present [earthly] condition of things, and the future [heavenly] one. And forasmuch as that heavenly state which is for us future, is now, to those in it, present, it is by the easiest transition denoted by “the age to come.” compare Luke xx. 35, and especially Heb. ii. 5, “the world to come.” So that the meanings seem combined,—‘every name now named in earth and heaven?’ and, ‘every name which we name,—not only now, but hereafter.’ Wesley says, beautifully expanding Bengel: “We know that the king is above all, though we cannot name all the officers of his court. So we know that Christ is above all, though we are not able to name all His subjects”): 22.] and subjected all things under His feet (from the Messianic Ps. viii.; not without an allusion also above to Ps. cx. 1), and gave (‘presented;’ keep the literal sense: not ‘appointed;’ see below) HIM (emphatic, from its position: HIM, thus exalted, thus glorified, the Father not only raised to this supereminence, but gave HIM to His redeemed as their Head, &c.) as head over all things to the Church (the meaning is thus to be gained, from what follows: CHRIST is Head over all things: the Church is the BODY of Christ, and as such is the fulness of Him who fills all with all: the Head of such a Body, is Head over all things; therefore when God gives Christ as Head to the church, He gives Him as Head over all things to the church, from the necessity of the case. Thus what follows is explanatory of this), which same (Church) is His BODY (not in a figure merely: it is veritably His Body: not that which in our glorified humanity He personally bears, but that in which He, as the Christ of God, is manifested and glorified by spiritual organization. He is its Head, from Him comes its life; in Him, it is exalted: in it, He is lived forth and witnessed to; He possesses nothing for Himself,—neither His communion with the Father, nor His fulness of the Spirit, nor His glorified humanity,—but all for His Church, which is in the innermost reality, HIMSELF; His flesh and His bones—and therefore) the fulness (i. e. ‘the thing filled,—“the filled up receptacle” [compare ch. ii. 22], as Eadie expresses it; the meaning being, that the church, being the Body of Christ, is dwelt in and filled by God: it is His fulness in an especial manner—His fulness abides in it, and is exemplified by it. The nearest approach to any one word in English which may express it, is made by fulness, though it requires explaining, as importing not the inherent plenitude of God Himself, but that communicated plenitude of gifts and graces wherein He infuses Himself into His Church) of Him that filleth (it is not very easy here to decide whether the word should be thus rendered, or, “that is being filled with.” I have discussed the two in my Greek Test. and adopted that in the text: being further inclined to this rendering by ch. iv. 10, where it is said of Christ, “He that ascended up above all heavens, that He might fill all things,” and the Apostle proceeds to enumerate the various gifts bestowed by Him on his Church. See further in note there) all things (the whole universe: not to be restricted in meaning. The Church is the special receptacle and abiding-place of Him who fills all things) with all things (i. e. who is the bestower of all, wherever found:—with all, not only gifts, not only blessings, but things: who fills all creation with whatever it possesses—who is the Author and Giver of all things. The reference is, I think, to the Father, and not to Christ).

Ephesians: Chapter 2

II. 1–22.] (See on ch. i. 3.) COURSE AND PROGRESS OF THE CHURCH THROUGH THE SON; consisting mainly in the receiving of believers in the new man Christ Jesus—setting forth on one side the death and ruin in which they were;—on the other, the way to life opened to them by the finished work of Christ. This throughout the chapter, which is composed (as ch. i.) of two parts—the first, more doctrinal and assertive (vv. 1–10), the second more hortative and reminiscent (vv. 11–22). In both, the separate cases of Gentiles and Jews, and the present union in Christ, are treated of. And herein

A. 1–10.] THE POWER OF THE FATHER IN QUICKENING US, BOTH GENTILES AND JEWS, IN AND WITH CHRIST (1–6);—HIS PURPOSE IN MANIFESTING THIS POWER (7);—INFERENCE RESPECTING THE METHOD OF OUR SALVATION (8–10).

1, 2.] Actual state of the Gentiles—dead in trespasses and sins, living under the power of the devil.

1.] You also (now, ye are selected and put into prominence, from among the recipients of God's grace implied in vv. 19–23 of the former chapter, See below), who were (this clearly marks the state in which they were at the time when God quickened them: this in ver. 5 is brought prominently forward) dead (certainly not, as Meyer, ‘subject to [physical] death:’ the whole of the subsequent mercy of God in His quickening them is spiritual, and therefore of necessity the death also. That it involves physical death, is most true; but as I have often had occasion to remark [see e.g. on John xi. 25, 26], this latter is so subordinate to spiritual death, as often hardly to come into account in Scripture) by reason of (not exactly as in Col. ii. 13, “being dead in your trespasses,” where the element is more in view, whereas here it is the cause of death which is expressed.—We might render, were the expression good in serious writing, ‘dead of your trespasses,’ as we say ‘he lies dead of cholera’) [your] trespasses and sins (where the two words, trespasses and sins, occur together, the distinction seems to be, that the former indicate involuntary acts in which the limit of right is overstepped, the latter, conscious habits of doing wrong. As to the way in which this verse is to be brought into the construction of the context, the simplest view seems to be the usual one, that the Apostle began with you also, in the accusative, intending to govern it by “quickened together with Christ” (ver. 5), but was led away by the relative clauses, “wherein,” &c., “among whom,” &c., and himself takes up the dropped thread of the construction by “But God,” &c., ver. 4. At all events, the clause should be left, in translation, pendent, as it stands, and not filled in conjecturally, as in A.V.);

2.] in which (viz. sins, the last substantive, but applying in fact to both) ye once walked (we hardly need, as some, go back every time to the figure in the word walked—the word has become with the Apostle so common in its figurative sense) accord-ing to (after the leading of, conformably to) the course (so A.V.: the very best word, as so often. The original word is the age, compounded of its temporal and its ethical sense: it is not exactly ‘lifetime, ‘duration,’ nor again ‘fashion,’ ‘spirit,’ but some common term which will admit of being both temporally and ethically characterized,—‘career’ or ‘course’) of this world (St. Paul generally uses “the world,” but has “this world” in 1 Cor. iii. 19; v. 10; vii. 31. It designates the present system of things, as alien from God, and lying in the evil one), according to the ruler of the power (so literally: see below) of the air (the devil—the god of this world, 2 Cor. iv. 4, is clearly meant: but it is difficult exactly to dissect the phrase, and give each word its proper meaning. The power appears to be used here to represent the aggregate of those in power: as we say, ‘the government.’ St. Paul is supposed by many to have spoken in accordance with Rabbinical, or even with Pythagorean notions. But I am disposed to seek my interpretation of the words from a much more obvious source: viz. the persuasion and common parlance of mankind, founded on analogy with well known facts. We are tempted by evil spirits, who have access to us, and suggest thoughts and desires to our minds. We are surrounded by the air, which is the vehicle of speech and of all suggestions to our senses. Tried continually as we are by these temptations, what so natural, as to assign to their ministers a dwelling in, and power over that element which is the vehicle of them to us? And thus our Lord, in the parable of the sower, when He would represent the devil coming and taking away the seed out of the heart, figures him by the birds of the air (or, of heaven). The Apostle then, in using this expression, would be appealing to the common feeling of his readers, not to any recondite or questionable system of dæmonology. That traces are found in such systems, of a belief agreeing with this, is merely a proof that they have embodied the same general feeling, and may be used in illustration, not as the ground, of the Apostle’s saying), of the spirit (the power being used as designating [see above] the personal aggregate of those evil ones who have this power, the spirit, in apposition with it, represents their aggregate character, as an influence on the human mind, a spirit of ungodliness and disobedience,—the “spirit of the world” of 1 Cor. ii. 12,—the aggregate of the “seducing spirits” of 1 Tim. iv. 1) which is now (i. e. ‘still:’ contrast to “once,”—to you, who have escaped from his government above) working in the sons of (the expression is a Hebraism, but is strictly reproduced in the fact: that of which they are sons, is the source and spring of their lives, not merely an accidental quality belonging to them) disobedience:

3.] among whom (the “sons of disobedience:” not merely local, but ‘numbered among whom’) we also all (WHO? The usage of we all by St. Paul must decide. It occurs Rom. iv. 16, “who is the father of us all,” undeniably for Jews and Gentiles included: viii. 32, where the universal reference is as undeniable: 1 Cor. xii. 13, where it is still more marked: 2 Cor. iii. 18, equally undoubted. It can hardly then be that here he should have departed from his universal usage, and placed an unmeaning “all” after “we,” merely to signify, ‘we Jews, every one of us. I therefore infer that by we all, he means, we all, Jews and Gentiles alike; all, who are now Christians) lived our life once in (of the element, in which, see 2 Cor. i. 12; where the same double use of in, of the place, and the element, is found) the lusts of our flesh (of our unrenewed selves, under the dominion of the body and the carnal soul. See a contrast, Gal. v. 16), doing the desires (the instances in which our will manifested itself) of our flesh and of our thoughts (the plural use is remarkable. There appears to be a reference to Numb. xy. 39, in the Septuagint version, “Ye shall not turn aside after your thoughts” (the same word as here). ‘Thoughts’ must be understood to mean, those phases of mind which may or may not affect the will, but which then in our natural state we allowed to lead us by the desires they excited); and we were (the change of construction has been remarked by the best Commentators as intentional, not of negligence,—“to give emphasis to the weighty clause that follows, and to dis-connect it from any possible relation to present time, ‘we were children of wrath by nature,—it was once our state and condition, it is now so no longer.” Ellicott) children (not sons, but implying closer relation. The effect of the expression is to set those of whom it is predicated, beneath, in subjection to, as it were, the products of, wrath) by nature (the ex-pression amounts to an assertion on the part of the Apostle of the doctrine of original sin. There is from its secondary position no emphasis on “by nature:” but its doctrinal force as referring to a fundamental truth otherwise known, is not thereby lessened) of wrath (WHOSE wrath, is evident: the meaning being, we were all concluded under and born in sin, and so actual objects of that wrath of God which is His mind against sin), as also [are] (not, were) the rest (of mankind i.e. all others, who are not like us, Christians).

4.] The construction is resumed, having been interrupted (see above on ver. 1) by the two relative sentences, “wherein,” and “among whom.” But (contrast to the preceding verse,—the mercy and love, to the wrath just mentioned) God, being rich (this states the general ground for what follows, and the following, “because of His great love,” the special or peculiar motive) in mercy (mercy, properly, as applying to our wretchedness before: compare Ezek. xvi. 6),—on account of His great love wherewith He loved us (the clause belongs, not to what goes before, but to the verb below. Us are all Christians; the same as “we all” in the last verse),

5.] even when we were dead in our trespasses (see on ver. 1), vivified (or, quickened: not, as A.V., ‘hath quickened’—a definite act in time, not an abiding consequence is spoken of) us together with Christ (Christ was THE RESURRECTION and the Life, and we follow in and because of Him. The disputes about the meaning of this vivifying, or quickening, have arisen from not bearing in mind the relation in New Test. language between natural and spiritual death. We have often had occasion to observe that spiritual death in the New Test. includes in it and bears with it natural death as a consequence, to such an extent that this latter is often not thought of as worth mentioning: see especially John xi. 25, 26, which is the key-text for all passages regarding life in Christ. So here—God vivified us together with Christ: in the one act and fact of His Resurrection He raised all His people—to spiritual life, and in that to victory over death, both spiritual, and therefore necessarily physical also. To dispute therefore whether such an expression as this is past [spiritual], or future [physical], is to forget that the whole includes its parts. Our spiritual life is the primary subject of the Apostle’s thought: but this includes in itself our share in the Resurrection and exaltation [ver. 6] of Christ. The three past tenses, “quickened,” “raised up,” “made to sit,” are all anticipatory as regards the actual fact in each man, but equally describe a past and accomplished act on God’s part when He raised up Christ)—by grace ye have been saved (this insertion in the midst of the mention of such great unmerited mercies to us sinners, is meant emphatically to call the reader’s attention to so cogent a proof of that which the Apostle ever preached as the great foundation truth of the Gospel. Notice the perfect, ‘have been saved,’ not, ‘are being saved,’ because we have passed from death unto life: salvation is to the Christian not a future but a past thing, realized in the present by faith)—

6.] and raised us together with Him (the Resurrection of Christ being the next. event consequent on His vivification in the tomb), and seated us together with Him (the Ascension being the completion of the Resurrection. So that all three verbs refer strictly to the same work wrought on Christ, and in Christ on all His mystical Body, the Church) in the heavenly places (see on ch. i. 3, 20) in Christ Jesus (as again specifying the element in which, as united and included in which, we have these blessings which have been enumerated. It is an additional qualification, and recalls the mind to the fact of our union in Him as the medium of our resurrection and glorification.—The disputes as to whether these are to be taken as present or future, actual or potential, literal or spiritual, will easily be disposed of by those who have apprehended the truth of the believer’s union in and with Christ. All these we have, in fact and reality [see Phil. iii. 20], in their highest, and therefore in all lower senses, in Him: they were ours, when they were His: but for their fulness in possession we are waiting till He come, when we shall be like and with Him):

7.) that He might show forth (see Rom. ix. 23. The original implies, that the exhibition is for His own purpose, for His own glory [see ch. i. 6, 12, 14]—compare note on Col. ii, 15) in the ages which are hereafter to come (what are they? the future periods of the Church’s earthly career,—or the ages of the glorified Church hereafter? The answer must be given by comparing this with the very similar expression in Col. i. 26, 27, where it is manifest (1) that the ages from which the mystery was hidden are the past ages of this world; (2) that those to whom, as here, God will make known the riches of His glory, are His saints, i.e. His church on earth. Therefore I conceivé we are compelled to interpret analogously: viz. to understand the “ages to come” of the coming ages of the church, and the per-sons involved in them to be the future members of the church. Thus the mean-ing will be nearly as in ch. i, 12.—The supposed reference to the future state of glory seems not to agree with the language here,—nor with the fact that the second coming and future kingdom of Christ are hardly ever alluded to in this Epistle) the exceeding riches of His grace in (of the material of which this display of His grace will consist, the department in which it will find its exercise) kindness (see especially Rom. ii. 4) towards us in see ‘through’ as A.V.) Christ Jesus (again and again he repeats this “in Christ Jesus:” HE is the great centre of the Epistle, towards whom all the rays of thought converge, and from whom all blessings flow; and this the Apostle will have his readers never forget).

8.] For by grace (the import of the sentence is, to take up and expand the parenthetic clause “by grace ye have been saved,” above: but not barely so: that clause itself was inserted on account of the matter in hand being a notable example of the fact, and this for takes up also that matter in hand—the “exceeding riches, &c.” ye have been saved, through faith (“by grace,” above, expressed the objective instrumental condition of your salvation,—this “through faith” the subjective medial condition: it has been effected by grace and apprehended by faith); and this (‘your salvation;’ your having been saved, as Ellic.) not of yourselves: GOD’S (emphatic) is the gift (not, as A.V., ‘it is the gift of God;’—the gift, viz. of your salvation:—so that the expression amounts to this, ‘but it is a gift, and that gift is God’s’): not of works (see on Rom. iii. iv., and Gal. ii. 16), that no man should boast (see on Rom. iv. 2).

10.] For (substantiates vv. 8, 9. The English reader is likely to imagine a contrast between ‘not of works’ and ‘for we are His handi work,’ which can hardly have been in the mind of the Apostle) his handiwork are we (not, in our natural creation, which idea is clearly refuted by what immediately follows,—but in the spiritual creation, treated of in vv. 8, 9), created in Christ Jesus (see ver. 15; Tit. iii. 5, where the beginning of this new life is called regeneration. See also 2 Cor. v. 17; Gal. vi. 15) for good works (just as a tree may be said to be created for its fruit: see below), which God before prepared ('before He thus created us.' The sentiment is the same as that in John v. 36. To recur to the similitude used above, we might say of the trees,—they were created for fruits which God before prepared that they should bear them: i.e. defined and assigned to each tree its own, in form, and flavour, and time of bearing. So in the course of God's providence, our good works are marked out for and assigned to each one of us) that we should walk in them. Thus the truth of the maxim "good works do not go before him who is to be justified, but follow after one who is justified," is shewn. The sentiment is strictly one of the Apostle's,—in the spirit of Rom. xii.; Gal. v. 22, 25, &c.

B. 11–22.] HORTATORY EXPANSION OF THE FOREGOING INTO DETAIL: REMINDING THEM, WHAT THEY ONCE WERE (vv. 11, 12); WHAT THEY WERE NOW IN CHRIST (vv. 13–22). 11.] Wherfore (since so many and great blessings are given by God to His people, among whom ye are) remember, that once ye, the (i. e. who belonged to the category of the) Gentiles in the flesh (i. e. in their corporeal condition of uncircumcision), who are called (the) Uncircumcision by that which is called (the) Circumcision in the flesh wrought by hands (this last addition seems made by the Apostle, not to throw discredit on circumcision, but as a reserve, circumcision having a higher and spiritual application: as if he had said,—‘but they have it only in the flesh, and not in the heart.’ As Ellicott well states the case—“The Gentiles were called, and were the uncircumcision; the Jews were called, but were not truly, the circumcision.” See Col. ii. 11);

12.] that ye were (the that takes up again the “that” in ver. 11, after the relative clause,—and at that time takes up the “once” there. It is only a repetition; ‘that, I say....’) at that time (when ye were,—not Gentiles in the flesh which ye are now,—but that which is implied in the word “once” above,—heathens, before your conversion to Christ) separate from Christ (having no part in the promised Messiah. That this is the sense, is evident from ver. 13: see below), alienated from (“he does not say, separated from.... but the emphasis is strong, shewing a great severance. For there were also Israelites who were outside the commonwealth, only not as foreigners but as lax Jews, and lost their part in the covenants, not as foreigners, but as unworthy.” Chrysostom, Gentiles and Jews were once united in the hope of redemption—this was constituted, on the apostasy of the nations, into a definite polity for the Jews, from which and its blessings the Gentiles were alienated) the commonwealth of Israel (either a synonymous genitive, ‘that commonwealth which is designated by the term Israel,’ or possessive, ‘that commonwealth which Israel possessed.’ I prefer the former, as more simple), and strangers from (i. e. as we say, to the covenants of the promise (what are these covenants? That involved in the well-known promise, “To thee and thy seed, &c.,” and those which followed on it. See Wisd. xviii. 22; Eccl. xliv. 11. See note on Rom. ix. 4), not having hope (not ‘covenanted hope,’—but ‘hope’ at all), and without God (this is the best tendering, as it leaves the original word in its latitude of meaning. It may be taken either 1) actively, ‘denying God’ ‘atheist,’ 2) in a neuter sense—‘ignorant of God,’ or 3) passively, ‘forsaken of God’ This latter meaning is best here, on account of the passive character of the other descriptive clauses) in the world (contrast to the commonwealth of Israel. “He subjoins to the godless ‘How,’ the godless ‘Where,’” Meyer):

13.] but now (contrast to “at that time” as things are now with you) in Christ Jesus ye who once were far off were brought (so literally, in the historic sense: it is the effect of a definite event of which he is speaking. But in an English version, we are obliged, in combination with now, to adopt the perfect, ye have been) near (it was a common Jewish way of speaking, to designate the Gentiles as ‘far off.’ See also Isa. lvii. 19) in (as the instrument by which, but more—the symbol of a fact in which—the seal of a covenant in which,—your nearness to God consists: not “by,” as A.V., though it is so in ch. i. 7. There the blood of Christ is spoken of specifically, as the medium of our redemption—here inclusively, as representing the redemption) the blood of Christ (see remarks on ch. i. 7).

14.] For He (there is an emphasis on He, ‘He and none other’) is our peace (in the widest and most literal sense, our peace. He did not make our peace and then retire, leaving us to enjoy that peace,—but is Himself its medium and its substance; His making both one was no external reconciliation, but the taking both, their common nature, on and into Himself,—see ver. 15. Bear in mind the multitude of prophetic passages which connect peace with Him, Isa. ix. 5, 6; lii. 7; liii. 5; lvii. 19; Micah v. 5; Hag. ii. 9; Zech. ix. 10: also Luke ii. 14; John xiv. 27; xx. 19, 21, 26. And notice that already the complex idea of the whole verse, that of uniting both Jews and Gentiles in one reconciliation to God, begins to appear: for He is our Peace, not only as reconciling Jew to Gentile, not as bringing the far-off Gentile near to the Jew, but as reconciling both, united, to God; as bringing the far-off Gentile, and the near Jew, both into peace with God. For want of observing this the sense has been much obscured: see below), who made (specification, how He is our Peace. Better ‘made,’ than ‘hath made:’ the latter is true, but it is the historic fact which is here brought out) both (Jews and Gentiles. In the original both is neuter, as abstract;—both things, both elements) one, and (explana-tory’ namely, in that he’) threw down the middle wall of the fence (i. e. the middle wall which belonged to—was a necessary part of the carrying out of—the fence, or partition. The primary allusion seems to be, to the rending of the veil at the crucifixion: not that that veil separated Jew and Gentile, but that it, the chief symbol of separation from God, included in its removal the admission to Him of that one body into which Christ made Jew and Gentile. This complex idea is before the Apostle throughout the sentence: and necessarily 5; for the reconciliation which Christ effected between Jew and Gentile was in fact only a subordinate step of the great reconciliation of both to God, which He effected by His sacrifice in the flesh,—and in speaking of one he speaks of the other also. The partition, from what has been said above, is more general in sense than the middle wall; is in fact the whole arrangement, of which that was but an instrument—the separation itself, consequent on a system of separation: it represents therefore the whole legal system, ceremonial and moral, which made the whole separation,—of Jew from Gentile,—and in the background, of both from God), [to wit] the enmity (not, of Jew and Gentile: so strong a term is not justified as applying to their separation, nor does such a reference satisfy ver. 16,—see there;—but, the enmity in which both were involved against God, see Rom. viii. 7. the enmity is in apposition with the partition. This enmity was the real cause of separation from God, and in being so, was the inclusive, mediate cause of the separation between Jew and Gentile. Christ, by abolishing the first, abolished the other also: see below), in His flesh (to be joined, not with abolishing, as the A.V., which is very harsh, breaking the parallelism,—but with brake down. Christ destroyed the partition, i.e. the enmity, in, or by, His flesh; see on ver. 16, where the same idea is nearly repeated. It was in His crucified flesh, which was “in the likeness of the Slesh of sin,” that He slew this enmity); having done away the law of decretory commandments (this law was the partition,—the great exponent of the enmity. Its specific nature was that it consisted in commandments, decretorily or dogmatically expressed. This law, moral and ceremonial, its decalogue, its ordinances, its rites, was entirely done away in and by the death of Christ. See Col. ii. 13–15, notes. And the end of that abolition was); that He might create the two (Jew and Gentile) in Himself into one new man (observe, not that He might reconcile the two to each other only, nor is the Apostle speaking merely of any such reconciliation: but that he might incorporate the two, reconciled in Him to God, into one new man,—the old man to which both belonged, the enemy of God, having been slain in His flesh on the Cross. Observe, too, ONE new man: we are all in God’s sight but one in Christ, as we are but one in Adam), [so] making peace (not, between Jew and Gentile: He is the peace of us all: see below on ver. 17); and (parallel with the former purpose) might reconcile both of them (or of us) in one body (not His own human body, as Chrysostom [who however seems to waver between this and His mystical body],—but the Church, compare the same expression Col. iii. 15) unto God (if this had not been here expressed, the whole reference of the sentence would have been thought to be to the uniting Jews and Gentiles. That it is expressed, now shews that throughout, that union has been thought of only as a subordinate step in a greater reconciliation) by means of (through) the (His) cross (the cross regarded as the symbol of that which was done on and by it), having slain the enmity (this has been taken here to mean the enmity between Jew and Gentile. But see on ver. 15: and let us ask here, was this the enmity which Christ slew at His death? Was this the enmity, the slaying of which brought in the reconciliation as this verse implies? Does such a meaning of the word at all satisfy the solemnity of the sentence, or of the next two verses? I cannot think so: and must maintain the enmity here [and if here, then in ver. 15 also] to be that between man and God, which Christ did slay on the cross, and which being brought to an end, the separation between Jew and Gentile, which was the result of it, was done away) thereby (or, in or on it: viz. the cross: compare Col. ii. 15, notes: not in His body: see above); and having come, He preached (how? when? Obviously after his death, because by that death the peace was wrought. We seek in vain for any such announcement made by Him in person after his resurrection. But we find a key to the expression in John xiv. 18: see also ver. 28. And this coming was,—by his Spirit poured out on the Church. There is an expression of St. Paul’s, singularly parallel with this, and of itself strongly corroborative of the genuineness of our Epistle; in Acts xxvi. 23: “That Christ should suffer, and that He should be the first that should rise from the dead, and should shew light unto the people, and to the Gentiles.” This coming therefore is by His Spirit [see on ver. 18], and minis-ters, and ordinances in the Church) peace to you who were far off, and peace to those (not ‘to us,’ for fear of still upholding the distinction where he wishes to merge it altogether) that were nigh (this peace is plainly then not mere mutual reconciliation, but that far greater peace which was effected by Christ’s death, peace with God, which necessitated the union of the far off and the near in one body in Him. This is shewn especially by the repetition of the word peace. See Isa. lvii. 19.—Then follows the empowering reason, why he should preach peace to us both: and it is this ver. 18 especially which cannot be satisfied on the ordinary hypothesis of mere reconciliation between Jew and Gentile being the subject in the former verses. Here clearly the union [not reconciliation, nor is enmity predicated of them] of Jew and Gentile is subordinated to the blessed fact of an access TO GOD having been provided for both through Christ by the Spirit),

18.] For through Him we have our access (representing, both here and in Rom. v. 2, and ch. iii. 12, present liberty of approach) both of us in (united in, 1 Cor. xii. 13) one Spirit (not ‘one frame of mind: the whole structure of the sentence, as compared with any similar one, such as 2 Cor. xiii. 18, will shew what spirit is meant, viz. the Holy Spirit of God, already alluded to in ver. 17: see above. As a parallel, compare 1 Cor. xii. 13) to the Father.

19.] So then ye no longer are strangers and sojourners (‘sojourners,’ as dwelling among the Jews, but not numbered with them), but are fellow-citizens with the saints (comrades, co-citizens, of the saints. the saints are not angels, nor Christians then alive merely, but the saints of God in the widest sense,—all members of the mystical body of Christ,—the commonwealth of the spiritual Israel), and of the household (i. e. ‘members of God’s family,’ in the usual sense of the word) of God; having been built up (literally, built above: we cannot express this in one word: we have the substantive ‘super-structure,’ but no verb corresponding. There is a transition from one image, a political and social, to another, a material) upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets (how is this genitive to be understood? Is it a genitive of apposition, so that the Apostles and Prophets themselves are the foundation? This has been supposed by numerous Commentators, from Chrysostom to De Wette. But, not to mention the very many other objections which have been well and often urged against this view, this one is to my mind decisive,—that it entirely destroys the imagery of the passage. The temple, into which these Gentiles were built, is the mystical body of the Son, in which the Father dwells by the Spirit, ver. 22. The Apostles and Prophets [see below], yea, Jesus Christ Himself, as the great inclusive Head Corner Stone (see again below], are also built into this temple.

[That He includes likewise the foundation, and IS the foundation, is true, and must be remembered, but is not prominent here.] Clearly then the Apostles and Prophets cannot be the foundation, being here spoken of as parts of the upper building, together with these Gentiles, and with Jesus Christ Himself. But again, does the genitive mean, the foundation which the Apostles and Prophets have laid? So also very many Commentators. As clearly,—not thus. To introduce them here as agents, is as inconsistent as the other. No agents are here spoken of, but merely the fact of the great building in its several parts being built up together. The only remaining interpretation then is, to regard the genitive as simply possessive: ‘the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets,’—‘the Apostles’ and Prophets’ foundation’—that upon which they as well as your-selves are built. This explanation, which I find ascribed to Bucer only, seems to me beyond question the right one. See more below.—But (2) who are the prophets? They have commonly been taken, without enquiry, as the Old Test. prophets. And certainly, the sense, with some little straining, would admit of this view. They may be said to be built upon Christ, as belonging to that widest acceptation of His mystical body, in which it includes all the saints, Old as well as New Test. But besides the objections arising from the form of the sentence, which the English reader cannot appreciate, there is this weighty one: the usage of the expression apostles and prophets in ch. ili. 5. There unquestionably the prophets are New Test. prophets; and again in ch. iv. 11. And it is difficult to conceive that the Apostle should have used the two words conjoined here, in a different sense. Even stronger is the consideration arising from the whole sense of the passage. All here is strictly Christian,—post-Judaic,—consequent on Christ’s death, and triumph, and His coming preaching peace by the Spirit to the united family of man. So that we must decide for these prophets being New Test. prophets: those who ranked next to the Apostles in the government of the church: see Acts xi. 27, note. They were not in every case distinct from the Apostles: the apostleship probably always including the gift of prophecy: so that all the Apostles themselves might likewise have been prophets), Christ Jesus Himself (the Himself exalts the dignity of the temple, in that not only it has among its stones Apostles and prophets, but the Lord Himself is built into it) being the Head corner stone (see, besides reff., Jer. li. 26; Acts iv. 11. The reference here is clearly to that Headstone of the Corner, which is not only the most conspicuous but the most important in the building: “which, being placed in the corner, joins and rules the two walls of the building.” Builders set up such a stone, or build such a pillar of brick, before getting up their walls, to rule and square them by. I must again repeat, that the fact of Jesus Christ being Himself the foundation, however it underlies the whole, is not to be brought in as interfering with this portion of the figure);

21.] in whom (Christ keeps the whole together: and not only so, but He is in reality the inclusive Head of the building: it all consists, is upheld, is squared and ruled by its unity to and in Him) all the building being framed exactly together is growing (there seems no reason why the proper sense of the present should not be retained. Both participle and verb imply that the fitting together and the growing are still going on: and the only way which we in English have to mark this so as to avoid the chance of mistake, is by the auxiliary verb substantive, and the participle. The bare present, ‘groweth,’ is in danger of being mistaken for the abstract quality, and the temporal development is thus lost sight of: whereas the other, in giving prominence to that temporal development, also necessarily implies the ‘normal, perpetual, unconditioned nature of the organic increase’) unto an holy temple in the Lord (i. e. according to apostolic usage, and the sense of the whole passage, ‘in Christ.’) These “in whom,”—“in the Lord,”“in whom,”—like the frequent repetitions of the name Christ in vv. 12, 13, are used by the Apostle to lay all stress on the fact that Christ is the inclusive Head of all the building, the element in which it has its being and its growth. The increase spoken of will issue in its being a holy temple in Christ):

22.) in whom (viz. in the Lord)—it is characteristic [see above] of this part of the epistle to string together these relative expressions, all referring to the same) ye also are being built in together (with one another, or with those before mentioned) for an habitation of God (the only true temple of God, in which He dwells, being the Body of Christ, in all the glorious acceptation of that term) in the Spirit (it is even now, in the state of imperfection, by the Spirit, dwelling in the hearts of believers, that God has His habitation in the Church: and then, when the growth and increase of that Church shall be completed, it will he still in and by the Holy Spirit fully penetrating and possessing the whole glorified Church, that the Father will dwell in it for ever.

Thus we have the true temple of the Father, built in the Son, inhabited in the Spirit: the offices of the Three blessed Persons being distinctly pointed out: God, THE FATHER, in all His fulness, dwells in, fills the Church: that Church is constituted an holy Temple to Him in THE SON,—is inhabited by Him in the ever present indwelling of the HOLY SPIRIT. The attempt to soften away in the Spirit into “spiritually” is against the whole sense of the passage, in which not the present spiritual state of believers, but their ultimate glorious completion is spoken of).

Ephesians: Chapter 3

III. 1–21.] AIM AND END OF THE CHURCH IN THE Spirit. And herein, the revelation to it of the mystery of Christ, through those ministers who wrought in the Spirit: primarily, as regarded the Ephesians, through himself. Thus first, OF HIS OFFICE AS APOSTLE OF THE GENTILES (1–13): secondly, under a form of a prayer for them, THE AIM AND END OF THAT OFFICE AS RESPECTED THE CHURCH: its becoming strong in the power of the Spirit (14–19). Then (20, 21) doxology, concluding this first division of the Epistle.

1–13.] (See above.) On this account (in order to explain this, something must be said on the construction. In my Greek Test. I have discussed the various ways of connecting this ver. 1, and of terminating the parenthesis in the sense which begins with ver. 2: and have come to the conclusion that we must consider ver. 14 as taking up the sense, with its repetition of For this cause, and the weighty prayer which it introduces, and which forms a worthy justification for so long and solemn. a parenthesis. For this cause then will mean, ‘seeing ye are so built in,’—stand in such a relation to God’s purposes in the Church) I Paul (he mentions himself here, as introducing to them the agent in the Spirit’s work who was nearest to themselves, and setting forth that work as the carrying on of his enlightenment on their behalf, and the subject of his earnest prayer for them: see argument to this chapter above), the prisoner (but now without any prominence, or the very slightest; the definite article is rather generic, or demonstrative, than emphatic) of Christ [Jesus] in behalf of you Gentiles (see ver. 13, where this is repeated. The matter of fact was so:—his preaching to Gentiles aroused the jealousy of the Jews, and led to his imprisonment. But he rather thinks of it as a result of his great office, and himself as a sacrifice for those whom it was his intent to benefit), if, that is (or if indeed); i.e., ‘assuming that.’ The Ephesians had heard all this, and St. Paul was now delicately reminding them of it), ye heard of (when I was among you, not “have heard,” as A.V., making it appear as if it were some intelligence of his proceedings while absent from them: his whole course at Ephesus, his converse [Acts xx. 18–21], and his preaching, were just the imparting to them this knowledge) the economy (or, dispensation: see note on ch. i. 10. It is not the Apostolic office,—but the dispensation in which he was a steward, of that which follows) of the grace of God which was given me (the grace which was given was the material with respect to which the dispensation was to be exercised: so that the genitive is objective, as in ch. i. 10) to you-ward (to be dispensed in the direction of, to, you):

3.] that (explanatory of the fact implied in their hearing of this: as we say, ‘how that’) by revelation (see reff.; the stress is on these words, from their position) was made known to me the mystery (viz. of the admission of the Gentiles [ver. 6] to be fellow-heirs, &c. See ch. i. 9, directly referred to below); even as I before wrote (not, ‘have before written.’ ‘Before wrote,’ viz. in ch. i. 9 ff.) briefly, 4.] whereby (viz. by that which I wrote: not the fact of my having written briefly; as some) ye can, while reading, perceive my un-derstanding in the mystery of Christ (by comparing Col. i. 27, it will clearly appear that this genitive is one of apposition:—the mystery IS Christ in all His fulness; not of the object, ‘relating to Christ’); 5.] which in other generations was not made known unto the sons of men (this last is not only a way of expressing mankind, but gives also the cause why men were ignorant, the natural man not receiving the things of the Spirit. Notice as contrasted, “his holy Apostles and Prophets,” below), as (“it was indeed made known in a manner,” says Theodoret, “to the prophets of old, but not as now: for they knew not the things themselves, but wrote beforehand the matters concerning those things”) it hath been now revealed (more properly,—‘as in this present age it was revealed’) unto His holy (see remarks above. Olshausen says, “It is certainly peculiar, that Paul here calls the Apostles, and consequently himself among them, ‘holy Apostles.’ It is going too far when De Wette finds in this a sign of an unapostolic origin of the Epistle: but still the expression remains an unusual one. I account for it to myself thus,—that Paul here conceives of the Apostles and Prophets as a corporation (cf. ch. iv. 11), and as such, in their official character, he gives them the predicate holy, as he names believers, conceived as a whole, ‘holy’ or ‘sanctified’ but never an individual”) Apostles and Prophets (as in ch. ii. 20, the New Test. Prophets—see note there) in (as the conditional element; in and by) the Spirit (Chrysostom remarks, “Notice, as an example, that Peter would never have gone to the Gentiles, had he not heard the truth from the Spirit”); that (‘namely, that’—giving the purport of the mystery) the Gentiles are (not, as A.V., ‘should be.’ a mystery is not a secret design, but a secret fact) fellow-heirs (with the Jews) and fellow-members (of the same body) and fellow-partakers of the promise (in the widest sense; the promise of salvation:—the complex, including all other promises, even that chief promise of the Father, the promise of the Spirit itself) in (not to be referred to the promise, but to the three foregoing appellatives,—in Christ Jesus, as the conditional element in which their participation consisted) Christ Jesus through the Gospel (He Himself was the objective ground of their incorporation; the Gospel, the joyful tidings of Him, the subjective medium by which they apprehended it): of which (Gospel) I became (a reference to the event by which he was made so) a minister (see the parallel, Col. i. 23), according to (in consequence of and in analogy with) the gift of the grace (genitive of apposition, as clearly appears from the definition of the grace given in the next verse: the grace was the gift) of God, which was given unto me according to the working [in me] of His power (be-cause, and in so far as, His Almighty power wrought in me, was this gift of the grace, the apostleship, the office of preaching among the Gentiles, &c., bestowed upon me).

8.] Instead of going straight onward, he calls to mind his own (not past, but present and inherent, see 1 Tim. i. 15) unworthiness of the high office, and resumes the context with an emphatic declaration of it. Unto me, who am less than the least (thus admirably rendered by A.V.: the adjective is a double superlative in the original: literally, the leastes) of all saints (‘he does not say, “of the Apostles,”’ Chrysostom: and herein, this has been regarded as an expression of far greater depth of humility than that in 1 Cor. xv. 8: but each belongs to the subject in hand—each places him far below all others with whom he compared himself), was given this grace, (viz.) to bring to the Gentiles (emphatic, and pointing out his distinguishing office) the glad tidings of the unsearchable “‘in their nature, extent, and applica-tion”) riches of Christ (i. e. the fulness of wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption—all centred and summed up in Him);

9.] and to enlighten (not merely externally to teach, referred to his work,—but internally to enlighten the hearers, referred to their apprehension: as when the Apostles gave witness with great power of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus, Acts iv. 33. On St. Paul’s mission to enlighten, see especially Acts xxvi. 18) all men (no emphasis on all men) what is (i. e. as to what is, &c.)

the economy (see on ch. i, 10) of the mystery (“the dispensation [arrangement, regulation] of the mystery [the union of Jews and Gentiles in Christ, ver. 6] was now to be humbly traced and acknowledged in the fact of its having secretly existed in the primal counsels of God, and now having been revealed to the heavenly powers by means of the Church.” Ellicott), which hath been hidden from (the beginning of) the ages (this expression gives the temporal limit from which the concealment dated: so in Rom. xvi. 25. The decree itself originated “before the foundation of the world,” ch. i. 4, “before the ages,” 1 Cor. ii. 7: the “ages” being the spaces or reaches of time necessary for the successive acts of created beings, either physical or spiritual) in (hidden within,—humanly speaking, ‘in the bosom or the mind of’) God, who created all things (‘for the general creation is the foundation of all the rest of the economy of God’s dealings.’ The stress is on all things: this concealment was nothing to be wondered at,—for God of His own will and power created ALL THINGS, a fact which involves His perfect right to adjust all things as He will. The expression is used in the widest sense, embracing physical and spiritual alike):

10.] to the intent that (general purpose of the whole: more properly to be referred perhaps to was this grace given, than to any other one word in the last two verses. For this sublime cause the humble Paul was raised up,—to bring about,—he, the least worthy of the saints,—that to the heavenly powers themselves should be made known, by means of those whom he was empowered to enlighten, &c.) there might be made known (emphatic, as opposed to “hidden,” above—‘no longer hidden, but.’) now (has the secondary emphasis: opposed to “from the beginning of the ages”) to the governments and to the powers (see ch. i. 21 and note) in the heavenly places (see ch. i. 3 note. The governments and the powers are those of the holy angels in heaven: not, as has been vainly imagined Jewish rulers, Christian rulers, or good and bad angels. These are excluded by the general tenor of the passage, as Ellicott remarks, who adds well: “Evil angels more naturally recognize the power, good angels the wisdom of God”) by means of the Church (“when we learnt it, then they also learnt it by means of us,” Chrysostom. See also Luke xv. 10; 1 Pet. i. 12. “That the holy angels are capable of a specific increase of knowledge, and of a deepening insight into God’s wisdom, seems from this passage clear and incontrovertible.” Ellicott. “See what honour is put upon men, in that God willed that these His secret counsels should be made known to angels by them, chiefly by the Apostles. For this cause the Angels henceforth refuse worship from Apostles, as their superiors in the ministry, Rev. xix. 10, and with reason.” Grotius. But, as Stier well notices, it is not by the Apostles directly, nor by human preaching, that the Angels are instructed in God’s wisdom, but by the Church;—by the fact of the great spiritual body, constituted in Christ, which they con-template, and which is to them the theatre of the glory of God) the manifold wisdom of God (how is the wisdom of God manifold? It is all one in sublime unity of truth and purpose: but cannot be apprehended by finite minds in this its unity, and therefore is by Him variously portioned out to each finite race and finite capacity of individuals—so that the Church is a mirror of God’s wisdom,—chromatic, so to speak, with the rainbow colours of that light which in itself is one and undivided. Perhaps there was in the Apostle’s mind, when he chose this word, an allusion to the “wings of a dove covered with silver and her feathers with yellow gold,” the adorn-ment of the ransomed church, in Ps. Ixviii. 13. See Heb. i. 1; 1 Pet. iv. 10),

11.] according to (depends on may be made known—this imparting of the knowledge of God’s manifold wisdom was in accordance with, &c.) the purpose of (the) ages (so literally: and the genitive in the original is apparently one of time, as when we say, ‘it has been an opinion of years.’ If so, the sense is best given in English by ‘eternal,’ as in A.V. and our text), which (purpose) He made (constituted, ordained, purposed). Some would render, wrought: and apply it to the carrying out, executing, in its historical realization) in Jesus our Lord the Christ (or as in text, ‘in the Christ, [even] Jesus our Lord.’ The former name is official, the latter personal. It was in his Christ that He made, the purpose: and that Christ is Jesus our Lord. The words bind together God’s eternal purpose and our present state of access to Him by redemption in Christ, and so close the train of thought of the last eleven verses, by bringing us again home to the sense of our own blessedness in Christ):

12.] in whom (for the connexion, see note on last verse: in whom, as their element and condition) we have our boldness (not ‘freedom of speech’ merely, nor boldness in prayer: the word is used in a far wider sense than these: viz. that of the state of mind which gives liberty of speech, cheerful boldness) and [our] access (see note on ch. ii. 18: here the intransitive sense is even more necessary, from the union with boldness. We may confidently say, that so important an objective truth as our introduction to God by Christ would never have been thus coupled to a mere subjective quality in ourselves. Both must be subjective if one is: the second less purely so than the first—but both referring to our own feelings and privileges) in confidence (“that is, coupled with a good courage,” Chrysostom. Meyer remarks what a noble example St. Paul himself has given of this confidence in Rom. viii. 38 f.) through the faith (“in Christ points to the objective ground of the possession, through the faith, the subjective medium by which, and in confidence the subjective state in which, it is apprehended.” Ellicott) of (objective: = I:’ of which He is the object) Him.

13.] Wherefore (‘seeing which things,’ viz. the glorious things spoken of vv. 1–12: and especially his own personal part in them;—since I am the appointed minister of so great a matter) I intreat you not to be dispirited in (of the element or sphere, in which the faint-heartedness would be shewn: ‘in the midst of’) The phrase is best re-presented in an English version by not to faint at my tribulations for you, seeing that they are your glory (“how, their glory? because God so loved them as to give His Son, and to afflict His servants, on their behalf. For it was that they might enjoy such blessings, that Paul was bound with chains.” Chrysostom. Bengel compares 1 Cor. iv. 10).

14–19.] His prayer for them, setting forth the aim and end of the ministerial office as respected the Church, viz. its becoming strong in the power of the Spirit.

14.] For this cause (resumes the same words in ver. 1 [see note there]:—viz. ‘because ye are so built in, have such a standing in God’s Church’) I bend my knees (in prayer: see reff.; and compare 1 Kings xix. 18) towards (directing my prayer to Him) the Father,

15.] from whom (as the source of the name. In Greek, Father is “pater,” Family is “patria,” derived from pater. This must be lost to the English reader. See more below) every family (not ‘the whole family’ as A.Y., which is an ungrammatical rendering. The sense, see below) in the heavens and on earth is named (it is difficult to convey in another language any trace of the deep connexion of pater and patria here expressed. Had the sentence been ‘the Creator, after whom every creature in heaven and earth is named,’ all would be plain to the English reader. But we must not thus render; for it is not in virtue of God’s creative power that the Apostle here prays to Him, but in virtue of His adoptive love in Christ. It is best therefore to keep the simple sense of the words, and leave it to explanation to convey the idea, Patria is the family (or in a wider sense, as the Romans named it, the gens), named so from its all having one pater. It is not easy to say, to what the reference is, or why the idea is here introduced. The Apostle seems, regarding God as the Father of us His adopted children in Christ, to go forth into the fact, that He, in this His relation to us, is in reality the great original and prototype of the paternal relation, wherever found. And this he does, by observing that every patria, compaternity, body of persons, having a common father, is thus named [in Greek], from that father,—and so every earthly [and heavenly] family reflects in its name [and constitution] the being and sourceship of the great Father Himself. But then, what are families in heaven? Some have treated the idea of paternity there as absurd: but is it not necessarily involved in any explanation of this passage? He Himself is the Father of spirits, Heb. xii. 9, the Father of lights, James i. 17:—may there not be fathers in the heavenly Israel; as in the earthly? May not the holy Angels be bound up in spiritual families, though they marry not nor are given in marriage?),

16.] that (the purpose and purport of the prayer are blended) He may give you, according to the riches of his glory (specifies the gift, not what follows: give you, in full proportion to the abundance of His own glory—His own infinite perfections), to be strengthened with might (“with might” has been taken in several ways: 1) adverbially, ‘mightily:’ 2) of the form or shape in which the strengthening was to take place: 3) the instrumental sense seems the best: ‘with [His] might, imparted to you) by His Spirit (as the instiller and imparter of that might) towards (not merely ‘in,’ but ‘to and into,’ as Ellicott: import-ing “the direction and destination of the prayed for gift of infused strength:” towards the building up of that hidden man of the heart, which is a man’s self transformed into the likeness of Christ: “the inner man which contains Christ,” as a Greek writer admirably says) the inner man (the spiritual man [see above]—the noblest portion of our being, kept, in the natural man, under subjection to the flesh, but in the spiritual, renewed by the Spirit of God); that (continuation from the being strengthened,—and that as its result) Christ may dwell (emphatic; abide, take up His lasting abode: “not looked on afar by faith, but received with the embrace of our souls, that He may dwell in you.” Calvin) by your faith (apprehending Him, and opening the door to Him,—see John xiv. 23; Rev. iii. 20,—and keeping Him there) in your hearts (for there, as Calvin strikingly says, is Christ’s proper place, not bandied about on the tongue, nor flitting through the brain),—ye having been rooted and grounded (both images, that of a tree, and that of a building, are supposed to have been before the Apostle’s mind. But the verb to root was so constantly used in a figurative sense as hardly perhaps of necessity to suggest its primary image. The participles are what is called a pendent nominative, agreeing with you understood) in love (love generally. As Ellicott well says, ‘This [love] was to be their basis and foundation, on which alone they were to be fully enabled to realize all the majestic proportions of Christ’s surpassing love to man”),—that ye may be fully able to comprehend with all the saints (all the people of God, in whom is fulfilled that which is here prayed for) what is the breadth, and length, and height, and depth (all kinds of fanciful explanations have been given of these words. See specimens in my Greek Test. It is most probable, that the question, of what, after these nouns, is left indefinite—that you may be fully able to comprehend every dimension—i. e., of all that God has revealed or done in and for us [“the mystery of God,” Col. ii. 2]—though this is not a genitive to be supplied, but lying in the background entirely), and (this and introduces not a parallel, but a subordinate clause. The knowledge here spoken of is not identical with the comprehension above, but forms one portion of it, and by its surpassing excellence serves to exalt still more that great whole to which it belongs) to know the knowledge-passing (to know that which passeth knowledge is a paradox: “knowledge” being taken in the sense of ‘mere,’ ‘bare’ knowledge, and “to know” in the pregnant sense of that knowledge which is rooted and grounded in love, Phil. i. 9) Love of Christ (subjective genitive,—Christ’s love to us—see Rom. v. 5 note, and viii. 35–39—not ‘our love to Christ’), that ye may be filled even to all the fulness of God (“all the fulness of the Godhead” abides in Christ, Col. ii. 9. Christ then abiding in your hearts, ye, being raised up to the comprehension of the vastness of God’s mercy in Him and of His Love, will be filled, even as God is full—each in your degree, but all to your utmost capacity, with divine wisdom and might and love).

20, 21.] DOXOLOGY, ARISING FROM THE CONTEMPLATION OF THE FAITHFULNESS AND POWER OF GOD WITH REGARD TO HIS CHURCH.

20.] But unto Him (brings out a slight contrast to what has just preceded—viz. ourselves, and our need of strength and our growth in knowledge, and fulness) who is able to do beyond all things, far beyond the things which we ask or think (“our thoughts reach wider than our prayers: there is a climax in the words.” Bengel), according to the power which is working (viz. the might of the indwelling Spirit; see Rom. viii. 26) in us, 21.] to Him (solemn and emphatic repetition of the personal pronoun) be the glory (the whole glory accruing from all His dealings which have been spoken of: His own resulting glory) in the Church (as its theatre before men, in which that glory must be recognized and rendered) and in Christ Jesus (as its inner verity, and essential element in which it abides, The two clauses are not altogether independent: it is ‘in the Church, and [thus] in Christ Jesus’) to all the generations of the age of the ages (so literally. Probably the account of the meaning is, that the age of ages [eternity] is conceived as containing ages, just as our ‘age’ contains years: and then those ages are thought of as made up, like ours, of generations. Like the similar expression, ages of ages, it is used, by a transfer of what we know in time, to express, imperfectly, and indeed improperly, the idea of Eternity).

Ephesians: Chapter 4

IV. 1–VI. 20.] SECOND (hortatory) PORTION OF THE EPISTLE: and herein [A] (IV. 1–16) ground of the Christian’s duties as a member of the Church, viz. the unity of the mystical Body of Christ (vv. 1–6) in the manifoldness of grace given to each (7–13), that we may come to perfection in Him (14–16).

1.] I beseech you therefore (seeing that this is your calling: an inference from all the former part of the Epistle, as in Rom. xii. 1; but here perhaps also a resumption of “For this cause” of ch. iii. 1, 14, and we are thus carried back to the contents of ch. i. ii.), I the prisoner in the Lord (who am, as regards, and for the sake of the cause of, the Lord, a prisoner; so that my captivity is in the Lord, as its element and sphere, and therefore to be regarded as an additional inducement to comply with my exhortation. “For whatever is Christ’s, even though disgraceful in the eyes of the world, ought to be regarded by you with the utmost respect.” Calvin. Theodoret remarks, that he is prouder of his chains in Christ, than a monarch of his diadem), to walk worthily of the calling (see ch. i. 18, and note Rom. viii, 28, 30) wherewith ye were called,

2.] with all (see on ch. i. 8) lowliness and meekness (before God, accepting His dealings in humility, and before men, as God’s instruments, 2 Sam. xvi. 11: resting therefore on lowliness as its foundation), with longsuffering (longsuffering consists in not taking swift vengeance, but leaving to an offender a place for repentance. From this, its proper meaning, it is easily further generalized to forbearance under all circumstances of provocation), forbearing (see Rom. ii. 4) one another in love;

3.] earnestly striving to maintain the unity of the Spirit (that unity, in which God’s Holy Spirit in the Church unites men differing in race and habits, as Chrysostom.—The genitive is in fact a possessive—the Spirit’s unity, that unity which the Spirit brings about) in (united together by: within) the bond of peace (the bond is peace, not that which brings about peace, namely, love, as Bengel says. Col. iii. 14, which is quoted to support this meaning, is not applicable, because love there is expressly named, whereas here it certainly would not occur to any reader, especially after in love has just occurred. The genitive of apposition is the simplest—peace binds together the Church as a condition and symbol of that inner unity which is only wrought by the indwelling Spirit of God).

4.] (There is) (these words are not expressed in the original: but it is better to supply thus, than ‘ye are,’ which will not apply to the following parallel clauses. The assertion of the unity of the Church, and of our Lord in all His operations and ordinances, springs immediately out of the last exhortation, as following it up to its great primal ground in the verities of God) one Body (“what is this one body? the faithful all over the world, past, present, and to come.” Chrysostom), and one Spirit (viz. the Holy Spirit, who dwells in, and vivifies, and rules that one body: see ch. ii. 18, 22; 1 Cor. xii. 13 al.), as also ye were called in (elemental—the condition and sphere in which they were called to live and move) one hope of (belonging to: you were called in it as the element, see above: it is then an accident of the calling. Or perhaps it may be the genitive of the efficient cause, ‘which the calling works’) your calling:

5.] one Lord (as the Head of the Church: in this verse he grounds the co-existence of the “one body and one Spirit” in the three great facts on which it rests—the first objective,—one Lord—the second subjective,—one faith—the third compounded of the two,—one baptism), one faith (in that one Lord: the subjective medium by which that one Lord is apprehended and appropriated: not faith which we believed, but, faith by which we believe: but it is necessarily understood, that this subjective faith has for its object the One Lord just mentioned), one baptism (the objective seal of the subjective faith, by which, as a badge, the members of Christ are outwardly and visibly stamped with His name. The other sacrament, being a matured act of subsequent participation, a function of the incorporate, not a seal of incorporation [a symbol of union, not of unity: so Ellicott], is not here adduced. In 1 Cor. x. 17, where an act was in question which was a clear breach of union, it forms the rallying-point).

6.] one God (the unity is here consummated in its central Object: “this is the chief thing, because from this all the rest flow.” Calvin. But we must not miss the distinct witness to the doctrine of the Holy Trinity in these verses:—going upwards, we have 1st, the One Spirit dwelling in the one body:—2nd, the One Lord appropriated by faith and professed in baptism:—3rd, One God and Father supreme, in whom all find their end and object) and Father of all (masculine,—all men; ‘of all within the Church,’ for so is clearly the primary meaning, where he is speaking distinctly of the Church:—of all who have the adoption. But it can hardly be doubted, that there is a further reference—to the universal Fathership of all men—which indeed the Church only inherits in its fulness, others having fallen out of it by sin,—but which nevertheless is just as absolutely true), who is over all (men, primarily; and from the following,—men only, in this place. He is over all, in his sovereignty as the FATHER), and through all (men, in the co-extensiveness of Redemption by the Son with the whole nature of man: see on ver. 10 below, and ch. ii. 20, 21), and in all (men: by the indwelling of the Spirit, see ch. ii. 22. So that I cannot but recognize, in these three carefully chosen expressions, a distinct allusion again to the Three Persons of the blessed Trinity. All these are the work of the Father:—it is He who in direct sovereignty is over all—He who is glorified in the filling of all things by the Son:—He who is revealed by the witness of the indwelling Spirit).

7.] But (the contrast is between in all and to each one—the general, and the particular. And the connexion is—as a motive to keep the unity of the Spirit—‘none is overlooked:—each has his part in the distribution of the gifts of the One Spirit, which part he is bound to use for the well-being of the whole’) to each one of us was given (by Christ, at the time of His exaltation—when He bestowed gifts on men) [the grace (which was then bestowed: the unspeakable gift,—or grace, absolutely,—was distributed to each, &c.) according to the measure of (subjective genitive: the amount of: compare Rom. xii. 3) the gift of Christ (‘Christ’s gift;’—the gift bestowed by Christ, 2 Cor. ix. 1 not, ‘the gift which Christ received,’—for He is the subject and centre here—so Calvin, “He makes Christ the Author of the gift, because, as he made a beginning from the Father, so he desires to sum up us and all that is ours in Him”).

8.] Wherfore (i. e., since the gift was bestowed by Christ on different men according to measure) He (viz. God, whose word the Scriptures are) saith (viz. in Ps. Ixviii. 18, see below. With the question as to the occasion and intent of that Psalm, we are not here concerned. It is a song of triumph, as ver. 1 [compare Numb. x. 33] shews, at some bringing up of the ark to the hill of Zion. It is therefore a Messianic Psalm. Every part of that ark, every stone of that hill, was full of spiritual meaning. Every note struck on the lyres of the sweet singers of Israel, is but part of a chord, deep and world-wide, sounding from the golden harps of redemption. The partial triumphs of David and Solomon only prefigured as in a prophetic mirror the universal and eternal triumph of the Incarnate Son of God. Those who do not understand this, have yet their first lesson in the Old Test. to learn. With this caution, let us approach the difficulties of the citation in detail), When he ascended up on high (viz. Christ, at His Ascension. The ascending, in the Psalm, is that of God, whose presence was symbolized by the ark, to Zion, The Apostle changes the words from the 2nd person to the 3rd; the address asserting a fact, which fact he cites), he led captive a captivity (i. e. ‘those who suffer captivity:’ a troop of captives: such is the constant usage of the abstract word captivity for the concrete in the Septuagint: and it is never put for ‘those who cause captivity,’ as some would interpret it. In the Psalm, these would be, the captives from the then war, whatever it was: in the interpretation, they were God’s enemies, Satan and his hosts), he gave gifts unto mankind (the original meaning of the Hebrew is obscure. The sense (see my Greek Test.) seems to be, ‘Thou hast taken gifts among men,’ hast, as a victor, surrounded by thy victorious host, brought gifts home, spoils of—and the result of such reception would be naturally stated as the distribution of them among such hosts, and the people,—as indeed ver. 12 of the Psalm has already stated. And so the Chaldee paraphrast understood the words, interpreting the passage of Moses: ‘thou hast given gifts to the sons of men’).

9.] Further explanation of this text. But that He ascended, what is it (does it imply) except that He also descended into the lower parts of the earth (the argument seems to be this: the Ascension here spoken of was not a first exaltation, but a return to heaven of one who dwelt in heaven: compare John iii. 13, which is in fact the key to these verses. The ascent implied a previous descent. This is the leading thought. But it is doubted how far the words the lower parts of the earth carry that descent, whether to earth merely, so that “of the earth” is the genitive of apposition, “the lower parts, which are the earth,”—or to Hades, so that it is genitive of possession, “the lower parts which belong to the earth.” It cannot be said that the descent into hell would be irrelevant here,—or that our Lord ascended, not from Hades, but from the earth: for, the fact of descent being the primary thought, we have only to ask as above, how far that descent is carried in the Apostle’s mind. The greater the descent, the greater the ascent: and if the captivity consisted of Satan and his powers, the warfare in which they were taken captive would most naturally be contemplated in all its extent, as reaching to their habitation itself:—‘this ascent, what does it imply but a descent, and that even to the lower parts of the earth from which the spoils of victory were fetched?’ And this meaning seems to be upheld by the words, “that he might fill all things,” which follow, as well as by the contrast furnished by up above all the heavens.—This interpretation is upheld by most of the ancients, and some of the best of the moderns: that of the Incarnation merely, descent on earth, by most of the moderns: that of Christ’s death [and burial], by Chrysostom and some others)?

10.] He that descended, He (and no other: “for it was not one that descended, and another that ascended,” Theodoret). is also He that ascended (in English idiom, we must express it as in the text; see again John iii. 18) up above (see on ch. i. 21) all the heavens (compare Heb. vii. 26, ‘made higher than the heavens:’ and iv. 14, “that has passed through the heavens.” It is natural that one who, like St. Paul, had been brought up in the Jewish habits of thought, should still use their methods of speaking, according to which the heaven is expressed in the plural, 'the heavens' And from such an usage "all the heavens" would naturally flow. See, on the idea of a threefold, or sevenfold division of the heavens, the note on 2 Cor. xii. 2. Ellicott quotes from Bishop Pearson,— 'Whatsoever heaven is higher than all the rest which are called heavens, into that place did he ascend'), that He might fill (not 'fulfil') all things (the whole universe: see ch. i. 23, note: with His presence, His sovereignty, His working by the Spirit: not, with His glorified Body, as some have thought. "Christ is perfect God, and perfect and glorified man: as the former He is present every where, as the latter He can be present any where." Ellicott).

11.] Resumption of the subject—the diversity of gifts, all bestowed by HIM, as a motive to unity.

And HE (emphatic; 'it is He, that') gave (the gifts which He gave to His Church are now enumerated. "The idea is, that the men who filled the office, no less than the office itself, were a divine gift." Eadie) some as apostles (see 1 Cor. xii. 28, and note); some as prophets (see on 1 Cor. xii. 10: and ch. ii. 20; iii. 5, notes); some as evangelists (not in the narrower sense of the word, writers of gospels, but in the wider sense, of itinerant preachers, usually sent on a special mission. See note on Acts xxi. 8); some as pastors and teachers (from these latter not being distinguished from the pastors by the repetition of "some as," it would seem that the two offices were held by the same persons. The figure in pastors, if to be pressed, would imply that they were entrusted with some special flock, which they tended, "residing in and busied about some one spot," as Chrysostom says; and then the "teaching" would necessarily form a chief part of their work. If this view be correct, this last class includes all the stationary officers of particular Churches);

12.] in order to (ultimate aim of these offices, see below) the perfecting of the saints, for (immediate object, see below) (the) work of (the) ministry (of ministry in God's Church. The articles give completeness in English, but do not affect the sense), for building up of the body of Christ:

13.] until (marks the duration of the offices of the ministry) we (being thus perfected by virtue of the work of the ministry and the building up) arrive all of us (Christians, Jews as well as Gentiles: first person, because he himself was among the number) at the unity of the faith ("how so? have not all Christians the same faith?.... No doubt they have, as regards its substance, but not as regards clearness and purity; because the object of faith may be diversely known, and knowledge has always such a powerful influence on faith. Therefore he adds to this unity of faith, and of the perfect knowledge, &c.: true and full unity of faith is then found, when all thoroughly know Christ, the object of faith, alike, and that in His highest dignity as the Son of God." De Wette) and of the perfect knowledge (further result of the faith, ch. iii. 17, 19; 2 Pet. i. 5) of the Son of God (this objective genitive belongs to both substantives, "the faith" and "the perfect knowledge"), at the full-grown man (an awkwardness is given by the coupling of an abstract [unto the unity] to a concrete [unto a full-grown man]. The singular not only denotes unity, but refers to the summation of us all in the one perfect Man Christ Jesus. The maturity of the full-grown man is contrasted with the infancy which follows), to the measure of the stature (or, 'age?' the Greek word may mean either. The similitude in the words "full-grown man" seems to be derived from age: that in ver. 16, from stature. The balance here is inclined in favour of stature, by the prevalence of the image of growth and extension, which can hardly be denied as pervading the passage) of the fulness of Christ (see note on ch. i. 23; 19. Of Christ is a genitive subjective:—the fulness which Christ has: 'Christ's fulness' Compare Gal. iv, 19): that (apparently another, and subordinate, aim of the bestowal of gifts on the church is here adduced. For we cannot go forward from the finished growth of ver. 13, and say that its object is that we be no longer children, but must go back again to the growth itself and its purpose; that purpose being mainly the terminal one of ver. 13, and subordinately the intermediate one of our ver. 14) we be no more (having been so once) children tossed (like waves: see James i. 6) and borne about by every wind of teaching (the Commentators quote from Plutarch, that "a man is not to let himself be carried obliquely by every argument as by a wind"), in (elemental: "the evil atmosphere, as it were, in which the varying currents of doctrine exist: exert their force." Ellicott) the sleight (literally, dice-playing. The word was naturally and constantly used to signify 'entrapping by deceit') of men (as contrasted with "of Christ," ver. 13), in craftiness furthering (tending or working towards) the system (see ch. vi. 11, note, and Chrysostom's explanation) of error (not, deceit, though in fact the sense is so. The genitive of error is subjective—the system is that which error adopts);

15.] but (opposition to the whole last verse; introducing as it does, not only the being followers of truth, but the growing up below) being followers of truth (the word here used cannot mean merely, as A.V., to speak the truth, as the whole matter dealt with is more general; the particular follows, ver. 25. The verb has the widest meaning of being true—and [as Stier remarks] not without a certain sense of effort, 'following after the truth.' The Vulgate gives it well, but perhaps with too exclusively practical a bearing, "doing truth:" the Five Clergymen, 'holding the truth,' which is objectionable as resolving the sense into mere orthodoxy: the old English versions, 'folowe the truth,' which by "the truth," still gives too much the objective sense. It is almost impossible to express it satisfactorily in English. I have somewhat modified this last rendering, restoring the general sense of 'truth.' The objection to 'followers of truth' is that it may be mistaken for 'searchers after truth'—but I can find no expression which does not lie open to equal objection) in love (this is added, as the element in which the Christian following of truth must take place: it is not and cannot be a following of truth at all hazards: but must be conditioned by love: a true-seeking and true-being with loving caution and kind allowance—not breaking up, but cementing, brotherly love by walking in truth) may grow up into (increase towards the measure of the stature of;—to the perfect man in Him. Again an allusion to the incorporation of all the Church in Christ: see below) Him in all things (in every department of our growth, ‘in all things wherein we grow’), which is the Head (see ch. i, 22), namely, Christ:

16.] from whom (see Col. ii. 19, an almost exact parallel, from which it is clear that ‘from whom’ belongs to ‘maketh the growth,’ below—He being the source of all growth) all the body (see on Col.), (which is) being closely framed together (note the present participle—the framing is not complete, but still proceeding) and compacted by means of every joint (to be joined, not with the participles preceding, but [see below] with maketh the growth, &c.) of the supply (the joints are the points of union where the supply passes to the different members, and by means of which the body derives the supply by which it grows. The genitive, as in “body of sin,” “vessels of the ministry,” is a kind of definitive genitive, by which the predominant use, purpose, or destination of the joint is specified and characterized.” Ellicott),—according to the working in the measure of each individual part,—carries on (the original denotes that the growth is not carried on from without, but by functional energy within the body itself) the growth of the body (of the body is repeated, rather than “of itself” used, perhaps for solemnity, perhaps [which is more likely] to call back the attention to the subject word, the body, after so long a description of its means and measure of growth) for the building up of itself in love (Love is the element in which the edification, as well as that in which the growth, takes place).

[B] (See on ver. 1.) IV. 17–VI. 9.] Exhortations to a course of walking and conversation, derived from the ground just laid down, and herein (iv. 17–v. 21) general duties of Christians as united to Christ their Head.

17.] This (which follows) then (resumptive of ver. 1. This is shewn by the fact that the “no longer walking” here is only the negative side of, and therefore subordinate to, the “walking worthily” of ver. 1. vv. 4–16 form a digression, arising out of the words, “the unity of the Spirit,” in ver. 3. Still this must not be too strictly pressed: the digression is all in the course of the argument, and “no longer” here is not without reference to “no longer” in ver. 14. The fervid style of St. Paul will never divide sharply into separate logical portions—each runs into and overlaps the other) I say (see Rom. xii. 3. That an imperative sense is involved, lies in the context), and testify in the Lord (element in which he spoke, not a formula of conjuring them; see 1 Thess. iv. 1, note), that ye no longer (‘as once:’ implied too by also below) walk as also (besides yourselves: though the Ephesians did not walk so now, their returning to such a course is made the logical hypothesis) the Gentiles (ye being now distinguished from them by being members of God’s church, though once Gentiles according to the flesh. Perhaps from this not being seen, “the rest of” was inserted) walk, in (element) vanity (see Rom. i. 21: they were made vain in their downward course from God. But we must not restrict the word to idolatry: it betokens the waste of the whole rational powers on worthless objects. See also on Rom. viii. 20) of their mind (their rational part),

18.] darkened (see again Rom. i. 21, and the contrast brought out 1 Thess. v. 4, 5, and ch. v. 8) in (the sphere or element in which) their understanding (perceptive faculty: intellectual discernment), alienated (objective result of the subjective ‘being darkened’) from the life of God (these words do not mean “the kind of life which God appointed,” as the ancients [Thdrt., Thl., and Grot., al.], for the peculiar word here used for life never has this meaning [see the two clearly distinguished in Gal. 7. 25], but always life, as opposed to death. Thus ‘the life of God’ will mean, as Beza1 beautifully says, “that life which God liveth in His own:” for, as Bengel says, “the spiritual life is kindled in believers from God’s own life.” Stier makes an important remark: “The Apostle is here treating, not so much of the life of God in Christ which is regenerated in believers, as of the original state of man, when God was his Life and Light, before the irruption of darkness into human nature”) on account of the ignorance (of God: see 1 Pet. i. 14) that is in them (not, by nature: compare Rom. i. 21–28: they did not choose to retain God in their knowledge, and this loss of the knowledge of Him alienated them from the divine Life), on account of (second clause, subordinate to alienated, &c.) the hardening (not blindness, as A.V., which is a mistaken rendering of the word. The proper meaning is becoming callous, as a part of the body does where the skin is hardened by constant friction or pressure. “By ‘hardening’ he means the last degree of insensibility: for the callosities in the body have no feeling, being altogether deadened.” Theodoret) of their heart, 19.] who as being past feeling gave up themselves (“themselves, with terrific emphasis. It accorded here with the hortatory object of the Apostle to bring into prominence that which happened on the side of their own free will. It is otherwise in Rom. i. 24, ‘God gave them up:’ and the two treatments of the fact are not inconsistent, but parallel, each having its vindication and its full truth in the matter of fact of the context.” Meyer) to wantonness (sec Gal. v. 19 note), in order to (conscious aim, not merely incidental result of the giving themselves up—see below) the working (this and more is implied: the being workmen—the working as at a trade or business—but we have no one word for it: so Chrysostom, “See how he shuts them out from excuse by using these words, the working of uncleanness: they sinned not, saith he, by chance fault, but they went and wrought the dread things themselves, and used that employ as their care in life”) of impurity of every kind (see Rom. i. 24–27) in greediness (such is the meaning, and not ‘with greediness,’ i.e. greedily, as A.V.

greediness, the desire of having more, is obviously a wider vice than mere covetousness, though this latter is generally its prominent form. It is self-seeking, or greed: in whatever direction this central evil tendency finds its employment. So that it may include in itself as an element, as here, lustful sins, though it can never actually mean ‘lasciviousness’).

20.] But YOU (emphatic) did not thus (not on these conditions, nor with such prospects) learn Christ (Christ personal—not to be explained away into a Christian life, or any thing else: see 1 Cor. i. 23; Phil. i. 15–18; Col. ii. 6. CHRIST Himself is the subject of all Christian preaching and all Christian learning—to know Him [Phil. iii. 10] is the great lesson of the Christian life, which these Ephesians began to learn at their conversion: see next verse); if, that is (see ch. iii. 2 note, and 2 Cor. v. 3. He does not absolutely assume the fact, but implies that he then believed and still trusts it was so), it was Him that ye heard (if ye really heard at your conversion the voice of the Shepherd Himself calling you as his sheep—John x. 27, see also John v. 25), and in Him that ye were taught (if it was in vital union with Him, as members of Him, that ye after your conversion received my teaching. Both these clauses are contained in learning Christ,—the first hearing of the voice of the Son of God, and growing in the knowledge of Him when awakened from spiritual death), according as is truth in Jesus (the rendering and connexion of this clause have been much disputed. I will remark, 1) that it seems by its form to be subordinate to “in Him that ye were taught,” and the according as to express the quality of the teaching: 2) that in this case we have truth is in Jesus answering to “in Him that ye were taught.”) 3) To take the easier members first, in Jesus is a closer personal specification of in Him—in Jesus—that one name recalling their union in both in His Person, and, which is important here, in His example also: 4) as is truth expands ye were taught—if the nature of the teaching which you received was according to that which is truth [in Him]. So that the meaning will amount to this—if ye were taught in Him according to that which is truth in Jesus;—if you received into yourselves, when you listened to the teaching of the Gospel, that which is true [respecting you—and Him] in your union with and life in Jesus, the Son of God manifest in the flesh),

22.] namely, that ye put off as regards your former way of life (explains the reference of the term put off: as if he had said, “for you were clothed with it in your former conversation”) the old man (your former unconverted selves, see note on Rom. vi. 6), which is (i. e., seeing that it is) corrupting (i. e., waxing corrupt) according to (in conformity with; as might be expected under the guidance of) the lusts of deceit (deceit is personified—the lusts which are the servants, the instruments of deceit: the rendering, ‘deceitful lusts, A.V., destroys the whole force and beauty of the contrast below to holiness of the truth),

23.] and be renewed (both in the original are marked,—the gradual process implied in the present tense, and the passive character of the verb) by (not merely the sphere in which, but the agency by which) the Spirit of your mind (the expression is unusual, and can only be understood by reference to the New Test. meaning of the word Spirit, as applied to men.—First, it is clearly here not exclusively nor properly ‘the Holy Spirit of God,’ because it is called “the Spirit of your mind.”) It is a Spirit, in some sense belonging to, not merely dwelling in, you. The fact is, that in the New Test. the “spirit” of man is only then used in its proper sense, as worthy of its place and governing functions, when it is one Spirit with the Lord. We read of no “old spirit.” the spiritual man is necessarily a man dwelt in by the Spirit of God: the psychic man is the ‘animal’ man led by the psyché (the animal soul), and not having a spirit, Jude 19. Thus then the disciples of Christ are being renewed, undergoing a process of renewal in the life of God, by the agency of the spirit of their minds, the restored and divinely-informed leading principle of their mind, just as the children of the world are walking in the vanity of their minds);

24.] and put on the new man (as opposed to the old, not meaning Christ, any further than as He is its great Head and prototype; see below), which was created (as historical fact, once for all, in Christ. In each individual case, it is not created again, but put on: cf. Rom. 14) after God (i. e., after God's image: see Col. iii. 10; also Gen. i. 27: so 1 Pet. i. 15. The doctrine of the restoration to us of the divine image in Christ, as here implied, is not to be overlooked. Not the bare fact of Gen. i. 27, but the great truth which that fact represents, is alluded to. The image of God in Christ is a far more glorious thing than Adam ever had, or could have had: but still the being “after the image of God,” “after God,” is true of both) in (element, or sphere, of the character of the new man) righteousness and holiness of the truth (again, beware of ‘true holiness,’ A.V.—as destroying the whole antithesis and force of the words. The genitive, too, belongs to both substantives.

the truth, God’s essence, John iii. 33; Rom. i. 25; iii. 7; xv. 8, opposed to “deceit.” “Righteousness and holiness occur together, but in contrary order, in Luke i. 75, and Wisd. ix. 3. The adjectives and adverbs are connected, 1 Thess. ii. 10: Tit. 1. 8. Righteousness betokens a just relation among the powers of the soul within, and towards men and duties without. But holiness betokens the integrity of the spiritual life, and the piety towards God of which that is the condition. Hence both expressions together complete the idea of moral perfection [Matt. v. 48]. As here the ethical side of the divine image is brought out, Col. iii. 10 brings out the intellectual. The new birth alone leads to perfect knowledge; all knowledge which proceeds not from renewal of heart is but outward appearance: and of this kind was that among the false Colossian teachers.” Olshausen).

25.] Wherefore (because of the general character of the new man as contrasted with the old, which has been given: “before, he spoke generally of the old man: now he describes it part by part.” Chrysostom) having put away (the past tense should be noticed here: it was open to the Apostle to write “putting away,” but he prefers the past—because the man must have once for all put off falsehood as a characteristic before he enters the habit of speaking truth) falsehood (abstract), speak truth each one with his neighbour (a quotation from the prophet Zechariah, see reff.): for we are members of one another (Rom. xii. 5. of one another brings out the relation between man and man more strongly than if he had said, of one body: at the same time it serves to remind them that all mutual duties of Christians are grounded on their union to and in Christ, and not on mere ethical considerations).

26.] Be ye angry, and sin not (citation: see ref.: and from the Septuagint version, not from the Hebrew, which [see Hupfeld on the Psalms in loc.] means ‘tremble [‘stand in awe,’ A.V.] and sin not.’ ‘The first imperative, although by way of command, is so in a weaker degree than the other: it is rather assumptive, than permissive.—‘Be angry [if it must be so].’ It has been asked (by Tholuck, Serm. on the Mount):—“If Paul speaks of culpable anger, how can he distinguish sinning from being angry? If of allowable anger, how can he expect not to retain it over the night?”—but we may answer that he speaks of anger which is an infirmity, but by being cherished, may become a sin): let the sun not set upon your irritation (i. e., set to your wrath with a brother a speedy limit, and indeed that one which nature prescribes—the solemn season when you part from that brother, to meet again perhaps in eternity):

27.] nor again (there is a slight climax: see below) give scope (opportunity of action, which you would do by continuing in a state of irritation) to the devil (not, to the slanderer, as some attempt to make it mean: the word “diabolos” as a substantive always has this personal meaning in the New Test.).

28.] Let him that stealeth (not ‘that stole,’ as A.V. Stier remarks well, that the word lies between “him that stole” and “the thief:” the former would be too mild, the latter too strong) steal no longer: but rather (“for it is not enough to leave off his sin, but he must enter on a course of life opposite to it.” Theophylact) let him labour, working (see John vi. 27 and note) with his hands (contrast to his former idleness for good, and bad use of those hands) that which is good (contrast to his former evil gain by theft), in order that (as a purpose to be set before every Christian in his honest labour) he may have to impart to him that hath need.

29.] Let every corrupt (or, worthless; “that has no profitable work to do,” Chrysostom: not so much ‘filthy,’—see ch. v. 4) saying not come forth (so the original, according to the Greek idiom) from your mouth, but whatever (saying) is good for building up of the (present) need (the need is the deficiency; the part which needs to be built up, the defect to be supplied by edification), that it may give grace (minister spiritual benefit: be a means of conveying through you the grace of God) to them that hear.

30.] And (Theophylact finely gives the connexion: “If thou speak a word corrupt and unbefitting a Christian mouth, thou hast grieved, not man, but the Spirit of God”) grieve not (the expression is according to man’s ideas,—but truly and touchingly sets forth the love of God, which [Rom. v. 5] is shed abroad in our hearts by His Spirit) the Holy Spirit of God, in whom (as the element, condition, of the sealing: not, as A.V., “whereby;” the sealing, both of the Lord and of us His members, is the act of the Father, John vi. 27: the Spirit being the seal, ch. i. 13) ye were sealed unto (in reservation for) the day of redemption (the day when redemption shall be complete in glory—see again ch. i. 18. So far from the doctrine of final perseverance, for which Eadie here more sharply than reasonably contends, being involved here, there could hardly be a plainer denial of it by implication. For in what would issue the grieving of the Holy Spirit, if not in quenching His testimony, and causing Him to depart from them? The caution of Theophylact, “break not the seal,” is a direct inference from the passage).

31.] Let all bitterness (not only of speech, but of disposition), and wrath, and anger (“wrath is a temporary, anger a chronic bearing of malice.” Ammonius. Both are effects of bitterness, considered as a rooted disposition), and clamour (“in which angry men break forth,” Estius), and evil speaking (the more chronic form of clamour—the reviling another not by an outbreak of abuse, but by the insidious undermining of evil surmise and slander. Chrysostom traces a progress in the vices mentioned: “See how he pushes forward the description of evil. Bitterness begets wrath, wrath begets anger, anger begets clamour, clamour begets slander”), be put away from you, with all malice (the inner root, out of which all these spring. “We know, that those enmities are most savage which are cherished within and make no show to those who are without.” Chrysostom):

32.] but be ye (literally, become ye: but it is very difficult to mark the distinction between become and be in a translation. Become ye is certainly too far off the time present; be ye, too immediately belonging to it. The difficulty is best seen in such a*command as that in John xx. 27, “Be not (become not) faithless, but believing”) towards one another, kind (see note, Gal. v. 22), tenderhearted, forgiving (see Luke vii. 42. Bengel notices that the three, kind, tenderhearted, forgiving, are opposed respectively to bitterness, wrath, and anger each other, even as (argument from His example whom we ought to resemble—also from the mingled of justice and gratitude, as Matt. xviii. 33) God in Christ (not ‘for Christ’s sake,’ as A.V., see 2 Cor. v. 19, 20. God IN Christ, manifested in Him, in all He has done, and suffered: Christ is the sphere, the conditional element in which this act took place) forgave you (not ‘has forgiven,’ as A.V. It is the historical fact of Christ once for all putting away sin by the sacrifice of Himself, which is alluded to. So that we are not to attempt to change the meaning into a future, as is often done, especially in prayers: e.g. “even, as thou, Lord, for Christ’s sake, hast promised to forgive us.” Family Prayers by the late Bishop Blomfield, p. 43).

Ephesians: Chapter 5

V. 1, 2.] These verses are best taken as transitional,—the inference from the exhortation which has immediately preceded, and introduction to the dehortatory passage which follows. Certainly Stier seems right in viewing the walk in love as resuming ch. iv. 1, and indicating a beginning, rather than a close, of a paragraph.—Be ye (or, “become ye,” see on last verse) therefore (seeing that God forgave you in Christ, see next verse) imitators of God (viz. in walking in love, see below), as children beloved (see next verse: and 1 John iv. 19); and (shew it by this, that ye) walk in love, as Christ also (this comes even nearer: from the love of the Father who gave His Son, to that of the Son, the Personal manifestation of that love in, our humanity) loved (not, ‘hath loved,’ as A.V.) us (the appeal, with the reading us, is a general one, deduced from the universal relation of us all to Christ: with you, it is more a personal one to the Ephesians), and gave up Himself (absolute; not to be joined with “to God”) for us (see note on Gal. iii. 13:—‘on our behalf,’ in fact, but not necessarily here implied, ‘in our stead’) an offering and a sacrifice (I believe the nearest approach to the truth in the question of the difference between offering and sacrifice will be made by regarding offering as the more general word, including all kinds of offering, —sacrifice as the more special one, usually involving the death of a victim. The great prominent idea here is the one sacrifice, which the Son of God made of Himself in his redeeming Love, in our nature—bringing it, in Himself, near to God —offering Himself as our representative Head: whether in perfect righteousness of life, or in sacrifice, properly so called, at his Death) to God (to be joined with the substantives “offering” and “sacrifice,” not with the verb, gave Himself up) for an odour of sweet smell (the question so much discussed, whether these words can apply to a sin-offering strictly so called, is an irrelevant one here. It is not [see above] the death of Christ which is treated of, but the whole process of His redeeming love. His death lies in the background, as one, and the chief, of the acknowledged facts of that process: but it does not give the character to what is here predicated of Him. The allusion primarily is to Gen. viii. 21, where after Noah had brought to God a sacrifice of every clean beast ‘and bird, “the Lord smelled a sweet savour,”—and the promise followed, that He would no more destroy the earth for man’s sake).

3–21.] Dehortation (for the most part) from works unbecoming the holiness of the life of children and imitators of God.

3.] But (not transitional merely: there is a contrast brought out by the very mention of fornication after what has just been said) fornication, and all impurity, or (see ch. iv. 19 note) covetousness (ib.), let it not be even named (i. e. let not the thing be even talked of. Compare Ps. xv. 4) among you, as becometh saints (meaning, that if it were talked of, such conversation would be unbecoming the holy ones of God);

4.] and obscenity (not in word only), and foolish talking (Trench well maintains, that in Christian ethics, this means more than mere ‘random talk:’ it is that talk of fools, which is folly and sin together), or (disjunctive, marking off jesting, as covetousness before) jesting (much interest attaches to this word. It had at first a good signification: “the habit of one easy and genial,” but got a bad sense, the being time-serving, easily turned,—or given to levity and inconsistency in talk; then finally settled down to the sense of jesting, ordinarily in a profligate sense), which are not becoming; but rather thanksgiving (how are we to fill up this clause? Probably, “but rather thanksgiving is becoming:” or, “but rather let thanksgiving be named among you.” The former seems the more probable. The connexion is apparently, ‘your true cheerfulness and play of fancy will be found, not in buffoonery, but in the joy of a heart overflowing with a sense of God’s mercies’).

5.] A ppeal to their own knowledge that such practices exclude from the kingdom of God: see below.—For this ye know (indicative, not imperative, “For this know”), being aware that every fornicator or (or now, not “and,” for individualization of each) unclean man, or covetous man, which is (i. e. which word means. This reading necessarily confines the reference to that one word) an idolater (compare Col. iii. 5, and Job xxxi. 24–28; Ps. lii. 7; Matt. vi. 24. Meyer remarks well, that it was very natural for St. Paul, whose forsaking of all things [2 Cor. vi. 10; xi. 27] so strongly contrasted with selfish greediness, to mark with the deepest reprobation the sin of covetousness), hath not inheritance (the present implying more the fixedness of the exclusion, grounded on the eternal verities of that Kingdom,—than mere future certainty: see 1 Cor. xv. 25) in the kingdom of Christ and God (not ‘and of God,’ as A.V. No distinction is to be made, Christ and God being, in the Greek, in the closest union. The words bear no legitimate rendering, except on the substratum of our Lord’s Divinity. But, on the other hand, we cannot safely say here, that the same person is intended by Christ and God).

6.] Let no one deceive you with empty (not containing the kernel of truth, of which words are but the shell—words with no underlying facts) sayings (the persons pointed at are heathen, or pretended Christian, palliators of the fore-mentioned vices. The caution was especially needed, at a time when moral purity was so generally regarded as a thing indifferent. Harless quotes from Bullinger,—“There were at Ephesus corrupt men, as there are in abundance among us now, who receive these salutary precepts of God with loud laughter, calling sins of uncleanness mere human weakness: acts of extortion, prudence: idle jesting, pleasantry,—and inferring that God will not be very severe on lapses of this kind”): for (let them say what they will, it is a fact, that) on account of these things (the above-mentioned crimes, see Col. iii. 6) cometh (present, as “hath,” ver. 5) the wrath of God (not merely, nor chiefly, His ordinary judgments, “of which examples are before our eyes:” but His special wrath, His vengeance for these sins, over and above their state of disobedience) on the sons of (see on ch. ii. 2) disobedience (the active and practical side of the state of the unbeliever [John iii. 36] is here brought out. The word [which in the original may mean either] is a valuable middle term between unbelief and disobedience, implying their identity in a manner full of the highest instruction).

7.] Be not (the distinction ‘Become not’ is unnecessary and indeed unsuitable: it is not a gradual ‘becoming,’ but ‘being,’ like them, which he here dehorts from. See note, ch. iv. last verse) therefore (since this is so—that God’s wrath comes on them) partakers (see ch. iii. 6) with them (the sons of disobedience, not the sins:—sharers in that which they have in common, viz. these practices: their present habitude, not, their punishment, which is future).

8.] For (your state [present, see above] is a totally different one from theirs—excluding any such participation) ye WERE (emphatic) once darkness (stronger than “in darkness,” Rom. ii. 19; 1 Thess. v. 4: they were darkness itself—see on “light” below), but now (are ye, in the original, is not expressed—perhaps, as Stier suggests, not only for emphasis, but to carry a slight tinge of the coming exhortation, by shewing them what they ought to be, as well as were by profession) light (not “enlightened”—light has an active, illuminating power, which is brought out in ver. 13) in (‘in union with’—conditioning element) the Lord (Jesus): walk (the omission of “therefore” makes the inference rhetorically more forcible) as children of light;

9.] for (gives the reason of the introduction of the comparison in the context, connecting this with the moral details which have preceded) the fruit of the light is in (is borne within the sphere of, as its condition and element) all goodness and righteousness and truth (in all that is good [Gal. v. 22], right, and true);

10.] proving (to be joined with the verb walk, ver. 9 having been parenthetical. The Christian’s whole course is a continual proving, testing, of the will of God in practice: investigating not what pleases himself, but what pleases Him) what is well pleasing unto the Lord.

11.] And have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness (see Gal. v. 19, 22; on which Jerome says, “Vices finish with themselves and perish; virtues put forth fruit and abound.” See also the distinction in John iii. 20, 21; v. 29), but rather even reprove them (in words: not only abstain from fellowship with them, but attack them and put them to shame).

12.] For (the connexion seems to be, ‘reprove them—this they want, and this is more befitting you—for to have the least part in them, even in speaking of them, is shameful’) the things done in secret by them it is shameful even to speak of (the connexion being—‘I mention not, and you need not speak of, these deeds of darkness, much less have any fellowship with them—your connexion with them must be only that which the act of reproof necessitates’).

13.] But (opposition to things done in secret) all things (not only, all the things done in secret, as Ellicott after Jerome, al.: the Apostle is treating of the general detecting power of light, as is evident by the resumption of the all in the next clause) being reproved are made manifest by the light: for every thing that is made manifest is light (the meaning being, ‘the light of your Christian life, which will be by your reproof shed upon these deeds of darkness, will bring them out of the category of darkness into light’ (‘when it is manifested it becomes light,’ Chrysostom). They themselves were thus ‘once darkness,’ but having been ‘reproved’ by God’s Spirit, had become ‘light in the Lord.’ The A.V. is doubly wrong—1) in ‘all things that are reproved:’ 2) in ‘whatsoever doth make manifest is light’ [which is also an ungrammatical reading of the Greek]: besides that such a proposition has absolutely no meaning in the context).

14.] Wherefore (this being so—seeing that every thing that is made manifest becomes light,—is shone upon by the detecting light of Christ,—objectively,—it only remains that the man should be shone upon inwardly by the same Christ revealed in his awakened heart. We have then in Scripture an exhortation to that effect) He (viz. God, in the Scripture: see ch. iv. 8 note. No other reading is allowable) saith, Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall shine upon thee (where is this citation to be found? In the first place, by the introduction of the word Christ it is manifestly a paraphrase, not an exact citation. The Apostle cites, and had a perfect right to cite, the language of prophecy in the light of the fulfilment of prophecy: and that he is here doing so, the bare word ‘Christ’ shews us beyond dispute. I insist on this, that it may be plainly shewn to be no shift in a difficulty, no hypothesis among hypotheses,—but the necessary inference from the form of the citation. This being so,—of what passage of the Old Test. is this a paraphrase? I answer, of Isa. lx. 1, 2. There, the Church is set forth as being in a state of darkness and of death [cf. lix. 10], and is exhorted to awake, and become light, for that her light is come, and the glory of Jehovah has arisen upon her).

15.] He now resumes the hortative strain, interrupted by the digression of vv. 12–14, Take heed then (there is not any immediate connexion with the last verse: but the then resumes from the “walk” in ver. 8, and that which followed it there) how ye walk strictly (the construction is exactly as in 1 Cor. iii. 10, “Let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon.” ‘Take heed of what sort your strict walking is:’—the implication being, ‘take heed not only that your walk be exact, strict, but also of what sort that strictness is—not only that you have a rule, and keep to it, but that that rule be the best one.’ So that a double exhortation is involved), (namely) not as unwise, but as wise (qualification of the walking strictly, and expansion of the manner of such walking),

16.] buying up (for yourselves) (the) opportunity (viz. of good, whenever occurring [best rendered in an English version by a plural, opportunities]; let it not pass by, but as merchants carefully looking out for vantages, make it your own: see Col. iv. 5), because the days (of your time,—in which you live) are evil.

17.] On this account (because ye have need so prudently to define your rule of life, and so carefully to watch for opportunities of good) be not (better than ‘do not become, which puts the process of degeneracy too strongly in English) senseless (or foolish), but understand (know intelligently,—as matter of fact, as the servant who knew his lord’s will and did it not, Luke xii. 47) what is the will of the Lord.

18.] The connexion seems to be: after the general antithesis in ver. 17, “be not foolish, but understand,” &c., he proceeds to give one prominent instance, in the same antithetical shape.

And (introducing a particular case after a general injunction) be not drunken with wine, in which [practice] (not, in wine, but the being drunken with it—the crime is not in God’s gift, but in the abuse of it: and the very arrangement of the sentence in the Greek, besides the spirit of it, implies the lawful use of wine—see 1 Tim. v. 23) is profligacy (the word in the Greek is derived from not saving, squandering: and, as spendthrifts are almost of necessity self-indulgent and reckless, the word comes to have the meaning of ‘dissoluteness,’ ‘debauchery,’ ‘profligacy’); but (contrast, see above) be filled (antithesis to being drunken with wine) with (literally, ‘in.’ let this be the region in, and the ingredient with which you are filled) the Spirit (your own spirit, dwelt in and informed by the Holy Spirit of God, see note on ch. iv. 23. If this is so, if you are full of the Spirit, full in Spirit, there will be a joy indeed, but not that of profligacy: one which will find its expression not in drunken songs, but in Christian hymns, and continual thankfulness);

19.] speaking to one another (ch. iv. 32; see also the parallel place, Col. iii. 16. It is perhaps too much to find in this the practice of antiphonal chanting: but it is interesting to remember that in Pliny’s letter the Christians are described as accustomed to meet on a set day before day, and to sing a song to Christ as God by turns among themselves: Nicephorus, Hist. xiii. 8, says, “The custom of antiphonal chanting the church has received from as far back as the Apostles”) in psalms (not to be confined, as Olshansen and Stier, to Old Test. hymns; see 1 Cor. xiv. 26; James v. 13. The word properly signified those sacred songs which were performed with musical accompaniment,—as hymns without it: but the two must evidently here not be confined strictly to their proper meaning) and hymns (see above) and [spiritual] songs (or, odes: the general name for all lyrical poetry, and applying especially to such effusions as persons used in the state of drunkenness; the Christian’s ode is to be spiritual, inspired by that fulness of the Spirit which is in him), singing and playing (as well as speaking, not explanatory of it: singing and playing corresponding to hymns and psalms above) in your heart to the Lord (i. e. Christ—compare Pliny’s letter above);
